Tracking Down the Underground Railroad

The underground railroad was spread across southern Iowa. The large white arrows suggest the general direction. Fugitives usually tried to reach Chicago; from there, some went on to Canada. Red dots indicate “stations.” The system was loosely organized and often functioned based on connections between individuals in a locale. Most local conductors probably knew of the next two or three stations; few would have known the stations in all parts of the state.