Some Historic Sites in Iowa

The written history of Iowa begins on June 17, 1673, when Joliet and Marquette paddled out of the Wisconsin River and into the broad expanse of the Mississippi just below McGregor, Iowa. Everything before that date is pre-historic Iowa and is best represented by the Effigy Mounds National Monument above present-day Marquette.

A number of other sites comparable to the Effigy Mounds area are being developed. In addition, the State Historical Society of Iowa hopes to make a beginning on its Toolesboro Mounds area in the months ahead.

As a further guide for members and interested Iowans, the Society plans to publish issues of The Palimpsest on such topics as museums—state, city, and privately owned—which have outstanding merit and will be of more than local interest. The latter type will doubtless be listed in an appendix. Also contemplated is an issue on fairs, festivals, rodeos and similar attractions. These must be well-established and possess the element of longevity, such as the Clay County Fair, the National Dairy Congress, the Pella Tulip Festival, the Tama Powwow, and the rodeos at Sidney and Fort Madison. Information, programs, and pictures will be needed in order to develop these stories. Ultimately complete issues of The Palimpsest should appear on the more important ones, similar to those published on the Iowa State Fair, the Clay County Fair, the Tama Powwow, and the Midwest Old Threshers Reunion.

Iowa has a rich and colorful history and every effort should be made to present it in vivid and dramatic form. Historical accuracy should always be the determining factor in every community presentation. It is only when the elements of truth and accuracy are combined with drama that a true picture can be drawn.

One can earnestly hope that the following pages will serve as a catalyst in engendering a deeper love and affection for the Hawkeye State.
