The Weather in Luxembourg

Steven Orlen

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.1119
THE WEATHER IN LUXEMBOURG

is like a prayer
that this life could be dismissed
as effortlessly, empty of notches.

And I would say without remorse, that mirror:
this has been my life, the pain
in the door—it’s fast asleep; and this
the collapsing day with stars
distant and harmless.

But always at this time I am too calm
to welcome even death
sliding through the trees.
He knows where he’s not wanted,
his life. His wife died in her sleep.

The temperature in Luxembourg is 78 degrees. The last of a line of unimportant Kings sits in the garden eating lunch.

In the city of the living
hisburghers are choosing sides.
There are so many decisions they could make.
Silence chews at their ears.
They need a rest.

Already in the upstairs rooms their wives and mothers settle into green sofas, vowing allegiances to chastity. They’ve had enough.
Their soft gums suck
noisily like bowls of clams.

I could turn off as easily. I want never to have accomplished anything,
to be the last quiet man
of my kind, standing in the pasture.
It is nearing the end of the afternoon.
It seems I’ve been preparing for this a long time,
but I can’t stop smiling.

18  Steven Olen