

1977

Binge

Paul Nelson

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Nelson, Paul. "Binge." The Iowa Review 8.2 (1977): 66-67. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2201>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

The Language of Starvation / Paul Nelson

Huddled on our stools, we carve at blankness, to make meat hang or dance, hold itself from falling.
We smear and chew, smoke and erase looking through the young Calcutta bones hooked before us on the rafter, his teeth still growing in the air.
He lets his arms swing down on their metal clips and springs, one palm back, the other forward as for alms.

The ulna parallels the radius on this side, crosses on the other.
We see the backside by recollection, like fear when it isn't there, hunger when we do not feel it.
We imagine the flesh we sit on, our organs clutched like birds in a covered cage, the asp peeking through the girdle. Today we want a live model; we want our mothers, and can't imagine from this armature anything we may have eaten.

Binge / Paul Nelson

Men in felt hats slough along the river flats where someone said you flashed beneath the bridge.
Or were you simply smiling?

They find you; you are being blind, staring down again. They grab your coat, turn you to the door, the sun,

which you reject like a name, your lips stitched with mud and whiskey.

The woman soaps your ankle, crooning; children and disciples 'But,' like fish kissing the glass of your talk.
You've heard this all before, and when a friend remarks the terror of your cough it's like resisting thumbs, pushing up the corners of your mouth before the solitude sets in.

Two by Two / Paul Nelson

Not since air first cut their lungs in another language had they been touched. Now he's lost a polyp, hung like a mussel on a kelp stalk: my father divided by a scar, talking to himself as she sits listening, one tuck folded over the slit that crosses her, through which they fished the bed we coiled in.

In May my brother and I dumped the coal bucket buried to the lip beneath the maples, watched the mud-water, stiff with leaves, flood the lawn, watched the old roots of Mother's lilies thaw among the sleeping garter snakes.
With hoe and edger we diced them, for her and lust working happily together as they wound out slowly toward the sun, the hedge, like conversations between strangers.

The bits were carried off by crows.
The garden overgrew. Dad still marvels at his feet, their perfect arch and metacarpals, sleeping like brothers under sheets.