Missing from Home · Maria Flook

I'm the one they call "littlest," when families review losses by accidental death or illness.

"Fat one," they named you when the uncles came to play pinochle with our beautiful mother.

The night before you ran away, we went into an abandoned house with all its lights on.
A wife had been taken by police but her husband escaped on the B&O.

Neighbors collected
china and flatware,
and ripped the curtains loose.
You said it was stealing, the way women smile
without showing their teeth.

I unpinned the doilies from the chairs, knowing someone would want them.
You kept still before a gilt mirror.

"This makes me thin,"
you said, moving your hands in the shape of an hour glass or brushing some secret from your waist.

Even the principal from the school had come to loot,
he wore his terrible blazer.
When he removed the mirror from the wall, you became full of something for a moment, but it diminished.

Our mother, examining the lace, began to laugh
and covered her face.
She said it's crazy
about sad people.

The next day
taking no belongings you got into some man's flashy car.
