A Large Heavy-Faced Woman, Pocked, Unkempt, in a Loose Dress . . . and her mute shadow touching me made me look up, the glass panes and squatting aircraft like a movie screen behind her, and she smiled, held out a small orange card that I took with my hand from her hand—the deaf-and-dumb alphabet on one side, hand-signs, and on the other her plea, her exhortation, her prayer, her pitch: SMILE. With the hand that took my coins she drew a blessing in the air and like a tired usher walked away down the empty seats and dirty ashtrays to a young woman with a baby, the orange card hovered till the child stirred, reaching up, reaching, the mother lifted her head from her worries to frown, say no. Maybe someone was late.

Or hadn't caught the right plane or had caught it, leaving; or left with bad words.

The big woman shaped another smile with her lips, touched the baby's curling wafting hand, traced her blessing again, wasted no words.
Her limp fingers invisible with the silence of their stillness, down the narrowing corridor she went toward the next gate, where some gathered oblivious drunk traveling men wearing cowboy hats and boots after their convention were singing the loud song she couldn't hear as she approached them like the stage messenger whose surprising words will signal the end but who says nothing this time, and the singing stops, the actors stand in place waiting and the audience, restless and embarrassed, begin to bark into their hands willing now to welcome any word, even the bad news The Queen is dead or The old shepherd whom you summoned knows or I alone escaped to tell thee, but she doesn't speak, only her hands can—like yours, you accoutered conventioners and young griever, you tired mothers, you healers and whores on trips, wife-beaters and tormentors of children, you shoe-salesmen, cooks, polite cold freeway toll-takers with warm palms, you men making fists in your compulsive pockets around coins or keys, you women groping in purses for cigarettes, for candy and gum and lipstick confused, here is your herald! Some message is come.

Even the worst she can say will be touching.

And your being still could be a kind of listening.
