Dream of the Interior

Chase Twichell

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3869

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Dream of the Interior

A dog that has been sleeping on a crypt rouses and stands up, her yellow hide sunken over the haunches, pendant teats crusted and dry.

Green spotted lizards drop noisily down through the serrated leaves, rustling among the wooden crosses, plastic flowers and melted votive stubs, the heaped sand bordered by shells.
What do I long for or deny such that I dream up this paradise for myself, and why is there so much death in it, so many nameless grave-dunes?

Beyond the tumbled coral wall, the heavy sea-grapes hang in dust, the sea folds up its white rags and shakes them out again, and the crude oars of the fishermen dip and rise and fling away their sapphire droplets.

If I leave this place, could I find my way home through the streets of sand, the bones asleep in the heat?
A vine like honeysuckle scribbles over the wall, one sweet taste on the pale green tip of each stigma, the delicately splayed petals spilling pale orange dust and perfume.

If I put my tongue to a single flower I'd suspend here forever in my unknown need, swaying like the black dog on his yellow bride, slightly off balance among the dead, locked in a dream.

Useless Islands

I'm trying to remember what happened when love overtook me, how the old self slipped from its hard boundaries like a ripe plum out of its skin.

It's a personal mystery.

It was August, each moment setting fire to the next, the woods already bloodied by the first bright deaths.

I'm trying to remember, but there's a blacked-out part to the story,