

2005

Suez War: Alexandria, 1956

Gregory Djanikian

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Djanikian, Gregory. "Suez War: Alexandria, 1956." The Iowa Review 35.3 (2005): 128-129. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.6078>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

Suez War

Alexandria, 1956

The sirens were wailing, someone was shouting in the street, and my father was putting out the lights.

From a window, I watched straggler cars heading home, their headlamps painted blue and night becoming darker.

Everywhere, shades were drawn, shutters closed and latched.

In the cold basement we sat under blankets below the steel bracings my father had welded for shelter.

Soon there was the sound of artillery far away, maybe in Aboukir, maybe shells aimed toward the canal where already ships had been sunk.

“Hush, now,” my mother whispered cradling me in her arms, the commotion of her heart against my ear, and the radio’s static sounding like sharp bursts of gunfire in the desert.

I imagined the apartment house shaking.
I imagined something like a large bird curving perfectly toward our roof and everyone suddenly taking flight.

“Hush, now,” my mother said in the flickering candle light, the shadows moving like dark wings along the wall and the sound of guns in the distance thundered in my blood as my mother held me tight as if I could disappear like water through the fingers or the flimsiest cloth, or like a hand in the night slipping away from another hand.