

AUGUST ON ALICE

Jonathan Blum

Last August there was nothing wrong with our naked bodies polishing off little loaves of banana bread from the Merritt Bakery on a cool night in the evenings reading Flannery O'Connor out loud in bed we dreamed about buying a '65 Buick LeSabre from an old couple in Santa Cruz who told us they didn't need that much room any more in my journal I strung eighth notes across song lyrics we played in your not yet vandalized car I learned "Chelsea Bridge" my legs felt danced on Last August I would fall asleep at 3 in your arms listening to you breathe and wake up to your lips kissing me wanting me then I was the woman full of steam and vigor staying awake after feeling it in my teeth and the heels of my feet in my bed where good things could now be stored and there was peace after dreams

we wondered whether people really felt like what it felt like to make love were they scared as we were your honey quaking and we did not go further

This August every window on Alice Street is open again impatiens in the courtyard are shining like a fountain it's a lunch hour cookout on a third floor balcony but you do not live here your stuff is not here instead you have turned up on the back of a bookmark where you once pencilled a long distance phone number then again because I still buy the toothpaste you like because I still have the box of horrible-fitting condoms the Guardian recommended because the candles beside my bed have not burned down

This August the morning sun keeps reminding me that before our indefinite silences you came to Oakland and blessed this once-dreaded month shook all the evil out of it so that now when I go walking up Alice Street without you past the wasps floating round the 10-foot hollyhocks the kids in drumming camp no line at the post office I don't tap any of the watermelons at the Goodluck Supermarket for knowing still they will all be sweet
