

1975

Bark

Michael Cuddihy

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Cuddihy, Michael. "Bark." The Iowa Review 6.3 (1975): 33-33. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.1890>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

The wind, gusts
Blowing off the mountains,
Blue peaks half-hidden
In snow. I shrug
Under this old wool
Sweater, leaning
My weight on the window handle.

Bark / Michael Cuddihy

Grotesque. All those anxieties eating their way out as we get older. Your old governess, remember, the way she wore her woolen stockings—all knotted and rolled, like the veins in her legs. Always tugging at them, out of breath, one thigh straining against the worn upholstery. And the elephant's foot your favorite cousin brought you from Africa for your tenth birthday. He set it down in your bedroom, your eyes astonished at how rough its wrinkles were, the coarseness of the inch-long hairs. Stiffer even than the brush your father used after he had forced your tiny fists out from behind you.

Afternoon: Rillito Creek / Michael Cuddihy

A tall girl in a red windbreaker. Ducking as she enters the stables, a little awkward, her arms full of hay. The sun feeds on her close-cropped hair. Inside, two horses stamping. Charcoal blue mesquite, a haze of blond grass. West, along the river, cottonwoods, a whole row of them, sightless, gaunt. One every fifty yards, leafless, like a line of dead presidents, their roots stopped, curling back on themselves. The horses are outside now, snorting, the shadows of their long heads combing the stubble, back and forth in the rusty light.