THE DISASTER TREE

In the land of the blind the shade of this tree stretches farther than the eye can see.
Its roots run deeper than mere defoliation knows; and even diseased and cut to a stump, the least half-inch left level on dirt is the base of a magic space leading the eyes up the tree the blind see, to where its invisible birds sing inaudible notes of hope; its xylem are still cocked toward heaven.

And even when we fall to our knees the paper-thin skin covering the patella is a minimal cushion we mustn’t deny, for in retrospect it suffices. This poem written on the dead trunk, on paper, is for the deflowered flower-girl whose boyfriend may yet do her justice, insurance, legal heirs, and joy; this poem is for the proposing boyfriend whose kneel is forced, but who may one day rise into his wife with a true love, the force of which needed such a long distance runner’s start; this poem to say the depths of despair are where the lowest root drinks underground streams, and continues past disaster; this,

a love poem; this extended conceit, a note of hope:

the tree surgeon falling limb to limb:
when he lost his eyes, he read bark with his fingers.
And when he sawed off his hand, the stump of his arm could still point, and beckon, and stroke.
