
Volume 14

Issue 2 *Spring-Summer: Writing From the World:
Selections from the International Writing Program 1977-1983*

Article 69

1984

Vigil on a Bay

Julia Hartwig

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Hartwig, Julia. "Vigil on a Bay." The Iowa Review 14.2 (1984): 194-194. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3062>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

Julia Hartwig · Poland

VIGIL ON A BAY

She finally slept but even in sleep the ocean, washed out, roared, carrying sand to the beach.
It was as she had seen it sometimes at dawn.
The wind pulled at the door and rattled the shutters against the house.
On a chair lay an abandoned volume of gothic stories and a newspa opened to the police report.
Her fear was domesticated
as a stone washed continuously by the roar of the ocean.
She saw a woman with flowing hair and wearing a long military skirt
burning leaves, gathering them to the center of the fire.
Behind her shoulders the ocean tried to seize her with each withdrawing wave as if she were a hostage held by some secret pact concluded in the past.
To live with the ocean is to live between everyday fear and the fear which, like a rock beneath the surface, is made of layers of fear, fear laid down for thousands of years by the gigantic fish, by the birds, by the mind.
And everyone must yield finally to some element, vow it fidelity.
How could she not know that the ocean was always there behind th windows of her old house?
Should one cross the ocean for this?
Should one go as far as the end of the world to look in the aged,
human eye of providence?