1991

In the Woods, 1957

John Spaulding

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4078

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Summer at the Croft

And the rain came in daysful. Each of us ate what we could—crayfish we caught in a swamp, oatmeal, broth and batter noodles. At evening the smell of wet goats came in the windows and we could see black raspberries hanging like bulletholes through the gray leaves. We would tell ghost stories to scare ourselves and make footprints with toes missing until our minds went flat and we thought of nothing but that big black bed that lay open up the narrow staircase in the attic. The father meantime emptied the warm milk onto his crumbled cornbread, added syrup and began to sing. It was his soft sounds we caught in our net of sleep just before the screen door slammed and someone yelled that the dogs had tore up a groundhog on the porch. The rains began heavy again next day around noon. But for a few hours then we had the sun and some of it fell in a cup by the window where a stiff dry flower stood like a Scotswoman just stepping from a brown dress.

In the Woods, 1957

I disappear on the way home from school into the woods of the neighborhood, where I have no friends except two cigarette butts and a coffee can. The sky is green, and no one knows I am missing.
I watch the sumacs smack their arms in the wind.
I crumble a fistful of sticky red flowers
and listen to the four o’clock train.
I did not go to the barber shop after school or to choir practice.
The wind blows my smoke over the pine trees.
Through the leaves I can see a section of Highland St.
Kids on their way home from school, nurses driving home from the hospital. Perhaps my father will forget about the haircut and no one will ask about choir practice.
If there is a war here
I will hide in the mountains south of town,
where there will be others like me, in camouflage,
waiting, with cigarettes and machine guns.

WAKING

I have forgotten to set the alarm.
I slowly enter my opium-filled body.
This morning is soft enough to allow me to move. The jar of sleep opens.
The pool drains. And bees fill the house.
(My cat paws at them.) From far away
the sun is struggling to get out of its box.
I peer over my lower lid—
something is dangerous.