The Flower Called I Want

"L'herbe Voglio non cresce mai nel giardino del Re"

The flower called I Want blooms not within the gardens of Paradise, nor do its roots number here among Purgatory's narrow beds where the soul descended cleanses itself with soil and a rake.

To accompany his loneliness, one newcomer sings lullabies until stilled by the lettuces' indifference to song.

The flower called I Want blooms not . . .

These phrases of his mother

... carried over the water wither, so he buries them beside the onion. The onion, whose single word is a copper bolt demanding tears. In this middle world, day is ever day without change, night is ever night. What he feels lispings as time is his tongue returning its verbs.

Across the mullioned greenhouse walls, his image flashes and he perceives he's slow becoming a creature half-man, half-wheelbarrow—the better half of each.

The better half of man is silent, and the barrow bears his load. Without voice, he grows a purer ear for the thorns' cry, bind me.

Within, his last worldly solace of poise is torn—Human, weep—by the onion's plangent command.
