Fairy Tale · Carol Muske

In that country sacred to the wolf, the mill no longer grinds out its dull bread and duller proverbs.
The unshepherded flocks complain in the empty fields. In the dead branches sit crows too exhausted to fly.

It's November, as it has been for years.
In the kitchen of the lonely palace one chop hobbles into the skillet.
The barrel staves split, and stack.

High on the landing of the great staircase above the ballroom, the chandelier rattles its glass skeletons and the cobweb's drawn back:

here is the illegitimate daughter of the king standing the way she stood the night he banished her, cold-eyed, her grey cloak slipping from her shoulder as she strikes her open palm with the butt of the riding crop—to emphasize each point she is making.

According to the story—it is her job, now that she's back—to make the leaves regrow, to unfreeze the waterfall.
Why does she wait?

All she has to do is speak the ancient name of each predator

and he will open his eyes, walk on his hind legs through the gate, looking right and left, clean-shaven, utterly certain of a second chance.
