Two Poems on Pickerel Lake

1. 1951

Five & I am buoyantly on my back while looking up under the girlish under-skirts of willows leaning out over the shoreline as Mamma calls from the safety of her screened-in cabin porch on the hillside, calling for me to hurry in, can't I see how thunderclouds are moving in fast?

I splash in & run up the hill to her cold arms & a beach towel, shivering in the sudden cool, uninvited breeze, looking back into the trees behind me, their supple limbs bending, submitting.

2. 2001

A cool September evening & my boat in perfect lullaby, gently rocking to the gibbous moonrise near the drop-off where I fish alone for milk-eyed walleye down deep just beyond stagnant algae & inside a rim of coontail & green cabbage weed.

Drifting a jig-&#x26;&-minnow, I wait for the tap-tapping of a whiskered father beneath me before setting the hook & calling out to him to rise as I imagine

Lazarus once rose from the dead, Lazarus who, at first, couldn’t believe his unimagined fortune, the seemingly impossible just made possible, a second chance, a miracle until he noticed, as each star-struck fish I pull from the depths notices, a barbed hook far back & planted deep in his soft gullet.
In the moonlight, I watch nervous waterstriders, those Jesus-bugs, as they walk on the water beyond the boat’s bow, their spindly shrews’ legs skittishly skating the lake’s surface under the month’s full moon shining down, a fuller moon shining up.
