

1991

Elegy, 1822

Frankie Paino

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Paino, Frankie. "Elegy, 1822." The Iowa Review 21.3 (1991): 148-149. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4064>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

so much like a bird it becomes my wish for you, whoever you are—what I offer to the wind which wraps around my palm, opening, as if this poem, this prayer, might reach you in time.

ELEGY, 1822

This time it's not so easy, holding a pose, shoulders back as he bends to gather driftwood, build that final bed. All he can offer is this pyre—frankincense and salt which turn the flames chameleon. Shelley's dead.

And two years from Greece, the marsh disease which will kill him, Byron turns from the smoke, dusky medusa-curls circling his friend's face,

the hand which held his own one summer in Geneva falling open as if offering something to the wind.

What else can he do but raise his head, that posture of defiance which makes the others envious,

Hunt and Trelawny ashamed of their own small love.
Byron's thinking he must leave before he thrusts his hand through the heat toward those lips, dark with their secret. He says he'll take the skull for a goblet, swallow death whole.

But now he will swim. Pushing away from shore, everything around him's cerulean—water, sky,

roots of fire—even the air looks blue, forgiving.

The bones of his foot seem to unfurl in the waves so he's kicking harder, strong. Something feels endless inside him. The midday August sun scorches his arms as they rise and fall.

Out toward the Bolivar, his hands raining light, Byron is burning, and he gives himself to the agony,

its pure, rare, bite like fire in his veins,
until he's laughing, blisters rising cruel as moons.