1989

A Phantom of Delight

Michael Heffernan

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3796

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
A Phantom of Delight

Father liked reading Wordsworth in the bathroom in a great voice, pitching his vagrant tent among the unfenced regions of his brain. He hated Wordsworth like a pestilence. One of his favorite tactics of derision was to recite the scriptures mockingly. There was a tang of mockery in the air, a vibrancy of mockery through the door. Once he was at this long enough, maybe the better part of a good hour or so, another sound would rise amid the din of his locution, curling onto it and then all through it like a wisp of smoke, as from another life we both had lived, a bar in Ensenada where the beer was kept in ice in buckets on the table and the smoke hung like a blue veil over us, wavering when she walked in from the street to sit beside the window in the stillness after the laughter and the songs died down.