Two poems

From The Darling North

HELLO KITTY, GOODBYE PICCADILLY

Imagine you'd come to Hawai`iki early.
I don't have Hawai`iki.
Imagine you were in Heaven.
I don't have Heaven.
Imagine you were in Paradise but at first you don't recognise paradise, or smell it or touch it, because you miss earth too much,
and being earthly.
You miss the cold wind and you wish that instead of leaning into it reading it with your mouth and casting it aside like small-talk on all those occasions of cold wind you had gathered it up and kept it in a suitcase. Then you could carry it with you to the new place open it there
and remember what cold wind feels like.
You say to yourself if only I had done that cold wind would come rushing back but you didn't.
In Paradise it is so hot your teeth loosen and creak in your gums and your hands hum.
You notice dainty sandals, gold dresses shirts accumulating on a lawn red birds.
You remember a coat, olive green, rough,
sea-going you wore near the sea. The beach wall was scooped out by waves,
and kelp rotted
in your nostrils.
You wore your coat to Mass where the squeak of new pine pews

rang out into the still air above the people like modern bells and you cricked your neck to engage with the baleful mosaic stare of the Jesus.
 There was a department store where the air sprang with grey wool.
 That was where you wore the coat but can't recall the exact nature of how you needed it.
 Imagine you'd come to Hawai'i early.
 I don't have Hawai'i.
 Imagine you were in Heaven.
 I don't have Heaven.
 Imagine you were in Paradise
 and one day in Paradise when you haven't been there long you look up and find streetlights swimming and people talking at an aquarium and the jellyfish are purple and pulse like a heart.
 After a day of hard light dusk falls suddenly as if the dark were heavy and the stream that flows close to your apartment becomes wetter and
 shinier
 in the moonlight.
 You can't help recalling that you once climbed aboard a bus perfunctorily, like pecking an old relative
 but you threw it away.
 You watch the news
 on and off
 and the accent of the newsreader bounces in loping kilohertz but over time dies down until you lose it somewhere inside your ear.
 You hear
 your own accent,
 which used to be beyond hearing, a dog's whistle.
 Imagine you were in Paradise and in that Paradise you notice that the sea is cloudy with sunblock and rushes up the beach tinkling with the gold rings of newlyweds,
 and the metal detectors of the homeless are made very happy.
 The hills thrust up sharply, and others say there should be an excise of Paradise

 tax so the children can go back to school on Fridays
 although they don't really need school.
 In Paradise you don't need anything.
 You read in the paper that depressed kids are turning up at the Help Program
 with the red-haired gene they need help with in Paradise.
 For instance the word 'bong' echoes through the university shuttle service, and the campus is full of stray cats.
 There's a certain peacefulness.
 Off-ramps with banks of tires, escape routes for runaway trucks.
 You clean the bathroom mirror in Paradise and on the shelf below it a pink Post-it says 'Dialects of Seeing'
 in the round writing of your opposite.
 You don't clean it up.
 You know this is like a dream, this found thing, so ho-hum – no human endeavour. You didn't make this up. You couldn't make this stuff up, but you tell it anyway.
 Bong bong.
 Imagine you'd come to Hawai`iki early.
 I don't have Hawai`iki.
 Imagine you were in Heaven.
 I don't have Heaven.
 Imagine you were in Paradise
 and on arrival
 you remember what you had been told about Paradise at the little old cold school: In Paradise you will sit for a long time looking at everything as if for the first time and you will understand.
 You realise you that you like the sing-song of Pidgin,
 an exhibition of empty rooms with carved wooden weeds growing out of the skirting boards, a variety of friendliness.
 Kim chee, mandoo, spicy ahu maki, manapoua buns, handbags.
 (In Paradise you don't need money.
 A handbag is pure luxury.)
 You think you see a sign saying Occidental Rugs but you're mistaken: your eyesight which you thought would be fixed in Paradise.

It is dazzling and you are dazzled. The sea.
 You walk about. You drive about learning the avenues of Paradise.

In the Chinese cemetery on the hill the names of the immigrants under the colonies of lichen look out over the bunched handful of city, mini Hong Kong.
 You wonder in passing about your body, its whereabouts.

Eventually in Paradise you discover a shopping mall.
 This development is a long time coming because before you came to Paradise you bought meat, Brussel sprouts, rough socks.
 In the shopping mall goldfish swim in blue ponds and perfume coils out of stores to engulf you and the song composed by the Queen when she was incarcerated in the Palace
 'Aloha 'Oe'
 deposits its snippets in the warm air.

You stop at certain shops, and you learn them, and you like them for their sound and smell and their meaning gathers like clouds which when heavy fall on to the carpark, and gather again.

And again you process along the upper level of the mall and warm air bathes your feet and you incline your head towards price tags and you fall in love with a cat-face and stroke a purse in its likeness to have and to hold.

Imagine you were in Paradise and in Paradise a funny expression sometimes pops out of your mouth and your children laugh because nobody says that here. (And here you need to add that for your children this is not Paradise because for them there is only childhood.)

You realise with a jolt that your children's DNA does not contain the expressions your parents used, that you use,
 and if they took a sample of tissue from your children they would not be able to prove relationship through work cut out, mind you,

FLOOD MONOLOGUE

1.

You never discussed the stream and no doubt the stream didn't want your discourse (its own merry way) but now that you live by the stream a mosquito has come up the bank and bitten you, and the stream is in your bloodstream. You buff the site of entry like a trophy.

Your chuckling new acquaintance takes your cells out to the sea.

2.

It goes all night, you tell your friends drinking wine to warm the house (already warm), and laugh of course like a drain. Later in your roomy queen you listen to its monologue – ascending plane that never reaches altitude. Your fingers stretch from coast to coast to try it out, this solitude, while water thumps through the riverbed.

3.

You're not exactly on your own.
Teenagers come and go, the screen-door clacks, Cardinals mob a little temple hanging in a tree. A neighbour with a bag of seeds asks you if you mind the birds. There is that film, and the flu, but no. In the mornings earlyish you slide the rippling trees across

(Burnham Wood) and watch six parrots lift like anti-gravity.

4.

At sunset a rant about the dishes – you’ve worked all day, unlike some people! The tap runs. The sun, tumbling over Waikiki, shoots through the trees, gilds the stream (unnecessary), stuns you in the empty room. Every day for ten years (you realize, standing there) you’ve crossed the bridge etched Mānoa

Stream, 1972, back and forth, Except the day the river rose.

5.

Some facts: Mongooses (sic) (introduced) pee into the current, plus rats and mice,

The stream is sick. All the streams.
Mosquitoes -your messenger and those that bit the teenagers whose young blood is festive like the Honolulu marathon – could carry West Nile virus. Often fatal.

Probably don’t, are probably winging it like you, and you will go your whole life and only die at the end of it.

6.

The stream doesn’t look sick. It takes a pretty kink near your apartment.

The trees are lush and spreading like a shade house you once walked in in a gallery (mixed media). The water masks its illness like a European noble with the plague – a patina, and ringlets.

You're pissed about the health issues of the stream, and healthcare, because it has your blood, you have its H2O.

7.

You think it's peaceful by the stream?
Ducks rage, waking you at 2am, or thereabouts. Mongooses hunt the duck eggs, says your son. Ah, you say.

That night the quacks are noisy, but you fret in peace. Sometimes homeless people sleep down by the river bank.

Harmless. One time one guy had a knife.

They still talk about it and you see him ghostly like an app against the trees.

All your things are near the stream, beds, plates, lamps – you're camping apart from walls and taps and electricity.

Your laptop angles like a spade, and clods of English warm the room (already warm). They warm your heart.

Overall you have much less, because of course – divided up. But you're lucky or would be if the stream was squeaky clean, and talked to you.

The stream had caused a little trouble in the past, i.e., the flood. Not it's fault.

900, 000 people pave a lot, they plumb a lot. Then rain like weights. From a safe distance (your old apt) you watched your little water course inflate and thunder down the valley taking cars, chairs, trees.

You saw a mother and her baby rescued from a van – a swimming coach, with ropes – the van then bumbled out to sea.

10.

One apartment in your complex took in water in the flood. And mud. It was this apartment. You've known it all along, of course, because you watched.

They fixed it up. Lifted carpets, blasted fans for a week. Repainted.

It's pretty good. The odd door needs a shoulder still. In certain lights though, on the wall, a watermark, the stream's dappled monogram.

11.

You're talking clichés – water under the bridge, love letter from a lawyer, serious harm, sunk without you.

The stream has been into your bedroom, and you in its. Remember reeds, coolness, summer afternoons. You loved the stream. Its stinging waters send a last message in lemon juice:

If I'm fucked, you're coming with me.
sincerely, the stream.
