1979

Wilbur on the Trampoline

John Engels

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2467

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Wilbur on the Trampoline  •  John Engels

I was there that night in ’56 when, his long arms flapping, he bounced hard and high, and higher on the trampoline. Caught in the porch light, there in Engle’s yard, grinning in the yellow light, teeth shining, high-shouldered Wilbur—arms held up and wide like thin wings sprouting outward from his skull—faltered, and lost in vigorous midflight his balance, and came widely straddling down, one long leg to each side of the wooden frame—so delicate a clearance that he gasped.

As for me, I shrivelled where I stood:

in my short-legged circumstance I would have borne more than a body ought to bear, I knew, most likely perishing right then and there, of my three souls most surely losing two.

But praising God and Goodness, Wilbur rose and leaped, as limber as before. And in the dull light of recollection what I choose to see is the winged, the resurrectionary skull which in the instant he has come to seem:

heart-mouthed death’s-head, toothy, winged, lying the long reach back into that night from which I hear the measured squawking of the springs, some far-off traffic noises, and a dog moaning from the lawn’s far darks—no other sound as Wilbur leaps and dangerously tumbles, high and higher, bounding and rebound.