2009

Talking Frotteur Blues

James Capozzi

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.6773

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
I.
Tell me the night of the Church of the Sloe when some Godfearing men duly heaved duly hoed and raised ten corpses from hollows and mire and thawed them in the fire's blue breath smoking there, in the wild stillness.

Tell what happened when they ran out of work out of murdered drunks travelers snared by the mire.
When the bog was again a far silent place exorcised of pieces of arms and faces and other such material none of us know otherwise.

II.
As this county kept some of the old patchwork, his voice rode ancient music reeling underneath until, one morning, calling through the remnants of a barn set artfully afire, the ruin became a riddle: murmurs emerged for the geezer on the farther side whose son had gone to town once, avenger.

III.
A man who can do and undo what he wants walks into a bog that is also a loneliness.

Just him and the bog and the sound the sods make as some things are so large they must make a sound as they mass at the edge of our homes, of our sheep.

He can’t hear them, they’ve always been there always will be other mere ghosts of the county.

    Isn’t it enough that you have heard of this place traveler, that you have eaten at its marble table?

    Isn’t it enough
that you me and the man share one memory, at most?