Learning to Dance

Michael Carey
the window is full of fields, and the fields are full of beans—300 tons hanging gently from stalks so tender and so brittle, the burden of one bird would break them.

Learning to Dance

I

There used to be a horse in that pasture, a piebald gelding. He was the only way my father knew where to turn when he was visiting.

I remember baling hay there for the first time, before the horses, before the sheep, before my father ever thought to visit. The sun again close, our bodies wracked yet constantly in motion. Waves of grain in waves of heat. Our stomachs, the world, moving, our lives a song we were teaching ourselves to dance to.

II

Now it’s weeds,
now it’s beans,
now the old shed
is crumbling.
Sheep turn as the morning advances.
My father is gone.
It is no longer now,
it is thousands of years before man existed,
the horizon strangely red and burning.

THE STORY OF OUR LIVES

for Arlen and Fran Gangwish

The buzzing of flies over a carcass.

The promise of life in the seed and the rain and the soil.

Every morning our eyes come to rest on the horizon.

Such a large sky full of emptiness, clouds heavy with air and floating water.

These are our children growing ever closer to leaving.

Nothing so near as distance.

THE REASON FOR POETRY

There are only two chickens left now since the wild dogs got done with them.
They don’t seem to care, those that remain, cooing in the coop with a tank full of water and cracked corn they couldn’t finish in a season.
I’ll never get over how real the world is and yet, how easily it disappears,
