NANCE VAN WINCKEL

Almost Impervious

From across the river a last dream disappears into the fresh cress along the bank, where a woman kneels, holding a baby over and then in the water. There he begins to sense again the silence he'd thought he'd exited forever.

How sudden the sun. Hoisted
toward it, he warmed;
he breathed.

Only much later, in the battles' endless repetitions of the spear, would he feel once more the rapids' icy pull and recall how swiftly a man slips out from a god—a split second before the white light surrounds what shivers, what gleams.
