Of Kore*

for Jae Choi

A: In the breach without escort I breathe inside the letter.

A: She was wearing a tinsel bodice of space.

A: That as she paused preening in my palm without ceremony—

A: To a place stationed about place.
But speak of its cupboards and trenches only when arriving because next came her blue shoes when one falls unchorused into my hand.

A: She refuses to speak

and painting the remembered names of my horses that began by strolling the hallways together.

A: No. I am simply undead among the dead.

More like a civil servant. We work the printing press, unwording.

That loosened petal of animal mechanics chomping oxygen and chrome until absent.

A: We employ mostly nurses; a version,

A: Tuckering their tinsel murmur trays.

A: Because, her pistil and lisp. Ledging. A turnstile.
It was never personal.

Her toys, which are vowels, which are toys, which are celledsacs from which termites, or orchards of speech trunks for my workers.

Diswound rhymes pile up outside the gates.

A: She unpacks the ink from a curdled geyser and daughters it into a hat.

A: And then?

Then the field was suddenly a mad woman
jamming caverns into her violate smock.
The crop stalks, a militia, teetered and a snap.

Storying, on one knee,

from soil untethering her jawbone, a gesture ashes forth
patty-cake nuptials.

A: Then. Before night falls in this cellar, your four seas shall whinny and stagger in their stadium, unruffling waves
in which all times might exist.

A: Of course not.
Not benevolent from the groin of the father, the brothers and I:

we drew sticks.

Of brothers.

Among brothers, gashlings. Bash at the brother-face blood-let for father-eyed: precedence.

This is my station.

A: Between each, all things:
there I live there I bind them,

unto separateness that they may, whatsoever,
and difference.

A: "A botched junkyard garden sire should not envy them"
cautioned one of my brothers.

But that this child could end.

Or: to see her safely forever standing safely forever
on her tiptoes safely forever coloring in all the elbows
and the sounds

A: Because her sing-songs engrave us.

A: Because this child could end.
