Returning to the City of Your Childhood

Ruth Stone

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5557

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Returning to the City of Your Childhood

In the framed black and white photograph on the wall of your rented furnished condominium, you imagine a hidden garden of blue cornflowers. It drifts in the acid residue. In this black and white photograph, the garden you imagine is beyond a narrow passageway between two buildings. For you, it exists in spite of this jerrybuilt investment condominium. And you imagine someone, perhaps it is you, in the hidden part of the photograph; you, a child, are looking over a plank fence to where surely, (you imagine,) a grandfather is nailing together piece by careful piece, an original wooden doll house, (not yours, it was never yours.) In reality you once watched him, that grandfather beyond the fence, with your own trust in miracles, at age six. In the room where the photograph (not yours) hangs, a montage sharp as the odor of fresh sawdust. You put your hand against the striated silence. What are these things that draw toward us, these visitors who hide among us, who are as the air that enters, giving and taking away.