

1995

Trying Not to Be Cynical

Stephen Dobyns

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Dobyns, Stephen. "Trying Not to Be Cynical." The Iowa Review 25.3 (1995): 83-84. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4436>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

Trying Not To Be Cynical Stephen Dobyns

These early risers—the cardinal’s tenacious alarm, the mockingbird’s artful imitation of the street—how keen they are to get started. I imagine them alert all night on their perches awaiting the signal, which is not dawn because they begin long before the first hint of light. The way that sunflowers ardently follow their master or how the Irish setter next door always has its sneakers on: it’s not the immediate moment they embrace but all moments.

The forward-looking, the ever-eager, surely they suffer set-backs but the next morning the cardinal is out there once again with its pygmy trumpet blast, not only broadcasting its breathing but its readiness as if the day had too few minutes for all its plans.

Don’t we know people who are equally forward-looking,
unable to stay in bed, rushing from one embrace to the next, eternally excited by the unexciting?
But there I go again: too cynical. As a hand fits within a glove, so the energetic fit within their day.
The foolish ones have foolish projects, the brilliant forge the ladder up which humankind has climbed.

What joins them is their embrace of each waking hour, their gusto for existence, the joy of inhalation, but how trying to those others for whom the moment is a burden. How can one assert the superfluity of all life when the fervent and forward-looking are rushing back and forth like a cheerful spider wrapping a melancholic insect in sticky strands?

But it's not that, only the cynical think that;
rather the ardent find heat where others find winter.
How eager they must be after death to return again, standing in line wherever the line forms, perhaps on sunset's ruby cloud or a rainbow's optimistic arc.
Who would trudge forward without their nudging, these Casanovas of the instant, these embracers of breathing?

It is not yet four A.M. and the cardinal begins its call:
a benign airhorn cutting across the backyard fences.
In a dozen bedrooms eyeballs rotate toward alarm clocks:
a groan, a sigh and the head goes back beneath its pillow, hoping to snag a few more dreams before the day thoughts start their interminable charting of what comes next, a card house of plans plausible only to the impassioned.