ADITI MACHADO

THE ANIMAL

To the place he will sit down to die, his quiet broken by a distant bell held in the hands of a boy:

          this is where I go, as if to an attic; this is where I expect it will happen, amid a vatic breeze in the grass in the sun surrendering itself to a wound, and the coming to a place is sometimes enough, and even more is the coming to it as sheep from a point to the far right with a boy and a gathering sound of bell, from within a thick of pine: this coming, from a nowhere, upon a beast:

          the white of sheep invades a field as a circle might empty wildly into another circle.
