Entertaining Your Father in the Netherlands

Katrina Vandenberg

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5812
Entertaining Your Father in the Netherlands

The lies your father and I tell pile up, and yet the little cruelties of the past are not useful to anyone. He says he is happy, and I let him. A friend of my mother’s implores me to admit that getting involved with you was a mistake and I say fiercely I would do it again.
Six years after you died I sit with him on a bench by a canal in Utrecht, eating Italian broodjes, with little to say. We watch a barge clean the canal for spring, dragging its claws across the bottom for bicycles tossed from the bridge by drunken thieves that year. Pinching frame after rusted frame, adding each to the tangle of wheels and handlebars on deck.
I tell him that in Amsterdam two cars go in each year, and that a Viking ship was found, intact, at the bottom of the Vecht after it sank one thousand years ago on its way to trade on this very canal.

The ship’s in the museum because it’s rare; the bicycles are junk because they aren’t, though they will be rare too if they remain unfound long enough. Some students pump their bikes past us with their strong legs—I’m sure he thinks of you, his youngest son, dead by twenty-five. I just knew you for five years, when we were barely grownups, which is why I’m out of stories your father wants to hear.
What’s left are tales of meanness, mistakes, wild foolish ways you might have outgrown if you lived.
The tales I start, changing their endings when his smile falters. If you were here, I’d never tell.
But since you’re not—speaking of you as pure and wise is not like we’ve forgotten you as much as worried your best face, wearing it down like a good-luck piece. Listen, I’m about to tell one that will shock you back to life, gloriously imperfect and raw.
I’ve waited until now to bring it up.