Each morning she is wheeled into the picture window of her son-in-law’s house, jammed into her selected viewing space by the table with the lamp and bowling trophy. The drapes sweep apart like fronds.

She stretches her neck like a brontosaurus and watches the neighbors, whose names she doesn’t remember. Across the street two Volkswagens line up like M&M’s, one yellow, one orange.

At lunchtime her daughter broils a small steak, very tender, saying, “Ma, you must have meat.” But her taste runs these days to Kellogg’s corn flakes and baby cereals. She leans over her plate, stretching her neck like a brontosaurus, and mangles a small piece between her tough gums. The dog waits his turn.

Her grandson has left a bag of M&M’s on the table. Forbidden, but no one’s watching and they’re so good, one yellow, one orange.

Each evening she is wheeled up close to the TV in her son-in-law’s house. She watches Superman reruns. In the kitchen, her son-in-law eats meat and potatoes and talks in a loud voice. His bowling night—he will have her daughter to herself. But the TV picture has gone bad, and the room is dark. Just last week she could hardly tell if there were four lovely Lennon sisters, or three.
He returns late—almost eleven—low scorer on his team. He needs his wife but there’s a dinosaur in his living room, stretching her neck. It’s past her bedtime. He waits his turn.

Each morning he looks out of the picture window of his house. Across the street the neighbors have parked their shiny, new Toyotas.
He blinks, as if at something unexpected and obscene. He moves away, walking upright, heavy on his bare heels. He wears pajamas.

In the kitchen
he pours orange juice into a paper cup and takes his medication—two shiny capsules.
His mother-in-law is extinct, and his wife, too.

There is the dog to feed; and he will think of people to visit. He moves slow, deliberate, but keeps on moving. The sky is full of birds, and the Rocky Mountains all have names.

In the evening he turns on the TV and wedges his fifty-foot frame into his favorite chair, curling his tail over the armrest.
He watches the third rerun of the Italian version of Zorro. When the horizontal hold goes haywire, he watches diagonal stripes.

It’s not easy to be a tyrannosaurus.
He stands eighteen feet tall, he thuds through life, what’s left. And when he roars, he shows his sharp stalactites and stalagmites. His grown children get nervous. He resents them. They wait their turn.
