At the Museum, 1938

Ruth Stone
This obsession with invisible things.

But the concrete with its gray crumbling smile
is like a factual male.
Drive your car into me, it suggests;
I’m no bloody vagina.

The concrete stretches for miles;
the turrets with guns in position.

AT THE MUSEUM, 1938

In the native bird exhibit, the whip-poor-will, stuffed with sawdust and arsenic, hides among arranged dried leaves in order to instruct you. Nearby, a Navajo rug, the design a complex ideograph, a sacred message; a man-spirit in mirror image. However, it is without annotation, the legend meaningless; reduced to artifact. Now I am looking at a photograph; Kill Spotted Horses’ ceremonial face in a cheap frame. In a matching frame, Blue Wing, her dark eyes set toward the mountains. Ropes of significant beads hang from her. Gently the round cheeks turn away. On the winding stairs, the old oak railing was crafted into ornate spools. Every newel post is carved. And here in a glass case, as if in a logical progression, is the tiny skeleton of a kiwi. Outside, the great elms along the streets in Urbana, their green arched cathedral canopies; the continuous singing of birds among their breathing branches.

SPECULATION

A girl we didn’t actually know won a contest we never heard of
and fifty pairs of new shoes.
We each had one pair of shoes
and two skirts and two blouses.
We were in high school, my sister and I.
We washed and ironed our clothes