MONKSHOOD

They have their vows: emptiness and clarity and disbelief. In all their immigration greed is a country they never enter. Ancient as chant in single lines they hunch their small blue heads above the garden too rash with yellow anthemis. Monkshood never equates envy with desire. They envy nothing, not the sultry peony too rich for its own stalk, bent down with the lurid possibility of a Chinese screen luminous with wings. Enough, they say, cut back to shroud.

Then it's camera quiet. Shady. Deep now with other lifetimes, bees a sudden narcotic. They glaze the garden.
