The Cathedral at Chartres

Katherine Soniat

1998

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5026
Katherine Soniat

THE CATHEDRAL AT CHARTRES

Here, the great arched doorway, there, a bride so far away she’s a trail of light.

Small woman, tiny groom set out to commune at the end of a stone universe.

Today, all her good saints are an original mix of dead plant and animal, this nuptial a planned potion of spun tulle, roses and candle smoke.

She has but to turn and drag her own long train out into the streets.

From this threshold

I peer into dankness, the hot end of a summer morning on my back.

Row after row of polished pews, then there they are again, my altared bride and groom.

The organ pours harmony over a pageantry of humans. Smiling, the gargoyle has overseen such plans, these primary conciliations of man and woman. He’s seen so many he could doze off in his walled garden of beatitudes.

Or he could compose a heart with thumping rhythms to inspire most any grandiosity—snort of the bannered crusade, seaworn sighs of Magellan, those brief exhalations when two or more gather to believe there will be no future such as theirs.