

AT THE STOVE

Matthew Lippman

Dropped in for a while.

Snow came soon.

Didn't know how long I'd be around. Came to your place between the hour and the car. In the barn

a child slept in hay.

Cold out,

tonight, though your eyes are blue. Dropped in for some time,
get my bearings.

You were at the stove, stirring the tomatoes. It's always been that way. Then, time to go.
Grow up and go.

Means something. Now,

I'm growing radish in my field. The monkeys come sometimes. It happens

when I think of you wrapping oil soaked gauze around your fingers. It happens when I'm restless. Snow came in the night. Look here,

I said to it,

why couldn't we have lungs in our lungs.
The pipes stayed quiet. A whole lot quieter than the onion in the basket growing a root. Dropped in for the heat.

The road was blue. All my belongings were blue.

I couldn't hear the owl. Needed the suede against my face.

All your trimmings. Then,

wings off. time to go. Out the window,

Ice between my fingers.

My fingers once in you.

The caps off.

The world off.

The field burning

wrapped around the heels of my boots.
