JOE R. KNIGHT

At the Infirmary

Amber measures my blood pressure, squeezing, then releasing, the black inflator bulb, pumping up the pressure gauge.

I gaze into her unblinking brown eyes and my heart bangs against its cage.

The pneumatic cuff is colored plum, Amber's scrubs are sky-blue, the braids of her auburn hair blaze, her dreamy smile gleams between candy-apple lips, and my prison garments are green as the leafy landscapes of spring.
