

1980

From "The Book of Poverty and Death"

Stanley Plumly

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Plumly, Stanley. "From "The Book of Poverty and Death." The Iowa Review 11.2 (1980): 100-100. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2587>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

from The Book of Poverty and Death ·
Stanley Plumly

after Rilke

There is the poverty of children shy with child—
the girl who will not say what is already part of her breath, like a second wind, another mouth.
And there is the poverty of rain, in spring,
clean on the streets, the small roofs of the city.
And poverty of desire in prison hallways, cell by cell . . .

And poverty of the wheelchair and the deathbed and the blind who tow them where they're told.
Or flowers along the railway or the river,
poorer with every passage.

You should look into your hands right now—they'll hold the poverty of grief until you let it go.

You should look into the light—it is the dust made whole.

The poverty of the bird that flies in the window or the yard-dog tied to the ground—rooms with doors locked on the dumb who talk to themselves . . .
These are the stones that will shine.

For the poor own the houses you will not visit;
they own the trees that are dead all day.
They own the table and the chair and the glass of water.

And they let their children go hungry who will eat all the bread.
And they let their children go cold who will take what is warm.

You should look around you how the dark is poor.