

My Grandmother, Spit on by Nuns at Easter, Came to America

Here my grandfather manufactured screens.
Mornings, he drove off to days of tacking squares of mesh to wooden frames.
Who burst through those wire windows was not his business. Every evening he demanded pleasure, calling for the music of his young son's violin.

Weekly my mother dressed in a tiny skirt and reached upon her toes to become their ballerina.
Left to herself in afternoons, she lay in wait for passing strangers, flounced down from the cemented porch, skirt awhirl, and kicked them without pause until she sobbed.

To me they've left their piano, the keyboard grey, untouched for years.
No moon tonight,
just my banging in darkness, still lonely, strange to them, my toneless minuets still the dance-tunes of Russians rising from their heels in surprised black nights across our lawn.

—Joanne Jacobson