Star Ledger

POEMS BY

Lynda Hull

THE IOWA POETRY PRIZE
Winner of the
EDWIN FORD PIPER
Poetry Award

Publication of this book was made possible with the generous assistance of Janet Piper
In memory of Mary Green Hull
Acknowledgments

Several of these poems have also been included in anthologies: “Black Mare” in Under 35: The New Generation (Doubleday); “Hospice” in Poets for Life: Seventy-Six Poets Respond to AIDS (Crown) and in Pushcart Prize XV (Pushcart Press); “Frugal Repasts,” “Love Song during Riot with Many Voices,” and “Shore Leave” in New American Poets of the 90’s (David R. Godine).

I would like to thank the National Endowment for the Arts for a fellowship which allowed me to complete this book and the Yaddo and Edna St. Vincent Millay colonies for fruitful residencies.

“Love Song during Riot with Many Voices” is for Dean Young and Cornelia Nixon; “The Real Movie, with Stars” is for Ralph Angel; “Adagio” is for Mark Doty; and “Abacus” is for soul-sister Barbara Anderson. “The Crossing, 1927” makes use of passages from Edna St. Vincent Millay’s journals and is for Herbert Morris. “Utsuroi” owes a debt to Marina Warner. Most of all my best thanks to David, whose constant support and belief made this book possible.
Contents

★ I ★
Star Ledger, 3
Shore Leave, 6
Fairy Tales: Steel Engravings, 8
Love Song during Riot with Many Voices, 11
Midnight Reports, 15
The Real Movie, with Stars, 17
So Many Swimmers, 20
Adagio, 23

★ II ★
Edgemont: The Swans, 29
Visiting Hour, 32
The Crossing, 1927, 35
Aubade, 40
Studies from Life, 43
Utopia Parkway, 47
Gateway to Manhattan, 50
Magical Thinking, 53
Utsuroi, 56
III

Cubism, Barcelona, 61
Counting in Chinese, 65
Carnival, 68
Frugal Repasts, 71
Abacus, 74
Lost Fugue for Chet, 78
Vita Brevis, 81
Hospice, 84
Black Mare, 88
How perilous to choose not to love the life we're shown.

Seamus Heaney
Almost time to dress for the sun's total eclipse so the child pastes one last face in her album of movie stars – Myrna Loy and Olivia de Havilland – names meant to conjure sultry nights, voluptuous turns across some dance floor borne on clouds. Jean Harlow.

Clipped from the Newark evening paper, whole galaxies of splendid starlets gaze, fixed to violet pages spread drying on the kitchen table. The child whispers their names when she tests “lorgnettes” made that morning out of shirtboards, old film negatives gleaned from her grandmother's hat box.

Through phony opera glasses, hall lights blur stained sepia above her, and her grandmother's room is stained by a tall oak's crown, yellow in the window. Acorns crack against asphalt three floors down. The paper promised “a rare conjunction of sun and moon and earth.”

Her grandmother brushed thick gray hair.
    Cut glass bottles and jewel cases.
Above the corset her back was soft, black moles she called her “melanomas” dusted across powdery skin like a night sky, inside out.
The Spanish fan dangles from her wrist and when she stands she looks like an actress from the late-night movies. The child sifts costume brooches, glass rubies and sapphires, to find the dark gold snake ring with emerald chips for eyes. She carries the miniature hourglass to the sagging porch, then waiting turns it over and over. Uncertain in high heels, she teeters and the shawl draped flamenco-style keeps sliding off her shoulder, so she glances up the block to Girl Scouts reeling down the flag. The child hates their dull uniforms, how they scatter shrieking through leafsmoke and the sheen of fallen chestnuts. She touches the ring, heavy on a ribbon circling her neck, then thinks she’ll sew the album pages with green embroidery silk.

Her grandmother snaps the fan and they raise lorgnettes to the sun’s charcoaled face, its thin wreath of fire. Quiet, the Girl Scouts bow their heads – sleek Italian ones and black girls with myriad tight braids.

Streetlights hum on, then the towers of Manhattan flare beyond the river. The earth must carve its grave ellipse through desert space, through years and histories before it will cross with sun and moon this way again.
Minor starlets in the child's album will fade and tatter, fleeting constellations with names flimsy as the shawl that wraps her shoulders. She'll remember this as foolish. The girls by the flag will mostly leave for lives of poverty, crippled dreams, and Newark will collapse to burn like another dying star.

But none of this has happened. Afternoon has stilled with the eclipse that strips them of their shadows, so each one stands within their own brief human orbit while the world reverses, then slowly, recovers.

She wears the sailor suit – a blouse with anchors, skirt puffed in stiff tiers above her thin knees, those spit-shined party shoes. Behind her a Cadillac’s fabulous fins gleam and reflected in the showroom window, her father’s a mirage. The camera blocks his face as he frames a shot that freezes her serious grin, the splendid awkwardness of almost-adolescence. He’s all charm with the car dealer and fast-talks them a test-drive in a convertible like the one on display, a two-tone Coupe de Ville. But once around the corner he lowers the top and soon they’re fishtailing down dump-truck paths, the Jersey Meadows smoldering with trash fires. He’s shouting Maybelline, why can’t you be true, and seagulls lift in a tattered curtain across Manhattan’s hazy skyline. Dust-yellow clouds behind him, he’s handsome as a matinee idol, wavy hair blown straight by sheer velocity. Tall marsh weeds bend, radiant as her heart’s relentless tide. They rip past gaping Frigidaires, rusted hulks of cranes abandoned to the weather. Her father teases her she’s getting so pretty he’ll have to jump ship sometime and take her on a real whirl, maybe paint the whole town red. For her merchant marine conjures names like condiments – Malabar, Marseilles – places where the laws of gravity don’t hold. She can’t believe her father’s breakneck luck will ever run out.
He accelerates and spins out as if the next thrill will break through to some more durable joy.
So she stands, hands atop the windshield and shouts the chorus with him, and later when they drop the car he takes her to a cocktail bar and plays Chuck Berry on the jukebox. She perches on a barstool and twirls her Shirley Temple’s paper umbrella, watches the slick vinyl disks stack up, rhythms collecting, breaking like surf as her father asks the barmaid to dance with him through “Blue Moon,” then foamy glass after glass of beer. The barmaid’s sinuous in red taffeta, a rhinestone choker around her throat. Her father’s forgotten her and dances a slow, slow tango in the empty bar and the dark comes on like the tiny black rose on the barmaid’s shoulder rippling under her father’s hand.
The girl thinks someday she’ll cover her skin with roses, then spins, dizzy on the barstool.
She doesn’t hear the woman call her foolish mortal father a two-bit trick because she’s whirling until the room’s a band of light continuous with the light the city’s glittering showrooms throw all night long over the sleek, impossible cars.
Dusk after dusk, through the smoke of industry and autumn buffed across the sky, the shy girl loses herself in books her grandmother once read as a child. Blue and violet spines shine in her hands, gilt-edged pages and those stories of runaway children transformed to sea urchins caught by underwater journeys. At some point in her mind, the Thames and Hudson braid their waters and below, the traffic flows like the river flows across the pages, steely, engraved with whorls and the salesgirls wave from curbs and bus-stop islands like good children left behind, sketched on riverbanks or sleeping the sleep of a different century. The playground cries of Catholic girls across the street filter through the curtains to her reading chair and although they surely know the soul is a white, clear room they carry with them, they seem so purely physical, unbound in blue gym suits, cool air stippling their skin. Nuns’ faces from sidelines float, bodiless, the girl believes, on columns of air, their habits shirring the wind.
The girl looks back to her book and her grandmother’s humming through a clatter of enamelware and radio news from Cuba, then the Aqueduct race results — Fred Caposella chanting a spell of Caribbean jockeys’ names steaming through the alarm of garlic and rosemary that clouds the panes of London where yellow squares of gaslight show the way home to solitary walkers draped in bracelets, thin collars of fog. Beyond the parlor windows the girl sees women turn in heavy silks through brittle rings of gossip that rise up the stairwell to the empty nursery, an open window where their children have descended ladders of white mist, and it’s too late to call them home from the river’s quick current. Already the bridges have closed over them, arms embracing, letting go those children whose bodies swiftly grow strange, paradisal. Book open on her lap, the girl’s already in love with promises of transport. She traces the caps of engraved sea-leaves that frame those faces like sunflowers turning to follow the moon’s silver imperative that lays a ruler across the waves, the tides where her story begins in the surge and lapse of traffic.

She hears Bay of Pigs then Odds to to 1, and the cries fading, now turning sharper across the street as if by sheer volume, each girl might stay her departure.
Love Song during Riot with Many Voices

Newark, 1967

The bridge's iron mesh chases pockets of shadow and pale through blinds shuttering the corner window to mark this man, this woman, the young eclipse their naked bodies make – black, white, white, black, the dying fall of light rendering bare walls incarnadine, color of flesh and blood occluded in voices rippling from the radio: Saigon besieged, Hanoi, snipers and the riot news helicoptered from blocks away. All long muscle, soft hollow, crook of elbow bent sequined above the crowd, nightclub dancers farandole their grind and slam into streets among the looters. Let's forget the 58¢ lining his pockets, forget the sharks and junkyards within us. Traffic stalls to bricks shattering, the windows, inside her, bitch I love you, city breaking down and pawnshops disgorge their contraband of saxophones and wedding rings. Give me a wig, give me a pistol. Hush baby, come to papa, let me hold you through night's broken circuitry, chromatic and strafed blue with current. Let's forget this bolt of velvet fallen from a child's arm brocading pavement where rioters careen in furs and feathered hats burdened with fans, the Polish butcher's strings of sausages, fat hams. This isn't a lullaby a parent might croon to children before sleep, but all of it belongs: in the station torn advertisements whisper easy credit, old men wait for any train out of town and these lovers mingling, commingling their bodies, this slippage, a haul and wail of freight trains pulling away from the yards. With this girl I'll recall black boys by the soda shop, other times with conked pompadours and scalloped afterburns stenciled across fenders. Through the radio

Hendrix butanes his guitar to varnish, crackle and discord of "Wild Thing." Sizzling strings, that Caravaggio face bent to ask the crowd did they want to see him sacrifice something he loved. Thigh, mouth, breast, small of back, dear hollow of the throat, don’t you understand this pressure of hotbox apartments? There’s no forgetting the riot within, fingernails sparking to districts rivering with flame. What else could we do but cling and whisper together as children after the lullaby is done, but no, never as children, never do they so implore, oh god, god, bend your dark visage over this acetylene skyline, over Club Zanzibar and the Best of Three, limed statues in the parks, over the black schoolgirl whose face is smashed again and again. No journalist for these aisles of light the cathedral spots cast through teargas and the mingling, commingling of sisters’ voices in chapels, storefront churches asking for mercy.

Beyond the bridge’s iron mesh, the girl touches a birthmark behind her knee and wishes the doused smell of charred buildings was only hydrants flushing hot concrete.
Summertime. Pockets of shadow and pale. Too hot to sleep. Hush baby, come to papa, board the window before morning's fractured descant, a staccato crack of fire escapes snapping pavement and citizens descending, turning back with points of flame within their eyes before they too must look away. At dawn, when the first buses leave, their great wipers arc like women bending through smoke to burdens, singing terror, singing pity.

That's how billboards give up their promises – they look right into your window, then whisper sex, success. The Salem girl's smoke plume marries the gulf between the high-rise projects, the usual knife's edge ballet enacted nightly there for the benefit of no one. It's just that around midnight every love I've known flicks open like a switchblade and I have to start talking, talking to drown out the man in the radio who instructs me I'm on the edge of a new day in this city of Newark which is not a city of roses, just one big hockshop. I can't tell you how it labors with its grilled storefronts, air rushing over the facts of diamonds, appliances, the trick carnations. But you already know that. The M-16 Vinnie sent – piece by piece – from Vietnam is right where you left it the day you skipped town with the usherette of the Paradise Triple-X Theater. You liked the way she played her flashlight down those rows of men, plaster angels flanked around that screen. Sometimes you'd go fire rounds over the landfill, said it felt better than crystal meth, a hit that leaves a trail of neon, ether.
I keep it clean, oiled, and some nights it seems like a good idea to simply pick up that rifle and hold it, because nothing's safe. You know how it is: one minute you're dancing, the next you're flying through plate glass and the whole damn town is burning again with riots and looters, the bogus politicians.
We'd graduated that year, called the city ours, a real bed of Garden State roses. I've drawn x's over our eyes in the snapshot Vinnie took commencement night, a line of x's over our linked hands. The quartet onstage behind us sang a cappella – four brothers from Springfield Ave. spinning in sequined tuxedos, palms outstretched to the crowd, the Latin girls from Ironbound shimmering in the brief conflagration of their beauty, before the kids, before the welfare motels, corridors of cries and exhalations.
I wore the heels you called my blue suede shoes, and you'd given yourself a new tattoo, my name across your bicep, in honor of finishing, in honor of the future we were arrogant enough to think would turn out right.
I was laughing in that picture, laughing when the rain caught us later and washed the blue dye from my shoes – blue, the color of bruises, of minor regrets.
The tide foams in with its cargo of debris, and this man, delirious in evening clothes, kneels begging me please and it doesn't matter who I am or that he's never seen me. Off-season, the boardwalk's empty pay phone rings through the chemical Atlantic's curse and slap.

What can I say? Me, another stranger with empty pockets, bad habits, unpacking my sequence of crises vanquished, surpassed then spread upon the beach between us. He's staggered away and it's as if I'm swimming in a theater's musk of plush, watching myself drunk again on blanched sunlight, the lethal hum of oleander, whatever ravening thing we want that's so illusory. Los Angeles. The audience shuffles while in the balcony a man weeps before the film commences.

That concrete arroyo I, someone not I, wandered once through blurred frames to this two-bit Sonoran rodeo – everyone swilling beer around a chestnut gelding, shoulders lathered, his nostrils tortured to a rude facsimile of roses. Such breath, such confounding brilliance, this slim Mexican saying estrella, estrellita, fingering my blond hair. Maybe it was the sunglasses. Or a tincture of sweat and panic like that streaking the forehead of the B-movie actress playing someone’s discarded mistress down on a binge, reeling stupidly through pastel hallucinated alleys seeking amnesia’s salt tequila sting.

A stranger with formal collar and cummerbund. Someplace where there are no casual encounters. But tonight, a continent away there’s the salt kiss, full on the mouth, of another ceaseless ocean bestowing gnarled rafts of weed, the styrofoam and high heels.

I wasn’t supposed to be in that arroyo. The Mexicans weren’t supposed to be in the country. Larger and larger circles of not belonging, as if we belonged anywhere marooned in our tidepools of tiaras and razors, little kits brought along for the ride. As if anything, finally, belongs to us – those intangible empires of fear and regret, sudden crests of tenderness. Even the soul, some would hold, escapes to a vast celestial band wrapping the world without us. In Los Angeles, a beige froth of haze hid the mountains. Estrellita, and what gone thing did the Mexican recall in that turning? A girl's dusky hand cradling fruit with silvery skin, coiled pulp the tint of roses in mist? Or was it dust cascading from the tipped palm, La Pelona, that old bald uncle, Death, spitting on a barroom floor?

In this movie time's running out. The Mexican touched my hair and I took the kiss full on the mouth, sweet fruit, miraculous chemistry of salts and water that keeps the flesh, that swells and spills and feels so like weeping. What belongs to me, if not this? Given splendor by the pay phone's luminescence, the man wearing evening clothes slumps upon the boardwalk.
Perhaps he is the messenger beneath these chilling stars, these heavenly infernos, burning here above the sea.
Confettied to shreds, the last leaves darken gusts that shrug passersby into winter. On the sill, a fly's husk rattles its hollow cartouche, photos spread across the table in this perishing slant of afternoon. Distant with afterlife's opacity, my friend's face shadows the surface, so many cherished strangers, the stolen kiss returned with its burden.

Again, the struck chord of some rapt entropic melody, the static fall of a kimono from alabaster shoulders. Was it a blue room or a shade more sheer like gauze fluting the brow?

Was the white piano by the wall, crumbling plaster and ivy twining to espalier the inside of this place, the mind's edge glimpsed by half-sleep? Calm is apparitional at times like these, December's first gale from the sea rocking this ship of a house in surge and creak, water foaming the road. Before me, the photos fan the hour’s edge, my friend caught like this – angle of bone, aquiline bridge too visible through translucent skin.

    Savage out there.
Fence pickets undo themselves from next-door’s yard where a television fills with snow. Capricious nature, this uneasy providence, and here’s remembrance arriving with the azure hiss of airmail letters: blanketed in black and white, he’s propped in wicker, the crescent of beach dissolving to sea behind him, the most remote margin of land where on rare days it’s possible to walk endlessly, it seems, into breakers, the tide . . . Beside him, an ashen cyclamen. One failing stem designs pure curve, the single bloom so like the shape of cormorants in flight beyond tawny estuaries, beyond rollers in the bay striking out like the shoulders of so many swimmers. At first his mortal glance seems empty, then it's clear the emptiness is mine, that half-dreamt room is grief, a single creased syllable opening to the circling of cormorants inviolate, beyond the coast of anything we know.

Across Majestic Boulevard, Steam Bath neons the snow to blue, and on her table a blue cup steams, a rime of stale cream circling its rim. Before finding the chipped case behind the mirror, she waits for morning the way an addict must wait, a little longer, and studies the torn print on the wall – lilies blurred to water stains, a woman floating in a boat trailing fingers in its wake. Someone rich. Someone gone.

Maybe a countess. She lets herself drift in the boat warming thin translucent hands in coffee steam.

She’s not a countess, only another girl from the outer boroughs with a heroin habit as long as the sea routes that run up and down the coast.
She’s read all winter a life of Hart Crane, losing her place, beginning again with Crane in a room by the bridge, the East River, spending himself lavishly. She’s spent her night circulating between piano bars and cabarets where Greek sailors drink and buy her cheap hotel champagne at 10 bucks a shot before evaporating to another port on the map of terra incognita the waterlilies chart along her wall. The mantel is greened with a chemical patina of sweat and time, and she can’t call any of this back. Hart Crane sways, a bottle of scotch in one hand, his face plunged inside the gramophone’s tin trumpet, jazzed to graceless oblivion. She rinses her face in the basin, cold water, then turns to glance across the boulevard where life’s arranged in all its grainy splendor. The steam bath sign switches off with dawn, a few departing men swathed in pea coats. The bath attendant climbs as always to the roof, then opens the dovecote to let his pigeons fly before descending to his berth.

They bank and curve towards the harbor that surrenders to the sea. She knows Crane will leap from the Orizaba’s stern to black fathoms of water, that one day she'll lock this room and lose the key. The gas flame's yellow coronet stutters and she rolls her stocking down at last to hit the vein above her ankle, until carried forward she thinks it's nothing but the velocity of the world plunging through space, the tarnished mirror slanted on the mantel showing a dove-gray sky beginning to lighten, strangely, from within.

Next, the dull silk thwack of an umbrella opening. No, that was later, her grandmother's hands & the umbrella smelled like some lost decade, like shelter – camphor & lavender.

They're going to feed the swans, a long bus ride past the wilderness of chrome dinettes where soda jerks shimmy behind their blinding counters.

Tenements unpin themselves from gray construction-paper sky diesel to nothingness by the bus's passage to orange leaves pasting copper beeches in the park. There is the door's pneumatic snap behind them, then rain fuming the pavement, Indian summer & couples loiter – young men fatally cool in pointed shoes, leather jackets wrapping the shoulders of varnish-haired girls. Her grandmother holds a sack of bread while she kneels by the lake. Swans gloss towards shore & she sees through her face in the shallows by the sluice, a mask rippled over the bottom's plush ferment of silt & leaves. Then silently, the swans arrive opening & closing coral beaks, black tongues. They cancel her reflection with their cluster & jostle for crumbs. She knows about the gods, how they come to earth sometimes as swans. Dense mist rivulets snowy backs & her sweater is fog when the slim necks arc over her their soft, laddered clucking & what alien grace, the white weight of swans leaving water & for once she has no longing for the future, for beauty beyond the trance of swans. There's thunder & I know they all must leave the park for the heart's violent destinations – raptures & betrayals, departures & returns, a torrent of stories bewildering & arbitrary as any the gods might choose. In one, war begins, the swans are garroted with piano wire, a soldier unraveling his skein of private nightmares. Her grandmother saves the clipping. Another has the girl argue with her grandmother, take flight to suffer, almost accidentally, her first kiss. The darkened park. This utter stranger. But here the stories blur until the soldier is the stranger & the hands that tangle the girl's damp hair, tilt back a long swan's neck, so rippling transformed, she's reflected in that stricken human face trying to lose itself over hers in a ferment of white wings, sluice-water dousing park lights.

So many seasons' debris, where the crumbs she'd strewn as a child vanish again, chimerical as memory, & swans glide away carving clear wakes in a timeless still lake. I see a girl waiting for a bus.
Lightly, it's raining on her grandmother's face so the umbrella opens its scent & bus tickets stain their hands with minute, indigo numbers that show the fare.
From the hospital solarium we watch row houses change with evening down the avenue, the gardener bending to red asters, his blond chrysanthemums. Each day I learn more of the miraculous.

The gardener rocks on his heels and softly Riva talks to me about the d.t.'s, her gin hallucinations. The willow on the lawn is bare, almost flagrant in the wind off Baltimore harbor. She wants me to brush her hair. Some mornings I'd hear her sing to herself numbers she knew by heart from nightclubs on the waterfront circuit.

I wondered if she watched herself dissolve in the mirror as shadows flickered, then whispering gathered. Floating up the airshaft her hoarse contralto broke over "I Should Care,"

"Unforgettable," and in that voice everything she remembered – the passage from man to man, a sequence of hands undressing her, letting her fall like the falling syllables of rain she loves, of steam, those trains and ships that leave. How she thought for years a departure or a touch might console her, if only for the time it takes luck to change, to drink past memory of each stranger that faltered over her body until her song was a current of murmurs that drew her into sleep, into the shapes of her fear. Insects boiling from the drain, she tells me, a plague of veiled nuns. Her hair snaps, electric in the brush, long, the color of dust or rain against a gunmetal sky. I saw her once, at the end of a sullen July dusk so humid that the boys loitering outside the Palace Bar & Grill moved as if through vapor. She was reeling in spike heels, her faded blue kimono.
They heckled her and showered her with pennies, spent movie tickets. But she was singing.

That night I turned away and cursed myself for turning. She holds a glass of water to show her hands have grown more steady. Look, she whispers, and I brush and braid and the voices of visiting hour rise then wind like gauze. The gardener’s flowers nod, pale in the arc lamps that rinse the factory boys shooting craps as they always do down on Sweet Air Avenue. I know they steam the dice with breath for luck before they toss, and over them the air shimmers the way still water shimmers as gulls unfold like Riva’s evening hands across the sky, tremulous, endangered.

A floating city of substance, of ether and haze, the great liner crests and breaks through foam, streams of cold turquoise. On deck, slippery, wet, deserted at six in the morning tall deck chairs rest in rows with their knees up to their chins, I write on blue onionskin, a letter home. My ninth day on the ocean and we’re almost to Havre. By noon we’ll be off the boat and on the train – Paris, the radiant destination.

I mouth its syllables, the name Millay, and think I’ll change my name to Violette.

Long before dawn, awake from restless half-sleep I kept watch to see the sky rinse then pearl through the porthole, but no, and the whole ship was sleeping, lingerie frothing from steamer trunks in watery light, cut iris on nightstands.

Even the rats slumbering in the granary or among the nervous legs of racehorses.

Last night off starboard Laurence pointed towards lighthouses, the Cornish coast, and I thought I’d die thinking of Tristan and Iseult, their story of rue and devotion and we were there held in the same chill current, a couple with scotch on our breaths and I leaned over the railing where waves churned, obscuring the glimmer of Cornwall then showing again the visible present streamed into myth, cold turquoise. Nine days at sea – a floating city – and in the ship's grand ballroom the journey's last fête careened, everyone chattering in French champagned beneath the chandeliers. Mademoiselle Simone's mynah slipped his gold leg chain and fluttered from table to table, awkward on lopped wings shrieking bloody pack of knaves in dockside Limey English so the orchestra cranked louder to drown him out but everyone was drunk and didn't care.

Is it wrong, this craze for Europe, this vast grand fling, all of us flooding from America, the crass and gaudy, towards what farther shore?

Beauty? A form of love or devotion?
Thin arabesques of laughter, the sudden gash of a badly painted mouth. Outside the deck dropped then crested like the roller coaster in Maine when I was a child – four stories tall – the white roller coaster and through trees far below people strolled in straw hats and beyond the park the summer glitter of the same sea that frosted me past midnight still warm and giddy from the ballroom. Salt mist crimped my hair, the blanket Laurence wrapped around my shoulders. Tristan, wounded, crossed the Channel, maybe here, for Brittany and I shiver into the traveler’s extravagant elation veined with fear. Paris, the radiant destination. I wanted to see the day break over France but the sun won’t rise at all this morning because it’s raining. Nine days at sea and this early I’m alone for once on deck a minor jazz-age duenna without the rainbow-colored dress of scarves, no entourage of sloe-eyed flappers, no flaming youths, only this solitary sway over cold marine depths, sunken crystal. The ship’s a floating city of ether and haze awash in bands of sea and sky that merge. Was there rain or sunlight when Tristan writhed with fever waiting for the longboat which carried Iseult?

   Black sail, white sail, a confusion of sails.
   Tristan and Iseult each longing to be touched, transformed, to be one and never, never, always that distance, that illusive deceiving horizon. He suffers time the way a lover always will, a traveler, as if by having at last the loved one, as if by merely arriving a completion takes place.

   The harrowed waves. Paris, the destination an irreal embrace of starlight twenty-four hours a day, white monuments gracing fragrant boulevards. The cabin steward wants to know if I'm cold but I don't care because the drop of the deck is the white roller coaster swinging over the sea, that stark delicious vertigo and people way below sipping lemonade with mint.

   The steward shakes my shoulder, then with the bow and flourish of a cabaret emcee says, Voilà, la terre de France, and I stare and stare a long time, not even thinking and I don't care if it rains while the great liner cruises these glorious, numbered hours.

The car, the car would hesitate then tilt as it lurched to descend past hurtling signs – Hold Your Hat,

Don't Stand, at each turn, Don't Let Go, and I know I will never arrive.

Below the viaduct, the 5:05's stiff wind snares the whole block in its backlash, and although the morning fairly aches with promise, only insomniacs are out, the million-dollar dreamers orphaned by love's chameleon reversals.
What joins me to my neighbor is this silent complicity: by flashlight I uproot dandelions and crabgrass, while on his fire escape he does calisthenics. A month ago he came home to an empty flat and that emptiness turns its dull blade inside his chest. Caught by the last anemic sickle of moon, perhaps he thinks himself more than half a man, but less than full.

This early the street's washed black and white, jittery as a sixteen-millimeter reel. It's easy to understand, at times like this, the sudden desire to commend oneself into the hands of sympathetic strangers who, in certain transfiguring lights, wear the faces of husbands and wives. And then there's the edgy allure of the dangerous ones - that red-haired cashier with an emerald piercing her nostril's flare, or the carnival boy who tends the shooting booth – those blind ducks with rings painted round gthey necks. This business of being human should not be such a lonely proposition. Maybe I should drop my spade and stride to my neighbor’s alley, call out, It is I, the one for whom you have been waiting.

Come down. Let us join our forces. Yes, a brash tarantella through fireweed, the shattered bottle glass. But I am not so bold, not nearly so presuming. Instead I note the snail’s slimy progress and my neighbor touches toes until the fog rolls down the hill like a memory that wants losing. He performs deep knee bends until he strikes a contract with himself that gets him through his day, a deal not unlike the one between earth and root, between green pear and empty hand. My neighbor crawls back through his window, his landing sways its vacant iron grid, and above the plummeting alley, a sleek gray seam of sky.

Pretty soon deals will go down all over the city.
The fruit vendor will appear singing strawberries and watermelons. From their tanks, lobsters in the seafood markets will wave pincers as if imploring the broken factory clock that registers 9:99 in the morning, 0° even in the heart of summer. Answer me. What am I to make of these signs?
Studies from Life

Soot-blackened, marble angels freeze their serpentine ascent above scattered women in the pews, net shopping bags beside them as the priest drones mass before an altar carbonized with Madrid's incessant traffic fumes. In stone, the Virgin rests her foot upon the serpent coiling a benighted world, and tarnished in their reliquary, the hermit's fingers play no instrument but incensed air. Such a meager gathering, yet here is the visionary beggar riding tissued layers of soiled garments, notebook in her hands, transcribing helplessly her transport in a code of suns and doves' entrails, crouched seraphim. Because he believed the mad inhabited zones of heaven, El Greco painted in asylums – the saint's blue arms raised in rapture truly modeled from the madman's supplications. Cries and rough whispers, nuns’ habits sweeping across stone floors, disturbing the stacks of charcoal studies. He found derangement spiritual. The cathedral font is dry today, stained glass rattling the passage of Vespas and taxicabs. The stairway tumbles, Baroque, to the boulevard twitching with heat, gypsied with cripples, the sots and marvelous dancing goats.

In the Prado, Greco’s attenuated aristocrat buys his way to grace beside a Virgin transfigured – the Resurrection. What Calvary in the model’s mind built that cathedraled radiance of her glance, so matte and dense and holy? They’re everywhere in these vivid streets living parallel phantasmic cities that shimmer and burn among swirling crowds along the esplanade – tangoing couples dappled under trees, the fortune-tellers and summer girls like dropped chiffon scarves sipping their turquoise infusions, planetary liqueurs sticky with umbrellas. They chatter through a dwarf’s frantic homily of curses. Simply a ripple the crowd absorbs, but where is the saint from the plains’ walled city the tourists come to find? Oh, she is broken on the wheel, milled into dust. She is atomized to history’s dry footnotes. Here is the sleek plane’s vapor, the speed-blind train, and there the fragrant secrets inside fine leather. Still, the painter shows the beggar’s empty bowl, irradiated shades, these gaseous figures writhing upward, hands knotting tremulous prayers.

And the mouths, the mouths . . . Such hollow caverns that plumb what depths of human pain, or is it ecstasy’s abandon? Past a twilight the color of sighs on the street made numinous with restaurant lights, he is there, the man kneeling before a shopfront’s iron grille. Facing, rapt, a silk-swathed mannequin, he’s chanting litanies in a perfumed tongue

45
of numerals, some unearthly lexicon. And if we could translate, we might hear how the saint dwells perpetual, the form of this hunger within.
Marble steps cascade like stereopticon frames of quays along the Seine he’s ready to descend, a folio beneath his arm of yellowed pages wreathed in the aura of French, a cache of star maps and movie stills, Lauren Bacall.

Parisian breezes siphon off into slight vacuums left in air by the passage of young men wheeling racks of suits and dresses towards the Garment District. New York and the twilit Public Library steps where each instant spins a galaxy of signs – the flushed marquees and newsboys’ shouts fold into hoarse cries, street vendors of former times when parrots picked fortune cards from drawers beneath their hurdy-gurdy cages outside Coney Island’s Penny Arcade. Towards Times Square, streaming taillights weave nets of connections carmine as Bacall’s lipsticked pout in Screenplay Magazine, and the whole bedazzled city’s a magnificent arcade one might arrange in a cabinet, those amusement-park contraptions worked by coins or tinted wooden balls traveling runways to set into motion compartment after compartment, a symphony of sight and sound into fantasy, into the streets of New York through Oriental skies, until the balls come to rest in their tray releasing a shower of prizes: A milliner's illuminated display of hats, the stamp hat tilted over Bacall's arched eyebrows, filings spread across the inspector's desk, her sullen gaze.
On Utopia Parkway, in his workshop, Bacall's dossier's lain for months untouched among springs and dolls' heads, ballerinas arcing through charted celestial spheres, that music.
Hoagy Carmichael's heard offstage as he threads the rush-hour crowd. A typist's crooked stocking seams recall with affection the actress on her way up – the modeling jobs, ushering in New York. The box will work by a rolling ball wandering afield into childhood, an insight into the lives of countless young women who never knew, may never know, any other home than the plainest of furnished rooms, a drab hotel.
The drama of a room by lamplight, hotel neon in To Have and Have Not. Carmichael's "Hong Kong Blues," blue glass like the night-blue of early silent films – an atmosphere of cabaret songs, “How Little We Know.”

Fog, the boat scenes, and each compartment becomes a silver screen. Offstage music, and now we hear the music in Cornell’s eternity as the actress takes her place among the constellations, Cygnus, the Pleiades, one of the Graces.
Someone's saying it's almost time for the ambulance.
Then there's your own shocked face in the Public Bathroom's mirror, already underwater, the woman curled at your feet, foam speckling her lips.
Beyond these sinks, towards blind pavilions escalators lunge briefcases, scented fur coats conveyed above mental patients set loose upon the town.
Counterfeit daylight thrums the upper platform's bland heaven. Familiar numbered streets erase themselves – your ride uptown – 14th, 23rd, 42nd, counting into the concourse swarmed with zero-hour losers, newsprint, incense, that Haitian lynx cooing her rich patois, hawking charms for nightmare's hexed recurrent voodoo. Counterfeit daylight.

The No clenched inside. On the tiles, the woman whose throat is ringed with bandannas, whose collapse is a stain you want to step around. Shove your hands deep inside your pockets and make like you're cool about the few decisions away she lays beneath the cascade of endless running faucets. Someone's calling for an ambulance. Where is your room, lucid sunlight fanning rooftops? Where is the subway stop named Esperanza? No, that was another country.
Hope, safe haven against the riptide's snarling wake. A heaven vast, impersonal. So where are the angels of Reckoning and Assuagement to hold this woman's hand, thin fingers splayed against the tiles beneath her many coats?
And you're part of this, Doll, by the indifferent turn of an ankle, the glance casually averted. Let's say once she believed in human goodness among these blind pavillons.

This woman. Lie down with her, nestle your face in retch and tremor, her rank hair. Palm her temples.
Lie down in the whir of roofs lifting away as you knew they always must, clamorous pauses between marquees and parking lots filled with an ascension of pigeons. Shall those who'll die, like her, so publicly, hear the underneath of plosive secret voices?

How up and down the island buildings bulge and sob, the great tailor's shears above Varick Street clipping endlessly the thread that holds all of this together, these partial stories overheard:

    Chestnuts steaming on a brazier, yes . . .

    Play a tenspot,

    Silverice in the eighth . . .

    The 5:12,

    missing that, the 5:28 . . .

    We always liked . . .
The mind has precincts of pain, exiles within the precincts of pain . . .

So, listen now with her to this broken wake of commuters safe in their passage, always passing. And who bears responsibility?
Only angels of Fraud and Dissembling tinsel the Strip tonight, a ceaseless run of water from busted taps telling how it felt as she let go, fingers loosening, her many clothes unfurling. Dante’s Grove She’d have nothing but contempt for you, guilty and standing here long past the last train, waiting for the police sweep, waiting for the clamp on the wrist, concrete sweating against your forehead.
It’s almost time for the sirens to begin, the shaking, a trembling from within.

42nd, 23rd, 14th counting backwards, so when at last the Haitian arrives to press earth into your hands, a rubble of bone and charms, you’ll go down on your knees, willing to pay, and keep on paying. Wasn’t this exactly what you wanted?
A woman, after an absence of many years, returns to her old neighborhood and finds it a little more burned, more abandoned. Through rooftop aerials the stadium's still visible where the boys of summer spun across the diamond and some nights she'd hear strikes and pop flies called through the open windows of the rooms she shared with a man she thought she loved. All that summer, she watched across the street the magician's idiot son paint over and over the Magic & Costume Shop's intricate portico – all frets and scallops, details from another century. The more he painted though the more his sheer purity of attention seemed to judge her own life as frayed somehow and wrong.

Daily the son worked until the city swerved towards night's dizzy carnival with moons and swans afloat in neon over the streets.
One evening she saw the magician's trick bouquet flower at the curb while he filled his car.
He folded the multicolored scarves, then caged the fabulous disappearing pigeons.

It is a common human longing to want utterly to vanish from one life and arrive transformed in another. When the man came home, he’d touch her shoulders, her neck, but each touch discovered only the borders of her solitude.
As a child in that neighborhood she’d believed people were hollow and filled with quiet music, that if she were hurt deeply enough she would break and leave only a blue scroll of notes.

At first when he hit her, her face burned.
Far off the stadium lights crossed the cool green diamond and burnished cobwebs swaying on the ceiling. Then she became invisible, so when the doctor leaned over and asked her name all she could think of were her dresses thrown from the window like peonies exploding to bloom in the clear dark air. No music—merely a rose haze through her lids, something ticking in her head like a metronome in a parlor, dusty and arid with steam heat.

How many lives she'd passed through to find herself, an aging woman in black, before the locked and empty shop. So much sleight of hand, the years simply dissolving. Again she hears the crowd, a billow of applause rippling across the brilliant diamond, across the mysterious passage of time and the failure of sorrow to pass away.
Of course there's the rose tranced across sun-warmed tile, but also the soft tattoo of newsprint along a commuter's palm, the flush of a motel sign the instant it signals No Vacancy. I have always loved these moments of delicate transition: waking alone in a borrowed house to a slim meridian of dawn barring the pillow before the cool breeze, a curtain of rain on the iron steps, rain laving lawn chairs arranged for a conversation finished days ago.

The Japanese call this utsuroi, a way of finding beauty at the point it is altered, so it is not the beauty of the rose, but its evanescence which tenders the greater joy.

Beneath my hands the cat’s thick fur dapples silver, the slant of afternoon.

How briefly they flourish then turn, exalted litanies in the rifts between milliseconds, time enough for a life to change, and change utterly.

The magnesium flash of headlights passing backlit the boy’s face in my novel – the heroine’s epiphany and she knows she is leaving, a canopy of foliage surrounds his dark hair whispering over, over – that sweet rending.

Nothing linear to this plot, simply the kaleidoscopic click and shift of variations undone on the instant: evening as it vanishes gilds the chambermaid’s thin blond hair in her hotel window and she thinks I could die now, and it would be enough.

Long beyond nightfall, after the café's closing the waiters slide from their jackets and set places for themselves, paper lanterns blowing in the trees, leaf shapes casting and recasting their fugitive spell over the tables, over the traffic's sleek sussurrus.

So easily you fall to sleep, the room a cage of rain, the wallpaper's pinstripe floral another rift between us, this commerce of silences and mysteries called marriage, but that's not what this is about.

It's this wet balcony, filigreed, this rusty fan of spikes the pensione's installed against thieves and this weather – needling rain that diminuendoes into vapor, fog dragging its cat's belly above the yellow spikes of leaves, the hungry map the hustlers make stitching through the carnival crowd below, and I'm thinking of Picasso's early work – an exhibit of childhood notebooks, a Poetics' margins twisting with doves and bulls and harlequins. Your face, our friends', the sullen milling Spaniards, repeated canvases of faces dismantled, fractured so as to contain the planar flux of human expression – boredom to lust and fear, then rapture and beyond. He was powerless, wasn't he, before all that white space? I mean he had to fill it in, and I can fill in the blank space of this room between you and me, between me and the raucous promenade, with all the rooms and galleries I've known, now so wantonly painting themselves across this room, this night, the way I extend my hand and the paseo, foreign beyond my fingertips, dissolves to a familiar catastrophe of facades, the angles of walls and ceilings opening all the way to the waterfront where the standard naked lightbulb offers its crude flower of electricity to blue the dark abundant hair a woman I could have been is brushing, a torn shade rolled up to see the bird vendor's cat upon his shoulder or, at some other stage in their pursuit, the same French sailor I see drunkenly courting the queen dolled up in bedsheets and motorcycle chain, some drag diva strung out on something I can't name, something kicking like this vicious twin inside who longs to walk where guidebooks say not to, who longs to follow beyond all common sense, that childhood love of terror propelling us through funhouses and arcades, mother of strange beauty and faith.

But it's only chill rain that gathers in my palm, the empty terra-cotta pots flanking the balcony. Rain and the ache in my hands today, those off-tilt Gaudis queasily spelling the tilt from port to port any life describes: Boston's damp cold and we're stuffing rags again in broken windows, that condemned brownstone on harshly passionate – Mr. Lowell – Marlborough Street where our feet skimmed, polished black across the floor, damp, the tattered hems of trousers. Simply trying like always to con our way to some new dimension. And weren’t we glamorous? Oh, calendar pages riffling in the artificial wind of some offscreen fan, a way to show life passing, the blurred collage of images we collect to show everything and nothing has changed. But I want to talk about the swans of Barcelona this afternoon in the monastery pool, battered palms and small bitter oranges smashed against pavement stones. And those swans, luxurious and shrill by turns. It’s not swans that arrest me now – only this sailor staggering on the paseo fistling the air between him and the queen, shouting je sens, je sens, but he isn’t able to say what he feels any more than I understand how it is that perspective breaks down, that the buried life wants out on sleepless nights amidst these coils of citizens, a carnival dragon snaking, sodden, through the trees above them. I know. I know, there’s got to be more than people ruthlessly hurricaned from port to port. I know tomorrow is a prayer that means hope, that now you breathe softly, sleeping face rent by sooted shadows the thief's grille throws while you're turned into whatever dream you've made of these curious days filled with cockatoos and swans, the endless rain. Things get pretty extreme, then tomorrow little blades of grass will run from silver into green down the esplanade where a waiter places ashtrays on the corners of tablecloths to keep them firmly anchored.

The drag queen will be hustling, down on her knees in the subway, a few exotic feathers twisting in the wind.

But it won't be me, Jack. It won't be me.
Past midnight, September, and the moon dangles mottled like a party lantern about to erupt in smoke. The first leaves in the gutter eddy, deviled by this wind that’s traveled years, whole latitudes, to find me here believing I smell the fragrance of mock orange. For weeks sometimes, I can go without thinking of you. Crumpled movie handbills lift then skitter across the pavement. They advertise the one I’ve just seen – “Drunken Angel” – Kurosawa’s early film of occupied Japan, the Tokyo slums an underworld of makeshift market stalls and shacks where Matsu, the consumptive gangster, dances in a zoot suit to a nightclub’s swing band. The singer mimes a parody of Cab Calloway in Japanese. And later, as Matsu leans coughing in a dance-hall girl’s rented room, her painted cardboard puppet etches shadows on the wall that predict his rival’s swift razor and the death scene’s slow unfurling, how he falls endlessly it seems through a set of doors into a heaven of laundry: sheets on the line, the obis and kimonos stirring with his passage. And all of this equals a stark arithmetic of choices, his fate the final sum. Why must it take so long to value what's surrendered so casually? I see you clearly now, the way you'd wait for me, flashy beneath the Orpheum's rococo marquee in your Hong Kong hoodlum's suit, that tough-guy way you'd flick your cigarette when I was late. You'd consult the platinum watch, the one you'd lose that year to poker. I could find again our room above the Lucky Life Café, the cast-iron district of sweatshop lofts. But now the square's deserted in this small midwestern town, sidewalks washed in the vague irreal glow of shopwindows, my face translucent in the plate glass.

I remember this the way I'd remember a knife against my throat: that night, after the overdose, you told me to count, to calm myself. You put together the rice-paper lantern and when the bulb heated the frame it spun shadows – dragon, phoenix, dragon and phoenix tumbling across the walls where the clothes you’d washed at the sink hung drying on a nailed cord. The mock orange on the sill blessed everything in that room with its plangent useless scent. Forgive me.

I am cold and draw my sweater close. I discover that I’m counting, out loud, in Chinese.
Sure the advertisements are full of advice. They beseech everyone to get drunk or go on vacation, to keep journeying to fill the wrenched vacancy, keep moving forward to find out what's behind us – old news. By now the bird vendors are out dealing cockatoos and jeweled finches, ringed pigeons, corrosively iridescent with morning.

It's true the architecture's complex, but sometimes I get fed up with swallowing diesel and cruising around in someone else's idea of the good life. So here I am counting the hairs I've lost, while on the promenade people air their ocelots beneath balconies festooned with streamers, confetti staining a turbaned sheik three stories high bowing over a couple who've been up all night.

The woman rolls a cigarette, blows smoke while the man, wearing a lush's face, looks down at the table, hands over his eyes. Think I'll just stay here to contemplate the defects of my own character, the pressed tin ceiling a topographical map tattooed across the brain – my little piece of the universe.

    I know the clubs are full of parrots with fortunes to tell, fat women in magenta tutus flashing the vast marble expanses of their backs and all of them saying, “Where you from?”

    Singapore, Bali, the Republic of Wherever I Want to Be From. The pipes screech their burden and last night that wrecked chanteuse from 1936 told me the story of Barcelona’s anarchists, three times how they shot her nephew, nine years old, for stealing a chair. You see he had it wrong.

    He should have destroyed the chair.

A joke’s no laughing matter here. Maybe I should dye my hair, book up the coast to Marseilles, down to Marrakesh. I want to say there’s time. That I have no regrets. Maybe I’ll take a stroll, drop a coin and talk to someone about the way life seems a dream of anarchy on highways, through masques and arcades, the jittery palpitations, torrents of which the present is composed. The carnival resumes, Ferris wheels slicing circles in the sky. Pipes burst an explosion of birds. So, I'm leaning over the railing counting the pickpockets, addressing you, the abstract "you" that's the sum of everyone I've known or lost or longed for. You know what I mean.

What I want you to tell me is how are we to fit between these palaces of justice and the waterfront's bedraggled carnival? Or that ramshackle museum with cracked and muzzy skylights, pots carefully arranged to catch the rain? Artifacts, I swear to you, disappeared before my eyes.
After the ribboning fever of interstate, after freight yards & tinsel-towns, through the cranked-up mojo of radio signals, through the moteled drift of nonsleep, comes the arms crossed over the chest, the mind’s blind odometer clicking backwards, comes sifting over years the musk of those opened crates spilling into that room, the abandoned building. Just me & him. Comes the torn Army jacket & Detroit voice, dusky, the sweat-grayed tee-shirt. A cup of snow-water melted on the ledge. No light – simply candles pooled in wax across the floor, nothing more, but those crates of rose crystal, hot out the backdoor of some swank shop.

While shadows flickered bare lathes, while he spasmed the strung-out toss of too much hunger, too long, I set out the beautiful idea of feast. Rose crystal plates & saucers lined the mattress’s thin margin of floor, guttering flames, those teacup rims. Just me & him, that nameless jacket, olive drab. I wanted to catch the cries, the ragged breath, how we used to say come the revolution we’d survive anything, anything, & condemned to that frugal repast we were, somehow, free.
Snow-water melted in the cup rinsed his forehead, that pure juncture of clavicle & shoulder. Better this immersion than to live untouched. I wanted to be the cup & flame, I wanted to be the cure, the hand that held the river back that would break us, as in time, we broke each other. Wait.

Not yet. While great newpresses crashed over next day's headlines, while alley cats stalled beyond the wrenched police-lock in a frieze of ferocious longing, his arms clenched the flawless ache of thigh, damp curls. No clinic til break of day to break the stream of fever I rocked with him towards the story I told as a girl: the perfect city, luminous in the back of the radio, jazz turned down so low it ghosted improvisations that let me fly immune above skyscrapers, the endless gleaming arguments of streets. I set out the platter, a delicate tureen & then we were spark & fever, all frequencies tuned until that piss-poor stinking room seemed shouldered through torn skyline.

Through spark & fever, shouldered beyond the folly of others set adrift: the room of the girl who bends to gas flame deciding coffee or suicide, beyond Roxbury’s Emperor of Byzantium alone on his Murphy-bed throne, tinfoil minarets & domes.

Condemned & oddly free, my hand following his ribs’ dark curve, the ridge of muscle there & there. James, what’s the use?

After the broken arpeggios of all these years, comes this waking, this stooping to the gas flame, comes the learning & relearning trough the long open moan of highway going on towards a stream of crimson lifting away from the horizon. I wanted to be the hand that held back the river, destiny. Comes this new day cruelly, unspeakably rich, as that drenched grisaille of morning came pouring then over blackened wicks, over all that crystal fired empty & clean. Better this immersion than to live untouched.

No grand drama, only Chinatown’s incendiary glow, me returning to the old delinquent thrill of us passing through this jimmied door, the herbalist’s shop gone broke & latticed with accordion grille.

Are these faces of ours oddly gentled, First Husband, as evening’s verge spills over bad-news gang-boys filling vestibules with their bored sangfroid, over old women smoothing newsprint sheets for carp steamed to feathers of flesh? Two doors down, the gold-toothed Cantonese lifts her tray of pastries streaming red characters for sweet lotus, bitter melon, those for fortune, grief, for marriage & rupture.

In my wallet, the torn wedding picture sleeps – your brilliantine & sharkskin, my black-brimmed hat, a cluster of glass cherries. Too young. Words roil to calligraphy above us, cold as the dawn your second wife wakes to, day-old rice then scorched fluorescence through sweatshops, through bobbins & treadles, the 6¢ piecework. When it's time, we'll exchange a formal kiss in the whorling updraft of burnt matches & apothecary labels, gang graffiti slashed upon the walls. Why return to this empty shop where I'd meet you sometimes after-hours over poker, men chanting numbers in a sinuous grammar of 40-watt light & smoke? Not much here now, a few drafty rooms, broken drams of pungent White Flower Oil you'd rub my feet with, bruised from dancing six sets a night between the star acts.

Not much, but what I choose to shape sleepless nights far from here, when I'm diaphanous, engulfed again by Chinatown's iron lintels, the hiss & spill of neon fog, heliotrope & jade unrolled against the pavement I'd walk in filmy stockings, the impossible platform shoes. As if I might find her here again, my lost incarnation fallen from the opulent emptiness of nightclubs, those restaurants tuxedoed in their hunger. No one could translate such precise Esperanto. And so we linger tiny, surviving protagonists briefly safe here from the crowd's ruthless press, a fanfare of taxis polishing the avenues. Whenever next I meet you, I'll meet you here in the harsh auroral radiance of the squad car's liquid lights. Things have never been so essential. I have seen businesses fold & open like paper lilies, & men leave for Hong Kong, then return to lie down again in crowded rooms, the way each of us lies down with a lacquered maze of corridors & places where those once loved unbearably wear strangers' faces. You run your hand through the hair you've dyed black to hide the gray & out on the street, sweet-faced vandals arabesque caught in a rain of trinkets, green cards, the lucky one-eyed jacks. Beneath my fingers, the twisted braille of hearts & knives incised upon the counter works its spell until the herbalist takes up his abacus once more to commence the sum of unguents, of healing roots, a measure of time, a calculation beyond all worth.

Lost Fugue for Chet

Chet Baker, Amsterdam, 1988

A single spot slides the trumpet’s flare then stops at that face, the extraordinary ruins thumb-marked with the hollows of heroin, the rest chiaroscuroed.
   Amsterdam, the final gig, canals & countless stone bridges are, glimmered in lamps. Later this week his Badlands face, handsome in a print from thirty years ago, will follow me from the obituary page insistent as windblown papers by the black cathedral of St. Nicholas standing closed today: pigeon shit & feathers, posters swathing tarnished doors, a litter of syringes. Junkies cloud the gutted railway station blocks & dealers from doorways call coca, heroína, some throaty foaming harmony. A measured inhalation, again the sweet embouchure, metallic, wet stem. Ghostly, the horn’s improvisations purl & murmur the narrow strasses of Rosse Buurt, the district rife with purse-snatchers, women alluring, desolate, poised in blue windows, Michelangelo boys, hair spilling fluent running chords, mares’ tails in the sky green & violet. So easy to get lost, these cavernous brown cafés. Amsterdam, & its spectral fogs, its bars & softly shifting tugboats. He builds once more the dense harmonic structure, the gabled houses. Let's get lost. Why court the brink & then step back?

After surviving, what arrives? So what's the point when there are so many women, creamy callas with single furled petals turning in & in upon themselves like variations, nights when the horn's coming genius riffs, metal & spit, that rich consuming rush of good dope, a brief languor burnishing the groin, better than any sex. Fuck Death. In the audience, there's always this gaunt man, cigarette in hand, black Maserati at the curb, waiting, the fast ride through mountain passes, descending with no rails between asphalt & precipice. Inside, magnetic whispering take me there, take me. April, the lindens & horse chestnuts flowering, cold white blossoms on the canal. He's lost as he hears those inner voicings, a slurred veneer of chords, molten, fingering articulate. His glance below Dutch headlines, the fall “accidental” from a hotel sill. Too loaded. What do you do at the brink? Stepping back in time, I can only imagine the last hit, lilies insinuating themselves up your arms, leaves around your face, one hand vanishing sabled to shadow. The newsprint photo & I’m trying to recall names, songs, the sinuous figures, but facts don’t matter, what counts is out of pained dissonance, the sick vivid green of backstage bathrooms, out of broken rhythms – and I’ve never forgotten, never – this is the tied-off vein, this is 3 A.M. terror thrumming, this is the carnation of blood clouding the syringe, you shaped summer rains across the quays of Paris, flame suffusing jade against a girl’s dark ear. From the trumpet, pawned, redeemed, pawned again you formed one wrenching blue arrangement, a phrase endlessly complicated as that twilit dive through smoke, applause, the pale haunted rooms. Cold chestnuts flowering April & you’re falling from heaven in a shower of eighth notes to the cobbled street below & foaming dappled horses plunge beneath the still green waters of the Grand Canal.
Houseboats roll soft with morning's thin drizzle, gypsy colors muted as we pass to wander the arboretum's intricate chill paths, oval disks naming trees in Dutch, the familiar grown exotic in this city built on land that is sea, where our reflections merge with buildings floating upside-down. A coverlet of ground mist wraps our ankles, so we seem, for a moment, nearly aerial, incorporeal within the distant sough of foghorns, then the museum's zones of pure atmosphere, galleries of trompe l'oeils, convex interiors, the underwater hush of voices. Rain steady against the skylights' frosted lozenges dapples floors and walls, until outside is inside and we move among the lit chambers of genre paintings lavish with detail, small parables of vanitas – dust

circling the goblet’s rim, half-empty, flies swimming the burst pear’s nectar. Excess and transience: even in Vermeer, a girl bending to her lustrous task weighs palmfuls of pearls, the Last Judgment pinned behind her in aquatint. Books crumble from leather bindings, and time glazes the fish’s iridescent scales – decay so palpable it stains the clearing sky of afternoon, late in this violent century, in time of plague.

I’ve seen the shadow cross over young men, clustered addicts in parks where bronzed explorers survey the Atlantic’s cold immensities, measured in parchments like these cartographer’s fancies, a world more mysterious, perhaps more richly imagined. The wing of afternoon tilts duskward, ochered in brief splendor and all around the tender regard of countless saints and virgins. The closing hour signals and we enter again our fragile lives, bridges and boulevards webbed overhead with trolley wires, a host of tiny colored lights electrified like constellations to conjure time’s strange torque, the instant pulsing to a life’s span

as we turn once more towards each shining arborvitae, towards evening gardens drenched in the radiant calm hue of chamomile, this illusion of a universe, a proffered gift.
Frayed cables bear perilously the antiquated lift, all glass and wrought-iron past each apartment floor like those devices for raising and lowering angels of rescue in medieval plays. Last night the stairwell lamps flickered off and I was borne up the seven floors in darkness, the lift a small lit cage where I thought of you, of the Catholic souls we envisioned once, catechism class, the saint in her moment of grace transfigured as she's engulfed in flames. The lift shivered to a halt above the shaft and I was afraid for a moment to open the grille, wanting that suspension again, the requiemed hum of one more city going on without me – Cockney girls with violet hair swirling among the businessmen and movie ushers of Soho, sullen in their jackets. All of them staving off as long as they can the inevitable passing away, that bland euphemism for death. But I can't shake this from my mind:

your face with its hollows against hospital linen. Newark's empty asylum wings opened again this year for the terminal cases. Each day another strung-out welfare mother, the street-corner romeos we used to think so glamorous, all jacked-up on two-buck shots. It was winter when I last was home and my mother found you on her endless dietician's rounds, her heavy ring of keys. It was winter when I saw you, Loretta, who taught me to curse in Italian, who taught me to find the good vein in the blue and yellow hours of our sixteenth year among deep nets of shadows dragged through evening, a surf of trees by the railway's sharp cinders. Glittering like teen-dream angels in some corny AM song, buoyed by whatever would lift us above the smoldering asphalt, the shingled narrow houses, we must have felt beyond all damage. Still what damage carried you all these years beyond the fast season of loveliness you knew before the sirens started telling your story all over town, before the habit stole the luster from your movie-starlet hair.

Little sister, the orderlies were afraid to touch you. Tonight, the current kicks the lights back on and there's the steady moan of the lift's descent, the portion of what's left of this day spread before me – stockings drying on the sill, the cool shoulders of milk bottles – such small domestic salvations. There was no deus ex machina for you, gone now this half year, no blazing escape, though how many times

I watched you rise again, and again from the dead: that night at the dealer’s on Orange Street, stripping you down, overdosed and blanched against the green linoleum, ice and saline. I slapped you until the faint flower of your breath clouded the mirror. In those years I thought death was a long blue hallway you carried inside, a curtain lifting at the end in the single window’s terrible soft breeze where there was always a cashier ready to take your last silver into her gloved hands, some dicey, edgy game. Beneath the ward clock’s round dispassionate face there was nothing so barren in the sift from minute to absolute minute, a slow-motion atmosphere dense as the air of medieval illuminations with demons and diaphanous beings. I only wished then the cancellation of that hungering that turns us towards the mortal arms of lovers or highways or whatever form of forgetfulness we choose.

Your breath barely troubled the sheets, eyes closed, perhaps already adrift beyond the body, twisting in a tissue of smoke and dust over Jersey's infernal glory of cocktail lounges and chemical plants, the lonely islands of gas stations lining the turnpike we used to hitch towards the shore, a moment

I want back tonight – you and me on the boardwalk, the casino arcade closed around its pinball machines and distorting mirrors. Just us among sea serpents, and the reckless murmur of the sea. Watching stars you said you could almost believe the world arranged by a design that made a kind of sense. That night the constellations were so clear it was easy to imagine some minor character borne up beyond judgment into heaven, rendered purely into light. Loretta, this evening washes over my shoulders, this provisional reprieve.

I've been telling myself your story for months and it spreads in the dusk, hushing the streets, and there you are in the curve of a girl's hand as she lights her cigarette sheltered beneath the doorway's plaster cornucopia. Listen, how all along the avenue trees are shaken with rumor of this strange good fortune.
It snakes behind me, this invisible chain gang – the aliases, your many faces peopling that vast hotel, the past. What did we learn?

Every twenty minutes the elevated train, the world shuddering beyond the pane. It was never warm enough in winter.

The walls peeled, the color of corsages ruined in the air. Sweeping the floor, my black wig on the chair. I never meant to leave you in that hotel where the voices of patrons long gone seemed to echo in the halls, a scent of spoiled orchids. But this was never an elegant hotel. The iron fretwork of the El held each room in a deep corrosive bloom.

This was the bankrupt's last chance, the place the gambler waits to learn his black mare's leg snapped as she hurtled towards the finish line.

* * *
How did we live? Your face over my shoulder was the shade of mahogany in the speckled mirror bolted to the wall. It was never warm. You arrived through a forest of needles, the white mist of morphine, names for sleep that never came. My black wig unfurled across the battered chair. Your arms circled me when I stood by the window. Downstairs the clerk who read our palms broke the seal on another deck of cards. She said you're my fate, my sweet annihilating angel, every naked hotel room I've ever checked out of. There's nothing left of that, but even now when night pulls up like a limousine, sea-blue, and I'm climbing the stairs, keys in hand, I'll reach the landing and you're there – the one lesson I never get right.
Trains hurtled by, extinguished somewhere past the bend of midnight. The shuddering world.

Your arms around my waist. I never meant to leave.

* * *

Of all of that, there's nothing left but a grid of shadows the El tracks throw over the street, the empty lot. Gone, the blistered sills, voices that rilled across each wall. Gone, the naked bulb swinging from the ceiling, that chicanery of light that made your face a brief eclipse over mine. How did we live? The mare broke down. I was your fate, that yellow train, the plot of sleet, through dust crusted on the pane. It wasn't warm enough.

What did we learn? All I have left of you is this burnt place on my arm. So, I won't forget you even when I'm nothing but small change in the desk clerk's palm, nothing but the pawn ticket crumpled in your pocket, the one you’ll never redeem. Whatever I meant to say loses itself in the bend of winter towards extinction, this passion of shadows falling like black orchids through the air. I never meant to leave you there by the pane, that terminal hotel, the world shuddering with trains.
THE IOWA
POETRY PRIZE WINNERS

1987
Elton Glaser, Tropical Depressions
Michael Pettit, Cardinal Points

1988
Mary Ruefle, The Adamant
Bill Knott, Outremer

1989 Terese Svoboda, Laughing Africa
Conrad Hilberry, Sorting the Smoke

THE EDWIN FORD PIPER
POETRY AWARD WINNERS

1990
Lynda Hull, Star Ledger
Philip Dacey, Night Shift at the Crucifix Factory
"In the world of Star Ledger, possibility and desire collide with drunkenness and addiction, with failed relationships and faceless, anonymous men. It’s the world of the bad bet, cruddy perfume, sucker punch and scam, the many colors and sounds of desperation and disillusionment. . . . In this fine, unsettling but very readable collection, Lynda Hull’s got what it takes.”—American Poetry Review

"Lynda Hull’s poems show an immersion in the rough-edged, garish details of the world, and—almost antithetically—a removal from that world in the form of a refusal to control, comment, or qualify. They persist in a sympathetic wonder that strikes the reader as contemporary and wholly genuine.”
—Prairie Schooner

"Hull shows a refreshing concern for the integrity of the line, exploring with daunting skill the use and clench of vowels and consonants within a rhythmic unity. . . . The breadth and scope of Hull’s moral vision are what make her poems truly rare.”
—Harvard Book Review

Lynda Hull was born in Newark in 1954. Her first volume of poetry, Ghost Money, won the Juniper Prize in 1986. Her poems have appeared in many journals, including Poetry, the New Yorker, Ploughshares, and the Gettysburg Review. She died in 1994.

University of Iowa Press
Iowa City, Iowa 52242