Why I like Painters

William Pitt Root

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2563
Why I Like Painters

William Pitt Root

Morning air like salt braces an aspect of the light
painters adore,
who scorn
the too-sweet blossomings of vegetation bright along the paths they live their lives by.

This one chooses models
he ignores for hours,
attacking
his blank canvas
with still lives
of jugs and sextants
as he breathes in odors from her body languishing across his couch.

He smiles and pays her generous praises
and the going rate
as she leans down
smiling privately
to gather her clothes,
and dresses. "I want to be reminded what I'm missing with this brush."

We spend the afternoon drinking on the bay, discussing the active and passive voice, ionization and light, the rates of precipitation for variously ground pigments, cunnilingus and enlightenment in The Yellow Book.

At sunset we are speechless, afloat with our bottles and our thoughts, when his wife, whose eyes are flecked with gold, swims through the mirrored sky and climbs aboard, smiling.
It is midnight as I write this.
   Occasionally I glance
toward the couch and nod.