ON READING HOMER

*Nectar and ambrosia Athena instilled within Akhilleus to keep his body whole
—the Iliad, XIX*

All day, I have been reading Homer at the table, the old wine-tasting table in the kitchen, its dark cracked wood gouged, burned, stained,
scarred like a map of the world.
(O, spilled drop of a wine-dark sea!)
Reading, actually, an old girlfriend's copy of Robert Fitzgerald's translation from the Greek, those great men and their rage annotated in her slant lavender hand, as in a water-color her strength and her wit brushed momentarily over the pages, a palimpsest on the ancient art of warfare.
Fair Athena, the hope of old soldiers.
Fair redhead, o, we had some rows of our own, didn't we?
I was foolish of heart, and proud, you evinced a talent for winging crockery, and together we made our love zing!

All day, rain has streamed down the windows, rushed in torrents past the kitchen door.
Now, the storm clouds are breaking up, drifting off into the rosy-fingered dusk. A watery light dimples these pages, where battlefields have been abandoned for the cooking-fires, and libations are raised to the gods. . . .
I catch myself rubbing a pensive circle in the table-wood. ~Any regrets?
She gave me a bottle of '75 Lafite Rothschild and I did not open it at once and drink it with her, but stored the bottle away, for what?

Years later, when my wife and I hauled it out to celebrate some occasion, the wine had of course gone sour.
