ROSEBUD

There is a place in Montana where the grass stands up two feet, yellow grass, white grass, the wind on it like locust wings & the same shine.
Facing what I think was south, I could see a broad valley & river, miles into the valley, that looked black & then trees.
To the west was more prairie, darker than where we stood, because the clouds covered it; a long shadow, like the edge of rain, racing toward us.
We had been driving all day, & the day before through South Dakota along the Rosebud, where the Sioux are now farmers, & go to school, & look like everyone.
In the reservation town there was a Sioux museum & 'trading post,' some implements inside: a long-bow of shined wood that lay in its glass case, reflecting light.
The walls were covered with framed photographs, the Ogallala posed in fine dress in front of a few huts, some horses nearby: a feeling, even in those photographs the size of a book, of spaciousness.
I wanted to ask about a Sioux holy man, whose life I had then recently read, & whose vision had gone on hopelessly past its time: I believed then that only a great loss could make us feel small enough to begin again.
The woman behind the counter talked endlessly on; there was no difference I could see between us, so I never asked.

The place in Montana was the Greasy Grass where Custer & the seventh cavalry fell, a last important victory for the tribes. We had been driving all day, hypnotized, & when we got out to enter the small, flat American tourist center we began to argue.
And later, walking between the dry grass & reading plaques, my wife made an ironic comment: I believe it hurt the land, not intentionally; it was only meant to hold us apart.
Later I read of Benteen & Ross & those who escaped, but what I felt then was final: lying down, face against the warm side of a horse, & feeling the lulls endlessly, the silences just before death. The place might stand for death, every loss rejoined in a wide place; or it is rest, as it was then after the long drive, nothing for miles but grass, a long valley to the south & living in history. Or it is just a way of living gone, like our own, every moment.

Because what I have to do daily & what is done to me are a number of small indignities, I have to trust that many things we all say to each other are not intentional, that every indirect word will accumulate over the earth, & now, when we may be approaching something final, it seems important not to hurt the land.
