THE WIG OF LILIANE (4 RUE BROCHANT)

Chestnut-colored, it droops like a tender animal curled in a bottom drawer of the foyer chiffonnier.

My new-found cousin, Maurice, retired professor of Latin and Greek, keeps everything she wore:
hats, coats, purses, furs.

In every packed room her photograph—wide-apart eyes, level grey gaze, neck-length hair later shaved, the offending lump plucked from her brain.

In the wig, snug under a slouched hat, she revives to rummage for books in dusty stores, striking a bargain with dealers.

A hard-to-find translation for Maurice cheers her, defers the nausea, headaches he soothes with a cloth dipped in cologne.

In this near museum of bric-a-brac, posed in a dark Parisian spring, Maurice confides in me.
A finch perched on her funeral wreath and sang.

After the burial, a pigeon from the Parc Batignolle stood guard on his shoulder. And inside the kitchen, having misread the light of an open window, a sparrow circled her needlepoint of birds and sky. We hear a stir at the door. Flinging the wig to the floor, she floats into the vestibule, breathless with the purchase of Martial's Epigrams.

A scarce edition, leather-bound, deep brown, like her damp hair, whose true shade matches the hue of the antique buffet looming in the mirrored hall.

The bird roosts in her outstretched palm.
As soon as she nudges it back on course, she will cradle my face in her hands, examine me as if I were another rare book she'd stumbled on at the bouquiniste.

"Maurice, chéri, look, our cousin has something of her mother's eyes about the lids, the lift of the brow, but Aunt Jeanne's hair, the flyaway curls.
