1989

The Guinea Hen

Mary Clark

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3743
My constant desire
to eliminate them—
I hope that caused
no damage.
I apologize
to my own breasts.

Just when you begin
an apology
it's too late.
It can be too late.
It may be.
I've seen it happen
over and over
in my—just now
I'm believing it—
my gracious life.

THE GUINEA HEN

Think of old Victorian women gliding in dresses with bustles, the tips of their shoes showing.
Now, think only of the bustle.
Imagine a bustle of feathers
and a bird head stuck on top,
a most hideous bird head,
a head not far from a vulture's
but less exaggerated, more like a normal bird's, plucked.
All skin, pink and bluish
and shriveled and dry, flaking, the head makes even the young bird look ancient and frail.
The eyes close like a lizard's.
At the top of the head,
a few infrequent hairs come out,
like the last hairs of balding,
and the hard triangular horn there
only confirms the bird as elderly.
Unlike the pheasant, she lacks the long tail which gives dignity to her stride across the lawn.
In fact, she lacks length in general.
The legs and neck, meager,
the body, squat, she becomes a bird consumed by feathers,
like a snail who has come out of its shell only part way.
But the guinea hen is vulnerable perched on the wooden beam at night.
Her feet deep under, her head pulled in, is the best she can do.
Hoping, is it, to look like something other than a game fowl?
A feather muff of sorts?
A decorative feather bouquet?
Her feathers are decorative:
pearls on rich dark velvet.
And graduated pearls, no less,
which grow larger toward the feet,
and, at the neck, a precious collar of the smallest perfect circles.
Granted, the head is hideous, but surely the body is the most sensuous bird body I've seen.
Like the girl at the bar whose face is nothing to look at
but whose figure knocks men out.
Like the woman we see
from the back in the late night horror movies. The camera closes in and she begins her turn.
The music hits the severe chord
just as the face, revealed, halts the man in pursuit
who backs up slowly—
so as not to spur her on—
into his own stunned desire.