254 Telephone interview with Martin Sabo, Arlington, VA (May 14, 2007). Anti-anti-smoking restaurant lobbyist Chum Bohr remarked that Sabo’s cosponsorship had indicated that he had known “which way the wind was blowing.” Telephone interview with Wencel (Chum) Bohr, St. Paul (Mar. 4, 2009).

255 Telephone interview with Henry Savelkoul, Sun City West, AZ (Mar. 2, 2009). 2305
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

the state’s most heavily Republican district, had smoked from the age of 16 to 26, but quit two years before entering the legislature. By his own admission still addicted (as he was sure he remained 34 years later), he “gagged” at secondhand smoke. Unaware of Kahn’s earlier bill or her plan to file another in 1975, when Philbrook informed the Speaker’s office early in the session that he wanted to introduce an anti-smoking bill, he was told about Kahn, who, on hearing of Philbrook’s deep interest, asked him to co-sponsor hers.256 Even younger, 25-year old Ted Suss, a Vietnam War Marine,257 when asked 34 years later what had motivated him to become a cosponsor, observed:

Part of what motivated me to become an author was youthful ignorance. I did not realize at the time that authoring a controversial bill can cause problems for you in the future. Thus my willingness to stick my neck out.

As a lifelong non-smoker, my motivation was at least informed by my disgust with sidestream smoke and the smoky atmosphere in so many offices, business places, and public buildings. This disgust opened my mind to trying to do something about the problem. Once I started talking to people, it became apparent that my feelings about smoking were shared by many others. Listening to the public debate on the issue before I was elected to the legislature convinced me that there was a huge public health issue at stake apart from the comfort issue.

Once educated on the public health impact smoking had on non smokers, I wanted to do something about it. Phyllis’ bill was a very handy tool for me to express my views and make what I considered to be good public policy. I think, this may be giving myself more credit than I deserve, I knew deep down inside that this non-smokers rights and more attention to public health was a direction America needed to go and I wanted to be part of taking the first steps in that direction. I do recall telling someone once, I think at a National Council of State Legislators meeting, that I felt it important for one state to break the ice on this issue to give motivation and perhaps political cover to legislators in other states.

Between election day in November of 1974 and swearing in day in January of 1975, I met Phyllis for the first time and asked if there was any chance of becoming a co-author of her bill. She laughed in response knowing full well that finding five authors for that legislation was not going to be easy.258 A third of a century later Suss still took “great pride in having been an author of this law. For the law itself, but more so for the snowball that this law started rolling down the hill.”259

256 Telephone interview with Bud Philbrook, St. Paul (Mar 1, 2009).
257 http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?id=10642
258 Email from Ted Suss to Marc Linder (Mar. 2, 2009).
259 Email from Ted Suss to Marc Linder (Mar. 2, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

In language identical to H.F. 2801 (of 1974) and the MCIAA as enacted, H.F. 79’s key prohibition declared that: “No person shall smoke in a public place or at a public meeting except in designated smoking areas.”260 In later analyses of MCIAA Kahn glossed this provision as making her statute path-breaking or even revolutionary:

Certain other states have listed a greater or lesser number of places where smoking is prohibited. The Minnesota law takes the step of forbidding smoking everywhere unless it is specifically allowed, but this step is psychologically far more difficult for people to understand. This single line in state law required a massive change in cultural attitudes and it is not surprising that it was difficult to get instantaneous comprehension and enforcement.261

In fact, however, even the first statewide ban, the 1973 Arizona law, had included the same prohibitory structure perforated by permissively designated smoking areas.262

ANSR implemented its aforementioned determination to exclude restaurants from the 1975 bill in order to neutralize its strongest opponents, by the circuitous route of retaining their specific identification in the definition of “public place” while conferring alone on owners of restaurants (and bars) the authority to designate the entire public place a smoking area. In other respects, too, it differed significantly from H.F. 2801.263 First, the definition of covered “public places” made clear that the list of named public places was illustrative (“not limited to”) rather than exhaustive. Second, it narrowed coverage by expressly “excluding private, enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers” (thus forcing co-employees, customers, and visitors to inhale especially concentrated smoke or to forgo contact with the occupants).264 Third, from the prohibition of smoking

262 See above ch. 23.
263 Theodore Tsoukalas, Jennifer Ibrahim, and Stanton Glantz, “Shifting Tides: Minnesota Tobacco Politics” at 9 (2003), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/cere/tcpmus/MN2003, erroneously asserted that: “The original bill introduced by Representative Phyllis Kahn in 1974 (HF 2801) was introduced again as HF 79 in February 1975.” Replete with gross factual errors, the authors’ legislative history of MCIAA is unreliable. For example, they bizarrely asserted that House File 966 had passed the Senate Health Committee, whereas in fact it was not even considered by a House committee. Id. at 7.
except in designated smoking areas were excluded “cases where an entire room or hall is used for a private social function” whose seating arrangements were controlled by the sponsor and not the owner. 265 Fourth, “persons in charge of public places” were added to proprietors as designators of smoking areas, but both were denied such authority “in places where smoking is prohibited by the fire marshall or by other law, ordinance or regulation.” Fifth, H.F. 79 set forth a complex of controls governing designated smoking areas, providing that “physical barriers shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent non-smoking areas.” Where, however, a public place consisted of a single room, “the provisions of this law shall be considered met if one side of the room is reserved and posted as a no-smoking area” 266 (suggesting that no physical barriers or ventilation would be required where they were most urgently needed). 267 Moreover, restaurants and bars were excluded from the prohibition of designating a public place in its entirety as a smoking area; the only condition attached to designating a restaurant or bar as a smoking area in its entirety was posting this designation conspicuously on all entrances used by the public. 268 Sixth, H.F. 79 raised the threshold for prosecution of owners/managers for failing to enforce the law by making only a willful failure a violation. 269 And seventh, the new bill conferred on “any affected party” the right to file a court action to enjoin repeated violations of the law. 270 Overall, then, Kahn accurately described the bill as “‘more moderate’” than the previous year’s. 271

Soon after the bill’s introduction Brandt was persuaded that it was likely that the legislature would confer at least some protection on nonsmokers because, as noted earlier, 90 of 131 House members present voted to restrict smoking in the House itself on at least one of three roll calls on the House rules and even some 267 Although the implementing rules did not expressly address the issue, the chief drafter later observed: “I don’t recall the statutory construction that allowed it but the rules required use of space separation or barriers (minimal as they were) even if the public place consisted of a single room. I don’t know if we were interpreting what it meant to be a ‘side of the room’ or some other provision that needed clarity to implement reasonably. I do know that enforcement required space or barriers, not merely one side of the room defined solely by the proprietor.” Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Nov. 6, 2009).

---

of those who voted No would support regulation of public smoking. And while greater uncertainty prevailed concerning senators’ attitudes, the aforementioned vote on the Senate rule in 1974 suggested that they did not differ significantly from those of their House counterparts. Brandt may have concluded that it was unlikely that either chamber would defeat MCIAA, but at the same time he also acknowledged that “the bill may be so weakened by amendments as to be ineffective, unless the public demands a strong bill,” especially since he conceded that “[e]ven as introduced, the bill falls far short of the ideal,” though it “would still represent a great improvement over the existing situation.” Nevertheless, even the results of his own questionnaire indicated that a watered-down bill was a real possibility: of the 47 representatives who told ANSR that they would support a nonsmokers’ rights bill, only 14 voted to restrict smoking on all three roll calls, while 17 did so on two, 6 on only one, and nine on none (suggesting that “the kind of legislation they may be willing to support may not be very adequate”).

272

The House Health Care Subcommittee Votes to Water Down the Bill

The bill’s first test took place before the Health Care Subcommittee of the House Health and Welfare Committee on February 13, at which in addition to Kahn and Brandt, a representative of the Lung Association, and Dr. Paul B. Johnson, chief of the pulmonary division of St. Paul-Ramsey Hospital, spoke for the bill, while a lobbyist for the Radisson Hotels and the president of the Minnesota Association of Commerce and Industry spoke against H.F. 79. Serendipitously, despite the Minnesota Historical Society’s destruction of all the audio tapes of committee hearings from the 1970s and 1980s, some knowledge of this hearing (and of the full committee hearing on February 25) has been 273 State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Committee on Health and Welfare, Subcommittee on Health Care, [Minutes] (Feb. 13, 1975), in MSA, MHS, 129.A12.6F. Dr. Johnson, who “was not an out and out activist,” had been involved in the Lung Association and, as he reconstructed the situation 34 years later, was probably recommended as a witness by that organization. Telephone interview with Paul Johnson, Edina, MN (Nov. 10, 2009). MACI’s public testimony against the bill refutes the later claim by ANSR’s president that “[t]he only opposing organization was the Hotel, Motel and Restaurant Association.” Jeanne Weigum, “Passage of the First Comprehensive, State-Wide, Smoking Control Law in the U.S.,” in Proceedings of the Fifth World Conference on Smoking and Health 2:327-31 at 327 (William Forbes et al. eds. 1983).

---

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

preserved for posterity because Honeywell, Inc., which was so eager to press its position that smoking in office workplaces be regulated solely by the Department of Labor and Industry that, in connection with the public hearing on the proposed regulations in December 1975, its corporate employee relations attorney and personnel director assigned the company’s in-house lobbyist to review the tapes of the committee hearings and floor debates “to provide them with some idea of the legislative intent of the ‘No Smoking’ act” in general and especially regarding the adoption of the amendment to place factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces under DLI’s jurisdiction.274

At the subcommittee hearing Kahn emphasized that she was not seeking to eliminate smoking, but “‘only...to establish the right to breathe clean air as a fundamental public right.’”275 Interestingly, instead of admitting that the decision to permit owners to permit smoking everywhere in restaurants, thus watering down the bill compared to her measure in 1974, was simply driven by the need to neutralize the restaurant owners’ opposition that had helped kill the previous year’s bill, Kahn disingenuously and implausibly claimed that she was reacting to the “strong and legitimate criticism” that had been directed at the earlier bill: “Restaurants are a more voluntary place where people go...”276 Brandt insisted that cigarette smoking was the “No. 1 air pollution problem... You get the same amount of pollution standing next to a smoker as you do next to an exhaust pipe of a car.”

In contrast, David Kuduk, Radisson’s lobbyist, both called the bill unnecessary and specifically objected to a provision that he argued might result in the Health Department’s requiring businesses to install barriers and ventilation

---

274Patsy Randell to W. C. Viitala, Subject: Clean Indoor Air Act Rules and Regulations (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112H.18.3(B). To be sure, the usefulness of the preserved knowledge depends on the accuracy and truthworthiness of Randell’s notes. On Honeywell’s position on the regulations, see below. In addition to transcribing the tapes, Randell as lobbyist had also attended the hearings and debates. Telephone interview with Patsy Randell, Minneapolis (Apr. 4, 2009). Randell was not included in the list of registered lobbyists for 1975. State of Minnesota, State Ethics Commission, Registered Lobbyists (Feb. 11, 1975).

276Patsy Randell to W. C. Viitala, Subject: Clean Indoor Air Act Rules and Regulations at 1 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112H.18.3(B).

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

That the hotel was so adamantly opposed to the law even after restaurant coverage had been removed (so that Chum Bohr, the lobbyist for the combined restaurant-hotel-resort hospitality association, of which Radisson was a member, did not even bother to appear at the House hearing) suggests, in connection with behind-the-scenes information discussed below concerning the fact that its owner, Curt Carlson, also owned the company that supplied the trading stamps for two of the cigarette manufacturers, the possibility that Radisson was perhaps acting on behalf of the tobacco industry. (Radisson’s hard-line position was underscored when, soon after the law had gone into effect, it posted smoking-permitting signs “throughout the area” at a Minnesota Hairdresser’s Convention at the downtown Radisson at which ANSR ran a booth selling nosmoking signs so that “the level of smoke on the conference floor could have stopped traffic.”) Finally, before the subcommittee Oliver Perry, the head of MACI, focused on what he called “serious practical problems,” especially for small businessmen” during a recession, when “hav[ing] to deal with another inspection procedure could possibly be the last straw.”

Following this testimony, the subcommittee adopted the weakening motion offered by Rep. Howard Smith, a DFL retail businessman and rural conservative, to amend the bill by adding the word “existing” before “physical barriers and ventilation systems” so that where none existed, owners who chose to designate smoking areas would be under no obligation to use those barriers/systems to minimize the toxic impact of the smoke that wafted over to nonsmoking areas. That Kahn agreed to this amendment meant, according 278 Bruce Nelson, “Nonsmoking Backers Get Taste of Victory,” SPPP, Feb. 14, 1975 (15:1-3). More than 30 years later Kuduk, who by then was a longtime legal services lawyer, did not recall what Radisson’s objections to the bill were, but thought that they probably were related to a fear of loss of sales. Telephone interview with David Kuduk, Grand Rapids, MN (May 22, 2007). Minority Leader Savelkoul conjectured that Radisson might have been especially opposed to the bill because in addition to hotels it also owned an entertainment/convention venue in the Twin Cities area. Telephone interview with Henry Savelkoul, Sun City West, AZ (Mar. 2, 2009).

279 Telephone interview with Wencel (Chum) Bohr, St. Paul (Mar. 4, 2009).

282 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 23, 2009).

283 State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Committee on Health and Welfare, to Ed Brandt, that “she wasn’t sure whether the bill would get out of the sub-committee without Smith’s amendment.” If business owners were in fact adamantly opposed to being forced to spend money on new barriers or ventilation and had the votes in the subcommittee to make the provision a deal-breaker, the Minnesota Health Department’s post-enactment promulgation of a rule that under certain circumstances would nevertheless have imposed precisely such an expenditure suggests just how far the agency went to override at least one of the law’s weaknesses (even though barriers in fact may not have protected nonsmokers at all from exposure to secondhand smoke).

The colloquy between Kahn and several antagonists, in particular Republican real estate businessman O. J. Lon Heinitz, who wanted to dilute the bill even further by striking “or serving as a place of work” from the definition of “public place,” thus limiting coverage to public places used by the general public, was instructive. In response to Heinitz’s question as to whether her bill covered factories, Kahn stated that it did, but incorrectly added that “the point here is that you have to designate [smoking] areas or allow smoking breaks,” when in fact H.F. 79 imposed neither duty. Then, when Heinitz explained that he asked in order to find out how the bill related to OSHA and to the fact that “[y]ou can’t move machinery around to accommodate [sic] smokers and non smokers [sic],” Kahn bizarrely back-pedaled, apparently willing to deprive nonsmoking industrial workers of all state protection from exposure to their colleagues’ secondhand smoke: “A factory is not really open to the public in the same sense that a...store is and certainly I would think that if there’s no disagreement among workers, and there’s generally no problem, you could designate the entire place smoking...because a factory might not be generally open to the public I don’t feel this is a problem. Industry can work this out with it’s [sic] workers.” Kahn then reversed herself yet again, in response to Republican John Kaley’s question as 285Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 13, 2009). Not recalling that he had attended the hearing, Brandt was reconstructing the logic that must have underlain Kahn’s move.

286See below this ch.

287http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?ID=10251 (visited Nov. 10, 2009). Heinitz’s interest in excluding workplaces may have been connected to the fact that earlier in his legislative career he had been president of the employment agency Snelling and Snelling in Minnesota. The Minnesota Legislative Manual 1971-1972, at 77 (Larry Anderson ed.).
to whether the factory owner had the right under the bill to declare a whole area nonsmoking, by pointing out the obvious—that the owner had no such power and that “working is one of the necessities of life and protection is needed for people who are irritated by smoke and who work.” Kaley’s counter that Kahn’s approach would force a factory owner to reorganize his whole assembly line prompted her to revert to her suggestion of smoking breaks. The two Republicans received reinforcement from Kuduk who, despite being Radisson’s paid lobbyist, suddenly began testifying “[o]n behalf only of myself.” After pointing out correctly that under H.F. 79 workplace coverage did not turn on being open to the public, he insisted that coverage of his 15-employee law office “would be a problem for us....” Prompted by Heinitz to devise an amendment to solve the problem, Kuduk favored deleting “serving as a place of work,” a phrase that made the bill “all inclusive”—and whose function finally dawned on Heinitz. Now Oliver Perry of MACI entered the fray, conjuring up the specter of conflicting jurisdiction with OSHA as well as between the Board of Health and the Department of Labor and Industry. Kahn sought to tamp down this eruption by observing that “[w]e need...higher standards of clean air than OSHA standards.”

That Heinitz’s amendment failed only by a vote of 4 to 5 (both Republicans and two of seven DFL’ers voting Yes), suggested, along with the watered-down designated smoking areas provision, that while the subcommittee was willing to recommend to the full committee that the bill pass as amended, business owners far beyond the restaurant industry (which was exempt) opposed regulation of smoking on their premises and a large majority of the legislature was not about to commit to an expansive law. Heinitz made his motion after Kahn had rejected his proposal to hold the bill over for further study. He sought to exclude workplaces because coverage might create problems for employers unable to provide separate smoking and nonsmoking areas: “‘What would the factory do? ... Have machines for smokers and machines for nonsmokers?’” Kahn simply cut this Gordian knot by pointing out that the bill “would resolve those types of problems by banning smoking in the entire area if facilities could not be established for nonsmokers.” The health justification and poetic justice were clear: “‘For years we have been resolving those kinds of situations in favor of the smoker.... It’s time we begin to resolve them in favor of the nonsmoker.’”

---

288 Patsy Randell to W. C. Viitala, Subject: Clean Indoor Air Act Rules and Regulations at 1-3 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112H.18.3(B).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The same day that the House subcommittee acted, the Minnesota Board of Health, which H.F. 79 tasked with writing the implementing regulations for MCIAA, voted 9 to 1 to prohibit smoking at all public meetings held in Minnesota Health Department buildings. The dissenter, insurance agent Robert Willmarth (who by 1976 would be Board chairman), “with cigar in hand, told fellow board members that ‘I don’t drink coffee—I’d like to ban it.’” In response to the distinction drawn by psychologist Michael Keable that coffee drinking did not bother nonsmokers, Willmarth asserted that he did not like the fumes that coffee gave off.\(^{291}\) When the discussion then veered off onto the smell of perfume and after-shave lotion it became manifest that not all members of the Board, several of whom smoked, had even the slightest grasp of the emerging science of secondhand smoke exposure. The Board’s action was not coincidental: in light of the legislature’s and the Minneapolis city council’s consideration of restricting smoking at public smoking, some Board members stated that they should set an example.\(^{292}\)

Radisson Hotels as Cigarette Manufacturers’ Secret Agent?

That Radisson was the sole individual corporation to oppose the bill raises the tantalizing possibility that it was acting as a subterranean agent for the cigarette manufacturers, especially since it was a member of the hospitality coalition whose lobbyist, Chum Bohr, was sitting out the hearings because he had already \(^{291}\) Lewis Cope, “State Health Board Restricts Smoking, Leaves Coffee Alone,” MT, Feb. 14, 1975 (1A, 5A), Bates No. TIMN0461954. Recalling the incident many years later, Willmarth—who owed his appointment to having a brother-in-law who was a state legislator—asserted that he had not “really” been opposed to the nosmoking rule, but had made this “newspaper comment” so that the public would understand that people are bothered by various odors. Willmarth’s memory or bona fides were cast in doubt by his claim that he had had no reason to oppose the ban since he did not smoke at Board of Health meetings anyway (which was contradicted by the reporter’s eyewitness observation). Telephone interview with Robert Willmarth, Rochester, MN (Apr. 1, 2009).

---

\(^{292}\) Lewis Cope, “State Health Board Restricts Smoking, Leaves Coffee Alone,” MT, Feb. 14, 1975 (1A, 5A), Bates No. TIMN0461954. The occupational information came from a telephone interview with Michael Keable, St. Joseph, MN (Mar. 20, 2009). Among the Board members whom he was able to recall 34 years later, Keable identified three smokers including one physician. Member Elizabeth Kalisch identified Bridget Coleman, the wife of then-Senate Majority Leader Nicholas Coleman, as a smoker. Telephone interview with Elizabeth Kalisch, White Bear Lake, MN (Mar. 20, 2009).
achieved privileging restaurants to permit smoking everywhere. Two years earlier Radisson had briefly become the target of the tobacco industry’s ire in response to the company’s announcement in April 1973 that, beginning May 1, it would set aside special space for nonsmokers in banquet and convention facilities at gatherings of 25 or more people. At the time, Radisson owned hotels in Minneapolis, Duluth, and Bloomington, Minnesota as well as in Omaha, Lincoln, Denver, and Tobago.293 As soon as the cigarette oligopolists’ panoptically active surveillance of their possible enemies caught wind of this treachery, their agents went into red alert mode to warn the top of the hierarchy. On May 2, R. Marshall Edelen, the vice president for distribution services at Brown & Williamson, forwarded to Edward Finch, the company’s president, chairman, and CEO, a newspaper clipping with the announcement that a Pittsburgh department manager had included in his weekly letter.294 Edelen added that Radisson was owned by Curt Carlson of Minneapolis, who also owned Gold Bond Stamp Company and other affiliated entities that engaged in coupon and promotion programs used by Lorillard and Liggett & Myers.295 Two days later, Brown & Williamson’s vice president and general counsel sent a copy of the clipping to his counterparts at Lorillard and Liggett as well as to the Tobacco Institute president, simply mentioning that Carlson owned Radisson.296

Manifestly aware of the cigarette manufacturers’ sensitivity to the slightest slight and constant vigilance to detect any possible threat and prepared to kowtow to avoid offending economically much more potent corporations, Radisson sought to preempt any retaliatory action by writing an abject letter of apology before the manufacturers could even plan their inevitable reprisal. On May 9, Harry Greenough, Carlson’s “top pitchman,” president of the Carlson entity in charge of Gold Bond stamps, wrote to Curtis Judge, the president of Lorillard, to fill him in on "a dumb thing that happened in our hotel division. Your clipping service will probably send you a copy of an article...which states the Radisson Hotels have initiated a policy of reserving a special space for non-smokers during their banquet and convention activities." Addressing Judge by his first name, Greenough then sought to disabuse his customer of any suspicion of betrayal by recounting that an (unidentified) convention group had moved into the Radisson in Omaha and requested that smoking be banned from their space: “Of course this was impractical, and our manager was smart enough to counter by suggesting that during their activities certain areas be reserved for smokers and an adjacent area for non-smokers. They accepted this compromise and everything went smoothly. The next thing that happened was that our manager was discussing the situation with some of his staff and one bright sole [sic] got the idea that this could be a possible ‘sell’ for the hotels and rushed off to the newspaper.” Greenough then concluded by groveling: “Our people involved have been duly reprimanded and straightened out; and, as stated, there is no such policy at the Radisson Hotels.” Five days later Greenough sent an identical account to the marketing vice president at Liggett & Myers.

Whether Greenough’s story was factually correct is as unclear as whether it succeeded in propitiating the cigarette companies, since, after all, Greenough had praised his manager, at the very least, for having accommodated a large group of customers (precisely) by reserving a special space for non-smokers during a convention and did not appear to have admonished him never to show such flexibility again. (Interestingly, two years later, in the midst of the Minnesota legislature’s deliberations on the 1975 MCIAA, an article appeared in the Washington Post, and was circulated among R. J. Reynolds executives, on antismokers’ growing success in carving out public spaces, at the very end of which the Radisson PR chief to whom Greenough had cc’d his letter to Judge was quoted as commenting on the chain’s having tried and dropped nosmoking sections in their restaurants “because the ban was impossible to enforce and because there was no way to keep smoke from drifting to nonsmoking sections”:

---

300 H. W. Greenough to Curtis H. Judge (May 9, 1973), Bates No. 680261889.
301 H. W. Greenough to Samuel White (May 14, 1973), Bates No. 680261887.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

“‘We tried it, it was a great idea, everybody loved us, but it didn’t work.’”[302]

Moreover, especially at a time when the cigarette companies were being inundated with news of metastatizing nosmoking areas on airplanes, trains, buses, and now hotels and restaurants—indeed, the day after Greenough had sent his letter to Judge, the Philadelphia Inquirer published a long article on the subject, a clipping of which was circulating at R. J. Reynolds[303]—it seems unlikely that they would have appreciated Radisson’s subtle distinction between a policy and a practice.[304]

That Greenough knew what potential harm he was warding off when he submitted his abject apology became clear the very next day when the head of the Coordinating Board of Tobacco Trade Associations informed R. J. Reynolds that his organization had recently sent an “admonition to state executives in Minnesota, Nebraska and Colorado to think twice before using Radisson Hotels which recently announced plans to set aside ‘special space for non-smokers.’”[305]

And the corrective action that the manufacturers would have set in motion was hinted at in a memo from Finch at Brown & Williamson to his general counsel Bryant instructing him to discuss the matter with Lorillard and Liggett & Myers, “pointing out what we did with Marriott.”[306] Exactly what the cigarette companies did to Marriott is not clear from the industry’s disgorged online documents, but what is known suggests at least the possibility that by April Radisson might already have been aware of what treatment the cigarette oligopoly was meting out to a hotel chain that had “crossed” it, but that, unlike Radisson, was not even its partner in hawking cigarettes.

On February 13—two months before the Radisson press release—Marriott announced that it was making one whole floor of rooms in each of three hotels in Washington, D.C. nonsmoking. As if wanting to poke the cigarette companies in the eye, The New York Times led off its article with: “Nonsmokers have a new hero today. His name is J. Willard Marriott....”[307]

---

[304] Lorillard’s general counsel forwarded Greenough’s letter to Judge to Kornegay and DeBaun Bryant without comment. Arthur Stevens to Horace Kornegay and DeBaun Bryant (May 17, 1973), Bates No. 680261888.

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

those floors—which Philip Morris preferred belittling as “isolation wards” and a “sales gimmick”\footnote{See \textit{The Stop Smoking Industry} at 7 (drafted May 10, 1973 and revised July 12, 1973), Bates No. 1005099001/8.}—huge framed signs declared that tobacco smoking was banned. What Marriott styled an “experiment” the chain’s 27 other hotels would probably hasten to adopt if it proved successful. Giving the cigarette manufacturers a vital incentive to nip this innovation in the bud was the fact that Marriott, which, according to the American Hotel and Motel Association, was “the first to offer such a haven for nonsmokers,” appeared to have “hit upon a popular idea,” which was driven by guests’ comments about smoke odors.\footnote{“Washington Hotels Offer Entire Floor to Nonsmokers Only,” \textit{NYT}, Feb. 14, 1973, Bates No. 1005073665.} The hotel’s “motive, apparently, ha[d] nothing to do with the principles of the Mormon Marriott family. Profit is the lure”—not only by increasing occupancy rates bulked up by nonsmokers who had been “gagged by the lingering tobacco smell,” but also by cutting the costs caused by frequent cleaning of smoky drapes and cigarette burn damages to carpets and furniture.\footnote{John Holusha, “New Motel Policy: No-Smoking Floors,” \textit{Evening Star} (Washington, D.C.), Feb. 13, 1973, Bates No. 1005073666.} (In retrospect, a former president of the Minnesota Restaurant Association and well-known Twin Cities restaurateur who had opposed the MCIAA because smoking was legal admitted that even in the short run the law had been for the best because it had saved him the cost of cleaning windows and wooden paneling twice a week.)\footnote{Telephone interview with Jack Kozlak, Naples, FL (Oct. 15, 2009).} The cigarette manufacturers may not yet have determined whether hotels’ profit motive or principle constituted the greater threat, but they presumably found utterly unforgiveable that former Surgeon General Steinfeld was scheduled to attend the “kickoff.”\footnote{Richard Kluger, \textit{Ashes to Ashes} 235 (1996).}

The very same day that the \textit{Times} articles appeared, John T. Landry, Philip Morris’s group vice president and director of marketing for tobacco and the company’s “resident advertising genius” (especially in relation to Marlboro),\footnote{John T. Landry to Sam Huff (Feb. 14, 1973), Bates No. 1005073666.} shot off an outraged letter to his “old friend”\footnote{John Holusha, “New Motel Policy: No-Smoking Floors,” \textit{Evening Star} (Washington, D.C.), Feb. 13, 1973, Bates No. 1005073666.} Sam Huff, a famous former professional football player who, beginning in the 1950s, had worked for Philip Morris as a salesman for Marlboro (which was heavily advertised on television... during professional football games)\textsuperscript{315} and in the meantime had become a Marriott vice president of special markets. Venting about Marriott’s “inane publicity release” concerning the nonsmoking floors, Landry complained that the hotel chain had “not only taken a cheap shot at our industry but a very uninformed one.” Not having to bother to explain to a fellow Marlboro hawker of what exactly Marriott was ignorant, he instead relied on Huff’s having “worked very closely with us for some time” and thus being “aware of the great pride we take in our products” to make him understand Landry’s “annoyance.”\textsuperscript{316} (If Landry was merely annoyed, he must have mellowed in the two years since midnight on New Year’s Day 1971 when “[h]e sat home alone by his television set, watched four of his beloved cowboys gallop off into the sunset for the last time, and wept”\textsuperscript{317} as the ban on cigarette advertising went into effect.)

What action the companies took next is unknown, but as late as June Marriott was still anathema to them, when one of its market development officials wrote to Philip Morris President George Weissman urging him to consider an expensive corporate suite in Essex Towers in Manhattan.\textsuperscript{318} Weissman’s terse reply said it all: “In view of the Marriott attitude toward smoking, your letter was obviously misdirected.”\textsuperscript{319} The next critical links in the conflict are missing, but by September Brown & Williamson noted that Marriott had reported the termination of its “no smoking” accommodations because ‘there just wasn’t anybody asking for’ those restricted rooms.”\textsuperscript{320} That lack of demand prompted the abandonment of the initiative seems implausible—after all, in November, the Tobacco Institute noted that whereas “Marriott gave up, apparently the Quality Inn chain is expanding its no-smoking quarters.”\textsuperscript{321} Rather, the real reason, as the Chicago Tribune somewhat opaquely revealed in a review of the growing number of places where smoking had been restricted or banned, had not been difficult to imagine: “Marriott Hotels, gungho for smoking and nonsmoking areas, ushered in the latest no-smoking trend with relish. Since that initial fanfare...the Marriott program has been dropped, apparently because the corporation-to-corporation lobby was as strong as its Springfield [Illinois] contingent,” which “strong tobacco lobby” had

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item[\textsuperscript{315}] Ray Jones, To Our Friends in the Tobacco Industry (Oct. 25, 1960), Bates No. 2012511756.
\item[\textsuperscript{316}] John T. Landry to Sam Huff (Feb. 14, 1973), Bates No. 1005073633.
\item[\textsuperscript{317}] Richard Kluger, \textit{Ashes to Ashes} 335 (1996).
\item[\textsuperscript{318}] Peter Duncan to George Weissman (June 5, 1973), Bates No. 2025015072.
\item[\textsuperscript{319}] George Weissman to Peter Duncan (June 8, 1973), Bates No. 2025015071.
\item[\textsuperscript{321}] TIN, No. 86, Nov. 12, 1973, at 6, Bates No. 950307081.
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
defeated a bill in the state legislature that session that was more inclusive than the Arizona law.\textsuperscript{322}

The burden of this account of the aforementioned convoluted series of events is to raise the possibility that Carlson’s/Radisson’s direct and open opposition to H.F. 79 may have represented a quid pro quo that they were impelled to perform in order to dispel any lingering suspicion by the cigarette oligopolists that Carlson was biting the hand that fed him and to retain Liggett & Myers and Lorillard’s trading stamp business.

\textit{The House Health and Welfare Committee Recommends Passage of a Diluted H.F. 79}

When the full House Health and Welfare Committee considered H.F. 79 on February 25, only Kahn spoke in support of it, emphasizing that the bill permitted bar and restaurant owners to designate their entire space as smoking areas if they conspicuously posted signs to that effect at all entrances normally used by the public.\textsuperscript{323} The bill’s only opponents were once again Radisson and MACI, which pursued the same tacks as before the subcommittee. Kuduk “argued unsuccessfully that ‘places of work’ should be excluded from the bill,” whereas Perry contended that inside work environments were more properly under the Occupational Safety and Health Administration’s jurisdiction.\textsuperscript{324} The committee then proceeded to accept the subcommittee’s report with its sole amendment of adding “existing” (to qualify “physical barriers and ventilation systems”) as well as two of the author’s (i.e., Kahn’s) further weakening amendments. First, the exclusion of “private, enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers” was expanded to apply “even though such offices may be visited by nonsmokers.” And second (despite the press’s aforementioned judgment that the committee had rejected Radisson’s and MACI’s objections), the general prohibition on smoking in public places was relaxed by excluding from its application “factories, warehouses and similar places of work with a ceiling of more than fifteen feet and not usually frequented by the general public, unless the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation creates a problem of smoke pollution.” Kahn made this turn of events possible by executing yet another about-face, this time acknowledging that a “legitimate problem” had been raised in subcommittee in that the general public did not generally frequent workplaces like factories, “where it would be very difficult to rearrange workers to deal with smokers and non smokers [sic], such as [on] an assembly line.... It was also a legitimate point that these places are usually large buildings and...generally workers are not that close together....” (Asked later whether she had offered the latter amendment because it was clear that she would be unable to get the bill out of committee without it, Kahn replied: “I believe so. Or it may have been just to get one group of opponents out of the way for the whole process of the bill.”) Heinitz, who 326Patsy Randell to W. C. Viitala, Subject: Clean Indoor Air Act Rules and Regulations at 3-4 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112H.18.3(B). At the Health Department’s public hearing on MCIAA’s implementing rules, Kahn, while conceding that her remarks “would not have the implications of formal legislative intent,” repeated and expanded on her committee statement by noting that “the thought that went into that separate kind of regulation...was the fact that those places, one, often have quite high ceilings, besides the fact that they are not open to the general public. They also, often because of the kind of materials that are used, have certain regulations dealing with smoking, usually the prohibition of smoking in such places. It was also put in as a constraint because of the thought of problems with assembly lines and the fact that people’s jobs in dealing with machinery that was set on the floor would not allow the ability of moving around as, say, a secretarial pool could. ... And I think the distinction...was probably because there was no legal terminology that anyone could think of. I think the white collar-blue collar distinction that has come forth is probably as good a practical one as has appeared.” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, [Transcript of Public Hearing] at 164-65 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\textsuperscript{322}Pat Colander, “If Smoke Gets in Your Eyes,” \textit{CT}, Nov. 1, 1973 (B1, at B3).

\textsuperscript{323}Minnesota House of Representatives, \textit{Weekly News Wrap-Up} (n.p.) (Feb. 27, 1975).

\textsuperscript{324}Bob Goligoski, “House Panel Approves Bill Regulating Smoking,” \textit{SPPP}, Feb. 26, 1975 (15:1-3). Kahn objected to Kuduk’s proposal because it would “deprive some people of their livelihood or the type of job they want...it is a conflict but we’ve attempted to resolve it in a moderate way.” Patsy Randell to W. C. Viitala, Subject: Clean Indoor Air Act Rules and Regulations at 4 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112H.18.3(B).

327Email from Phyllis Kahn to Marc Linder (Mar. 21, 2009). Many years later Brandt expressed the opinion that: “Regardless of whether or not this [amendment discriminating against nonsmoking blue-collar workers] was essential to passage of the bill in the House, I am convinced that it was necessary for passage in the Senate. There was a higher percentage of Republicans in the Senate than in the House. How many would have catered to MACI at that time is unclear, but very likely a majority of Republicans would have. If three more Senators would have voted no or abstained instead of voting in favor of the MCIAA, it would not have become law.” Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 21, had almost succeeded in excluding work places altogether in subcommittee, was now able to water down this new provision by securing the committee’s agreement to striking the 15-foot ceiling. In the wake of these dilutions, the committee recommended that the bill pass.\textsuperscript{328}
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Beverly Schwartz, the director of ANSR (which by now had 5,000 members and chapters in Duluth and Rochester in addition to the Twin Cities),\textsuperscript{329} had expected neither the “overwhelming” voice vote nor the ease with which the “controversial bill” had been approved, but now expected that the Senate would pass it as well.\textsuperscript{330}

\textbf{The Full House Passes a Weakened H.F. 79 by a Solid Majority}

On February 28, a week before the full House took up H.F. 79, the Minneapolis City Council intensified the momentum for anti-smoking action by unanimously (12-0) passing an ordinance banning smoking at public meetings of governmental bodies covered by the state open-meeting law. Backed by a $100 fine, the ordinance required those conducting meetings to inform those in attendance of the ban.\textsuperscript{331} (At the end of 1974 Duluth had passed an even broader \textsuperscript{328}State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Committee on Health and Welfare, [Minutes] at 9-10 (Feb. 25, 1975), in Legislature, House Committee Minutes—Health & Welfare, MSA, MHS, 129.A.12.5(B); \textit{Journal of the House of Representatives, Sixty-Ninth Session of the Legislature, State of Minnesota: 1975}, at 354-55 (Feb. 27); H.F. No. 79, First Engrossment (Feb. 27, 1975). It is unclear how the statute could have been interpreted in this sense, but Kahn supposedly “said if the work space is small enough so as to make it uncomfortable for the nonsmoker, the rights of the nonsmoker should be recognized.” “Non-Smokers Rights,” \textit{Thief River Falls Times}, Apr. 16, 1975 (copy of clipping furnished by ANSR).

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

anti-public smoking ordinance, which, however, the Lung Association of Northeast Minnesota did not regard as “‘the most effective,’” but merely “a step in the right direction.”)

Before the House gave preliminary approval to H.F. 79 on March 6, Kahn, definitively abandoning the logic of the scientist she had been and adopting the politician’s meaningless hyperbole, called the bill “the ‘most moderate bill that will ever appear before this body....’” By the huge majority of 103 to 19, the House, sitting as the Committee of the Whole, struck the provision that made guilty of a misdemeanor any proprietor or person in charge of a covered public place who wilfully failed to enforce the act. (While admitting that this amendment weakened the bill, Brandt noted that through the “cumbersome procedure” of a court injunction the bill still made it possible to require owners to protect nonsmokers’ rights.) The objection to “forcing private citizens to enforce the measure” was driven by the scenario that several legislators had depicted of high school principals’ being charged for having failed to stop students from smoking. Kahn voted against the amendment, but was joined by only a few stalwarts, who did not even include two of the bill’s cosponsors. The Committee of the Whole then recommended passage of the amended bill to the House by a vote of 88 to 38. With the DFL controlling the House by the almost equally huge majority of 104 to 30, alone the 71 DFL caucus members who voted Yea would have sufficed for the motion to prevail. Their 72 percent Yea-vote (71-27) surpassed the 61 percent among Republicans (17-11). When the bill came up for final passage four days later, Kahn stressed that it did “not prohibit smoking,” but was “just a separation of smokers and nonsmokers to protect the health of everyone alike.” The House passed the bill by a vote of 78 to 54 with 64 percent (65 of 102) of the DFL caucus but only 43 percent (13 of 30) of the Republicans voting Yea. Republicans, who made up 22 percent of the House membership, accounted for 31 percent of the Nays compared to only 19 percent of the Nays cast against the ban on smoking in the House chamber on January 20. The Republicans’ 17-13 split against the bill revealed, in Brandt’s view, “very weak caucus pressure at most,” thus confirming Savelkoul’s aforementioned account. Objections, according to one press account, came from “smokers on the floor of the House claim[ing] that the proposed legislation was an infringement on some sort of inalienable right” and other opponents who insisted that H.F. 79 “was impractical and lent itself to possible harassment of smokers.”

---

340 Ed Brandt tallied the party vote on an untitled and undated sheet that was included in copies of his papers that ANSR made available.

342 Journal of the House of Representatives, Sixty-Ninth Session of the Legislature, State of Minnesota: 1975, at 512-13, 105 (Mar. 10); Brandt’s tally of party votes. Brandt characterized the fact that 20 representatives had switched their votes (“fluidity of legislative sentiment”) as demonstrating why it was critical for voters to contact their legislators. Ed Brandt, “H.F. 79 Passes Houses,” ANSR 3(1):2 (Apr. 1975). For the bill text as the House passed it, see H.F. 79 (second engrossment) (copy furnished by MHS). Of the 54 House members who voted against H.F. 79 26 had also voted against Kahn’s motion to ban smoking in the House chamber.

343 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Oct. 26, 2009).

344 “Tokin’ Bill,” St. Cloud Times, Mar. 18, 1975 (copy of clipping provided by ANSR). Press coverage of the floor debate was very skimpy. E.g., Steven Dornfeld, “At the Capitol,” MT, Mar. 11, 1975 (2B:1). The wholly inadequate press reporting on all the floor debates together with the aforementioned destruction of the audio tapes of all floor debates (and committee meetings) from their inception in 1973 through the 1980s makes robust legislative history for this period impossible. Even when news reporting on (unrelated) floor debates was less unsatisfactory, one former House member vividly recalled thinking when reading accounts of debates in which he had participated: “I must have been in the Wisconsin legislature.” Telephone interview with Bud Philbrook, St. Paul (Mar. 1, 2009).
The Tobacco Institute Propaganda Tour Comes to the Twin Cities

In April, as the focus of legislative action shifted to the Senate, the Minneapolis Tribune, without explaining the context or newsworthiness of devoting 10 column inches to an interview with an assistant to the president of the Tobacco Institute visiting Minneapolis (for no identified purpose), permitted Constance (Connie) Drath to regurgitate the cigarette oligopoly’s cliché that “laws restricting smoking in public places are ‘unnecessary’” because most smokers were courteous, denounce the “‘segregation’” of “forc[ing] smokers to sit in the rear of airliners,” and insist that smokers’ “‘civil rights’ should be respected.” In fact, the Tribune failed to inform its readers that it was allowing itself to be used as a small component of a large-scale propaganda campaign in which the cigarette manufacturers were engaged. Drath, whom the press dubbed the industry’s “‘Smokes Person,’” had been newly added to the “public relations staff” of the Tobacco Institute (as if the TI were anything but one gigantic PR operation) to travel around the United States to speak to live and broadcast audiences. Drath’s special mission coincided with state legislative sessions: she was, for example, in Texas, as the Dallas Morning News was at least open enough to admit in interviewing her, “crusading” against the public smoking bill then pending in the legislature. Just a few days before the Iowa Senate Human Resources Committee took up S.F. 106, Drath flew into Des Moines for a 15-minute appearance on television, a possible newspaper interview, and as a guest for an entire hour of call-ins on a radio show on the state’s most important 345 Lewis Cope, “Tobacco Industry Calls Most Smokers Courteous, Says They Also Have Rights,” MT, Apr. 9, 1975 (B4:2-5).

346 Decades later the reporter, who had covered medicine and science, vaguely recalled the interview and criticized himself for having failed to explain why the interviewee had been in Minnesota (he strongly surmised that she had had other interviews scheduled as well). He observed that in the context of the tobacco industry’s constantly urging him (and other reporters) to present its side of the story, he viewed this particular interview as “being easy enough.” Telephone interview with Lewis Cope, Minneapolis (Mar. 12, 2009).

347 “Call Her ‘Smokes Person.?‘” St. Antonio Light, Mar. 15, 1975, Bates No. TITX0032095.

350 See below ch. 25.
radio station. With H.F. 79 having passed the House and now in the Senate, it was Minnesota’s turn. (Stanton Glantz and colleagues incorrectly asserted that: “It was not until 1976, after the Act [MCIAA] was being implemented, that the Tobacco Institute began to respond. In response to the American Lung Association’s support and promotion of nonsmokers’ rights, the Tobacco Institute sent out Public Relations representatives across the country, spreading the message that the nonsmokers’ rights were ‘an infringement on smokers’ rights.’” This error is closely linked to their other mistaken claim that MCIAA’s “evolution and ultimate passage...occurred without interference from the tobacco industry” and that “the first indication of the tobacco industry’s involvement came in 1976....”) The TI and its bosses were immensely self-congratulatory about the impact of Drath’s “standard speech,” which she delivered to the likes of the Lions Club and which, 11 years after the surgeon general’s initial report, repeated the manufacturers’ mendacious allegation that “controversy” still surrounded smoking’s health impacts in addition to blasting government attempts to “regulate social conduct” and to “subject the tobacco consumer to a lifelong criminal record” for smoking in an “unthinking moment” in a prohibited place. Such drivel prompted Arthur Stevens, Lorillard’s otherwise dour general counsel and the chairman of the industry’s mighty Committee of Counsel, in May to praise the results Drath had already achieved as “totally unreal. We could not have ever hoped to have attracted such highly qualified spokespersons.” Stevens was referring to TI’s board of trustees meeting two days earlier at the posh Greenbrier in White Sulphur Springs, the minutes of which recorded: “The 351Connie Drath to Kloepfer and Ehringhaus (Feb. 28, 1975), Bates No. TIMN0261698 (memorandum laying out her schedule for “[m]y debut” for the TI in the Midwest).

352For a map of her appearances, see William Kloepfer at 44 (Sept. 24, 1975) (untitled), Bates No. TIMN0075481/7.
354William Kloepfer to Ave et al. (Mar. 14, 1975), Bates No. ZN22935.
355Text of Remarks by Connie Drath Assistant to the President of the Tobacco Institute Inc. Before the Lions Club of Tyler, Texas Monday, Mar 10, 1975, at 5-7, Bates No. ZN22936/40-42.
356Arthur Stevens to William Kloepfer (May 23, 1975), Bates No. 03766622 (referring also to another PR person).

2326
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

meeting was then shown film clips and heard tapes of various presentations by Ms. Drath and Mr. Dwyer. This was followed by short talks by the two spokespersons. The presentations were received with a spontaneous and prolonged round of applause.357 This vision of the masters of the cigarette killing machine wildly cheering what they knew to be nothing but their own elaborately scripted obfuscation designed to “get across the idea still that there is a—a—a cigarette controversy”358 and delivered by someone hired without scientific knowledge of tobacco or health matters who then “received a two-week orientation course” consisting of lectures by TI executives and a field trip to a cigarette factory359 and whose shtick was that she purported to be a nonsmoker who “likes the smell of cigarettes”360 demonstrated how desperate and clueless they were in the face of an anti-secondhand smoke movement that was proving to be their commodity’s undoing.361

The Restoration of Restaurant Coverage at the Senate Health, Welfare, and Corrections Committee Meeting on April 29: Double-Cross or Lobbyists’ Comedy of Errors?

The crucial step in Senate consideration of H.F. 79 took place on April 29 (an event overshadowed by the world-historical surrender of the South Vietnamese government and evacuation of the remaining U.S. presence) at the Health,
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Welfare, and Corrections Committee meeting, of which, unfortunately, press coverage ranged from nonexistent to extremely meager and the minutes have not been preserved. The notable amendments that the committee adopted included: (1) striking from the exclusion of factories and warehouses not usually frequented by the general public the provision “unless the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution,” thus making the exclusion absolute; (2) striking restaurants from the provision excepting only restaurants and bars from the ban on declaring a covered public place as a smoking area in its entirety; (3) re-establishing the responsibilities of proprietors or other persons in charge of public places by requiring them to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place by (a) posting appropriate signs; (b) arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area; (c) asking smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke; or (d) any other means which may be appropriate”; and (4) conferring discretion on the state board of health, “upon request, [to] waive the provisions of this act if it determines there are compelling reasons to do so and a waiver will not significantly affect the health and comfort of nonsmokers.”

362“Legislative Update,” Minneapolis Star, Apr. 29, 1975 (7C:1), stated merely that the committee had amended the bill to “prevent owners of restaurants from designating their entire establishments as smoking areas” and to “spell out a proprietor’s obligations to enforce the law” without shedding any light on positions taken or participation by lobbyists. The Minneapolis Tribune merely stated that the committee had approved the bill without mentioning any amendments. Jack Coffman, “Party-Designation Requirement Included in House Primary Bill,” MT, Apr. 30, 1975 (2B:1). The St. Paul Pioneer Press failed to allude to the bill at all. Of the extremely scanty coverage of the hearing Brandt archly observed: “[I]f [lobbyist] Chum Bohr slept on his job, could you really have expected more from our newspapers?” Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 2, 2009).

363The minutes were lacking at the only two institutions at which committee minutes are archived—the Minnesota Legislative Reference Library and the Minnesota Historical Society/State Archives. Email from Robbie LaFleur, director, Minnesota Legislative Reference Library, to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2009); telephone interview with former state Representative Steve Trimble, St. Paul (Apr. 18, 2009) (Trimble searched the box with the committee’s papers for 1975). Honeywell’s lobbyist, as noted above, reviewed the tapes of the Senate committee meeting (which the Minnesota Historical Society later destroyed), but took no notes because “[t]here was little discussion....” Patsy Randell to W. C. Viitala, Subject: Clean Indoor Air Act Rules and Regulations at 1 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112H.18.3(B).

364Journal of the Senate, State of Minnesota, Sixty-Ninth Legislature: 1975, at 1502-1503 (May 1). As odd as it seems, the use of “or” (between (3)(c) and (d)), which remained in the final enactment (§ 6), presumably signaled the legislature’s intent to limit
The committee meeting was remarkable both for what happened and did not happen. As noted earlier, in order to eliminate the opposition of restaurants and to improve the bill’s prospects of passage, Brandt, on behalf of ANSR, had agreed with Wencel (Chum) Bohr, the lobbyist for the Minnesota Restaurant Association, Minnesota Hotel and Motor Hotel Association, and Minnesota Resort Association (combined under the umbrella organization, Minnesota Hospitality Group, of which he was the chief staff executive from 1968 to 1978, when he stopped lobbying), that ANSR would remove coverage of restaurants from the 1975 version of the anti-smoking bill. Bohr later charged that ANSR had agreed to insure that the bill would not be amended to reestablish such coverage. These charges were presumably designed to explain why Bohr had made the fatal lobbying error of failing to appear at the Senate committee hearing on April 29, at which the Episcopal minister Robert North (DFL), not seeing any reason why restaurants should be excluded, moved to amend the bill to cover them. Some time earlier the committee had informally discussed the bill, the Health Department’s implementing rules to the imposition on owners of only one of the four specified means of making reasonable efforts to preventing smoking—despite the fact that the title of the section used the plural, “Responsibilities of Proprietors.” Asked whether he had interpreted the use of “or” that way and, further, whether in the absence of any seating an owner had no duty to provide a “smoke-free area,” the chief drafter of the implementing regulations, Kent Peterson replied: “I do not recall any discussion of narrow interpretation of those provisions. Considering your appropriate reading of those provisions and existence of controversy, I have no explanation of your questions. However, the law and rules had to be read together for enforcement and perhaps that’s why there needed to be amendments to the law before substantial enforcement could occur.”

365 State of Minnesota, State Ethics Commission, Registered Lobbyists 8 (Feb. 11, 1975). Bohr’s lobbyist registration cards stated that the issues on which he would be lobbying were taxes, signs, labor, and insurance, but did not mention smoking in public places as did some other lobbyists.

366 Statement of Chum Bohr (Sept. 15, 1978), Bates No. 500024298; telephone interview with Chum Bohr, St. Paul (Mar. 4, 2009); http://www.hospitalitymn.com/index.php?page=40 (the associations did not merge but formed a management company (Upper Midwest Hospitality)).

367 Telephone interview with Ed Brandt, St. Paul (Apr. 26, 2007); email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 4, 2009). According to Brandt, who attended the meeting, North said something to the effect that he could see why bars were exempt, but why restaurants? Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 17, 2009). More than three decades later North had absolutely no recollection of his role at the hearing, though he did not deny that he had done what Brandt remembered. Telephone interview with Robert because it regarded smoking as a big issue like abortion or the death penalty. Committee chair George Conzemius—a nonsmoker who had himself drafted an anti-smoking bill, but dropped it when Schaaf introduced S.F. 602—recalled (more than three decades later) that the committee, many of whose members were “idealists,” overwhelmingly supported North’s amendment and the bill, which he, nevertheless, did not think would pass the legislature.\textsuperscript{368} Schaaf, who agreed that the committee was “very liberal,” while also distinctly recalling North’s intervention, nevertheless offered a very different account, according to which North, rather than moving to amend, spontaneously questioned Schaaf as to why his bill did not cover restaurants and asked why the committee would not pass a “clean” bill. Schaaf, for his part, agreed that the bill was not perfect, but called it a tremendous first step. In his recollection, he offered author’s amendments that (must have) included restaurant coverage, though he admitted that if he had brought such amendments to the committee, North would have had no reason to raise the issue of restaurant coverage.\textsuperscript{369}

\textsuperscript{368}Telephone interview with George Conzemius, Cannon Falls, MN (Mar 1, 2009). Conzemius opined that no one took Kahn, who “comes up with some really flaky and weird stuff,” seriously either back then or in 2009 in her 37th year in the House. In contrast, anti-anti-smoking lobbyist Chum Bohr sought to explain the success of Kahn’s bill on the grounds that in the House she “could get away with murder.” Telephone interview with Wencel (Chum) Bohr, St. Paul (Mar. 4, 2009).

\textsuperscript{369}Telephone interview with David Schaaf, Roseville, MN (Mar. 8, 2009). Given the disappearance of the committee minutes, the destruction of the audio tapes, and the lack of any detailed press coverage, reconstruction of what happened at the hearing based on
The convoluted and internally inconsistent story that Bohr told to excuse his absence at the Senate committee hearing began in the summer between the 1974 and 1975 sessions, when he was invited to a meeting at which “they” (ANSR) were going to “go after smoking” to the extent that they had drafted 150 bills from which they would “take from the middle of the pile” one and introduce it and if it failed, keep introducing weaker and weaker ones until it passed.370 As implausible, bizarre, and directly contradicted by ANSR as this assertion may be, 371 Bohr insisted that “they” told him to “get behind the bill,” but he responded that he was unable to do so both because decisions about smoking in restaurants were driven by the market and because owners were in no position to act as policemen since they already had their hands full under the dram shop law.372 Although Bohr failed to explain why ANSR deleted restaurant coverage, the fact, as already noted, is that ANSR did. Perhaps his knowledge that H.F 79 as introduced on January 20, 1975, permitted restaurant owners to permit smoking everywhere was responsible for his having failed to state the very next day on his lobbyist registration cards that he would be lobbying on the issue of “smoking in public places,” as the two Radisson Hotel lobbyists stated when they registered on January 23.373

When asked many years later why he had failed to lobby against restaurant coverage in the Senate, Bohr replied that “we didn’t get much of a chance” because he had asked for, but did not get notice of, the Senate (Health and Welfare) Committee hearing on the bill. As to why the committee had not given him notice, he simply said: “I was declared the enemy.” Instead of trying to explain on what basis a committee chair owed a lobbyist a duty to inform him individually and personally of a committee meeting date when such information was publicly posted in the legislature and available to all and especially to the 34-year-old memories of Brandt, Conzemius, and Schaf (who was “almost positive” that he had submitted author’s amendments) is the unsatisfactory alternative.

370 Telephone interview with Wencel (Chum) Bohr, St. Paul (Mar. 4, 2009).
371 Edward Brandt, while agreeing that Bohr had attended one ANSR meeting, stated that at most ANSR had drafted a total of two bills. Telephone interview with Edward Brandt, St. Paul (Mar. 4, 2009).
372 Telephone interview with Wencel (Chum) Bohr, St. Paul (Mar. 4, 2009).
373 State of Minnesota, State Ethics Commission, Registered Lobbyists 11, 91 (Feb. 11, 1975) (William Fern Brooks, Jr. and John Michael Tancabel). David Kuduk, who actually did lobby for Radisson on this issue before the House Health and Welfare Committee, was a registered lobbyist, but not for Radisson (though he was registered for Carlson’s Gold Bond Stamps) or on this issue. Id. at 47-48. Kuduk worked at the law firm of Chestnut & Brooks.
Bohr circuitously responded with a very long and incoherent story about a free medical study in which he had participated during the Nixon administration, the chief point of which appeared to be the advice not to smoke. (Bohr, who had smoked in the 1970s, remained as late as 2009 in a state of denial about smoking’s adverse health impacts.) In other words, the “enemy” was tobacco, with which the committee associated him. If the committee associated Bohr with the tobacco industry, it was not alone: at the time many in the anti-smoking movement perceived him as a “puppet” lobbying for it and tobacco lobbyists as very clearly working and speaking through him and the restaurant and hospitality industry in general. Ignorant of the fact that H.F. 79 would be discussed on April 29, Bohr instead attended a hearing on unemployment insurance elsewhere in the capitol; as he left that hearing, someone asked him why he had not attended the other committee hearing, thus giving him a first inkling that H.F. 79 had been discussed.

This much of reality may have been reflected in Bohr’s account: that the committee chairman, George Conzemius, himself had not known that H.F. 79 would be on the committee’s agenda on April 29 because its chief sponsor, Senator David Schaaf, had failed to bring H.F. 79, which had passed the House more than seven weeks earlier, to the committee. Indeed, Conzemius had advised Schaaf that the legislature would soon adjourn and that if he failed to present the bill to the committee by April 29, he would have to wait until the 1976 session for action on it. In the event, five minutes before the meeting was to end, Schaaf appeared and the meeting ran 10 to 15 minutes late in order to deal with the

374 Telephone interview with George Conzemius, Cannon Falls, MN (Mar. 4, 2009).
375 For example, a week after the Board of Health hearing on MCIAA rules an ANSR activist who had spoken at the hearing wrote a lengthy follow-up letter to the hearing officer stating that: “I hope the panel will recognize that our opposition came from people who were paid lobbyists. No doubt with connections to the mighty, devious Tobacco Inst, ever present, not always visible.” Faye Mowers Topliff to Kent [Peterson] (Dec. 9, 1975), Health Dept., MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Decades later Topliff and another former ANSR activist from Duluth independently offered this perspective. Telephone interview with Faye Topliff, Duluth (May 9, 2009) (quote); telephone interview with Betty Christensen, Duluth (May 11, 2009).
376 Telephone interview with George Conzemius, Cannon Falls, MN (Mar. 4, 2009). Both Brandt and Schaaf opined that the unemployment hearing would have been more important for Bohr’s client, Brandt going to the extent of claiming that even if Bohr had known about the scheduling conflict between both hearings, he would still not have attended the MCIAA hearing. Telephone interview with Ed Brandt, St. Paul (Mar. 2009); telephone interview with David Schaaf, Roseville, MN (Mar. 8, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

To be sure, the accuracy of Conzemius’s memory (not to mention Bohr’s probity) is strongly called into question by the fact that the daily column in the St. Paul Pioneer Press publishing the agendas of that day’s legislative committee meetings stated that “smoking in public places” was one of seven bills with which the Senate Health, Welfare and Corrections Committee was scheduled to deal at 8 a.m. Conzemius was not certain as to why Schaaf had not presented the bill earlier, but Schaaf had told him that he had been trying to mobilize support for it among his colleagues. Alternatively, committee member Robert North later noted that Schaaf had not enjoyed a reputation for being the chamber’s “hardest working member.” Schaaf himself, while unable to offer a reason for the lateness, did note that MCIAA had not been “at the top of my agenda”; on the contrary, it was about his sixteenth priority among 17 bills. For this very reason, perhaps, during April Kahn had been suggesting to Minnesotans who had written to her in support of her bill that they urge Schaaf and Conzemius finally to schedule a hearing on S. F. 602.

The day after the hearing Brandt “got a call from Chum Bohr...asking what I had done to him, to which I honestly replied, ‘Nothing.’” North acted on his own. There was no testimony before the committee and no one approached him, or any other committee member, in any way whatsoever.” Bohr nevertheless remained “bitter about the way the measure was enacted. ‘At first we were told 377 Telephone interview with George Conzemius, Cannon Falls, MN (Mar. 1 and 4, 2009).

---

378 “Legislature Today,” SPPP, Apr. 29, 1975 (14:3). Possibly this agenda did not become known until relatively late since the previous day’s corresponding column in the Minneapolis Tribune stated that the committee’s agenda was not available. “At the Capitol,” MT, Apr. 28, 1975 (2B:1).
379 Telephone interview with George Conzemius, Cannon Falls, MN (Mar. 1, 2009); telephone interview with Robert North, Galena, IL (Mar. 2, 2009). Brandt also observed that Schaaf was not as effective a legislator as Kahn. Telephone interview with Edward Brandt, St. Paul (Apr. 26, 2007).
380 Telephone interview with David Schaaf, Roseville, MN (Mar. 8, 2009).
381 Phyllis Kahn to Louise Udden (Apr. 3, 1975), and Phyllis Kahn to David Carr (Apr. 16, 1975), in Legislation, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B).
382 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 5, 2009). According to Kahn, the (unnamed) restaurant lobbyist also went back to her and “complained, ‘You promised me you weren’t going to have restaurants in there.... You have to go to the conference committee and take them out.’” Phyllis explained that she had removed restaurants from the House version of the bill but she had not said anything about the Senate version. It was the lobbyist’s job, not hers, to lobby the Senate.” Billie Young and Nancy Ankeny, Minnesota Women in Politics: Stories of the Journey 49 (2000).
that restrictions on smoking would not apply to restaurants.... But at the last minute they slipped restaurants in. This caught us unawares.” However, Kahn “denied there was any trickery involved. ‘The restaurant people are just trying to cover up their own sloppy lobbying.... The House did vote to exempt restaurants, but the Senate put restaurants back in. The restaurant people should have been watching the bill all the way; they didn’t follow through.’” And an unusually thorough piece in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch agreed that the 800-member Minnesota Restaurant Association was simply “not effective in lobbying against” the MCIAA.383 For his part, Bohr, instead of fessing up to his incompetence, sought self-exculpation in the story, published in the Tobacco Institute’s own house organ, that ANSR was “a one-issue lobby ‘which tied itself to motherhood and apple pie’ in an election year when the legislature was especially sensitive.”384

In seeking to draw lessons from the course of ANSR’s efforts to secure MCIAA’s passage, Brandt later classified this incorporation of restaurant coverage as a result of a lobbyist’s absence as an example of the “influence of accidental factors.”385 But even Brandt was unaware of the fact that Bohr’s 383 Harry Wilensky, “Effort to Ban Smoking Results in Murky Law,” St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Nov. 16, 1975 (cont. at 20A), Bates No. TIMN0240663/4. The restaurant lobby, as a nearly contemporaneous University of Minnesota graduate school paper put it, “was so confident of their success that they left their lobbying posts.” Susan Goodwin Gerberich, “Prevention Through Legislation: University of Minnesota-ANSR Project” at 5 (PH-5-502, Spring 1976) (copy furnished by ANSR).

384 “Stringent No-Smoking Law Failing,” TO 1(2):1, 9 (Nov. 1976), Bates No. 01418984/92. In a statement that he filed (but did not deliver orally) during the Health Department’s public hearing on its proposed regulations in 1975, Bohr, in an incompetent attempt to prove that “the circumstances of how the bill became law only assumes [sic] legislative intent based on one sided testimony,” asserted that, because restaurants (and other businesses) had been exempted from H.F. 79 as introduced, “our industry and many other industries informed the author in the House that we wouldn’t oppose the bill in testimony. When the bill passed the House and went to the Senate, assuming the bill would stand as is, we put our efforts to other bills of importance to our industry. Then lo and behold, we learned the exemptions were pulled. Unfortunately, it was too late to get a hearing. The bill passed the Senate and passed the House without a conference committee discussion during the last hectic day of the legislative session thus preventing intelligent discussion that could have resulted in a law we could live with to better serve all of our customers.” [Chum Bohr, untitled], Exhibit 23 [Public Hearing Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975 (Dec. 2, 1975)], in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

385 [Ed Brandt], “Highlights of the Early Years: ANSR, 1973-76” at 2 (Nov. 6, 1993)
accidental absence was inextricably linked to the accidental silence of another anti-MCIAA lobbyist who was in fact present.

The mystery of the failure of any anti-smoking-regulation lobbyist to speak up at the April 29 meeting is deepened by the fact that the prominent lobbyist who was present had stated on his lobbyist registration card that he would be lobbying on the issue of smoking in public places on behalf of the Radisson Hotel Corp. Associated for years with the DFL power structure, William Brooks, Jr., of the law firm Chestnut, Brooks, & Burkhard, prominent and high-powered lobbyists, represented many other large corporate entities and business associations, including Carlson’s Gold Bond Stamp Co. Brooks appeared at the April 29 hearing pursuant to instructions from Curt Carlson, who, however, had also directed him not to speak unless and until a representative of the hospitality industry also showed up and spoke. (Brooks’s presence at the hearing may have been fortuitous in the sense that he was there to oppose another Schaaf-sponsored bill banning public pay toilets.) Carlson arranged for such a person to appear, but Bohr did not show up, thus leaving Brooks mute. Brooks never found out why Bohr had not shown up, but suspected that his absence was intentional and a result of some “deal” that Brooks was never able to unravel. Brooks also claimed that he had spoken privately to committee members, counted votes, and had therefore known that if Bohr (and Brooks) had spoken up, the committee would have killed the bill. This last claim flatly contradicts

(Notes that Brandt made for a talk he gave) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt).

390Telephone interview with William Brooks, Jr., Minneapolis (May 12, 2007).
391Telephone interview with David Schaaf, Roseville, MN (Mar. 8, 2009).
392Telephone interview with William Brooks, Jr., Minneapolis (May 12, 2007). To be sure, Brooks’s judgment and/or memory was called into question by his claim that no lobbying had taken place in the House because Kahn had that chamber under control, whereas in fact Brooks’s own associate, the aforementioned David Kuduk, testified twice before House committees. Confronted later with the information about Kuduk’s House testimony, Brooks merely observed that his instruction had pertained only to the Senate.

2335
chairman Conzemius’s characterization of the committee and its vote as well as the statement by Brandt, an eyewitness, that the vote was overwhelmingly or unanimously in favor of H.F. 79,393 although Schaaf, who had not been a committee member, later commented that Brooks’s claim about the head count might have been accurate.394 The fact, however, that four of the committee’s 16 members then voted against the bill (while one did not vote) on the Senate floor two weeks later395 suggests the possibility that Bohr or someone else had lobbied them in the interim.

Carlson never explained to Brooks why he did not want Radisson to go out on a limb in testifying before the Senate committee, though Brooks observed that without any doubt hotels had been opposed to the bill. He also purported not to know whether tobacco companies had ever approached Carlson about opposing the bill, but he also volunteered the opinion that if they had, Carlson would have told them to go “jump in the lake.”396 In light of the aforementioned documents...

393Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 5, 2009). Brandt also speculated that it was not clear that Bohr would have been able to thwart adoption of the amendment had he been there. On the other hand, he also opined that if MCIAA had been enacted without restaurant coverage: “In view of the fact that I was in Harrisburg from mid-1976 to mid-1978, it is unlikely that we could have passed a bill including restaurants within a few years. At the minimum, it would have taken until Jeanne Weigum had several years as executive director [of ANSR] behind her before this would have had a reasonable chance of happening. By that time, partisanship had increased greatly, which certainly would have complicated things.” Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 16, 2009).

394Telephone interview with David Schaaf, McGregor, MN (May 12, 2007).

395Journal of the Senate, State of Minnesota, Sixty-Ninth Legislature: 1975, at 2281 (May 14). The four Nays were cast by Robert Lewis (DFL), George Perpich (DFL), Earl Renneke (R), and Sam Solon (DFL). Committee membership was taken from http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/committeeresults.asp#search. Perpich, a smoking dentist, conjectured many years later that he must have voted against the bill as a favor to (nonsmoking) Solon, whose restaurant-owning constituents must have been bugging him. Telephone interview with George Perpich, St. Paul (Mar. 7, 2009). Lewis, the Senate’s first black member, smoked and died of a heart attack at 47. http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?ID=10374; email from John Milton to Marc Linder (Mar. 6, 2009). Renneke, according to Perpich, did not smoke.

396Telephone interviews with William Brooks, Jr., Minneapolis (May 14 and 25, revealing Radisson’s supine attitude toward cigarette manufacturers, Brooks’s view of his customer’s independence should be judged skeptically.

The factually false contention that restaurant coverage had been “tacked on to the bill at what one official of the Minnesota Restaurant Association called ‘the twelfth hour’” notwithstanding—more than two weeks remained before the full Senate voted on the bill and the House on repassage—Bohr was later unable to explain why he had failed to lobby against the bill during that interim. Presumably Bohr was that unidentified official.

Instead, he assailed the tobacco industry for having “sat on its hands,” especially since he had “called the tobacco companies and warned them well in advance” of the bill. Purporting not to know why they had failed to lobby, he could only conjecture that perhaps their strategy had been that if they just kept quiet, the anti-smokers would leave them alone.

Overall, then, under the Senate Health committee amendments, whereas the factory/warehouse provision weakened the law, those dealing with restaurants and owners’ duties strengthened it; the health board’s power to issue waivers was manifestly designed to create administrative flexibility so long as the effect on nonsmokers was significant—to the extent that prohibiting smoking in (but not the wafting of smoke into) certain areas significantly improved their health and comfort in the first place. Two days later the Senate adopted the committee report.

The Full Senate Upholds Inclusion of Restaurants and the House Concurs

When the full Senate took up H.F. 79 on May 14, it adopted the motion by Senator Robert Brown, a professor of education at the College of St. Thomas and chairman of the Minnesota Republican Party, to amend the committee amendment by reinserting the aforementioned factory/warehouse language, but now the provision would be administratively regulated: “except that the department of labor and industry shall, in consultation with the state board of health, establish rules to restrict or prohibit smoking in those places of work where the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees.”

Brown grounded the need for this amendment, which the committee had been unable to work out, in the inappropriateness of having the Board of Health “interfere” and two agencies in a workplace in which the public normally was not involved. Schaaf accepted the amendment, which he believed had been worked out with Brandt of ANSR and MACI.

After several senators had spoken against the bill, Al Kowalczyk, a very conservative Republican senator who had otherwise never spoken on the floor, made an impassioned plea for the bill because his asthmatic son reacted violently to smoke and was forced to leave restaurants. North, the Episcopalian minister who had seized the opportunity in committee to propose the insertion of restaurant coverage and who even at this late moment was not certain that the bill would pass, experienced Kowalczyk’s intervention as one of the rare occasions when a floor speech actually changed votes.\textsuperscript{403}

On its third and final reading, the bill passed by a vote of 36 to 28\textsuperscript{404} (two more Yes votes than the constitutionally required majority of all 67 elected senators).\textsuperscript{405} Not only was the result much closer than in the House—prompting Brandt to speculate that the closeness might have been a function of Bohr’s having lobbied the full Senate after all\textsuperscript{406}—but the DFL approval vote itself at 57 percent was both much more closely divided and almost identical to the Republicans’ 55-percent Yea-rate: whereas Democrats supported the bill by a vote of 20 to 15, Republicans approved 16 to 13.\textsuperscript{407} The closely divided DFL vote \textsuperscript{403}Telephone interview with Robert North, Galena, IL (Mar. 2, 2009). Senator Jerald Anderson also recalled Kowalczyk’s speech. Telephone interview with Jerald Anderson, Sun City West, AZ (Mar. 23, 2009). Senator Jack Davies, who was also an academic specialist on the legislative process, observed that “personal appeals” had often been very effective in the Senate. Telephone interview with John Davies, Minneapolis (Mar. 23, 2009). Senator John Milton, who was chair of the Health subcommittee of the Senate Health Welfare Committee of which Kowalczyk was a member, found it “amusing” that Kowalczyk had given such a speech because: “In my dealings with self-styled conservative politicians, they’re against everything except where they have a personal interest.” Email from John Milton to Marc Linder (Mar. 11, 2009). The account of the proceedings is based on senators’ personal recollections 34 years later because, astonishingly, the press virtually ignored the bill’s passage. For example, none of the five articles on the legislature that the Minneapolis Tribune ran on May 15 even mentioned the bill, whereas the minuscule filler in the Pioneer Press presented no information on the debate. “Senate Advances Smoking-Area Bill,” \textit{SPPP}, May 15, 1975 (25:6). In this sense Brandt’s judgment is puzzling that: “The media have given good coverage to the bill. From inception to enactment to implementation, the media have kept a watchful eye on the law and have done an adequate job in informing Minnesotans about the law’s provisions.” Ed Brandt and Mary Jo Matczynski, “This Is Clean Indoor Air Country,” American Lung Association Bulletin, Jan.-Feb. 1976, at 11-13 at 13.

\textsuperscript{406}Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 5, 2009). To be sure, early lobbying is more effective before momentum has built up: “Fewer members are involved in decisions at the start of the process so the task of persuading decision makers is less difficult.” Jack Davies, \textit{Legislative Law and Process in a Nutshell} 23 (1975).

\textsuperscript{407}\textit{Journal of the Senate, State of Minnesota, Sixty-Ninth Legislature: 1975}, at 2281
demonstrated that it was not a so-called caucus vote because Majority Leader Coleman was able, as Brandt noted, to “win or defeat any bill, if he was determined to do so.” In fact, Coleman, as his biographer and former state Senator John Milton put it, “preferred not to make votes on controversial issues ‘caucus votes’—abortion, gun control, ban-the-can, ban on smoking, gay rights, et. al., for two reasons: he didn’t like some of them, but more importantly he knew that his DFL caucus was more conservative than us ‘dreamers’ wanted to accept, and that there were on some issues more votes to be harvested from the Republicans.” More plausibly, the narrower Senate vote may simply have stemmed from the new coverage of restaurants, which made the bill much more intrusive and irritated many restaurant owners who may have possessed some local political power that they could bring to bear against incumbents. Impressive was the fact that whereas Brandt was unable to perceive any commonality among the 15 DFLers who had voted against the bill in terms of ideology, occupation, or the make-up of their districts, 11 of the 15, according to a reconstruction by two of their DFL senatorial colleagues, smoked. Among the few nonsmoking DFLers who, surprisingly, voted against H.F. 79 principle was not the motivating force. For example, Jerald Anderson, a dentist whom Milton recalled as “very public health conscious,” voted No because “my wife smoked a pack a day at the time. It was as simple as that.” The Nay cast by Jack Davies, a liberal and law professor, surprised not only Brandt more than any (May 14); http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/ (party affiliation). According to Brandt’s contemporaneous roll-call analysis, the majority in favor of the bill among Twin Cities metropolitan area senators was as striking as the majority against it in the rest of the state. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Nov. 1 and 5, 2009).

408Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 2, 2009).

409Email from John Milton to Marc Linder (Mar. 10, 2009). In contrast: “Those that were virtually automatic (follow the leader/trust the leader) were: conference committee reports on all major spending bills, election-related issues, and, of course, a motion by the Majority Leader to adjourn. You followed Nick on these or you paid the price!”

410Telephone interview with Rolf Nelson (a Republican Senator in 1975 who was a member of the Health and Welfare Committee), Minneapolis (Mar. 14, 2009).

411Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 23, 2009).

412Email from John Milton to Marc Linder (Mar. 23, 2009); telephone interview with John Davies, Minneapolis (Mar. 23, 2009). The smoking senators were Borden, Chenoweth, Kleinbaum, Laufenburger, Lewis, H. Olson, G. Perpich, Purfeerst, Schrom, Solon, Stokowski; the non-smokers were Anderson, Davies, A. Olson, and Willet.

413Email from John Milton to Marc Linder (Mar. 23, 2009).

414Telephone interview with Jerald Anderson, Sun City West, AZ (Mar. 23, 2009).
of the others,415 but Davies himself, who 34 years later, after having served as a judge on the Minnesota Court of Appeals for a decade, good-naturedly and self-deprecatingly confessed: “I’d chalk it up to dumbness.”416 The best that the lifelong nonsmoker, who in 1975 had published a book on the legislative process,417 was able to “make up” was “my disbelief that it was going to work”—of which he was then very quickly disabused.418

The difference in voting patterns between the two houses may, in the view of Burnham (Bud) Philbrook, one of the House sponsors of H.F. 79, have been a function of the fact that because the entire House had stood for election in 1974 in the immediate aftermath of the Watergate scandal, the DFL not only secured a huge majority, but its expanded caucus was replete with more liberal/progressive members, a phenomenon lacking in the Senate, none of whose members had stood for election in 1974.419 In contrast, Senator Conzemius, the chair of the Health and Welfare Committee, conjectured that the reduced majority for the bill in the Senate may have been accounted for by the fact that once the bill had passed both the House and his committee, those opposed to smoking regulation intensified their lobbying efforts in the full Senate.420

After Senate passage Bohr reminded Kahn that she “had agreed to not put restaurants in. But I told him I had never agreed to take it out once the Senate put it in.”421 Bohr insisted that her agreement with the restaurant association meant that, even if Kahn had nothing to do with the Senate’s action, she was still obligated to see to it that the bill went to a conference committee and to oppose restaurant coverage on behalf of the House, but she refused.422 Just as North’s committee amendment to cover restaurants had, according to Brandt, been “totally spontaneous,” on the bill’s return to the House two days later (May 16), “Kahn was only too glad to move that the House adopt the Senate bill, instead of sending it to a conference committee. But I had nothing to do with that either. I know only because Kahn told me so.”423 (With only three days left in the 415Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar 22, 2009).

416Telephone interview with Jack Davies, Minneapolis (Mar. 23, 2009).
418Telephone interview with Jack Davies, Minneapolis (Mar. 23, 2009).
419Telephone interview with Bud Philbrook, St. Paul (Mar. 1, 2009). The entire legislature stood for election in 1972, but four-year senatorial terms (in contrast to the two-year House terms) meant that senators did not campaign in 1974.
420Telephone interview with George Conzemius, Cannon Falls, MN (Mar. 1, 2009).
421Email from Phyllis Kahn to Marc Linder (Mar. 23, 2009).
422Email from Phyllis Kahn to Marc Linder (Apr. 21, 2009).
423Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 5, 2009).
session, sending it to conference would presumably have killed it for 1975; opponents’ failure to make such a motion was presumably a function of their knowing that they lacked the requisite votes.) Sounding a triumphant note at the ANSR annual meeting 10 years after the MCIAA’s passage, Kahn observed of her own tactic in 1975: “To appease the Restaurant Association, I agreed to take the restaurants out of the bill, and it initially passed the House in that form. However, they forgot that bills go through the Senate too and that body added protection in restaurants back and I simply accepted the Senate version for final passage.”424 Kahn’s motion that the chamber concur in the Senate amendments and repass H.F. 79 prevailed. By a vote of 96 to 31 the House then repassed the bill. The inter-party differential intensified, with 80 percent of the DFL voting Yea compared to only 61 percent of Republicans.425

Was the Tobacco Industry Really Asleep?

“It’s offensive to me to say it,” Rep. Phyllis Kahn, its author, told the Los Angeles Times, “but nobody took us seriously. The tobacco lobby knew about it but didn’t consider it a serious threat since it didn’t actually prohibit smoking.... Nobody’s been able to do it since, and the reason is because of our success.” ...

“Basically I think the law is effective...[b]ut when people choose to ignore it, there is no question they ignore it with impunity.”426

Despite the striking firsthand evidence presented earlier of the presence and involvement of tobacco lobbyists in the legislative process, the dominant narrative in the literature on the MCIAA, which lacks any evidentiary basis, denies any cigarette industry participation. Ashes to Ashes, Richard Kluger’s influential panorama of cigarette manufacturers’ conspiracy to conceal the truth about the lethal consequences of smoking, forged the mould for this story by claiming that after the enactment of the Minnesota law, “[b]elatedly, the tobacco industry awoke to this new threat at the state level. Its lobbyists flocked to state capitals and argued that smoking restrictions were unfair, unjustified by scientific findings, and unenforceable.... Throughout the 1970s, though, the antismoking effort was hardly a groundswell as the industry installed an effective political apparatus at the state level. While Utah, Nebraska, and Montana passed clean-air laws in the wake of the Minnesota statute, theirs were less comprehensive....”

425Journal of the House of Representatives, Sixty-Ninth Session of the Legislature, State of Minnesota: 1975, at 2878 (May 16); Brandt’s tally of party votes. The press’s lack of understanding of the bill was reflected in the claim that the Senate’s addition of restaurant coverage and removal of the penalty of $300 and 90 days’ imprisonment were “relatively minor changes.” “Capitol Approach,” SPPP, May 17, 1975 (8:2).

Citing Kluger, Stanton Glantz and Edith Balbach, two leading anti-smoking advocates, wrote that the “Minnesota law was the last time that clean indoor air legislation would pass without vigorous opposition from the tobacco industry.”

(Ironically, Glantz may have merely been citing himself: although Kluger, as was the case with the vast majority of his factual claims, failed to provide a source for this statement, he had interviewed Glantz, who told him that the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act had been enacted in 1975 “‘largely because nobody was paying att.,’ it came out of nowhere & caught industry by surprise....”) In a monograph devoted to tobacco politics in Minnesota Glantz repeated this by then received wisdom, insisting, based on sources that had absolutely nothing to do with the assertion, that the law “was enacted without any overt opposition from the tobacco industry..., something that would never happen again. The tobacco industry was caught off-guard.... Minnesota’s experience in passing a Clean Indoor Air Act was the last time that the tobacco industry did not play a major role to defeat such activities. In the early to mid 1970s, the tobacco industry did not interfere with tobacco control efforts in Minnesota.”

429 Stanton A. Glantz [interviewed by Richard Kluger] (July 18, 1989), Bates No. 83724526.
430 Theodore Tsoukalas, Jennifer Ibrahim, and Stanton Glantz, “Shifting Tides: Minnesota Tobacco Politics” at 1, 6 (2003), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/MN2003. In support of the assertion that MCIAA “was enacted without any overt opposition from the tobacco industry” the authors cited “Association for Nonsmokers Rights. Minnesota Clean Indoor [Air] Act Becomes Law. The ANSR. 1975;3(2) [June 1975]” and “Association for Nonsmokers Rights [Ed Brandt]. Kahn-Schaaf Bill Protects Right to Smoke-Free Air. The ANSR. 1975;2(6) [Feb. 1975].” Theodore Tsoukalas, Jennifer Ibrahim, and Stanton Glantz, “Shifting Tides: Minnesota Tobacco Politics” at 1, 4 (2003), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/MN2003. Neither the first reference (which was not an article but a headline encompassing more or less the entire issue of the newsletter) nor the second (which was published right after the bill had been introduced and before a subcommittee had even dealt with it) mentioned anything about tobacco Scholars were hardly alone in denying cigarette companies’ agency. The American Lung Association in Minneapolis was distorting history when its public information director, Maggie Vertin, later claimed that “in 1975, the tobacco industry was ‘not yet on to the wave of non-smoking sentiment sweeping the country.’” So Ms. Kahn’s bill ‘really did slip through.’” Indeed, in 1980 the Tobacco Institute itself demonstrably disseminated disinformation by claiming that it had been “caught off guard” by the passage of the MCIAA in 1975, which “was long before we knew of this [i.e., nonsmokers’ rights laws] as an issue. We were kind of absent from that fight.” In point of fact, the Tobacco Institute and its member companies were, as already recounted in detail, deeply immersed, if not submerged and drowning, in those waves all over the United States.

Kahn herself—who had not been surprised and did not at the time think about what she perceived as an absence of tobacco lobbying—took a different tack, acknowledging that “[t]he tobacco lobby knew about it but didn’t consider it a serious threat since it didn’t actually prohibit smoking.”

industry opposition. Globally undifferentiated and without substantiation was also the assertion by Allan Brandt, The Cigarette Century 289 (2007): “With the tobacco industry’s lobbying focused in Washington, these early bills came in under its radar.” Ironically, if the tobacco industry did display lobbying incompetence in Minnesota in 1975, it was not the last time. In 1979-80, when the Health Department proposed important amendments to the MCIAA regulations, the Tobacco Institute’s lobbyists, though aware of the administrative proceedings, “did not fully understand that their assignment from us extended to regulatory proceedings as well as legislative actions.” Expressing chagrin at not having been “fully on top of any matter affecting our interest,” the senior vice president for state activities promised R. J. Reynolds’ manager for state public affairs that that “situation has been rectified and will not recur.” John Kelly to Larry Bewley (May 23, 1980), Bates No. 500024344.

Mislled by such claims, the reporter chimed in that MCIAA “moved through the Minnesota Legislature practically unnoticed.”

In a pregnant
formulation that would be repeated many times over the years, Kahn mentioned during a discussion of the law’s legislative history at ANSR’s annual meeting on February 2, 1976, a “fact she believe[d] actually helped gain passage of the Bill: ‘they laughed the Bill all the way to the Governor’s office—then they sat up and read it.’” To be sure, this view was not compelling since MCIAA did not differ from the scores of other bills and ordinances opposed by the industry opposed at the time that also failed to prohibit (rather than) restrict smoking.

Such claims, unsupported as they are by contemporaneous sources, need to be tested empirically. In light of the considerable resources that the cigarette companies devoted to combating (and defeating) anti-smoking bills in Arizona (and elsewhere) in 1973, 1974, and 1975, their alleged failure to lobby in Minnesota in 1975 would have been anomalous, especially since the Tobacco Institute was closely monitoring the course of the bill in Minnesota, noting when it was introduced and when it passed the House, and that Americans for Non-Smokers Rights, headquartered in Minneapolis, was “pushing for ‘the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act.’” Moreover, according to Charles Wasker, a long-time tobacco lobbyist in Iowa, a competent lobbyist did represent the tobacco industry in the Minnesota legislature in 1975.

More importantly, a number of participants with firsthand knowledge independently and more than 30 years after the events had taken place stated that one particular tobacco lobbyist had lobbied against the bill. Victor Jude both owned a wholesale tobacco distributorship (Jude Candy and Tobacco Co.) and was a director of the Minnesota Candy & Tobacco Distributors Association. In addition, he was a DFL member of the Minnesota House from 1957 to 1966.

---

436 “Annual Meeting—Many Attend, Learn ANSR Ready to Go the Second Mile,” ANSR 4(1):1 (Apr. 1976). See also Phyllis Kahn, “The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Legislation Enacted with Volunteer Group Support,” in Proceedings of the Fifth World Conference on Smoking and Health 2:309-11 at 310 (William Forbes et al. eds 1983): “I...believe that the bill passed in part because it was not taken very seriously by its opponents. They thought it was such a ridiculous thing to do that they kept laughing at it all the way to the Governor’s office.”

437 See above ch. 23.

438 TIN, No. 91, Feb. 4, 1974, at 4, Bates No. 950307982; TIN, No. 120, Apr. 8, 1975, at 1, 3 (quote), Bates No. 950307736.

439 Telephone interview with Charles Wasker, Des Moines (Mar. 30, 2007).

440 E.g., Joseph Robbie to MCTDA Members (Oct. 24, 1974), Bates No., TIMN461875 (letterhead). and of the Senate from 1967 to 1972, after which he became a lobbyist. Although his lobbyist registration for 1975 listed the Minnesota Railroads Association as the only entity for which he would be lobbying, Ted Suss, a cosponsor of H.F. 79, remembered 34 years later that Jude had been “active lobbying against the bill”; possibly Jude was “freelancing on that issue” when “he was making points about its negative effect,” prompting Suss at the time to think about Jude’s own business’s being harmed by the measure. Even Brandt, who steadfastly denied that the Tobacco Institute ever lobbied during the bill’s pendency, admitted that Jude was “[t]he local representative of the tobacco industry at the time.” Radisson’s anti-MCIAA lobbyist, William Brooks, stated with certitude that Jude had been lobbying against the public smoking bill in 1975. Similarly, Senate Health and Welfare Committee chairman Conzemius observed that because Jude worked behind the scenes, he did not have personal knowledge of Jude’s lobbying, but he was sure that Jude opposed and lobbied against the bill. House Minority Leader Savelkoul remarked that he

441 http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?ID=12423
442 State of Minnesota, State Ethics Commission, Registered Lobbyists 43 (Feb. 11, 1975). His son Thaddeus Jude, who entered the legislature in 1973, was alone in his insistence that his father had lobbied only for railroads in 1975. He stated that Joseph Robbie, the executive director of the MCTDA, had been a tobacco lobbyist in the 1960s, and that James Erickson was a tobacco lobbyist from 1975 on, but that he was unable to recall who the lobbyist was from 1970 to 1975. Telephone interview with Thaddeus Jude, Minneapolis (Apr. 26, 2007).
443 Email from Ted Suss to Marc Linder (Mar. 2, 2009).
444 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 18, 2009). Several years after the MCIAA’s passage Brandt asserted that “the lobbyist for Minnesota tobacco dealers did not testify on the Minnesota bill as it went through the legislative process, since the people whom he represented had concluded that it would not affect them. They were right.” Comments by Edward R. Brandt (Co-Founder and Former President of the Association for Non-Smokers Rights) on the Effectiveness and Effects of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act and Related Issues (elaborating upon testimony before the Wisconsin Assembly Committee on State Affairs, March 20, 1979, on Assembly Bill 80 [to be entered as testimony for American Lung Association of Mid-Maryland], Bates No. TI03870504/09. In fact, they were wrong and so was Brandt. Later, when asked whether Jude had actually made such a statement to him, Brandt was unable to recall and then shifted to a different argument: “He [Jude] may well have decided that a ban on indoor smoking would not hurt his sales. Inasmuch as non-compliance remained a serious issue for many years, he probably was right.” Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 11, 2009).
445 Telephone interview with William Brooks, Jr., Minneapolis (May 12, 2007).
446 Telephone interview with George Conzemius, Cannon Falls (Mar. 1, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

would be surprised if Jude had not lobbied against the bill “behind the scenes.” 447—a description that virtually all informants offered as his modus operandi. 448 Schaaf, the bill’s chief sponsor in the Senate, later observed that he had been surprised at the time that he had seen no tobacco lobbyists; he conjectured that wholesalers had not lobbied because they did not believe that the law would depress cigarette sales. 449 At the same time, he assumed that the tobacco industry believed that the bill could be handled by the restaurant lobbyists. 450

The most undeniable evidence of lobbying by the tobacco industry stemmed from its one registered lobbyist in Minnesota in 1975, James Erickson. A multi-client lawyer-lobbyist who had been graduated from law school in 1972 451 and was just beginning his lobbying career in 1974-75, 452 Erickson was registered as lobbyist for the Northwest Tobacco & Candy Distributors (the rival to Robbie’s organization), but, unlike Radisson’s lobbyists, did not specifically mention smoking in public places as one of his issues; instead he merely referred to “[i]tems of general interest to the tobacco and candy distributors.” 453 Asked in 2009 about his lobbying on the MCIAA in 1975, Erickson immediately insisted that the cigarette manufacturers were “the lead dogs,” whereas the distributors organization took a “back seat” and merely followed the “signals called” by the national tobacco companies. 454

447 Telephone interview with Henry Savelkoul, Sun City West (Mar. 2, 2009).
448 For example, former Senator Jerome Hughes (1967-92), one of the MCIAA sponsors in 1975, characterized Jude in particular as a “low-key” lobbyist and added that tobacco lobbyists had been around but in the background in 1975. DFL Senator Steve Keefe (1973-80) recalled Jude as a tobacco lobbyist, but emphasized that tobacco lobbyists, did not specifically mention smoking in public places as one of his issues; instead he merely referred to “[i]tems of general interest to the tobacco and candy distributors.” 449 Schaaf, the bill’s chief sponsor in the Senate, later observed that he had been surprised at the time that he had seen no tobacco lobbyists; he conjectured that wholesalers had not lobbied because they did not believe that the law would depress cigarette sales. 449 At the same time, he assumed that the tobacco industry believed that the bill could be handled by the restaurant lobbyists. 450

449 Telephone interview with David Schaaf, McGregor, MN (May 12, 2007).
450 Telephone interview with David Schaaf, Roseville, MN (Mar. 8, 2009).
452 Telephone interview with James Erickson, Minneapolis (Apr. 20, 2009).
Finally, the fact that internal cigarette manufacturing company documents reveal that early in 1976 the Tobacco Institute was working closely with the hospitality industry (through Bohr) and MACI (through Perry) to challenge the MCIAA in court or to amend it legislatively strongly suggests that whatever lobbying strategy the tobacco companies had been pursuing in 1975 that dictated concealing their involvement, Bohr and Perry may have been its primary executors.\textsuperscript{455} Indeed, once Peter Lindberg, the industry’s chief lobbyist during the first half of the 1970s, had been appointed a state district court judge for Hennepin County in 1974\textsuperscript{456} and was thus no longer available for public lobbying on behalf of the cigarette industry, the oligopoly may have decided that more experienced non-tobacco lobbyists Bohr and Perry would, given burgeoning anti-tobacco public opinion in Minnesota, better serve its interests.

\textbf{The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: An Overview and Evaluation}

Non-smokers who sit near the smoking section say they have little benefit.\textsuperscript{435}

“Tell them in Des Moines we think this law is stupid.”\textsuperscript{436}

\textsuperscript{455}See below this ch. That a Legacy Tobacco Documents Library search identified no materials from 1975 suggesting contacts between the tobacco industry and Bohr or Perry (or other lobbyists) does not mean that none exist(ed).

\textsuperscript{436}Bonnie Wittenburg, “No-Smoking Law Stirs Good-Natured Minnesota Fuming,” \textit{DMR}, Aug. 2, 1975, Bates No. TIMN0462047 (quoting smoking customer of barbershop,
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

As approved by the governor on June 2 and as it went into effect on August 1, MCIAA, 437 whose purpose was to “protect the public health, comfort and environment,” 438 prohibited smoking in public meetings and public places, defined as “any enclosed, indoor area used by the general public or serving as a place of work, including, but not limited to, restaurants, retail stores, offices and other commercial establishments, public conveyances, educational facilities, hospitals, nursing homes, auditoriums, arenas and meeting rooms, but excluding private, enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers even though such offices may be visited by nonsmokers.” 439 The relatively capacious scope of the prohibition was, however, subverted by the same huge exception that severely limited the usefulness of virtually all public smoking laws of the period: “No person shall smoke in a public place or at a public meeting except in designated smoking areas.” And even this mere segregation of smokers but not of their smoke did not apply at all to “factories, warehouses and similar places of work not usually frequented by the general public....” Although this wording suggested that coverage of workplaces was a mere consequence of the principal purpose of protecting the public, the legislature did go on to require the state department of labor and industry, in consultation with the state board of health, to “establish rules to restrict or prohibit smoking in those places of work where the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees.” 440 The designation of smoking areas was entrusted to proprietors or others in charge of public places, whose discretion was limited in only two respects: they were not permitted to designate as smoking areas places in which the fire marshall or other law prohibited it; and, except for a bar—which, if designated as one entire smoking area, had to be conspicuously posted to that effect at all normal entrances 441—no public place could be designated as a smoking area in its 437 For background on the law, see Mark Wolfson, The Fight Against Big Tobacco: The Movement, the State, and the Public’s Health 49-67, 152-54 (2001).

438 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 2, at 633.
439 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 3 subd. 2, at 633.
440 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 4, at 634.
441 Several months after the law had gone into effect but before the administrative rules had been promulgated, Kahn told a St. Louis alderman seeking her advice about a proposed city ordinance that “I can’t give you any good reasons for the separate category for bars in our law except a gut feeling that we had that the clientele of bars are probably less sensitive to a smoky atmosphere than those of cafeterias or better restaurants or most entirety. Where a public place consisted of a single room, the legislature, in a less than transparent manner, declared that “the provisions of this law shall be considered met if one side of the room is reserved and posted as a no-smoking area,” thus raising the question both as to what “one side” encompassed and whether merely reserving no-smoking areas wherever the proprietor desired (as was permissible in multi-room public places) was also lawful. In addition, owners were not required to make any physical changes to protect nonsmokers from smoke: only already “existing physical barriers and ventilation systems shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent non-smoking areas.”
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

442 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 5, at 634.

443 To the aforementioned St. Louis alderman Kahn explained with regard to the “one side” of a single room language that “we ran into some trouble with the lack of a definition of the word ‘side.’ When the bill was written, we obviously meant ‘side’ to be at least a [sic] half a room or very close to a half, but the Department of Health has ignored this and has just defined it as a continuous [sic; should be “contiguous”] section.” Phyllis Kahn to Bruce Sommer at 1 (Oct. 24, 1975), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118F.8.3.(B). Nevertheless, in an internal guideline the Health Department characterized the “one side” of a single room language as the MCIAA’s “only standard for size of the designated area....” Guidelines Regarding Implementation and Enforcement of Minnesota Clean Air Act, Laws of Minnesota, 1975 Chapter 211 (For Internal MDH Use Only) at 3 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

444 While noting that “[n]othing in the law requires a proprietor to designate a portion of the establishment as a ‘smoking permitted’ area,” the Health Department merely specified that “the proprietor should use his/her own judgment on the size of the smoking permitted area if any smoking area is permitted.” Guidelines Regarding Implementation and Enforcement of Minnesota Clean Air Act, Laws of Minnesota, 1975 Chapter 211 (For Internal MDH Use Only) at 2, 3 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

445 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 5, at 634.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas.” In other words, if existing barriers and ventilation could not be so used, the agency was required to prohibit smoking entirely.

The severe constraints imposed on what on its face appeared to be an expansive prohibition fully confirmed ANSR’s analysis of the final bill text as an illustration of “the difficulty of working within the nature of the political process—which is a compromising process.” Just how far the initial legal regime was from ANSR’s aspirational end goal was made clear by the group’s director, who informed the press the following year that: “Our thinking is that smoking should be considered socially unacceptable and limited to consenting adults in private.” By the same token, however, ANSR correctly stressed that MCIAA’s “intent is to prohibit smoking unless there is a designated smoking area. Smoking is the exception, not the rule. ... The intent of the law is not to designate no-smoking areas, but to establish smoking permitted, if SMOKING IS TO BE PERMITTED.

To the extent that the Minnesota legislature focused enforcement on owners, the “reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place” required of them were potentially capacious but ambiguous so that it was difficult to discern whether proponents imagined effective compliance resulting from them. Posting signs was helpful, but “arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area”—a much more expansive term than “no-smoking area” and one that should have been interpreted to mandate protection from exposure to smoke drifting from designated smoking areas—could have formed the core of an administrative rule with a powerful protective bite. Similarly, requiring owners to “ask[ ] smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke” did not limit owners’ responsibility to addressing smokers 446 1988 Minn. Laws ch. 613, § 9, at 726, 730 (italics added).

---

447 A bill filed by Kahn would have conferred these additional protections on all employees, but it failed to survive consideration by the House Health Committee. “State Employees Get Additional Protection,” ANSR Bulletin 2(2):1 (May 1988).
451 In fact, the Health Department’s rule drained the provision of all such potential by interpreting “smoke-free area” to mean merely “acceptable smoke-free area.” See below this ch.
452 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 6, at 634.
who were violating the law in the sense of smoking in nonsmoking areas, but would have encompassed smokers whose smoke was drifting from smoking into nonsmoking areas. At the same time, however, owner intervention was completely complaint driven: even if an owner saw people smoking in a nosmoking area, he was under no obligation even to ask them to stop so long as no “client” or employee complained; moreover, even when he did respond to a request and asked smokers to stop, he was also under no obligation to report this violation to any law-enforcement authority. Thus, although the Minnesota statute made it a petty misdemeanor to smoke in a nosmoking area, the real-world mechanism by which a prosecution could take place remained unexplained. Apparently, the legislature must have intended enforcement to be effected at best indirectly, since the only court action that an “affected party” or the state or local board of health was entitled to institute was for an injunction of “repeated violations” of an owner’s responsibilities to post signs, arrange seating, or ask smokers to stop smoking. Finally, although the statute required the state board of health to adopt rules and regulations “necessary and reasonable to implement” MCIAA, it also conferred discretion on the health board, “upon request, [to] waive the provisions” of MCIAA if the board “determines there are compelling reasons to do so and a waiver will not significantly affect the health and comfort of nonsmokers.”

MCIAA cost its supporters $75,000, including $20,000 in ANSR expenses from February 1973 through August 1975 and $20,000 and $35,000 in Hennepin and Ramsey County Lung Association staff salaries and program staff time, respectively. In light of this relatively modest financial outlay, Kahn offered six reasons to explain “[w]hy we were able to pass this fairly stringent restriction

\[453\] 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 7 subd. 2, at 635.
\[454\] 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 7.3, at 635.
\[455\] 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 7.1, at 634-35.
\[456\] Robin Derrickson, Untitled Typescript at 1 (Sept. 1978) (talk given at Western Lung Conference) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR). To be sure, Jeanne Weigum, who by 1983 was the president of ANSR but who had not been involved in the organization or the campaign for MCIAA in 1975, offered a radically lower estimate: ANSR and the three Minnesota lung associations invested less than $10,000 (largely for staff time), while the opposition spent “in the neighborhood of $500.” Jeanne Weigum, “Passage of the First Comprehensive, State-Wide, Smoking Control Law in the U.S.,” in Proceedings of the Fifth World Conference on Smoking and Health 2:327-31 at 327 (William Forbes et al. eds. 1983). It is unclear how Weigum could have determined how much the opponents had spent. That she incorrectly believed that the Hotel, Motel and Restaurant Association was the only opposing organization may in part account for this implausibly low figure.
on what people have considered to be their right for certainly the past 30 years i.e., [the] right to smoke tobacco in any form, in any place whatsoever...” First, as a “persistent and devoted non-smokers rights group” ANSR “gave extreme support during the entire process,” including drafting the bill, mobilizing witnesses to testify before committees, “writing continual [sic] letters” and “putting tremendous pressures on the legislative process at every moment.” Second, a “sound body of scientific knowledge,” in particular the surgeon general’s report detailing tobacco smoke’s effects on nonsmokers and its translation by an American Lung Association popular pamphlet “into words that not only the public, but even legislators could understand” were especially helpful. Third, virtually every health organization in Minnesota lent its support. Fourth, “a dramatic change in the composition in [sic] the legislature...around 1972” that produced “a majority that had not only decreased in age and increased in educational experience but also went from a majority of smokers to a majority of non-smokers.” Fifth, whereas Wisconsin with a small tobacco industry had been unable to pass any tobacco control measure in recent years, Minnesota lacked “any sizeable tobacco industry.” And sixth, the fact that MCIAA appeared to everyone to be “utter[ly] reasonable[ ]” undercut opposition.457

Despite the spatial comprehensiveness that the law achieved in comparison to that of other states, it still did not, as Brandt explained one of MCIAA’s deficiencies “in layman’s terms,” “specify what portion of a public place may be designated as a smoking area,” although the question was “a possible subject for regulations to be adopted by the State Board of Health.” Similarly, until DLI issued the relevant rules, MCIAA established “no legally binding restriction on smoking” applicable to “places used chiefly by employees” rather than the general public.458 Even in the interim between the gubernatorial signing ceremony and the law’s effective date the lung associations in Minnesota reported that two problems had cropped up: restaurant owners purportedly “fear a loss of customers and wasted space if segregated smoking and nonsmoking areas are mandated”; and DLI “fears it is currently considered impossible to enforce such regulations in the work place.”459 Nevertheless, the law, as Time reminded its readers as soon as MCIAA went into effect, “shifts the balance of power between smoker and non-smoker” by “put[ting] the burden on the smoker to find a smoking area, rather than on the non-smoker to find a spot of clean air.”460 It may not have been apparent to ANSR at the time, but even this power shift, like segregation on airplanes, offered such minimal (to non-existent) immunity from tobacco smoke that it could not possibly appease nonsmokers or create even a temporary social-political equilibrium—a prospect of the slippery slope to the endgame that never ceased to agitate the cigarette oligopolists.461

457Representative Phyllis Kahn, Speech Before Public Health Association, St. Cloud at 4-5 (Oct. 8, 1976), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118F.8.3.(B). Earlier, to a St. Louis alderman Kahn made light of the opponents of the bill apart from the Restaurant Association: “to a lesser extent” opposition came from the “Minnesota Association of Commerce and Industry, who claimed that all the business [sic] would move out of the state so that their workers could smoke” and “to an even lesser extent from the Association of Retailers, who claimed that all the shoppers will be going to Wisconsin so that they’ll be able to smoke.” Phyllis Kahn to Bruce Sommer (Oct. 24, 1975), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118F.8.3.(B).

459“An Explanation of the Minnesota ‘Clean Air Act,’” ANSR, July 1975, Appendix II at 4, Bates No. 85646234/7. The source of this information is difficult to identify: the statement cited in the text was tacked on to a re-typed version of Ed Brandt, “Bill in Layman’s Terms,” ANSR 3(2):1-2 (June 1975) (no issue appeared in July 1975).

461See, e.g., the tobacco lobbyist’s aforementioned statement that the industry opposed the bill because of its intent to reduce smoking. Robert Milis, “Dr. Steinfeld Boosts Smoker Restriction Measure,” Post Bulletin (Rochester, MN), Feb. 25, 1974, Bates No. TIMNO461983. According to a Minnesota Poll, whereas 37 percent of state residents had said that they smoked cigarettes in 1975, two years later only 31 percent did. “Minnesota Poll: Cigarette Smoking Declines in Minnesota in Last 2 Years,” MT, July 17, 1977, clipping in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B). The poll did not explore MCIAA’s impact on this decline, but in 1976 Kahn offered the speculative/anecdotal argument that although the law “was not aimed at individual smoking deterrence,...its [sic] had an interesting effect on smokers. This is probably why the tobacco industry became so interested in it albeit belatedly. It turns out that as smoking is considered socially and legally unacceptable and also as it becomes more difficult to smoke, people smoke far less. Legislators have told me that with the passage of the no-smoking rule on the floor of the House, their cigarette consumption has gone way down just because of the additional effort it takes to go someplace else to smoke.” Representative Phyllis Kahn, Speech Before Public Health Association, St. Cloud at 7 (Oct. 8, 1976), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118F.8.3.(B). Despite cigarette manufacturers’ fears, as late as 1979, Brandt remained extremely skeptical that MCIAA would reduce cigarette sales or smoking: “[C]onsidering the limited impact that tremendous publicity about the harmfulness of smoking to the smoker had on tobacco consumption, it seems inconceivable to me that publicity about the harmful effects of smoking on the non-smoker could lead to more than very marginal changes.... Logically, there is no reason why requiring separate smoking and no smoking sections should lead to any significant decrease in smoking.” Comments by Edward R. Brandt (Co-Founder and Former President of the Association for Non-Smokers Rights) on the Effectiveness and Effects of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act and Related Issues
In light of the significant advance that MCIAA represented beyond all previous state laws, President Kornegay’s failure even to allude to it in his report on state legislation to TI’s annual meeting in January 1976 was astonishing. Pooh-poohing “the Banzhafs of this world,” who “boast[ed] of legislative successes” in 1975 and gave “the impression that smoking and the tobacco industry are on the run,” Kornegay gamely tried to convince his bosses that “we did lose some, but we struck some counter blows, and the effect is beginning to tell. The important point is that we won more often than we lost—and most of the losses were close contests.” Pretending that the rich and powerful cigarette oligopoly was the underdog (but at the same time inadvertently revealing just how unpopular the tobacco industry had become), he stressed that “we have gone into every contest with the initial odds greatly against us and with hostile public sentiment whipping up the press and activist clamor being generally supportive of the restrictive measures.” Purporting to “tick off the states where the anti-smokers are claiming ‘victory’ [and] we can see their public claims of success might be tinged with private frustration,” but in fact cherry-picking nine states in which smoking restrictions/bans were very narrow in scope (applying, for example, only to elevators), Kornegay boasted that these enactments had hardly been victories, though “they could have been if our spokesmen[,] our field men and our legislative representatives had not beaten back the fires, dampened the public uproar and convinced legislators to soften measures that could not be laid to rest.”

Where MCIAA fit into this heroic Goliath and David yarn was nowhere in evidence.

Enforcement and Compliance Before the Administrative Rules Went into Effect

I say if they [smokers] can even sit two tables away from me I’d consider it a victory.\(^{463}\)

Letting people smoke in one end of the room and not the other end, does very little good as that smoke carries right to the other end of the room. The smaller the room the quicker it gets there.\(^{464}\)
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Passing the country’s then-strictest anti-public smoking law had been difficult enough, but putting it into practice might prove to be much more arduous. On no one was this concern less lost than the bill’s most energetic and ardent legislative sponsor, Phyllis Kahn. Unlike many, if not most legislators, who, either holding to a rigid view of the separation of powers or perhaps simply not wanting to spend any more political capital on the issue, regard enforcement, even of their own pet legislation, as belonging entirely to the administrative agency on which the legislature conferred such exclusive authority, Kahn, though perhaps not acting as a one-person compliance officer, nevertheless, even before MCIAA went into force on August 1, took a very hands-on and even personal approach.

By mid-July she had already begun bugging the commissioner of the Department of Administration—who was in charge of buildings in which she spent considerable time—about “what steps you are taking to enforce” MCIAA when it became effective in the State Building Complex, almost every area of which was covered by the broad definition of “public places.”\(^{465}\) Even after the commissioner had replied, Kahn did not let him forget that although the Board of Health rules (when they were issued)\(^{466}\) would help him in designating smoking areas, this prospect did “not relieve proprieters [sic] of the responsibility of [sic] the immediate enforcement” of the MCIAA,” which, it was her interpretation and the attorney general’s, went into effect on August 1 with or without the implementing rules.\(^{467}\) (The Health Department, which was in charge of drafting rules and enforcing the law, took the same position.)\(^{468}\) Three weeks after that date, she once again reminded the commissioner that “the law did not have a

\(^{464}\) Ralph Brown to Dr. Warren Lawson (Nov. 20, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\(^{465}\) Phyllis Kahn to Richard Brubacher (July 14, 1975), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B).

\(^{466}\) The Board of Health filed the final rules with the Department of State on Apr. 2, 1976. Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six at 9, in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (file stamps).

\(^{467}\) Phyllis Kahn to Richard Brubacher (July 30, 1975), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B).

\(^{468}\) Guidelines Regarding Implementation and Enforcement of Minnesota Clean Air Act, Laws of Minnesota, 1975 Chapter 211 (For Internal MDH Use Only) at 1 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). provision for delay of adherence until after the drafting of regulations,” although this time she did acknowledge that he had “made a good start on adherence” by posting signs in cafeterias and conference and meeting rooms in state buildings. As for the prohibition of smoking except in designated areas, Kahn was not at all shy about suggesting that smoking be prohibited in corridors, lobbies, passageways, and registration lines because “it would be impossible to designate a smoking area in anyone [sic] of these and maintain a smoke-free area for the general public.”

While also making certain to convey her one-person legislative intent to the Health Department as it drafted the crucial implementing regulations, Kahn intervened wherever she deemed it necessary to remind violators of their duties. Thus, already on August 1, she wrote to Commissioner Thomas Ticen, the chairman of the Hennepin County (Minneapolis) Board, that she had noticed that it had voted that week to permit smoking at its meetings in the belief that MCIAA permitted public bodies to designate smoking areas in public buildings. Because, however, as Kahn pointed out, the act expressly excepted places in which smoking was “prohibited by the fire marshall or by other law, ordinance or regulation” from the general grant of authority to owners to designate smoking areas, and the Board’s public meetings in the City of Minneapolis were governed by the latter’s (aforementioned) ordinance banning smoking in such places, “you are not allowed to set up designated smoking areas.” Kahn, who closed by instructionally expressing her expectation that the Board would “rescind this illegal action” at its next meeting, was unable to resist enjoying her triumph over attorney and fellow DFL member Ticen, who had himself been a state legislator (smoked, earlier in the year had resisted the applicability of the city ordinance to the Board, and eventually died of lung cancer): “I...am somewhat perplexed that among the large and well-paid staff of Hennepin County, there is no one who is able to correctly interpret one of our less complex state laws.”

470For example, Kahn informed the MDH official charged with drafting the rules that she was “somewhat concerned with the definition of ‘private social function.’ The legislative intent of this exclusion was not to get into the business of legislating conduct at weddings, confirmations, and the like; and I am not sure that your definition recognizes this desire.” Phyllis Kahn to Kent Peterson (Sept. 29, 1975), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3.(B).

Ten days later, in response to a letter from a non-constituent (who had tried to secure passage of a nosmoking bill in student model legislation programs), Kahn “strongly recommend[ed] membership in ANSR,” adding that nonsmokers’ diligence would certainly be required to educate owners about their responsibility to prohibit smoking, especially since her own observations while traveling had made it clear to her that enforcement was “spotty, particularly out of the Twin Cities area....” 472 (Against this background of uninhibited interventionism it seemed out of character that in October she not only merely requested that an official of the Northwestern Bell Telephone Company who was also chairman of the State Information Services Advisory Council at their next meeting “either ban smoking entirely or else reschedule it in a room that has somewhat more area and more adequate ventilation,” but even politely wondered whether she was “[p]erhaps...being unduly sensitive” and superfluously added that she did “not think that the smoke-filled room adds anything to the atmosphere.”) 473 In November Kahn informed the associate dean of the University of Minneapolis Veterinary Hospital (with a copy to the university president) of a “flagrant violation of the law” that she had witnessed on a recent visit to the clinic with her cat: when she pointed out to a receptionist who was smoking at the desk that she was violating the MCIAA—Kahn did not mention to the dean whether the receptionist recognized the university area’s legislative representative or whether Kahn identified herself and her unique authority regarding the MCIAA—and that a sign on the door expressly prohibited smoking except in designated areas, “she replied that the entire waiting room was a designated smoking area.” Kahn then admonished the dean for “such a cavalier regard for the health of the public” displayed by an “agency dealing with public health.” 474

The Health Department received only 23 complaints from nonsmokers by the beginning of October,\textsuperscript{475} but Kahn was under no illusions as to state health inspectors’ ability to “‘police this law effectively, even if they add a smoking check on their yearly visit.’” Nevertheless, despite knowing that violations had taken place, she was “‘by and large...satisfied with the present situation,’” which was just a “‘first step.’”\textsuperscript{476}
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

H.F. 79’s cosponsor Bud Philbrook experienced first-hand the extent of compliance in rural small-town Minnesota in the summer of 1975 when a House colleague invited him to visit his hometown of 300 to 400 after the new law had gone into effect. When they walked into a restaurant, Philbrook reminded his host of the new law; the colleague in turn explained to the waitress that Philbrook had been one of the new law’s chief sponsors and that they wanted to sit in the nosmoking section, thus prompting her to guide them into, through, and out of the kitchen into a space near the rear entrance where a table had been set up. Still smiling, she announced: “This is our non-smoking table.” Having gotten the point of the exercise, Philbrook and his friend retreated to the restaurant, where they would be exposed to smoke as if the bill had never passed.\textsuperscript{477}

Restaurant owners did not reserve such treatment exclusively as punishment for state legislators nor was the practice confined to the boondocks. For example, shortly after the Health Department’s public hearing on its proposed rules a resident of Minneapolis submitted a comment to the principal drafter, Kent Peterson,\textsuperscript{478} about asking for the non-smoking section at a restaurant and being “told to pick any table and that would be my non-smoking table.”\textsuperscript{479} (Even three

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item\textsuperscript{475}Gordon Slovut, “State Health Board Gives No Quarter to Smoking Foe,” Minneapolis Star, Oct. [10], 1975 (1A, 4A), Bates No. TIMN0462141/2.
\item\textsuperscript{476}Harry Wilensky, “Effort to Ban Smoking Results in Murky Law,” St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Nov. 16, 1975 (1), Bates No. TIMN0240663.
\item\textsuperscript{477}Telephone interview with Bud Philbrook, St. Paul (Mar. 1, 2009). The scene was exquisitely captured by a cartoon of a waiter ostentatiously showing customers to their non-smoking table in a garbage-strewn back alley. “‘Table for Two Non-Smokers, This Way, Please,’” Minneapolis Star, Aug. 2, 1975 (4A), Bates No. TI47350692. For a contemporaneous account of the haphazard and disparate compliance with MCIAA as it went into effect in Rochester, see “Businesses Here Try to Abide by New Law, Butt...,” Post-Bulletin (Rochester), Aug. 1, 1975 (1), Bates No. TIMN0462144.
\item\textsuperscript{479}Earl Schleske to Kent Peterson (Dec. 18, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Schleske had been active in ANSR. Telephone interview with Earl Schleske, Minneapolis (Oct. 10, 2009). As late as December 1975 the editor of one Twin Cities daily blamed “the nonsmoking majority of Minnesotans” for not “demanding the \end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

years later the best light in which the president of the Minnesota Restaurant Association could cast compliance was that “most Minnesota restaurants have at least a nominal area for nonsmokers....” At the same time, however, he acknowledged the make-believe character of compliance in “small restaurants that do not have enough room to substantially separate smokers and nonsmokers.”

Immediately after the law had gone into effect on August 1, the Health Department revealed, albeit only within the agency, how limited its enforcement activities would be:

The Minnesota Department of Health does intend to enforce this law. The legislation had no appropriation for an administrative or investigatory staff for enforcement of the Act; therefore, the Department of Health must limit its enforcement activity to inspection of places where Health Department staff currently go, namely, restaurants, hotels, resorts and health care facilities. Beyond these places, the Department will refer complaints to local Boards of Health or issue a warning through telephone or written communications.

Even more suggestive of the modest niche that the Health Department had carved out for itself as well as of the reputation that ANSR had gained as an effective and reliable partner was the Department’s recommendation to the public that, if an owner refused to comply with MCIAA, the “affected party” contact either Glenna Johnson (telephone number included), the chairperson of the Public Awareness Committee of ANSR (which was “pursuing a program to inform proprietors of the requirements of the law and will advise proprietors on ways to assure clean air for the non-smokers”) or the MDH itself, which would follow up on complaints “as appropriate”—meaning by means of inspectors in the aforementioned types of businesses, referral to local health boards, telephone or letter, or, in the case of “‘repeated violations,’” seeking a court injunction.

---

481 Guidelines Regarding Implementation and Enforcement of Minnesota Clean Air Act, Laws of Minnesota, 1975 Chapter 211 (For Internal MDH Use Only) at 3-4 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

482 Guidelines Regarding Implementation and Enforcement of Minnesota Clean Air Act, Laws of Minnesota, 1975 Chapter 211 (For Internal MDH Use Only) at 4-5 (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). light of ANSR’s single-minded zealous advocacy—by the time MCIAA went into effect on August 1, some of ANSR’s approximately 6,000 members had devoted the month of July to informing businesses of the law’s requirements\textsuperscript{483}—MDH’s delegation of first-line enforcement to this NGO may actually have been designed to enhance the state bureaucracy’s capacity for securing compliance, but farming out enforcement to an organization lacking legislatively conferred powers was nevertheless a sign that the Department did not envision vigorous enforcement as a central dimension of the struggle for Minnesota’s new smoke-free culture.\textsuperscript{464}

And even three years later the Department’s director of the division of environmental health complained that, because he lacked a budget “for an investigation arm to pay closer attention to the 1,200 complaints” that the MDH received annually, he had to “‘steal’ money from other budgets to enforce” the MCIAA. Consequently, its restaurant and resort inspectors were able to visit each establishment only once every 9 to 18 months “even if a complaint [wa]s filed during the interim....\textsuperscript{485}

Chum Bohr, the executive vice president of the Minnesota Restaurant Association, may have been an incompetent lobbyist\textsuperscript{486} whose absence from the crucial Senate committee hearing had made possible restaurant coverage (which otherwise might not have secured a legislative majority for some years), but once the law was in force he charged that “[t]here’s a lot of ambiguity in the law”\textsuperscript{487} and ambiguously stated that restaurants would “adjust the smoking and nonsmoking space to fit the needs of the day.” Kahn’s outright refutation that that position was “entirely incorrect,” inasmuch as “any restaurant, whether or not it sells liquor, must offer a smoke-free section or room,” did not faze the Minnesota Restaurant Association, which, literally on the eve of the MCIAA’s effective date, distributed a legal opinion claiming that “any restaurant selling liquor, wine or beer may call itself a bar and avoid having to set aside a special smoking area—a contention that Bohr himself propagated. His semantic shenanigans prompted a Twin Cities columnist to acknowledge that his “dinosaur mentality” at least had the “virtue of candor” in saying that MRA members “reserve[d] the right to comply or ignore at their discretion.” An especially absurd instance of restaurant owners’ trying to circumvent the law by proclaiming themselves exempt bars was reported to various officials, including the head of the Minnesota Health Department, by three women who, on asking for seats in the nosmoking section of a Howard Johnson’s Restaurant in the Minneapolis suburb of Bloomington, were told by the general manager that, as a bar, Howard Johnson’s was not required to provide a nosmoking section. Unable to reconcile this claim with either Howard Johnson’s self-advertising as a family restaurant or the presence of children on the premises, they left.

Drafting the Department of Health Rules

[T]hose of us in the non-smokers’ rights movement tend to be impatient, action oriented people who do not take time to measure conditions before and after. Clever researchers would have studied the Minnesota scene as soon as the law passed and would have continued sampling as years went by. No such thing happened. Unfortunately, we do not 493Judith Dixon et al. to Mayor Robert Benedict (cc: Warren Lawson), Oct. 30, 1975, in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). This issue was not definitively resolved until 1976 when the Health Department rules went into effect defining “bar” and “restaurant.” See below this ch.

even have Health Department Statistics of the number of Minnesota smokers or the number of cigarettes smoked per smoker pre MCIAA. 494

Initial and Preliminary Drafting Not Fully Embodied in Publicly Accessible Drafts

By early summer the state Health Department had initiated the process of drafting a set of proposed implementing rules. Notice was given to “all interested persons and groups” of the Board of Health’s intent to “obtain information on these rules from non-agency sources.” Among the parties from whom staff “sought input into preparation” of the rules were legislators who authored the bill, ANSR, “other voluntary health organizations which supported the Act,” and “associations of restaurants, office building managers, retail stores,” and other establishments that would be affected by the new law.495 Kent Peterson, the chief drafter, “met with any group that made a request,” including Minneapolis building owners (who “saw the issues of the debate,” whereas businesses outside of the Twin Cities metropolitan area “could just ignore the whole issue”); “even more meetings” took place with the Minnesota Restaurant Association as well as with Representative Kahn and ANSR members, who were “quite involved.”496

Exactly when the Health Department turned out its first draft, is unknown, but the earliest MCIAA document labeled “draft” extant in the Department’s files at the Minnesota State Archives or at the Department itself was dated July 7.497 Of its 496 Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2009).

497 Minnesota Department of Health Adult Health Section, Subject: Draft of Proposed “Rules and Regulations of the Minnesota State Board of Health for Regulating Smoking at Public Places and in Public Meetings” (July 7, 1975), in MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

Some mystery attends the authorship of this draft, which, in light of the scattered topics it addressed and unmediated beginning, presumably represented responses to an already existing draft. The only name on the draft, “Kist” (written in the same handwriting as the date), was presumably that of Anthony Kist, who had been chief of health facilities standards and compliance until shortly before the date of the memo, when he was transferred to another division following revelations of his involvement in a large nursing home scandal. Elizabeth Emerson, Public Health Is People: A History of the Minnesota Department of Health 1949 to 1999, at 232 (n.d.), on http://www.health.state.mn.us/small number of definitional provisions fleshing out statutory terms two were noteworthy. First, an interlinear handwritten addition to the typewritten definition of a “single room” public place (reserving “one side” of which as a nonsmoking area MCIAA declared to be lawful) required the nonsmoking area to consist of “not less than ½” of the total area. The Department’s failure to include such a definition in the final rules was, as noted below, a disappointment to many anti-smokers, including Kahn, but this early insertion suggests controversy within the Department as well.

498 1975 Minn. Stat. ch. 211, § 5, at 633, 634.
499 Based on the handwriting, Peterson guessed that this comment had been written by Deputy Commissioner Dr. Ellen Fifer. Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 15, 2009).
500 The Health Department rejected a definition in terms of a “particular percentage of the room...because it would not be reasonable for all public places,” especially since the Department chose the vague definition “to provide reasonable implementation of the law in public places which consist of a single room and therefore have less flexibility to separate smoking and nonsmoking areas.” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 12 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
501 Two months later, Special Assistant Attorney General Terry O’Brien, who was assigned to advise the Health Department on MCIAA rulemaking, commented to chief drafter Kent Peterson that “[g]iven the Legislature’s decision to use this term [“one side of the room”], I think your proposed definition is as precise as one can establish.” Terry O’Brien to Kent Peterson, Proposed Rules Implementing the Clean Indoor Air Act at 3 (Sept. 4, 1975), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.1.15.1(B). Apparently, the definition was “a contiguous portion of the room, including any seating arrangements.” Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The lack of agency unanimity was also reflected in the penciled comment (in another handwriting), “Not need” to the typescript’s requirement of “reserved for no-smoking” signs every 10 feet marking the boundary of that area—another mandate that was not adopted. In an incompetently drafted section implementing owners’ statutorily imposed duty to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent nosmoking areas, the typescript provided that they “shall” do A “and/or” B without explaining under what circumstances one would suffice. The first involved using “existing physical barriers such as walls and partitions to the extent feasible and extending any existing booth partitions to a minimum height of 60 inches,” whereas the second meant “[p]roviding an isle [sic] space buffer of at least 4 feet,” but subject to the proviso that “the ventilation system(s) in the public place...have ample air handling capacity which will assure that smoke will not be carried by air movement from the ‘smoking permitted’ area to the ‘no-smoking’ area(s).” The proposed height of the barriers was four inches higher than the Department’s ultimate specification, the reason for which change is discussed below. The mandatory extension of existing booth partitions (which a handwritten comment, inserted by Peterson, rejected) seemed oddly compulsory since a public place without walls, partitions, or booths would have been subject to no barrier requirement at all. Moreover, the weasel phrase “to the extent feasible” opened up the interpretive possibility that some owners would be freed from this mandate altogether (and thus, correlative, nonsmokers freely exposed to smoke). In contrast, the four-foot buffer zone, which, like the five-foot barrier, made its first appearance in this draft, was not only not subject to any such feasibility standard, but was attached to a ventilation standard that would have been virtually impossible to satisfy. Since the statute merely provided that “[w]here smoking areas are designated, existing physical barriers and ventilation systems shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent non-smoking areas,” and thus imposed absolutely no protective duties on owners whose public places lacked such barriers or ventilation, the proposed rule presumably also lacked any such authority. Whether the Health Department was Air Act, Rule 2.f) (Draft, Sept. 9, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

---

502 Minnesota Department of Health Adult Health Section, Subject: Draft of Proposed “Rules and Regulations of the Minnesota State Board of Health for Regulating Smoking at Public Places and in Public Meetings” (July 7, 1975), in MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). A further section on ventilation required nosmoking areas always to be designated “in areas where positive pressure is provided by the ventilation system in relation to adjacent areas” so as to “remove any smoke that may be present in adjacent area(s).” Id.

503 1975 Minn. Stat. ch. 211, § 5, at 633, 634.
empowered to weaken the requirement on the basis of feasibility or, conversely, to impose the four-foot space requirement on owners with or without barriers or ventilation both was unclear and, at least as to the latter issue, would soon be contested. Finally, without attending to the complication created by the “and/or” provision, an infelicitously worded, handwritten insertion (by Peterson) added yet another method for minimizing smoke’s toxic effect—“rearrangement of business equipment and customer seating as reasonable to not have smoke”—which would, as discussed later, in somewhat altered form, play an important but complex and ambiguous part in the array of protections embodied in the final rules.

ANSR had also been occupied with drafting its own proposed rules, the earliest set of which it submitted to the Health Department at the end of July. In sync with the times, ANSR stressed that implementation of the MCIAA’s intent to provide a smoke-free environment for nonsmokers in all indoor public areas could be effected “without destroying the right of the smoker by providing him/her with a smoking area within each establishment, if the proprietor so designates” (a possibility, to be sure, that it promptly rendered less probable by providing that “[n]othing in these regulations shall be construed to require the proprietor of a public place to designate a smoking area”). Although ANSR specified that separate smoking lounges had to be “ventilated to remove the toxic air so that it cannot travel to the non-smoking sections,” it was nevertheless willing to permit smoking and nonsmoking sections within a single room so long as they were separated by a partition (of undefined height) or a four-foot-wide aisle. Brandt may have been inspired to sponsor the latter device by his familiarity with its having been proposed in the petition that Action on Smoking and Health had submitted to the U.S. Transportation Department and Federal Aviation Administration in 1969 for promulgation of a rule requiring the separation of smoking and nonsmoking passengers on all commercial domestic air carriers. In it the group’s founder, lawyer John Banzhaf, proposed seating nonsmokers on the left and smokers on the right side, so that “the center aisle would be an effective barrier between the two groups,” although the petition

---

504 Minnesota Department of Health Adult Health Section, Subject: Draft of Proposed “Rules and Regulations of the Minnesota State Board of Health for Regulating Smoking at Public Places and in Public Meetings” (July 7, 1975), in MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

For a modified form of this proposal that later appeared in a draft, see below this ch.

505 Rules and Regulations as submitted by the Association for Non-Smoker’s Rights n.p. [1-3, 6] (July 29, 1975), in MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Many years later Edward Brandt assumed that he was at the very least involved in writing this submission. Telephone interview with Ed Brandt, St. Paul (Oct. 14, 2009).
pointed out that air circulation in an airplane was “typically poor.”

The tragically absurd public health consequences of the four-foot-wide-space proposal—which, as noted, was already embodied in the Health Department’s draft and remained enshrined in the final set of rules—by what was arguably the country’s leading and most successful statewide anti-smoking organization would be spectacularly on display in the testimony of an elementary school teacher at the Health Department’s public hearing on the rules toward the end of the year. A self-professed “sort of nervous” Gerald Ratliff—who had been “extremely involved” in ANSR, devoting countless hours to seeking to persuade businesses to comply with MCIAA—explained that whereas in other elementary schools in his suburban Twin Cities district teachers had negotiated for smoking lounges, his school had a one-room lounge. We have a very small one. I would say it’s [a] ten by twenty or ten by fifteen room, [in] which are four very small tables like in bars. And what they have done is separate the two tables from the other two tables by four feet and let people smoke in there. And it’s the only place for teachers to smoke in the building. So it’s worse than a bar. And I just am wondering if it’s possible to add to...Section 442, or...Section (p) on minimum room size, where you can allow smoking, because it’s really almost absurd because the smoke is so thick, you know. If you have a room that has two chairs in it and you split one chair for smokers and one for non-smokers, it doesn’t seem to be reasonable. So I would suggest adding a minimum room size for the definition of “room.”

No ANSR member took up the cudgels for Ratliff or proposed a change to deal with the extreme exposure to which he had been exposed. Nor did the Department’s principal rule drafter, Kent Peterson, who did answer one of Ratliff’s other questions, respond or suggest that some other provision in the 506 Brandt attached a reprint of the petition to ANSR’s post-Board of Health public hearing statement. CR 115(213) (Dec. 20, 1969) (n.p.), appended to Edward Brandt to Kent Peterson (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Why, given the plentiful experience with the fecklessness of such a “barrier” after the rule had gone into effect on July 10, 1973, anti-smoking advocates were willing to extend the discredited model to other settings is unclear. For the rule, see 14 Code of Federal Regulations Part 252, in CR 38(90):12207-11 (May 10, 1973).

507 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 171 (Dec. 2, 1975).

510 Asked about the complaint decades later, Peterson, while understandably not recalling it, commented that “I think (and you can see in the documents) that there probably was not statutory authority to make as intrusive a requirement as to impose a rules that Ratliff had perhaps overlooked already made the school district’s arrangement unlawful.\textsuperscript{511} Ratliff’s experience was made all the more poignant by the overwhelmingly significant fact, which he did not reveal at the hearing, that only a very small minority of his fellow teachers smoked and yet intolerably polluted the air of the small lounge. Indeed, the very fact that at the time such monopolization of indoor air by smokers was considered the norm, which disqualified complainers as supersensitive deviants to whom business owners resented being required to cater, was precisely the social-psychological-cultural-legal foundation to whose dismantling compliance with the MCIAA would eventually contribute so powerfully. But that process was just being initiated, and for Ratliff and similarly situated exposees it would be many years before the law provided any protection.\textsuperscript{512} (Asked decades later what MCIAA had changed for such nonsmoking teachers, Peterson observed: “For what we now know about the health consequences of air in a confined space only separated by a minimal 4 foot space, nothing changed for their health. It did however send a message to all smokers that the social acceptability of smoking had changed. Smokers were restricted to a space—unfortunately the air was not. ... MCIAA was the initial statement of rights for non-smokers; it took a while to learn how much change was needed to preserve safety of health consequences.”)\textsuperscript{513}

\textsuperscript{511}Ironically, when the nervous non-tenured teacher asked whether he could be fired for asking his employer for clarification of the policy or an improvement of the situation, Assistant Attorney General Terry O’Brien was unwilling to give him an answer without having researched the question, though he “suspect[ed]” that Ratliff could not be fired. He nevertheless went on to suggest that Ratliff could not count on the Health Department for any assistance: “That is a question for the two parties in private actions to work out. [I]f you have a very bad employer or if you have an employer that is running around the room smoking or whatnot, that...will be something that those two will have to work out among [sic] themselves....” Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 173 (Dec. 2, 1975).

\textsuperscript{512}Telephone interview with Gerald Ratliff, St. Paul (Oct. 31, 2009). Ratliff confirmed that separation of smokers and nonsmokers by four-foot-wide spaces in restaurants helped somewhat in some restaurants and not at all in others.

\textsuperscript{513}Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 29, 2009). As for what was known about the health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure, it is noteworthy that when ANSR in a post-Board of Health proposed rules hearing submission presented documentation so that the Board would have access to the facts that had persuaded the legislature to enact the MCIAA, it focused on eye and nasal irritation, headaches, and coughs. Edward Brandt to Kent Peterson (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA,
How deeply compromised MCIAA was by this point was nicely encapsulated in the gloss that Kahn had put on the 1974 version of MCIAA at the House Health Subcommittee hearing on H.F. 2801. Citing the provision declaring that “[s]moking areas shall be separate, of adequate size and with adequate ventilation to fulfill the purpose of this act,” she observed that “I would imagine if you had a small room where it was impossible to provide a separate smoking and a non-smoking area, that would be interpreted to mean that you could not designate it a smoking area. It is only permissive to designate the area, it is not mandatory.”

In contrast to this lax regime in mixed-use rooms, ANSR would have banned smoking entirely in hallways, corridors, skyways, concourses, elevators, restrooms, lobbies, ticket and registration areas, public meetings, and the non-seating areas of shopping malls. Bolder still was the flat ban on smoking in retail stores, businesses, agencies, and public service establishments, except in private enclosed offices and even there only if they were ventilated so as to prevent the smoke from entering public and work areas. Also ahead of its time was the requirement that public places “which have intercom systems shall periodically announce over the system that smoking is not permitted except in designated areas” unless they had “other effective means of enforcing the no-smoking ban.”

Restaurants may have been anti-smokers’ bête noire, but ANSR apparently deemed it too discontinuous with addictive cultural practices even to propose an outright smoking ban; indeed, it also over-generously would have permitted owners to designate up to 50 percent of the total service area as the smoking section (although the smoking prevalence rate was far lower and ANSR’s other proposed proportions in other mixed-use public places such as waiting rooms in health clinics and medical treatment centers, government building smoking lounges, various lobbies, and seating sections of shopping malls...
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

were limited to one-third). Then, however, ANSR cast off this timidity by subjecting this provision to the de facto impossible-to-satisfy condition that the smoking section “be properly ventilated to prohibit [sic] the smoke from entering the other areas of the restaurant.” Almost as intrepid was ANSR’s definition of the statutorily exempt “bar”: to qualify, 90 percent of an establishment’s revenue was required to derive from the sale of liquor—a hurdle whose stringency would, in the event, far exceed the definitional criterion that the Health Department would eventually devise. ANSR’s proposal also raced beyond the Department’s ultimate rule in totally banning smoking in all classrooms in educational facilities, but, again, it acquiesced in the vested privileges of addicted professors and staff by permitting their private, enclosed offices to be designated smoking areas\(^\text{518}\) (even though and while students might be required to meet with them there).

On August 4, Peterson sent Special Assistant Attorney General Terry O’Brien for comment a draft of the “format” he intended to use to draft the rules. By this point he had already finished preliminary drafts of Rules 1 and 3, which, together with drafts of Rules 2 and 4, were to be finished the next day, when he was going to be discussing them with “interested parties during the next two weeks.” He also informed O’Brien that a draft (of the complete rules) would be available for review by the Board of Health by August 29. Although neither the first two drafts, which Peterson attached, nor the second two are extant, a copy of the format, which was simply the table of contents of the rules, has survived.\(^\text{519}\)

Already this earliest skeletal structure of the rules closely resembled the final

\(^{518}\)Rules and Regulations as submitted by the Association for Non-Smoker’s Rights n.p. [4-5] (July 29, 1975), in MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\(^{519}\)Kent Peterson to Terry O’Brien, Subject: Review of Matters of Format, Preliminary Drafts and Jurisdiction Issues (Aug. 4, 1975), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.I.15.1(B). Presumably the rulemaking schedule was delayed and the Aug. 29 deadline became Sept. 12 as noted below. Peterson posed several questions to his legal adviser the most interesting of which dealt with whether it was lawful to enforce MCIAA in patient areas of hospitals and nursing homes: “The reasoning against application to patient areas is that the area is ‘rented’ to a patient for his/her temporary use. However, I am in doubt regarding application to large wards of patients...or double occupancy rooms.” Id. The rules ultimately did apply to patient areas, but O’Brien’s response, which he may have given orally, is not preserved. Peterson also asked about MCIAA’s applicability to federal government buildings and interstate transportation. Finally, Peterson also mentioned that on Aug. 7 he and O’Brien were scheduled to meet with Judith Pinke (assistant to the Labor and Industry commissioner) and Ray Adell (an attorney in that department) to clarify the statutory exemption of factories and warehouses from Health Department jurisdiction and the meaning of an enclosed, indoor public place serving as a workplace. No record of that discussion appears to be extant. work product except in one striking respect\(^{520}\), whereas the key provision of this draft was framed in terms of implementing the statutory requirement of “minimizing the toxic effects” of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas by means of existing physical barriers, ventilation systems, and seating arrangements,\(^{521}\) later Peterson re-assigned its role to the only partly statutory term “acceptable smoke-free area.” MCIAA used the term “smoke-free area” only in the ambiguous context of imposing on the proprietor responsibility for making “reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place”\(^{-}\)—but solely with respect to one of four such alternative types of efforts, namely, “arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area.”\(^{522}\) This crucial phrase\(^{523}\) underwent several changes with regard to its placement and function in the rules; the exact chronology of its insertion into the draft rules is uncertain because the August draft(s) is/are not extant, but its later fate is instructive: after two decades of enforcement agents’ travails with anti-smokers who (cantankerously but understandably) took “acceptable smoke-free area” literally, the Health Department decommissioned the source of the truth-in-packaging dispute.\(^{524}\)

The next steps in the rule drafting process are difficult to reconstruct gaplessly because what was apparently the first complete draft, that of August 11, has not survived, although its contents are, to some extent, known\(^{525}\) from... detailed comments that Assistant Attorney General O’Brien sent Peterson on September 4.\textsuperscript{526} Deeming the draft “an excellent starting point in getting these rules into effect,” O’Brien generally focused on pointing out to Peterson ambiguities (such as the qualifier “reasonable”) that vested too much discretion in state officials and that regulatees could manipulate into loopholes.\textsuperscript{527} Of particular interest is O’Brien’s discussion of the term “smoke-free,” which Peterson had apparently used in the sub-rule governing restaurants (and perhaps several other public places). O’Brien first dwelt on the term in a general section emphasizing that “[s]tandards or criteria for determining a result should be distinguished from statements of results.” He identified “smoke-free” as merely stating a conclusion rather than “the analysis by which that conclusion was reached.” However, in order to be enforcible, the rule had to “state the methods with which to determine whether or not an area is ‘smoke-free.’"528 Under the specific discussion of its use in the restaurant sub-rule, O’Brien then posed three important questions: “Who decides what is ‘smoke-free?’” [sic]. Once decided, how is it proven? What demonstrable evidence could be introduced to indicate compliance or non-compliance in the event of dispute?529 Presumably it was this methodological-interpretive admonition that prompted Peterson in the next iteration of the draft to adopt the heavily freighted phrase “acceptable smoke-free area” and to define it in terms of physical criteria—height of barriers, width of aisle spaces, air changes per hour of ventilation systems, and concentration of carbon monoxide—that an inspector could (theoretically) readily measure.530

\textsuperscript{526}Terry O’Brien to Kent Peterson, Proposed Rules Implementing the Clean Indoor Air Act (Sept. 4, 1975), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.I.15.1(B).

\textsuperscript{527}O’Brien did not cover all points at this time, but only “some major areas of concerns,” deferring a more in-depth memo until Peterson submitted a final proposed draft. Terry O’Brien to Kent Peterson, Proposed Rules Implementing the Clean Indoor Air Act at 1-2 (Sept. 4, 1975), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.I.15.1(B).

To be sure, this definition in terms of means rather than results531 left open the question as to whether barriers and spaces, which turned out to be the only means that owners ever used, could in fact produce smoke-freedom (acceptable to whom?) rather than meaningless circularity insensitive to the substantive public health objectives underlying the drive for state intervention. That ahistorical hindsight was not needed to question the robust protectiveness of barriers or spaces was demonstrated a little later by the complaint of no less an authority figure than the assistant personnel director for the Minnesota Department of Public Safety. Two weeks after the Board of Health had held a public hearing on its proposed rules (which included the option of separating smoking and nosmoking areas by 56-inch-high barriers or four-foot-wide spaces), Jean Rozeske submitted a comment on official letterhead contesting the adequacy of the rules for an eight-hour-a-day working environment “based on experience in a work area which essentially complies with two of the criteria set forth by the Board of Health in reference to physical barriers and separating space. Although these conditions are met, I continue to suffer with daily headaches, congestion, sore throats, and difficulty with breathing.”532 In the event, such a statement was 528Terry O’Brien to Kent Peterson, Proposed Rules Implementing the Clean Indoor Air Act at 1 (Sept. 4, 1975), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.I.15.1(B).

529Terry O’Brien to Kent Peterson, Proposed Rules Implementing the Clean Indoor Air Act at 4 (Sept. 4, 1975), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.I.15.1(B).
530Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2.i) (Draft Sept. 9, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
531Only the CO concentration was a result, but, as noted below, inspectors never measured it. Moreover, in the event, particulate matter, which was far more lethal, was less amenable to measurement at the time.
532Jean Rozeske to Warren Lawson (Dec. 17, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, unable to dissuade the Board of Health from upholding the Health Department’s unsubstantiated assertion that 56-inch-high barriers were “sufficient to completely interrupt the direct flow of smoke from seated persons and to provide deterrence from indirect shifting of smoke.”
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Publicly Available Drafts of the Board of Health’s Proposed Rules Prior to Its Public Hearing in December

On September 12, the Health Department sent to all Board of Health members a draft of proposed rules, requesting them to make suggestions for the proposal being prepared by the Department’s staff. Whether that draft is extant is uncertain because when, on October 1, Dr. Warren Lawson, the Department’s executive officer, attached “[t]he staff recommendation for proposed rules” to the materials he sent the Board members for their meeting on October 9, it was unclear whether that iteration incorporated the members’ suggestions that he had solicited on September 12. To be sure, on September 11 the press obtained a copy of the 19-page proposal (stamped “not official, draft only”), which the Department was sending to restaurant owners, hotels, office managers, citizens groups, and other interested parties. The copy of a draft preserved in the Minnesota State Archives bearing the date of September 9 and otherwise corresponding to the press account of it may be the draft that Lawson sent to Board members on September 12. The only reason for uncertainty as to whether the September 9 draft was identical to that of September 12 was that on September 10, Peterson held a meeting attended, at the very least, by Neil 536Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act (Draft 9/9/75) (every page is stamped “Not Official Draft Only”), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

Solberg, chairman of the Downtown Committee of the Building Owners and Managers Association of Minneapolis, whose members owned or controlled 10 million square feet of office space, Raymond Jones, the director of administration of Pillsbury Company, and a representative of IDS Properties, Inc., a subsidiary of Investors Diversified Services, Inc., which owned several million square feet of downtown Minneapolis office space, but presumably also by other Twin Cities firms covered by MCIAA. That the written statement by Solberg (which appears to have been prepared for oral presentation) and a letter by Jones, both dated September 10, made it clear that they were responding to the (aforementioned no longer extant) draft of August 18 suggests that they were not yet privy to the September 9 draft.

Solberg, on behalf of the Minneapolis building owners and managers, sought to identify a dichotomy in the proposed rules between “public facilities” or “public areas,” on the one hand, and the “office building industry” on the other. Whereas, in his group’s view, the rules were “heavily oriented” toward the former, they were “extremely ambiguous and inadequate” regarding the latter: “We are essentially dealing with two distinctly separate problems: controlled office space with existing highly scientific work flow procedures which govern the positioning and layout of employee work stations as opposed to public areas.”

This alleged contradiction between profitably and scientifically operated offices and government-mandated public health intervention became the hallmark rhetorical ploy of Twin Cities big business’s opposition to the MCIAA rules. To one of the rules’ key operating provisions concerning the

---

537 Statement of the Minneapolis Association of Building Owners and Manager Association [sic] Relating to Proposed Clean Indoor Air Rules at 2 (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

538 Raymond Jones/Pillsbury Co. to Kent Peterson (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

539 Because it seems implausible that Peterson would have withheld the September 9 draft from precisely the businesses whose input he was seeking, it is possible that he at the very least revealed to them whatever changes he had made since the August 18 draft, that they commented on them, and that he then made some last-minute changes in the draft that the press received on September and that Lawson distributed to the Board on September 12. If not, then the September 9 draft was the September 12 draft.

540 Statement of the Minneapolis Association of Building Owners and Manager Association [sic] Relating to Proposed Clean Indoor Air Rules at 1 (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

541 In 1975, two of the principal resisters, Pillsbury Co. and Honeywell Inc. had sales of $1.2 billion and revenues $2.8 billion, respectively. “Pillsbury Reports Record Sales and Earnings for Year,” NYT, June 27, 1975 (57); “Honeywell and Control Data Show
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

minimization of the toxic effects of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas the owners unconditionally objected on the grounds that it was “undefinable in terms of specifics and could lead to undue confusion as well as dogma [sic] of requirements based on non-engineering criteria”\textsuperscript{542} without offering a corrective. It is difficult to discern any rational kernel of BOMA’s objection (other than a possible failure to construe the inter-linked proposed rules properly), since, although at this stage the Health Department had operationalized its minimization sub-rule only in terms of unquantified “considerations,”\textsuperscript{543} which did apply to offices and office buildings, at the same time the “acceptable smoke-free area” standard, which also applied to these specific locations,\textsuperscript{544} was defined by \textsuperscript{542}Statement of the Minneapolis Association of Building Owners and Manager Association [sic] Relating to Proposed Clean Indoor Air Rules at 1 (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

---

\textsuperscript{543}Rule 3.d) required owners who designated smoking-permitted areas to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent non smoking areas according to the following considerations:
1) In selection of the smoking permitted area, existing physical barriers including walls, pillars and partitions shall be utilized.
2) Designation of the smoking permitted area shall contemplate ventilation capacity and general air movement in the “public place or meeting room.” The general air movement shall not be from the smoking permitted area to the no smoking area.
3) Arrangement of seating shall provide a distance between the smoking permitted area and no-smoking area.

Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.d) at 8 (Draft 9/9/75) (every page is stamped “Not Official Draft Only”), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). It is assumed here that the structure of the pertinent sections of the Aug. 18 draft to which the building owners were responding was sufficiently similar to that of Sept. 9 to support the analysis of the owners’ criticism. The discussion of O’Brien’s memo on Peterson’s Aug. 11 draft and of the latter’s “format” suggest that it was. If it was not, then Solberg’s comments could still not have persuaded Peterson to quantitate the minimization provision since Peterson would already done so in the Sept. 9 draft.

\textsuperscript{544}The sub-rule governing offices provided that in an open work area office that was not used by the public, but was a workplace “occupied by both smokers and non-smokers,” the owner would be considered in compliance with the MCIAA if he used any of these three mechanisms: (1) prohibition of smoking in the entire area; (2) prohibition of smoking in the entire work area and provision of a smoking lounge in a separate area; or (3) permission to smoke “in one or more sections of the open work area which are used exclusively by smokers and people who permit smoking, but prohibit[ion] in all sections of the open work area in which people do not expressly permit smoking. Smoking permitted areas shall be limited to assure that the remainder of the room is an acceptable smoke-free area as defined in Rule 2(i).” Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.c) at 10-12 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2.i) at 4 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). For the text, see below this ch. This provision does raise the possibility that the Aug. 18 draft had been superseded by that of Sept. 9. The owners complained that the “seating requirement calling for ‘reasonable distance’ is not specific and could indeed cause hardship and confusion to all parties.” Statement of the Minneapolis Association of Building Owners and Manager Association [sic] Relating to Proposed Clean Indoor Air Rules at 2 (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). On Sept. 4 O’Brien had advised Peterson that a “rule setting a standard of ‘reasonable distance’ is pregnant with problems. The word ‘reasonable’ states a conclusion not a process. What is reasonable? Who decides what is reasonable? On what standard is reasonableness determined. What is ‘reasonable’ to Phyllis Kahn may be patently unreasonable to Stan Mayslack [a former professional wrestler and restaurant owner]. You might consider a specified distance as being reasonable.” Terry O’Brien to Kent Peterson, Proposed Rules Implementing the Clean Indoor Air Act at 4 (Sept. 4, 1975), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.I.15.1(B). Although O’Brien referred to this provision as Rule 3.2.(c)(ii), it appeared to correspond to Rule 3(d)(3) in Peterson’s aforementioned Aug. 4 “Format,” which dealt with the arrangement of seating (to separate smoking and nonsmoking sections in order to implement owners’ duty to minimize the toxic effects of smoking on adjacent areas). By the time of the Sept. 9 draft Peterson had dropped “reasonable” altogether from the minimization provision, leaving only a “distance,” but at the same time requiring the aisle space under the definition of “acceptable smoke-free area” to be at least four feet. Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.d)3) at 8 and Rule 2.i) at 4 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Peterson later explained his initial failure to quantify certain standards as a function of the fact that it was “difficult to find specific measurements with some evidence. I used the best measurements that I could justify based upon current knowledge.” Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 18, 2009). O’Brien and Solberg clearly agreed on this point on which Peterson had accommodated them, but it seems odd that the building owners would have been wasting everyone’s time at the Sept. 10 meeting criticizing a superseded draft. The explanation may be that the written version of Solberg’s oral presentation had been prepared before Sept. 9 (or whenever owners had been apprised of the new draft) and did not in its entirety reflect what the owners actually said at the Sept. 10 meeting. This confusion is exacerbated by the fact that one of the participants later thanked Peterson for the “opportunity of expressing our feelings toward seeking a special exemption finally became obvious in their last specific comment keyed to the sub-rule governing offices: “Smoking in office areas is difficult to post and control because of the innumerable work stations involved, the movement of people from station to station, and the very fact that open area plans and work stations have passageways which can support smokers and non-smokers alike. It would appear that this section should be eliminated as well as any other pertinent part within this text in that the restrictions on smoking could relate to public areas in public buildings or perhaps other public areas in private buildings when so designated properly.”
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

This special pleading on behalf of office workplaces that the general public did not frequent made no impression on Peterson (who many years later explained): “Since the law includ[ed] places of employment of that type, we could not consider exempting them. We talked to them to try to find workable ways to make it possible for them to manage while still enforcing the law.” The building owners then concluded by asserting that the August 18 draft rules “place an undue burden on the employer’s ability to administer effectively together with an unnecessary financial burden.” Solberg also accused the “text” of being “completely unaware of the engineering and architectural efforts that will be required to satisfy these general objectives.”

At the end of his prepared statement Solberg turned the discussion over to Jones “so that the employer’s position might be shared with you [i.e., Peterson].” The “brief comment” that Jones then made was presumably not so detailed or specific as his letter of September 10. The August 18 draft, which Raymond Jones, who would continue attacking the rules throughout the rulemaking the new draft” at the meeting. Larry Strohkirch (IDS Properties, Inc.) to Kent Peterson (Sept. 30, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Without any direct recall, decades later Peterson noted that before fax machines and the internet: “If there was a meeting on Sept. 10 and there was a draft approved for release the prior day, there would not have been an opportunity to give it to them earlier.” Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 14, 2009).

546Statement of the Minneapolis Association of Building Owners and Manager Association [sic] Relating to Proposed Clean Indoor Air Rules at 2 (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

547Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 14, 2009).

548Statement of the Minneapolis Association of Building Owners and Manager Association [sic] Relating to Proposed Clean Indoor Air Rules at 2 (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

549Statement of the Minneapolis Association of Building Owners and Manager Association [sic] Relating to Proposed Clean Indoor Air Rules at 2 (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

2378
process, criticized appears, at least with respect to the provisions at issue (smoking/nonsmoking areas in single room public places and office space), to have been identical to that of September 9/12. Jones insisted that it was “imperative to clarify the wording because this is a critical operating issue. Office space is arranged to aid employees in the performance of their jobs.” After quoting an industrial psychologist who had argued that because “[f]unctional, behavioral and technical aspects determine the layout of individual work places, groups and departments,...the building is built around the organization, the organization is not squeezed into predetermined spaces,” Jones informed Peterson that Pillsbury had spent $1.49 per square foot for studying, planning, and the layout of two 28,147 square-foot “largely open-area floors to assure the effective operation of the units located there.” From there he jumped to unsubstantiated and fanciful anti-procrustean claims of pending commercial doom under MCIAA. According to the first opaque scenario, if the firm designated all non-private office space nonsmoking, the “loss of productivity” would amount to $462,000 annually—“[i]f an estimated 264 smoking employees in our Headquarters offices were absent from their work station one hour per day to visit Smoking Permitted areas...” Under the second scenario, which “would quite possibly” bring about an ever greater productivity loss, designating one side of a room smoking and the other nonsmoking would cause “many employees to travel to another part of the floor to contact those with whom they closely work”—a travelog that “contradicts” the aforementioned “scientific study.” Under a capitalist nightmare of a prestidigitated example, Jones claimed that “to separate the Commodity Analysts, Decision Makers and Internal and External Information Systems could easily cost us $10,000.00 in 10 minutes with a $.10 per bushel market on 100,000 bushels of wheat by delaying our reaction time.” Having limned these slippery slopes to bankruptcy, Jones requested that MDH reword the “single room” and office space provisions to authorize owners to “[d]esignate individual work station areas as No Smoking or Smoking Permitted areas in open office space” in order to “permit continued high productivity, scientifically planned.”

---

50 At the Board of Health public hearing Jones presented the same criticism of designating one side of a room smoking and the other nonsmoking on the grounds that it interfered with “scientific” work flow. Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 116 (Dec. 2, 1975).

51 Jones’s next letter of Sept. 26, as noted below, indicated that some changes had been made between Aug. 18 and Sept. 12.

52 Raymond Jones/Pillsbury Co. to Kent Peterson (Sept. 10, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The press picked up this tale of huge losses occasioned by interference with grain-buying teams’ need for instant reactions to rapid
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

As asked decades later about the reality content of such complaints, Peterson observed that “I would not be surprised if the specific example cited from Pillsbury would have been viewed as reality in 1975 whereas it’s not now.”

Unfortunately, Jones did not engage in a dialog with an employee at the downtown St. Paul office of a large insurance firm who complained to the Health Department in 1975 about being subjected to the kind of individual work station regime for which Pillsbury was pleading, under which “there is really no smoke free area at all.” She added that if management did not like the efficiency consequences of separating smokers and nonsmokers, “then the answer of course is to prohibit smoking altogether. I am paid to work. I resent employees who are paid to smoke.”

(Nothing in MCIAA, as Brandt later observed of Jones’s complaint about alleged costs of compliance, “requires any employer to pay employees who are off smoking and not working.”)

The September 9/12 draft included several crucial provisions that had to carry the burden of both implementing the legislature’s unexpressed intent as to how capacious or narrow the outright prohibition of smoking was to be and, correlatively, how numerous and extensive or few and confined the exceptional designated smoking areas and interpreting the expressed directive that “existing physical barriers and ventilation systems shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent non-smoking areas.” The key operative term in this context was the “Acceptable Smoke-free Area,” which, oddly, was not keyed to MCIAA’s only use of the term “smoke-free area”—namely, owners’ § 6 duty to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place by (a) posting appropriate signs; (b) arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area; (c) asking fluctuations in market prices. Austin Wehrwein, “Nonsmokers Rights Law Sparks Minnesota Dispute,” WP, Oct. 6, 1975, Bates No. TIMN0462140. At the Board of Health public hearing the Northwestern National Life Insurance Co.—40 percent of whose 650 employees at its headquarters in Minneapolis smoked—aligned itself with Pillsbury’s complaints and proposed solutions. Preposterously, the company also asked the Health Department to consider “treat us like an office supporting a factory....” Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 155-60 (quote at 160) (Dec. 2, 1975).

553 Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 14, 2009). With regard to the practical significance of such claims, Peterson added: “Those broad estimates of dollars lost in productivity don’t have much impact when writing the rule. I have always thought that good managers can adjust work circumstances to maintain productivity. However, the rule had to be justified as reasonableness and their input meant something there.” Id.

554 Nancy Cincoski to Secretary and Executive Officer of the Board (Dec. 17, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

555 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 161 (Dec. 2, 1975).

556 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 5, at 633, 634.
smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke; or (d) any other means which may be appropriate.” Indeed, this version of the draft rules dealt with this duty only indirectly (without even mentioning “smoke-free place”) by noting that: “Permissible alternatives to the mechanisms described in Section 6...may include any of the following: 1) If on entry into the location all persons are asked their preference for a smoking permitted or a no smoking area, then the proprietor...shall be deemed in compliance if at least one sign advising the public of this mechanism is conspicuously posted at all entrances normally used by the public. 2) (Other mechanisms are being prepared.)” This alternative presumably qualified as one of the statutory other appropriate means. Instead of regulatorily implementing the “smoke-free area” provision in its narrow statutory context, the Health Department applied it to various “Categories of Affected Places” covered by Rule 4. First, however, drafter Peterson defined an “Acceptable Smoke-free Area” as an area of the public place or public meeting where smoking is prohibited and at least one of the following conditions exist [sic]:

1) There is a continuous, physical barrier of at least five feet in height to separate the smoking permitted and no smoking areas.

2) There is an isle [sic] of space of at least four feet in width to separate the smoking permitted and no smoking areas.

3) The ventilation system in the room containing both a smoking permitted and no smoking area has total air circulation (recirculated plus air) not less than six air changes per hour including supply of tempered air not less than 7½ cubic feet per minute per person.

4) By using a combination of the ventilation system, isle [sic] space or physical barriers, the concentration of carbon monoxide in the no smoking area shall at no time exceed 10 milligrams per cubic meter (9 parts per million).

5) (Other acceptable standards being prepared)

---

557 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.e) at 9 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Since the MDH abandoned this structure in later drafts, other mechanisms were not prepared. In the next iteration this provision dropped the express reference to § 6 of MCIAA and deemed the preference asking a “reasonable effort...to prevent smoking...” Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.e) at 7 (Draft 10/9/1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B); Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.e) at 7 (n.d. [Oct. 1, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH).

558 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2.i) at 4 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
The application to individual affected places was exemplified by restaurants, in which smoking was limited to designated smoking areas, the size and location of which smoking-permitted areas were required to be “limited to provide an acceptable smoke-free area in the remainder of the establishment.”

The same requirement to provide/assure an “acceptable smoke-free area” was also applied to other locations, including retail establishments, office areas, public conveyances, passenger terminals, health care facilities (including patient dining rooms or activity rooms and lounges), public meeting rooms, and educational facilities.

Since the Health Department at this stage did not explain the meaning of the interpretive gloss “acceptable” or the reason for its insertion, let alone the scientific bases for the barrier heights or aisle space as guarantors of smoke-freedom, their analysis is postponed until the account here reaches the stage in the process when such justifications were forthcoming. Noteworthy is the great emphasis that this draft placed on implementing the mandate in § 5 of MCIAA that: “Where smoking areas are designated, existing physical barriers and ventilation systems shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent non-smoking areas.” An entire sub-section of Rule 3 was devoted to “Minimizing the Toxic Effects,” which was eliminated from the October iteration, which, in turn, inserted in its stead a subsection generally operationalizing “Acceptable Smoke-free Area” in lieu of splintering its application to the aforementioned selected locations. The September draft required owners, where they designated smoking-permitted areas, to carry out the minimization “according to the following considerations: 1) In selection of the smoking permitted areas, existing physical barriers including walls, pillars and partitions shall be used. 2) Designation of the smoking permitted areas shall contemplate ventilation capacity and general air movement in the ‘public place or meeting room.’ The general air movement shall not be from the smoking permitted area to the non smoking area. 3) Arrangement of seating shall provide a distance between the smoking permitted area and no smoking area.”

These Health

---

559 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.a) at 9 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The same mandate applied to the designated no-smoking side of a single-room restaurant. Id.

560 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.b), c), d) e), f), i), and k) at 10-17 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The mandate did not, however, apply to auditoriums, arenas, gymnasiums, theaters, hotels, motels, or places of work (unless the latter were located in any of the aforementioned public places).

561 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.d) at Department proposed rules thus reproduced the fecklessness of the MCIAA while adding rules too vague or weak to be usefully enforcible (such as “contemplate”). Like the statute, the rules did nothing to protect nonsmokers from secondhand smoke in public places that lacked pre-existing barriers or ventilation systems. Why the seating arrangement provision did not require even the inadequate four-foot space called for by the “acceptable smoke-free area” the Department did not explain.

Having previously concluded that it lacked authority to prescribe any quantitative apportionment of the space, the Health Department was able to shed only weak light on the opaque determination in § 5 of the MCIAA—namely, that the owner of a single-room public place was compliant if he reserved and posted “one side of the room...as a no-smoking area” was to define “one side” as “a contiguous portion of the room, including any seating arrangements”562 and to require that the “size of the no smoking area shall be at least proportionate to the preference of patrons of that establishment for such an area.”563

The proposed resolution of the contentious issue of regulating smoking in the open work area of an office (defined as a location in which “professional activities or clerical and administrative activities are the principal usage”)564 that was not used by the general public but was occupied by smoking and nonsmoking workers conferred discretion on owners to achieve compliance with their responsibility under § 6 of MCIAA to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking” by using any of three mechanisms: (1) banning smoking in the whole area; (2) banning smoking in the whole area and providing a smoking lounge in a separate room; and/or (3) permitting smoking in one or more sections “used

---

8 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Like the “acceptable smoke-free area” provision, the minimization mandate was applied to selected categories of affected places, including restaurants, retail establishments, offices, public conveyances, passenger terminals, auditoriums, arenas, gymnasiums, theaters, hotels, motels, public meeting rooms, and educational facilities.

562 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2.f) at 3 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

563 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.b) at 6 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

564 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2.j) at 4 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The criterion that the draft used to identify office space covered by DLI’s rules was whether it “supports activities which are principally to manufacture or assemble goods, products or merchandise for sale, or to store goods, products or merchandise not for the purpose of retail sale....” Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.c) at 12 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

exclusively by smokers and people who permit smoking” but prohibiting it in all sections in which “people do not expressly permit smoking.” Inherent in the third mechanism was the fatal defect of undermining protection for nonsmokers by subjecting them to the full brunt of precisely the kind of workplace pressure to go along to get along that would perpetuate their self-injurious acquiescence that MCIAA was meant to abolish in favor of compulsory norms.

In any public conveyances with a capacity of 10 or more passengers (including the driver) the Health Department authorized owners to designate smoking-permitted areas, thus implicitly prohibiting smoking altogether in public transport with eight or fewer passengers (plus the driver). How owners would go about “assur[ing] an acceptable smoke-free for non-smokers” or minimizing toxic effects in such close quarters as in a bus the rules failed to spell out. Such a seemingly hopeless task of compliance might suggest that the Department was seeking to effectuate a de facto ban on smoking there, but the later course of the drafting process would refute such a hypothesis.

The more than two pages that the Health Department devoted to health care facilities constituted the most extensive attention bestowed on any category of affected places. However, despite patients’ greater than average vulnerability to the health impacts of smoke exposure, the rules were hardly the most stringent. For patient bed areas the rules offered two alternative procedures. First, in a scenario not unbridgeably remote from the “More doctors smoke Camels than any other cigarette” ads that had been terminated more than two decades earlier, the administration could ask prospective patients whether they preferred a smoking-permitted or a no-smoking area, assigning rooms “according to this preference when space is available.” If no space was available in either the no-smoking or smoking areas, then “smoking shall be prohibited in all patient bed areas except areas which are used exclusively by smoker patients and patients who have expressed permission for smoking”—thus, once again, subjecting nonsmokers to social pressure to acquiesce in smoking at a time in their lives when they might have the least social-psychological wherewithal to mount resistance. On top of this lax governance, the Health Department also prioritized hospital administrators’ wishes over the availability of warnings to nonsmokers by allowing health care facilities to satisfy the signage requirements merely by posting a single sign at the entrance to each wing or floor stating that smoking was prohibited except in designated areas. Alternatively, if management did not assign bed areas according to patient preference, smoking had to be prohibited in all patient bed areas except rooms “occupied exclusively by smoker patients or patients who have expressed permission for smoking”—setting up the same stress test for nonsmokers.\footnote{Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.f)1) at 13-14 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).}

---

565 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.a) at 11 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). This special sub-rule was presumably meant to instantiate MCIAA § 6(d), which provided that owners could also use “any other means which may be appropriate” in complying with their duty to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking....”

2384

Imposing the burden of enforcement on sick nonsmokers stood in sharp contrast to the endorsement in 1974 by the board of the Minnesota Hospital Association of a unanimous resolution of the Minnesota State Medical Association urging hospitals to allow patients to smoke in multi-bed rooms only with the approval of their own doctors and that of the non-smoking patients’ doctors.\footnote{“Hospital Unit Seeks Tobacco-Sale Ban,” \textit{MT}, June 15, 1974 (10B:5-7). Though only a non-binding recommendation to hospitals, the vote was considered a “major victory” for ANSR, which had been trying to use hospitals to set an example. The recommendation also included a ban on hospital sales of tobacco.}

Finally, in order to effectuate the provision in § 7 of MCIAA for waiving the act’s requirements if the Board of Health determined that there were “compelling reasons” and the waiver would not significantly affect nonsmokers’ health and comfort, the September draft rules required applicants to prove that the law’s implementation would both “[r]esult in the public place[’s] not being able to provide the service for which the place is intended, and...[e]ndanger the ability of the public place to meet its costs for operation”; the draft also required that, despite the waiver, the CO concentration “in all sections of the public place at no time will exceed” the regulatorily mandated 10 milligrams per cubic meter for an “acceptable smoke-free area.” In connection with making these eligibility determinations the Board of Health permitted itself “access to all records of the public place pertinent to such application”\footnote{Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 5 at 18-19 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). By October the Health Department dropped the requirement that the applicant prove that implementation would result in “not being to provide the service....” Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 5.b) at 11 (Oct. 1/9, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (and copy furnished by MDH).}—an intrusion into the documentation of the factors underlying regulated businesses’ profitability that the Board/Department modified by the time it made its proposed rules available \footnote{567} Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.f)1) at 13-14 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

---

\footnote{568} “Hospital Unit Seeks Tobacco-Sale Ban,” \textit{MT}, June 15, 1974 (10B:5-7). Though only a non-binding recommendation to hospitals, the vote was considered a “major victory” for ANSR, which had been trying to use hospitals to set an example. The recommendation also included a ban on hospital sales of tobacco.
\footnote{569} Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 5 at 18-19 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). By October the Health Department dropped the requirement that the applicant prove that implementation would result in “not being to provide the service....” Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 5.b) at 11 (Oct. 1/9, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (and copy furnished by MDH).}
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

at the public hearing in December.\textsuperscript{570}

While drafting the proposed regulations, staff of the Health Department—whose head, Dr. Warren Lawson, was a heavy smoker\textsuperscript{571}—met, after the State Board of Health had given notice of its intent to seek information from sources outside the agency; these “interested parties” included “legislators who authored the Act, voluntary health organizations which supported the Act and associations of establishments affected by the Act.”\textsuperscript{572} Asked whether the Department had received any guidance from the legislature as to how to frame the regulations, Peterson, their chief drafter, noted that the only legislator with whom he had met was Kahn herself, but that her voice had been only one of many and her views had not been accorded any greater weight than anyone else’s. The principal constraint that Peterson faced in drafting the rules was the issue of how far they could extend without imposing an “undue burden” on businesses (including their profitability) so that they could be reasonably implemented by virtually all businesses. By the same token, the regulations had to accommodate the “feeling that there was a right to smoke.”\textsuperscript{573} Since MCIAA neither explicitly nor implicitly embodied either a right to smoke or any indication that the legislature intended the regulatory agency to subordinate its public policy of protecting the public health to business profits—except for the provision for a waiver, which owners had to request and which therefore operated apart from the general framework, but nevertheless could not be granted if it significantly affected nonsmokers’ health and comfort\textsuperscript{574}—the drafter’s acquiescence in such \textsuperscript{570}“The Board has the right to request any other information reasonably necessary to determine the merits of the waiver application. Failure to submit such requested information may result in denial of the waiver application.” Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 445(a) at 15 (n.d. [Dec. 2, 1975]), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The provision was retained in the final rules.

\textsuperscript{571}Telephone interview with David Giese, Hopkins, MN (Apr. 5, 2009) (Lawson’s administrative assistant at the time). In 1977 Lawson, together with some other public figures such as the president of the state American Cancer Society, signed a pledge not to smoke on no-smoking day (D-Day) 1978. Elizabeth Emerson, Public Health Is People: A History of the Minnesota Department of Health 1949 to 1999, at 235 (n.d.), on http://www.health.state.mn.us/library/dhsjournals/Chapter9.pdf an overarching constraint on the shielding of nonsmokers from secondhand smoke exposure suggested that the regulations would not even reach the outer limits of a statute that was already deeply flawed by its permissive authorization of designated smoking areas. Peterson’s pragmatic defense of the regulation emphasized that: “At the time, many felt that the separate areas did protect us non-smokers better than without the law. ... I believe that an unacceptably strict law and rules would have been ignored or, worse yet, repealed before acceptance of non-smoking areas were [sic] shown. Investigation and enforcement of more stringent standards was not an option.”

\textsuperscript{572}Consideration of Proposal to Authorize Public Hearing Relating to Regulation for the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, in Warren Lawson to Members of the State Board of Health, Re: Agenda Material for October 9 Meeting (Oct. 1, 1975) (copy furnished by Minnesota Health Department).

\textsuperscript{573}Telephone interview with Kent Peterson, Minneapolis (Apr. 1, 2009).

\textsuperscript{574}1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 7, subd. 1, at 633, 635.

The possibility of such a backlash was visibly on display in a letter to Peterson in mid-September from Representative Bruce Nelsen, a Republican who had voted against H.F. 79 on final passage in the House but then voted for it after the Senate had amended it. While purporting to view MCIAA as an “admirable attempt to resolve a problem of growing concern” that “eventually will help mold and alter public attitudes about the rights of non-smokers,” Nelsen reported that “organized groups supporting this legislation are now trying to do by rule and regulation what they did not obtain through legislation.” He acknowledged that “there would be many different ideas of the exact legislative intent of this bill,” but he was nevertheless “absolutely amazed” when he read about some proposals for which he insisted that, as he saw it, legislative intent did not call such as “[i]nstallation of ventilating fans; required four-foot isles [sic]; requiring large and expensive signs at all entries; hiring a person to make announcements over the PA system or maintaining a four-foot buffer zone between smoking and non-smoking areas.” What his animus boiled down to was that many such proposals were “really asking the private sector to pay for changing...public attitudes. Only when the state of Minnesota decides it will rent the areas involved in a four-foot wide buffer zone will the financial responsibility be replaced.”

In turn, ANSR met informally with the Board and covered businesses in order to “get input into the regulations from those concerned so that the regulations will effectively protect the nonsmoker and also take into consideration the reasonable concerns of proprietors.” Business owners’ schmoozing with agency officials pursued a different end. For example, John Kahler, who in 1975-76 was both president of the Minnesota Hotel & Lodging Association and corporate general manager and executive vice president of Kahler Corporation, whose Kahler

575 Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Apr. 2, 2009).
576 Bruce Nelsen to Kent Peterson at 1-2 (Sept. 15, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3.(B).
Grand Hotel in Rochester serviced the Mayo Clinic,578 pressed on Robert Willmarth, the aforementioned cigar-smoking member of the state Board of Health, his opposition to any ventilation system air exchange requirements.579

By October Bohr was apparently trying to make amends for his lack of diligence in legislative lobbying by spearheading the Minnesota Restaurant Association’s “rear-guard action”580 to persuade the world that “any place serving beer, wine or liquor is a ‘bar.’” For the many restaurant owners “banking on the act’s ‘bar loophole’” to escape coverage this implausible contention was apparently the ultra-thin reed on which they were resting their case against ANSR in “battling to influence” the Health Department, which was under time pressure to meet its November deadline to issue regulations. Even some restaurants that purported to comply were in fact engaged in guerrilla warfare: for example, “a couple at a fancy restaurant who complained that a tiny third-floor, nonsmoking area reminded them of a toilet” found themselves “escorted out by the bouncer.” Nor were restaurants outliers: the Minnesota Association of Commerce and Industry also began resisting on the grounds that smoking restrictions in offices and factories “would be costly and disruptive—if not impossible to implement,” because, for example, fixed machinery and equipment could be incompatible with creating “smoke segregation areas.” Little wonder that ANSR accused some big firms and banks of “dragging their feet, fearful that smoking customers will complain.”581

In distributing the September 12 draft rules, Peterson included a letter asking recipients for comments. Based on the responses preserved in the Department’s archived files, he did not receive many before the Board of Health met on October 9 to consider whether to authorize Lawson to hold a public hearing, but those that were submitted came largely from the same aforementioned Twin Cities building owners and managers, some of whom continued adamantly to oppose application of the law to their commercial space. Indeed, BOMA’s resistance had stiffened to the point that it lambasted coverage even of “public areas” (i.e., areas accessible to members of the general public who were not employed in the offices housed in buildings owned or managed by BOMA members) to which it had seemed reconciled just three weeks earlier. But on October 2, Arthur Olofson, the association’s executive secretary, informed Peterson that the fact that by personal observation he knew that there was “certainly a lack of recognition for the ‘no smoking’ restriction in elevators”—which had already been off limits before the MCIAA—suggested that enforcement was “poor if not impossible. We recognize that public areas which include corridors, washrooms and skyways will have similar problems of enforcement. It would appear to be pure folly to attempt to legislate in these areas.” In other words, taken together with BOMA’s earlier claim that enforcement in tenant space was all too possible and destructive of productivity, this new negativity would have led to a total exemption for office buildings from a law that Olofson conceded had “merits,” which, however, he did not bother to spell out. Instead, he insisted that, given the differences in size and complexity of space usage as between small and large tenants, there was “no equitable way to treat individuals on a similar basis and therefor [sic] to define areas for smoking should be a decision of management.” Consequently, BOMA shifted to the position that even as to the private entrepreneur, office tenant, or office owner the proposed rules “will be difficult and burdensome to implement technically and will be difficult if not impossible to enforce from a practical viewpoint.”

Even more hostile was the Northern States Power Company, whose property and land manager had received inquiries from all manner of employees not a single one of whom had mentioned a word about an “undesirable condition caused by smoking.” Opposed to coverage of “so called [sic] ‘public’ office buildings” whose use by the general public was “incidental,” he complained that MCIAA had “created an opportunity for a small vocal minority to stir up a lot of animosity within the building that has little or nothing to do with health hazards from inhaling smoke.”

Without explaining the change it sought, IDS Properties contended that among its tenants were many occupying as little as 200-300 square feet and no private offices; since each smoker would have to be surrounded by 200 square feet of space and the buildings’ bathrooms and corridors were public and therefore smoking-prohibited, if any employee was opposed to smoking, no employee in such small offices could lawfully smoke in the building and a great deal of time and effort would be lost as a result of the smokers’ leaving the building to smoke.

---

582 Arthur Olofson (Building Owners and Managers Association of Minneapolis) to Kent Peterson (Oct. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
583 Donald Robbins (Northern States Power Co.) (Sept. 22, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (no addressee).
584 Larry Strohkirch (IDS Properties, Inc.) to Kent Peterson (Sept. 30, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
The indefatigable Jones from Pillsbury weighed in again, taking a much different stance than the unrelenting opposition displayed by BOMA (which he stated he was sure would have “thoughts of their own”). Instead, in order to “ease compliance capability on the part of an office building occupant” he cooperatively proposed a number of specific modifications, at least one of which the Health Department immediately adopted before it even submitted the next iteration to the Board of Health. This proposal, which hardly lived up to his claim of merely “clarify[ing] the language,” reduced the minimum height of the physical barriers sub-branch of the “acceptable smoke-free area” from five feet to 56 inches; it also would have deleted the requirement that the physical barrier be “continuous.” Pillsbury sought to justify these two changes on the grounds that in a so-called open-plan or landscaped office—which purportedly accounted for 60 percent of all offices “‘now on the drawing boards’”—“physical barriers are often not continuous but are sufficient to provide a degree of audio and visual privacy and interrupt horizontal air flow. Standard heights of free standing ‘landscaping’ screens of at least one major manufacturer are 56 inches and 72 inches—not five feet—whereas at least two major manufacturers of open-plan panelling use standard heights of 62 inches and 80 inches.” In addition to including the claim about “interrupt[ing] horizontal air flow,” later in his formal “Justification” for the rules, Peterson did in fact adopt the 56-inch standard, which appeared in the draft presented to the Board of Health on October 1/9, but did not jettison “continuous.” It is noteworthy that although the sole basis for the height change was the purported commercial availability of barriers, and although three of the four types exceeded five feet, Jones opted for (and the 587 See below this ch. Pillsbury also proposed that the four-foot-wide aisle space be modified to delete “wide” and “aisle” because aisles in office landscaping layouts were “ill-defined or non-existent.” Peterson deleted the former but not the latter. Finally, Pillsbury prevailed in its proposal to delete the requirement that where smoking was permitted in one or more sections of the open work area of an office, “[s]moking permitted areas shall be limited to assure that the remainder of the room is an acceptable smoke-free area....” Raymond Jones (Pillsbury) to Kent Peterson at 2-3 (Sept. 26, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B); Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.c)3) at 11 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B); Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.a) at 8 (Oct. 1, 1975) (copy furnished by MDH).

---

585 Raymond Jones (Pillsbury) to Kent Peterson at 1-2 (Sept. 26, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (internal quote from magazine Architectural Management).

586 See below this ch.

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Health Department acquiesced in) the only one that lowered the standard. As for dropping continuousness, whatever make-believe “degree...of privacy” non-continuous barriers (or, for that matter, even continuous 56-inch barriers) provided against noise and the distractions of seeing and being seen and whatever minimal efficacy they displayed in interrupting horizontal air flow, they would be wholly impotent against drifting smoke.

Finally, Peterson also received extensive comments on the September 9/12 draft rules from Radisson Hotels lawyer-lobbyists Brooks and Kuduk, who, in addition to misleadingly asserting that their client had “not opposed the concept of separating smoking and non-smoking areas”—after all, they had testified before the legislature that the whole bill was unnecessary—submitted a lengthy laundry list of objections, only one of which was adopted by the Health Department in its October 1/9 draft and all of which combined would have severely compromised not only the implementing rules, but the statute itself. Their complaints began with the claim that the definition of “place of work” (“any location at which two or more individuals perform any type of...service for consideration of payment under any type of employment relationship, including but not limited to employment by a[n]...individual”) was so broad that it embraced a private residence when the owner hired two or more people to provide a service in his own house—a result that, without explanation, they claimed was not statutory intent. The definition of “bar” was “unacceptable” because Radisson saw no reason to use a quantitative capacity to serve (50) meals as an exclusionary classificatory criterion. The only criterion that did not “necessarily include false or arbitrary considerations” was “whether an establishment can sell alcoholic beverages....” These commercially self-serving assertions failed to explain why the legislature had bothered to exempt bars but not restaurants, why Representative Kahn had acquiesced in the restaurant industry’s pressure to exempt restaurants from H.F. 79, why great controversy had attended the Senate’s coverage of restaurants late in the process, or why Chum Bohr and the Restaurant Association had displayed intense animosity toward that amendment if, as Radisson claimed, any restaurant could nevertheless exempt itself by the simple expedient of securing a license to sell alcohol, which presumably Radisson and the vast majority of restaurants had. The lawyers’ only objection that was even plausibly anchored in the text of the law was to that part of the definition of “acceptable smoke-free area” framed in terms of five-foot-high physical barriers “and” ventilation systems with numerically specified air changes. Because MCIAA “specifically indicated that existing” barriers and ventilation systems 588Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2.a) at 1 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

“were to be used to facilitate the separation of smoke-free areas,” Brooks and Kuduk argued that the sub-rule “clearly goes beyond the statutory intent.”

Their argument would have been robust if (1) they had not falsely charged that the Health Department required compliance with both the barriers and ventilation methods and (2) the proposed sub-rule had not given covered public places the option of using four-foot wide spaces, about which the act was silent and which, in fact, according to the Health Department’s original and long-time head of MCIAA enforcement, was the most commonly used means of compliance with the “acceptable smoke-free area” requirement.

The only one of Radisson’s numerous suggestions that was embodied in the next iteration of the rules was one small part of its proposed elimination of the prohibition of smoking-permitted areas in such common traffic areas as entry lobbies, registration areas, or hallways of hotels/motels on the grounds that the ban exceeded the bounds of MCIAA, which merely required that nosmoking areas be provided in those areas. The only concession that the Health Department made in this regard was to permit the designation of “a portion of the seating area of a lobby or lounge” as smoking permitted. It nevertheless retained its general ban on smoking-permitted areas in “common traffic areas...or other areas which would be required to be used by non-smokers.”

Brooks and Kuduk failed to mention that the provision to which they objected was not specific to hotels, but rather a “general provision[ ],” which prohibited the location of smoking-permitted areas “in a complete area which non-smokers

---

589 William Brooks, Jr. and David Kuduk to Kent Peterson (Oct. 3, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The letter stated that the comments were based on a draft of the rules labeled “second draft”; the draft of Sept. 9 bore no such designation, but textually and in terms of section numbering it corresponded to Radisson’s references. The Health Department did insert a provision in the rules expressly excluding private residences, but not until the final version following its public hearing. See below this ch.

590 Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Mar. 27, 2009). Schneider retired in 1994.

591 William Brooks, Jr. and David Kuduk to Kent Peterson (Oct. 3, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

592 Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.f)2) at 10-11 (Oct. 1/9, 1975) (copy furnished by MDH). This sub-rule of the later draft was arguably even broader than that criticized by Radisson inasmuch as the latter had limited such common traffic areas to those “used by non-smokers to accomplish the activities for which a hotel, motel or resort is intended.” Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.h) at 16 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
would be required to use to accomplish the activities for which the public place is intended” and was exemplified by the prohibition of smoking-permitted areas “in a complete area of required public use such as an entry lobby, ticket areas, hallways, elevators or similar places which must be used by non-smokers.” As with the applicability of the mandate to minimize toxic effects, the September 9/12 draft rules inserted this general provision in several categories of affected places, but with precise locational specifications. Perhaps the most prominent and consequential application was to areas in retail establishments that “must be used by the non-smoker to utilize the retail store, such as the complete entry or exit lobby or all counters at which payment is made for the goods and services.” The other two locations were passenger terminals, in which smoking shall not be permitted in a ticket area or public movement areas such as hallways, stairways and waiting lines to board the public conveyance and health-care facilities, in which the Department prohibited smoking in “common traffic areas such as the entry area, corridors, elevators or other areas which must be used by non-smokers to get from one location to another in the health care facility.”

Ironically, whereas Radisson’s lobbying resulted in only a minor paring back in the October draft rules of the total ban on smoking in common traffic areas in hotels, the proposed ban was totally eliminated with regard to retail establishments and passenger terminals (as a consequence of those locations’

593 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.a) at 5 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The Oct. 1/9 draft was almost identical except for the deletion of the imprecise “complete,” which was then reintroduced in the December 2 proposed rules. Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3.a) at 4 (Oct. 1/9, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (and copy furnished by MDH); Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 443(a)(3) at 7 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

594 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.b) at 10 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

595 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.e) at 13 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

596 Regulations for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.f) at 14 (Draft 9/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

597 Asked 34 years later about this about-face, Peterson observed: “I don’t remember any smoking/nonsmoking check-out lanes. It seems incredible now to think of people walking around a retail store smoking and even considering a smoking checkout.” Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Nov. 22, 2009).
elimination from the rule governing “categories of affected places”) and, arguably, cut back sharply in health-care facilities, concerning none of which has any written record of lobbying been preserved. (The smoking ban in common traffic areas in health care facilities was absent from the December 2 version of the proposed rules as well as in the final rules.}\(^{599}\)

The Health Department later sought to justify this ban on the grounds that “it is felt that these designated smoking permitted areas shall be arranged to provide smoke free access to the activities which are conducted in the public place.” And even if the Department’s “feel[ing]” that “it would be contrary to the basic intent of this legislation”\(^{600}\) to permit hybrid use of such areas was reasonable, it is difficult to discern any difference that would have justified such radically different treatment as between common traffic areas and, for example, a restaurant, so as to have justified complete smoke-freedom in the former and inundation with smoke from numerous smokers only four feet away in the latter. Indeed, the Board of Health later inadvertently conceded as much in upholding the Department’s position: “The Board...finds that this rule is necessary to conform with the intent of” §§ 6(b) and 2 of MCIAA “in that non-smokers should have access to the activities conducted within the public places without being subjected to the harmful effects of tobacco smoke.”\(^{601}\)

That even the Health Department officials most intensively participating in drafting the rules insufficiently appreciated or understood the exposures from which they were purportedly protecting nonsmokers—even according to the laws of physics and the standards of human sensory perception of the time—was embarrassingly on display in December in the response to a complaint by Estelle Swanson, an ANSR activist and representative of an emphysema club, about \(^{598}\)The October draft deleted from the September draft “to get from one location to another in the health care facility...” Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.e(2) at 10 (Oct. 1/9, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (and copy furnished by MDH).

---

\(^{599}\)See below this ch.

\(^{600}\)Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 17, MDH Ex. 11 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\(^{602}\)“Volunteer Thanks,” ANSR 3(3):n.p. [2] (Oct. 1975). This issue was labeled “3,” conditions in the common traffic areas in the very Health Department building in which the Board of Health public hearing on its proposed rules was taking place:
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

MS. SWANSON: [B]eing that the law specifically states that it was going to protect me from smoke-filled places, why isn’t there something in the law to eliminate smoking in entranceways. Now right here in this building, had I gone out and had to come back in during the recess, as an emphysema patient, I probably would have gone down. It was blue with smoke right in the entryway. ... There is no other way for me to get into this building. Why isn’t there something in the law to protect us from entrances.

MR. PETERSON: It is the purpose of one of the general provisions to speak to reasonable protection of entrances and exits of buildings. We have posted our lobby as a no smoking area, and have not posted the distance between the two doors. ... I understand your point, and I think we should consider as to whether there would be significant smoke buildup between the two doors so that we would have to post that also. Our initial thought was that with that door being opened frequently, that the air does change so frequently that there couldn’t be much smoke....

This farce reached its high point when MACI representative Oliver Perry intervened to inform the hearing examiner that “the policeman who is guarding the door out there is smoking in the non-smoking area in your building.”

Based in part on the comments that the Health Department had received, it effected a number of significant changes in the October 1 draft proposed rules that the staff recommended to the Board of Health for the latter’s consideration at its October 9 meeting. The definition of “acceptable smoke-free area” was marginally tightened by requiring that it constitute a “contiguous portion of the public place...including seating arrangements” and weakened by catering to but the number was struck out by hand and replaced with “4.” The issue referred to an August newsletter, but no such issue appears to be extant.

603 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 31 (Dec. 2, 1975).

605 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 171 (Dec. 2, 1975). Giese replied that although the policeman was “not an employee of ours...we will pursue the matter with him.” Id.

606 This draft incorporated suggestions for changes that Board of Health members (and others) had made to the draft that the Health Department had sent to them on September 12. Consideration of Proposal to Authorize Public Hearing Relating to Regulation for the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, in Warren Lawson to Members of the State Board of Health, Re: Agenda Material for October 9 Meeting (Oct. 1, 1975) (copy furnished by MDH). At least one version of Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act was labeled “Draft 10/9/1975”, in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
Pillsbury’s request and lowering the minimum required barrier height from five feet to 56 inches. In addition, the Department watered down the purported ultimate touchstone of acceptable smoke-freedom—carbon monoxide concentration—by setting it not at 10 milligrams per cubic meter (9 parts per million) in the area in question, as it had been in the previous draft, but at that level in excess of the “background concentration of carbon monoxide in air immediately outside the facility....”

Whereas the September draft rules lacked a unitary sub-rule for applying the definition of the key concept of the “acceptable smoke-free area,” October’s iteration restructured Rule 3 (“General Provisions”) by replacing the sub-rule on “Minimizing the Toxic Effects” with one on “Acceptable Smoke-Free Area,” which was now operationalized uniformly: “The size and location of all smoking permitted areas shall be determined such that toxic effects of smoking are limited in no smoking areas. The proprietor or other person in charge is responsible for making arrangements for an acceptable smoke-free area....”

The Health Department’s prescription in this foundational provision merely to “limit” smoking’s toxic effects in nosmoking areas in the face of an express statutory mandate of “minimiz[ation]” boded ill for prospects that the regulations would interpret and implement the MCIAA to be more rather than less protective of nonsmokers. (To be sure, by the time of the December 2 version of the proposed rules, the Department had thought better of this misstep, inserting instead “minimized,” which then remained in the final rules.)

---

607 Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2.j) at 3-4 (Draft 10/9/1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B); Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2(j) at 3-4 (n.d. [Oct. 1, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). The Health Department later justified the use of outside air background CO levels as the baseline on the grounds that “there may be greater levels of carbon monoxide produced on the outside by motor vehicles. Outside CO pollution will not be a consideration in determining the inside concentration which is ‘acceptable smoke-free.’” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 9-10, MDH Ex. 11 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112H.18.3(B). By the time of the public hearing the proposed rules defined the outside air as within 12 feet of the building. Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 442(a)(2)(dd) at 3 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

609 Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The October draft’s general provisions went on to mandate that if smoking was to be permitted—in conformity with the statute, which conferred discretion on, but did not require, owners to permit smoking at all—610—the smoking areas that owners were responsible for designating “shall not be located such that non-smokers would be required to use the areas in order to participate in the activities for which the public place is intended.” As examples of locations that would be off limits to smoking the draft mentioned those that had to be used by nonsmokers such as hallways, elevators, and entry, exit, and ticket areas. Moreover, the size of such designated smoking areas “shall not be more than proportionate to the preference of patrons of that establishment for a smoking permitted area, as can be demonstrated by the proprietor.”611 (The final regulations watered this provision down by specifying that it “shall not be construed to prevent designation of a smoking-permitted area in a portion of the establishment which non-smokers must briefly cross to reach the intended activity.”)612

In implementing the MCIAA’s imposition on owners of the responsibility for making “reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place by...posting 610Smoking areas may be designated by proprietors....” 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 5, at 633, 634. A decade later the Department pointed out that “when a proprietor...exercises the option to provide smoking permitted areas, this is done with the knowledge that there will be some costs involved. These are costs which they have opted to incur but which are not necessary in order to comply with the law.” Before the Minnesota Commissioner of Health: Statement of Need and Reasonableness at 3 (June 13, 1986), Bates No. TIMN0458156/8.

612Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 443(b)(3) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIM0240635/39. While the MDH rules were being drafted Kahn opined to an alderman from St. Louis, whose proposed anti-smoking ordinance expressly prohibited designated smoking areas from encompassing more than 20 percent of the total seats or total area of the room, that his approach was “good because we did not do that in our bill, and the State Board of Health doesn’t seem to have enough nerve to do it in their rules and regulations. Phyllis Kahn to Bruce Sommer at 1 (Oct. 24, 1975), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B). The provision was § 3(1) of the ordinance, which was attached to the correspondence.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

appropriate signs,”  “arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area,” “asking smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke,” “or...any other means which may be appropriate," the October draft proposed rules specified one of these “other means” alternative to the first three by declaring that “[i]t shall be considered to be a reasonable effort by the proprietor...to prevent smoking in a public place if all persons are asked upon entry into the public place their preference for a smoking permitted or a no smoking area and all persons are then directed to the appropriate area. Furthermore, at least one sign advising the public of this mechanism shall be conspicuously posted at all entrances normally used by the public.” (The Health Department did not retain this sub-rule in the final rules: although the provision, beginning with “if” did reappear, it functioned only as a partial substitute for the duty to post signs.)

613 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 6, at 633, 634.

614 Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 3 e) at 7 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). The Department characterized this method as “particularly satisfactory for restaurants which currently use a host or hostess to direct people to seating and no further cost in personnel or changes in the seating arrangements of the facility would be required.” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 17, MDH Ex. 11 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

615 Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 443(d)(8) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/41. The Health Department deleted from the final rules the provision spelling out an alternative method for owners to carry out their responsibility to prevent smoking. Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at 12, attached to “Adoption of Rules Implementing the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975” (n.d. [after Dec. 2, 1975 and before Apr. 2, 1976]), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Oddly, this explanation by the Health Department staff to the Board of Health of the Department’s post-hearing proposed deletions and additions to the rules failed even to mention the dismantlement of this provision. The Board’s “Findings of Facts” offered an opaque and misleading explanation by claiming that “MHD 443(d)(8) relating to inquiries of all users as to their preferences for placement was initially proposed in another section. However, based upon testimony...at the Hearing,...the Board finds that its inclusion in MHD 443(d) relating to signs is appropriate inasmuch as this rule permits an alternative to posting several signs.” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 29 at 10 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). In fact, at the hearing, restaurant
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The October draft introduced a number of changes in Rule 4 creating special rules for individual “Categories of Affected Places.” First of all, half of these places (including retail establishments, passenger terminals, auditoriums-arenas-gymnasiums-theaters, and public meeting rooms) were eliminated. With regard to the specific places retained, the Department bestowed a great favor on restaurant owners at the expense of their nonsmoking customers by providing that “[d]uring hours of operation when a facility which may otherwise be considered a restaurant does not serve food but does serve alcoholic beverages, the facility shall be considered a ‘bar’”—meaning that it was lawful to permit smoking everywhere, including in areas that were otherwise strictly nonsmoking, but that now would be super-inundated with particulate matter on various surfaces and the stench that it would continue to offgas. In the sub-rule that now merged coverage of workplaces and offices “not customarily used by the general public”—owners of which were now freed from compliance with the general signage rules and were required merely to post one sign per floor stating that smoking was prohibited except in designated smoking areas—the Health Department further weakened protection for nonsmokers by applying to both the social pressure-ridden rule for offices that owners would be “considered to [be] making reasonable efforts to prevent smoking if smoking is permitted only in sections of the place of work or office which are used exclusively by smokers and people who permit smoking.” In some small workplaces/offices the indiscriminate designation of such smoking areas in the same room as no-smoking areas might have been constrained to some extent by a new sub-rule that required each no-smoking area to be at least 200 square feet. Exposure to smoke was also intensified for people in public conveyances with a capacity of fewer than 10: if everyone, including the driver, expressly consented, the conveyance in its lobbyist Bohr stated his belief that “at the time we discussed” the provision (presumably at some non-public consultation with Peterson), “we were talking about the number of signs that would have to be used, and could we get away with signs by doing something else. I think this could be construed by people reading it that all of a sudden it becomes a qualification of what people must do. I think that the words ‘in lieu of signs’ is missing in this thing.” Without in any way mentioning the proposed rule’s entirely different function of offering owners an alternative method of discharging their responsibility to prevent smoking, Peterson agreed with Bohr, called the point “well taken,” and announced that the Department would consider the suggestion. Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 120-21 (Dec. 2, 1975).

entirety could “considered a smoking area...”\textsuperscript{618} Finally, the rule regarding health care facilities was modified to prohibit visitors and staff from smoking in patient rooms “unless patients expressly permit”\textsuperscript{619}—a comically tragic form of a ban in light of patients’ obvious reluctance to jeopardize the company, care, and expertise of the very people whom they needed most in the world during those critical days by vetoing those persons’ ministering to their own addiction, which for decades until August 1, 1975, had been their unquestioned and uncontested vested privilege. The Department inserted the same mechanism into the sub-rule governing patient dining, activity, and day rooms and lounges, in which, under the September draft, smoking had been prohibited except in designated smoking areas; in contrast, the October draft extended smoking to theretofore nonsmoking areas if “expressly permitted by all patients and residents of the facility...”\textsuperscript{620}

Except for blue-collar workplaces (subject to DLI rules), MCIAA did not distinguish among various kinds of workplaces on the basis of whether the general public frequented them or not. On the contrary, the statute defined “public place” to include “any enclosed, indoor area used by the general public or serving as a place of work...”\textsuperscript{621} Thus MCIAA did not distinguish for coverage purposes between non-blue-collar workplaces that the general public used and those it did not use. Similarly, the definition of “office” in the Board of Health’s draft proposed rules meant “every building, structure or area which is used by the general public or serves as a place of work at which the principal activities consist of professional, clerical or administrative services.”\textsuperscript{622} The rules nevertheless impermissibly discriminated against nonsmoking white-collar workers whose workplaces and offices were “not customarily used by the general public”; the draft rule provision that the owner “shall be considered to [be] making reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place if smoking is permitted only in \textsuperscript{618}Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4. c)2) at 9 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). See also below this ch.

\textsuperscript{619}Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4. e)1)cc) at 10 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH).

\textsuperscript{620}Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4. e)3) at 10 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). The sub-rule for patient dining and other rooms was absent from the proposed rules available at the public hearing and the final rules.

\textsuperscript{621}1975 Minn Laws ch. 211, § 3 subd. 2, at 633 (italics added).

\textsuperscript{622}Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2 c) at 2 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH).
sections of the place of work or office which are used exclusively by smokers and people who permit smoking,” by virtue of jettisoning objective criteria and introducing the subjective criterion of whether nonsmokers “permit[ted]” smoking, subjected nonsmokers to potential intimidation to acquiesce in their colleagues’ smoking.

The workplace/office rule went on to provide that where smoking-permitted and no-smoking areas existed in the same room, each no-smoking area was required to be at least 200 square feet and an “acceptable smoke-free area” (meaning that it was required, for example, to be separated from the nonsmoking area(s) by 56-inch-high physical barriers or four-foot-wide spaces). Owners who availed themselves of this option were freed from the obligation to comply with the otherwise much more specifically informative sign-posting requirements that, by pin-pointing where smoking was prohibited and permitted, promoted the compliance and enforcement processes. Instead, the only signage requirement to which those in charge of non-blue-collar workplaces and offices were subject was to “conspicuously post at least one sign on each floor which states, ‘Smoking is prohibited except in designated smoking areas.’”

623 Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4 a) at 8 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). This provision was dropped from the final rules. When asked many years later whether he agreed with the analysis in the text, then Assistant Attorney General Terry O’Brien replied: “I see the discrimination, but I don’t recall anyone raising the issue at the time of the rules process. Also, I don’t remember anyone suggesting a discriminatory intent, or for that matter, thinking about [it] in the context you raise. That, in retrospect, is the problem.” Email from Terry O’Brien to Marc Linder (Apr. 10, 2009).

624 Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4 a) at 8 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). The area-specific signage rule required that one of two posting methods be used. Under the first, “smoking permitted” and “no smoking” signs had to be placed at an easy-to-see height and location; in addition, “[t]he boundary between a no-smoking area and smoking permitted area shall be marked with signs so that persons may differentiate between the two areas.” Rule 3 c) 7) (aa) and (bb). In 1980 the Health Department created across-the-board equity by amending the definition of “acceptable smoke-free area” to require that all such areas be at least 200 square feet. This amendment was driven by inspectors’ observations that under the original rule owners “could designate an unreasonably small area as being smoke-free and still be in compliance. Non-smokers had little recourse in such instances.” The 200-square-foot rule was also designed to insure accommodation of up to 20 nonsmokers. [Minnesota Department of Health], Clean Indoor Air Rules: Statement of Need and Reasonableness at 1 (n.d. [1979]) (copy furnished by MDH).

The press was more interested in a number of provisions in the draft rules dealing with bars and restaurants. A bar, which alone among public places was authorized by the statute to be “designated as a smoking area in its entirety,” was defined by the draft regulations as an “establishment where one can purchase and consume alcoholic beverages, but excluding any such establishment having table and seating facilities for serving of meals, in consideration of payment, to more than fifty people at one time.” Restaurants were defined as “every building, structure, or area used as, maintained as, or advertised as, or held out to the public to be an enclosure where meals are served for consideration of payment.” Regardless of the impact of lingering smoke, restaurants qualified as bars—and were thus entitled to be designated as smoking areas in their entirety—during those hours when they served no food, but did serve alcohol.

Newspapers called special attention to the rule that required bars that served meals to more than 50 people at one time to set aside nonsmoking areas, prompting Glenna Johnson, the head of ANSR’s Awareness Committee, to oppose the 50-person threshold on the grounds that in small communities bar-restaurants serving under 50 might be the only place in town to eat. In contrast, ANSR’s director, Mary Jo Matczynski, who called the MCIAA a “revolutionary idea,” though “pleased” with the Health Department’s proposals—which did

---

626 1974 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 5, at 633, 634.
628 Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 2 b) at 2 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). The rule went on to exclude from the definition of “meals” “foods which are prepackaged when served to the public or foods which are served as snacks or appetizers.” This sub-definition was dropped from the final rule, which instead specified that the meals “are made available to be consumed on the premises.” Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 442(p) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/39. See also MHD 442(c).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

not set forth how much space in a restaurant, office, or other public place had to be reserved for nonsmokers—suggested a 50-50 division in restaurants as “fair.” Indeed, since 63 percent of adults, and presumably even more pre-adults, were nonsmokers, Matczynski may even have been short-changing her constituents, but Peterson, the drafter, appeared to dismiss her rigid numerical approach by insisting that “it would be impossible to have an absolute minimum that would apply to all restaurants because they are so different in nature.”

The October draft also created special rules for several other kinds of public places. The Health Department staff created a bifurcated rule for “public conveyances” (which included “every air, land or water vehicle” used to transport people “for compensation,” including airplanes, trains, buses, boats and taxis) based on passenger capacity: in any public conveyance with a capacity of 10 or more persons (including the driver) designated smoking-permitted sections were authorized; those with a capacity of fewer than 10 “may be considered to be a smoking area in its entirety if the driver and the passengers expressly consent.”

Since the provisions for specific public places such as public conveyances prevailed over the general provisions if they “conflict with or are inconsistent with” the latter, presumably smoking sections could be lawfully designated in the larger-capacity conveyances even if they were inconsistent with the existence 632The only rule applied to educational facilities was that smoking-permitted areas were prohibited in areas “normally used” by under 18-year-olds. Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4 d) at 9 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). It was retained in the final rules. Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 444(f) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/43.

636Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4 at 8 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). Although this provision stated that “[a]bsent irreconcilable conflict” owners “shall be expected to comply” with both provisions, the word “irreconcilable” was not repeated in the sentence quoted in the text. The meaning of the curious directive “shall be expected” was opaque.

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

In its official “Justification,” the Health Department staff sought to explain its proposed special rule for small vehicles on the grounds that “[w]e feel that it is not likely that a smoke free area could be maintained” in a smaller than 60-square-foot public conveyance with a low ceiling if any smoking were permitted. The staff nevertheless managed to transmogrify this commonsensical conclusion into a rule sanctioning smoking-permitted areas by means of the unsubstantiated and highly dubious claim that the “concept of permitting the driver and all passengers to express their consent for smoking permitted in the entire public conveyance is also analogous with [sic] the public policy created in” MCIAA “for private, enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers.”

This attempt at analogic reasoning broke down, inter alia, because whatever rationale the legislature may have imagined supported perpetuating white-collar employees’ smoking privileges “[e]ven though such offices may be visited by non-smokers” and even though employees might have to enter those offices as a condition of employment, the legislature nevertheless deemed them “private,” whereas it expressly regulated only what it called “public” conveyances. The only discernible carryover from the imagined rationale for occupants of private offices would have been protecting the (mobile) workplace-based privilege of the drivers of those public conveyances to continue smoking regardless of the health impact of the smoke exposure in such extraordinarily confined spaces on their countless thousands of passengers. Yet the result could just as well have been intimidation of nonsmoking drivers into exposing themselves to (tipping) passengers’ smoking. Apart from creating the potential for intimidating nonsmokers into acquiescing in making smaller-capacity conveyances into smoking areas in their entirety, the sub-rule left it unclear how it would be administered in the real

---

638 Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 24 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975). The Department replicated this argument in declaring with regard to the sub-rule governing hotel rooms that “it is felt that [the] sleeping room which is rented to the guest is logically excluded from application of this law.... The concept of this exclusion is analogus [sic] with [the] exception of a ‘private social function’....” Id. at 26.

639 1975 Minn. Statutes ch. 211, § 3(2).

640 At the Board of Health public hearing on the proposed rules Chum Bohr, latching on to this consent provision in the public conveyance and hospital resident rules and the lack of one in the office rules, suggested that the inconsistency be eliminated by making the “consent privilege” prevail throughout. Brandt objected to a consent clause governing workplaces because many people felt intimidated by their employers. Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 142-43 (Dec. 2, 1975). After the hearing, Associated Industries of world as passengers entered and left: would, for example, the appearance of a new passenger, who refused to consent to smoking, require everyone to stop smoking, which would then resume as soon as that passenger left, although the smoke might linger during the return to the nosmoking regime? Or, as in a much more piquant scenario imagined by a speaker at the public hearing on the Health Department rules: “[I]f you got into a limousine and three passengers wanted to smoke and one didn’t...they couldn’t kick the other guy out. And it seems to me there ought to be some provision for that. You can’t kick somebody out because he doesn’t want to smoke. Or...he wants to be in a smoke free area when the other want to smoke. I mean, they are common carriers, and they shouldn’t be allowed to throw out a person that doesn’t want to smoke because the other passengers want to smoke.”

641 Minnesota, in opposing the provision requiring owners to determine customers’ preferences in order to determine the relative size of a smoking-permitted area, suggested that if the rule remained, employers be given the opportunity to ascertain employees’ willingness to consent to an area that would be entirely smoking permitted. Donald Lenarz to Hearing Examiner (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

641 Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, at 140 (Dec. 2, 1975) (Bennett Davis), in Health Department, Attorney General Papers, MSA, MHS, 103.I.15.1(B). The question/comment elicited only a “Thank you” from the hearing examiner. Id. After Kent Peterson had answered in the affirmative a question by another member of the public as to whether the rule meant that it was possible that smoking areas could be allowed on Metropolitan Transit Commission buses, he added in response to a follow-up question as to whether a local ordinance would override the state law that a more stringent city ordinance would take precedence. Id. at 141-42 (Michael Hennen). These conundrums might therefore have been mooted by pre-existing local ordinances banning smoking in some kinds of public conveyances. At least Minneapolis appears not to have adopted any. Email from Mary Rumsey (reference librarian University of Minneapolis Law Library) to Marc Linder (Apr. 17, 2009) (based on the indexes and tables of contents of the non-circulating Minneapolis Ordinance Code, July 1, 1960, As Amended Through December 31, 1972). An ordinance may, at least substantively, have been superfluous because, according to the director of customer services at Metro Transit: “Although I don’t have first-hand knowledge, it is my understanding that smoking has never been permitted on the buses of Metro Transit and its forebears since the first days of public ownership under the Metropolitan Transit Commission, which was created by the state legislature in 1967 and operated its first publicly owned transit service in 1970. The major private predecessor was Twin City Lines. It’s [sic] Trainmen’s and Bus Drivers’ Guide dated July 1, 1950 says: ‘Passenger Smoking. Passengers shall be allowed to smoke on the rear platforms of the standard type car if city ordinances permit. On P.C.C. cars or on buses smoking is not allowed . . .’” Email from Robert Gibbons to Marc Linder (May 6, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

That the Health Department proposed a more rather than less smoking-permissive regime for health care facilities was (seemingly) as astonishing as the fact that, as one ANSR activist put it, “hospital administrators fought us tooth and nail,” matched only by bar owners.642 This stance was squarely placed in a

These proposed provisions were retained in the final rules. Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 444(a) and (e)(1) and (2) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/41/43. Asked decades later whether passengers were as little protected as the text seemed to suggest, Peterson replied: “Smoking in taxicabs or similar small spaces was a difficulty and we tried to work out a compromise with the consent provision. There may not have been either authority nor scientific evidence to order a public place to be totally non-smoking. Your observations about whether or not nonsmokers were protected uses the current knowledge of second-hand smoke. In 1975 we had very little of that evidence.” Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Apr. 10, 2009). In fact, however, as shown elsewhere in this chapter, contemporaries were acutely aware of the impact of secondhand smoke and the fecklessness of the law’s prophylaxis. For example, a week after Peterson had drafted the first set of proposed rules, he received comments pointing out, inter alia, that: “Many elderly people with heart and respiratory ailments must ride buses and would be subjected to an extremely unhealthy atmosphere if this section is allowed to remain.” Gerald Peterson to Kent Peterson (Sept. 18, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3 (B). Another Minnesotan informed the Board of Health just three days before the public hearing on its proposed rules that when several rows of seats were set aside at the back of a Greyhound bus, “the air is filled with smoke all the way to the front of the bus and our lungs and clothing are saturated with the foul odor for smokers.” Lucile Ahrens to Dr. Warren Lawson (Nov. 29, 1975), Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Three years after MCIAA’s enactment several pro-smoking senators introduced an amendatory bill that, after authorizing owners to designate nonsmoking areas, prohibited the Metropolitan Transit Commission from designating any of its public conveyances a nonsmoking area in its entirety if the scheduled run from beginning to final stop on the route exceeded 30 minutes. S.F. 1995 (Feb. 9, 1978, by Olson, Vega, Stumpf, Ueland, Solon). The bill would also have imposed the same condition on all public places under the control of the state of Minnesota or any of its political subdivisions. Because an “overwhelming number of ANSR supporters” showed up to testify, the hearing on Mar. 2, 1978 was cancelled and the bill was pulled at the last minute and died. Gene Rosenblum et al., “ANSR Appeals for Help,” ANSR 6(2):n.p. [1] (May-June 1978) (quote); email from Jeanne Weigum to Marc Linder (Apr. 14, 2009).

642 Telephone interview with Gerald Ratliff, St. Paul (Oct. 31, 2009). Light on the scope of smoking in hospitals and administrators’ cavalier attitude toward smoking was shed by an anti-smoking activist-emphysema patient who had devoted many hours to securing passage of the MCIAA. In a letter to the state health commissioner she characterized practices at St. Joseph’s Hospital as “a good example of the downright commercial context by a long-time anti-tobacco activist pulmonary physician: “In the 1970’s and ’80’s one of the questions a hospital admitting office asked was, ‘Do you want smoking or non smoking’. Hospital administrators were worried that if they took a stand against smoking, they would offend and lose their smoking customers. It wasn’t until we had voluntarily produced strong smoke free environments in outpatient clinics and a few leader hospitals in smaller communities and the Mayo Clinic did the hospital leaders in Minnesota support a legislative ban on smoking in healthcare facilities (exempting mental health units) in 1990. The two year phase in to 1992 went smoothly once they were convinced by the legislation that they would be protected by what they called ‘a level playing field.’ And while agreeing that hospital administrators had fought against MCIAA, Kent Peterson was “not sure they all had the same reasons but some fought it because they were fighting state standards of all types. The hospital industry has long prided itself [on] private accreditation as a substitute for state regulation. Basically that is ‘self-regulation’ and to avoid regulation by multiple jurisdictions and potentially the need to sort out multiple standards. It would be ok if there were the same or more stringent standards in accreditation and public accountability, but there was not. Several years later, medical leaders convinced hospitals executives to become leaders in the non-smoking movement. It became good PR. But they were anti-regulation like any other businessperson initially.”

Like the aforementioned special signage sub-rule for white-collar workplaces, that for patient rooms relieved owners of any duty to post signs in those rooms “if there is at least one sign at the entrance to each floor and wing which states:

---

defiance going on, even in hospitals where smoking should not be allowed at all.” Estelle Swanson to Warren Lawson (Nov. 24, 1975), in Health Department, 112.H.18.3(B), MSA, MHS. To her letter she attached a response to her complaints about the hospital’s lack of compliance from the administrator, who, after observing that the law was “a very controversial subject, with each side claiming rights and privileges,” defended the hospital’s compliance by reference to a large sign at the entrance stating that smoking was not allowed “except” in the automat, coffee, shop, cafeteria, conference rooms, locker rooms, lounge area, private offices, staff hall, and waiting rooms. With the exception of the coffee shop and cafeteria, in which there were “marked tables where smoking is not permitted,” apparently the hospital permitted smoking everywhere in the named areas. In addition, in the lobby “we feel there is ample space to allow for freedom for both smokers and non-smokers without interference to either group.” Sister Marie de Paul to Estelle Swanson (Aug. 22, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

643 Email from Dr. A. Stuart Hanson to Marc Linder (Nov. 8, 2009).
644 Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Nov. 1, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

‘Smoking is prohibited except in designated smoking areas.’ As for the patient rooms themselves, owners or those in charge were free to choose between two options. First, they could “ask all prospective patients” whether they preferred a smoking-permitted or no-smoking area; when space was available, they were then required to “assign rooms according to this preference”; when no space was available in a no-smoking room and “a patient is admitted to a room originally designated for smoking, smoking shall be prohibited in that patient room unless expressly permitted by the non-smoker.”

Or second, if the owners did not assign rooms in accordance with patients’ preferences, “smoking shall be prohibited in all patient rooms except patient rooms occupied exclusively by patients who smoke or patients who have expressed permission for smoking.”

These procedures, which put nonsmokers whose health was compromised in the vulnerable position of going along to get along in order to avoid aggravating their anxieties by confronting their roommates, were retained in the final rules. Arguably even greater potential for intimidation was built into the provision, which the final rules also retained, that “[v]isitors and staff shall be prohibited from smoking patient rooms unless patients expressly permit.”

Ironically, the Health Department sought to justify these rules by reference

---

648 Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 444(g)(2) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/43.

649 Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4 e) 1) (cc) at 10 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH); Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 444(g)(3) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/43. Amusingly, after the statute and rules went into effect, some hospitals permitted smoking only with a physician’s permission and only if a nurse was present. “Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act (MCIAA) Regulations Explained,” ANSR 4(4):3 (Oct. 1976).
to “the unique characteristics” of patients, who were “more likely to be suffering from a health condition which is adversely affected by toxic byproducts of cigarette smoke.” Moreover, since patients’ rooms were so small that “any amount of smoking...could affect the health and comfort of non[-]smoking patients,” the Department perceived the need—and claimed that its rules provided—for “maximum efforts to totally separate smokers from non[-]smokers.”

Significantly, the final rule dropped one of the few outright bans on smoking embodied in the draft rule—namely, in such “common traffic areas” as corridors, elevators, entry or exit areas, or other areas that non-smokers had to use. (In 1980, agreeing with complaints filed by non-smokers that smoking was inappropriate in hospitals and “most inappropriate” in corridors, emergency rooms, treatment rooms, admitting areas, and intensive care units, the Health Department promulgated a rule prohibiting those in charge from designating any such places smoking-permitted areas. Not until 1987 did the Minnesota

651 Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4 e)2) at 10 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). Neither the chief drafter of the rules nor his legal adviser was able to recall why this provision had been deleted from the final rules. Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Apr. 10, 2009); email from Terry O’Brien to Marc Linder (Apr. 10, 2009).

652 [Minnesota Department of Health], Clean Indoor Rules: Statement of Need and Reasonableness at 6 (n.d. [ca. 1979]) (copy furnished by MDH) (quote); State Register 3:2065 (May 21, 1979); Minn. Code of Agency Rules 7 § 1.444 F. 4 (Apr. 14, 1980). Nevertheless, 15 years later, when the Health Department proposed similar rules changes whose validity turned on the same statutory language, the administrative law judge found them to be defective. The first proposed change would have prohibited smoking in office buildings except in private enclosed offices and designated smoking areas of lunchrooms or lounges. Doug Kelm, lobbyist for the Tobacco Institute and R. J. Reynolds objected that MCIAA did not authorize such a rule and the ALJ agreed: although the change was supported by record “facts showing its reasonableness, it negates the authority of ‘proprietors or others in charge’ to designate smoking areas in office buildings. This authority is granted by statute and cannot be removed by rule.” State of Minnesota, Office of Administrative Hearings for the Minnesota Department of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Permanent Rules of the Minnesota Department of Health Relating to Clean Indoor Air: Report of the Administrative Law Judge, Finding of Fact 28.b, 28.d, and 29.a (1-0900-8678-1, Aug. 2, 1994), on http://www.oah.state.mn.us/aljBase/09008678.rr1.htm. The ALJ went on to concede that although the proposed rule’s effect “is laudable, is supported by public opinion...and is based upon present day knowledge of second hand smoke,” it nevertheless went beyond the MCIAA of 1975, “which was presumably based
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The legislature amend MCIAA by and large to ban smoking in health care facilities including doctors offices.\textsuperscript{653}

The structure and evolution of the special rules for hotels, motels, and resorts resembled those for hospitals. The draft rules excluded sleeping rooms rented to guests from the smoking ban except in the designated smoking areas regime\textsuperscript{654} (thus subjecting all nonsmokers to smoke residues in rooms previously occupied by smokers),\textsuperscript{655} but at the same time they prohibited the establishment of \textsuperscript{653}1987 Minn. Laws ch. 399, § 2, at 3158. The provision in this amendment that allowed patients to smoke if their attending physician authorized smoking in writing was repealed by 1992 Minn. Laws ch. 576, § 2.

\textsuperscript{654}Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4. f)1) at 10 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH).

\textsuperscript{655}This same disregard of residues attended the decision to permit smoking in restaurants during those hours when they sold no food but did sell alcohol. The Health Department staff argued that this sub-rule provided both “flexibility” for owners and “adequate protection of the public’s health.” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, smoking-permitted areas in “common traffic areas such as registration areas, hallways, elevators or other areas which would be required to be used by non-smokers.” From this prohibition, however, the rules excepted “a portion of the seating area of a lobby or lounge...." As was the case with hospitals, the final rule deleted the partial ban on designated smoking areas in common areas.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The agency’s proposed eligibility criteria for implementing the statutory provision conferring discretion on the state Board of Health to waive the law, on request, for “compelling reasons” if the waiver did “not significantly affect” nonsmokers’ “health and comfort” were, correspondingly, twofold. The applicant bore the burden of demonstrating the existence of both those “[c]ompelling reasons to necessitate a waiver,” which might “consist of evidence that implementation of the Act would endanger the ability of the public place to meet its costs of operation,” and “clear and convincing evidence to prove that even” if the act and rules were waived, “the concentration of carbon monoxide in all sections of the public place shall at no time exceed the background concentration of carbon monoxide in air the building by more than 10 milligrams per cubic meter (9 parts per million).” In other words, as long as the owner

657 Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 444(h) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/43. This ban had still been included in the proposed rules at the time of the public hearing. Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 444(h)(2) at 14 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

658 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 7 subd. 1, at 633, 635.

659 Minnesota Department of Health, Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 5 b) 1) and 2) at 11 (n.d. [Oct. 1/9, 1975]) (copy furnished by MDH). The final rules modified both criteria somewhat: for “meet its costs of operation” was substituted “produce sufficient income to meet its operating expenses”; and the outdoor air carbon monoxide background reference was limited to that within 12 feet of the building. Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 445(b)(1) and (2) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/44. At the Board of Health public hearing on the proposed rules their principal drafter, Peterson, stated that “the amount of unusable space [caused by the four-foot-wide space rule] and projections as to how much...income would be derived if you could use that space” might be evidence that implementing the law could cause an owner to be unable to meet his costs of operation. Board of Health demonstrated that the entire public place was the equivalent of an “acceptable smoke-free area” in terms of this carbon monoxide level test (despite the fact that smoking were permitted in the place), the law might be waived on grounds of profitlessness. (The legislature did not repeal the waiver regime until 1995.)

Remarkably, the Health Department sought to justify this rule on the grounds that “the statute was not intended to cause adverse economic effects or to cause termination of employment” and claimed that this “concept is found” in the MCIAA provision stating that “no additional physical barriers or ventilation systems would be required to be installed.”

That restaurants were looming as the law’s Achilles heel and that the Minnesota Board of Health was not inclined to prioritize protecting nonsmokers from exposure to smoke over owners’ self-perceived financial interest in prioritizing smokers became clear at the October 9 Board of Health meeting in response to a proposal by Board member Michael Keable, to require restaurants (and other covered public places) to reserve at least 25 percent of their total floor space for nonsmokers. Underlying his initiative was personal experience: when he and his wife had asked for seats in a nosmoking area in one of the “better restaurants” of his hometown (St. Cloud), they “were led to a card table set up in the basement.” Having been “made to feel like a second-class citizen,” Keable offered the amendment to close a “loophole” in the staff’s proposed regulations because “[t]echnically, the card table in the basement may have complied with the law....” In principle Keable’s proposal appealed to Assistant Health Commissioner Dr. Ellen Fifer, who, however, found the need for inspectors to measure the floor space to check compliance—no one appears to have cut this Gordian knot by suggesting seating as the alternative criterion in restaurants, as in fact occurred when the rules were amended in 1980—an additional enforcement burden. Another board member, retired policeman Patrick Daugherty, based on his guess that in northeast Minneapolis the majority of restaurant goers were smokers, (illogically) challenged the fairness of the figure of 25 percent, prompting Keable to point out that, with the cigarette industry claiming at most 63 million smokers out of a total population of 220 million, 25 percent would be “conservative.” His arguments, however, were of no avail, and the Board defeated his proposal by a vote of 10 to 2. Chief rule drafter Peterson, adducing no statutory warrant for such a policy, insisted that the draft regulations represented “a ‘middle ground’” reached after discussions with the restaurant industry and other businesses as well as with those seeking to protect nonsmokers from tobacco smoke’s “potentially harmful health effects.” The key to attaining this golden mean was the aforementioned rule that prevented large bar-restaurants from lawfully declaring themselves exempt bars if they could seat more than 50 for food at one time. In reality, such a rule not only did nothing to protect consumers in smaller restaurant-bars, but authorized owners to declare their restaurants “‘part-time’” bars and thus exempt them from coverage during the hours when they did not serve food.\[664\]

\[\text{additional enforcement burden. Another board member, retired policeman Patrick Daugherty, based on his guess that in northeast Minneapolis the majority of restaurant goers were smokers, (illogically) challenged the fairness of the figure of 25 percent, prompting Keable to point out that, with the cigarette industry claiming at most 63 million smokers out of a total population of 220 million, 25 percent would be “conservative.” His arguments, however, were of no avail, and the Board defeated his proposal by a vote of 10 to 2. Chief rule drafter Peterson, adducing no statutory warrant for such a policy, insisted that the draft regulations represented “a ‘middle ground’” reached after discussions with the restaurant industry and other businesses as well as with those seeking to protect nonsmokers from tobacco smoke’s “potentially harmful health effects.” The key to attaining this golden mean was the aforementioned rule that prevented large bar-restaurants from lawfully declaring themselves exempt bars if they could seat more than 50 for food at one time. In reality, such a rule not only did nothing to protect consumers in smaller restaurant-bars, but authorized owners to declare their restaurants “‘part-time’” bars and thus exempt them from coverage during the hours when they did not serve food.\[664\]}
As far as Keable’s own restaurant encounters were concerned, years would pass before they improved. In the meantime he was persuaded that “some restaurateurs were ‘going out of their way to harass nonsmokers.’” Moreover, as wholly inadequate as restaurant compliance may have been, “unfortunately,” in Keable’s view, “business and management aren’t going out of their way to provide the same level of rights [for employees] as they would for customers in public areas.”

Keable was merely a highly visible and vocal target of such guerrilla warfare tactics engaged in by restaurant owners to subvert the law. Restaurants, as many people informed the Health Department in public comments submitted during the run-up to the public hearing, “often designate just two or three tables for nonsmokers and make sure that those tables are in the worst locations—no view, near noisy busing stations, near smelly rest rooms and drafty doors. And worst of all, a haze of smoke from the adjacent tables hangs over the nonsmokers.” To be sure, even such debilitating and demeaning conditions would have passed muster under the proposed regulations so long as the tables were four feet away from a smoking area.

The Health Department may have received only 23 complaints from nonsmokers by the beginning of October, but even Kahn was under no illusions about the state health state inspectors’ ability to “police this law effectively, even if they add a smoking check on their yearly visit.” Although she knew that violations had taken place, she was “by and large...satisfied with the present “acrimonious.” He felt at the time that anti-smoking regulation had to be developed gradually—if nonsmokers pushed for precipitous change that dropped the axe on everyone, “we’d get slapped down.” Telephone interview with Michael Keable, St. Joseph, MN (Mar. 20, 2009). The Board of Health, which was the Health Department’s administrative body, was composed of 16 members, nine of whom broadly represented licensed health professionals and six of whom were public members. The Minnesota Legislative Manual: 1975-1976, at 361-62 (listing only six members with health-related degrees).

Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Mar. 27, 2009) (original chief of enforcement of MCIAA).

Gordon Slovut, “State Health Board Gives No Quarter to Smoking Foe,” Minneapolis Star, Oct. [10], 1975 (1A, 4A), Bates No. TIMN0462141/2.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

situation,” which was just a “‘first step.’” Bohr, the executive vice president of the Minnesota Restaurant Association, must have been more than satisfied when, at the end of November, he received a letter from the St. Paul police chief after the later had reviewed the proposed MCIAA rules:

Violation of the law, as far as we can determine, is a misdemeanor of the lowest order and as such will receive absolutely no attention from our Department except as it might be necessary to respond to specific complaints occurring within our jurisdictions. To date we have received no complaints and have taken no action, and we are not anticipating any great change in that area of police activity.

In fact, in so far as I can determine, the whole thrust of the regulation is directed toward some sort of health and welfare inspection program. If anyone is really serious about enforcing the Statute and the regulations to the letter of the law, it seems to me it speaks toward hiring some sort of an army, armed with citation booklets and loosed upon the unsuspecting public for some yet undetermined purpose.

Sure looks like a money-maker, if nothing else. Bohr recycled this written expression of manifest revulsion against his police force’s involvement in enforcing such a law by a Twin Cities police chief bubbling over with such undisguised bias against the mere thought of protecting nonsmokers.

Nor was the police department the only St. Paul government agency aiding and abetting the pro-smoking forces. Far more astonishing was the set of comments on the state Health Department’s proposed MCIAA rules submitted to Peterson by the Deputy Health Officer of the Division of Public Health of St. Paul’s Department of Community Services. Based on his staff’s review of the draft rules, Edward Eberhardt underscored “a very severe bias toward the rights of non-smokers as opposed to those of smokers.” Without revealing what those latter rights were and what qualifying expertise he, qua public health official, possessed to evaluate them in relation to the former, he believed that both had to be considered, though he also found “the entire concept to be distasteful.” While acknowledging that that bias was “perhaps, the intent of the law,” he nevertheless

670 Harry Wilensky, “Effort to Ban Smoking Results in Murky Law,” St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Nov. 16, 1975 (1), Bates No. TIMN0240663.

671 Richard Rowan to W. J. Bohr (Nov. 25, 1975), Bates No. TIMN0462137.

672 Bohr later quoted it. “Statement of Chum Bohr” (Sept. 15, 1978), Bates No. 500024298/301-2. He also attached a copy of the letter to his post-Board of Health hearing statement, claiming that it “establishes [t]he inability of the State and local Health Department to enforce the law against the smoking violator...” W. J. “Chum” Bohr to Kent Peterson (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

found it worthy of criticism that “many of the areas affected are, by their characteristics, of such a nature that they could designated only as a non-smoking area.” He implicitly contested the entire tenability of the MCIAA by characterizing its core feature, the “acceptable smoke-free area,” as “an impractical requirement relative to existing practice.” In particular, he called attention to his inability to grasp the process of reevaluation that tobacco use was undergoing by admitting that “I find it completely out of the realm of my imagination to envision compliance by a bowling alley if they must designate smoking areas.” Beyond his failure to perceive any overriding public health interest as between smokers and those exposed to their smoke, Eberhardt shared one concern with the police chief—shielding his “already overburdened staff” from “a considerable influx of complaints.”

The December 2, 1975 Public Hearing on the Rules to Implement the MCIAA

At the time of the hearings, the local newspapers as well as TV stations carried the story. I was particularly concerned because one of the local TV stations, WCCO, captured some film of some health department officials, including bigwigs, sneaking cigarettes, during the break. At the time, the Commissioner, Assist. Commissioners, and others were smokers, and the [sic] smoking was permitted in offices at the Department. I implored one of the reporters not to broadcast health dept. officials puffing on their heaters during breaks from the hearing. He didn’t.

On October 23, the Board of Health ordered that a public hearing on the proposed rules be held on December 2. During the combined nine-hour public 673 Edward Eberhardt to Kent Peterson (October 31, 1975), in Health Department, Minn. State Archives, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

674 Email from Terry O’Brien to Marc Linder (Apr. 8, 2009). In 1975 O’Brien was an assistant attorney general who both assisted Kent Peterson in drafting the Board of Health rules and acted as its lawyer at the public hearing.

675 Before the Minnesota Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, Order for Hearing (Oct. 23, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The hearing was to be held directly preceding one conducted by DLI. Before the Minnesota Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, Notice of Hearing (Oct. 27, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Earlier the hearings themselves had been tentatively scheduled for October 23. Schedule for Regulations Regarding Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act (n.d.), h "trotted out" the proposed MCIAA regulations. The more than seven of those hours that were held under the auspices of the State Board of Health witnessed wide-ranging attacks on the law and agency rules by building and business owners, although the approximately 150 people in the audience were “clearly on the side of nonsmokers, applauding when persons testified how they had been bothered by smoking in restaurants, offices, while waiting in line at banks and bus stations, and even in restrooms.” (Ironically, the entire back page of the following day’s issue of the St. Paul Pioneer Press that reported on the hearing was devoted to an ad for Marlboro.) In contrast, the audience at the Labor and Industry Department hearing, which did not begin until after 5 p.m., was, according to ANSR, “very small” and engaged in limited discussion. In addition to the presentation of ANSR’s policy statement, the vice president of the Minnesota AFL-CIO, Leonard LaShomb, merely explained that he “had not heard much” from union members about the smoking regulations for factories and warehouses.

The proposed rules on which witnesses commented differed from the draft that had been submitted by the staff to the Board of Health most saliently with regard to a new limitation and two gaping exceptions to it. Under the general provision governing smoking-permitted areas: “One and only one smoking permitted area shall be designated per room. However, rooms containing at least 20,000 square feet...in total floor space may designate more than one smoking permitted area....” Then under the special sub-rule governing workplaces as one of the “categories of affected places,” the Health Department added yet another huge exception to the just created “one and only one smoking permitted area per room” rule: in workplaces “not customarily frequented by the general public” the same room “may contain several, separate no smoking and smoking permitted areas provided” that the former were at least 200 square feet in area.\(^{682}\) New, too, was the related provision that: “In a public place which contains two or more rooms which are used for the activity, the responsible person may designate one entire room as smoking permitted as long as at least one other comparable room has been designated as a no-smoking area.”\(^{683}\) All of these changes sparked controversy analyzed below.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Hearing Examiner David Giese explained at the outset of the Board of Health hearing that the proposed rules had been divided into 14 sections on which testimony would be received seriatim from witnesses,\(^{684}\) who, by the end of the marathon session, numbered 36.\(^ {685}\) On the first section, which dealt with the authority, scope, and purpose of the rules, only the bill’s principal author, Phyllis Kahn, offered testimony. In addressing what she “perceive[d] as the legislative intent in the passage of this law,” Kahn observed that “[t]he basic problem has been that for much too long, smokers have claimed all air as their inalienable territorial right, thus, it requires a special effort to assert that the right to be free from tobacco smoke transcends any right to smoke tobacco and must in the interests of public health prevail when the two are in conflict.\footnote{Statement by Rep. Phyllis Kahn for the Hearing on Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act (Dec. 2, 1975), in Legislative, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B). This part of Kahn’s statement is quoted from this source because the transcript’s version is incorrect and incomprehensible.}

After wandering off point to join ANSR in urging rejection of the DLI rules as “totally inadequate,” she also emphasized that although nothing in the law implied a balance between smokers’ and nonsmokers’ rights (or even required designation of smoking areas), neither the law nor “hopefully the regulations to be adopted” sought to “eliminate smoking”; rather, they “seek to establish the right to breathe clean air as a fundamental public right.”\footnote{Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 10-12 (Dec. 2, 1975).}

Comment then proceeded to the crucial and contentious issue of the regulatory definition of an “Acceptable Smoke-Free Area,” which accordingly attracted extensive testimony, none of which, however, challenged the agency’s insertion of the non-statutory modifier “acceptable.” Such an objection might have been expected from ANSR, but its representative, Edward Brandt, the organization’s legislative committee chair—who later recalled that business representatives’ testimony had “made it clear that many employers considered any requirement to do anything to protect the health and comfort of non-smokers to be unreasonable interference”\footnote{Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007).}—concisely signaled that awareness of the intense counter-pressures that political-economically powerful owners of covered public places were bringing to bear on the Health Department was prompting ANSR to make do with much less than fulfillment of its maximum agenda:

Ideally, the Association for Non-Smokers Rights would like to see a stronger definition of a smoke-free area than is contained in here, because we do not believe that it is going to completely resolve the problem of insuring that smokers /sic/ have a right to breathe fresh air. Nevertheless, in keeping with the extensive consultations which the staff members of the Board of Health have participated in in trying to get the comments of various parties who are interested in and affected by these regulations, we feel that what is contained in here...is a reasonable compromise, even though it falls short of our ideal. We believe that it does take into consideration the legitimate concerns of people with varying interests.\footnote{Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 12-13 (Dec. 2, 1975). The “/sic/” was inserted by the court reporter. See also “Proposed No-Smoking Rules Called Too Strict.”}
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

In order to understand what ANSR (and owners\textsuperscript{690} of covered public places) were reacting to, it is necessary to discuss the Health Department’s explanation of “acceptable smoke-free area” in its “Justification,” which was included as one of the hearing exhibits. The Department was careful to point out that this definition ostensibly implemented MCIAA’s (only) provision to use the term “smoke-free area”\textsuperscript{691}—namely, § 6, which made it owners’ responsibility to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place by...arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area...” (That is, “arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area” was one of four alternative means of making “reasonable efforts to prevent smoking.”)

Although the Department did not mention this issue in explaining its definition of the phrase, later in the “Justification,” when dealing with the operative rule that required owners to “make arrangements for” the “acceptable smoke-free area”\textsuperscript{692} defined earlier, it characterized the statutory phrase

\textsuperscript{690} The December 2 proposed rules included for the first time definitions of the terms “proprietor or other person(s) in charge of a public place(s)” used in §§ 5-6 of the MCIAA. “Proprietor,” which applied to a corporation and an individual, meant “the party, regardless of whether he is owner or lessee of the public place, who ultimately controls, governs or directs the activities within the public place” and did “not mean the owner of the property unless he ultimately controls, governs or directs the activities within the public place.” Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 442(l) at 5 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). “Other person in charge” was awkwardly defined as “the agent of the proprietor authorized to perform [sic; should be “give”?] administrative direction to and [perform] general supervision of the activities within the public place at any given time.” Id. MHD 442(i) at 4. Finally, the regulatory term “responsible person” meant the “proprietor or other person in charge.” Id. MHD 442(n) at 5.

\textsuperscript{691} Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 3 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\textsuperscript{692} MDH 443(d) (Oct. 1, 1975). Glossing MCIAA § 5, this sub-rule (which was retained in the final rules as MDH 443(e)) also provided that the “size and location of any smoking permitted area shall be determined such that toxic effects of smoking are minimized in the adjacent no smoking area.” In turn, the Health Department glossed its own rule by arguing that § 5 of the statute gave the Department “authority to require that the size and location of any smoking permitted area shall be determined such that the toxic effects of smoke are minimized in the adjacent no smoking area. While the proprietor still has general flexibility to designate a smoking permitted area as the business operation dictates, there must be a certain over-riding concern for the toxic effects of smoking which “arranging seating to provide a smoke[-]free area” as “ambiguous.” 693 Exactly what that ambiguity was the staff failed to mention. Nor, at first glance, does “smoke-free” appear to be, even in the slightest way, capable of two or more interpretations; on the contrary, the term appears to be especially unequivocal and translucent. After all, the legislature could have required the area to be merely nonsmoking or smoking free; that it did not so choose might have had been linked to the fact that the MCIAA’s hallmark was its ban on smoking everywhere except in smoking-permitted areas (rather than requiring certain areas to be nonsmoking). 694 However, since the statute did use the term “non-smoking areas” and “no-smoking area” in § 5, it certainly could have used the term in § 6. That it instead used “smoke-free” could therefore prompt the conclusion that the legislature envisioned three kinds of areas: smoking permitted, nonsmoking, and smoke-free, in the last of which both smoking and smoke from smoking-permitted areas would be prohibited. Indeed, it is only by interjecting § 5 that the “Justification” was able to create the appearance/semblance of an ambiguity where otherwise none would have been in sight. That section provided that: “Where smoking areas are designated, existing physical barriers and ventilation systems shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoking in adjacent non-smoking areas.” In contrast, § 6 did not deal with minimizing the drift of smoke from smoking-permitted areas into smoke-free areas, but with the “prevent[ion of] smoking in the public place” altogether by means of signs, “arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area,” and “asking smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke.” In other words, whereas § 5 contemplated that smoking would continue to take place and 693 Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 21 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

694 As the head of ANSR’s public awareness committee looked back at her efforts to explain to owners their obligations under MCIAA: “What I...remember is how difficult it was for people to see that what we were telling them was that they had to find a place for the smokers, not the non-smokers.” Email from Glenna Mills to Marc Linder (Nov. 1, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

that owners would be required to take at least one physical measure to reduce the smoke’s drift into nonsmoking areas, § 6 contemplated that no smoking would take place and that therefore the nonsmokers would be seated in a (completely) smoke-free area.

The major interpretive obstacle that this reading must confront (other than that apparently no one at the time championed it) is how to identify these two different areas; the only assistance that the statutory text offered was that § 5 specified that a public place consisting of a single room may contain a merely “no-smoking area” on “one side of the room,” which would be subject to the owner’s duty to “minimize the toxic effects of smoke” emanating from the adjacent other side of the room. It also turned out that § 6 did contain an ambiguity after all, albeit not one to which the Department called attention: since the “smoke-free area” resulted from arranging seating, smoke-freedom would not have been mandatory in areas that lacked seating—a conclusion that suggested that the legislature was concerned with situations/places in which nonsmokers were spending more extended periods of time (and therefore were sitting) as opposed to ones in which they were transiently moving through an area or standing for shorter periods.695

Neglecting these subtleties, the treatment of the definition by the “Justification,” favoring the agentless passive and running together §§ 5 and 6,696 declared: “It is felt that the term ‘acceptable smoke-free area’ is more appropriate to use in regulations because only ‘reasonable’ efforts are necessary and designation of a smoking permitted area is allowable. Therefore, the law does not necessarily expect 100% ‘smoke-free’ conditions and ‘acceptability’ of the no-

695 The Health Department turned this logical structure on its head when it not only defined, in the sub-rule, “acceptable smoke-free area” to mean a “contiguous portion of the public place...including seating arrangement,” but also glossed the sub-rule as necessarily including seating arrangements “so that a proprietor does not designate non-seating portions of the public places as the only no-smoking area.” MHD 442(a)(1) (Oct. 1, 1975); Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 3 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

696 The Board of Health went even further in this direction by finding that since § 6 required a smoke-free area and § 5 required use of existing barriers/ventilation to minimize toxic smoke effects, MHD 442(a) “merely clarifies the optional conditions available to proprietors to maintain a ‘smoke-free area.’” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 4 at 2 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
smoking area is the real question.”697 Because the “reasonable efforts” of § 6 refer to prevention of smoking rather than to achievement of smoke-freedom, the Department failed to demonstrate that it had persuasively identified the legislature’s intent to mean “non-smoking” both when it used “non-smoking” and “smoke-free area.” The Health Department belittled and debased the legislature’s choice of a smoke-free standard even further when it characterized the carbon monoxide threshold level as the measurement “for determination of relative smoke-free conditions....”698

Acquiescence by the state’s premier anti-smoking organization in an administrative standard of smoke-freedom that was at best a misnomer ensured that no individual criticisms of 56-inch barriers and four-foot spaces would prompt the agency to strengthen the criteria.699 In contrast, businesses were not satisfied with the concessions that the Health Department had made to smoking. Indeed, a broad front of businesses and business organizations, led by Pillsbury Company’s representative, Raymond B. Jones, flayed the Department’s effort to regulate smoking among white-collar employees in offices. After digressing to attack the “double standard” that was “unfair to all employees” resulting from the fact that 13 of Pillsbury’s installations were subject to the Board of Health’s jurisdiction and 9 to the Labor Department’s and recommending that both agencies adopt the latter’s (extraordinarily relaxed rules), Jones urged striking...
"continuous" as modifying "barriers" on the grounds that it was "vague." In the event, he attempted to explain neither what could possibly be vague about "continuous" nor how any protection whatsoever could be provided nonsmokers if smoking and nonsmoking sections were, at intervals, separated by nothing.

President Oliver Perry of the 1,700-member Minnesota Association of Commerce and Industry briefly complained about the "unduly restrictive" conditions imposed by barriers and spaces, which might undermine efficiency and morale in offices. Expanding on these points in a written statement that he did not read, Perry—whose remarks were surely most congenial to the R. J. Reynolds top executives and TI President Kornegay who were on the list to which the newspaper clipping reporting Perry’s them was circulated—claimed that employers embedded their drive for "maximum efficiency in an environment responsive to employee needs," whereas erecting barriers and rearranging space “to comply with regulations for which there is no demonstrated need or demand would be counter [sic] productive.” Conjuring up another specter, the state’s principal employers organization implausibly imputed reason to a demand by its class antagonist: Perry warned that it was “entirely reasonable that organized labor would request special concessions for smokers if these proposed rules are implemented.” Constructing nonsmokers and unions as mutually exclusive, he predicted that “[i]f such a request became a part of the collective bargaining agreement, then non-smokers could demand the same” presumably for paid breaks.

Associated Industries of Minneapolis pushed MACI’s arguments beyond the breaking point. When Donald Lenarz, presumably without a shred of irony, insisted that “[c]ertainly a barrier of at least 56 inches in height, even with the three or four foot interval, could as effectively separate smoking permitted and no smoking areas as could the four foot space,” the grain of truth that underlay his claim was the latter’s fecklessness. Based on what he had heard at the

---

700 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 16 (Dec. 2, 1975).
701 Statement of Oliver S. Perry Before State Board of Health at 1 (Ex. 22, Dec. 22, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
702 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 18 (Dec. 2, 1975).
703 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 154 (Dec. 2, 1975).
705 Statement of Oliver S. Perry Before State Board of Health at 5 (Ex. 22, Dec. 22, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
706 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 20 (Dec. 2, 1975). AIM also urged both the acceptability of lower (51-inch) barriers and the total elimination of smoking/no-smoking sections if the public place satisfied the ventilation standard. Id. at 20-21.

707Donald Lenarz to Hearing Examiner (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

708Bohr’s level of competence was painfully on display during the discussion of the definition of “bar,” when he got down to metaphysical brass tacks: “Dining in a supper club is not just dining, it’s an emotional experience.” Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 36 (Dec. 2, 1975). See also Gordon Slovut, “Rival Views Cloud Hearing on Smoking Law,” Minneapolis Star, Dec. 2, 1975, Bates No. TIMN0461869. Debating the law that allegedly interfered with that experience at a public hearing in the Minnesota Health Department Building at which smoking was prohibited apparently did not produce the same level of frustration. Lewis Cope, “The Air Doesn’t Clear After Debate on New Nonsmokers’ Rights Law,” MT, Dec. 3, 1975, Bates No. TIMN0461866.

709W. J. “Chum” Bohr to Kent Peterson (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, Minn. State Archives, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
by declaring that the provision under discussion was “clearly an over-extension of the law” and “prohibitive,” not only because many businesses were unable to afford “sophisticated ventilation systems,” but also “because of limited space, can neither meet the four foot separation or [sic] provide physical barriers. There are hundreds and hundreds of little ten-stool truck stops in this particular category.”

Bohr’s arguments prompted the first of several remarkable interventions by drafter Peterson regarding “our justification for these rules.” Assuring regulatees that Bohr’s point that the law did not require any additional barriers or ventilation system was “well taken,” he explained that “[t]hat is why there is the (dd) section requiring an objective standard of carbon monoxide concentration.” Consequently, small businesses would be free, instead, to “combine those mechanisms or use some other system to provide an area that has less than nine parts per million of carbon monoxide at all times.” The Health Department, in other words, had adroitly avoided giving grounds for judicial invalidation of the rule by pointing out that it in no way had fallen into the trap of imposing a requirement that the legislature had expressly declined. Effectively, however, it imposed a requirement that the legislature had not mentioned at all—the four-foot-wide space between smoking-permitted and nosmoking sections.

And when the Minnesota Retail Federation repeated businesses’ (physically wholly implausible) claims that existing barriers that were neither 56 inches high nor continuous “will adequately prevent smoke infiltration,” Peterson again felt called upon to comment. This time, however, his response rejected opponents’ mystifying position, but also made the agency’s standard vulnerable to contestation, and potentially, invalidation:

---

710 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 24-25 (Dec. 2, 1975).
711 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 26 (Dec. 2, 1975). Sub-section 4 of the draft rules of September 9/12 had expressly included, as noted above, the (ungrammatical) directive that “[b]y using a combination of the ventilation system, isle [sic] space or physical barriers, the concentration of carbon monoxide in the no smoking area shall at no time exceed 10 milligrams per cubic meter,” but this “combination” clause was eliminated from later drafts.
713 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 27 (Dec. 2, 1975).
While few observers (who did not imagine that smoking restrictions would undermine their livelihoods) with their senses of smell and sight intact might have disagreed with Peterson’s skepticism regarding the smoke-shielding capacity of lower barriers, he himself had now cast doubt on the science base of the Department’s own claim that 56-inch barriers (or four-foot-wide spaces) would create “acceptable smoke-free areas.” Later, when the subject reemerged, one hearing participant who characterized the height as having been “arrived at arbitrarily,” suggested that “scientific data” should be gathered or tests conducted to determine whether such a barrier was in fact ineffective in separating smoking and nonsmoking areas. Peterson injected himself to remark that he was “certain” that in the course of implementation the Department would make such a determination, but then, prejudging any such undertaking (which never took place), he asserted, without citing any evidence, that “56 inches is adequate for seated individuals. And it does significantly deter the drifting of smoke for people who are standing.” Still later in the hearing Peterson appeared stymied when pressed to explain the basis for the Health Department’s “intent” that a 56-inch barrier, four-foot-wide space, ventilation system with six air changes and a supply of at least 7.5 cubic feet of tempered outside air per minute per person, and carbon monoxide concentration no more than nine parts per million in excess of that in the outside air within 12 feet of the building would “accomplish generally the same results.” Asked by his interlocutor whether, in developing the rules, he had research results showing such equivalence, Peterson stumbled: “Well, this is the intent, that physical barriers do that.” Told directly that to state such an equivalence “without any research support” was not adequate, the chief drafter failed even to venture a justification: “I see your point. Thank you.”

714 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 67-68 (Dec. 2, 1975) (Steve Olson).
715 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 151-52 (Dec. 2, 1975) (Bennett Davis). This discussion took place in the context of the prerequisite of achieving the aforementioned carbon monoxide concentration for receiving a waiver: if this criterion was the fundamental one, it created an opaque enforcement situation for the public, who would be unable to smell, let alone, measure the CO, 10 milligrams per cubic meter of which were deemed to be “the chemical definition of ‘acceptable smoke-free air’” because exposure to that concentration for eight hours could produce carboxyhemoglobin blood levels in excess of two percent, against which the preponderance of research literature indicated that humans needed to be protected. Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 9 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Although the Department of Health was well aware that tobacco smoke consisted of hundreds of gases and particles (including carcinogenic benzo(a)pyrene), it selected CO “as the chemical to be measured for determination of relative smoke-free conditions because equipment is readily available to Indeed, even the Department’s formal “Justification,” which became publicly available at the time of the hearing, offered absolutely no scientific (or any other type of) evidence to support the assertion that a 56-inch-high barrier could “demonstrate that an area is ‘acceptably smoke-free,’” let alone that such a barrier did or could stand in any empirical relationship to the maximum measure the level in air and carbon monoxide is one of the most dangerous absorbed gases in tobacco smoke.” Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 7 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Whatever the availability of such equipment, in fact Health Department inspectors never measured CO. See above this ch.

The explanatory “Justification” of the proposed rules, which set forth the reasoning to support, inter alia, the barrier height and space width requirements, was lacking in the file on the MCIAA regulations maintained at the Health Department. Telephone interview with John Olson (Enforcement Coordinator, Indoor Air Unit, Minnesota Health Department), St. Paul (Mar. 31, 2009). Fortunately, however, a copy was located at the Minnesota State Archives/Historical Society. Many years later Kent Peterson spoke of having prepared the Statement of Need and Reasonableness. Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Apr. 2, 2009). However, this precise terminology appears not to have been used in the Minnesota Statutes until 1982. Minnesota Statutes § 14.23 (1982). To be sure, the legislature amended the Administrative Procedure Act in 1975 so that “[a]t the public hearing the agency shall make an affirmative presentation of facts establishing the need for and reasonableness of the rule proposed for adoption,” but this requirement did not go into effect until July 1, 1976. 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 380, § 2, at 1285, 1287. The APA in effect at the time the Health Department was proposing the MCIAA rules did require administrative rules before being adopted to be based on a “showing of need for the rule,” which, together with the reasons for it, had to be submitted to the attorney general. 1974 Minn. Laws ch. 344, § 2(4), at 577. See generally, George Beck et al., Minnesota Administrative Procedure 8-14 (1987). Beck, who was an administrative law judge within the Office of Administrative Hearings from its inception in 1976 until 2005 and had been a hearing officer in the Commerce Department from 1973 to 1975, stated that prior to 1976 the statements that agencies had provided to the Attorney General had been very brief (one page) and had not adequately explained the basis for proposed regulations. Telephone interview with George Beck, St. Louis Park, MN (Apr. 15, 2009). A lawyer at the Minnesota Office of Administrative Hearings, which after 1975 was given centralized authority over agency rules hearings, stated that administrative proceedings before that time were “pretty wild west.” Telephone interview with Michael Lewis, St. Paul (Apr. 9, 2009). Dr. Lawson, the Board of Health secretary and executive officer, did sign a Statement of Need, but it was merely a brief recitation of the legislature’s mandate to the Board to adopt rules. Before the Minnesota Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, Statement of Need (n.d.), Exhibit 9 (Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
acceptable CO level (10 mg/m$^3$). The crucial question as to how a barrier over which tobacco smoke drifted could possibly fulfill its assigned function of reducing the CO level to acceptable from above acceptable—after all, since the CO level was the ultimate touchstone, if the acceptable level had already existed, there would have been no need for a barrier—the Health Department never posed, let alone answered. Although the Department neither presented nor needed scientific evidence to bolster its commonsensical rejection of non-continuous barriers “because a sufficient degree of interrupted horizontal air flow could not be assured,” when it came to the criterion of height, the “Justification” merely claimed that the 56-inch standard “was selected because 56 inches or more is sufficient to completely interrupt the direct flow of smoke from seated persons and to provide partial deterrence of the smoke from indirect drifting of smoke.”

The Health Department staff never even tried to explain what “interrupt” meant or where and into whose air space the smoke drifted after the interruption was over.

For the four-foot-wide space separating smoking-permitted and no-smoking areas, which turned out to be public places’ principal means of satisfying the “acceptable smoke-free area” standard, the Health Department never even purported to offer any public health-based justification. The only pseudo-explanation it was able to devise was that four feet was “a standard, accepted distance of comfortable aisle space which is used in commercial establishments.” That some relevant and plausible relationship existed between a distance that owners used to avoid customers’ chairs’ being backed into one another or other undesirable entanglements such as drowning out conversations and one that would protect nonsmokers from drifting smoke the Department was prudent 718 Although the Department’s ventilation system requirements may have been better grounded (in the building code and recommendations of the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air-Conditioning Engineers), the staff incautiously admitted that satisfying that standard might not suffice and that reinforcement by yet another standard might be necessary despite the rule’s requiring owners to meet only one: “With an adequate ventilation system in use the level of toxic products from smoking would not exceed low concentrations and it is reasonable that no health danger would result. While there may be minor discomfort among the people most allergic to smoke, this discomfort would be minimal if the non-smokers are separated from smokers in some manner.” Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 4-5 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

---

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

enough to refrain from making itself ridiculous by trying to demonstrate. Instead, the only justification it set forth pertained to the question as to why it did not impose a wider “neutral zone”; and here the reason had absolute nothing to do with public health: “Widths greater than four feet were considered but these were rejected because of a possible adverse economic effect on commercial establishments which would keep an unusually wide ‘aisle space’ to be [sic] in compliance with the Act and these rules.”\textsuperscript{719} Despite the Department’s failure to address the issue, let alone to provide any reason whatsoever for this wildly implausible claim, the Board of Health crowned this charade by finding that four feet was “of sufficient distance to minimize toxic effects of smoke.”\textsuperscript{720}

Most striking about the origins of these crucial methods for implementing the compromise that the legislature struck between protecting nonsmokers from secondhand smoke and permitting the owners of public places to continue to permit people to smoke by minimizing the toxic impact of drifting tobacco smoke is that they were adopted from general considerations guiding seating capacity and spacing in public buildings totally unrelated to the (hopeless) task of blocking the movement of tobacco smoke. Why the Health Department concluded that such dimensions adopted from irrelevant functions would have served at all, let alone maximally, to preclude the spread of toxic smoke is unclear.\textsuperscript{721}

\textsuperscript{719}Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 4 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\textsuperscript{721}The Health Department official who drafted the proposed regulations, asked 34 years later for the sources of these two requirements, observed: “I do recall real difficulty finding existing standards from anywhere to use for [sic] basis for specific distances or heights. We got suggestions from interested parties in Minnesota but there were no other states with standards at the time. I was not aware of anyone in the surgeon general’s office or at HEW to ask for standards. I am not aware that they were working on the smoking/non-smoking area concept. I recall researching the height of barriers and distances used to create separation when people are seated in public buildings. I got information about the commercially available barriers and typical building practices. I recall that barrier height was easier than distance...for height we could use the height to create visible separate [sic; should be separation] when seated...that’s the justification for 56 inches. I do not recall the basis for 4 feet...but there must have been something similar; it was a practical rule of thumb or really just a compromise.” Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Apr. 4, 2009). The assistant attorney general who helped Peterson draft
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Before testimony was taken on other definitions, Hearing Examiner Giese interrupted the announced schedule to permit the MCIAA’s chief Senate sponsor, David Schaff, who had a conflict with a legislative committee meeting, to comment on whichever rules he wished. In the event, he chose, before entertaining questions about legislative intent, to dwell on only one aspect. His concern about endangering the health of nonsmokers in single-room eating places, even where they were apportioned half the room, and especially the specter he raised of going further “if the legislation isn’t proper,” may have been designed to dampen the opposition of restaurant owners.722

When testimony moved on to other proposed definitions, Oliver Perry of MACI picked up where Radisson had left off in its aforementioned letter to Peterson several months earlier protesting a definition of “place of work” broad enough to encompass private homes in which two or more people such as an “upstairs and downstairs maid” or two “catereses” [sic] were employed—an outcome that Perry believed would surprise and dismay legislators and the general public. The comment prompted Peterson to justify the threshold of two employees, but he failed to engage the debate about private residences despite Perry’s repetition of his challenge.723 (The Health Department nevertheless yielded: the final rules provided that they “shall not apply to a private residence when the residence is not customarily used as a ‘place of work.’”724 Its Findings of Fact expressly declared that this “specific exclusion is found to be necessary based on” Perry’s hearing testimony.)725

the rules and represented the health commissioner at the public hearing on the proposed rules recounted that: “I know we had some written record to support what I refer to as the ‘engineering’ stuff. Even in those days, the Commissioner couldn’t just pull out a number without offering a reasonable basis. It may have been brief; it may have lacked many citations, but it would have been in writing and a part of the record. The APA was going through huge changes at that time, but by then it was clear that a bureaucrat couldn’t just pull some standard out of his rear, establish it, enforce it and fine for its violation. There had to be some justification.” Email from Terry O’Brien to Marc Linder (Apr. 8, 2009).

723 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 53-54 (Dec. 2, 1975).
724 Rules As Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 444(b)(2) (Apr. 2, 1976) (copy furnished by MHD), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
725 Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 31 at 11 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The Board of Health suggested that it made the change because the broad sweep had not been intentional: “clarifying language” was called for because “the inclusion
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Deviating from the procedure until that point, a member of the public directly asked Peterson what the (very contentious) term “one side of the room” meant. In lieu of answering, the chief drafter merely stated that since it had been “felt” that the statutory phrase was not clear, a definitional rule was needed to “clarify that ambiguity.” Unenlightened, the participant asked more specifically: “Does that mean half the room or just if there are 18 rows, with one side of the room with one row?” This time Peterson obliged that it did “not necessarily mean one-half of the room. ... So any group section of the room would be adequate.” 726 Despite the obvious debilitating impact that such lopsidedness could exert on public health, neither ANSR nor anyone else pursued the issue.

Having gone through the regulatory definitions, the hearing then proceeded to the general provisions, the first of which dealt with another contentious subject—smoking-permitted areas, testimony on which was extensive. The Health Department had inserted the two aforementioned significant changes into this section following presentation of a draft on October 1 for the Board of Health meeting on October 9. First, it limited the number of smoking-permitted areas per room, but then did an about-face and created an exception: “One and only one smoking permitted area shall be designated per room. However, rooms containing at least 20,000 square feet (6,096 1820 square meters) in total floor space may designate more than one smoking permitted area and shall otherwise comply with these rules.” 727 And second, the Health Department staff added a

---

726 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 55-56 (Dec. 2, 1975) (Merle Stone).

727 Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 443(a)(1) (n.d. [Dec. 2, 1975]), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Though unable to recall the matter decades later, Peterson acknowledged that because a private residence was such maids’ place of employment and home, the question “would still be unclear for maids.” Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 22, 2009).
new subsection providing that: “In a public place which contains two or more rooms which are used for the activity, the responsible person may designate one entire room as smoking permitted as long as at least one other comparable room has been designated as a no-smoking area.” The Health Department staff sought to justify the exception for rooms with at least 20,000 square feet of floor space “in recognition that it would be reasonable for the smokers to walk a distance of no more than approximately 5,000 feet to find a smoking permitted area. Assuming approximately square dimensions of a room, the room containing at least 20,000 square feet in total floor space is the type of room which would apply to this concept. [F]or airport terminals and other extremely large rooms, it is reasonable for this section to be included.”

Before touching on the staff’s difficult relationship with the Pythagorean Theorem, it is crucial to observe the complete disconnect between the MCIAA’s purpose and any justifiable basis for this exception. The Health Department declared that “[t]o remain consistent with the intent of the legislation and to help assure an acceptable smoke free [sic] area in the public place, this rule requires that there be one and only one smoking permitted area per room.” It then argued that the exception for large rooms was “permitted in recognition” of what would be a reasonable distance for smokers to walk to reach an area in which it would not be unlawful to smoke. Such a standard, however, was totally irrelevant to what was in fact the sole relevant criterion in this context—namely, whether should have read “may” since the MCIAA (§ 5) did not impose any duty on owners to permit smoking anywhere. And second, grammatically rather than legally erroneous was the imputation of agency to “rooms” in designating themselves smoking-permitted.

Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 443(a)(2) (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

permitting multiple smoking-permitted areas in such rooms would “assure an acceptable smoke[-]free area” in that room. By failing either to scrutinize this criterion or to cap the number of smoking-permitted areas in such large rooms\textsuperscript{731} the Health Department facilitated the constriction of smoke-free areas. As for the 5,000-foot rule, perhaps it was whimsically chosen for its propinquity to the iconic mile that smokers were alleged to be willing to walk for at least one brand of cigarette.\textsuperscript{732} In any event, it could not possibly have been the straight-line distance that anyone would have had to walk in a 20,000-square-foot, approximately square-dimensioned room,\textsuperscript{733} in which 200 feet would be the greatest such distance. If the Health Department really meant 5,000 feet, the room in question would have had to have been 25 million square feet (with sides ca. 3,535.5 feet long), the non-existence of which in Minnesota would have redounded to nonsmokers’ benefit.

No Radisson representative spoke up at the Health Board public hearing in December, but the post-hearing written comments submitted by Brooks may have reinforced the Health Department staff’s desire to avoid judicial challenges to the rules by striking offending provisions. Brooks insisted that section 5 of the MCIAA, which specifically provided that “[s]moking areas may be designated by proprietors...except in places in which smoking is prohibited by the fire marshall, or by other law, ordinance or regulation” was “in direct opposition” to the proposed ban on smoking-permitted areas in common traffic areas: “The Department of Health is without authority to adopt such a restriction.”\textsuperscript{734}

\textsuperscript{731} The sub-rule (MHD 444(b)(1)) requiring that no-smoking areas be at least 200 square feet might have acted as a de facto cap, but it applied only to workplaces not customarily frequented by the general public. This sub-rule was in its own right dysfunctional since, as shown below, it made “checkerboarding” possible. In response to the complaint by Jones of Pillsbury Company about the alleged arbitrariness of the 20,000 square foot standard Peterson pointed to the sub-rule as permitting more than one smoking-permitted area in rooms under that size. Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 92-93 (Dec. 2, 1975).

\textsuperscript{732} Roberta Rand, an ANSR member and employee in the Minneapolis Police Department dispatch office, was able to use this joke, to applause, at the end of the hearing when, in response to a complaint about the hardship for smokers who had leave their workplaces to take a walk to smoke: “the tobacco industry has made a big play for, ‘I’d walk a mile for a camel [sic].’ So why don’t they?” Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 179 (Dec. 2, 1975).

\textsuperscript{733} The Health Department presumably added this condition because, at the extreme, a room (say) 10 feet wide and 2,000 feet long (which still would not have required a 5,000-foot walk) would have been so narrow as to preclude acceptable smoke-free areas.

\textsuperscript{734} Letter from William Brooks, Jr. to Warren Lawson at 1 (Dec. 22, 1975), in Health Astonishingly, the Health Department’s formulation of this sub-rule in the final rule turned the earlier version on its head by merely prohibiting the designation of common traffic areas in their entirety as smoking-permitted areas if non-smokers were required to use them and even authorizing “designation of a smoking-permitted area in a portion of the establishment which non-smokers must briefly cross to reach the intended activity.”735 Asked what might have prompted this reversal of policy, the chief drafter observed decades later: “It seems like a blatant gift to ‘smoking supporter’ but it is quite likely where we ended up. Such is the long process to avoid a contested rule. ... My charge was to write rules that accurately enforced the law and could be supported if there were a contested rule. I do not remember exactly which group would have appealed the rules but it was a constant issue. This was a milestone law and we wanted the rules to promote, not delay enforcement of the new law. As you know, that’s why compromises are made.”736 Incredibly, the Health Department staff in its post-Dec. 2, 1975 public hearing recommendation to the Board of Health that it adopt the final rules claimed that the “new language,” which had been “rewritten at the suggestion of several persons who felt that it was not understandable,” “has the same operative effect but is intended to be easier to understand.”737

---

736 Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Oct. 19, 2009).

737 “Adoption of Rules Implementing the Provisions of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). In contrast, Radisson secured no changes with its unspecified complaint that the legislature’s deletion of the provision in the original H.F. 79 making owners who wilfully failed to enforce MCIAA guilty of a misdemeanor barred the Board of Health from reimposing it. Id. at 2-3. Not only did Brooks fail to identify the rules that “attempt to make the proprietor...a policeman,” but he also ignored the fact that section 7(3) of MCIAA did empower the state board of health to seek injunctions of repeated violations of proprietors’ section 6 responsibilities, which included the duty to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place by” posting signs, “arranging seating to provide a smoke-free area,” “asking smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke,” “or by any other means which may be appropriate.” Brooks undermined his own critique of the proposed rules both by conceding that MCIAA “is designed and intended to provide a smoke-free area in public places for persons who desire such a facility “ and asserting that “Radisson hotels and restaurants have not opposed the concept of designating smoking and non-smoking areas” without reflecting on the fact that “smoke-free” was so much more comprehensive than “non-smoking” that achieving it might necessitate considerably greater restrictions on smoking than might otherwise have been anticipated. Id. at 3-4.
In point of fact, the process regarding this sub-rule was much more complex and many-layered than Peterson was able to reconstruct from memory. And although this radical change emerged, ironically, from an agreement that apparently formed spontaneously at the public hearing on December 2, the final outcome may not have represented a consensus. The General Metropolitan Area Hospitality Association, represented by attorney Gerald Singer, insisted that the common traffic area sub-rule “cause[d] more concern than any other single provision” because, for example, in order to seat someone in a single-room restaurant’s nosmoking area that was not located immediately at the entrance it was necessary to cross the smoking area—which, in many if not most restaurants, was the bar. The same problem occurred with respect to reaching the bathrooms, which were generally located in the bar area. Singer “recognize[d] the evil to which the proposed rule is sought to drive at, but nevertheless, compliance with this would require designation of basically the entire premises as a nosmoking area, or would entail the major revision and reconstruction work, which I don’t think was contemplated in the original act when they talked about existing barriers.” After Singer had complained about such renovation and the “great cost” that would be associated with it,738 Harry Erickson, a militant ANSR member from Minneapolis who spoke up more discrete times than anyone else at the hearing,739 cut Singer and the restaurant owners no slack in offering a guided tour of named “establishment after establishment” in which nonsmokers were exposed to smoking.740 Astonishingly, however, a little later Brandt himself took the floor to declare that Singer’s comment had been one of the few criticizing the proposed rules that “had some relevant factual basis and was not simply opposition to the intent of the law.” Marching much further toward compromise, he even “appreciate[d] the fact that strictly interpreted, that Subsection could create a problem for some kind of establishments. And I would not object to having some modification there to make clear that if the restaurant, for example, honestly tries to designate smoking and non-smoking areas, the fact that the smoking area would be next to an entrance or next to a washroom, that persons who would briefly have to go through such an area to get to the non-smoking area, this would be permissible.” In the event, the one caveat that he did attach to his quasi-official ANSR acquiescence was, as already shown, ignored by the Health Department: “I would urge you...to be very careful in any revision...to make sure that such a qualification would not be broader than would be necessary to accomplish the purpose in mind.” 741

739 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 48, 2 (Dec. 2, 1975).
740 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 71-73 (Dec. 2, 1975).

The Department diluted protection for nonsmokers as well in another location already shown to be inextricably interwoven with common traffic areas. Earlier in the hearing Singer had raised the issue of the definition of “bar,” which he insisted was “intended” to encompass the cocktail lounge area of a restaurant despite the fact that customers sometimes received food service there. Crucially, he admitted that such cocktail lounges were “always near the beginning [i.e., entrance] of the place. So that you can’t get anywhere without walking through it.” 742 Singer did not mention the potential problem, let alone call for its elimination—presumably because restaurant owners were already treating cocktail lounges as smoking areas 743—but the proposed rules being discussed at the hearing defined a “bar” as “any establishment where one can purchase and consume alcoholic beverages.” 744 Since a cocktail lounge was not an “establishment” in its own right, but merely part of a larger restaurant establishment whose owner, despite selling alcohol in the non-cocktail lounge eating areas, was barred by MCIAA from declaring the entire establishment smoking permitted, an interpretive obstacle to declaring the entire lounge smoking permitted existed. Instead of engaging and arguing against this lesser issue (which none of the participants appeared to grasp), two anti-smokers vociferously attacked the statutory exemption for bars as a “gigantic loophole within the law.” 745

But even after Peterson had intervened to point out that “we have to somehow balance the inclusion of restaurants and the exclusion of bars,” ANSR’s chief 741 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 83-84 (Dec. 2, 1975). In its Findings of Fact the Board of Health ratified this agreement between restaurant owners and ANSR, expressly basing the “qualification” permitting smoking-permitted areas to be “designated in a location which non-smokers may briefly cross to reach an intended activity” on Singer’s and Brandt’s testimony; it excused this additional smoke exposure on the grounds that the modified “rule will conform with [sic] the intent of the law without placing an undue burden on proprietors.” Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 24 at 9 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

---

742 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 34 (Dec. 2, 1975).

743 During the common traffic area discussion, Singer had used the example of a restaurant where “[y]ou have to walk by the bar where you are allowed to smoke.” Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 70 (Dec. 2, 1975).

744 MHD 442(c) (Dec. 2, 1975).

745 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 36 (Dec. 2, 1975) (Rohalio Lasso). Maria Mueller also wondered why the law was written to exclude bars. Id. at 39.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

representative, Brandt, failed to suggest that the proposed sub-rule be clarified to preclude within-restaurant cocktail lounges from attaining the status of totally exempt bars. Rather, his undifferentiated support for the regulatory status quo missed the issue altogether: “We strongly support the inclusion of the definition of a bar under (c), or something reasonably close to this definition as essential to carrying out the full intent of the law.”

In the event, the Health Department/Board of Health was attentive to what it characterized as the indication of “some confusion” in the hearing testimony (irrelevently citing Singer’s aforementioned statement that cocktails lounges were intended to be included within the definition of “bar”) “as to the status of a bar within an establishment and its relationship to the rest of the establishment.”

Following the hearing, the Department, whose “Justification” had not discussed this sub-issue of the definition of “bar,” recommended to the Board that the additional phrase “or portion of an establishment” be adopted to “permit a ‘cocktail lounge’ which exists as a part of an establishment which is otherwise a restaurant to be considered a ‘bar’ for the cocktail lounge portion only, and the restaurant portion to be regulated under this Act.”

Without revealing the substance of its own regulatory intent, let alone that of the overridingly important legislative intent, the Board then rubber-stamped the change on the grounds that “MHD 442(c) which defines ‘bar’ was never intended to exclude a separately designated room of an establishment in which alcohol is served but in which meals are not served. Thus, a portion of an establishment which functions solely as a bar within these rules may be considered a bar for only that portion regardless of activities conducted in the remainder of the establishment.”

---

746 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 38 (Dec. 2, 1975). Brandt’s inattentiveness to this issue may have been a function of his personal indifference, stated many times even more than three decades later, to the health impact of smoking on bar customers. Telephone interviews with Ed Brandt, St. Paul (2007-2009).

749 “Adoption of Rules Implementing the Provisions of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975 (n.p. [at 2]) (n.d.), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

750 Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of
The aforementioned lack of consensus on the common traffic areas sub-rule hinged on differences between the restaurant industry, to which ANSR was prepared to make concessions, and general business offices, whose managers’ sad stories of disruption not only failed to prompt ANSR to subvert its own goals, but drove Peterson both to lose his patience with owner efforts to maintain smoking and to make an uncharacteristically unbureaucratic intervention.

The source of this resistance to the new anti-smoking regime was Donald Lenarz, representing Associated Industries of Minneapolis, an organization of 725 employers and building owners/managers, which had been formed in 1937 as a capitalist class struggle organization to deal with a growing number of powerful unions in a more “subtle” manner than the disbanded Citizens Alliance: in lieu of the latter’s head-on collisions, strikebreakers, brute force, and gunmen, Associated Industries fielded “a small army of trained employer representatives, labor conciliators and employee relations directors.” Instead of illustrating the disruptive impact on smoking in office areas of the proposed common traffic sub-rule by reference to any of AIM’s many members, Lenarz chose AIM’s own 3,600 square-foot headquarters staffed by 14 employees. Abstracting from the exempt “private offices,” he focused on the 124-sq.-ft. library, 124-sq.-ft. supply room, 350-sq.-ft. conference room, 127-sq.-ft. reception area, and 382-sq.-ft. general office area, several of which were in practice diminished by the presence of cabinets and other objects. For example, it was “impractical” to divide the library—which association members also used—being effectively less than a hundred square feet, into smoking and nosmoking sections, to put up partitions in it, or to get a four-foot space between sections. The conference room would be subject to the common traffic sub-rule because nonsmoking members of union committees would be required to use that room for the purpose for which it was intended (i.e., collective bargaining). If AIM made the room nonsmoking, since the hallways and restrooms would be posted nonsmoking, periodically unionists and others (totalling 15 or 20 people) would have to leave the building to smoke, thus interrupting the function; if, on the other hand, AIM divided the room and 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 13 at 6 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Against the background of this expressed regulatory intent regarding Final Rule 442(c), it would not have been lawful for owners to serve meals to cocktail lounge customers in the lounge, as Singer indicated had been the practice.

751Donald Lenarz to Hearing Examiner (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

table 50-50 (without being able to comply with the four-foot-wide-space requirement), the resulting physical seating configuration would, since smoking and nonsmoking were cross-class phenomena, interestingly have ousted the traditional labor versus management constellation in favor of smokers versus nonsmokers—an outcome that left Lenarz sputtering: “So I don’t know where we are.” And, finally, the general office area for five clerical workers, four of whom smoked, could not be partitioned by barriers and was not large enough to allow for a four-foot-wide space; and “since our ventilation system probably doesn’t meet the requirements in the rules and we can’t measure the carbon monoxide concentration,” it too might have to be posted nonsmoking, thus causing those smokers to leave the building to smoke, “however many times that may be during the day.”

Having listened to a very lengthy account that did not even come close to tugging a single one of his heartstrings, Peterson mild-manneredly but definitely drew the inexorable conclusion for AIM and many Minnesota smoking aiders and abettors:

MR. PETERSON: I would like to point out that the law does put the burden on the smoker and not the non-smoker.

(Applause)

MR. PETERSON: And that these rules are consistent therefore with the law. And therefore, if the proprietor attempting to comply with an acceptable smoke-free area can find no other alternative, you would have to post no smoking in its entirety. That’s the intent, I believe, of the law.

With regard to the sub-rule pertaining to public places with two or more rooms used for the same activity, which conditioned the designation of an entire room as smoking-permitted on the owner’s designating “at least one other comparable room...as a no-smoking area,” the Health Department’s “Justification” self-contradictorily both accurately repeated this sub-rule and misstated it, to nonsmokers’ detriment, by asserting that, “if one room is entirely designated as smoking permitted then there is responsibility to have at least one other comparable room with a no smoking area” (rather than to designate it nosmoking in its entirety).

This issue arose at the hearing when a representative of the Bloomington Hospitality Association—who, under oath, stated (and submitted as an exhibit “statistics which are not b.s. or hearsay” purporting to show) that over a 10-week period of 9,786 persons served lunch in two rooms at one restaurant absolutely none made advance reservations for a seat in a nosmoking area and only 14 so requested after entering—charged that there was a contradiction between this provision and MHD 444(b)(4), which provided that the “size of the designated smoking permitted area shall not be more than proportionate to the preference of patrons of that location for a smoking permitted area....” Despite the unambiguous language and meaning of section (b)(2), Peterson initially and erroneously responded that it “does state that at least a portion of a comparable room shall be a no smoking area.” Then finally understanding that a problem existed, he sought shelter from the criticism in the shaky conjecture that “I don’t believe that we have authority to require that the entire comparable room smoking be no smoking”—without, apparently, seeing any need to offer a statutory warrant for authorizing an owner to declare every square inch of a room smoking-permitted. Unwilling to face the reality of the rule’s text that he himself had drafted and/or too flustered to reproduce his own work product accurately, Peterson instead erroneously claimed that “it does state that where there are two rooms, one is entirely smoking, there shall be a comparable room that indicates a no smoking area.” Perhaps perceiving at last the discrepancy between his statement of the rule and the rule, he conceded that: “We may have to clarify that. Apparently you don’t understand that was the intent.” An incredulous Chum Bohr had to ask him to repeat his statement, prompting Peterson to misstate yet again that “a portion of the comparable room must contain a no smoking area.”

At least Brandt of ANSR was not hoodwinked: calling Peterson’s interpretation a “proposal to change that language,” he bluntly objected because it “would utterly defeat the purpose of trying to provide maximum protection for the non-smoker. The wording should be the other way round. [A]t least one whole room should be a non-smoking facility with possible mixture in other rooms.” ANSR’s counterattack was unavailing. Peterson, backed by the Board of Health, possessed the authority not only to vindicate his mistake and bring reality into sync with it, but to impose it on the rest of the world: the final rule read just as he had erroneously claimed (“as long as at least a portion of one other comparable room has been designated as a no-smoking area”).

757 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 73-76 (Dec. 2, 1975).

In contrast to ANSR’s aforementioned concession on common traffic areas, Brandt proposed supplemental language for what he deemed “the heart” and “the most important part of the entire regulation,” the adoption of which he strongly urged regardless of whatever changes might be made in other sections. That subsection (MHD 443(a)(4)) mandated that the “size of the designated smoking area shall not be more than proportionate to the preference of patrons of that location for a smoking permitted area, as can be demonstrated by the responsible person.” ANSR viewed adoption of this sub-rule as “absolutely essential” because it was “vital in dealing with the problem of token compliance,” which, as already noted, was especially rampant in restaurants.

According to the Health Department’s “Justification,” this sentence “describes the general method in which the proprietor should decide the size for designation of a smoking permitted area...if such an area is provided.” The staff deemed it “the most practicable method for such determination” after having considered and rejected “an absolute minimum percentage or a minimum square
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

...footage” because of the difficulty that the Department would have enforcing such standards and “because of the lack of ability to find a percentage or square footage which would be reasonable and proper for all public places....” While allowing owners to use “any reasonable method” (“as long as” it was consistent with MCIAA and the rules), the staff pointed out that “[m]ethods for size determination could be a combination of either surveys of customers and/or recording of the number of people who ask for smoking permitted areas in some period of time.” The Department offered two specific examples that it would find “acceptable”: (1) owners could start by designating the public place 50-50 as between smoking and nonsmoking and then “observe whether or not the size of those areas are [sic] adequate or excessive for customer demands, and then make changes in response to them; and (2) owners could, for a limited time period, ask all customers their preference for smoking or nonsmoking areas, record the numbers, and then designate seating accordingly. As long as the method was “reasonable” and “there are not a significant number of citizen complaints that the size has not been adequate,” Department inspectors would deem owners’ designations acceptable.763

Against this background, Brandt explained (to applause) that the figures cited by restaurateurs earlier in the hearing purporting to show that virtually no nonsmokers ever requested seating in a nonsmoking area were totally useless and totally beside the point, because they are based upon the assumption that the non-smoker must request the use of a non-smoking facility, which is clearly not the intent of the law. The law does not say that public places shall provide a non-smoking section for non-smokers who request it. It says smoking prohibited, period, excepting in designated smoking areas. ... If anyone is to request a specific facility, it is the smoker.... And no statistics from any restaurant have any validity whatsoever unless the proprietor has asked each and every patron what his preference is.764

---

763Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 17-18 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, Minn. State Archives, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The Board of Health agreed that absolute minimum percentages or minimum square footage might not be reasonable for all public places because of “the variables of activity, use, need and population in each public place at any given time”; consequently, “fluctuating boundaries based upon demonstrable preference” were consistent with the need to protect nonsmokers’ health and comfort. Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 25 at 9 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

764Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 85 (Dec. 2, 1975). According to Glenna 2443
Because many nonsmokers who preferred nonsmoking sections would not initiate the request because they either were unaware of their legal rights or, “more probably,” did “not want to engage in what they think is going to be a hassle,” ANSR, comparing the experience in airplanes, \(^{765}\) proposed adding regulatory language to authorize owners to determine the percentage of patrons preferring a smoking area according to one of the following criteria: (1) the percentage of patrons expressing a preference for a smoking area “if all patrons are asked for their preference”; (2) the percentage of patrons expressing a preference for a smoking area in a survey, “provided that the survey include all patrons during a period of at least two weeks and provided that a new survey is conducted once each year”; (3) the percentage of patrons specifically requesting use of a smoking area if the owner does not ask all patrons for their preference; and (4) the percentage of smokers in the general population defined as 37 percent for establishments catering chiefly to adults and 25 percent for those catering to children and adults. \(^{766}\)

ANSR’s initiative was very rudely received by the general counsel for the Hospitality Industry of Minnesota, Robert Johnson, \(^{767}\) who earlier in the hearing, sounding as though he were mouthing Tobacco Institute propaganda, had (incorrectly) instructed those present that MCIAA was about health and “not a law to recognize certain individuals who may be irritated by smoke.” \(^{768}\)
Vociferously but incoherently Johnson accused Brandt of having presented a proposal “certainly contrary to the agreement that I thought we had with you and your organization....” The precise nature of that agreement and of ANSR’s breach was obscured by Johnson’s assertion that the “theory” that he thought that Brandt had “accepted” was that the “key” was “the preference of people we are serving,” and if Brandt was “not going to accept it, I think you really have gotten into an entirely different battle, because this then becomes an economic battle...rather than our desire to serve the public....” The only semi-intelligible sense that could be extracted from Johnson’s oration was that “there is just a heck of a lot of us that don’t smoke. We really don’t care where we sit. And if somebody else wants to smoke,...I think these people have rights....” The core of his objection appeared to be the claim that ANSR had acquiesced in the restaurant owners’ view that “preference was true preference, and indifference also was a preference on the part of the public.” Johnson wanted to “go back to that idea, that people are going to have to ask where they want to be.... But let’s not forget that there is a large segment who is indifferent, and I think that they also have to be recognized.” In other words, what Johnson in fact strenuously objected to was Brandt’s effort to use MCIAA to raise nonsmokers’ consciousness about their new right to smoke-free space in covered public places. The most that Johnson would put up with was ANSR’s “educat[ing] those people to go in and tell” the restaurants “that you want to be in a non-smoking area, then I think we have the preference of the customers coming forward.” But if Brandt’s plan was “to turn this thing around and start making policemen out of anybody in any industry”—especially if, as Johnson did not mention, nonsmoking was the default position and the burden was shifted to smokers to express their preferences—“I think we are going to have some difficulty, because I don’t think that is the way we thought in the law.”

Health Hearing Transcript at 125 (Dec. 2, 1975). After MCIAA had gone into effect the American Lung Association praised the law’s “careful wording” for “bring[ing] significant impact for other legislators using this approach. ‘Most important...is the fact that the language did not exclusively stress the ill health effects of smoke, but rather urged the protection of “public health, comfort and environment.”’” Annual Meeting—Many Attend, Learn ANSR Ready to Go the Second Mile, ANSR 4(1):1 (Apr. 1976) (statement by Karen DeCavalcante, Program Associate for Smoking and Health, and National ALA Coordinator for the non-smokers’ rights movement).

769Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 88, 90 (Dec. 2, 1975). See also Bob Goligoski, “Non-Smoking Rules Ignite Differences,” SPPP, Dec. 3, 1975 (12:5-6). Bohr also submitted as a hearing exhibit the results of a National Restaurant Association attitude survey that asked 3,192 consumers to rank order the importance of 22 features in choosing a restaurant. Depending on the type of restaurant, the presence of a nosmoking section
This position was pushed even further by John Kahler, a smoker who was president of the Minnesota Hotel & Lodging Association and vice president for operations of the Kahler Hotel in Rochester. He claimed that his hotel’s compliance with MCIAA (which consisted of having posted signs and “added the non-smoking area” by August 1) had, as far as he knew, elicited “not one single positive response from a guest,” although more than half a million people were in the building annually.\textsuperscript{770} Another seeming Tobacco Institute trainee, Kahler urged replacing “coercion and vindictiveness with some common sense and courtesy....”\textsuperscript{771} Relatively sedate at the hearing, in his post-hearing written statement Kahler shed his restraint to attack anti-smokers as just another “special interest” group that, “embark[ed] on a course of action for the oppressed,....lose sight of their real intent as they pursue their special interest.” In this case of providing “relief for a small minority of people who, unfortunately, suffer from lung or congestive problems,” anti-smokers “confused the issue” not only by including all non-smokers, but even more by failing to admit that “they recognize that the vast majority who enjoy going out for entertainment and the like don’t really give a hoot whether others smoke or not.” Indeed, most of Kahler’s smoking and nonsmoking customers felt that it was “ridiculous” to make an issue out of seating locations. He therefore proposed the market-knows-best solution (“a democratic way”) of letting hospitality operators “do their own thing” including “cater[ing] to non-smokers” and “[i]f the non-smokers are right, it won’t be long before we have a factual answer.” Such an approach would prevent non-smokers from “over-playing their hand and trying to transmit some of their responsibility to us.” In the context of the collective problem of public health, however, Kahler failed to explain how the dictum that “each of us...must assume responsibility for any personal problems we may have”\textsuperscript{772} could possibly be implemented when only state intervention could limit or eliminate the source of secondhand tobacco smoke exposure.

\textsuperscript{770}Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 82 (Dec. 2, 1975).
\textsuperscript{771}Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 83 (Dec. 2, 1975).
\textsuperscript{772}John Kahler to Kent Peterson (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

Later, Peterson himself took up this issue again when he relayed to Bohr a comment from “our health education department” concerning the conclusion that “we” had reached “about the fact that the public is not educated about the fact that this law exists, and that it is apparent that there are not many people who request a no-smoking area.” Since the legislature had failed to appropriate any funds for public education about MCIAA, the Health Department, which was “willing to work with the hospitality industry however possible to improve this public education,” inquired, without the slightest hint of irony, whether “you have some budget that could be obtained from private sources, like your own....” Instead of rising to the bait, Bohr denied Peterson’s premiss: “I’m just plain telling you that the public has been aware of it.”

In the event, the Board of Health, based on Brandt’s testimony, adopted the first and third of ANSR’s four proposed methods for determining the “proportional preference of users of a smoking-permitted area” and rejected, without explanation, one that tracked one approved by the aforementioned “Justification”.

When the hearing proceeded to focus on “Categories of Affected Places”—the rules for which, under MHD 444(a), prevailed over the general provisions of MHD 443 if the two were in conflict—Oliver Perry of MACI attacked the definition of “office,” designed to determine whether it would be

773 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 99-100 (Dec. 2, 1975).
775 Rules As Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six, MHD 443(b)(4)(aa) and (bb) (Apr. 2, 1976) (copy furnished by MHD), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The final rule also gave owners the discretion to use “an alternate method which reasonably indicates the user’s preference.” MHD 443(b)(4)(cc). The final preference-determination rule read as follows: “(aa) the percentage of users of the location who express a preference for a smoking-permitted area when the responsible person asks all users for their preference, or (bb) the percentage of users of the location who request or select a smoking-permitted area when the responsible person does not ask all users for their preference, or (cc) the percentage of users who are determined by the proprietor to prefer a smoking-permitted area by an alternate method which reasonably indicates the user’s preference.”
776 “When a public place contains an office which supports activities which are principally to manufacture or assemble goods, products or merchandise for sale, or to store subject to the Health Department or the Labor & Industry Department rules, as creating a “double standard.” He reasoned that an “intolerable situation” and a “nightmare” for compliance and enforcement would result from the fact that the corporate headquarters of (say) General Mills or 3M or that of any manufacturing firm located in a downtown Twin Cities office building would be “exempt” (that is, not covered by the former set of rules), while the “office next door” of lawyers, architects, or accountants or the headquarters of a retailer such as Dayton’s would be covered.777 Brandt counterattacked by pointing to the irony that the language to which Perry was objecting was adopted by the legislature in direct response to Perry’s objections to the possibility of dual regulations778 (Although no representative of Honeywell, Inc.779 spoke at the public hearing, the firm, which employed more than 15,000 employees in more than 20 buildings in the Twin Cities area, submitted a post-hearing written statement suggesting that the rule be amended to provide that “all facilities of a private employer engaged primarily in the manufacture of goods, which are not usually frequented by the general public, be under the regulation of one agency.” In light of the laxness of the Labor Department rules it was self-explanatory that “[p]referably this agency should be the Department of Labor and Industry.”780

778 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 127-28 (Dec. 2, 1975). For Perry’s confused and unconvincing attempt at rebuttal, see id. at 132.
779 Honeywell’s position on MCIAA was ambivalent inasmuch as the law increased demand for the air filtration equipment that the firm produced. After Honeywell management had finally recognized that these devices were unable to remove particulates, it decided to ban smoking in its buildings—a decision reinforced by the human resources department’s conclusion that a nosmoking regime decreased health costs. Telephone interview with Patsy Randell, Minneapolis (May 4, 2009) (long-time company official who in 1975 lobbied for it on MCIAA).
780 Statement of Honeywell, Inc. at 3 (n.d.), attached to F. A. Boyle [personnel director, Honeywell] to Dr. Warren Lawson (Dec. 19, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS,
In the event, based on a letter from DLI to the Health Department written two weeks after the public hearing, the provision was “rephrased to conform with” the former’s rules.\textsuperscript{782}

Brandt then segued into an extended policy discussion of the comparative merits of the two departmental sets of rules. ANSR “appreciate[d]” that the Health Department rules were a “sincere effort to determine specific and workable standards concerning the work places,” but the fact that during the “extensive consultation” held prior to issuance of the proposed rules the relatively little attention that had been directed to workplaces meant that “perhaps none of us have had a chance to think through this aspect of the regulations quite as thoroughly as we might have wished to.” Brandt then (with considerable exaggeration) praised the Board of Health for “essentially...proposing...to provide the same level of protection for the non-smoker in the work place as in the place visited by the general public.”\textsuperscript{783} However—and this circumstance assumed even 112.H.18.3(B). Although the company stated to the Board of Health that “we have a significant interest in providing a clean and healthy environment for our employees” (\textit{id. at 1}), a clerical employee (who was a single parent of three) informed Lawson that she had been “terminated on the spot” when she refused to work in an area with heavy smokers and stale air. Donna Pritchard to Dr. Warren Lawson (Dec. 18, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\textsuperscript{781}Judith Pinke (Assistant to the Commissioner) to Kent Peterson (Dec. 18, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\textsuperscript{782}Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 32 at 11 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B) (erroneously dating the letter as Dec. 8). Revised and final rule MHD 444(c) read: “When a public place which is a factory, warehouse or similar place of work contains an office which is incidental but related to the primary operation, such office shall for the purposes of this Act, be regulated under Rules of the Department of Labor and Industry.”

\textsuperscript{783}Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 128 (Dec. 2, 1975). For the second use of “sincere” in the transcript, which was presumably a result of Brandt’s misspeaking or the court reporter’s error, “specific” has been substituted, which appeared in ANSR’s written statement. ANSR Policy Statement, Board of Health Regulations, Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at 3 (MHD Ex. 21, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Despite the fact that ANSR and the Health Department had “worked quite well together on the of the original rules,” their relations were, until about 1977, “less than cordial....” This tension was apparently in part linked to the Department’s having initially regarded MCIAA “with dismay” because of the view that it was unenforceable. Jeanne Weigum, “The Self-Enforcing Law: The Way to a Cleaner Indoor Environment,” in \textit{Proceedings of the Fifth World Conference on Smoking and Health} 2:333-36 at 333
greater significance since so many manual workers were not even covered by the Health Department rules—ANSR’s “feeling” was that the standards of protection for the non-smoking employee need to be stronger than those for places that are used by the general public, for several reasons: One is that the employee normally spends approximately 40 hours a week at his work place, whereas most patrons will probably spend an hour or two at a given kind of public establishment, or a little bit more. So the amount of exposure is much greater at the work place.

Furthermore, the employee doesn’t have any option but to go to work at the one place where he has a job. Whereas the patron of a public service will sometimes have some choice of facilities which he wishes to patronize. Furthermore, since the criterion in each case is an acceptable smoke-free area, which can be met by having a...distance of four feet between the smoking area and the non-smoking area, this is probably reasonably satisfactory in a public facility like a restaurant, because if I’m given a table that’s only four feet from the non-smoking [sic; must be smoking] section, I can respectfully decline and say, I would wish to wait until a table is available to me a little farther away from the smoking section. That same four feet distance however is less adequate as a protection for the asthmatic employee whose station happens to be four feet from the chain smoker.

Brandt may have offered the airline system as one way “the state could use [sic] to force restaurants” to implement the law’s clear intent of making “smoke-free places the norm, not the exception,” but indirectly his statement underscored the obvious—namely, that airplane-style segregation in restaurants offered nonsmokers virtually no protection from secondhand smoke. ANSR took this position despite the fact that, as Brandt observed many years later, “even no-smoking areas had no real protection from smoke in most restaurants. If you asked for one, they would give you one, but it might be next to a smoking area, [sic]

(William Forbes et al. eds 1983).

784Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 128-29 (Dec. 2, 1975).

786In a notice of proposed rulemaking in 1979 the Civil Aeronautics Board—which had still “not finally decided whether the rules as now amended will be sufficient to protect non-smokers from unreasonable exposure to tobacco smoke”—in response to a comment by ASH that smoking should be prohibited in forward first class not only because its small size precluded “effective separation,” but also “because smoke drifts back into the tourist no-smoking area even when a curtain is drawn,” stated that there was no convincing demonstration...that grouping all smokers together would solve the problems associated with smoking on aircraft.” Civil Aeronautics Board, Part 252 - Provisions of Designated ‘No-Smoking’ Areas Aboard Aircraft Operated by Certificated Air Carriers: Proposed Restrictions on Smoking at 2, 4 (May 16, 1979), Bates No. 03743088/9/91. which was useless."\(^{787}\) Such candor stood in sharp contrast to Brandt’s understandably propagandistic but nevertheless hopelessly hyperbolic claim, written in the fall of 1975 and published in early 1976, that: “When you deplane in Minneapolis or St. Paul, you’re in clean indoor air country.”\(^{788}\)

Brandt was willing to accept the four-foot-wide space as the Health Department rule for non-workplaces (even though it did not produce a smoke-free area acceptable to him)—the definition of an “acceptable smoke-free area” was “not as strict...as we would ideally like,” but overall ANSR regarded the rules as a “good compromise” that would “have a substantial positive effect on alleviating the problems stemming from indiscriminate smoking in public places”\(^{789}\)—but on behalf of ANSR he suggested one of two courses for workplace-related rules: the proposed workplace rules should either be adopted on an interim basis with the commitment to develop stronger rules as soon as experience with the interim ones made improvement possible or, “in view of our total disenchantment” with the DLI rules, deleted for the time being and both departments should immediately undertake a serious effort to draft stronger rules.\(^{790}\)

Following Brandt’s detour a crucial discussion took place about the alternative to the aforementioned MHD 443(a)(1), which prohibited the designation of more than one smoking-permitted area per room (except in rooms containing at least 20,000 square feet). Under the alternative, “a place of work which is not customarily frequented by the general public may contain several, separate no smoking and smoking permitted areas within the same room provided the no smoking areas are at least 200 square feet...in area. Such no smoking areas must comply with the requirements for an acceptable smoke-free area...”\(^{791}\) The draft of September 9/12 had lacked such a provision, a version of which appeared in the draft of October 1/9 and stated that in a workplace or office not customarily used by the general public the owner would be deemed to be making reasonable efforts to prevent smoking if it was permitted in sections used exclusively by smokers and “people who permit smoking. Where such smoking permitted areas and no smoking areas exist in the same room..., each no smoking area shall be at

---

\(^{787}\) Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 19, 2009).

\(^{789}\) ANSR Policy Statement, Board of Health Regulations, Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at 1 (MHD Ex. 21, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\(^{790}\) Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 129-30 (Dec. 2, 1975).

\(^{791}\) Minnesota Department of Health Rules Chapter Twenty-Six: Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, MHD 444(b) (n.d. [Dec. 2, 1975]), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
least 200 square feet...and an acceptable smoke-free area....”792 The Health Department staff’s “Justification” made no effort at all to conceal the extent to which the Department had acquiesced in the aforementioned importuning by Twin Cities firms and building owners that the rules respect corporate office managers’ conception of the role played by smokers and their smoking in their “scientific” (i.e., profit-maximizing) operations. Not to be underestimated here was the fact that, as Patsy Randell, who as Honeywell, Inc.’s lobbyist in 1975 attended the legislative hearings and debates (rising to director of state government affairs and vice president of corporate diversity and multicultural business affairs), later explained, all Twin Cities corporate executives at the time smoked (drank and were white).793

Ironically, then, although ANSR failed to persuade the Board of Health to bring the level of protection for office workers up to that for the general public regarding this rule, the final rule depressed the level of protection conferred on the general public down toward that granted office workers by permitting more than one smoking-permitted area in rooms containing at least 20,000 square feet.794 The Health Department staff argued that the new rule was “necessary to provide additional flexibility to places of work” because there was need for permitting more than one smoking permitted area per room in a place of work due to the separation of employees according to activities within many work locations, the long period of time which both smoking and non smoking employees spend at the place of work, and the adverse economic effect which could be created by excess time off for smoking breaks or by separation of people doing related activities.795

The basis of the 200-square-foot rule was the 150-square-foot “standard, accepted” per person area in commercial business offices obtained from the very entities on whose behalf the pro-smoking revision was undertaken—“Minneapolis and St. Paul owners and managers.” On what scientific basis the staff decided to tack on 50 extra square feet it kept to itself, offering only this robustly opaque 792Proposed Rules for Implementation of Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, Rule 4.a. (Draft 10/9/75), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

793Telephone interview with Patsy Randell, Minneapolis (May 4, 2009).
justification: “it was decided to require all no smoking areas to be a minimum area greater than 150 square feet. Hence, 200 square feet was selected as proper to maintain minimum space for a ‘smoke-free’ environment.” How these 10 x 20-foot island oases, separated by a four-foot moat from the breezy oceans of drifting smoke, could possibly merit the tag, “acceptable smoke-free area,” the “Justification” did not even seek to explain.796

By the same token, however, the staff was not even audibly embarrassed to assert that this exclusively employer-demanded arrangement would redound to nonsmoking workers’ health. Indeed, in this very context the Department did not even shy away from deploying a term that virtually per se suggested air quality degradation:

“Checkerboarding” of no smoking and smoking permitted areas is herein allowed for places of work not customarily frequented by the general public because such places generally have working areas assigned by functional activities within the place of work. Alternation of such working locations, beyond a small distance to conform to 200 square feet no-smoking areas, would not be economically feasible for employers. Employers are still required to provide an “acceptable smoke-free area”.... With the 200 square foot minimum and “acceptable smoke-free” standard, it is felt that the health and comfort of non-smoking employees will be improved.797

By whom this vision of improved health and comfort was “felt” and whether the improvement was being measured vis-a-vis the previous iteration of the rules, which lacked this beneficent public health provision, staff said not. Moreover, this cave-in stood in screaming contradiction to another explanation in the self-same Health Department “Justification” of its proposed rules, which emphasized that “acceptable smoke-free area” was necessarily defined as a “contiguous portion of the public place” to indicate that “the area must be ‘connecting or compacted’ and not broken down into ‘checkerboard’ type sections.”798 But while the Department was at it, the staff yielded to yet another corporate demand—freedom from aesthetic pollution. “Since this rule applies only when the place of work is not customarily frequented by the general public and the people who are there would be expected to understand that smoking restrictions exist within the place of work, it would not be necessary to have all the sign provisions which are required by” the general sign rule. Instead, one sign (prohibiting smoking except in designated areas) per floor would suffice to pull off this behavioral-cultural revolution the vanguard of which Minnesota was universally “felt” to be.

798 Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Justification” at 3 (MDH Ex. 11, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS,

Impressively, both the Department’s justification and the impact of the new rule constituted an unambiguous rebuff to Brandt/ANSR’s proposal that workers needed more rather than less protection than the general public, who, by and large, not only spent much less time exposed to smoke than employees—who many or most of them were in other capacities—but were also much freer to choose less smoky (or more smoke-free) public places to frequent.

The Health Department’s gift to employers at the expense of nonsmokers’ health failed to placate one of its most insistent demanders, Pillsbury Company, which the press, with some accuracy, credited with this victory of employers over public health: “The original idea was to require that the smokers be huddled together somewhere out of the way of the nonsmokers. That was altered after a representative of the Pillsbury Co. said separation that way would interfere with office productivity. The result was the 200-square-foot rule.” Ungrateful, the firm’s ubiquitous agent, who now for the first time introduced himself as “Ray Jones, a non-smoker,” opined that “200 square feet...could become an awkward number” and urged a rollback: since the 150 square feet per work station rule of thumb “in actuality is in excess of what most businesses experience,” he requested that the Health Department consider lowering “that number to 150 in identification of work stations.” In its post-hearing “brief,” which purported to identify items of “utmost significance in operating a business,” Pillsbury revealed its desire to subvert MCIAA by recommending both that the limit on the number of smoking-permitted areas be dropped regardless of room size and of whether the general public frequented the place and that smoking be permitted in any nosmoking area “with the permission of the non-smoker(s) present.” The Northwestern National Life Insurance Company went Pillsbury one better by suggesting that the Department permit employers to “designate work station by work station non-smoking and smoking,...provided it complied with the four foot requirement.” Instead of engaging Pillsbury in a race to the bottom, Lenarz of Associated Industries of Minneapolis asked Peterson whether the proposed requirement that nosmoking areas be at least 200 square feet meant individually or in the aggregate.

112.H.18.3(B).

799 Raymond Jones of Pillsbury Company had complained that required 1.5-inch high lettering on signs was “aesthetically repugnant of tasteful office environment.” Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 116 (Dec. 2, 1975). ANSR militant Harry Erickson responded that “I really don’t feel that...most of the health problems are aesthetically beautiful either. And I would just as soon have some unattractive signs helping a person with asthma...as opposed to not having the signs and having them suffer....” Id. at 118-19.

801 Gordon Slovut, “Nonsmokers’ Rights Soon to Be Spelled Out,” Minnesota Star, Feb. 16, 1976, Bates No. TIMN0462127. This account is confused since the draft rule had already included the 200 square-foot-rule.

In explaining that the rule meant that each of the multiple nonsmoking areas had to reach the 200-square-foot threshold, Peterson placed himself in breathtakingly sharp self-contradiction to his own “Justification” because now he claimed that the “intent of that 200 square foot requirement is to maintain some separation, some reasonable separation, so there could not be checkerboarding of no smoking areas and smoking permitted areas.” Embellishing the aforementioned derivation in the “Justification” of the 200-square-foot standard, Peterson asserted that “we wanted to have more than enough for one person so that person wasn’t just isolated in an island by himself.” This justification was unmoored from any relevant considerations: MCIAA was designed to protect nonsmokers from exposure to tobacco smoke, not to insure that two long-suffering nonsmokers might keep each other company in a 10 x 20-foot box as smoke drifted through their air space—especially not when 200 square feet represented “standard, acceptable” floor space for only one and one-third persons.

---

802 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 133 (Dec. 2, 1975).
803 Raymond Jones to Hearing Examiner at 2, 3 (Dec. 12, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
804 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 160 (Dec. 2, 1975) (John Murphy). In a post-hearing written statement the company expressly suggested dropping the 200-square-foot requirement altogether in exchange for meeting two of the “acceptable smoke-free area” standards such as the four-foot-wide space and ventilation. John Murphy to Kent Peterson (Dec. 22, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
805 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 134 (Dec. 2, 1975).
806 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 135 (Dec. 2, 1975).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Alone this rule made a mockery of the outlandish claim by John Banzhaf, one of the country’s leading anti-smoking campaigners, that the MCIAA as “the strongest” public smoking law “makes a very simple proposition: there shall be no smoking except in certain small designated smoking areas.”

Peterson, who had drafted the regulations, observed decades later that under them smoke would be “everywhere” after an hour: its visibility and odor might have been diminished, but in terms of the air’s chemical composition, probably no change had occurred. He then added: “We simply did not know that the hazardous effects of smoking would be carried in the air away from the visible smoke and worst smell. Obviously, we now have evidence to support that even invisible effects of tobacco smoke is [sic] hazardous.”

That some nonsmokers in the mid-1970s, without the benefit of hindsight, had also been well aware of the pitifully marginal reduction of exposure to secondhand smoke that segregation effected did not mean that they realized that the new situation was no more tenable or stable than the old smoke-wherever-you-feel-like-it situation: the mere fact that society had finally recognized that smoking caused harm to others and made some (partly symbolic) gestures to rectify the problem was and was hailed as a great victory; few people (other than cigarette company executives) understood that more was not only possible but inevitable. Similarly, the objections that many building and business owners and employers raised regarding the burdensomeness of complying with and enforcing smoker segregation would foreseeably have motivated them to reach the same conclusion that airlines eventually did—namely, that the game was not worth the candle and that therefore a flat ban would be more cost effective. It was precisely this nightmarish convergence of attitudes on the part of anti-smokers and owners of covered public places that constituted the tobacco industry’s premonition of the endgame.

The Department of Labor and Industry Draft Rules

[T]he regulations proposed by the Department of Labor and Industry for places of work under its jurisdiction are woefully inadequate....

---

808 Telephone interview with Kent Peterson, Minneapolis (Apr. 1, 2009).
809 Email from Kent Peterson to Marc Linder (Apr. 2, 2009).
810 ANSR Policy Statement, Board of Health Regulations, Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at 3 (MHD Ex. 21, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).
MCIAA assigned primary jurisdiction over “factories, warehouses and similar places of work not usually frequented by the general public” to the Labor and Industry Department, while the state Board of Health retained rulemaking control over all other workplaces. MCIAA’s smoking ban except in designated smoking areas did not apply to the former workplaces; where workers’ close proximity or inadequate ventilation caused “smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking workers” the Labor and Industry Department, in consultation with the Health Board, was required to “establish rules to restrict or prohibit smoking.” The DLI had already produced a set of draft rules by August 12, which were, however, very brief. In addition to defining the statutory scope of coverage as including “any indoor location of an employer’s enterprise used principally to manufacture or assemble goods, products or merchandise for sale, or to store goods, products or merchandise not for the purpose of retail sale,” the rules merely required employers to satisfy their duty to prohibit or restrict smoking by choosing one of three options: prohibiting smoking in the entire work area; applying for and receiving a waiver (authorized by § 7 of MCIAA if the Board of Health found that there were compelling reasons and that a waiver would “not significantly affect” nonsmokers’ health and comfort); or, “to the extent possible without unreasonable interruption of the business operation, designat[ing] a smoking area and a no smoking area, each in size approximately proportionate to numbers of smokers and nonsmokers employed in the vicinity.”

However inadequate ANSR may have deemed the Health Department’s

---

811 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 4, at 633, 634.
812 Proposed Rules and Regulations of the Department of Labor and Industry Pursuant to M.S. 144.414, § I (draft Aug. 12, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). This definition was narrower—that is, less inimical to the interests of nonsmoking white-collar employees in factories and warehouses—than the next iteration and the final rules, which also mandated coverage of “those areas incidental but related to the primary operation covered by these regulations.” See below this ch. No evidence was found suggesting that the Labor and Industry Department shared this draft with the general public or regulatees; the Health Department, with which DLI was required to consult, file stamped it received on Aug. 14.
813 Proposed Rules and Regulations of the Department of Labor and Industry Pursuant to M.S. 144.414, § II (draft Aug. 12, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). Under the third option, if an employer received a complaint from a nonsmoking employee about discomfort, the employer was required to “make every reasonable effort” to “arrange suitable ventilation,” eliminate the source of the smoke,” “transfer the nonsmoker,” or “make other arrangement agreeable to the nonsmoker.” Id. § II.C.2.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

proposed regulations, Brandt, in an ANSR policy statement released a week before the joint Health and Labor and Industry hearings, excoriated those of the Labor and Industry Department as “totally unacceptable” and urged their rejection. (In contrast, ANSR supported the Health Department regulations “with a few qualifications.”) Unsurprisingly, President Oliver Perry of the Minnesota Association of Commerce and Industry said that he did not have “any quarrel” with the Labor and Industry proposal. In response to Brandt’s criticism that the rules’ vagueness invited “employer interpretation or abuse,” Deputy Commissioner Raymond Adel, while acknowledging that the rules were “not very specific,” excused them on the grounds that “there are too many situations that would have to be individually covered...we can’t make individual rules to apply to each situation.” For example, Adel insisted that “sometimes a certain employee needs to work at a certain plant location, such as being assigned to operate fixed equipment, and for that reason it is not reasonable to expect an employer to rearrange his workers.” Brandt dismissed this argument by reference to the statute’s “clear intent...that if you can’t rearrange people then the law clearly authorizes the department to prohibit smoking in an area.” The Minneapolis Star made Brandt’s charge that the proposed regulations “would subvert” the MCIAA for blue-collar workers its own: “Workers in Minnesota factories and warehouses could continue smoking, despite the state’s nonsmokers 814 The hearings were presumably held jointly because the MCIAA required the DLI, “in consultation with the state board of health,” to “establish rules to restrict or prohibit smoking in those places of work where the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees.” 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 4. On October 22, the labor commissioner gave notice of the hearing, to begin on December 2 after the adjournment of the Health Department hearing. The purpose of the proposed rules he described as “establish[ing] reasonable means and methods which employers may utilize to safeguard the health and comfort of non-smoking employees.” Before E. I. Malone, Commissioner Department of Labor and Industry, In the Matter of the Proposed Adoption of Rules of the Department of Labor and Industry Governing Smoking in Factories, Warehouses and Similar Places of Work, Notice of Hearing at 2 (Oct. 22, 1975).

815 “ANSR Policy Statements: Department of Labor and Industry,” ANSR 4 [should be 3][4]:1 (Dec. 1975). An editorial preface noted that the statements were synopses of lengthier statements presented at the December 2 hearing, but the press quoted from them on November 26.

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

rights law,” under the Labor and Industry rules.817 To be sure, in answer to his own question as to why a DFL state administration, with the DFL controlling both houses of legislature, would have adopted “such extreme pro-employer regulations,” Brandt later adduced his “belief that smoking was more prevalent among factory workers than in the general population” and “a few negative responses by lobbyists for some individual unions to the law.”818 In that precise context it remained unclear whether the regulations accommodated employers more than smoking blue-collar workers and their unions,819 but in retrospect Brandt expressed the judgment “that Malone did what the majority (although maybe a slim one) of [smoking] blue-collar workers wanted,” and in that sense “was catering to union workers, not to employers.”820

818 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007). A nationwide survey in 1976 revealed that, with regard to occupational groups, nonfarm blue-collar workers had the highest cigarette-smoking prevalence rate among men 20 and over—50.4 percent compared to 36.6 percent among white-collar workers; every male blue-collar subgroup had a higher prevalence rate than every white-collar subgroup. Gordon Bonham, Use Habits Among Adults of Cigarettes, Coffee, Aspirin, and Sleeping Pills: United States 1976, App. tab. 3 at 21 (U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare Pub. No. (PHS) 80-1559, Oct. 1979). The only other explanation that Brandt gave in support of his position was the conjecture that Republican Senator Robert Brown had offered the amendment to transfer rule-writing jurisdiction over factories and warehouses to the Labor and Industry Department “on behalf of business interests,” since Brandt considered “specious” Brown’s claim that he had done so to avoid interfering with OSHA regulations. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007). More than three decades later Brown had no recall of his amendment. Telephone interview with Robert Brown, St. Paul (Mar. 11, 2009).

819 The Labor and Industry Commissioner in 1975-76 was E. I. (Bud) Malone, a former journeyman electrician and officer in the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who had been appointed by a Republican governor in 1968 and twice reappointed by a DFL governor. The Minnesota Legislative Manual: 1975-1976, at 419. When Brandt complained to Malone about the regulations, he reminded Brandt that his union had endorsed him when he ran for his House seat (although Brandt was a Republican in a heavily DFL district).

820 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 18 and 19, 2009). The then assistant to the commissioner of Labor and Industry concurred in Brandt’s view. Telephone interview with Judith Pinke, Minneapolis (Mar. 26, 2009). Significantly, in 1994 when the Health Department proposed a rule to tighten regulation of smoking in factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces by restricting smoking to private enclosed offices and designated smoking sections of lunchrooms and lounges unless employees were stationed longtime head of enforcement at the Health Department observed that blue-collar unions, which had been “very guarding” of their smoking members’ continuing to be entitled to smoke at work, never filed any complaints on behalf of nonsmokers.\textsuperscript{821}
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

With regard to the Department of Labor and Industry draft rules\textsuperscript{822} a role reversal took place at the hearing: whereas employers were by and large not only supportive, but urged that the Board of Health adopt the (feckless) DLI rules, on ANSR’s behalf Brandt launched a slashing critique that urged their virtually wholesale rejection, leaving only the provision dealing with employee lunchrooms, cafeteria, lounges, and rest areas unscathed.

Overall, ANSR denounced the proposed DLI regulations “as worse than no regulations at all” and called for their rejection and development of new ones that “would be meaningful, specific and consistent with the intent of the law.”\textsuperscript{823} The lunchroom provision required employers to “reserve one side or area of the room for the sole use of non-smokers, and...make a reasonable effort to minimize the toxic effects of smoke pollution in that area.”\textsuperscript{824} The provision governing general

\textsuperscript{821}Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Mar. 27, 2009).

\textsuperscript{822}In 1984 the legislature transferred jurisdiction over these workplaces from DLI to the Health Department and repealed the former’s special rules. 1984 Minn. Laws ch. 654, § 113, at 1903, 1981. At the initiative of Phyllis Kahn, who had met with the Health Department regarding “enforcement of standards to restrict smoking in workplaces” under DLI, MDH, acting at Kahn’s suggestion and determining that DLI agreed, drafted bill language for the transfer. Sister Mary Madonna Ashton, Commissioner of Health, to Phyllis Kahn (Mar. 22, 1984), Minnesota Department of Health, Phyllis Kahn file (copy furnished by MDH).

\textsuperscript{823}“ANSR Policy Statements: Department of Labor and Industry,” \textit{ANSR} 4 should be 3:1, back page (Dec. 1975). Alternatively, ANSR recommended adoption of Labor and Industry’s rules “with the recognition they will serve only as interim standards and with the commitment [sic] to revising the regulations as soon as some experience with implementing them has been gained.” “ANSR Policy Statements: State Board of Health,” \textit{ANSR} 4 should be 3:1, back page (Dec. 1975).

\textsuperscript{824}Labor and Industry Proposed Rules Governing Smoking in Factories, Warehouses
work areas ANSR regarded as “an open invitation to employers to evade their responsibility and to violate the intent of the law to protect the health and comfort of non-smoking employees.” That provision read as follows: “Upon complaint of an employee that the close proximity of workers or inadequate ventilation is causing smoke pollution detrimental to his or other non-smoking employees’ health and comfort, the employer...shall make a reasonable effort to determine the causative factors of the smoke pollution.” ANSR criticized this last clause on the grounds that the rule, by authorizing the employer to do so, “when such cause is obviously smoking by employees...encourages an employer to refuse to recognize the validity of a complaint that an employee is bothered by smoke.” The Labor Department draft then went on to provide that: “If the employer...finds that the smoke pollution is due to the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation, he shall make a reasonable effort to minimize the toxic effects of the smoke pollution on non-smokers.” Brandt dismissed this framework for regulating employers’ “responsibility to deal with smoke pollution [a]s so general as to be not only totally unenforceable from a legal point of view, but also totally useless as a standard form an educational point of view.”^829

The final provision of the DLI draft rules, which dealt with efforts to minimize tobacco smoke’s toxic effects, sounded to Brandt/ANSR “like an effort at deliberate sabotage of the purposes” of MCIAA^830 because employers were required to act only “to the extent possible without unreasonable interference with the business operation.”^831 Moreover, the fact that under the rule employers’ efforts to minimize toxic effects had to include the arrangement of seating or work patterns as a means of separating smokers and nonsmokers only “provided that such an arrangement is not detrimental to the employment status of either the non-smoking or smoking employees”^832 prompted Brandt to conclude that permitting employers to refuse to separate smokers and nonsmokers on these grounds was “an outright perversion of the law.” ANSR’s critique was based on the proposition that, although the legislature did not intend for the factory and warehouse regulations to be “any weaker” than those governing places under the Board of Health’s jurisdiction, the DLI proposals “fail to incorporate even the very weak standard” embodied in the Board of Health regulations. This conclusion, in turn, derived from the argument that MCIAA was “based on scientific evidence that smoking is detrimental to the non-smoking employee if 831Labor and Industry Proposed Rules Governing Smoking in Factories, Warehouses and Similar Places of Work LICA 5 a) (n.d. [file stamped received Oct. 24, 1975, MDH]), in Health Department, Minn. State Archives, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

832Labor and Industry Proposed Rules Governing Smoking in Factories, Warehouses and Similar Places of Work LICA 5 a) 3) (n.d. [file stamped received Oct. 24, 1975, MDH]), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). This language was also quoted by Gordon Slovut, “Proposal on Blue-Collar Smoking Turns Air Blue,” Minneapolis Star, Nov. 28, 1975 (9A), Bates No. TIMN0461951, whereas Brandt’s quotation was too abridged to be comprehensible. The final rule lacked the proviso quoted in the text. State of Minnesota, Department of Labor and Industry, Labor and Industry Rules Governing Smoking in Factories, Warehouses and Similar Places of Work, LICA 5(c) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. 85646238/9. LICA 5 a) 1) and 2) also required of employers “utilization of existing physical barriers” and “consideration of the flow of air movement, so that insofar as possible, smoke shall move away from non-smokers” among their efforts to minimize toxic effects of smoke pollution.
The amendment to the bill concerning factories, warehouses and similar places of work not usually frequented by the general public, except that the department of labor and industry shall, in consultation with the state board of health, establish rules to restrict or prohibit smoking in those places of work where the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees.\textsuperscript{834} (When the then assistant to the commissioner of Labor and Industry was read this provision 34 years later, she laughed heartily in recollection of her and her colleagues’ amused and bemused reaction to the question of how they would ever be able to know whether smoke had been detrimental to blue-collar workers’ health.)\textsuperscript{835} Since this weakening\textsuperscript{836} of the amendment—which Kahn herself, as explained above, was constrained to offer in order to secure passage of her bill in committee after employers, supported by pro-employer committee members, had requested an even more radical watering down of the bill—authorized a continuation of laissez-faire smoking (or whatever regime employers had in place) in such workplaces in which worker proximity or ventilation did not detrimentally affect nonsmoking employees’ comfort and health, it clearly imposed preconditions for obligatory intervention by employers that did not exist in other settings.

Brandt’s post-hearing argument to the contrary to the Labor and Industry Department was based on a retelling of the legislative history that ignored and misrepresented its basic facts:

The amendment to the bill concerning factories, warehouses and similar places of work not usually frequented by the general public, except that the department of labor and industry shall, in consultation with the state board of health, establish rules to restrict or prohibit smoking in those places of work where the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees.\textsuperscript{834} (When the then assistant to the commissioner of Labor and Industry was read this provision 34 years later, she laughed heartily in recollection of her and her colleagues’ amused and bemused reaction to the question of how they would ever be able to know whether smoke had been detrimental to blue-collar workers’ health.)\textsuperscript{835} Since this weakening\textsuperscript{836} of the amendment—which Kahn herself, as explained above, was constrained to offer in order to secure passage of her bill in committee after employers, supported by pro-employer committee members, had requested an even more radical watering down of the bill—authorized a continuation of laissez-faire smoking (or whatever regime employers had in place) in such workplaces in which worker proximity or ventilation did not detrimentally affect nonsmoking employees’ comfort and health, it clearly imposed preconditions for obligatory intervention by employers that did not exist in other settings.

brandt’s post-hearing argument to the contrary to the Labor and Industry Department was based on a retelling of the legislative history that ignored and misrepresented its basic facts:

\textsuperscript{834} Telephone interview with Judith Pinke, Minneapolis (Mar. 26, 2009).
\textsuperscript{835} Email from Jeanne Weigum to Marc Linder (Mar. 21, 2009).
work was not meant to provide for any different degree of protection for non-smokers in these places than in any other places. It was simply designed to meet the objections of Oliver Perry that such establishments would otherwise be subject to dual regulation, and potentially incompatible regulations, by the Department of Industry under the Occupational Safety and Health Act and by the State Board of Health under the Clean Indoor Air Act.

Although MCIAA just as clearly did not confer unlimited discretion on DLI in formulating rules to restrict or ban smoking, the law more than plausibly contemplated a lower level of protection for factory and similar workers. Whether the ulterior motive was to accommodate employers or more heavily-smoking blue-collar workers and their unions, nonsmoking workers would be disadvantaged vis-a-vis employees and the general public in other covered public places.

Although Brandt’s claim of parity may have been exaggerated, his view, expressed in amplified post-hearing comments to the Labor and Industry Department, that “nothing in these proposals...would in any way whatsoever restrict smoking” was nevertheless valid—especially in light of DLI’s later record of virtual non-enforcement. In his follow-up comments Brandt attacked the aforementioned “without unreasonable interference” language as feckless because the standard was left undefined and “business representatives at the public hearing...made it perfectly obvious that many employers consider any requirement to do anything to protect the health and comfort of non-smokers to be ‘unreasonable interference.’” He also pointed out that the “detrimental to the employment status” of any employee language “would undoubtedly be interpreted by employers unsympathetic to” MCIAA “to mean the smoking of any employee could not, or at least need not, be restricted if the employee objects”—an outcome that “would make a mockery of” the law. Little wonder that by mid-1976 Brandt complained that: “The biggest problem we’ve had is in the workplace.... We have not seen much evidence of cooperation by employers. And it’s a problem because the employee is likely to be very hesitant to approach the employer.” And Kahn agreed that a high priority for amending MCIAA was “some protection for an employee who complains about not being given a smoke-free area.”

---

837 Ed Brandt to Judy Pinke (Dec. 19, 1975) (copy furnished by ANSR).

Post-Hearing Efforts by Regulatees and ANSR/Kahn to Modify the Health Department Rules

The law does not say that proprietors must set aside a non-smoking section for those who ask; it says smoking in public places is prohibited, except that designated places may be set aside for smokers. The intent is clearly to make smoke-free places the norm, not the exception.

With the record left open for 20 days for receipt of written statements pertaining to the Board of Health’s proposed rules, numerous entities, but especially a number of the same firms that had forged a high advocacy profile during the previous months and ANSR, submitted detailed proposals for further changes. The Board of Health did adopt the few changes recommended by the Health Department staff, but the latter characterized them all as “no substantial changes from the public hearing draft such that a new hearing would be required before promulgation....” Several of the changes that were based on statements made at the hearing were already discussed above. Perhaps the most notable addition prompted by post-hearing comment stemmed from Representative

---

842 ANSR Policy Statement, Board of Health Regulations, Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at 2 (MHD Ex. 21, Dec. 2, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Kahn, who suggested this change to the four-foot-wide space provision. “This may be empty space or could be a section of seats or area acting as a buffer zone in which smoking is not permitted, but which itself is not considered to be part of an ‘acceptable smoke-free area.’” She offered owners this accommodation in the form of “more flexibility in the type of boundaries they would like to create. I think it would be particularly useful in a restaurant where one was considering the division of a line of booths and could avoid the necessary erection of a partition.” The “buffer zone” was a kind of nobody’s zone in the sense that smokers sitting there were not permitted to smoke, yet nonsmokers sitting there were not in an “acceptable smoke-free area.” Why members of either group would nevertheless have sat there is unclear, but if they did, they would to some extent have alleviated owners’ alleged concerns about reduced seating capacity. The change could be viewed as a continuation of the Realpolitik that had led Kahn to exempt restaurants from H.F. 79 in the first place, but it may also have been a clever means of precluding owners from taking advantage of the possibility that Peterson had pointed out to them at the hearing of including the income loss associated with the unusable space caused by compliance with the MCIAA in applying for waivers.

The Final Board of Health Rules

Minnesota is the model, and the proposed regulations will go far toward clearing the air.

---

845 For confirmation that the change was based on Kahn’s letter, see Before the Minnesota State Board of Health, In the Matter of the Proposed (Rules) (Amendments) Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, “Findings of Fact,” ¶ 8 at 3-4 (Apr. 1, 1976), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

846 Manifestly, Stuart Olshansky, “Is Smoker/Nonsmoker Segregation Effective in Reducing Passive Inhalation Among Nonsmokers?” AJPH 72(7):737-39 at 737 (July 1982), was mistaken in asserting that “segregation laws simply do not specify how far nonsmokers should be situated away from smokers in an enclosed area....”

847 Phyllis Kahn to Kent Peterson (Dec. 18, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B). The wording of the final rule, MHD 442(a)(2)(bb), differed largely by substituting “unoccupied” for “empty.”

848 Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Mar. 27, 2009).

849 Board of Health Hearing Transcript at 149 (Dec. 2, 1975). A former Health Department inspector noted that the use of four-foot-wide spaces in smaller restaurants such as diners might have effected an overall reduction in the number of seats, but did not generally produce that impact. Telephone interview with Jim Witkowski, St. Paul (Mar. 26, 2009). across the country.\textsuperscript{850}

Unlike the anti-public smoking law in Iowa, whose 1978 statute would not provide for administrative regulations,\textsuperscript{851} the Minnesota legislative scheme was to some extent both weakened and arguably strengthened by the regulations promulgated by the state Department of Health\textsuperscript{852} on April 2, 1976,\textsuperscript{853} which the \textit{L.A. Times-Washington Post} Service hyperbolically characterized as having “caused more controversy than anything in the state since the Sioux Indian uprising of 1862.”\textsuperscript{854} Subversive of whatever rigor MCIAA possessed was a series of changes that the final rules enshrined regarding smoking-permitted areas. To recapitulate: first, after limiting to only one the number of smoking-permitted areas that owners were authorized to designate per room, the Department reversed course by exempting rooms with at least 20,000 square feet of floor space, which were subject to no limit on the number of smoking permitted areas;\textsuperscript{855} second, a sub-rule conferred on owners of public places with two or more rooms used for the same activity the discretion to designate one entire room as smoking permitted “as long as at least a portion of one other comparable room” was designated no-smoking;\textsuperscript{856} and third, a sub-rule modified the ban on smoking in common traffic areas that nonsmokers had to use by declaring that that provision “shall not be

\textsuperscript{850}Gerald Riso (Managing Director, American Lung Assoc.) to Dr. Warren Lawson (Nov. 21, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

\textsuperscript{851}See below ch. 25.

\textsuperscript{852}Kahn (and the public information director of the American Lung Association in Minneapolis, Maggie Vertin) “conceded that there was some compromise in writing the regulations that implemented the law. ‘The regulations are much looser than the law itself’ Ms. Vertin said. ‘We lost a little in the writing.’” William Endicott, “No-Smoking Law Is Only Puffing Along,” \textit{C-J}, Oct. 12, 1978, Bates No. TIMN0461854

\textsuperscript{853}The Minnesota State Board of Health adopted the rules by resolution on Feb. 19, 1976, and Dr. Warren Lawson, the commissioner of health and secretary and executive director of the Board adopted them on Mar. 5, 1976; they were filed with the secretary of state on April 2, 1976. State Board of Health, In the Matter relating to the Proposed Rules Relating to the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975: Order Adopting Rules (copy furnished by the Office of the Revisor of Statutes); telephone interview with Kent Peterson, Minneapolis (Apr. 1, 2009).

\textsuperscript{856}Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act MHD 443(b)(2) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/39.
construed to prevent designation of a smoking-permitted area in a portion of the establishment which non-smokers must briefly cross to reach the intended activity.\footnote{Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act MHD 443(b)(3) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/39.}

Even more central to, but also more ambiguous regarding, the protection that the law conferred on nonsmokers was the requirement that the person in charge of a covered public place “make arrangements for an acceptable smoke-free area....”\footnote{Rules as Adopted for the Implementation of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act MHD 443(e) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240635/41.} Under this sub-rule\footnote{MHD 442(a)(1)-(2), Bates No. TIMN0240636-7.} an owner was in compliance with MCIAA so long as he separated the smoking and nosmoking sections by a four-foot space or with 56-inch high barriers—regardless of how much smoke drifted from the former to the latter. Although the rules purportedly set forth a performance standard (with regard to the ultimate statutory purpose of protecting nonsmokers from secondhand smoke) in terms of CO concentrations, because inspectors never took such measurements, in reality owners were free to satisfy a mechanical, fixed quantitative standard without any reference to whether compliance with it achieved that purpose (since the Health Department presumed that the presence of either of those physical standards would per se secure the desired outcome).

Long before it promulgated the final rules in 1976, the Department had received ample public comment complaining about how useless the 56-inch barriers and 4-foot spaces had already proved to be in practice. One commenter explained to Kent Peterson that a “five foot barrier is the same as no barrier since smoke rises and spreads. An aisle space of four feet is ridiculous because the smoker can exhale (blow) the smoke farther than that.”\footnote{Gerald Peterson to Kent Peterson (Sept. 18, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).} Another told Peterson’s boss that “[o]ne can hardly notice the difference since the law was passed. ... What good does it do to have smokers and non-smokers in the same room a few feet apart?”\footnote{Ruby Olson to Warren Lawson (Nov. 17, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).} A high school teacher expressed her “strong feelings” about designated smoking areas, which she illustrated by reference to the faculty room’s four tables, two of which were labeled smoking and two nonsmoking: “But, the entire room is in a constant haze of smoke! It is ridiculous to label or designate areas in close proximity of one another because smoke travels.”\footnote{Jean Anderson to Warren Lawson (Nov. 20, 1975), in Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).}
Regardless of the fecklessness of these options, inclusion of barriers and ventilation raised the question of whether the agency had overstepped its legislatively conferred powers in potentially mandating expenditures by owners, from which making the statute expressly protected them by limiting their duties to the use of “existing” ones. After all, “old ventilation systems,” as Kent Peterson (self-contradictorily) pointed out, were “‘grandfathered’ into the regulations.” Moreover, the legislative history made unequivocally clear that the bill’s chief author, Kahn, acquiesced in that limitation precisely because of the objection that the agency might impose such expenditures. Perhaps Bohr was referring to this fact when he complained that some of the Board of Health’s proposals “were an ‘overextension of the law,’ particularly as they apply to restaurants.” Notwithstanding such complaints, the Health Department managed, as explained earlier, to avoid acting beyond its powers by giving owners the choice of using the four-foot-wide space and thus making barriers/ventilation elective rather than mandatory.

Even if owners had universally complied with this elaborate scheme, it could not even remotely have protected nonsmokers from ambient secondhand smoke exposure. The absurd character of even this more sensitive regime was visibly on display in a newspaper photograph from mid-1976 showing a smiling restaurant owner leaning on a (noncompliant) 42-inch-high “barrier” dividing the restaurant into two equal smoking and nonsmoking sections and gazing at a customer whose dense cigarette smoke floats far above the barrier just inches from his face. In 1978 Lung Association anti-smoking activist Robin Derrickson reported of her own experiences in restaurants: “The inadequacy of our law sticks out when I look to my left and just past that 4’ buffer space is a cigarette pouring out smoke. Smoke hasn’t been told about staying out of the no smoking section. ... I contend that the no smoking section is a start and that it is unfortunate that the law has been turned around—the whole place should be no smoking with the smoking section set aside.” Just how limited horizons were even at the cutting edge of the anti-smoking movement was exquisitely on display in her utopian lament that: “I calm myself thinking we’ve changed attitudes for the better, but we are not yet to the point of being able to seal smoking sections off from the remainder of the restaurant. That’s the ideal and maybe we’ll be to that point someday.”

The 56-inch-high physical barriers also performed another regulatory (if not real-world) function: the final rules added a definition of “room” as “any indoor area which is bordered on all sides by a wall or partition of at least 56 inches (1.42 meters). Such sides shall be continuous and solid except for door portals for entry and exit.” Adoption of this definition exacerbated MCIAA’s central weakness, as ANSR president Jeanne Weigum was still pointing out in 1983:

[T]he regulations allow smoking in private offices if they are not shared with non-smokers and the department has defined short walled cubicles as offices. This in effect means that work sites might have several dozen little smoking areas in a larger working area. Obviously the smoke does not remain in the cubicle and many of the complaints we receive are from people adjacent to a cubicle where someone smokes. It is our hope that the department will change their interpretation of this. At the present time this interpretation is making it more difficult to provide genuine protection for non-smokers.

In the event, it took the Health Department more than another decade to amend the rule to define a “room” as having floor-to-ceiling walls, but the

---

867 Robin Derrickson, Untitled Typescript at 8 (Sept. 1978) (talk given at Western Lung Conference) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR).
870 Minnesota Rules § 4620.0100 subp. 17 (1995). At the same time the Health Department amended the rules to define a “private enclosed office” as a room occupied relevant question in this context was why ANSR—which in the interim had removed the word “Rights” from its name (but nevertheless retained the ANSR acronym)—“because we thought it made us sound too militant.... It conjured up the image of the kind of people who went around with squirt guns and we really don’t advocate such tactics”871—did not mount a similar campaign against other 56-inch-high barriers (or four-foot-wide spaces) on the grounds that they, too, failed to provide “genuine protection for non-smokers” in restaurants and other public places.872 After all, as late as 1980, a questionnaire concerning restaurants’ compliance with that year’s new MCIAA regulations revealed that 68 percent of ANSR’s own members replied that only “rarely” was a 56-inch high (or 4-foot wide) physical barrier even present.873
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

871 Laura Wilkinson, “Anti-Smoking Laws,” Associated Press Executive News Service, May 23, 1987, Bates No. TIMN0457515 (quoting Sandra Sandell). At the time of the change in 1984, ANSR opaquely claimed that “Association for Nonsmokers—Minnesota” would “attract the support of a wider audience” and “appeal to a broad base of the community....” “Jottings,” ANSR, No. 1, Winter 1984, at 2; “Name Changes—Goals the Same,” ANSR, No. 2, Spring 1984, at 1. However, as ANSR’s long-time president said much later: “We wanted to be less confrontational and more appealing to work places. We wanted to go in proposing solutions rather than seeming demanding about ‘rights.’” Email from Jeanne Weigum to Marc Linder (Apr. 13, 2009).

872 In its response following the administrative law hearing on the 1994 proposed rule changes to objections by the tobacco industry lobbyist Doug Kelm to the proposed floor-to-ceiling walls for private enclosed offices the Health Department noted that it had received complaints about tobacco smoke arising from office cubicles, and then proceeded to assert without explanation that the barriers functioned in the general setting: “While a barrier of fifty-six inches in height is appropriate for separating smoking and nonsmoking areas, the minimum size of the nonsmoking area is 200 square feet. ... Treating cubicles as private, enclosed offices could place smokers adjacent to every employee in the office seeking accommodation. In such a case there would be no contiguous space available to segregate ETS from nonsmoking employees.” State of Minnesota, Office of Administrative Hearings for the Minnesota Department of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Permanent Rules of the Minnesota Department of Health Relating to Clean Indoor Air: Report of the Administrative Law Judge, Finding of Fact 19b (1-0900-8678-1, Aug. 2, 1994), on http://www.oah.state.mn.us/aljBase/09008678.rr1.htm.

873 ANSR Opinions on MCIAA Restaurant Compliance,” ANSR Flyer 2(2):1-2 (Dec. 1980). Revealingly, although the questionnaire asked whether the non-smoking area was free of ashtrays, it failed to ask whether it was free of tobacco smoke.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The Final Labor and Industry Department Rules

When the law was passed, we were quite naive. Most of us had a belief that when the law passed the job was finished. Others would see to it that it was enforced. ... Many members became discouraged and dropped out of the organization. It appears that the people who are likely to be involved in the “grind it out” part of enforcing the law, are different from those who are likely to be involved in the passage of the law. Those who envision quick and easy results are likely to be discouraged and disappear, often in bitterness. Without people to carry on the much less glamorous enforcement and educational part of the process, legislation is much less likely to succeed.874

Issued on the same day as the Health Department rules, the Department of Labor and Industry “Rules Governing Smoking in Factories, Warehouses and Similar Places of Work” failed to attain even the aspirational rigor of the Health Department’s rules. The relaxed regulatory framework was set by the declaration that MCIAA “excludes from its provisions” factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces and merely “directs” the department to establish rules where workers’ close proximity or inadequate ventilation caused smoke pollution detrimental to nonsmoking employees’ health and comfort. Then going far beyond mechanical paraphrase of the statute, the Department articulated the purpose of its rules as “safeguard[ing] the non-smoking employee’s health and comfort within reasonable regulation of his working environment without serious disruption of the work activities at his place of work.”875 After declaring employers that 875Labor and Industry Rules Governing Smoking in Factories, Warehouses and Similar Places of Work, LICA 1(e) (Apr. 2, 1976), Bates No. 85646238. The Department defined the scope of factories and similar workplaces to mean “the indoor area of any facility of an enterprise used principally to manufacture or assemble goods, products or merchandise for sale, or to store goods, products or merchandise not for the purpose of direct retail sale, and shall include those areas incidental but related to the primary operation covered by these regulations.” Id. LICA 2. In other words, office workers in such plants were assimilated to factory workers and not to white-collar workers in covered workplaces. The final Health Department rules expressly mandated this classification. MHD 444(c), Bates No. TIMN0240635/42. Nevertheless, in 1977, three days after receiving a complaint about an MCIAA violation at the Sperry Univac plant in Roseville, Charles Schneider, the section chief of Environmental Field Services at MDH, informed the employer that a memo that the company had prepared in August 1975 stating that its legal department had taken the position that the law’s blanket restrictions did not apply to the company’s plants because they were not usually frequented by the general public was “in error”: because prohibited smoking in areas used by nonsmokers to be compliant,\(^{876}\) it offered the former an alternative that was much less protective for the latter: in lunchrooms, cafeterias, lounges, and rest areas provided to employees and not open to the public, employers were required to reserve one side or area of the room for the exclusive use of nonsmokers and to “minimize the toxic effects of smoke pollution in that area.” The size of such areas had to be “proportional to employee preference,” about which employers were required to maintain documentary records.\(^{877}\) In contrast, in general work areas:

Upon complaint of an employee that the close proximity of workers or inadequate ventilation is causing smoke pollution detrimental to his or other non-smoking employees’ health and comfort, the employer...shall determine the causative factors of the smoke pollution.

If the employer...finds that the smoke pollution is due to the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation, he shall minimize the toxic effects of the smoke pollution on non-smokers. The employer...shall maintain records which document the actions taken on complaints received.\(^{878}\)

Sperry Univac’s office space did not fall under the Labor and Industry Department rules, but under the Health Department’s rules governing offices, the company was required to comply with MCIAA’s workplace rules. C. B. Schneider to Roy Hain (Mar. 10, 1977), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B). Kahn’s papers also include the memo: Roy Hain to Distribution “A” (Aug. 13, 1975). Sperry Univac’s response, at least as embodied in an internal memo, did not reflect good faith: instead of complying with its MCIAA duties, it declared that (with the exception of lunchrooms, cafeterias, and lounges), “the regulations applicable to Roseville Operations are complaint oriented”—meaning that the firm would do nothing toward compliance unless and until an employee complained, and even when internal investigation showed a complaint to be valid, Sperry Univac would undertake “corrective actions” only “to the extent possible without unreasonable interference with the business operations....” One of the “acceptable” actions was “utilization of air flow to direct smoke away from the complainant....” W. H. Schreiber to Distribution “A” (May 3, 1977), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B). Ironically, once the DLI rules went into effect, the firm’s complaint-driven regime, at least in its factories, became lawful. See below.

However, employers’ duty to minimize those toxic effects was severely diluted by limiting it to “the extent possible without unreasonable interference with the business operation.” Within those confines employers were required to: use existing physical barriers; use “flow of air movement, so that insofar as possible, smoke shall move away from non-smokers”; and arrange seating or work patterns to separate smokers and nonsmokers.879

Contemporaneous and Later Views of the MCIAA’s Effectiveness

Once upon a time ANSR and other advocates, wallowing in spasms of naive optimism through 1975 and 1976, thought the law would mean an end to public smoking.880

Other Minnesotans were apparently also dissatisfied with the efficacy of such mechanisms: in 1987—by which time the Health Department believed that during the dozen years MCIAA had been in force no one had yet been fined for violating it—Charles Schneider, the section chief of Hotels, Resorts, and Restaurants of the Environmental Health Division of the Health Department, told the press that the enforcement staff had “‘encountered situations where a place was in compliance with the law but still had some unhappy people.’” Such people presumably included “‘people who authored the original bill,’” who “‘would have liked to [have] made the entire world smoke free.’” In fact, by this time even the higher bureaucracy at the Health Department conceded that “‘[w]ith the term “acceptable smoke-free area,” people think it means literally smoke free....’”881

Whether the Health Department’s false advertising—a much later comparative study of particulate matter and nicotine levels in smoking and designated no-smoking areas characterized identification of the latter as a “‘smoke-free area’” as “inappropriate, perhaps to the point of such usage now being misleading and deceptive”882—was even partly responsible for nonsmokers’ literalist turn did not appear to occur to Mary Thompson, the Department “official in charge of keeping smokers in their place,” who maintained that: “It’s conceivable that you could have smoking and non-smoking areas within the same room. The smoke drifts. It’s a non-smoking-area; it’s not necessarily smoke free."883 By 1994, in connection with an administrative law hearing on the Health Department’s proposed regulation to tighten the regulation of smoking in factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces—an initiative that prompted one of the cigarette companies’ lobbyists to complain that the MDH “promotes a philosophy of deep government intrusion or micromanagement”884—the executive director of the Association for Nonsmokers-Minnesota (ANSR) forthrightly declared that after MCIAA’s enactment “many tried to meet the letter of the law by separating smokers from nonsmokers. That many governmental agencies, restaurant owners, and employers now provide smoke-free environments...testifies to their experience that separation does not work. It appears that once they were forced to do something about second-hand smoke, they eventually chose to go smoke-free.”885

Looking back, Dr. Ellen Fifer Green, who as assistant health commissioner had represented the Health Department in supporting MCIAA before the legislature, characterized it as a “very weak law” that did not help very much in terms of improving indoor air content, but whose very existence “made people feel better.”886 David Giese, a nonsmoker who worked for 36 years at the Health Department and was the hearing officer at the public hearing on December 2, 1975, looked back at the law, especially as it affected restaurants, as “pretty ineffective if you were at all close to the smoking area.”887

Charles Schneider, who from the outset was responsible for MCIAA’s enforcement, laconically judged his own agency’s regulations as having been “pointless” in seeking to neutralize the toxic effect of designated smoking areas: anyone who gave any thought to the matter or observed even compliant public 884Doug Kelm (North State Advisers), Statement of Need and Reasonableness (SNR) at 5 (June 13, 1994) (Public Exhibit No. 5, prepared testimony at hearing on MDH proposed rules (4620)) (copy furnished by MDH).

886Telephone interview with Ellen Fifer Green, Minneapolis (Mar. 28, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

places would have had to conclude that once smoking was permitted it was impossible to protect nonsmokers. 888 To be sure, Schneider’s low regard for the rules’ theoretical effectiveness as well as his dismissal at the outset of the substance of the new law as not worth the paper it was written on, according to Jeanne Weigum, ANSR’s long-term president, largely driven by not wanting to be saddled with an enforcement burden unaided by any additional staff or funding. 889 Schneider, who had quit smoking in 1968, 890 saw no accident in his agency’s not having any full-time inspector: “The feeling we got was that if there had been money attached to the bill, it would have been voted down.” Despite the fact that Schneider knew that “the health risk from ‘second-hand smoke’ is much higher in an office situation where a person may be exposed to fumes eight hours a day,” and that the “most ‘violent’” complaints that his office had received involved office smoking policies, Schneider nevertheless felt no embarrassment in conveying his “personal opinion” to the press that there was a “‘good chance’ for some modification of the law” in a direction that could not have redounded to the benefit of office workers’ health: “There have been some cases that to absolutely comply would cost [sic] a great deal of money—primarily in office situations.... Seating arrangements are based on work flow patterns, not on smoking patterns. Sometimes it is just not possible to carry on business with nonsmoking seating patterns.” Resisting employers were fortunate in finding likemindedness in the very agency empowered to enforce MCIAA—not to mention their good fortune that the legislature had appropriated “‘not one penny for enforcement.’” 891

A former state Health Department inspector distinctly remembered more than 888 Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Mar. 27, 2009). Unclear is how Schneider reconciled this retrospective judgment with his claim 30 years earlier that “‘[t]hings are a lot better for the non-smoker in Minnesota than they were before this ordinance [sic].’” Bill Douthat, “Despite Bans, Smokers Elsewhere Puff Away,” Miami News, Apr. 9, 1979, Bates No. TIFL0059493. This claim was juxtaposed to the admission by an official of General Mills, which employed 3,000 people in Minnesota, that not only did it not comply with the 200-square-foot no-smoking zone rule, but that neither employees nor Schneider’s agency had complained.

889 Telephone interview with Jeanne Weigum, Minneapolis (Apr. 7, 2009). Weigum, who became involved with ANSR shortly after MCIAA’s passage and while the regulations were being drafted, distinctly recollected Schneider’s statements at meetings during this early period; she added that his attitude eventually changed.

three decades later that smoke drift over regulation-compliant barriers rendered MCIAA only “marginally effective” —especially in conjunction with the fact (confirmed by Schneider) that the agency never performed carbon monoxide readings, never checked to ascertain whether ventilation systems produced the required number of air changes, and never revoked any restaurant’s license for failure to comply with MCIAA.

James Brinda, the director of environmental health for the Minneapolis Health Department, who was in charge of enforcing the law in the state’s largest city, had so internalized the gap between real protection of nonsmokers and MCIAA’s permissive designated smoking areas that, in referring to the 265 and 184 complaints received by his department in 1976 and 1977, respectively, he had no compunction about publicly airing his own bias: “‘[A] lot of these beefs came from the kind of people who want to abolish smoking from the face of the earth.’” He impatiently ridiculed such otherworldly complainers:

“I get complaints from people who say they aren’t getting a smoke-free area in a restaurant, but what may be acceptable to one person may not be to another.... He said many people expect restaurant air that is totally free of smoke. “The woman who constantly complains about smoke, won’t be satisfied until the entire world quits smoking....”

892 Telephone interview with Jim Witkowski, St. Paul (Mar. 26, 2009) (still employed at the Environmental Health Division of the Minnesota Health Department).

893 Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Mar. 27, 2009). In 1980 the Health Department deleted the provision dealing with carbon monoxide concentration because “inspectors found that it was nearly impossible to make reliable measurements...within the time available for carrying out an inspection. This criterion was also found to be unsatisfactory since it allowed for acceptable levels of carbon monoxide to vary in relation to changing levels in air,” which were “clearly affected by auto emissions and by a facility’s proximity to roads, etc.” Moreover, “only one or two facilities ever relied on carbon monoxide concentrations for compliance....” [Minnesota Department of Health], Clean Indoor Air Rules: Statement of Need and Reasonableness at 2 (n.d. [1979]) (copy furnished by MDH).

895 Elena De La Rosa, “Compliance with No-Smoking Areas Varies,” MT, Apr. 11, 1977 (1A), Bates No. TIMN0462112. In fact, Brinda took the position that, given the intense opposition of restaurant and bar owners, just getting the law passed had been an accomplishment, but that the law’s chief purpose had been educational, although no one in 1975 had contemplated that some day all public places would be nonsmoking. Telephone interview with James Brinda, Minneapolis (Mar. 29, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

But even nonsmokers who merely wanted to keep the smoke out of their nonsmoking areas would have to remain unsatisfied since the Health Department’s regulations used a rigidly numerical, objective (albeit irrational) definition of “acceptable smoke-free area” as one in which smoking itself was prohibited and (and for example) from which the smoking-permitted area was separated by a four-foot space, although Brinda himself admitted that “of course” smoke did drift across the “imaginary line” separating them.\footnote{Telephone interview with James Brinda, Minneapolis (Mar. 29, 2009).}

Perhaps the most reflective, self-reflective, and playful insights into the mindset of those who played prominent roles in advocating for the initiation of statewide government controls on smoking in public were articulated by former Assistant Attorney General Terry O’Brien, who both counseled Peterson in drafting the Board of Health’s proposed regulations and represented the health commissioner at the public hearing on December 2, 1975. Asked more than three decades later whether back in 1975 he had regarded the designated smoking area system as largely subverting the intended protection of nonsmokers, inasmuch as smoke drifted over 56-inch-high barriers and across 4-foot-wide spaces, and whether he had thought that this regime was just a foot in the door or might be as good as it was ever going to get, he observed:

When the statute was passed, mainly due to Phyllis Kahn’s energy, everything was an open slate. The legislature gave little guidance except do something, and there were few existing guidelines. The entire concept was thought revolutionary by those who pushed it, and those who feared it. I don’t think any of us thought our efforts were the end game. We knew that secondary smoke traveled more than four feet and could leap tall buildings if necessary. But little was said by us since the opponents correctly guessed that this was the foot in the door. We never purported that the rules were all that would be done, but didn’t deny it either.

Looking back, the rules seem almost silly. They were, however, the foot in the door which established the concept of clean indoor air, empowered non smokers to object and report, gave the color of governmental sanction, and, to some extent, pushed smokers to acknowledge, however reluctantly, that their exhalations resulted in invasions of other people’s personal tissues. So, yes, without thinking too far ahead, none of us were crusaders, it was a job to be done and none too exciting as [sic] that, we thought we would be back at it once the public accepted the idea. And the public did.

I suspect that Hawkeyes, as well as Gophers, are shocked to be asked if they want smoking rooms when traveling to other states. We giggle now to see old black and white movies where the doc asks the patient in the hospital bed if he wants a smoke or old Movietone News showing Congressmen smoking during their hearings—as was everyone else. These rules were among the first steps of what has turned out to be a long and largely Finally Articulating the Need to Dismantle the Scientifically Obsolete Regime of Designated Smoking-Permitted Areas

The well-mixed concentration of smoke in a space is directly proportional to the smoker density and inversely proportional to the air exchange rate. Erecting a barrier a few feet high or placing the smokers and nonsmokers in different parts of the space changes neither. Increasing the distance from the source to the target will reduce peak exposure, because of the proximity effect, which acts while the source is on, i.e., when the cigarette is lit, but does not eliminate exposure. It’s sort of like being shot with a ‘32 round instead of a ‘45.”

It took an anti-smoking activist in 1977 in Massachusetts (which in 1975 outright banned smoking in supermarkets and Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority means of transit, except in personal offices, but failed to provide for enforcement) to point out that the strictest public smoking law was not wearing any clothes—that is, that MCIAA did not really protect nonsmokers from secondhand smoke. In his testimony in 1977 to the National Commission on Smoking and Public Policy, Roni Rechnitz, the executive director of Citizens for Clean Air in Publicly Used Buildings, noted that although it was “on paper at least...the most comprehensive legislation to date,” MCIAA was “not good law. And it is not effective law. But it is significant law having been the first and thus opening the door for better, well thought out, and more enforceable legislation.” As an advocate of a statewide referendum, Rechnitz opined that “[t]he primary problem” with the Minnesota law was that “it had to be passed by a legislature entailing all the customary ‘political considerations’ deemed necessary for passage.” With regard to the substantive protections that MCIAA provided, he correctly identified designated smoking areas as “the key here. By trying to overly accomodate [sic] smokers it introduced a number of complicating factors which greatly reduced the potential effectiveness of the bill.” This 897 Email from Terry O’Brien to Marc Linder (Apr. 9, 2009).

---

898 Email from James Repace to Marc Linder (Apr. 6, 2009).
900 The National Commission on Smoking and Public Policy was created by the American Cancer Society in October 1976, inter alia, to examine the effectiveness of anti-smoking policies. Report of the National Commission on Smoking and Public Policy: A National Dilemma: Cigarette Smoking Or the Health of Americans (Jan. 31, 1978), Bates No. TIMN0431947.
understatement reflected the fact—which appears never to have been highlighted during the legislative debate in Minnesota—that “a gas by the definition of its physical properties expands to the limit of its confinement. Smoke will not stay on one side of a room because it is a designated smoking area.” For this reason Rechnitz called the provision permitting designated smoking areas on all public conveyances with a capacity of ten or more persons “the worst section of that law,” though the same inundation of nosmoking areas with smoke from adjoining designated smoking areas occurred across the gamut of covered public places.901

Such accounts demonstrated that some health advocates were well aware of the virtual uselessness of what by then had become the legislative standard permitting proprietors to designate smoking areas virtually wherever they pleased. It was this aspect of MCIAA that prompted Judy Pinke, the assistant to the commissioner of the Labor and Industry Department, many years later to refer to it as an “awfully baroque piece of legislation.”902

By the 1980s, as scientists began to devise appropriate measuring devices and develop a much deeper understanding of the consequences of secondhand smoke exposure, they criticized the kind of physical separation measures that the Health Department required for compliance with the MCIAA as virtually useless. Thus, for example, as early as 1985, two of the leading exposure scientists, James Repace and Alfred Lowrey, noted that “[p]hysical separation of nonsmokers and smokers into sections within a given space reduces peak concentrations, but not average concentrations to which nonsmokers are exposed, and therefore does not affect average lifetime risk.”903 (A decade later, Repace became more specific, 901 Roni Rechnitz, Director, Citizens for Clean Air in Publicly Used Buildings, Testimony to the National Commission on Smoking and Public Policy, at 1, 2, 6 (June 2, 1977), Bates No. 500807300/2/3/7. To be sure, the advance that Rechnitz limned beyond MCIAA in eliminating “designated smoking areas per se” would, bizarrely, have “recognize[d] the fact that some smokers are so powerfully addicted that they suffer tremendously if unable to smoke over an extended length of time” by permitting smoking in all bathrooms.) Id. at Bates No. 500807300/1. Curiously, ANSR itself modestly characterized MCIAA as merely “one of the most comprehensive nonsmokers’ rights...laws in the nation.” ANSR, “The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act and You: An Explanation of the Law and the Rules for Implementation” n.p. [at 5] (n.d. [ca. 1976]) (copy furnished by ANSR.

---

902 Telephone interview with Judy Pinke, Minneapolis (Mar. 26, 2009).

903 James Repace and Alfred Lowrey, “An Indoor Air Quality Standard for Ambient Tobacco Smoke Based on Carcinogenic Risk,” New York State Journal of Medicine, July 1985, at 381-83 at 382. To be sure, the year before the very same authors had written that “[n]onsmoking sections are effective ways to limit the exposure of nonsmokers to tobacco combustion products,” subject to the caveat that “[t]he larger the ratio of the smoking area...
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

declaring that although environmental tobacco smoke levels were higher in smoking than in nonsmoking sections, restricting smoking to one side of a room did “not reduce the ETS loading of the space. Thus, tobacco smoke will rapidly diffuse throughout the space and the laws of physics also rule out this putative control measure.”

By 1986 even the Minnesota Health Department publicly admitted what the basic human sense of smell and sight should have demonstrated as soon as the law had gone into effect in 1975. In the Statement of Need and Reasonableness that it issued in June 1986, the Department proposed some clarifying amendments to the MCIAA rules, including the blanket replacement of the term “smoke-free” with “nonsmoking,” especially in the crucial operating concept of “Acceptable smoke-free area.” The reason for the change was straightforward:

People have often interpreted the term “smoke-free to mean a totally smokeless area. Under the rules, it is not always possible to achieve a smoke-free environment when a room contains both nonsmoking and smoking-permitted areas. Although the rules are intended to prevent a nonsmoker from having direct contact with smoke, smoke may occasionally be detectable in the nonsmoking portion in a room. Therefore, it is preferable to use a term which reflects actual conditions.

Despite the ludicrous understatement suggesting that smoke in smoking-prohibited areas that were designed to shield nonsmokers from exposure was an exceptional and marginal phenomenon rather than the massive and necessary result of the inherently flawed system of designated smoking areas, the Health Department’s decision to eliminate what was in effect false advertising constituted an important, albeit halfhearted, acknowledgment that the decade-old regulations were unable to live up to their capacious interpretation of MCIAA, which—with the one aforementioned ambiguous provision requiring owners to arrange seating to “provide smoke-free areas”—did not in fact promise such smoke-freedom.

---

905 Before the Minnesota Commissioner of Health: Statement of Need and Reasonableness at 6 (June 13, 1986), Bates No. TIMN0458156/61.

ANSR not only did not criticize the administrative rules’ conflation of word and reality, but at times reinforced it. Thus in 1983 the organization declared that: “The most visible means for the public to recognize what has been accomplished is through smoking and nonsmoking sections in restaurants. This identification is due largely to the dedication of ANSR members during the first few years after the inauguration [sic] of the law. The Restaurant Committee...was diligent in its efforts to contact restaurant owners regarding the need for provide smoke-free areas for nonsmoking patrons.” The surgeon general’s 1986 report on the health impact of involuntary smoking finally prompted ANSR to break with its acquiescence in separation between smokers and nonsmokers. By 1989 it conceded that, however important the MCIAA had been in eliminating tobacco smoke pollution, it was “inconsistent with our current knowledge about secondhand tobacco smoke.” In particular, the law’s “minimal requirements” permitting “separation of smokers and nonsmokers within the same air space” made it “possible for an employer to abide by the letter of the law while his or her employees suffer from the tobacco smoke in the workplace.” (Why ANSR refrained from directing the same critique at restaurants is unclear.)

In 1989 it worked with Kahn and other sympathetic legislators to file companion House and Senate bills to amend MCIAA, inter alia, to offer nonsmokers greater protection from secondhand smoke exposure resulting from “drift from one cubicle or section of a room to another. The most significant parts of the bills addressed such problems by requiring that the odor of smoke be eliminated in nonsmoking areas.”

---

906 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 6(b), at 633, 634.
Not that Kahn, whom the Tobacco Institute regarded as the industry’s “long-time nemesis,” had waited until 1989 to launch her initiative to dismantle the scientifically obsolete regime of designated smoking areas: during the 1987-88 legislature sessions she had filed “a new scheme to place mammoth restrictions on this industry.”\footnote{Michael Brozek and Daniel Nelson to William Cannell, Re: Minnesota Plan/Status Report at 2 (Feb. 2, 1988), Bates No. TI08822049/50.} Instead of abolishing designated smoking areas outright, Kahn’s H.F. 607 and H.F. 1920, as TI noted, eliminated them “upon request of offended non-smokers.”\footnote{Michael Brozek and Daniel Nelson to William Cannell, Re: Minnesota Plan/Status Report at 3 (Feb. 2, 1988), Bates No. TI08822049/51.} Like MCIAA, her bills did not even mandate the use of physical barriers or ventilation systems in public places in which they were not already “existing,” yet the bills still required them to be used to “eliminate the presence of smoke in physically related nonsmoking areas.” Nevertheless, even though this provision appeared not to impose any duty on owners of public places without such barriers or systems, Kahn’s 1987 and 1988 bills took the radical step of requiring all owners of public places with a designated smoking area to “eliminate the designated smoking area and post appropriate signs advising the public that smoking is prohibited” if compliance with their already existing responsibilities under § 144.416 (to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking”) did “not prevent further complaints.”\footnote{H.F. No. 607, § 2 (Feb. 26, 1987, by Kahn et. al); H.F. No. 1920, § 2 (Feb. 15, 1988, by Kahn et. al).}

In part because Kahn’s bills were only a part of an “extremely heavy and dangerous legislative agenda facing the industry”\footnote{Michael Brozek and Daniel Nelson to William Cannell, Re: Minnesota Plan/Status Report at 4 (Feb. 2, 1988), Bates No. TI08822049/52.} (including bills to ban vending machine sales, ban smoking in all public buildings, restrict smoking in schools, require self-extinguishing cigarettes, increase the cigarette tax, and limit the tax exemption for publications advertising tobacco products),\footnote{Michael Brozek and Daniel Nelson to William Cannell, Re: Minnesota Plan/Status Report at 3 (Feb. 2, 1988), Bates No. TI08822049/51.} the Tobacco Institute’s Midwest regional officers considered Minnesota “the most anti-tobacco state in the nation.”\footnote{Michael Brozek and Daniel Nelson to William Cannell, Re: Minnesota Plan/Status Report at 10 (Feb. 2, 1988), Bates No. TI08822049/58.} To deal with this broad-based onslaught, TI mobilized its own counter-offensive, which in scope and intensity overshadowed by far any aggregation of resources that it would ever bring to bear in Iowa and included appearances at hearings by the cigarette oligopoly’s star Covington &
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Burling lawyers David Remes and John Rupp. One of TI’s leading flaks, Brennan Moran (later Dawson), assistant to the president, also inundated the Minnesota House Human Services Subcommittee with the cigarette firms’ standard dose of obfuscatory mendacity beginning with the claim that the bill “would be better titled the ‘Minnesota Smoker Harassment Act of 1988,’” especially since its “vendetta-like harassment” was directed at what was merely an “occasional annoyance” and “completely ignore[d] the real culprits of indoor air pollution...faulty ventilation systems....” Whereas the cigarette manufacturers otherwise propagated entrusting decisions about smoking to owners, when it came to this “anti-smoker ‘revenge’ bill,” suddenly Moran lambasted “granting employers dictatorial power” lest they pander to employees “claiming hypersensitivity to tobacco smoke....” Instead, she urged on the legislators the oligopolists’ favorite hoax—committing such decisions to the “common courtesy of smoking and nonsmoking employees and customers.” Whether Moran’s arrant nonsense detracted from or reinforced the overall effort, the tobacco industry’s richly endowed concerted lobbying may well have contributed to H.F. 1920’s defeat in the House Human Services Subcommittee by a vote of 5 to 3 and its death three weeks later by a vote of 8 to 7 in full committee. The cigarette companies may have succeeded in frustrating enactment of this particular anti-smoking initiative, but the Tobacco Institute was nevertheless constrained to admit that “Minnesota’s 1987 legislative session was one of the most punishing in our industry’s history” inasmuch as it “adopted the largest single cigarette excise tax increase in the history of the tobacco industry” in addition to “the first statewide law restricting the promotional distribution of tobacco products.” TI was also keenly aware that political momentum had shifted in Minnesota: whereas “most anti-tobacco measures” from 1975 and 1984 had been “dealt with in committee or...thwarted by direct lobbying,” “punitive legislation” was coming forth in ever greater and threatening volume since the advent of the state Health Commissioner’s Technical Advisory Committee on Nonsmoking and Health, which TI recognized as “an explosive coalition against the tobacco industry” that included “broad business representation....”

918 Michael Brozek and Daniel Nelson to William Cannell, Re: Minnesota Plan/Status Report at 7 (Feb. 18, 1988), Bates No. TIMN0457532/8/43.

In 1989, Kahn’s H.F. 452 would have imposed more stringent requirements on those in charge of covered public places. Textually, Kahn sought to achieve this objective by amending the existing provision in the following ways: “Where smoking areas are designated, existing physical barriers and ventilation systems shall be used to minimize prevent the toxic effect presence of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas.” In other words, whereas until then MCIAA did not require owners to have ventilation systems at all and the administrative regulations in effect gave owners a choice of using physical barriers or four-foot-wide spaces, but in either case failed to enforce a performance standard of minimizing smoke drift to neighboring nosmoking areas, ANSR and Kahn not only literally (though perhaps inadvertantly) mandated the use of barriers and ventilation, but also imposed a zero-tolerance standard for smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas. However, since no commercially practicable ventilation system could achieve such an outcome, presumably the bill’s authors intended that owners of public places would on their own eliminate designated smoking areas rather than face MCIAA’s (weak and ineffectual) sanctions. Ironically, then, this unwieldy mechanism constituted a step backward from H.F. 607/1920.

In the event, in 1989 neither the House nor Senate bill, which the Tobacco Institute again mobilized the cigarette companies’ resources to target for defeat, made any progress: H.F. 452 failed even to get a committee hearing, while S.F. 713 was tabled after having been “drastically amended by the Health Committee, whose members refused to regard it as a health issue.”

Even the Health Department’s aforementioned truth-in-nonsmoking-areas initiative took almost another decade to secure: not until 1995 was the amendment incorporated in the Minnesota Rules. The Statement of Need and Reasonableness that the Department submitted in 1994 as part of the administrative rulemaking process still seemed to reflect wonderment that “the public often interprets the term ‘smoke-free’ to mean ‘absolutely free of smoke’” or that it was “sometimes difficult for people to understand that compliance with the MCIAA and these rules does not actually result in areas which are free of environmental tobacco smoke.” Going beyond the Department’s more modest admission in 1986, it now conceded that in mixed smoking/nonsmoking rooms or buildings “the environment will not actually be ‘smoke-free.’”

Compliance and Enforcement, Such As They Were

Early press accounts suggested how feebly the new regime—which at the time the tobacco industry ranked as the country’s “Most Severe” set of restrictions—protected nonsmokers. The “Minnesota Indoor [sic] Clean Air Act Survey” of food service operators, conducted by the National Restaurant Association in January 1976, found that by far the single most widespread method of creating a nosmoking section was to “designate several tables as a no-smoking... area.” In contrast to the 56 percent of respondents who used that method, 20 percent made one side of the room nosmoking, 16 percent created nosmoking sections by means of partitions, eight percent used a separate dining room, while designating the entire restaurant nosmoking was “basically not being used as an alternative.” 30

Even more revealingly, fully 74 percent of respondents replied No to the question: “If there was no Clean Air Act, would you provide a no-smoking section?,” while only 20 percent answered Yes.

At the state Health Department itself, which issued the regulations, “desks have been rearranged so the 500 employees sit in clusters of smokers and nonsmokers, generally separated by file-cabinet barricades.” The legislature’s attitude toward its own creation was captured by its having waived the law “on at least one occasion so the smoking representatives would stay in their seats for a crucial late-night debate, rather than scurrying off the floor for a smoke. And Martin Sabo”—MCIAA co-sponsor and “the two-pack-a-day speaker of the House” was—one of the first to comply with the law: he pasted a ‘smoking allowed’ sign over two of his four chairs in the waiting area his office. ‘Thank goodness my boss is a smoker,’ said Sabo’s secretary..., who had a similar sign near her typewriter.”

In April 1976 the head of ANSR’s Public Awareness Committee reported that in addition to health care institutions, in which it was “inexcuseable...to allow smoking throughout their facilities,” state offices and buildings were “[a]nother problem area.... Enforcement is non-existent at the capital.” Glenna Johnson urged ANSR members to “[w]rite your legislator and demand an explanation for the blatant disregard of the MCIAA.”

Several months after promulgation of the regulations a reporter saw with his own eyes a sign in the largest restaurant in Minneapolis unlawfully declaring the entire premises a smoking area. Such brazen violations prompted Brandt to remark that “[f]or those who felt the law would be an immediate solution to the problem, it has to be a disappointment,”’’ but, with equanimity, he added that he had known that “‘it would be an educational campaign and I perceive the law as one tool to give nonsmokers the force of law.’” In 1977, when a journalist observed several people smoking directly in front of a no smoking sign at the Minneapolis Amtrak station and called the attention of the stationmaster to the violations, the latter replied: “‘All we can do is put up the signs.... We can’t do anything if people disobey them.’” The Amtrak official was wrong: MCIAA required those in charge of public places not only to post signs, but to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place by...asking smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke.”

---

30National Restaurant Association, Minnesota Indoor Clean Air Act Survey at 4 (n.d. Jan. 7, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0240683/6. 195 (or 38 percent) of 518 operators to whom surveys were sent returned them. Id. at 1. To be sure, the most prevalent method would not have been compliant unless the section was also separated by at least four feet from the smoking section.

To be sure, this mandate was risibly weak in that it literally not only did not obligate the owner on his own initiative to ask smokers not to violate the law, but even when he did intervene on a discomforted customer’s or employee’s behalf, he had no duty to inform the police of the violation if the smoker continued to smoke. Kahn herself, the journalist later discovered, had had the same experience in the same public place with the same outcome. She nevertheless maintained that the law was “adequate” as it was and did not need to be changed to make it enforceable. The problem was that “[s]hort-staffed and overworked police departments can’t be expected to devote their time to rounding up smokers”; consequently, the burden of enforcement fell on those in charge of public places who “usually don’t ask people to obey” the no smoking signs. As a possible solution Kahn suggested actions to enjoin those in charge of public places who had repeatedly violated the law to enforce it. Since the injunction actions that

935 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 6(c), at 633, 634.

936 George McCormick, “Enforcing Clean-Air Act,” MT, Feb. 3, 1977, Bates No. TIMN0240675. It is unclear whether Kahn’s position would have been encompassed by what The New York Times characterized as “agreement among...antismoking groups that enforcing the statutes is almost impossible; that compliance...is mostly a matter of public cooperation....” Shawn Kennedy, “Smoking Restrictions Are Proving Popular But Hard to Enforce,” NYT, Nov. 17, 1977 (A1), Bates No. TIMN0462090.

2488
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

MCIAA authorized the board of health and affected parties to institute merely enjoined “repeated violations” of proprietors’ aforementioned duty,937 which did not, in this context, go beyond asking (on behalf of customers/employees) smokers not to smoke, it is difficult to discern what systemic objectives such actions could have achieved—unless litigants could have persuaded judges that the provision in section 6 requiring proprietors to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place by...any other means which may be appropriate”938 encompassed much broader duties such as calling the police.939 The only plausible reason for Kahn’s preference for such an unwieldy and probably ineffective tool in lieu of amending the law (to impose specific duties on owners) was her knowledge that she no more had the requisite legislative majority for it in 1977 than in 1975, when she had been constrained to acquiesce in deleting the provision making owners’ violations misdemeanors. Such resignation in the face of limited legislative enthusiasm for a smoking ban was reflected in ANSR’s admission in 1978 that: “‘We haven’t reached the point where smoking is socially unacceptable, and the non-smokers still have to put up with it.’”940

Assistant Health Commissioner Dr. Fifer, who was the agency’s self-described “front man” at the legislature, revealed that the department had had a “general understanding” with the legislature (though not with Kahn) that the Health Department would not crack down, for example, on noncompliant

---

937 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 7(3), at 633, 635.
938 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 6(c), at 633, 634.
939 In fact, the Minnesota Statutes Annotated discloses no reported court decision relating to MCIAA at all. To be sure, the chief enforcer, Charles Schneider, stated in 1981 that “‘[t]he ultimate enforcement given us by the law is that we can seek an injunction keeping a business from operating.’” During the six years since the law had been in force the Health Department had “threatened such action ‘maybe 75 to 100 times’ statewide. It has never had to carry through.” Sandy Battin, “Smoking Rights Not Cloudy in Minnesota,” News-Tribune (Duluth), Nov. 1, 1981, Bates No. TIMN0462001. Schneider, who was in charge of restaurant and hotel inspections, later stated that the Minnesota Attorney General’s office had advised the Health Department that MCIAA had conferred on the latter the power to seek injunctions to keep businesses from operating; since the Department never sought any such injunction, it was unclear whether judges would have upheld the Attorney General’s interpretation. Schneider added that “theoretically,” affected private parties presumably had had the same right. Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Apr. 2, 2009).
restaurants by revoking their licenses. By 1979, the department knew of no case in which it had been necessary for an owner to change the ventilation. Moreover, even when the Health Department did engage in enforcement in response to complaints, it consisted merely in Schneider’s writing a letter to the owner or manager; if the agency received no further complaints, it took no further action.

In 1979 Brandt also confirmed the existence of an “implied understanding” to go slow with respect to enforcement between ANSR itself and owners. In testimony before a Wisconsin legislative committee considering a public smoking bill he stated that “the Minnesota experience reflects a tacit appreciation of the value of accommodation. ... I think it is probable that business interests would have commenced a lawsuit if the non-smokers’ rights movement had insisted upon so stringent an application of the letter of the law as to create a serious difficulty (or at least the perception of a serious difficulty) for proprietors.”

Even for Brandt, who had initiated the drive for legislation, this gradualism was appropriate: the disappointment of those who criticized MCIAA because it had “not been enforced strictly enough” stemmed from their “unrealistic expectations of a 'solution’ achieved by a single shot, so to speak—that passage of a good law would, of itself, take care of the problem....” In contrast, “[t]he larger number...realized that enactment of the law, although of great importance, was nevertheless only one step in a lengthy, difficult, mostly education process....”

Brandt’s analysis, however, missed the important point that the disappointment of at least some of the critics was apparently not rooted in an unrealistic expectation of frictionless and instantaneous enforcement of a “good

---

941 Telephone interview with Ellen Fifer Green, Minneapolis (Mar. 28, 2009).
943 Telephone interview with Charles Schneider, Minneapolis (Mar. 27, 2009).
944 Comments by Edward R. Brandt (Co-Founder and Former President of the Association for Non-Smokers Rights) on the Effectiveness and Effects of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act and Related Issues (elaborating upon testimony before the Wisconsin Assembly Committee on State Affairs, March 20, 1979, on Assembly Bill 80 [to be entered as testimony for American Lung Association of Mid-Maryland] at 6, Bates No. T103870504/09).
945 Comments by Edward R. Brandt (Co-Founder and Former President of the Association for Non-Smokers Rights) on the Effectiveness and Effects of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act and Related Issues (elaborating upon testimony before the Wisconsin Assembly Committee on State Affairs, March 20, 1979, on Assembly Bill 80 [to be entered as testimony for American Lung Association of Mid-Maryland] (n.p. [at 9]), Bates No. T103870504/12.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Rather, some may have concluded that MCIAA itself was deeply flawed by virtue of its central feature of designated-smoking-areas, which, even if 100 percent of owners had complied with their obligations all the time, insured that nonsmokers would continue to be exposed to secondhand smoke in restaurants and other covered public places almost as intensely as before, just as they continued to be in airplanes with nonsmoking sections. This skepticism was presumably at least in part reflected in a June 1978 Minnesota Poll revealing that 33 percent of nonsmokers did not think that restaurant operators generally provided “adequate no-smoking areas.”

(Moreover, the fact that, according to the same poll, even 71 percent of smokers, in addition to 75 percent of nonsmokers, thought that the “no-smoking law should be strictly enforced” made a mockery of the Tobacco Institute’s wishful thinking propaganda that “[t]here aren’t enough people who vitally care about the issue to make the law hard.”)

2491

946“Minnesota Poll: 7 of 10 Residents Think No-Smoking Sections Adequate,” MT, June 25, 1978 (1A, 6A), Bates No. TIMN0462261. To be sure, the ambiguity of the question made it impossible to determine whether respondents thought that they were being asked whether they believed that nosmoking sections were smokefree or numerous or large enough: “‘State law requires that restaurants provide nonsmoking areas for customers who want them. Do you think restaurant operators generally do or do not provide adequate no-smoking areas?’” Of nonsmokers 33 percent said No and 66 percent Yes. The responses prompted Richard Wade, director of the Division of Environmental Health of MDH, to express surprise that “‘so many people are satisfied with restaurants’ compliance’” since the Department received 1,200 to 1,400 complaints annually. “Minnesota Poll: 7 of 10 Residents Think No-Smoking Sections Adequate,” MT, June 25, 1978, clipping in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B). Even less on point was a question posed two and a half years earlier as to how effective the law had been in cutting down on smoking in public places: 12 percent responded “very effective,” 38 percent “somewhat effective,” 28 percent “not very effective,” and 15 percent “not at all effective.” Of nonsmokers who were sometimes bothered by smokers 56 percent responded either “very effective” or “somewhat effective.” “Minnesota Poll: Most Nonsmokers Think Rights Law Has Been Helpful,” MT, Jan. 18, 1976, clipping in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B).

947“Minnesota Poll: 7 of 10 Residents Think No-Smoking Sections Adequate,” MT, June 25, 1978 (1A, 6A), Bates No. TIMN0462261. Two years later, even 87 percent of two-pack-a-day smokers (in addition to 92 percent of nonsmokers) favored the law requiring restaurants and other businesses to “set aside some space for people who do not smoke.” “Minnesota Poll: Cigarette Smoking Interest Fading: 67% Wish They Could Give Up Habit,” MT, May 11, 1980 (1F at 10F), Bates No. TIMN0462021/2. To be sure, this very high proportion might have been reduced if the poll had correctly stated the law as prohibiting smoking except in designated smoking areas.
Two years later, 64 percent of nonsmokers polled by a newspaper in the St. Paul area responded that they were “bothered” when someone smoked near them in a restaurant, many explaining that “they felt the laws should be even stronger, with separate rooms or partitioning of rooms in restaurants for smokers and nonsmokers.”

For those who regarded the law’s failure to eliminate the source of tobacco smoke in public places as the problem, it was unclear, as Brandt argued in 1979, that the anti-smoking movement had in fact “made a lot of progress, relatively rapidly.” After all, if, as Kahn stressed, “[p]erhaps the most important reason for passage of the law is its reasonableness. It doesn’t prevent anyone from smoking,” the gap between the avant-garde but timid MCIAA and a law that

---

950 Comments by Edward R. Brandt (Co-Founder and Former President of the Association for Non-Smokers Rights) on the Effectiveness and Effects of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act and Related Issues (elaborating upon testimony before the Wisconsin Assembly Committee on State Affairs, March 20, 1979, on Assembly Bill 80 [to be entered as testimony for American Lung Association of Mid-Maryland] (n.p. [at 9]), Bates No. TI03870504/12.

951 Phyllis Kahn, “The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Legislation Enacted with Volunteer Group Support,” Proceedings of the Fifth World Conference on Smoking and Health 2:309-11 at 309 (William Forbes et al. eds. 1983) (though dated 1983, the article refers to events that took place in 1985). Kahn’s use of “reasonableness” was Pickwickian: it meant “pragmatic” in the sense of disarming legislative opponents; with regard to the purpose of protecting nonsmokers’ health the law was unreasonable. With a change in punctuation, Kahn repeated the same statement in Phyllis Kahn, “The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: A Model for New York and Other States,” New York State Journal of Medicine, Dec. 1983, at 1300-1301 at 1300. To be sure, Kahn went on to assert that: “If such measures [as dividing restaurants into smoking and nosmoking sections] do not result in a smoke-free atmosphere for the non-smoker, then the entire area must be made non-smoking.” Id. Kahn had also made these same claims (virtually verbatim) in 1976: Representative Phyllis Kahn, Speech Before Public Health Association, St. Cloud at 5 (Oct. 8, 1976), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118F.8.3.(B). On what statutory or regulatory provision she was basing this radical interpretation is unclear; like the Health Department rules’ misleadingly loose language, Kahn appears to have used “smoke-free” and “non-smoking” synonymously: “[M]ost would in fact have suppressed the source of smoke in public places and consequently provoked robust opposition by business owners and smokers would have been very great indeed. In any event, Kahn’s claim a little more than a year after it had gone into effect that MCIAA “sets out strict requirements for the designation of such smoking areas so that they are limited and will not affect the health or comfort of the non-smoker who chooses to pass through public life in a smoke-free atmosphere” was a preposterously exaggerated distortion of the law’s stringency. And although she may have been right in arguing that compliance with MCIAA’s comprehensiveness “requires a massive change in our culture and in our attitudes,” few would have foreseen that another 32 years would pass before the Minnesota legislature enacted such a statewide (indoor) ban.

Representative Phyllis Kahn, Speech Before Public Health Association, St. Cloud at 6 (Oct. 8, 1976), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118F.8.3.(B). The word “requires” was handwritten replacing the struck out “incurred.”

To be sure, 30 years after MCIAA’s passage and shortly before passage of the statewide Freedom to Breathe Act in 2007, several local governments in the Twin Cities area began adopting ordinances banning smoking outright in restaurants and bars. For example, the Minneapolis smoking ban ordinance went into effect on Mar. 31, 2005. Minneapolis Code of Ordinances, ch. 234. http://www.ci.minneapolis.mn.us/council/
The fate of the bill that Duluth DFLer Arlene Lehto, an environmentalist and director of the Save Lake Superior Association, introduced in the House in 1979 (where the DFL had lost its majority, it and the Republicans both controlling 67 seats) strikingly confirmed just how limited the legislature’s commitment to strengthening the law was. H.F. 184 was designed to deal with the problem of rampant violations of MCIAA by restaurants by conditioning restaurant licensure on compliance with the law—or, as she colorfully (albeit unscientifically) phrased it in a press release, “to ensure citizens a right to a tasty meal in a public restaurant without involuntary consumption of anothers nicotine emissions.” By circumventing the “lengthy and costly process requiring the county to develop evidence in cases of non-compliance,” the use of licensure sanctions offered prompt hearings before an enforcing board that was “closer to the community.” ANSR enthusiastically supported the bill because it promised to overcome MCIAA’s Achilles heel of “voluntary compliance,” which had resulted from the legislature’s failure to appropriate any funding for enforcement. ANSR welcomed the measure, whose wording it had been “waiting to hear for three years,” because it empowered the state health commissioner, the state hotel inspector, or any other authority charged with enforcement of safety or health regulations in restaurants to determine whether they were compliant: “What this all adds up to is that the one big item that prohibited enforcement (expensive litigation) will be replaced by MDH inspector action,” which ANSR viewed as “demand[ing] immediate respect by restaurateurs.”

Dr. Harold Leppink, the St. Louis County (Duluth) public health officer who had suggested the initiative to Lehto, regarded MCIAA as an important educational tool because it forced everyone to confront the problem of smoking every time he or she entered a restaurant by virtue of having to choose a smoking or nosmoking section. And although he believed that segregation made conditions “a little better,” the fact that the smoke nevertheless continued to overwhelm nonsmokers in restaurants, even when owners were formally in compliance with the law, motivated the former, in his view, to push even more adamantly for prohibition of smoking in public places. The bill, to which Schaaf introduced the companion in the Senate, suffered a sharp rebuff in committee when, according to Lehto’s account three decades later, her fellow DFL legislator from Duluth, Thomas Berkelman, lit up a cigar and passed out cigars to the male members of the committee. (Tobacco smoke was typically so thick in House committee rooms that often Lehto had to leave.) This fraternity-house-like prank in response to a relatively modest effort to facilitate compliance (rather than to narrow the scope of permissive smoking) puts in its proper context the contemporaneous acknowledgment in The New York Times that “Comprehensive Minnesota Law of 1975 Stands Alone.” It also explains why the Times added that the “world of the American smoker is shrinking, but not nearly as fast as most antismoking crusaders would like it to.”

2494

To be sure, Lehto’s bill was not killed outright on the spot: in an effort to get the bill out of committee Lehto amended it to cover only her own St. Louis and

---

959 Harold Leppink, “Proposed Legislation on Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act” (Feb. 12, 1979) (original furnished by Arlene Lehto); telephone interview with Arlene Lehto, Oro Valley, AZ (Mar. 30, 2009).

960 Telephone interview with Harold Leppink, Boca Raton, FL (Apr. 12, 2009).

962 Telephone interview with Arlene Lehto, Oro Valley, AZ (Mar. 30, 2009). To be sure, Berkelman denied her account (“I never did that”), charging that Lehto “kind of went off the deep end,” marginalizing her own effectiveness. Telephone interview with Thomas Berkelman, Minneapolis (May 9, 2009).

964 Email from Arlene Lehto to Marc Linder (Apr. 2, 2009) (surmising that “I might have been trying to get it past a committee however I could—and perhaps limiting it to the neighboring Lake County, in which she had support,\textsuperscript{965} in this radically shrunken version the committee recommended its adoption.\textsuperscript{966} Lehto was constrained to acquiesce in this miniaturized measure despite the warning by Dr. Lessink that: “Making compliance with MCIAA a condition for licensure would help St. Louis County solve some of the enforcement problems we have; however, MCIAA is of little value unless it can provide the same benefits to restaurant patrons throughout the state.”\textsuperscript{967} The bill was held over until 1980, when the House, sitting as the committee of the whole, voted 69 to 55 to adopt an amendment offered by Joseph Begich—a DFL mine manager from the Iron Range whose influence in St. Louis County antedated Lehto, of whom he was suspicious because of her attack on one of the mining companies for its environmental practices\textsuperscript{968}—to confine the coverage even further to first class cities in the two counties.\textsuperscript{969} A dozen days later Kahn tried to outmaneuver Begich, who had consistently voted against H.F. 79 and the rule change banning smoking on the House floor, by offering an amendment to extend coverage to all first-class cities statewide, but it failed by a vote of 41 to 76. Underscoring the voting heft of the anti-regulatory forces, another DFL representative, David Battaglia of Lake County, moved an amendment to strike his county altogether, leaving coverage only of St. Louis County’s sole first-class city (Duluth). After its adoption, the House passed the bill by a vote of 106 to 12,\textsuperscript{970} Lehto and Kahn voting with the majority presumably to secure an opening wedge for Senate or future legislative action, though in fact the bill died in the Senate Health, Welfare, and Corrections Committee.\textsuperscript{971}
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Formal enforcement of the law, inadequate as it was to protect nonsmokers from exposure to secondhand smoke, remained problematic for years. More than three years after the law had gone into effect, with about 1,200 complaints being filed annually, half of them relating to offices and other workplaces, Schneider believed that “the majority of businesses” did not comply with it. In 1979, the commissioner of health, while contending that MCIAA “made things much more tolerable for the non-smoker,” noted that it had “not been a complete success.” Instead of attributing the act’s failure to achieve more than mere greater tolerableness to the deeply flawed institution of designated smoking areas—which were arguably nowhere more grotesquely inappropriate than in college classrooms, in which instructors at one state university were advised to designate a smoking and a nonsmoking section—Dr. George Pettersen focused on the inadequate enforcement, although in fact even stationing an inspector full-time in every restaurant would not have protected nonsmokers from tobacco smoke drifting over 56-inch-high barriers. (Perhaps this fact accounted for the blanket prohibition of smoking—except in two “private” offices—in the Health Department’s Division of Environmental Health.) In response to questions posed by a legislative aid in Oregon about the operation of MCIAA the physician commented: “The most serious problem with the law is the lack of any funds being appropriated from the State Legislature to defray any of the costs of developing the rules or carrying on an informational program or an enforcement program.”

\textsuperscript{965}H.F. 184 (Apr. 23, 1979) (copy furnished by Lehto).
\textsuperscript{967}Harold Leppink, “Proposed Legislation on Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act” (Feb. 12, 1979) (original furnished by Arlene Lehto).
\textsuperscript{968}Email from Arlene Lehto to Marc Linder (Apr. 4, 2009).
The Tobacco Industry’s Efforts to Weaken the MCIAA and Stanch Its Emulation in Other States

As you know, attempts were made previously to organize the smokers in several states to provide them with an effective vehicle for expressing themselves to their elected officials. For reasons that a psychologist could better explain than I, there is little chance that we could stimulate a smokers’ revolt as long as the majority of those that use tobacco suffer from a “guilt complex.” The industry has remained silent so long on the alleged health hazards of smoking that despite their best efforts, The Tobacco Institute is not likely to change public opinion for many years to come. Until this can be done, the spread of no-smoking laws across the country should be factored into any sales forecast.976

After having failed to thwart enactment of the Minnesota law, the cigarette companies followed developments there very closely. Their ire was especially sparked by the perception that major corporations were adapting to the new rules rather than combating them. Ironically, the chief culprit appeared to be The Pillsbury Company, one of the state’s most prominent employers, which, as explained above, had, during the debate over the regulations, been one of the sharpest critics. (When Pillsbury complained about enforcement, Schneider, the Health Department’s head of enforcement, asked the company’s managers where Pillsbury had been while the bill was going through the legislature, prompting the response that they had never thought that it would pass.)977 But a newspaper article in February 1976 on the proliferation of anti-public smoking laws came to the attention of several R. J. Reynolds vice presidents, setting off a flurry of interoffice exchanges. In discussing the Minnesota law, the article noted that initially Pillsbury, which employed 900 people at its national headquarters in Minneapolis, had estimated that it could cost the firm $500,000 to comply with the law’s mandated segregation of smoking areas in offices and factories978 (if the smokers “had to leave their posts to smoke”).979 However: “After a trial period... a Pillsbury spokesman said ‘the law is working out fairly well. It’s helped nonsmokers greatly and although it may cost us some money, the problem is more health than money.’” Nevertheless, Pillsbury’s “acceptance” appeared to be exceptional, since the state Association for Commerce and Industry still regarded the rules as “unduly restrictive.”

After an exchange of notes scribbled on a copy of the article and the preparation of a draft in March, on April 9, James R. Peterson, a Reynolds vice president, sent a slightly toned-down letter to William Spoor, the chairman of the board of Pillsbury. Explaining to “Bill” that the statement by the Pillsbury spokesman in the attached article suggested that the company was supporting the law “on the basis of health reasons,” Peterson asserted Reynolds’ position that the law lacked a “factual basis...in the health area.” He appended a Tobacco Institute propaganda brochure, which culminated in the assertion that “[t]he answer” to the “controversy” between 60 million smokers and “some” nonsmokers who were annoyed by tobacco smoke lay in “courtesy, not law. The alternative is to pave the way for government control of all sorts of everyday irritations. No one would advocate that.”

“Other businessmen argued that that it would be discriminatory to permit smoke breaks without providing similar time off for nonsmokers.”

J. R. Peterson, Draft (Mar. 17, 1976), Bates No. 500050657. The “JSD/bt” abbreviation at the bottom of the draft suggests that it was written by or in the office of Dowdell, whose signed initials also appeared on the copy of the original article.

For example, the draft’s characterization of the Pillsbury spokesman’s conclusion as “completely fallacious” was deleted. J. R. Peterson, Draft (Mar. 17, 1976), Bates No. 500050657.

Peterson also appended an unidentified medical journal article.

Tobacco Institute, “True? False? Tobacco Facts” (n.d. [1973]), Bates No. 500050658/62. About this time, even the Burnett ad agency criticized the Tobacco Institute’s “courtesy campaign” advertising, which was supposed to “help reduce excessive and unreasonable anti-smoking activism by non-smokers,” as itself Peterson believed that armed with “the facts,” Spoor “would not want Pillsbury to lend further credence to the current mythology that smoking under normal conditions constitutes a health hazard to nonsmokers.” Seeking to sway Spoor by alluding to “the many unfounded attacks...upon the food industry in recent years,” Peterson complained about the “growing number of unwarranted state and local regulations restricting, if not prohibiting, the use of tobacco in an ever-increasing number of public and private places.” Government interference was bad enough, but “[o]f equal concern [w]as the number of large and prestigious companies, like Pillsbury, that apparently have been pressured into acquiescing to yet another unwarranted governmental intrusion into the private sector.” In a very early sign of cigarette manufacturers’ realistic resignation, Peterson then regretted that it was “[p]erhaps...too late to completely reverse the anti-smoking trend,” but hoped that private companies would join with the tobacco industry to “prevent, at least, such extreme measures” as the Minnesota law from spreading, and that the Minnesota Association of Commerce and Industry could “prevail upon the Legislature to amend the onerous law...and “unreasonable and risky” and “ludicrous.” While questioning the advisability of any paid consumer ads “to combat the present situation” and suggesting that Burnett’s own proposed ads might not accomplish the TI’s objective either because “[t]here may be no way to head off the activists,” Burnett did not appear to be embarrassed by the absurdity of its proposal, whose “message to non-smokers (including the activists) is that we’re all big boys and can get along together without any further formal restrictions.” Tobacco Institute “Courtesy” Campaign: Burnett Agency Position (1975), Bates No. 1005110514/5. Astonishingly, as late as 1980 ANSR published a board member’s explanation of MCIAA that asserted that “like every law, it cannot be effective unless it is understood and respected. The real solution is the exercise of consideration and common courtesy.” Nathan Portnoi, [untitled], ANSR 8(2):n.p. [2] (Nov. 1980). ANSR’s vacillating attitude was on display a few months later when a panel of its member-judges selected as the best answer to a Tobacco Institute ad on nonsmokers’ rights a response that attacked the “concept of common courtesy as a means to provide fair treatment for nonsmokers” as a “ploy by the tobacco institute [sic] to discourage nonsmokers from asserting their rights to breathe clean air.” Clara Riveland, [Untitled], ANSR 9(1):n.p. [3] (Mar. 1981). It is unclear whether Kahn was twitting or taking seriously the cigarette industry’s obfuscatory “courtesy” propaganda when she wrote some years after MCIAA’s passage: “Persons irritated by smoke expect to find a no-smoking section and have become more assertive in establishing their rights to such a space. Others look for smoking sections before lighting up and mistakes are generally taken care of by simple reminders. The law works effectively to simplify and reinforce rules of common courtesy.” Phyllis Kahn, “The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act: Legislation Enacted with Volunteer Group Support,” in Proceedings of the Fifth World Conference on Smoking and Health 2:309-11 at 310 (William Forbes et al. eds 1983).

correct some of the abuses that have been perpetrated under the guise of ‘protection of the public health.’” Suspecting that Spoor or “some of [his] people may have personal feelings on this subject”—that is, might themselves object to being forced to breathe tobacco smoke—Peterson nevertheless hoped that he could rely on the solidarity of beleaguered regulated capital to trump individual managerial character masks’ self-protective health instincts so that Pillsbury would not be willing to lend its “Corporate name to the endorsement of these restrictive Bills before a knowledgeable decision can be made on factual information.”

As incompetently as the cigarette companies may have opposed MCIAA as it was making its way through the Minnesota legislature, their vigilance became more focused soon after it went into effect. However, this new lobbying regime ran into several weighty stumbling blocks. An internal Tobacco Institute memo from March 1976, written by its Midwest regional manager, Larry Horist, to Roger Mozingo, vice president for government affairs, related that there are some who feel that the unequal enforcement provision (vis a’ vis, [sic] the division of responsibility between the state health authority over offices and commercial business and the labor department jurisdiction over factories, etc.) opens the possibility of having the law thrown out by the courts. Chum Bohr, of the hospitality industry, is one of the leading proponents of this view. He already has one of his members pledged to donate $10,000 to the legal battle.

On the other hand, Oliver Perry, of commerce and industry, speaks in favor of a legislative initiative. He feels that the above mentioned “flaw” in the original legislation could lead to reopening the matter in the legislature. Perry does admit, however, that there may be some difficulty in finding a sponsor. (Our one staunch supporter was recently defeated in the primary.)

Though Perry is partisan to our viewpoint, he feels somewhat constrained by the fact that many of his members favor the existing law.

---

987 Letter from James R. Peterson to William H. Spoor (Apr. 9, 1976), Bates No. 500050653/4/5. Spoor had a senior vice president respond, who attached a copy of a publication that purportedly expressed the company’s position more accurately than the newspaper article, but unfortunately the attachment does not appear to be included in the online tobacco documents. The writer added conciliatorily that “[t]he scientific literature appears to reflect an unfortunate lack of scientific clarity as to the health hazards, if any, to non-smokers exposed to tobacco in public places.” Letter from W. J. Powell to James R. Peterson (Apr. 23, 1976), Bates No. 500050651.

988 Larry Horist to Roger Mozingo, Re Minnesota (Mar. 3, 1976), Bates No. 50005665/6. (Because of an apparently defective Bates No., accessing this document might be easier at http://legacy.library.ucsf.edu/tid/uxc99d00.) The memo was not dated, but a cover sheet from Mozingo to Dowdell at R. J. Reynolds was dated March 3. Horist
Although the memo failed to reveal the legal basis for challenging the differential regulation of factories on the one hand and offices and businesses (frequented by the general public) on the other, the outcome that Bohr and restaurant and hotel owners hoped to secure was presumably not MCIAA’s reenactment with factories subject to the same coverage as businesses open to the public under the original law. On the contrary, they must have speculated that if the legislature had to start all over again, it would reduce coverage of the latter to the very limited coverage of the former—an extreme implausibility given the large majority of Minnesotans who appeared to support the law as well as the brute fact that Perry had been unable even to scare up a sponsor for whatever bill owners wanted. Horist was unable to glean any advantage for the cigarette manufacturers in either strategy: “Since we are not interested in involving the industry in the court action—except by way of moral support—and since [Joe] Robbie sees little hope in the legislative route, I see little optimism in the short run.” The longer-term perspective, in contrast, would “depend on the effectiveness of TI activity in cooperation with Robbie in his dual role of association executive and lobbyist or a re-evaluation of this relationship.” This mention of Robbie and his state tobacco wholesalers organization raised yet another sore point since Horist had “not been satisfied with the support we are receiving from several of our association people—and this is a case in point. Robbie is personally a delightful and highly competent individual. He is well liked in the Minnesota community and respected by the association members. With regard to TI programs, however, I sense a lack of commitment and enthusiasm. Without the active attention of his office, TI necessarily has to take a much [sic] responsibility for local activities—to the detriment of other duties.” That Horist would “have to travel to Minneapolis to do things which they could be doing on our behalf” was “doubly wasteful” especially “in consideration of our financial contribution to the effort.”

---

989 Larry Horist to Roger Mozingo, Re Minnesota (Mar. 3, 1976), Bates No. 50005665/6. An example of Robbie’s services about this time to the cigarette manufacturers was his report to the Tobacco Institute on a television program in Minneapolis on MCIAA, which featured Kahn and Bohr and “resulted as favorably as it could for the cigarette industry in our opinion.” Joseph Robbie to J. C. B. Ehringhaus (Feb. 17, 1976), Bates No. TIMN0462126
In the event, a few weeks later Representative Heinitz, who had almost succeeded in 1975 in removing coverage of workplaces from MCIAA, introduced a bill in the House that would have achieved much of what Bohr and Perry wanted (and had already urged in 1975). To be sure, the lack of cosponsors suggested that prospects of passage were slim. H.F. 2691 would have taken a long stride toward that goal by amending the definition of “public place” by narrowing the scope of covered workplaces to include only those “frequented by the general public.” Second, it redefined the critical term, “acceptable smoke-free area,” which had been introduced by the Board of Health regulations, to narrow the criteria, one of which owners were required to satisfy: deleting ventilation systems and carbon monoxide levels, Heinitz’s bill reduced the options to physical barriers at least 56-inches high or four-foot spaces between smoking-permitted and nosmoking areas. In other words, the more expensive technology and the performance standard measuring the efficacy of the dysfunctional barriers/spaces were eliminated. (To be sure, since the spaces and barriers, in that order, were, as noted earlier, virtually the only methods that owners were using anyway, the bill’s impact on the real world of compliance may not have been significant.) Third, the bill permitted smoking in nosmoking areas “with the express permission of every nonsmoker present. And fourth, H.F. 2691 lowered from 200 to 150 square feet the minimum size of nosmoking areas in rooms in which both smoking and nosmoking areas were permitted in workplaces not customarily frequented by the general public.990 The prosmoking forces’ initiative to roll back coverage of offices and business promptly revealed itself to be a pipe dream: after having been referred to the Health and Welfare Committee, the bill made no progress whatsoever.

Robbie appeared to have remained skeptical of his role in a legislative or judicial fix for the tobacco industry’s objections to MCIAA. In November 1976 he wrote to his nephew Stephen Bergerson—who as an official of Robbie’s Minnesota Candy and Tobacco Distributors Association believed that it was “inevitable” that the law “will force down tobacco sales”—that in the wake of Bergerson’s conversations with Horist, Bohr, and Perry, “nothing should be done to challenge this law by litigation” until after the 1977 legislative session. But in the meantime, even if Perry and MACI “want to try to and amend the law to restrict its application, I think we should leave it to them. We can help from behind the scenes but we must keep the public posture of being opposed to the law. 992

991 “Stringent No-Smoking Law Failing,” TO 1(2):1 at 9 (Nov. 1976), Bates No. 01418984/92.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

R.J. Reynolds appeared somewhat less pessimistic about the near-term chances of repealing what it called “the most stringent state anti-smoking law.” By January 1977 it had not yet been in effect long enough to reveal conclusively its impact on consumption, but the company’s vice president for planning could not help but believe that “in the longer run it will be damaging.” James Hind therefore recommended exploring with TI its “concept of getting signatures of smokers and applying it to the many public bans sought against smoking.” The petition sign-up that his interlocutor, F. Hudnall Christopher, Jr., had “so successfully carried out” in the case of the CAB (relating to airplanes) seemed to Hind “truly an expression of an individual’s freedom which everyone—government, media, and public[—]will respect. Minnesota might be the first place to go.” 993

992Joseph Robbie to Stephen Bergerson (Nov. 16, 1976), Bates No. 500050670. Bergerson, who 30 years later purported not to be able to remember the events surrounding the letter, stated that the industry had not lobbied against MCIAA in 1975 because no one had thought it would pass because it was too radical. Telephone interview with Stephen Bergerson, Minneapolis (Apr. 27, 2007).

993J. F. Hind to F. Hudnall Christopher, Jr. (Jan. 27, 1977), Bates No. 500050668. In February and December 1979, at the request of higher-ups at Philip Morris, the director of marketing research “examined the effects of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act...on that state’s cigarette sales,” and reported that tax-paid cigarette pack sales per capita in Minnesota as a proportion of those in the U.S. as a whole rose from 82.7 percent for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975 (before MCIAA went into effect) to 85.2 percent for the year ending June 30, 1979—a movement that he characterized as a “slight improvement in Minnesota versus U.S. per capita sales since the passage of the Act.” J. N. Zoler to J. J. Morgan, Subject: Minnesota Cigarette Sales (Feb. 21, 1979), Bates No. 2045259239 (quote); J. N. Zoler to J. J. Morgan, Subject: Minnesota Cigarette Sales (Dec. 11, 1979), Bates No. 2024372752/3. Amusingly, when Stanton Glantz and his co-authors of a study of Minnesota tobacco politics referred to this inquiry—“It was not until the later 1970s that Philip Morris began to realize the economic impact of the Clean Indoor Air Act on sales in Minnesota”—they misleadingly implied that the effect was negative. Theodore Tsoukalas, Jennifer Ibrahim, and Stanton Glantz, Shifting Tides: Minnesota Tobacco Politics 13 (2003), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/MN2003. The number of cigarette packages taxed in October 1975 in Minnesota exceeded that of a year earlier by 12.7 percent compared to an increase of only 1.2 percent nationally. “Tobacco Tax Council, Monthly State Cigaret Tax Report: Report for October 1975” (Dec. 11, 1975), Bates No. LG432661/2. In March 1976 the figures were 12.9 percent and 13.5 percent, respectively. “Tobacco Tax Council, Monthly State Cigaret Tax Report: Report for March 1976” (May 11, 1976), Bates No. TIMS0010245/6. For August 1976, the figures were 0.6
In lieu of amending MCIAA, of which the tobacco industry was currently incapable, TI chose to pursue yet another one of its well-funded pipe dreams. In September 1976, the recently hired former editor of the city desk at the Newport News Times-Herald, Paul Knopick, who was now “editor of the largest circulating tobacco periodical in the world,” i.e., TI’s mendacious quarterly propaganda sheet, Tobacco Observer, heard from Horist that an article about MCIAA would be a good idea because it was still a “symbol—the classic case” of anti-smoking laws, which was “still mentioned by anti-smokers at numerous hearings...both at state and local levels.” Conveying Horist’s plans for run-of-the-mill TI deception, Knopick told vice president William Kloepfer of Horist’s belief that “an Observer article could be ‘reprinted’ and then ‘passed to legislators’ considering similar legislation. He especially thinks it would be effective if we could get someone else to byline it—a sheriff up there, or a top distributor.” Two weeks later, Horist supplied Knopick with the names of several candidates for phony byliners, including lobbyists Bohr and Perry, Minnesota Candy & Tobacco Distributors Association heads Robbie and Bergerson, as well as St. Paul Police Chief Rowan (who in 1975 had sent Bohr a letter belittling MCIAA) and state Senator Baldy Hansen. This short list suggested that the cigarette companies already had a confidential relationship with Bohr and Perry, thus reinforcing the argument that they had been the tobacco industry’s covert lobbyists in 1975. In contrast, the relationship between Horist... and Knopick appeared to fall considerably short of the bonhomie that typified intra-Tobacco Institute correspondence: indicating that Knopick was in the grips of a delusion that he was a real reporter—Kloepfer would flatter him by asserting that at his earlier job his “journalistic star was rising brightly...and it still is”998—he had suggested to Horist that “as a journalist’ [he] should make the trip alone” to Minnesota, thus disappointing Horist’s plan to accompany him: “Someday, I hope to understand just what the hell that means. ... But alas, a [sic] accede to your inscrutable wisdom.” Despite the rebuff, Horist insisted on contacting “each of the gentlemen [on the list] to alert them to your visit and its purpose.”999 Unsurprisingly, the (unbylined) article, which dutifully quoted most of Horist’s “leads,” turned out to meet the norm for TI distortion. For example, it quoted Bohr’s nonsensical allegation that the “group which fought for the act’ [presumably ANSR]...tied itself motherhood and apple pie”—without explaining why the public would automatically have associated suppression of indiscriminate public smoking with such virtues—and then highlighted the (false) claim by CBS News commentator Charles Kuralt that under MCIAA it was “against the law to smoke in any public place...even if it is your own office, [and] a policeman can walk into that office and arrest you.”1000

In 1983 MCIAA remained a major national problem for the cigarette industry’s efforts to ward off enactment of similar laws in other states. For example, in April Rick Seely, TI’s Michigan State (and later Midwest) Director complained to TI vice president Robert Hanrahan that: “Proponents of Clean Indoor Air Acts invariably point to Minnesota as, not only a model for such legislation, but a shining example of how such laws can work.” Seely’s tale of woe stretched back to December 1982, when he began trying to find both information on MCIAA’s “negative effects” and a representative of the MACI to testify against a bill in Michigan, but what prompted him to write was the conclusion of his “wild goose chase” that very day in the form of official word from MACI’s vice president that “there is no such law in Minnesota as a Clean Indoor Air Act.” Frustrated by the fact that “we are without resources” to “counter[] the powerful and effective statements of our opponents and the witnesses they import from Minnesota,” Seely proposed that TI view “this situation as a priority item and hire a professional research group to survey the business community the right way. If we can get some negative, documented information and perhaps a few business people who are willing to expound on the negative aspects of the law, we could use these things in every state where a clean indoor air act is proposed.” If TI failed to dig up this kind of dirt, “our opponents will continue to rub Minnesota in our faces time after time after time.” In Michigan and Wisconsin alone, the pro-smoking forces would be faced with such legislation “either until the sponsors retire, hell freezes over or we silence the proponents once and for all, by proving that the MCIAA is either bad law or the most useless piece of legislation ever enacted by man.”

998 Remarks of William Kloepfer, Jr., Sen. VP-Public Relations, The Tobacco Institute Tobacco College of Knowledge at 12 (Nov. 17, 1981), Bates No. TI17930049/81. Remarkably, after all the revelations about the cigarette manufacturers, in 2009 Knopick manifestly believed that potential customers would be attracted to his PR business by reading on his company’s website that he had “created the first national publication for the tobacco industry, a keystone of a visible, effective public relations campaign.” http://www.eandecommunications.com/management.htm (visited Nov. 13, 2009).

999 Larry Horist to Paul Knopick, Re: Minnesota Article (Sept. 20, 1976), Bates No. TI47350800/1.

Exactly one month later Seely sent off yet another jeremiad to Hanrahan. This time he stressed that during the previous four years a clean indoor air bill had been introduced a total of six times in the Michigan legislature and that especially since 1981 Minnesota had been “consistently pointed to by proponents of this legislation as the paradise for non-smokers where all citizens gleefully comply with the law.” Seely then made a breathtaking admission for strictly internal consumption, which, if publicly disseminated, would have both suggested that the cigarette oligopoly feared that the endgame was approaching and revealed that the cigarette industry realized that the increasingly compelling and popular health regime embedded in Minnesota’s exemplary law was making a mockery of executives’ and underlings’ benighted but well-bankrolled plans to roll back anti-smoking regulation:

As our health arguments have grown ineffective and now fall on deaf ears, we need a strong defensive point to hang our hat on. That defense would be evidence of strong negative effects of Minnesota’s bill or spokespersons from Minnesota to address the issue of the failing of their legislation...

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act holds an almost religious-like symbolism for anti-smokers and the purpose of our research study should be to destroy that image or at least render it ineffective as a model for enacting further legislation anywhere.

1001Rick Seely to Bob Hanrahan (vice president TI), Re: Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act Study (Apr. 13, 1983), Bates No. T03870700/1.
1002Rick Seely to Bob Hanrahan, Re: Minnesota Indoor Air Act Study (May 13, 1983), Bates No. T03870702.
1003Rick Seely to Bob Hanrahan, Re: Minnesota Indoor Air Act Study (May 13, 1983), Bates No. T03870702.
TI headquarters soon began taking the proposal to denigrate MCIAA seriously. In July 1983, shortly after Hanrahan had informed TI’s chief lobbyist in Minnesota that the proposed study was “very important,” John D. Kelly, senior vice president for state activities, wrote TI President Samuel Chilcote that the statute had been “cited repeatedly by advocates of such restrictive legislation as an example of how laws can successfully curb smoking.” Its citation as a model in other states such as Oregon and Michigan prompted Kelly to recommend authorization of field research into the Minnesota law’s effects whose only purpose was to “point out the negative impacts of the law—for example the costs to business owners, the state, and consumers—in an effort to determine whether the law is effective as a model for other states’ legislation.” (This pitch to TI’s president was toned down from a draft that had characterized the purpose more aggressively as “render[ing] the law ineffective as a model for other states’ legislation.”) The chief impediment to such a refunctionalization of the landmark measure lay in the popularity that it had attained in Minnesota. TI referred to an Associated Press article citing polls that “indicate 90 percent of state residents approve of the law.” Even worse from the cigarette manufacturers’ perspective was that the Minnesota Restaurant & Food Service Association, “whose members might have been expected to be troubled by this issue, is quoted as having discovered that a majority of restaurants surveyed found compliance with the law ‘easier than expected.’” The problem, as Kelly

\[1004\text{Bob Hanrahan to Tom Kelm, Re Proposed Minnesota Study (June 21, 1983), Bates No. T103870695.}

\[1005\text{John D. Kelly to Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr., Re: Need to Challenge Anti-Smokers’ Claims on Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at [1-2] (July 25, 1983), Bates No. T103870692/3. For a more polished version, see Paula Johnson Duhaime (Tobacco Institute) to David Krogseng (North State Advisers, Inc.) (Nov. 10, 1983), Bates No. T103870689. Krogseng, former chairman of the Minnesota Republican party, was a TI lobbyist.}

\[1006\text{Untitled undated draft at 1-2 [latter half of 1983], Bates No. T103870525/6 (date reconstructed from reference to Oregon Indoor Clean Air Act as having gone into effect July 1 “of this year”).}

\[1007\text{John D. Kelly to Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr., Re: Need to Challenge Anti-Smokers’ Claims on Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at [1] (July 25, 1983), Bates No. T103870692. The unidentified AP article was Karen Mills, “Minnesota Smoking Law a Model for Rest of U.S.,” Independent-Journal (San Rafael, CA), 45 (Oct. 4, 1980), Bates No. TIMN046207.}

\[1008\text{John D. Kelly to Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr., Re: Need to Challenge Anti-Smokers’ Claims on Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act at [1] (July 25, 1983), Bates No. T103870692. According to a lengthy extract from the MRFSA news release, 54 percent of respondents} formulated it, was that “as long as these statements remain unchallenged, advocates of smoking restrictions can point to the Minnesota law as the prototype for smoking bans, not only in the workplace, but in all indoor areas.” Since field staff reports and legislative activity in Iowa and other states indicated that “we must move expeditiously,” Kelly argued that MCIAA’s impacts had to be scrutinized quickly to determine the efficacy of neutralizing the effect this law is having and may continue to have on the smoking restriction debate in other states.\textsuperscript{1009,1010}
PART VI

THE STRUGGLE IN IOWA FOR ANTI-PUBLIC SMOKING BANS: 1970s TO 2008

At the turn of the century, tobacco was illegal in 14 states. We rode out that cycle of anti-smoking sentiment, and we’ll ride out this one, too.¹

¹Ellen Merlo, at 21 (Oct. 24, 1994), Bates No. 2040236685/705 (untitled). Merlo was senior vice president for corporate affairs at Philip Morris. Tobacco was not illegal in any state at the turn of the century or since.
Non-Smokers’ Struggle Against Exposure to Tobacco Smoke:
Its First Meager Fruits in Iowa, 1970-1982

It does not require the foresight of a prophet to declare that the time is not far distant when civil law will make it impossible for fathers to smoke in the presence of their children.¹

The completely unregulated atmosphere that prevailed in the Iowa House and Senate inundating all non-smoking members with their colleagues’ secondhand smoke lasted from 1933² until the mid-1970s, when, at the very same time that the legislature, in sync with a national trend, began considering bills restricting and/or prohibiting smoking in various public places—by 1974 such bills had been introduced in 39 state legislatures and by 1975 in all 50³—the Iowa House also reversed a half-century of smoking laissez-faire. Then in 1978, at the tail end of the first wave of statewide enactments that had begun in Arizona in 1973, the Iowa legislature passed a weak law, which was taken over in large part verbatim from the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act⁴ without, however, adopting its neighbor’s comprehensive coverage of non-governmental commercial public places such as restaurants and stores. What it did copy from MCIAA and shared with virtually all similar state enactments of the period was the dysfunctional system authorizing owners and managers of covered places to permit smoking in designated areas, which undermined the protection that was such laws’ raison d’être and would remain a constant feature of the Iowa act for the next 30 years.

Iowa’s First Feeble Forays into Public Smoking Control Legislation in the Maelstrom of the National Drive for Nonsmokers’ Rights

¹Frederick Pack, Tobacco and Human Efficiency 37-38 (1918).
²See above ch. 18.
⁴See above ch. 24.
us on the basis of smoking and nonsmoking.5

In December 1969 Ralph Nader petitioned the Federal Aviation Administration for a total smoking ban in airliners on the grounds of fire hazard as well as of irritation and health risks linked to breathing tobacco smoke.6 Then in January 1970 he filed a petition with the Interstate Commerce Commission and the U.S. Department of Transportation requesting rulemaking proceedings for the creation of a rule prohibiting tobacco smoking on motor vehicles carrying passengers in interstate commerce. His petition contended that “smoking constitutes a serious hazard to the health of...all nonsmoking passengers.”7

Two months later, after the aforementioned bills had been filed in Congress and neighboring Illinois and elsewhere,8 three liberal Iowa House Democrats (non-smoking lawyers who admired Nader)9 filed Iowa’s first modern public smoking regulation bill, which included a preamble with the legislative finding that “the act of smoking tobacco products and the inhalation of tobacco smoke is detrimental to the health of the citizens of the state of Iowa and that the best interests of the citizens of the state would be served by the restriction of smoking in all public transportation services.” It provided that those offering such services “shall permit smoking by passengers inside the transportation conveyance only under the...condition[]” that “[s]eparate facilities shall be provided for smoking and nonsmoking passengers in such a manner that nonsmoking passengers are not exposed to the smoke or odors caused by smoking passengers.”10 Since, as one of the sponsors later observed, almost everyone in

---

8 See above ch. 23.
9 Telephone interview with Joseph Johnston, Iowa City (Dec. 29, 2008).
10 H.F. 1353, §§ 1, 3 (Mar. 23, 1970) (by Edward Mezvinsky, Michael Kennedy, and Joseph Johnston). Johnston and Mezvinsky both practiced in Iowa City. Iowa Official Register: 1969-1970, at 88-89, 96 (53d No., L. Dale Ahern ed.). Johnston had no specific recollection of the bill, but assumed that Mezvinsky had asked him to cosponsor it because he also represented Iowa City and was one of few members who cooperated with Mezvinsky, who was widely viewed as excessively ambitious; Kennedy was Johnston’s best friend in the legislature. Telephone interview with Joseph Johnston, Iowa City (Dec. 29, 2008). Mezvinsky, later a member of Congress from Iowa, was sentenced to seven the legislature smoked and Democrats were a hopeless minority, the bill’s advocates would have been under no illusion as to its chances of passage. The historical discontinuity was by this time stark enough that the Des Moines Register had to remind its readers that “[s]uch a restrictive cigarette law would not be entirely new to Iowa,” referencing (somewhat less than relevantly) the 1896-1921 ban on selling cigarettes. Neither this bill nor identical bills filed three years later in both chambers (by liberal Democrat Minnette Doderer and right-wing Republican David Stanley) saw any action, although in the interim (1971) the Interstate Commerce Commission had issued a regulation confining smoking (but not smoke) to the rear 20 percent of seats on interstate buses, and in 1973 the Civil Aeronautics Board required airlines to provide no-smoking (but not no-smoke) areas. To be sure, the state of federal bureaucratic enlightenment at the time was nicely reflected in the CAB’s assertion that “the attitude of many nonsmokers appear[s] insensitive to the rights of smokers. Smoking is a lawful activity, and requiring smokers to abstain totally on flights would cause many of them severe discomfort. ... The segregation of smokers...strikes an equitable balance, allowing neither smokers nor nonsmokers to infringe on the reasonable exercise of the rights of others.”
Non-Smokers’ Struggle Against Tobacco Smoke Exposure in Iowa, 1970-82

Iowa’s first non-transportational no-smoking bill was filed one month after the Nonsmokers’ Bill of Rights, under the auspices of the National Interagency George Mills, “Bill to Cut Smoking on Bus, Plane,” DMR, Mar. 15, 1970 (1T:4) (published after Mezvinsky had prepared but before he had filed the bill).

S.F. 15 (Jan. 11, 1973) (by Minnette Doderer (D) and Ralph Potter (R)); H.F. 494 (Mar. 26, 1973) (by David Stanley (R)). When asked years later whether this bill had not been a little bit ahead of its time, Doderer replied: “‘73, it sure was. Forbidding it? I suppose regulating it or something. I was smoking then. But then you can find any period in my life when I was smoking!” “A Political Dialogue: Iowa’s Women Legislators,” Box 1, Folder: Transcripts: Minnette Doderer, Part I at 66 (June 27, 1989), in Iowa Women’s Archive, University of Iowa.

Council on Smoking and Health, had been adopted on January 11, 1974, the tenth anniversary of the publication of the surgeon general’s consensus report on smoking. Fittingly, that surgeon general himself, Luther Terry, by now a consultant to the American Cancer Society on tobacco and health, was one of the signatories at the ceremony at Congress Hall in Philadelphia, where the original Bill of Rights had been signed. The three articles of this new bill of rights were, to be sure, modest:

Non-smokers have the right to breathe clean air, free from harmful and irritating tobacco smoke. This right supersedes the right to smoke when the two conflict.

Non-smokers have the right to express—firmly but politely—their discomfort and adverse reactions to the tobacco smoke. They have the right to voice their objections when smokers light up without asking permission.

Non-smokers have the right to take action through legislative channels, social pressures or any other legitimate means—as individuals or in groups—to prevent or discourage smokers from polluting the atmosphere and to seek the restriction of smoking in public places.

The limited scope and character and especially the lack of enforcibility of these rights of were rooted in the as yet preliminary and underdeveloped understanding of the health impact of secondhand smoke exposure. Terry himself expressed this view fully: apart from the “few non-smokers...genuinely sensitive to tobacco smoke” who “can be made very uncomfortable or even ill by exposure to significant amounts of tobacco smoke,” and others with emphysema, bronchitis, and heart disease, who could suffer “deleterious effects” from exposure, “the vast majority of non-smokers simply find intense tobacco smoke to be unpleasant or obnoxious. And even though they may not suffer any health dangers, they do have a right to be protected from such unpleasantness. It is in this light that we are observing increased concern in the rights of the non-smoker.”

Still devoting significant resources to the mission of keeping the population in a state of denial as to the lethal impact of smoking on smokers, the Tobacco

---

17On this organization, see above ch. 23.
19Luther Terry, “Reflections After Ten Years on Advisory Committee’s Report on Smoking and Health” at 13 (Jan. 11, 1974), Bates No. 502669820/32 (delivered at the Non-Smokers Bill of Rights Congress) (also printed in CR, Feb. 1, 1974 at S 1073-74, Bates No. TIMN0151701/2). On the development of the science of secondhand smoke over the following 15 years, see below ch. 26.
Institute despaired over the “massive media coverage” of the “‘event.’”\textsuperscript{20} That non-smokers still had a huge resistance force to overcome was reflected in the increase (from 50 to 52 million) in the total number of smokers during the 10 years since the issuance of the 1964 surgeon general’s report (although public health officials took solace from the fact that 10 million had quit smoking, that in the absence of educational efforts trends suggested that the number of smokers would have reached 75 million,\textsuperscript{21} and that the adult prevalence rate had fallen from almost 42 percent in 1965 to about 35 percent).\textsuperscript{22} Moreover, despite declines in 1963-64 and 1967-69, total consumption of cigarettes had risen 13 percent from 1963 to 1973; yet, while annual per capita consumption of those 18 and older at 4,148 had almost regained the 1964 level of 4,194, the latter had marked a decline of 3.5 percent from the 1963 peak). Most discouraging to Terry were the failure to reduce youth smoking and the dramatic increase in smoking among girls.\textsuperscript{23}

To be sure, the cigarette manufacturers in 1974 were very concerned that since 1963 the gap between actual consumption and the projected potential based on sales before 1963 amounted to 464 billion cigarettes or a loss of $8.36 billion: “Figure the companies’ market shares and their profit percentages.... You will be frightened.” The Tobacco Institute could not “help but feel” that this gap was “directly related to the anti-smoking campaign of our adversaries.”\textsuperscript{24} And the 1974 survey of the public’s attitudes toward smoking and the tobacco industry that Roper conducted for TI gave the companies good reason for deep pessimism in general: Roper itself was inclined to view its findings on behalf of its customer “‘with considerable alarm’...As far as the battle for public opinion is concerned, \textsuperscript{20}TIN, No. 90, Jan. 21, 1974, at 1-3, Bates No. HK0484897/8-9.

\textsuperscript{21}Luther Terry, “Reflections After Ten Years on Advisory Committee’s Report on Smoking and Health” at 8 (Jan. 11, 1974), Bates No. 502669820/7 (delivered at the Non-Smokers Bill of Rights Congress).
\textsuperscript{22}Jane Brody, “Decade’s Warnings Fail to Cut Smoking,” \textit{NYT}, Jan. 11, 1974 (1, at 8:1-3).
the tobacco industry has reached—if not passed—the critical point.... Barring some dramatic new evidence or development, further erosion would seem predictable.” This conclusion was based especially on one of the study’s “most significant findings”—“the very widespread support for segregation of smokers in most public places” that was shared “almost as widely” by smokers as non-smokers. By this time, 90 percent of non-smokers and 80 percent of smokers favored separate sections on trains and airplanes, while 64 percent and 42 percent, respectively, backed sectioning in workplaces and offices, and 60 percent and 34 percent, respectively, supported it in eating places. Even more portentous was that 39 percent of all non-smokers already favored a smoking ban in all public places, while 59 percent (and even 48 percent of smokers) backed it in retail stores, 28 percent in eating places, 22 percent in workplaces/offices, and 63 percent in college classrooms.

House File 1164, which was introduced by 31-year-old Davenport Democrat Gregory Cusack in 1974, reproduced largely verbatim the statute enacted in 1973 in Arizona. Cusack, a former college teacher, community organizer, director of the League of Women Voters Education Fund, Davenport city councilman, and a member of Students for a Democratic Society while a graduate student in history at the University of Iowa during the Vietnam war, considered himself one of the most (if not the most) left-wing Iowa legislator during the 1970s, although neither his constituents nor his colleagues may have been aware of his politics. A non-smoker who was very sensitive to smoke, 34 years later he was, nevertheless, unable to recall having filed, let alone anything about, his pathbreaking bill. However, on being told that he had been the sole sponsor, he speculated that he had probably filed it at the request of a constituent, about whom he could remember nothing.32 Cusack’s one-paragraph bill, declaring the smoking of tobacco in any form a “public nuisance and dangerous to public health,” prohibited it in a hallway, elevator, indoor theater, library, art museum, concert hall, auditorium, or “vehicle which is used by or open to the public.” Nevertheless, Cusack authorized those in custody or control of a theater, library, art museum, concert hall, or auditorium to “designate restricted areas therein which, upon posting with the words ‘smoking area,’ lawfully may be used for smoking.” Violations were subject to fines ranging from $10 to $100.33 In spite of its brevity, H. F. 1164 thus already contained the hallmark permissiveness that continued to mar the Iowa law into the twenty-first century. The Republican-controlled House took no action on Cusack’s bill.

31Iowa Official Register: 1973-1974, at 61 (55th No., L. Dale Ahern ed.). Although according to this official source Cusack at this time ran Cusack and Associates, a real estate and insurance business, Cusack later stated that he had been teaching part time. Telephone interview with Greg Cusack, Bellevue, IA (Apr. 10, 2008).

Although Cusack’s and the other early bills fell by the wayside without needing any intervening opposition and it is unclear whether the cigarette manufacturers engaged in any lobbying against them, the Tobacco Institute had definitely become a lobbying force in Iowa before this time. In 1967, for example, after having been alerted to a bill draft in Iowa requiring the disclosure of tar-nicotine content on packages, TI “immediately prepared a brief outlining the limitations and objections to such a bill; and as a result of our efforts, the proponents of the bill indicated that they were at least temporarily persuaded that such legislation was not appropriate at this time.”34 Again in 1969, it intervened against a bill that would have required disclosure of ingredients on cigar wrappers: “Even though this was a cigar bill, we actively opposed it as a matter of principle and on the assumption that its passage would pave the way for a disclosure of ingredients bill for cigarettes.”35

---

33 H.F. 1164 (Feb. 11, 1974, by Cusack).
Tobacco adversaries...march under the banner of medical credibility and public welfare respectability. [S]omewhere along the line the industry...has not met the issues, invested sufficient institutionalized efforts or utilized available manpower to the extent necessary.

While the tobacco industry has well staffed organizations on the national level with adequate resources to represent the industry, on the state level this isn’t so. Compared to the state organizations of the trucking, automotive, insurance and liquor industries, we do not measure up favorably.36

By 1975 the anti-second-hand smoking campaign had assumed crisis proportions for the cigarette manufacturers. At R. J. Reynolds, public affairs chief James Dowdell, warned his boss, senior vice president Charles Wade, in February that “unless we can find some way to reach the State legislators who are being convinced by the anti-smoking crusaders that passive smoking constitutes a health hazard, there inevitably will be more and more prohibitions placed upon smoking in public.” If, he predicted, an Arizona-like ban passed by the New York State Senate became law, “I don’t think we would have any problem in measuring the drop in State per capita consumption.” The Tobacco Institute’s state activities department was doing the best it could to defeat bills, but its efforts were being hampered by lawyers’ fears that any compromises on restrictive legislation would “be tantamount to an admission of guilt,” opening the way to even more tort suits. Worse still: “We know that smokers themselves will not speak out for their rights to smoke. In fact, if we can believe the opinion polls, the majority of smokers are convinced that their smoking does indeed constitute a health hazard to nonsmokers.”37

The cigarette oligopoly viewed the “accelerating trend” in the increasing support for “segregating and prohibiting smoking in various public places” with growing alarm.38 Between 1970 and 1975, according to one survey, even the proportion of smokers falling into this group had risen from 42 percent to 51 percent, while that of former and never-smokers rose from 61 and 68 percent to 77 and 82 percent, respectively. A May 1976 Roper study (“Public Attitudes Toward Cigarette Smoking and the Tobacco Industry”) paid for by the Tobacco Institute revealed that nationally 80 percent of all respondents (“and almost as 36An Open Letter to Manufacturer Management from the Board of Directors of the Coordinating Board of Tobacco Trade Associations at 1 (June 6, 1975), Bates No. 500023310.

37J. S. Dowdell to C. B. Wade, Jr. (Feb. 20, 1975), Bates No. 500000272.
many smokers”) favored separate sections for smokers in buses, trains, planes, and theaters, and more than 75 percent of all people (and almost as high a proportion of smokers) favored “segregating smokers in libraries or museums.” Support for such segregation at indoor sporting events had risen from 40 percent in 1974 to 67 percent, while at public meetings, eating places, and train, plane, and bus terminals it rose from 57 to 62 percent, 50 to 57 percent, and 44 to 54 percent, respectively. Moreover, more than 50 percent of all people and 33 percent of smokers favored separate sections for smokers in offices and other workplaces. 39 Complete bans received less support than segregation, but it too was high and rising:

Two-thirds of all people and over half of all smokers would ban smoking in doctors’ or dentists’ waiting rooms. Over half of nonsmokers and smokers alike continue to favor a ban on smoking in libraries or museums, and in retail stores.

Support for a complete ban on smoking in theaters increased from 42% to 46%.
A complete ban at “indoor” sporting events went up from 13% to 30%.
The ban on smoking in all public meetings went up from 27% to 34%.
There is also support at the 30% to 20% level for a ban on smoking in city, state, or federal buildings, in taxis, on trains, planes, or buses, in barber or beauty shops, and in restaurants.

At a lower level of support, 17% of all persons would ban smoking in work places or offices, and 16% favor a complete ban in airplane terminals and in train or bus stations. 40

At a loss for any better arguments, TI President Horace Kornegay “likened the anti-smoking campaign to segregationist campaigns.” Speaking at the annual meeting in North Carolina of an organization of flue-cured tobacco growers and manufacturers—who may have been experiencing cognitive dissonance and wondering just what was wrong with race segregation—he charged that “[i]t seems incredible that many politicians who support and fought for civil rights are now willing to erect new barriers that divide our people into opposing camps on the basis of smoking or nonsmoking.” 41

By the time the Iowa legislature convened in 1975, two neighboring states had already enacted public smoking laws. In 1974 both South Dakota and Nebraska passed bills strikingly similar to Arizona’s in terms of coverage, the gaping exception for designated smoking areas, and the penalty. Like the Arizona law, South Dakota’s covered elevators, indoor theaters, libraries, art museums, concert halls, and public buses, adding only elementary and secondary school buildings; it also made violations a misdemeanor subject to a fine ranging from $10 to $100. Acting one week later and declaring that smoking tobacco in any form was “dangerous to the health and welfare of each person,” the Nebraska legislature added hospital patient rooms and patient areas to the six public places covered by the Arizona law.

The 1974 state elections seated “the most equitably apportioned legislature in the nation, now controlled by Democrats who were younger, more urban, and more diverse occupationally than members of previous General Assemblies.” In 1975, with the Iowa House, in the wake of Watergate, dominated 61 to 39 by Democrats for the first time in a decade, Cusack filed a bill similar to his 1974 measure, this time dropping the references to public nuisance and health, but extending the so-called prohibition to “all halls and meeting places of governmental bodies...which by law are open to the public.” Again, the House took no action on it. But the 1975 session finally witnessed initial action on a Senate bill, which was carried over to the next session and passed by that chamber in 1976. In a Senate narrowly controlled by the Democrats 26 to 24, Senate File 106 was introduced by Democrat Kenneth Scott, a farmer, and 14 other Democrats (including Majority Leader George Kinley) and nine Republicans. The very brief bill was similar to Cusack’s without the extension to governmental places. The House took no action on the identical bill filed by Cedar Rapids Democrat and ex-smoker Jim Wells, who worked at Quaker

---

43 1974 Nebraska Laws L.B. 600, at 327 (Mar. 1). The next year Nebraska repealed the fine. 1975 Nebraska Laws L.B. 75, at 160.

46 H.F. 193 (Feb. 11, 1975, by Cusack).

48 S.F. 106 (Feb. 4, 1975, by Scott et al.).

49 H.F. 32 (Jan. 21, 1975, by Wells).

Oats as a member of the Retail, Wholesale, Department Stores Union, and was motivated to file the bill by “seeing a man smoking in a closed elevator with children present.”

When the Senate Human Resources Committee recommended Scott’s bill on March 11—to the consternation of the Tobacco Institute, which reported it on the first page of its Newsletter under the rubric, “Nonsmoker Issue”—it worked from a prepared committee amendment, which expanded the scope of buildings in which smoking might be prohibited, while retaining in modified form the authority conferred on those in custody of covered places to permit smoking by making available “smoking areas adjacent to such facilities within the same structure....” The new no-smoking areas included waiting rooms, rest rooms, lobbies, and hallways of hospitals, clinics, and laboratories, as well as public buildings owned or controlled by state or local governments—all of which were subject to designation as smoking areas. Also covered were the waiting rooms of the offices of physicians, dentists, and other health care givers as well as the buildings or portions of buildings housing businesses engaged in the retail sale of tangible personal property or taxable services—“if the practitioner or group of practitioners in custody or control of the waiting room elect to be covered by the 52James Lynch, “Former C.R. Lawmaker Recalls Smoking Ban Fight,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Apr. 10, 2008 (7A:1-3 at 2). In the immediate wake of the passage of a relatively comprehensive anti-public-smoking bill in 2008, the Cedar Rapids Gazette permitted Wells to celebrate his having gotten “the ball rolling” in 1975 (despite the fact that Cusack’s bill antedated his by a year). Although his bill “‘didn’t go anywhere,’” Wells remembered having “‘caught hell’” and “‘lost a lot of good friends....’” In 2008 Wally Horn (who as Senate majority leader in the 1990s killed anti-smoking rules for the Senate) recalled that in 1975 “[w]e just looked at Jim and said, “You’re ahead of your time.’” Why Horn, who did not smoke, found it necessary to add that “[w]hen it was over...there were no hard feelings,” is unclear. Id. At the signing ceremony for H.F. 2212 on April 15, 2008, Governor Chet Culver repeated the erroneous story about Wells—who was present and applauded—stating that the whole effort had begun in 1975 with Wells, who had filed one of the very first bills to regulate smoking. Http://www.radioiowa.com (audio file) (visited Apr. 15, 2008).

---

53[Senate Human Resources Committee, Minutes] at 1 (Mar. 11, 1975) (copy furnished by SHSI Des Moines).

54TIN, No. 120, Apr. 8, 1975, at 1, Bates No. TIMN0116776.

55Unfortunately, the committee amendment is lacking at the State Archives. Email from Assistant State Archivist Meaghan McCarthy to Marc Linder (Oct. 15, 2008). The text of the amendment is taken from the Senate Journal.
prohibition and penalties prescribed by this Act.\textsuperscript{56} Republican Senator Richard Ramsey (who ultimately voted against the bill in 1976) moved to strike this proviso, but nonsmoking Senator William Gluba of Davenport (a member of Ralph Nader’s Public Interest, Common Cause, Americans for Democratic Action, the ACLU, the American Academy of Political and Social Science, and a former member of the UAW),\textsuperscript{57} who strongly supported smoking regulation, argued that the amendment—which presumably would have made regulation more stringent by making coverage mandatory rather than elective—“would kill the bill,’’ and Ramsey’s killer amendment was defeated.\textsuperscript{58} The bill also prohibited smoking on railroads, buses, and airplanes providing departures originating in Iowa “except in those areas, not exceeding fifty percent of the passenger seating capacity, where smoking” was not prohibited by any other laws. Finally, the amended bill required those in custody or those on duty in the buildings to inform any violators they observed that smoking was prohibited by law.\textsuperscript{59} During committee discussion, Republican Senator Philip Hill, a lawyer for the Equitable Life Insurance Company of Iowa in Des Moines,\textsuperscript{60} opposed the bill, “even though he does not smoke and finds smoking objectionable,’’ because he was “opposed to the concept.” The committee nevertheless recommended passage as amended to the full Senate,\textsuperscript{61} which, however, failed to take up the bill before the session ended.

\textbf{The House of Representatives Takes a Tiny Step Toward Cleaning Its Own Air}

Continued adverse publicity and adoption of a wide scale of legislation that labels smoking a public nuisance and that insists that smoking infringes on rights and endangers the health of non-smokers could well lead to declining public acceptance of smoking and

\textsuperscript{57}\textit{Iowa Official Register: 1975-1976}, at 39 (56th No., Pam Peglow ed.).

\textsuperscript{58}[Senate Human Resources Committee, Minutes] at 1 (Mar. 11, 1975) (copy furnished by SHSI Des Moines). Presumably the killing would have been done at the behest of those health care givers who would not have elected to be covered.

\textsuperscript{60}\textit{Iowa Official Register: 1975-1976}, at 41 (56th No., Pam Peglow ed.).

\textsuperscript{61}[Senate Human Resources Committee, Minutes] at 1-2 (Mar. 11, 1975) (copy furnished by SHSI Des Moines).
increased feelings of guilt and embarrassment on the part of smokers. The end result could well be more and more people quitting smoking. This may represent the greatest danger of all.

In the midst of these initial efforts at statewide partial public smoking bans in Iowa, in 1975 the House also undertook the first small step toward re-regulation in the legislature itself. After Democratic Representative Charles Poncy, a former AFSCME union local president, had proposed an amendment to the rules prohibiting smoking in committee rooms during meetings, 25-year-old Democrat John Patchett of Johnson County offered an amendment to the amendment prohibiting smoking in the House chamber while the House was in session, which in effect would have restored the rule that had been in effect from 1884 to 1923. Patchett’s amendment lost on a close non-record roll call vote of 41 to 46. The House then voted 63 to 24 on a roll call vote to adopt Poncy’s minimalist amendment. Recalling the debate at a distance of 32 years, Patchett described it as good-natured. Thenceforth according to Rule 49: “Smoking shall not be permitted in the House Committee Rooms while a committee is meeting.”

That not all smokers opposed the new rule was attested to by Democrat Robert Krause, who recalled more than three decades later that “I probably lit up” while Patchett was offering his amendment, but nevertheless voted for it afterwards.

The imaginability of actually banning smoking in public places had spread by this time even to local government—or at least to the mind of one city council member in Iowa. In April 1975, Dorothy Strohbehn, who served on the Council Bluffs city council from 1972 to 1984 and had engaged in such acts of anti-smoking guerrilla warfare as hiding ashtrays during city council study sessions in small rooms and voting against issuing cigarette sales permits to hospitals, announced that she had requested the city legal department to draft an ordinance that would prohibit outright smoking in all public (i.e., local government) buildings, including city hall, the courthouse, library, and all fire stations. Motivating her proposal by reference to the council’s concern about air pollution as reflected in its recent consideration of an ordinance to ban backyard burning, Strohbehn added that she would be also be distributing copies of a newspaper article summarizing the results of a study that showed the harmful effects for nonsmokers of being in the same room with a smoker. The Tobacco Institute Newsletter may have celebrated the news that the Council Bluffs city council had declined to act on the proposed ban, but the mere fact that the initiative had emerged in one of the state’s larger cities suggested that the germinating nationwide revolt against unprotected exposure to tobacco smoke had not taken a detour around Iowa.

Senate File 106 in 1976

Of course there are those who are annoyed by cigarette smoke, just as there are those who object to heavy perfumes, garlic on the breath, barking dogs or any of a thousand other things. But there is no issue between smoker and nonsmoker which cannot be solved through mutual common courtesy and respect for the rights of others.

In 1976 the focus in the Iowa legislature shifted back to the statewide public smoking ban (S.F. 106), against which, significantly, the chief tobacco industry lobbyist, George Wilson, lobbied, formally representing the Iowa Association of Tobacco Distributors (IATD), of which he was the executive director. As of 70 Telephone interview with Dorothy Strohbehn, Council Bluffs (Mar. 28, 2009).

---

72 TIN # 123, at 2 (May 20, 1975), Bates No. 500016465/6. Decades later Strohbehn, who was nonplussed that the Tobacco Institute had even been aware of her proposal, was unable to remember the precise fate of her proposal. Telephone interview with Dorothy Strohbehn, Council Bluffs (Mar. 28, 2009). The city clerk was unable to locate the minutes for the relevant council meeting at which the ordinance would have been considered. Telephone interview with Judith Ridgely, Council Bluffs (Mar. 29, 2009).
74 George A. Wilson [signed], Iowa Senate Lobbyist Registration, Form L-1 (Jan. 12, 1978, there were 18 states in which the tobacco industry shared lobbyists to deal with taxation and health, i.e., smoking restriction, issues; of these 18 lobbyists 14 were state tobacco distributor association executives.\textsuperscript{75} From a somewhat different perspective: in 20 states the Tobacco Institute and the Tobacco Tax Council retained the same lobbyist; in seven of them that lobbyist was the association director. Wilson was one of these seven.\textsuperscript{76}

In spite of having signed a lobbyist registration form stating that he lobbied against S.F. 106, many years later Wilson insisted that, while he had observed the progress of such bills, he had never in his entire lobbying career lobbied against an anti-smoking bill because his tobacco wholesaler-client never took a position on such bills in order not to dissipate political lobbying capital that could better have been spent on measures of greater importance to them (specifically, the Iowa Unfair Cigarette Sales Act). When asked whether wholesalers would not have opposed such laws because they would presumably have reduced smoking and therefore sales, Wilson offered the empirically erroneous and implausible justification that they did not seem to have had that impact wherever they had been enacted.\textsuperscript{77}

A more detailed but somewhat suspect account was offered by another tobacco lobbyist, who worked for and with Wilson from 1976 to 1980. Almost three decades later, Marcia Hellum, one of the first female lobbyists in Iowa, stated that the tobacco industry (including the Tobacco Institute) had never requested that she and/or Wilson lobby against any clean indoor air bill. Wilson, she insisted, had regarded opposition to such measures as “penny wise and pound foolish” because such restrictions (for example on elevators) had been around “forever” and had been implemented on account of health concerns. She sought to make Wilson’s attitude more comprehensible by embedding it in the context of his father’s having had to have almost his whole jaw removed as a result of \textsuperscript{75} Martin Haley Companies, Joint Liaison Committee (Sept. 14, 1978), Bates No. 502415693/6-7. Because “the health problem evolved later than the tax problem...Tax Council lobbyists were already at work on annual retainers, and the [Tobacco] Institute tended to utilize lobbyists as needed, on an hourly rate basis.” Martin Haley Companies, Joint Liaison Committee at 5 (Aug. 22, 1978), Bates No. 03678341/8.

---

\textsuperscript{76} State Lobbyist List (Dec. 1, 1978), Bates No. 03678300/7-8.

\textsuperscript{77} Telephone interview with George A. Wilson, Jr., Des Moines (Apr. 11, 2007). On the UCSA, see below ch. 26.
smoking-induced cancer (without, to be sure, explaining how this matrix was consistent with Wilson’s having smoked and represented the tobacco industry for half a century). When confronted with the fact that by 1978 the Tobacco Institute had for four years been orchestrating nationwide resistance to enactment of such laws, which transcended in scope and importance by far scattered ordinances banning smoking on elevators or in theaters (as a fire risk), Hellum could offer no explanation as to why the cigarette companies would not have pursued a similar strategy in Iowa.78 The trustworthiness of her account also suffered from the fact that despite her unequivocal denial that she had ever lobbied against an anti-public smoking law or that a client had ever requested her to do so, like Wilson, she too had signed a lobbyist registration form in 1976 stating that she was lobbying against that year’s anti-public smoking bill (S.F. 106) on behalf of the IATD.79

Hellum’s description of cigarette companies’ disinterest in fighting anti-public smoking legislation in Iowa is also difficult to reconcile with statements, squarely addressing the question of regulation of public smoking, made in 1978, just after the Iowa Clean Indoor Air Act had gone into effect, by a Brown & Williamson Tobacco Company official at an IATD convention to which Hellum had invited him. Although he conceded, speaking on behalf of the manufacturers, that “our buyer/seller realtionship [sic], by definition, necessitates a low-key but nevertheless hardheaded adversary relationship between our two groups,” he stressed that they had “much more in common than in conflict. And this is all to the good because our solidarity and comradary [sic] have never before been of more importance to our survival than today. I am referring, of course, to the fact that our industry now faces it’s [sic] greatest challenge—the Smoking and Health Issue [Public Smoking Issue—‘the right to smoke’]. This challenge is so serious and contains such far reaching consequences for everyone in this room tonight, that it will require all of the good will, cooperation and combined strengths of 78Telephone interview with M. H. Sam Jacobson, Oregon (June 18, 2007). Under this name Hellum teaches at Willamette College of Law. She also characterized the materials that the Tobacco Institute had sent to her and Wilson in the 1970s as “amazing” in a “Neanderthalic sense” of demonstrating both a “head-in-the-sand” attitude and being written in the style of a Reader’s Digest sweepstakes advertisement offering no substantive information. Wilson’s like-named father had been governor of and U.S. senator from Iowa.

---

79Marcia L. Hellum, Iowa Senate Lobbyist Registration (Jan. 21, 1976) (copy furnished by SHSI DM). She also registered to lobby against H.F. 32, the identical bill filed in the House by Wells. Marcia L. Hellum, Iowa Senate Supplementary Lobbying Declaration Reporting Changes or Additions (Jan. 21, 1976) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).
every wholesaler and manufacturer in the industry...to stave off our determined and organized adversaries.”

After S.F. 106 had been returned to it, the Senate Human Resources Committee recommended the bill as amended by the committee. Very similar to the bill that the committee had recommended in 1975, it included two significant changes. First, it empowered those in custody of public cultural buildings to “permit smoking by persons seated at any table provided for the purpose of consuming food or beverages served or provided on the premises”; and second, it prohibited smoking in any room of a health care facility used for the recuperation or care of patients except in designated rooms, subject to the proviso that those in charge provided a sufficient number of nosmoking rooms to accommodate those who wanted them. Two members of the committee, which approved the amended bill by a vote of 10 to 1, stressed the public health dimensions. Non-smoking committee chairman, William Gluba, who called the evidence that smokers were affecting nonsmokers’ health “overwhelming,” said the bill boiled down to recognizing the rights of the 70 percent of the people in the country who did not smoke. Republican William Plymat, a key sponsor, counted only 16 smoking colleagues, whereas 34 did not smoke: “There are senators who are enduring the smoke of other senators and murmuring about it.” Plymat, who was “allergic” to tobacco smoke, pointed out that 27 states already had similar laws and neighboring Minnesota’s was “much tougher.” In contrast, the Iowa bill provided only a “friendly warning” for those smoking in “forbidden territory”: the law would work only if “people accepted regulations. Nobody is going on a witch-hunt.”

The five and a half hour Senate floor debate on March 3, 1976 underscored that amendment-studded S.F. 106 was a “toothless tiger”: not only did it authorize virtually all building operators to “exempt themselves” (and expose the nonsmoking users) by simply designating virtually all parts of their buildings smoking areas, but the minimum $5 fine made deterrence at the very least questionable. The three leaders of the “pro-smoking forces,” Democrat Richard Norpel and Republicans Willard Hansen and Calvin Hultman (a future majority and minority leader and, on his departure from the Senate in 1990, a Philip Morris lobbyist), were all cigar smokers. Hansen’s attempt to defeat the bill by 80 [No author], “Iowa Speech” at 2, 4-5 (July 26, 1978), Bates No. 690145178/9/81-82. The words in square brackets were handwritten on the typescript.

---

persuading his colleagues that passage would bring about a prohibition of smoking in the Senate chamber—an odd argument since more than two-thirds did not smoke—was rejected by Scott, who noted that the Senate Rules Committee would resolve that issue.83

The first amendment filed in the debate was offered by Hultman. Although it struck out the entirety of the committee bill (itself an amendment), it was, with a few exceptions, remarkably similar to it. Chief among the changes was the further relaxation of the already quite permissive provision relating to public cultural buildings: Hultman would have empowered those in custody to “permit smoking by persons on the premises and...make available smoking areas in such facilities within the same structure where smoking is not prohibited by any statute, ordinance, or lawful rule of this state or any of its political subdivisions and where the words ‘smoking permitted’ are posted.”84 The Register characterized this amendment as “permitting smoking in all but posted no-smoking areas—the reverse of what the bill provides.”85 Hultman would also have further relaxed the provision relating to retail stores—which under the committee version were subject only to elective coverage—by making the failure to post and keep on display no-smoking signs a conclusive presumption that the custodian had not so elected. Hultman would also have discouraged enforcement by making the prosecuting witness liable for court costs and reasonable attorney fees for a defendant who was acquitted. And finally, the amendment would have authorized school boards to make rules to regulate (as an alternative to prohibiting) the use of tobacco by students. Hultman’s amendment lost on a close 21 to 26 vote, with 12 of the 13 senators who ultimately voted against the bill voting Yea.86

Then Democratic Senator Richard Norpel, an insurance agency owner from a northeast Iowa town on the Mississippi and strong opponent of smoking regulation, offered an amendment to strike the prohibition of smoking (subject to 87Iowa Official Register: 1975-1976, at 45 (56th No., Pam Peglow ed.). Norpel also operated a clothing business and was a real estate salesman.

Non-Smokers’ Struggle Against Tobacco Smoke Exposure in Iowa, 1970-82

designation of smoking areas) in public buildings owned or controlled by state or local government. It lost by a vote of 16 to 29 despite having secured the votes of the Democratic Majority Leader George Kinley and the Republican Minority Leader Clifton Lamborn. Republican Philip Hill, another senator who generally opposed smoking restrictions, offered an amendment to strike the prohibition on smoking in the offices of doctors and other health care providers (insofar as they elected coverage), which was adopted 26 to 18 against the votes of the bill’s strongest supporters. However, Hill’s other amendment, which would have eliminated the coverage of services establishments, lost 14 to 31.

At this point in the debate Hultman and Democrat Norman Rodgers tried to kill the bill by means of a tabling motion. The overwhelming 36 to 10 vote defeating the motion prefigured the final outcome. On back-to-back voice votes, the Senate adopted two amendments offered by the bill’s sponsor, Scott, to convert the electability of coverage by those in custody of retail stores into mandatory coverage subject to designation of smoking areas, and, even more importantly, to add similar coverage of restaurants.

Hultman then succeeded in securing an overwhelming majority (35 to 4) for his amendment creating a grace period in retail store facilities so that no convictions for unlawful smoking were permissible until conspicuous nosmoking signs had been posted for at least 30 days, but failed on a non-record roll-call vote of 15 to 25 to persuade a majority of senators to abolish the bill’s penalty provision altogether. On a 24 to 19 vote the bill was then further weakened by 90 State of Iowa: 1976: Journal of the Senate: 1976 Regular Session Sixty-Sixth General Assembly 715-17 (Mar. 3) (S-5150A). The amendment was presumably drafted inartfully, since its adoption would have meant that smoking would have been prohibited in retail stores absolutely without any provision for designated smoking areas.

---

94 State of Iowa: 1976: Journal of the Senate: 1976 Regular Session Sixty-Sixth General Assembly 721 (Mar. 3) (S-5276). In between Hultman’s amendments, the extreme anti-regulationist Norpel unsuccessfully filed an amendment to require the furnishing of making the 10 to 100 dollar penalty apply only to second and additional offenses and reducing the penalty for a first offense to five dollars, but Hultman’s amendment to impose all court costs, including reasonable attorneys fees, on the person filing charges if the accused was found not guilty lost 13 to 30. The most extensively debated amendment, at least in the Des Moines Register’s view, proposed allowing school districts to set aside rooms for teenage smokers. Offered by two Democrats from Cedar Rapids, it was purportedly designed to enable students to use the restroom without being exposed to smoke, although one of its proponents apparently recognized that it violated the minimum smoking age law. It failed by a vote of 20 to 23.

The lowest level of understanding of the underlying public health problems was displayed by Republican Willard Hansen, whose amendment would have required anyone entering public cultural buildings to “have adequately, and with such frequency, bathed his [sic] or herself so as to preclude body odors from emitting from his or her person or in the alternative made appropriate application of any artificial substances which produces [sic] an aroma sufficient to subjugate any body odors.” For good measure Hansen would also have required people entering such public buildings to have brushed their teeth or cleansed their dentures at least once a day and gargled commercially sold substances strong enough to “subjugate any unpleasant odors emitting from the oral cavity.” Hansen’s detour was promptly declared an impermissible frolic by the chair, who ruled that it was not germane and thus out of order.

As the debate drew to a close, Hultman, according to the Register, “tried to shake senators” with an amendment legalizing marijuana, but withdrew it on discovering that it would not pass.¹⁰⁰ Norpel, too, withdrew his, which at first blush appeared merely whimsically or petutantly provocative: “Persons employed in or using the buildings mentioned in this section who do not smoke shall not enter areas designated as smoking areas.”¹⁰¹ Though Norpel, to a moral certainty, did not invest it with this deeper meaning, he inadvertently alluded to the reality that designated smoking areas would become de facto off limits to nonsmokers.
Non-Smokers’ Struggle Against Tobacco Smoke Exposure in Iowa, 1970-82

In the end the Senate passed S.F. 106 by a large non-party-line majority of 35 to 13 with 19 Democrats and 16 Republicans favoring and seven Republicans and six Democrats opposing it.¹⁰² As passed, S.F. 106 prohibited smoking in any elevator—coverage of which Philip Morris considered a “costless...compromise”¹⁰³—indoor theater, library, art museum, concert hall, auditorium, “or other similar facility open to the public,” subject to the exception that those in custody of the buildings housing them (except elevators) “may permit smoking by persons seated at any table provided for the purpose of consuming food or beverages served or provided on the premises and may make available smoking areas adjacent to such facilities within the same structure where the words ‘smoking permitted’ are posted.”¹⁰⁴ The bill also prohibited smoking in those portions of railroads, buses, and planes with departures originating in Iowa which were set aside as non-smoking areas by the person in control of the carrier, and required those areas to “be of sufficient capacity to accommodate all persons who do not wish to be seated in an smoking area.”¹⁰⁵ Subject to the exception for smoking areas designated by the person in custody, smoking was also prohibited in any waiting room, rest room, lobby, or hallway of any clinic, medical laboratory, hospital, or similar facility; the same ¹⁰⁰Dan Piller, “Iowa Senate OK’s Curb on Smoking in Public,” DMR, Mar. 4, 1976 (1A:6, 3A:5). The amendment would simply have added “marijuana” to the list of tobacco products the inhaling or exhaling the smoke of which or the possession or control of which in a lighted form defined “smoking” under S.F. 106. State of Iowa: 1976: Journal of the Senate: 1976 Regular Session Sixty-Sixth General Assembly 724 (Mar. 3) (S-5283).

¹⁰³[Philip Morris], Project Down Under—Group Presentation to Senior Management at 1, 3 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/3.

¹⁰⁴S.F. 106, § 2(1) (as amended and passed by the Senate Mar. 3, 1976).

¹⁰⁵S.F. 106, § 2(2) (as amended and passed by the Senate Mar. 3, 1976).
arrangement applied to any room in such facilities used for patient care or recuperation as well as in a health care facility, except that the person in custody or control could designate individual rooms as smoking rooms, provided that that person also provided “a sufficient number of rooms in which smoking is not permitted to accommodate those persons who desire such rooms.”

Subject to the designation of smoking areas by the controlling governmental body, officer, or agency, smoking was also prohibited in any public building owned or under the control of the State of Iowa or any of its political subdivisions. The prohibition of smoking in any building or portion thereof occupied by any business engaged in retail sale of tangible personal property or taxable services was subject not only to the designation of smoking areas, but also to the proviso of a grace period of 30 days after conspicuous “smoking prohibited by law” signs had been posted.

Smoking, except in designated areas, was also prohibited in restaurants. The enforcement scheme was very lax: the person in custody of the facility or any employee on duty “who observes any person smoking in that facility in violation of this Act shall inform that person that smoking is prohibited by law in that facility or that area....” Similarly, the penalty, which covered anyone who smoked in a no-smoking area or failed to post the required no-smoking signs was a mere five dollars for a first offense and $10 to $100 for additional offenses.

Despite the clear Senate majority, the House considered neither S.F. 106 nor the rather expansive H.F. 1130 filed by Wells and 21 other representatives in 1976, which tracked the 1975 Minnesota law. After the failure to debate S.F.

---

111 S.F. 106, § 6 (as amended and passed by the Senate Mar. 3, 1976). In fact, because the penalty provision was incompetently drafted, using “and” rather than “or,” it literally but nonsensically applied only to a person who committed both offenses. Oddly, this provision, which was not in the committee bill or amendment, was added by floor amendment offered by one of the most extreme opponents of regulation, Willard Hansen, and adopted by a vote of 38 to 10, most of the bill’s leading supporters, including its sponsor, Scott, voting Yea. State of Iowa: 1976: Journal of the Senate: 1976 Regular Session Sixty-Sixth General Assembly 725 (Mar. 3) (S-5284).
112 H.F. 1130 (Jan. 23, 1976, by Wells). This bill was the source of future Iowa law by extending coverage to restaurants, retail stores, offices, educational facilities, and hospitals, while excluding private enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers even 106 in the House in 1976, representatives by 1977 were hopeful that chances for passage in the new general assembly were greater, as Wells put it, “‘if only because [House Speaker Dale] Cochran has quit smoking.’” because his opposition had “‘had a lot to do with its failure....’”113 A few days later, Wells and 22 other representatives filed H.F. 285, a bill that was virtually identical to S.F. 106, but the House took no action on it.114

The Avalanche of State Anti-Smoking Bills in the Second Half of the 1970s and Cigarette Manufacturers’ Increasing Alarm

Although no element as found in cigarette smoke has ever been demonstrated to be the cause of any human disease, anti-smoking groups have bombarded the public with an unceasing attack on cigarettes for more than two decades. ... The anti-tobacco fanatics are now attempting to portray smokers as social outcasts. They are seeking not only social ostracism, but laws banning smoking in an immense variety of public places. In a nation built on a foundation of personal freedom and individual rights, such an attempt to control public behavior through bureaucratic compulsion should be repulsive to every citizen.115

At the close of the 1976 state legislative sessions, Tobacco Institute President Kornegay, in a possibly face-saving mode, tried to lower the state of alarm among the members of TI’s executive committee by stressing that, although since 1972 31 states had enacted some sort of legislation relating to the restriction of though they might be visited by nonsmokers (§ 4); it was also forward-looking in excluding factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces not usually visited by the general public (§ 5), as well as in limiting the mandated use of “physical barriers and ventilation systems...to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas” to “existing” ones (§ 6). Not adopted by later enactment were: its proviso that the labor and public health commissioners establish rules to restrict or prohibit smoking in workplaces where close proximity of workers or inadequate ventilation caused smoke pollution detrimental to nonsmoking employees’ health and comfort (§ 5); and the requirement that proprietors “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in prohibited areas by...[a]rranging seating to provide a smoke-free area” and “[a]sking smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke” (§ 6).

Non-Smokers’ Struggle Against Tobacco Smoke Exposure in Iowa, 1970-82

smoking, only of 18 could it “be said that there are in varying degrees troublesome laws affecting our industry.” And even among these 18 the variation ranged from Oregon’s segregation in public meetings to Minnesota’s coverage of a “multitude of situations.” The other 13 failed to meet the troublemaking threshold because they either applied only to elevators, certain forms of transportation, or the House chambers during sessions, or lacked enforcement or administrative provisions.¹¹⁶

Taking stock in a much more pessimistic and realistic vein, R. J. Reynolds—which classified only eight of the 31 states as imposing “[t]oken [r]estrictions”¹¹⁷—identified an undeniably upward trajectory of anti-smoking groups’ initiatives: whereas in 1971 and 1972 only two bills were enacted (California’s mandate to all public carriers of space for nonsmokers and New Jersey’s smoking ban in public transit vehicles), in 1973 five of 29 bills were enacted in 18 states, in 1974 six of 65 in 25 states, in 1975 20 of 160 bills in 48 states, and in 1976 seven of 161 in 39 states. Extrapolating, Reynolds predicted that in 1977 the “growing militancy of the anti-tobacco forces and the increasing self-consciousness among smokers will probably result in the introduction of bills restricting smoking in all of the 21 states that do not have no-smoking laws on the books.” At 80 percent it rated the probability that Iowa would enact the model bill circulated to state legislators in the wake of the adoption of the Nonsmokers’ Bill of Rights in Philadelphia in January 1974 by the National Interagency Clearinghouse on Smoking and Health, but Reynolds did not view the probability of passage of a measure as stringent as Minnesota’s as exceeding 50 percent in any state.¹¹⁸

Nevertheless, R. J. Reynolds not only projected 1977 to be “the most difficult year the Industry has yet had to contend with,” but lamented that the “Tobacco Institute still does not have the resources they need to respond fully to the numerous bills to restrict smoking that will be introduced.” In particular, the need for scientific and medical witnesses to testify before state legislative committees would be commensurately greater than ever before, but the company hoped that the Institute’s newly retained medical director and its law firm (Shook, Hardy & Bacon) would find the witnesses “so urgently needed to counter the very serious though unsupported charges that are increasingly influencing legislators to believe that smoking constitutes a health hazard to nonsmokers.” As for 1978 and beyond, all that Reynolds could foresee was the likelihood of the increasing intensity and scope of anti-smoking legislative intervention, which could be defeated only if the Institute launched a “concerted all-out effort to mobilize smokers to speak out for their right to smoke.” If not, and if the industry was also unable to prove the health hazards of smoking to be unfounded, then, the company’s director of corporate affairs conceded, at least internally, that “the objective of the anti-tobacco forces to ban all smoking in public, and, eventually, bring about complete prohibition of smoking, may, in the long run, be accomplished.”

¹¹⁶Status of Restrictive Legislation as of 9/16/76 (Remarks delivered to Executive Committee of the Tobacco Institute by Horace R. Kornegay, President and Executive Director), Bates No. 501800442.

¹¹⁸James]. S. Dowdell, “Smoking Restrictions” at 4-5 (Nov. 15, 1976), Bates No. 500656976/79-80. For later data showing a somewhat different number of bills introduced and passed in the 1970s, see Tobacco Institute, Stateline (Dec. 31, 1986), Bates No. 2023551362. The model bill prohibited smoking in elevators, indoor theaters, concert halls, museums, and public transit vehicles, and required segregation of smokers in government buildings, health care institutions, and other indoor places, including restaurants, in which the general public assembled. James]. S. Dowdell, “Smoking Restrictions” at 5 (Nov. 15, 1976), Bates No. 500656976/80.

The sixth biennial “Study of Public Attitudes Toward Cigarette Smoking and the Tobacco Industry,” which TI paid Roper to conduct in March 1978, brought even worse tidings for the industry. The central implication of Roper’s finding was that “anti-smoking forces...are well on the way to making the same sale about the effects of smoking on the non-smoker as they have already made with respect to the effects on the smoker.” The ominous fact that more than two-thirds of non-smokers and even almost half of all smokers believed that smoking was hazardous to non-smokers’ health was “the most dangerous development to the viability of the tobacco industry that has yet occurred.” As anti-smoking groups succeeded in convincing non-smokers of the health consequences of exposure to smokers’ smoke, “the pressure for segregated facilities,” which were already backed by “majority sentiment,” would “change from a ripple to a tide.” Indeed, Roper already foresaw the possibility that support for segregation could turn into “support for a total ban.” With 69 percent (up from 57 percent in 1974) of non-smokers and 40 percent (up from 30 percent) of smokers believing that non-smokers were harmed by cigarette smoke, Roper concluded that its customer’s battle to convince the public that passive smoking was not dangerous might already have been lost (although it nevertheless argued that “[t]he strategic and long run antidote to the passive smoking issue is...developing and widely publicizing clear-cut, credible evidence” that it was not harmful). Especially troubling to the cigarette oligopoly must have been the finding that its pet cure-all—namely, that courtesy not legislation was the answer—was the argument in opposition to anti-smoking laws that had registered the greatest loss of support since the 1976 survey. Significantly, a majority of those surveyed approved of segregating smokers in every public place about which they were asked and was larger than in 1976: trains, airplanes, and buses (91 up from 83 percent); theaters (83/81 percent); eating places (73/57 percent); indoor sporting events (73/67 percent); public meetings (67/62 percent); train, plane, bus stations (62/54 percent); workplaces and offices (61/52 percent). Support for total bans was lower, but for a number of locations nevertheless impressively high: doctors’ and dentists’ waiting rooms (69/65 percent); retail stores (55/52 percent). That the figures for some other locations—for example, trains, planes and buses (26/25 percent), eating places (23/22 percent), and work place and offices (17/17 percent)—were significantly lower, may have merely been an arbitrary and artificial function of the sequence of the questions: if, Roper conceded, it had “asked about banning before mentioning the acceptable alternative of segregation, the sentiment for banning might have been substantially higher.”

---

119J[ames]. S. Dowdell, “Smoking Restrictions” at 6-7 (Nov. 15, 1976), Bates No. 500656976/81-82.

Such public attitudes fully undergirded the public policies embodied in the avalanche of proposed and enacted state-level anti-smoking legislation. The mid-1970s, to the chagrin of the Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., which was, as always, monitoring, witnessed an explosive increase in the volume of proposed state-level anti-smoking/tobacco legislation: whereas between 1950 and 1970 somewhat more than 500 restrictive bills were filed (or about 24 per year), and for the overlapping period of 1966 to 1974 the corresponding figures were 470 and 52, a total of 386 bills or an annual average of 129 were introduced from 1975 to 1977. The average number of annual enactments also rose sharply from two to five to 14 for the three periods.

---

of the 1970s bills and laws made the quantitative growth all the more impressive: between 1975 and 1977, when some type of anti-tobacco bills was filed in all 50 state legislatures, 84 percent of the bills and 88 percent of enactments concerned restricting smoking to certain places or areas. Little wonder that TMA warned of an “uphill legislative battle on the State level” for 1978.125 (Ironically, a decade later a Tobacco Institute that was incapable of admitting even internally that it was trapped in an endgame, described its deteriorating situation this way: “What was considered an onerous bill in 1970, or even 1980, might now be viewed as a reasonable approach even by the industry to a typical public smoking bill introduced in 1988.”)126

By the end of 1977, according to an inclusive listing by TMA, 33 states had enacted 52 separate measures restricting smoking, which ranged from Kentucky’s ban on school property (exempting adult employees in assigned rooms) to Minnesota’s and Utah’s “comprehensive” laws, which “effectively restrict smoking in any public place, with the exception of bars.”127 In considering these initial regimes, it is crucial to recall that, as TMA pointed out, like their counterparts on airplanes, they provided very little if any protection from secondhand smoke exposure because, “[w]ith the exception of transit vehicles, elevators, and some cultural areas, where the designation of a smoking area would be difficult, the vast majority of enactments...[merely] restrict smoking to designated areas” rather than banning it.128 Classifying the statutes more closely, TMA identified six states that restricted smoking in business or work places, 19 in cultural places, seven in indoor sports arenas, four in restaurants (though two applied only to restaurants with 50 or more seats), five in food stores, 22 in health facilities, 17 in public/government meetings, and 26 in transit vehicles.\footnote{129}

Senate File 2022 in 1978: Iowa Finally Enacts Very Limited Regulation of Public Smoking

Although Iowa belonged to the definite minority of states that had as yet failed to take any statewide action to limit public smoking, momentum began mounting when, at the beginning of the 1978 session, the Register’s Iowa Poll revealed that of adult Iowans (65 percent of whom did not smoke) 64 percent thought that persons who smoked should be legally restricted to limited areas in restaurants, theaters, and auditorium lobbies, and 57 percent agreed about limiting smoking in government buildings. Even 47, 53, and 46 percent of smokers agreed with the same proposition regarding restaurants, lobbies, and government buildings, respectively. From these responses the Register concluded that “by overwhelming margins, the nonsmokers want an Iowa version of the Minnesota no-smoking law, which limits smoking to specified areas of most public places.” To be sure, the heterogeneity of anti-smoking positions, which lagged behind even the rudimentary scientific knowledge of the day, was reflected in the fact that 35 percent of non-smokers did not even object to others smoking in the same car.\footnote{130}

On January 10, two days after the poll’s release, Democrat Joan Orr (a member of Common Cause, the Iowa Civil Liberties Union, and the People’s Unitarian Church)\footnote{131} and a bipartisan group of 24 other senators introduced Senate File 2022,\footnote{132} which was virtually a copy of S.F. 106 as passed by the Senate in 1976. The next issue of the Tobacco Institute Newsletter reported that \footnote{130}Arnold Garson and James Flansburg, “Iowans Back Public Curbs on Smoking,” DMR, Jan. 8, 1978 (1A:6, 11A:1-2). Although the survey questions were propounded as stated in the text, the graphic in the article mistakenly stated the question as whether “you favor no smoking areas....” The survey provided no underlying demographic explanation of the finding that 44 percent of Democrats but only 25 percent of Republicans smoked.

\footnote{132}S.F. 2022 (Jan. 10, 1978, by Orr).
Iowa was one of four states in which “[b]road smoking restriction bills” had been introduced.\textsuperscript{133}

On January 11, 1978, the day after S.F. 2022’s introduction in the Senate—which Democrats continued to control 26 to 24\textsuperscript{134}—Republican Governor Robert Ray included in the recommendations accompanying his state of the state address to the legislature this very modest proposal: “Anti-Smoking: Since two-thirds of Iowa’s adults choose not to smoke, government can be of real service by restricting smoking to designated areas in government buildings. In addition, this can spur the private sector to take similar action voluntarily.”\textsuperscript{135} Four weeks later identical bills were filed by 19 Republicans in the House and 11 Republicans in the Senate, which incorporated Ray’s recommendation by merely prohibiting smoking—subject to a “limited number” of designated smoking areas—in public buildings owned by state or local government, but neither chamber took action on them.\textsuperscript{136}

January 11 also witnessed a federal intervention that created a substantive textual context against which Iowa’s anti-smoking legislative activity must be evaluated. The Carter administration’s secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Joseph Califano, Jr., (who two years earlier had, at his 11-year-old son’s urging, quit smoking),\textsuperscript{137} announced, to great publicistic fanfare, a “major initiative aimed at discouraging Americans from smoking....” As one component of this program Califano encouraged the states to strengthen their smoking laws and regulations or, if they lacked such, to introduce bills to enact them. In that connection Califano sent governors HEW’s model clean indoor air law, which he characterized as “representing some of the best elements of existing State legislation”\textsuperscript{138}—such as Minnesota’s and Alaska’s.\textsuperscript{139} Califano’s program also

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{133} TIN, No. 190, Jan. 24, 1978, at 7, Bates No. 500065086/91
\end{flushright}

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{134} Frank Stork and Cynthia Clingan, \textit{The Iowa General Assembly: Our Legislative Heritage 1846-1980}, at 8 (n.d.).
\end{flushright}

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{135} \textit{Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 457-54 (Jan. 11).}
\end{flushright}

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{136} H.F. 2153 (Feb. 8, 1978, by Hansen and 18 others); S.F. 2098 (Feb. 8, 1978, by Murray and 10 others).
\end{flushright}

\begin{flushright}
\end{flushright}

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{138} Joseph Califano, Jr. to James Hunt, Jr. (Governor of North Carolina) (Jan. 11, 1978), Bates T136310457.
\end{flushright}

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{139} Address by Joseph A. Califano, Jr., Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Before the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health, Shoreham Hotel, \end{flushright}
included a new smoking policy for HEW’s own buildings, which “bans smoking in conference rooms, classrooms, auditoriums, elevators and shuttle vehicles.
Within practical limits, the work areas of smokers and non-smokers will be separate and physically distinct. In recognition of the rights of individuals who wish to continue to smoke, smoking areas will be established. But the general rule will be ‘No Smoking—except in smoking areas.’ Most importantly, it will be the policy of the Department that smoking in shared work areas will be prohibited at the request of non-smokers whose health is affected.”

To be sure, the Carter administration immediately signaled its rejection of this approach in the form of an official White House press release the same day by Dr. Peter Bourne, Carter’s special assistant for health issues, stating his “concern over the effect of...proposals such as the prohibition of cigarettes in a number of places.”
Although he conceded that “people...should receive notice of whether proprietors and employers allow smoking” and that “[t]hose who are offended by smoking should be separated from those who are not so offended,” Bourne insisted that “the ultimate effort of government...should not be to make outcasts of smokers.
Such efforts are doomed to failure.”

HEW’s Model State Clean Indoor Air Act prohibited smoking in public vehicles or indoor public places (broadly defined to include “any enclosed area” while it was open to the general public, parts of public schools open to students, and portions of health facilities in which patients were permitted) except in designated smoking areas. The power to designate of an owner or other person in charge of a public place or vehicle was subject to two provisos: (1) that “reasonably substantial areas” of these places or vehicles were “not designated as smoking areas”; and (2) “existing physical barriers and ventilation systems are

---

Washington, D.C. at 17 (Jan. 11, 1978), Bates No. 508083171/87. It is unclear why HEW deemed the Alaska statute to be a model since it declared that with regard to covered places except means of transportation and laboratory waiting rooms “reasonable smoking areas must be provided, unless prohibited for the protection of the public safety or the protection of and preservation of the building and its contents” and that “[t]o the extent practicable, the state shall require its lessees or sublessees to provide separate smoking areas.” 1975 Alaska Laws ch. 125, § 18.35.320(a) and (b).

140 Address by Joseph A. Califano, Jr., Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Before the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health, Shoreham Hotel, 141 The White House, Statement of Dr. Peter Bourne, Special Assistant to the President for Health Issues (Jan. 11, 1978), Bates No. 89781455.

142 Model State Clean Indoor Air Act, § 3(2), Bates No. T136310459.

143 Model State Clean Indoor Air Act, § 4(a) and (b), Bates No. T136310459/60.
adequate to minimize the deleterious effects of smoking on adjacent areas which are not designated as smoking areas.”144 These two conditions in fact imposed more stringent restrictions on owners’ discretion than the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act because: (1) requiring “reasonably substantial” nosmoking areas precluded owners, for example, from designating an entire restaurant as smoking-permitted except for one or two tables as was not uncommon in Minnesota; and (2) unlike MCIAA, which merely provided that “existing physical barriers and ventilation shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas”145—meaning, presumably, that however much minimization they achieved was legally acceptable—under HEW’s Model Act owners’ designation of smoking areas was not lawful unless the existing barriers and ventilation were adequate to the objective of achieving the minimization of smoking’s deleterious effects on adjacent nonsmoking areas. The Model Act also went beyond MCIAA, which required owners to ask smoking violators to refrain from smoking only if a customer or employee requested such intercession, by making this duty absolute and unconditional.146 And finally, HEW’s Model Act was more capacious than MCIAA with regard to the coverage of workplaces by virtue of requiring the state labor department to adopt regulations to restrict smoking in workplaces “(1) in which smoking, alone or in combination with environmental substances, deleteriously affects the health or comfort of workers who do not smoke; or (2) if a worker has submitted a written request that smoking be restricted.”147

In early March the Iowa Senate Human Resources Committee defeated by a vote of 9 to 3 a motion by Republican Rolf Craft, an economics professor, to remove retail stores and restaurants from the scope of public places in which smoking was prohibited and defeated by a vote of 7 to 5 a separate motion by Republican John Murray to remove retail stores. The committee then voted 9 to 3 to specify that jurisdiction for enforcement be in magistrate court. Finally, it voted 11 to 1 to recommend the bill’s passage as amended.148

The Senate debate on S.F. 2022 took place on March 21. Just how little electoral room was available for enacting a comprehensive anti-smoking law was signaled at the outset when 12 Republicans and one Democrat offered as an amendment the aforementioned gubernatorially inspired bill that would have

---

144 Model State Clean Indoor Air Act, § 4(b)(1) and (2), Bates No. TI36310459/60.
145 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 5, at 633, 634. On MCIAA, see above ch. 24.
146 Model State Clean Indoor Air Act, § 5(3), Bates No. TI36310459/61.
147 Model State Clean Indoor Air Act, § 7(a), Bates No. TI36310459/61.
148 Senate Committee on Human Resources, Mar. 7, 1978, Minutes at 10 (copy provided by SHSI DM); Journal of the Senate: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 474, 484 (Mar. 7-8).
pared back smoking prohibitions to encompass only public buildings owned by state or local government. Republican Edgar Holden, who sought support for the amendment by noting that Governor Ray wanted it, based his advocacy on using publicly owned buildings as “‘the guinea pig’” for a change: if it worked, the legislature could then expand the prohibition to privately owned buildings. Orr, S.F. 2022’s floor manager, urged adoption of the unamended bill on the grounds that nonsmokers’ rights had to be protected because smoking contributed to lung cancer, chronic bronchitis, and emphysema. Avoiding that issue and seeking to shift the focus of the debate, Republican James Briles opposed the broader scope of the bill because it “would work against free enterprise by driving out of business the operators of small establishments who are forced to adhere to no-smoking regulations.” Imparting a more subtle twist to the argument, Holden, a real estate developer and telephone company president, insisted that the business owner “should be able to make the decision on whether to ban smoking in any area.” Orr’s counter-argument, while trenchantly accurate, was, apparently unbeknownst to her, equally destructive of the rationale for the massive exception embedded in her own bill (and still basic to the law three decades later): “[J]ust because you’re the proprietor of a business doesn’t mean you have the right to pollute somebody who doesn’t want to be polluted.” Ultimately the amendment lost on a tie vote of 25 to 25 because two Republicans who had sponsored the amendment withdrew their support.

After Orr had barely succeeded in securing a 26 to 23 vote in favor of her amendment to include waiting rooms in airports and railroad and bus stations in the prohibition, Holden, who had a reputation for being very pro-business,

---

149 Journal of the Senate: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 612, 1963-64 (Mar. 21) (S-5349). The one Democrat was Louis Culver, who had not been among the original supporters of S.F. 2098. Before the vote on this amendment the Senate adopted an amendment to it that added the provision in S.F. 2022 that prohibited smoking in rooms in health care facilities used for patient care or recuperation. Id. at 612, 1977-78 (S-5386).

153 Email from former Senator Beverly Hannon (Mar. 7, 2007).
offered his crucial amendment—which he had already filed two months earlier on January 18, at the same time that he filed another amendment to limit coverage to government-owned buildings—to gut the bill by excluding retail stores and restaurants. Coverage of these locations, which, according to the Register, “drew the most debate,” would, Holden insisted, create an impossible no-win enforcement situation for business owners inasmuch as smokers would be angry if they could not smoke where they wanted to and, conversely, nonsmokers would be angry if smokers smoked in nosmoking areas. His fellow Republican Briles, who persistently voted against anti-smoking bills, alleged that the bill “would work against free enterprise by driving out of business the operators of small establishments who are forced to adhere to no-smoking regulations.” Another Republican, Philip Hill, cast aspersions on the model Minnesota law by reporting that one time he was seated for half an hour in the nosmoking section of a large restaurant in Minneapolis without being served, and only when he moved to the smoking section did a waitress take his order, thus “subtly” using “starvation” to motivate customers to ignore the law. In contrast, Republican Roger Shaff, an assistant minority leader, offered a more personal reason for supporting the bill: “He noted that restaurants now often posted signs saying ‘no shirt, no shoes, no food’ and said, ‘I’d rather sit next to someone with no shoes than someone smoking.’”

The 30 to 17 vote to exclude these two essential locations of any comprehensive regulation of secondhand smoke exposure revealed how minimal the Iowa legislature’s commitment to this burgeoning public health movement was as yet. Broken down by party, the vote showed a significant difference: while 17 Republicans voted for reduced coverage and only five against, Democrats split 13 to 12. Nevertheless, the fact that even Democrats could not 154 Journal of the Senate: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 613, 1806 (Mar. 21) (S-5027). Holden withdrew the amendment to confine coverage to government buildings as soon as the aforementioned similar amendment had been defeated 25 to 25. Journal of the Senate: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 612, 1806 (Mar. 21) (S-5026).

---

muster a small majority for comprehensive coverage prefigured the persistent backwardness that would characterize Iowa’s anti-smoking legislation for the next 30 years. On the final vote the diluted bill passed 39 to 8, the no votes being equally divided between Republicans and Democrats.158

The Iowa debate over smoking in restaurants was but one of many occurring in state legislatures in the 1970s. Indeed, by the middle of the decade restaurants had become such a contentious site of struggle over exposure of nonsmokers to smoke that many state restaurant associations urged their members to create nosmoking sections in order to forestall further legislative intervention, advocated by anti-smoking groups such as the American Cancer Society and American Heart Association, that might require physical barriers, installation of ventilation systems, or reserving a fixed proportion of tables for nonsmokers. But the debate took on a different shape in Iowa, where, the Nation’s Restaurant News declared later in 1978, “the state restaurant association helped deliver a resounding defeat to a recent smoking bill” and “there has been no effort to enlist voluntary support of no-smoking sections [sic; must be “sections”].”159

Apart from pointing out that more and more non-smokers—who by this time outnumbered smokers by three to one—were recognizing secondhand exposure as a health hazard, a legislative analysis prepared by the National Restaurant Association in 1979 listed among the non-obvious arguments that proponents had adduced in favor of applying nosmoking laws to restaurants that: a “non-smoker doesn’t linger over a second cup of coffee and a cigarette, so business in the special section does 30% more business than the rest of the restaurant”; under a smoking ban “restaurants could reduce their ventilation requirements and thus conserve energy”; and exemption of restaurants from smoking ban laws “would bring charges of unequal enforcement from businesses not exempted.” On the other hand, arguments advanced by opponents of no-smoking laws included the following: many owners had never received a complaint from a customer; owners were “annoyed” by problems associated with creating nosmoking sections; bans would place owners in “the embarrassing position of becoming policemen”; according to a 1976 survey conducted in Minnesota (where the country’s most comprehensive law had gone into effect a year earlier), 80 percent of “restaurant diners couldn’t care less whether smoke gets in their eyes or lungs while eating”; anti-public smoking legislation imposed “high economic costs...for the redesign of dining areas, installation of dual air circulation systems, and...other necessary adjustments”; and there was no proof that tobacco smoke injured nonsmokers.\160\n

Despite the large majority that S.F. 2022 garnered in the Senate, the Register warned that it was “expected to face rough going in the House where similar proposals to restrict smoking have become bottled up in committees dominated by smokers.”\161\ The chair (W. R. Bill Monroe) and vice-chair (Jack Woods) of the House committee to which the bill was referred, State Government,\162\ were both heavy smokers.\163\ At the committee meeting on April 6, Wells’s aforementioned bill, H.F. 285, was taken up, but instead the committee decided to consider S.F. 2022. Democrat Diane Brandt then distributed an amendment that she had filed a week earlier\164\ reincorporating coverage of restaurants (which the Senate bill had included until it was struck on a floor vote) and mandating the provision of nosmoking areas in them.\165\ The minutes disclosed that chairman Monroe “was in doubt\166”—a reaction that committee member John Patchett three

---

\160\ Libby Hendrix [National Restaurant Association], “Smoking vs. Non-Smoking: A Legislative Analysis” (Aug. 1979), Bates No. TI22030128/34-5.

\161\ Bonnie Wittenburg, “Senate Passes Curb on Public Smoking in Iowa,” DMR, Mar. 22, 1978 (A1:1-2, at 5A:1). The most recent bill to have suffered that fate was presumably the aforementioned H.F. 285, which Wells had filed in 1977.

\162\ Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 1453 (Apr. 6).

\163\ Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Mar. 24, 2007). Patchett served on the committee with them in 1978. In 1985, Woods filed several weakening amendments to H.F. 102, which was designed to strengthen the anti-public smoking law. See below ch. 26. For example, he proposed to exempt the public areas of bus and air terminals. H-3265 and H-3266 (Mar. 6, 1985) (inserted into the bill book at the University of Iowa Law Library). In 1986, he filed amendments to exclude all restaurants and to authorize owners to designate entire public places as no smoking areas. H-5021 (Jan. 20, 1986) and H-5039 (Jan. 23, 1986) (inserted into the bill book at the University of Iowa Law Library).

\164\ Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 1:1313 (Apr. 6), and 2:3067.

\165\ Minutes, [House] State Government [Committee], Apr. 6, 1978, 12:15 p.m. at 2 (copy furnished by SHSI, DM). The minutes did not give the text of Brandt’s amendment, which was, however, included in Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 1454-55 (Apr. 6) (H-5951). For reference to Brandt’s withdrawal of her freestanding identical amendment, see below.

\166\ Minutes, [House] State Government [Committee], Apr. 6, 1978, 12:15 p.m. at 2 (copy furnished by SHSI, DM).
Non-Smokers’ Struggle Against Tobacco Smoke Exposure in Iowa, 1970-82

decades later interpreted as perhaps meaning that because Monroe opposed the bill, “he was just trying to avoid it.” 167 Adoption of the restaurant amendment on a show of hands by a vote of 8 to 6 clearly demonstrated that, being closely divided, the committee was hardly inclined to give the militant anti-smokers carte blanche. The remaining votes underscored this virtual stalemate. The motion by Democrat Bob Arnould, another smoker, to defer the bill until the next meeting—which could be taken as an effort to kill it—was opposed by Patchett; deferral barely lost on a seven to nine vote. 168

At this point the proceedings took on a entirely different cast as another smoker, 169 the committee’s ranking Republican, Vern Harvey—a housebuilding businessman who had been a helicopter pilot in the Vietnam War and awarded a Bronze Star, and left the Army as a captain 170 —distributed his amendment, which added “where designated,” “except,” and “no” in several places in the coverage section, inverting the default position, as it were, so that instead of smoking’s being prohibited everywhere, unless owners designated areas as smoking, areas became nosmoking only where owners so designated them. On a voice vote the Ayes had it, and the amendment was adopted, 171 which eliminated the bill’s most far-reaching element. The disputed nature of this transformation was visibly on display in the motion for reconsideration, which just lost by a vote of 9 to 10 on a show of hands. 172 (In case clarification was necessary, three weeks later chairman Monroe unambiguously explained the purpose of Harvey’s amendment during the House floor debate by observing that, without the amendment to

---

167 Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Mar. 30, 2007).
168 Minutes, [House] State Government [Committee], Apr. 6, 1978, 12:15 p.m. at 2 (copy furnished by SHSI, DM).
169 His fellow member Patchett was “[p]retty sure Vern smoked.” Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Mar. 30, 2007).
171 Minutes, [House] State Government [Committee], Apr. 6, 1978, 12:15 p.m. at 3 (copy furnished by SHSI, DM). Curiously, the text of the amendment in Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 1454-55 (Apr. 6) (H-5951), included “except” in three places it was lacking in Harvey’s amendment. The description by David Yepsen, “Betting Bill Back on Track After Quick Maneuver,” DMR, Apr. 7, 1978 (1A:5-6, at 5A:1)—“Instead of creating smoking areas, the bill would create ‘no smoking’ areas”—failed to capture the essence of the change: instead of creating a presumption that all areas were non-smoking unless the owner designated smoking areas, the amendment created a presumption that all areas were smoking unless the owner designated nosmoking areas.
172 Minutes, [House] State Government [Committee], Apr. 6, 1978, 12:15 p.m. at 3 (copy furnished by SHSI, Des Moines).
reverse the bill by allowing smoking in any area not designated as no-smoking, “the bill favors non-smokers....”) On a recorded roll call S.F. 2022 then passed 13 to 3, the three no votes being cast by the chair, vice-chair, and Norman Jesse, another heavy smoker.

Looking back, but without specific recall, Patchett concluded that he and other anti-smoking members voted against Harvey’s amendment, but nevertheless voted for the bill itself in committee because they assumed (correctly as it turned out) that the full house would reject Harvey’s amendment anyway; if he and his allies had voted against the bill in committee and defeated it, “it would never have gone to the floor—so this would have been the only chance to keep it alive. I think you can get the flavor that there was a fair amount of game-playing going on on this one.”

The fact that Monroe, Woods, and Jesse, three “moderate to liberal Democrats who would otherwise generally support ‘good government’ type of legislation” voted against the amendment (and were among the 15 members who voted against the bill on its third reading) suggested, three decades later, to anti-smoking Patchett, who had served on the committee with them, that “[t]hese votes often had much more to do with whether you were a smoker and your perceived rights relating to smoking—not contributions, lobbyists, or anything else.” While certain that the tobacco industry “must have had one or more lobbyists (probably from one of the bigger firms that handled multiple clients),” Patchett, who speculated that it “may also have had one or more corporate lobbyists fly in for this type of thing,” was unable to recall names, in part because the whole issue had lacked the salience that it later assumed: “At that time, they simply weren’t a major presence in the Iowa Legislature. There just weren’t that many bills affecting them, as I recall. This whole issue was just beginning to emerge. Other groups that probably would have been involved...would be the restaurant association.” In fact, the tobacco industry had three lobbyists in Iowa at the time, including George Wilson, who represented the Tobacco Institute, and Charles Wasker.
Six days after the House Committee on State Government had recommended passage of S. 2022, the Philip Morris USA public affairs department, in an update on legislative activities and other government relations matters for senior management, after reporting that the bill had passed the Senate and the House committee, noted under the rubric “PM-U.S.A. Action,” that the Tobacco Institute “advised us on April 12 that there is nothing that the manufacturers can do at this time.” Why the industry counseled inaction in the face of House floor action is unclear, especially since the memo outlined proposed responses to other governmental anti-tobacco/smoking action.\footnote{Philip Morris Public Affairs, USA, Update for Senior Management (Apr. 12, 1978), Bates No. 1000217591. Three decades later, ex-Representative Patchett’s educated guess was that the tobacco industry had seen “the handwriting on the wall—the votes were pretty well locked in.” Email from John Patchett (Mar. 24, 2007).}

When S.F. 2022 reached the House floor late in the day on April 28, it “breezed through the House with a minimum of debate.” Supporters in their eagerness to secure passage said little, while all of the opponents’ attempts to weaken the bill failed.\footnote{Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 2:2040 (Apr. 28).} The proceedings began with Monroe’s offering the State Government Committee’s aforementioned crucial amendment. On a non-record roll call vote it was defeated 21 to 48.\footnote{Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 2:2040 (Apr. 28), 2:3067 (H-5863).} (At this point Democrat Diane Brandt withdrew her aforementioned amendment to include restaurants and mandate a non-smoking section in them.)\footnote{Charles Bullard, “No-Smoking Bills Clears Legislature,” DMR, Apr. 29, 1978 (1A:3, 7A:4-6).} As with the committee roll itself, this vote, too, was ambiguous since the amendment could have been rejected both by those who opposed coverage of restaurants and by those who opposed the inversion of the bill’s no-smoking default position. That Monroe was no friend of the bill was underscored by his warning the members that a statutory prohibition on smoking might also apply to the House chamber itself. In response, the bill’s floor manager, Don Avenson—a smoker who had voted against banning smoking in House committee rooms in 1975 and would vote against banning it in the House chamber in 1979—pointed out that the House created its own internal rules.\footnote{journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 2:2040 (Apr. 28).}
Another opponent of smoking regulation, Republican Richard Welden, then offered a floor amendment that would have removed the penalties from the bill. Democrat Lyle Scheelhaase argued that the enforcement provision was “‘unworkable and unmanageable,’” while Republican Thomas Lind predicted that it would have the same effect on smoking that Prohibition had on drinking and the 55-mile per hour speed limit had on speeding. Wells, long one of the leaders of the legislative anti-smoking campaign, admitted that “the bill could be improved but...said it is the best the Legislature can do this year. ‘This is far from a perfect bill but it is a start....’” This sentiment was echoed by Republican Julia Gentleman—whose votes on anti-smoking bills were erratic—who argued that “[i]f we need to put some teeth in it or clarify it, we can do it next year.” In addition, supporters cautioned that adding new amendments that the Senate would have to approve in the final days of the session might inadvertently kill the bill. Advocates of the change, advancing a splendid example of a self-fulfilling prophecy, sought to justify the proposal on the grounds that enforcement would be difficult in general, but that in particular there would be no way to keep track of the number of offenses anyone had committed, thus rendering the increased penalty for repeat offenders inoperable. The very close, non-party-line, 39 to 42 vote by which the House barely defeated the attempt to eliminate the only means of enforcing the prohibition fully, and the 40 to 40 tie vote by which it rejected an amendment to eliminate the enhanced penalty for second and additional offenses confirmed the reality of Wells’s lament that there was no majority for a stronger bill.

On the bill’s final reading, the House passed S.F. 2022 by a large majority of (1A:3, 7A:4-6). On Avenson’s votes, see State of Iowa: 1979: Journal of the House: 1979: Regular Session Sixty-Eighth General Assembly 1:279 (Jan. 19). State of Iowa: 1975: Journal of the House: 1975: Regular Session Sixty-Sixth General Assembly 1:315 (Feb. 14). Three decades later Avenson observed that “in 75 I was the house assistant majority leader and in 79 I was the house democratic leader and in neither case did I use my power to preserve smoking in the house chambers I always respected my members more than that.” Email from Don Avenson to Marc Linder (July 13, 2007). At this late date Avenson no longer recalled having floor managed the bill. Id.

---

67 to 15. Of the 15 No votes 13 were cast by Democrats, 11 or 12 of these dissenters being smokers. In signing the weak bill, which failed to cover public commercial places and empowered owners to permit smoking and smoke virtually anywhere and everywhere, into law, Governor Ray engaged in simultaneous over- and understatement in declaring that it crystallized “‘a realization that people who don’t smoke have a right to breathe fresh air,’” while enabling smokers “‘to find a place.’” In the event, smokers would, for the next 30 years, continue to find quite a few places.

Coming five years after Arizona’s pioneering legislation and in the midst of the initial tumultuous phase of nationwide anti-smoking enactments, the Iowa law covered many more public places than the Arizona statute, but applied to a much narrower universe than the three-year-old MCIAA. In particular, unlike the latter, the Iowa law failed to cover restaurants, retail stores, other commercial establishments, offices, or workplaces. In the end, S.F. 2022 prohibited smoking (subject to the quasi-ubiquitous exception of designated smoking areas from which only elevators were excluded) in the following locations:

Public cultural facilities: indoor theaters, libraries, art museums, concert halls, auditoriums, and other similar facilities open to the public.

Transportation: railroad passenger coaches, buses, and airplanes, and other common carriers.

---

188 Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 2:2044 (Apr. 28). In tracking the progress of S. 2022, a TI senior vice president incorrectly reported to his superiors that the vote had been 65 to 15. Jack Kelly to Company Representatives TI Committee of Counsel Re: Significant Legislative Developments (May 2, 1978), Bates No. 85645146. This error was reproduced in Tobacco Institute, State Legislative Report SLR-78-18, at 1 (May 18, 1978), Bates No. 89781321/2.

189 According to John Patchett, Monroe, Jesse, Woods, Arnould, Dyrland, and Wyckoff were definitely smokers, whereas Horn, Pavich, and Griffee were not. Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Mar. 24, 2007). According to Don Avenson, Baker, Garrison, Miller, Scheelhaase, and Welden smoked. Email from Don Avenson to Marc Linder (July 13, 2007). Lind had smoked, but had stopped by this time, according to his son, Jim Lind. See below.

190 “‘Non-Smoker Must Breathe Fresh Air’...Ray Signs Bill,” DMR, May 9, 1978 (9A:5-6).

191 See above ch. 24.

192 1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 2(1), at 297.

193 1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 2(1), at 297.

194 1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 2(2), at 297.
Waiting rooms: in railroad and bus stations and airports.\textsuperscript{195}

Medical facilities: waiting rooms, rest rooms, lobbies, and hallways of hospitals, clinics, medical laboratories, and other similar facilities.\textsuperscript{196}

Patient care rooms: rooms in health care facilities, hospitals, clinics, or other medical facilities used for patient recuperation or care.\textsuperscript{197}

Government buildings: public buildings owned or controlled by the state of Iowa or its political subdivisions.\textsuperscript{198}

Whereas MCIAA placed some constraints on some owners’ discretion to designate smoking areas in the form of physical barriers and ventilation and the administrative regulations went further in virtually requiring owners who lacked barriers or ventilation to create four-foot spaces between smoking and nonsmoking areas,\textsuperscript{199} S.F. 2022 conferred unbridled discretion on those in custody or control of covered places to enable smokers to continue smoking. In general, the Iowa legislature’s failure to establish an administrative structure for implementing and enforcing its program of public smoking restrictions signaled a lower level of interest in ongoing oversight of this new dimension of active protection of public health. This lack of concern with compliance was clearly reflected in the absence of a provision (such as was contained in MCIAA)\textsuperscript{200} empowering the state Health Board or any affected party to seek an injunction of repeated violations of an owner’s duty to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking....”\textsuperscript{201} The only respect in which the Iowa law exceeded MCIAA in stringency was its requirement that the person in custody or control of a covered facility “who observes smoking in that facility in violation of this Act shall inform the person that smoking is prohibited by law in that facility or that area of the facility,”\textsuperscript{202} whereas owners in Minnesota were required to “ask[ ] smokers to refrain from smoking” only “upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoke....”\textsuperscript{203}

The Iowa measure owed its comparative weakness, especially in the face of

\textsuperscript{195}1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 2(3), at 297, 298.

\textsuperscript{196}1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 2(4), at 297, 298.

\textsuperscript{197}1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 2(5), at 297, 298.

\textsuperscript{198}1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 2(6), at 297, 298.

\textsuperscript{199}See above ch. 24.

\textsuperscript{200}1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 7 subd. 3, at 633, 635.

\textsuperscript{201}1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 6, at 633, 634.

\textsuperscript{202}1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1061, § 5, at 297, 298.

\textsuperscript{203}1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, §6(e), at 633, 634.

2553
the precedent set by its northern neighbor three years earlier, to a number of salient differences between the forces that were responsible for bringing the two pieces of legislation to fruition. The most important difference between the Iowa and Minnesota processes is that Iowa lacked any organization even remotely resembling the single-issue Association for Nonsmokers Rights, which articulated the need for statewide regulation of public smoking, drafted the legislation, enlisted a devoted and highly knowledgeable and intelligent legislator to sponsor the bills, mobilized grass-roots support, savvily launched media and public education campaigns, and systematically lobbied legislators. In particular, Iowa lacked any figure like political science professor and former legislator Edward Brandt, who proposed a legislative strategy to ANSR, wrote the bills, and brought his scholarly analysis, legislative experience, and intense and health-conscious personal objections to exposure to smoke to bear on the process. Unlike the situation in Minnesota, where the Lung Association initiated, financed, and helped staff ANSR, in Iowa no health group appears to have promoted anti-secondhand smoke legislation. The Iowa legislature also lacked a scientifically educated, forceful, and galvanizing figure like Phyllis Kahn, who, while also being chief author of numerous other bills (ranging from decriminalization of prostitution to promotion of bicycling), was personally and patently invested in combating the exposure of nonsmokers to tobacco smoke (as witnessed by her simultaneous feisty leadership of the struggle to ban smoking in her own workplace—the House floor). In contrast, none of the chief legislative sponsors of the Iowa bills in the 1970s appears to have identified her- or himself as closely with or cared as intensely about the issue as Kahn. The only respect in which prospective legislation in Iowa faced fewer obstacles was the absence of coordinated pro-smoking lobbying by powerful industry groups, which may have been a function of the lower threat level posed by the weaker Iowa proposals and less able advocates. And finally, ANSR’s permanent organization, existence, and continuous advocacy of more encompassing legislative amendments and more stringent regulatory intervention throughout the 1980s lacked a counterpart in Iowa, where promotion of more comprehensive legislation was discontinuous, sporadic, unorganized, and dependent on the more or less spontaneous seriatim emergence of individual legislators to carry on the struggle.

Enforcement as an Afterthought

For the first time in the history of the tobacco controversy, the millions of consumers who use the product we grow and manufacture are being brought under the same kind of attack that has been leveled against the industry. Pressure is building to change the role of government from persuader to policeman.\footnote{Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay, Tobacco Associates, 28th Annual Meeting, Raleigh, North Carolina, March 4, 1975, at 2, Bates No. TIMN320981/2 (TI president).}

---

On the eve of the law’s effective date (July 1, 1978), it began to dawn on law enforcement officials as well as on some legislators that S.F. 2022 did “not say how a violator is to be brought before a magistrate” or what a “civil fine” meant. Moreover, Democratic senator Earl Willits, who had supported the bill, conceded that its enforcement provisions were “a little weak, to say the least.” Believing that the law was “generally popular” and that “[m]ost Iowans are law-abiding,” he placed his trust in “good self-enforcement....” As for those who proved unworthy of his trust, Willits “assume[d] they could be charged the same as in a criminal offense,” but “it would not actually be a criminal proceeding,” though “a law officer could issue a citation for an offender to appear before a magistrate.” The Iowa Solicitor General was not sure whether the statute created a civil or criminal process—whether “you file a civil lawsuit and serve the offender” or “have a policeman arrest the violator....” Willits speculated that someone observing a violation might be able to “file a complaint like a criminal preliminary information, perhaps in the nature of a small claim....” Although the general services director of Polk County (whose county seat is Des Moines) said that she would call the sheriff’s office to have any smoking violator removed from the county courthouse, the sheriff’s office had not yet decided what to do if called. And finally, the state Attorney General, Republican Richard Turner, who was expected to issue an opinion the day before the law went into effect, reminded the public that his interpretation of state laws was “just one man’s opinion—and what does he know?”\footnote{Paul Leavitt, “Problem Seen in Enforcing Smoking Curb,” \textit{DMR}, June 28, 1978 (1A:6, 3A:5-6).}

A statewide survey conducted by the \textit{Des Moines Register} a few days after the law had gone into effect revealed widespread (but anecdotal) skepticism by local government officials about enforceability. For example, the Polk County buildings and grounds supervisor, though unsure as to how to handle a violator, was much more certain that attempted enforcement would “be a good way to get a black eye.”\footnote{“Hard to Tell Smoking Law Is in Effect,” \textit{DMR}, July 4, 1978 (12A:1-3 at 3).} Three months later, the attorney general had still not weighed in, but the state’s General Services Director, who was in charge of enforcement in state buildings, insisted that he had never seen anyone smoking in violation at the statehouse (though, interestingly, the Register did not deem it worth mentioning the whereabouts of the designated smoking areas). Asked what he would do if he did witness a violation, he “quipped: ‘I’ve hired a hit man from Chicago—$1,000 a head’ to deal with violators.” Asserting that it did not require an immediate answer, the attorney general assigned a low priority to writing his aforementioned opinion on enforcement, which was further delayed because of a disagreement among his staff as to whether civil or criminal procedures were called for.\footnote{Paul Leavitt, “Problems with Smoking Law Are Few, McCausland Says,” DMR, Sept. 28, 1978 (3V:1-4).}

In fact, Attorney General Turner, who was defeated in the November election, never issued an opinion on the law’s enforcement before he left office, leaving the task to his Democratic successor. Perhaps as a reaction to this delay, in January 1979, Senator Craft (the economics professor who had unsuccessfully moved to eliminate coverage of restaurants and stores) filed an amendatory bill to increase the minimum civil fine for an owner’s failure to post nosmoking signs to $10 for a first violation and $20 for a second violation, while making further violations simple misdemeanors. In addition, the bill would have conferred rulemaking authority on the state transportation department regarding smoking in common carriers and on the general services department regarding all other covered public places.\footnote{S.F. 33 (Jan. 10, 1979, by Craft).} However, the bill died in subcommittee.\footnote{Journal of the Senate: 1979: Regular Session Sixty-Eighth General Assembly 84, 179 (Jan. 10 and 18).}

The focus of the attorney general opinion, issued in March 1979, more than eight months after the law had gone into effect, was on determining whether enforcement was to be effected by way of civil action or criminal punishment. Rejecting purpose and objective sanctions as making criminal punishment distinctive, the newly elected Attorney General, Tom Miller, found it instead in “the intentional use of the formal moral condemnation of the community as an additional feature of the sanction.”\footnote{State of Iowa: 1980: Forty-Third Biennial Report of the Attorney General for the Biennial Period Ending December 31, 1980, at 14-19, at 15 (Mar. 9, 1979). The opinion was co-signed by Solicitor General Mark Schantz, who actually wrote it. Interviews with Mark Schantz, Iowa City (Mar.-Apr. 2007).} As applied to the statute at hand, he concluded that “regulations of smoking in public places do not evince an intent to employ the formal moral condemnation characteristic of criminal punishment. The behavior regulated has not been traditionally regarded as criminal. Smoking per se is not regulated; only the place at which the activity may be conducted is...
Non-Smokers’ Struggle Against Tobacco Smoke Exposure in Iowa, 1970-82

controlled."\footnote{State of Iowa: 1980: Forty-Third Biennial Report of the Attorney General for the Biennial Period Ending December 31, 1980, at 14-19, at 17 (Mar. 9, 1979).} He adhered to this view despite his recognition that most other states that regulated smoking in public places used criminal sanctions; instead, he chose to place greater weight on the fact that the Alaska statute, which also used the term “civil fine,” expressly provided for enforcement only by civil complaint or citation (even though the Iowa law did not).\footnote{State of Iowa: 1980: Forty-Third Biennial Report of the Attorney General for the Biennial Period Ending December 31, 1980, at 14-19, at 18 (Mar. 9, 1979).} Miller then interpreted the statute as requiring that the county attorney pursued the actions for the civil fines because it was his statutory duty to prosecute all proceedings necessary to recover penalties accruing to the state or his county.\footnote{State of Iowa: 1980: Forty-Third Biennial Report of the Attorney General for the Biennial Period Ending December 31, 1980, at 14-19, at 19 (Mar. 9, 1979).} Interestingly, the amendment, which lost 36 to 47, was generally supported by opponents and opposed by supporters of the bill. Miller pointed out that the House had rejected an amendment that would have substituted “conviction,” a criminal term, for “violation,” often associated “unambiguously” with civil procedures.\footnote{Journal of the House: 1978: Regular Session Sixty-Seventh General Assembly 2:2041-42 (Apr. 28) (H-6396).}

Subtly the attorney general perpetuated the tradition of questioning governmental enforceability of the smoking prohibition by “acknowledg[ing] that self-enforcement”—by which he or the reporter presumably meant voluntary or nonsmoker-aided compliance—“remains pivotal to the law’s chance for success, but added that ‘some role can be played’ by the courts.”\footnote{Daniel Pedersen, “Miller Clears Anti-Smokers’ Legal Haze,” DMR, Mar. 10, 1979 (1A:5, at 4A:1).} Within eighteen months of the law’s enactment, it became clear that, regardless of whatever clarity the attorney general’s opinion might have created concerning the proper enforcement procedures to be used, “thousands of Iowans” smoking in defiance of the ban were risking a civil fine, but it was not, in the Register’s view, “much of a risk” because the “police concede they are doing little to stop them.” Since the law had gone into effect, only 18 people had been charged with violating it, all of them pupils in Waterloo public schools who had been caught smoking in school buildings in a mass arrest. That even they had been charged shocked an official of the attorney general’s office who had been unaware of any such actions, though he conceded that it might be necessary to scrutinize the state of enforcement. None of the numerous state and local law enforcement officers contacted by the Register knew of any enforcement efforts, though one “top ranking police type” did confide, under a promise of anonymity: “‘Hell, I’m as guilty as anyone in having broken this law.... Sometimes I have to be reminded that I’m smoking where I shouldn’t be.’” The Register contrasted non-enforcement in Iowa with the “more hard-line approach in cracking down on illegal smokers in other states,” but did report that some Iowa officials warned that with the accumulation of evidence concerning the health consequences, the public might demand not only stricter police enforcement, but also more designated nonsmoking areas, including coverage of restaurants.216

The House Expands the Scope of Its No-Smoking Rule: 1979

Renewed effort was made to limit the exposure to secondhand smoke in the House itself in 1979.217 Two non-smokers, Democrat Craig Walter, a pro-business moderate218—who, ironically, in his later career as a lobbyist, represented the Iowa Restaurant Association and Iowa Lodging Association in opposition to bills to repeal the preemption of local anti-smoking ordinances whose enactment the Tobacco Institute had engineered in 1990219—and moderate Republican John 217Though unable to “recall why an effort was not made to ban smoking in the Chamber during the ’77-’78 term,” Patchett reasoned: “With the ban in effect for committee rooms during that time, we may have just made an assessment that there weren’t enough changes in the makeup of the House to pass the more extensive ban and that we should leave well enough alone.” Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Feb. 18, 2007). From 1975-76 to 1977-78, the Democratic majority shrank from 61 to 59 of 100 seats. Frank Stork and Cynthia Clingan, The Iowa General Assembly: Our Legislative Heritage 1846-1980, at 8 (n.d.). Tobacco lobbyist Charles Wasker claimed that the tobacco industry never cared about internal House/Senate smoking rules. Telephone interview with Charles Wasker, Des Moines (Mar. 30, 2007).

---

216Roger Moore, “Puffing Outlaws Defy Iowa Ban,” DMR, Jan. 2, 1981 (1A:1-3, 10A:2-4). The reference to a call for additional designated nonsmoking areas was based on a misunderstanding of the structure of the law: it provided for no designated nonsmoking areas; all areas were nonsmoking unless those in charge of buildings designated some of them as smoking.

Pelton,\textsuperscript{220} offered an amendment to the House Rules to expand significantly the no-smoking zone to “the chamber of the house except in the perimeter area while the house is in session.”\textsuperscript{221} The House, control of which Republicans had regained (56 to 44),\textsuperscript{222} voted 51 to 39 to adopt the change. Although not strictly along party lines, the vote did reveal a significant divergence: whereas almost two-thirds of Democrats (22-12) voted for the rule (and most of the 12 casting No votes were smokers), only a bare majority of Republicans (29 to 27) did.\textsuperscript{223} The vote was all the more remarkable because Republicans and Democrats, spurred on by the shift in control, were at that time engaged in a titanic struggle over the House rules characterized by perfect party-line votes.\textsuperscript{224} Patchett later characterized the bipartisan proposal as important because “this rule wasn’t ‘procedural’ (all of which are partisan and controlled by the majority party).”\textsuperscript{225} Although the relatively close vote signaled the contentiousness of the issue, Walter later commented that after the ban had gone into effect, he was never subjected to recrimination for having initiated this curtailment of smokers’ freedom to smoke in the chamber.\textsuperscript{226} In 1981, when the Republican-controlled House changed the main no-smoking area from the “chamber” to “on the floor of the house,”\textsuperscript{227} it also defeated, by a non-record roll call vote of 37 to 54, a proposed amendment to relax the ban by introducing this language: “Smoking shall not be permitted on the floor of the House from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. or while the House is in session....”\textsuperscript{228}

---

\textsuperscript{220}Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Feb. 18, 2007).

\textsuperscript{222}Frank Stork and Cynthia Clingan, The Iowa General Assembly: Our Legislative Heritage 1846-1980, at 8 (n.d.).

Former Representative Patchett provided this context for understanding these changes:

The “Chamber” of the House would encompass the entire chamber. The distinction between the Chamber and the “floor” of the House is effectively an artificial one—as they are essentially one and the same. The perimeter of the House has traditionally had “couches” where members and staff could gather, along with certain invited guests. The area of the floor where the members’ desks are located is very crowded. Since the Chamber has a very high ceiling and is quite large, the compromise (necessary to achieve passage) allowed some smoking on the very edge but kept the main part of the Chamber smoke-free. Some smoke might have drifted, but probably not much for those on the floor itself. Most evenings (Monday through Thursday) there would be several members (a handful) who would come back after dinner and do some work, catch up on reading, etc. Since most members do not have offices in the Capitol, it was often the only time to be able to work in relatively moderate quiet. While I wasn’t there in ’81, there were probably enough members who would like to smoke while doing this evening work—and didn’t think it would affect many others since there would be very few people present at that time. But you can see by the results that it did not carry the day.229

The same year anti-smoking advocates in the House and Senate unsuccessfully sought to strengthen the weak clean indoor air act. Democrat Rod Halvorson filed a bill that would have covered food service establishments, but authorized them to permit smoking in one-half of their seating capacity. It would also have facilitated enforcement by: requiring the state public health commissioner to adopt rules to enforce the law; substituting a (criminal) simple misdemeanor penalty for the civil penalty; and distributing one-half of the revenue collected from the fine to the person who contributed information that aided the violator’s conviction.230 But the bill languished in subcommittee for a year, only to be reassigned in 1982 to a second subcommittee and die without further action.231 Leadership’s opposition insured the bill’s demise232 but it was, nevertheless, as Halvorson later interpreted it, “probably...a sign of support...and also a realization that it would take mostly Democrats to pass the bill” that the Republican Judiciary Committee chair Nancy Shimonek reassigned it to a subcommittee with a Democratic majority.233 A similar but somewhat weaker bill that Wells filed in the Senate234 suffered the same fate,235 which the Tobacco Institute scorecard logged as having “died at adjournment.”236

---

229Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Mar. 3, 2007).
230H.F. 644 (Feb. 27, 1981, by Halvorson). The penalty for commission of a simple misdemeanor was a maximum of 30 days in prison and/or a maximum $100 fine. Iowa Code § 903.1.3 (1979). The bill would also have inserted the provision from the 1975 Minnesota law requiring the public health commissioner to adopt rules prohibiting smoking in factories and warehouses where the workers’ close proximity or inadequate ventilation caused hazards detrimental to nonsmoking workers’ health and comfort.
233Email from Rod Halvorson to Marc Linder (Aug. 9, 2007).
236Bates No. TCAL0406489 (May 5, 1982).

Last month [Tobacco Institute President] Sam Chilcote told me he believed the ETS issue, with all its political, social and economic ramifications, posed a greater threat than any other single tobacco issue.¹

By the mid-1980s cigarette manufacturers had become fully aware that the popular and expanding nationwide movement, triggered by cumulative individual and increasingly collective frustration and anger over a lifetime of compelled inhalation of smokers’ tobacco smoke and now fueled by scientific and medical discoveries of the morbid and mortal health consequences of such exposure, was, by means of both legislated restrictions and prohibitions on where smoking could lawfully take place and “social opprobrium,” depressing the incidence and daily consumption of cigarettes.² How successful the cigarette manufacturing companies’ defense of the indefensible was in the face of an increasingly activist and sophisticated anti-smoking movement in Iowa in the mid-1980s is the focus of this chapter.

The Tobacco Industry’s Failed Campaign to Disrupt the Formation of a Scientific Consensus on the Health Consequences of Secondhand Smoke Exposure

Significantly, Defendants were well aware of, and worried about, this issue as early as 1961 when a Philip Morris scientist presented a paper showing that 84% of cigarette smoke was composed of sidestream smoke, and that sidestream smoke contained carcinogens. In addition to understanding, early on, that there was a strong possibility that ETS posed a serious health danger to smokers, Defendants also understood the financial ramifications of such a conclusion...

Despite the fact that Defendants’ own scientists were increasingly persuaded of the ¹William Kloepfer, Jr. [TI senior vice president, public relations] to John Berard and Peter Sparber (May 24, 1984), Bates No. T110411104.

---

²JRN, The ETS Issue: Science and Politics at [3] (May 1987), Bates No. 2023551401/3. This four-page memo may have been written by John (Jack) R. Nelson, who at the time was manager of public affairs research and issues planning at corporate affairs, Philip Morris, Inc., the next month became director of corporate affairs planning, and in 2002 became president for operations and technology of Philip Morris, Inc. Philip Morris Glossary of Names, http://legacy.library.ucsf.edu/glossaries/pm_gloss_n.jsp strength of the research showing the dangers of ETS to nonsmokers, Defendants mounted a comprehensive, coordinated, international effort to undermine and discredit this research. Defendants poured money and resources into establishing a network of interlocking organizations. They identified, trained, and subsidized “friendly” scientists through their Global Consultancy Program, and sponsored symposia all over the world from Vienna to Tokyo to Bermuda to Canada featuring those “friendly” scientists, without revealing their substantial financial ties to Defendants. They conducted a mammoth national and international public relations campaign to criticize and trivialize scientific reports demonstrating the health hazards of ETS to nonsmokers and smokers.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

Defendants still continue to deny the full extent to which ETS can harm nonsmokers and smokers. Some Defendants, such as BATCo, R. J. Reynolds, and Lorillard, flatly deny that secondhand smoke causes disease and other adverse health effects; some, such as Brown & Williamson, claim it’s still “an open question”; and others, such as Philip Morris, say that they don’t take a position and that the public should follow the recommendations of the public health authorities. To this day [2006], no Defendant fully acknowledges that the danger exists.³

How sudden (though by no means discontinuous) the breakthrough in the science of passive smoking beginning about 1980 was can be gauged by the conclusion reached as late as 1979 in the surgeon general’s encyclopedic synthesis of Smoking and Health: “In summary, a substantial proportion of the normal population experiences irritation and annoyance on being exposed to cigarette smoke. The eyes and nose are the areas most sensitive to irritation.... Healthy nonsmokers exposed to cigarette smoke have little or no physiologic response to the smoke, and what response does occur may be due to psychological factors. There probably is a slight reduction in the maximum exercise capacity in older nonsmokers exposed to levels of CO occasionally found in involuntary smoking situations.”⁴ (Although the cigarette companies should have welcomed this almost innocuous conclusion, the day before the report was issued and without even having seen it, the “Tobacco Institute said it is the report, not

³United States v Philip Morris USA, Inc., 449 F.Supp.2d 1, 800-801 (D.D.C. 2006), aff’d, 566 F.3d 1095 (D.C. Cir. 2009). Strictly speaking, the “confidential” 1961 paper, while stating that sidestream smoke constituted 84 percent of cigarette smoke and listing numerous compounds in cigarette smoke identified as carcinogens, did not specifically identify any of them as present in sidestream as distinguished from mainstream smoke. Philip Morris Incorporated, “Tobacco and Health—R&D Approach,” Presentation to R & D Committee by Dr. Helmut Wakeham at 1, 9 (Nov. 15, 1961), Bates No. 2024947172/5/83 smoking, that could be dangerous to your health.”)

Going far beyond the very limited findings on the health impacts of secondhand smoke exposure published in the 1960s and 1970s—and synthesized in the same surgeon general’s report—which focused on the psychomotor effects of carbon monoxide, annoyance to nonsmokers, greater probability of respiratory disease among children of smoking parents, patients with pre-existing coronary artery and chronic lung diseases, and possible allergic reactions to tobacco smoke, the new learning on several scientific fronts radically transformed understanding of the extent and multifaceted nature of the morbidity and mortality caused by involuntary smoking. A landmark study published in March 1980 in the New England Journal of Medicine found that nonsmokers who lived in a house in which smoking was not permitted but for 20 or more years worked in a closed environment where smoking was permitted exhibited not only lower forced mid-expiratory flow rates and forced end-expiratory flow rates than unexposed nonsmokers, but also flow rates not significantly different than those of light smokers and non-inhaling smokers. An accompanying editorial by two members of the National Institutes of Health underscored both the qualitative advance achieved by the study and the gaps that still remained to be filled:

---

6U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Smoking and Health: A Report of the Surgeon General 11-1-11-41 (n.d. [1979]). See also Luther Terry, Jesse Steinfeld, Nicholas Krikes, Stanton Glantz, and Robert Fallat, “Proposition 5, Second-Hand Smoke and the Nonsmoker” (n.p. [1]) (Dec. 27, 1978), Bates No. 503646909/10 (paper written by two former surgeons general and anti-smoking militant Stanton Glantz which identified the same limited scope of health effects of secondhand smoke and also agreed that there was a “right to smoke”).

Until now the case against smoking in the general environment has often been anecdotal, based on annoyances, feelings, and sometimes more objective physical reactions such as eye and nose irritation. ... Because of the inconclusive nature of the evidence, the case against smokers has not been especially strong and the feelings and psychological reactions of smokers are as vehement as those of nonsmokers. But now, for the first time, we have a quantitative measurement of a physical change—a fact that may tip the scales in favor of the nonsmokers.

The question must be asked whether White and Froeb’s new evidence is sufficient to initiate new legislative actions that would further restrict smoking in public places. This is, of course, a difficult and delicate question. On the one hand, the evidence presented is statistically sound and significant; on the other hand, there is no proof as yet that the reported reduction in airways function has any physiological or clinical consequences.9

Less constrained by the norms of science than the demands of profitability, just three days after the article appeared, the senior scientist at Philip Morris informed the company’s research director that it was “an excellent piece of work which could be very damaging to our business.” Characteristically, the scientist knew no better person to initiate the “independent review” by a member of the medical profession needed to craft a “rebuttal” (which, if done by the tobacco industry, “would have little impact”) than Ragnar Rylander,10 the professor whom Philip Morris had been paying for years to churn out whitewashes of the health consequences of smoking.11 Unsurprisingly, the Association for Non-Smokers’ Rights, the organization responsible for passage of the country’s first comprehensive statewide regulation of smoking in public places (the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act),12 promptly hailed the study as “the first indisputable evidence that a steady long-term diet of other people’s smoke causes a measurable dysfunction in the lungs just as damaging as if the passive smoker indulged in smoke.” To be sure, ANSR conceded that the study “does not, however, prove that the smoke in a restaurant or waiting room is anything more than annoying to people who are not allergic to it.”13

Then on virtually the same day in mid-January 1981 Greek and Japanese studies published in two different medical journals finally uncovered

11On Rylander, see above ch. 23.
12See above ch. 24.
13“Study Proves Secondhand Smoke Deadly,” ANSR 8(1):1, 3 (July 1980).
epidemiological evidence of the impact of the numerous carcinogens in secondhand smoke in the form of lung cancer among nonsmokers exposed to spousal smoking. A four-page (retrospective) case-control study by Dimitrios Trichopoulos and colleagues at the University of Athens School of Medicine compared 40 nonsmoking female lung cancer patients and 149 nonsmoking control women with respect to whether and how much their husbands smoked. Compared with the control women, the lung cancer patients were 1.8 times more likely to be married to an ex-smoker, 2.4 times more likely to be married to a man who smoked between 1 and 20 cigarettes a day, and 3.4 times more likely to be married to a man who smoked 21 or more cigarettes a day.\(^\text{14}\)

The most serious limitation that the Greek investigators identified in their study, which was “offered principally to suggest that this issue should be pressed,” was the small number of cases\(^\text{15}\)—a weakness that did not mar the Japanese study, which for that reason bore the brunt of the cigarette oligopoly’s attacks. In a three-page paper published two days later in the British Medical Journal, Takeshi Hirayama, the chief of the epidemiology division of the National Cancer Center Research Institute in Tokyo, set forth the results of a 14-year prospective study of 91,540 nonsmoking housewives aged 40 and over measuring their risks of developing lung cancer according to whether and how much their husbands smoked. With the risk ratio of lung cancer among nonsmoking wives of nonsmoking husbands set at 1.00, that for those of husbands who were either ex-smokers or smokers of 1 to 19 cigarettes a day was 1.61 and that for those of husbands who smoked 20 or more cigarettes daily reach 2.08. Moreover, Hirayama also found that the relative risk of developing lung cancer by passive smoking was almost one-half that among women who smoked.\(^\text{16}\)

In the wake of these explosive findings, the cigarette companies, now more than ever, “[f]earing government regulation to restrict smoking in public places and sensing a decrease in the social acceptability of smoking,...were faced with a major threat to their profits. ... In response,” as Federal District Judge Gladys Kessler concluded a quarter-century later in her massive thousand-page, double-columned judicial opinion skewering the cigarette manufacturers’ decades of lethally profitable racketeering, “Defendants crafted and implemented a broad strategy to undermine and distort the evidence indicting passive smoke as a health hazard. Defendants’ initiatives and public statements with respect to passive smoking attempted to deceive the public, distort the scientific record, avoid adverse findings by government agencies, and forestall indoor air restrictions.

More specifically in the case of Hirayama’s study, the Tobacco Institute launched a media campaign—which succeeded in reaching a huge audience within a very brief period of time—to create the impression that a noted statistician had identified a mathematical error in the paper that invalidated the study. The extent to which the cigarette oligopoly was willing to overreach when its interests were threatened was indicated by the fact that two of the tobacco industry’s own consultants turned against the campaign, stating internally that Hirayama’s study was correct and that the Tobacco Institute had persisted in the campaign knowing that it was correct.

Indeed, by the early 1980s scientists at a Philip Morris laboratory in Germany had themselves confirmed the tumorigenic, morbid, and lethal effects of sidestream smoke on rats—research results that the company, unsurprisingly, preferred destroying rather than publishing.

Despite having survived the Tobacco Institute’s attempted assassination, by itself Hirayama’s study did not immediately persuade even the new surgeon general, C. Everett Koop, who in the preface to his first report on smoking and health (which was devoted to cancer) unequivocally declared that cigarette smoking was “the chief, single, avoidable cause of death in our society and the most important public health issue of our time,” to venture a bolder statement than that: “Although the currently available evidence is not sufficient to conclude that passive or involuntary smoking causes lung cancer in nonsmokers, the evidence does raise concern about a possible serious public health problem.”
In his foreword to the volume, Koop’s boss, Dr. Edward N. Brandt, Jr., the assistant secretary for health in the Department of Health and Human Services—who, ironically, had quit smoking just a year earlier when he assumed his position and later died of lung cancer at age 74—while characterizing the nature of the epidemiological correlation in Hirayama’s study as “unresolved,” nevertheless observed that “for the purpose of preventive medicine, prudence dictates that nonsmokers avoid exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke to the extent possible.” At their press conference on the occasion of releasing the report, too, both Brandt and Koop had urged nonsmokers to avoid inhaling cigarette smoke “even though the link between such passive smoking and cancer is still a matter of scientific debate.” Based on the Greek and Japanese studies, the conclusion of the chapter of the 1982 surgeon general’s report devoted to involuntary smoking and lung cancer reflected the as yet tentative and unsettled state of the science: “The evidence currently available suggests that involuntary smoke exposure may increase the risk of lung cancer in nonsmokers, but limitations in data and study design do not allow a judgment on causality at this time.” But the interest in epidemiological studies remained intense both because the chemical constituents of sidestream smoke were similar to those of mainstream smoke—indeed, in mouse skin assays condensate of the former was more tumorigenic per unit weight—and because the dose-response relationship between voluntary smoking and lung cancer had been established and a threshold

21 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of 22 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of 24 Thomas Maugh, “Edward Brandt, Jr., 74,” LAT, Sept. 5, 2007 (B8) (misleadingly stating that Brandt was a nonsmoker).
25 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of 27 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of for effect had not been established.\textsuperscript{28}

Similarly, the 1984 surgeon general’s report on smoking and chronic obstructive lung disease registered little in the way of robust research findings concerning the impact of involuntary smoke exposure on pulmonary function in normal healthy adults, though children of smoking parents did exhibit increased prevalence of respiratory problems and greater frequency of pneumonia and bronchitis.\textsuperscript{29} But just two years later, the proliferation of epidemiological spousal smoking exposure studies conducted in North America, Asia, and Europe during the five years since the publication of Trichopoulos’s and Hirayama’s pioneering papers enabled the National Resource Council and the surgeon general to issue reports placing their imprimaturs on the crucial finding of a statistically significant increase in the risk of lung cancer among nonsmoking spouses of smokers compared to nonsmoking spouses of nonsmokers—a conclusion that became anticipatorily generalizable since there was “no reason to believe...that the excess risk associated with involuntary smoking is restricted to exposure from spouses.”\textsuperscript{30} The NRC report, which had been undertaken at the request of the Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of Health and Human Services and was published in November 1986, summarily estimated that increased spousal risk, based on the set of new epidemiological studies, at 34 percent.\textsuperscript{31}

A month later, in transmitting to Congress the 1986 surgeon general’s report on \textit{The Health Consequences of Involuntary Smoking}, Secretary of Health and Human Services Dr. Otis Bowen declared that “the judgment can now be made that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke can cause disease, including lung cancer, in nonsmokers.” Based on the evidence in the report Bowen observed that “the choice to smoke should not interfere with the nonsmoker’s choice for an environment free of tobacco smoke,”\textsuperscript{32} while Koop’s direct superior, Dr. Robert Windom, assistant secretary for health, added that “it is clear that actions to protect nonsmokers from ETS exposure not only are warranted but are essential to protect public health.”

\footnotesize

Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

Secretary Bowen’s conclusion that it was “also clear that simple separation of smokers and nonsmokers within the same airspace may reduce but cannot eliminate nonsmoker exposure to environmental tobacco smoke” was of crucial significance for the public regulation of smoking by virtue of rendering scientifically obsolete what by then had become the nationally recognized policy norm of designated smoking areas embedded even in what the 1986 report itself judged to be (with one exception) the most extensive and restrictive statewide public smoking statutes.

Koop himself explicitly underscored the link between science and public

---

35 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of Involuntary Smoking: A Report of the Surgeon General 266-76 (1986). The exception was the Washington Clean Indoor Air Act. Id. at 269, 271-74 (erroneously dating the law to 1983). In 1985 the Washington legislature passed the bill, which banned smoking outright (thus prohibiting the designation of smoking areas) in a number of public places including: the public areas of retail stores; lobbies of financial institutions; office areas and waiting rooms of government buildings; museums; classrooms and lecture halls of schools, colleges, and universities; seating areas and hallways contiguous to them in concert halls, theaters, auditoriums, exhibitions halls, and indoor sports arenas; and hallways of health care facilities. 1985 Wash. Laws ch. 236, §§ 4(a) and (b), at 822, 823-24. These provisions by and large codified smoking bans that the state Board of Health had promulgated as administrative rules in 1975, but without any enforcement mechanism. Wash. Adm. Code. §§ 248-152-030 and 248-152-050 (1975); see above ch. 15. By two votes the Senate in 1985 failed to strike these absolute bans from the bill. Senate Journal—1985—Regular Session Forty Ninth Legislature State of Washington 1:1339-40 (Apr. 15). To be sure, while the bill was before the legislature the Tobacco Institute emphasized that it was less restrictive than the regulation because it permitted owners to designate restaurants in their entirety smoking areas (thus suppressing the fact that the law, unlike the regulation, was backed by penalties). 1985 Wash. Laws ch. 236, § 4(b), at 822, 824; Alexander King to William Buckley, Subject: Washington State Legislative Assessment—No. 3 (Apr. 1, 1985), Bates No. TNWL0002364. The cigarette manufacturers were able to rely on a considerable number of legislators to water down the bill, which had initially contained as Part II the Smoking Pollution Control Act, which required employers of office workplaces to prohibit smoking altogether if any nonsmoking employee objected to smoke and an accommodation satisfactory to all affected nonsmoking employees could not be reached. State of Washington, 49th Legislature, 1985 Regular Session, House Bill No. 62, § 14 (Jan. 18, 1985), Bates No. TNWL0026979/84.
policy by noting that the “scientific case against involuntary smoking as a health risk is more than sufficient to justify appropriate remedial action, and the goal of any remedial action must be to protect the nonsmoker from environmental tobacco smoke.” The kind of action he had in mind transcended both merely separating smokers and nonsmokers and reducing rather than eliminating the exposure. And although he argued that the new smoking policies that the report’s data necessitated “should not be designed to punish the smoker,” Koop insisted that smokers’ “addictive behavior” should not let them off the hook: “it is the smokers’ responsibility to ensure that they do not expose nonsmokers to the potential harmful effects of tobacco smoke.”

The report’s lengthy final chapter on restrictive smoking policies made it clear just how far state laws fell short of the science-based model that would satisfy the goals that the surgeon general had limned. Classifying the statutes into five groups of increasing protectiveness and restrictiveness, Koop’s report found that: 9 states (including two of Iowa’s neighbors, Illinois and Missouri) had enacted no statewide restrictions at all; 8 states had enacted only “nominal” laws, regulating smoking in one to three public places, excluding restaurants and private workplaces; 14 states (including Iowa and neighboring South Dakota) had enacted “basic” laws regulating four or more public places, excluding restaurants and private workplaces; 10 States (including neighboring Wisconsin) had enacted “moderate” laws regulating restaurants but not private workplaces; and 9 states (including Iowa’s neighbors Minnesota and Nebraska) had enacted “extensive” laws regulating private workplaces.

At the press conference accompanying the report’s release Koop predicted that The Health Consequences of Involuntary Smoking would become the same kind of “‘turning point’” that the original 1964 had been. However, the pace at which this new point would turn would greatly exceed that of its predecessor because the intervening two decades had witnessed such an upheaval in scientific understanding of, popular attitudes toward, and governmental restrictions on smoking that by 1986 even the Reagan administration health hierarchy unabashedly favored regulation of public smoking. In contrast, in 1962, shortly after he had announced that he would establish a committee of experts to review comprehensively all data on smoking and health, Surgeon General Luther Terry met with representatives of several health organizations, federal agencies, and the Tobacco Institute at which “it was agreed that the proposed work should be undertaken in two consecutive phases,” the first being an “objective assessment of the nature and magnitude of the health hazard” to be performed by experts, whereas Phase II “[r]ecommendations for action were not to be a part of the Phase I committee’s responsibility.”

---

Demonstrating that in contemplation of the especially strong nail that had just been driven into coffin nails’ coffin the manufacturers of what Koop identified as the “single agent...responsible for approximately 16 percent of all deaths annually in the United States” had become even more desperate and transparently mendacious than they had been in response to the 1964 report, the Tobacco Institute engaged in threadbare character assassination. The New York Times gave it space to spread its contemptible accusation that Koop had placed his “political agenda above scientific integrity.” Revealing that the looming endgame had apparently deprived the producers of the world’s most lethal consumer commodities even of the capacity to recognize that their propaganda served only to mock themselves, the Tobacco Institute risibly charged that: “A comparable example might have been if Carrie Nation, in the years before Prohibition, served as Surgeon General and issued a ‘scientific’ report providing the political ammunition to secure passage of the 18th amendment the Volstead Act.”

For internal consumption only, a few months later an especially aggressive Philip Morris document offered this analysis of the industry’s predicament:

If a thousand more consciously unbiased studies of ETS and disease risk in non-smokers were conducted, these are the best conclusions we could hope for:

39U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Smoking and Health: Report of the Advisory Committee to the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service 8 (n.d. [1964]). Even at the press conference accompanying the report’s release, Terry stated in response to a question as to whether he “anticipate[d] a second committee to recommend legislative executive [sic] action” that at the time he did “not anticipate assembling such a committee.” “Transcript of Press Conference by Surgeon General’s Committee on Smoking and Health” at 9 (Jan. 11, 1964), Bates No. 69000006/15. For the argument that Terry astutely “kept the committee away from the political morass that circled around the tobacco questions,” see Allan Brandt, The Cigarette Century 221 (2007).

40C. Everett Koop, “‘Other People’s Smoke’: Round Two,” NYT, Mar. 15, 1987 (sect. 3, at 12:1-4 at 1-2).

41Scott Stapf, “A Propaganda War Against Cigarettes,” NYT, Jan. 4, 1987 (F2:3-6 at 4-5).
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

1. ETS remains a suspected but unproven cause of disease in exposed populations.
2. ETS studies demonstrating disease risk can be explained by errors inherent in epidemiological research.
3. ETS has not been biologically established as a cause of disease in non-smokers.
   Please note that this is generally what we say (when we’re forced to talk about it) to discount cause and effect [sic] the link between active smoking and disease in smokers. Moreover, this is the best outcome we can expect from scientists. We will never find an unbiased scientist who concludes that ETS exposure has been proven safe for non-smokers.42

The situation, for the exacerbation of which the high-ranking corporate official hesitantly made the industry’s stonewalling in part responsible, both posed dangers to cigarette sales potentially more catastrophic than those created by the gradual disclosure to the public of the health impact on smokers, of which the manufacturers had been aware for years, and left more room for the industry to maneuver—provided that it relied on less transparent and more sophisticated prevarication and intransigence:

There is an analogy to our present situation and the situation the industry faced after the 1964 Surgeon General’s Report linking active smoking to disease. Then we faced a crisis of social acceptability over our product. We faced an anti-smoking movement and laws designated to curb smoking. As the scientific establishment slowly closed ranks against our position, we then sought to gather scientists to rebut the Report. The “controversy” over active smoking and disease soon subsided and we were left isolated on the issue. Since then, the product liability threat has all but silenced us on the active smoking issue outside the courtroom.

What the industry didn’t do in 1964 and the ensuing decades was mount an aggressive public relations campaign to counter the Surgeon General. The Tobacco Institute handled the issue as a “controversy” and the companies did their best to keep the brands out of the battle. Perhaps it was a prudent course considering the litigation we face today and the industry’s slow but steady growth between 1964 and 1982.

However, today the industry is declining and the ETS issue seems unlikely to evoke serious product liability litigation. Indeed, the same scientific uncertainty that keeps anyone from concluding ETS is harmless will also make it very difficult to prove ETS is harmful to any one individual. Low dose exposure is all but impossible to identify as the cause of disease in a specific person. Thus, we have much more operating freedom on the ETS issue than we had on the active smoking issue.

... What we need is an aggressive public relations campaign to:

1. Restore reasonable doubt in the minds of smokers that ETS is harmful to anyone.

---

2. Buttress the belief in smokers that smoking is a right which no government organization or individual is entitled to revoke.

We already possess the basic scientific critique of the ETS research necessary to fuel the campaign. More scientific research will not significantly strengthen this critique and may only add to the fear of smokers on this issue.

Unless we act now to counter this incidence decline, there will be little left to defend of the industry....

The rest of this chapter will examine how effectively anti-smoking advocates in Iowa were able to overcome the cigarette oligopoly’s phony claims and real money.

Jo Ann Zimmerman’s Initiative of 1983-84: House File 248

[S]moking fight[s] in Senate (and state). Boy, have there been some!

The Seventieth General Assembly (1983-84), both of whose houses were controlled by significant Democratic majorities—28 to 22 in the Senate and 60 to 40 in the House—engaged in an important effort to amend an anti-public smoking law that from its inception in 1978 had lagged behind that of the national leader (Minnesota) and had become even more backward during the intervening years as Minnesota made its regime more stringent by means of administrative rule (for example, by requiring restaurants to set aside at least 30 percent of its seating capacity for the nosmoking section) and other states and local governments enacted more rigorous legislation. For example, in 1979 neighboring Nebraska enacted the Nebraska Clean Indoor Air Act, which, in the view of the Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “duplicates and rivals classic Minnesota restrictive law for most restrictive in nation.” By this time, for example, numerous states had already covered the following types of public places that the Iowa law still excluded: educational facilities (20); food stores

---

42Beverly Hannon, [untitled notes] (Feb. 22, 1997), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (1), IWA.
43See above ch. 24.
(11); retail stores (9); restaurants (11); and workplaces (4).48

The primary sponsor of the chief anti-public smoking bill, H.F. 248,49 was first-term Democrat Jo Ann Zimmerman, a registered nurse, health planner, and former smoker,50 who in 1986 would be elected Iowa’s first female lieutenant governor.51 As early as January 7, 1983, more than six weeks before Zimmerman introduced the bill, the Tobacco Institute in its “1983 Legislative Outlook” had classified smoking restriction legislation in Iowa (as well as in 15 other states) in the highest ranked group—“Likely to be Introduced/Even to Pass.”52

Although throughout this discussion the focus remains on legislators, anti-smoking lobbying organizations such as the Iowa branches of the American Lung Association, American Heart Association, and, especially, the American Cancer Society, were, as anti-tobacco militant and state legislator Rod Halvorson put it many years later, an important part of the struggle “all the time.” Not only did they furnish legislators with vital statistics and arguments, but, even more significantly, they provided, through their members and supporters, a “comfort base” in the form of a constituency that enabled individual legislators to pursue a crucial public health objective without appearing to be following some idiosyncratic will-o’-the-wisp.53

Zimmerman later revealed the impetus for the proposed legislation in a newsletter: a future constituent had challenged her to write a bill recognizing the rights of nonsmokers as equal to those of smokers.54 The constituent, who was unable to work in an environment in which people smoked, had made this request when Zimmerman was door knocking in the fall of 1982 during her first campaign for a House seat; persistent, after her election, he called her in December to remind her.55 Filing the bill in 1983 was, accordingly, a rather spontaneous event: Zimmerman’s only cosponsor, James O’Kane, happened to sit behind her in the 48See Tobacco Institute, Smoking Restriction Laws in the Fifty States and the District of Columbia (Jan. 1982), Bates No. 81511773. See also Tobacco Institute, State Activities Division, StateLine (May 18, 1984), Bates No. TIMN0245209.

---

52“1983 Legislative Outlook” (Jan. 7, 1983), Bates No. T103870841/2. Legislation in no state was deemed “Likely to be Introduced/Likely to Pass.”
55Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 29 and 30, 2007).
House chamber, “saw the bill and asked to sign on.”

Where H.F. 248 went beyond the existing statute, it was in large part taken verbatim from the 1975 Minnesota law (although it curiously lacked the latter’s public policy preamble stating its purpose as protecting “the public health, comfort and environment”), but it also adopted several of that law’s most prominent defects. On the other hand, the bill failed to incorporate the more comprehensive coverage that the Minnesota Health Department had grafted onto the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act by means of administrative rules in 1976 and 1980. The bill expanded the universe of covered public places by incorporating workplaces, restaurants, retail stores, offices, other commercial establishments, and educational facilities. Like the Minnesota law, it ignored public health considerations by expressly excluding “a private, enclosed office occupied exclusively by smokers, even though the office may be visited by nonsmokers.” While conferring, like the Minnesota statute, a unique exemption on bars, which alone could be left without any nosmoking area, the bill, like the MCIAA regulations, also limited this exemption by excluding from the definition of “bar” any establishment that provided seating and tables for serving meals to more than 50 people at one time. Also like MCIAA, the bill did not require building owners to do anything to shield nonsmokers from the smoke emanating from designated smoking areas other than to use “existing physical barriers and ventilation systems...to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas”; and as was the case in Minnesota, one-room public places were in compliance if they merely reserved and posted one side of it as a non-smoking area. H.F. 248, which went beyond the Minnesota law by prohibiting designated smoking areas on elevators, adopted that state’s exclusion of 56 Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 29, 2007).

---

57 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 2, at 633.
58 See above ch. 24.
59 H.F. 248, § 1(2) (Feb. 21, 1983).
60 H.F. 248, § 1(4) (Feb. 21, 1983).
61 H.F. 248, § 2(1) (Feb. 21, 1983). Since the Iowa legislature did not empower or direct any agency to promulgate regulations to implement the clean indoor air law (and no enforcement or litigation is known ever to have taken place), the meaning of “one side of a room” was never clarified. Nevertheless, the Iowa legislature can be presumed to have known that the rules adopted by the Minnesota Health Department did not define the statutory term to mean one half of the room, but merely “a contiguous portion of the room, including any seating arrangements.” Minn Code of Agency Rules 7 § 1.442.H (1980). See above ch. 24.
factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces not usually visited by the public as well as MCIAA’s mandate that the bureau of labor establish rules restricting or prohibiting smoking in workplaces in which “close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees.”

From Minnesota the bill also took the imposition on those in control of public places of the responsibility to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking” by “[a]sking smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoker [sic; presumably should be, as in MCIAA, “smoke.”]” As worded, this duty was interpretable as encompassing requests to smokers who were violating the law by smoking in nonsmoking areas, but whose drifting smoke caused nonsmokers discomfort. This result was even more compelling in connection with Zimmerman’s adoption of the Minnesota language requiring proprietors to “[a]rrang[e] seating to provide smoke-free areas” —a much more capacious term than “no-smoking area,” which had to be interpreted to mandate protection for nonsmokers in nonsmoking areas from exposure to smoke drifting from designated smoking areas. And, finally, like the 1980 MCIAA rules, H.F. 248 required those in control of a covered building post signs on all major entrances stating that smoking was prohibited except in designated areas.

H.F. 248 was immediately referred to the State Government Committee, where it languished during the 1983 session. The following year it was assigned to a subcommittee consisting of three anti-smoking militants, Jean Lloyd-Jones, Johnie Hammond, and Darrell Hanson, returned three weeks later to the committee, and made a committee bill. At the committee meeting on February 21, 1983, Zimmerman later recounted that she had “probably agreed to changes and converting it to a Committee Bill.” As a lobbyist for the PTA before being elected, Zimmerman had learned that “bills voted out of committee as a Committee Bill had a greater chance of passing and appeared to have more power than a bill with an individual's name as primary sponsor.”

Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 28, 2007).

63 H.F. 248, § 2(1) (Feb. 21, 1983).
64 H.F. 248, § 3 (Feb. 21, 1983).
22, 1984, H.F. 248 was substituted for H.F. 2140, the bill that Republican Dorothy Carpenter, an assistant minority floor leader, had filed in January banning smoking in food service establishments with a minimum occupied seating capacity of 32, unless a contiguous area of not more than 50 percent of the serving area was designated for smoking and that had been sent to the same subcommittee consisting of Lloyd-Jones, Hammond, and Hanson. The spirit in which the anti-smokers approached the legislative process was captured by a newspaper cartoon included in the minutes depicting two smokers seated inside a jet engine of an airplane, one saying to the other: “You had to ask to sit in the smoking section...” A handwritten annotation below, which appears to have been made by Hammond and alluded to the contemporaneous battle over smoking in the House itself, added: “Imagine where they’ll seat you in the House.” With Lloyd-Jones managing the bill, the committee debated a subcommittee amendment. The “[l]ively discussion” began with an amendment to the amendment by Democrat Emil Pavich—who in 1991 would file a key amendment to the cigarette sales law desired by the cigarette companies to preempt local ordinances—to increase the threshold for bar coverage from 24 to 50 seats, which was adopted. Democrat Eugene Blanshan offered an amendment to 73[House] State Government Committee Minutes (Feb. 22, 1984) (copy furnished by SHSI, DM). The handwriting is very much like Hammond’s signature on the minutes as vice chair.

74Although the subcommittee amendment was not included in the file at the State Archives, an undated amendment to H.F. 248 filed by Lloyd-Jones is preserved, which struck out restaurants and retail stores and inserted verbatim the new section on food service establishments from H.F. 2140; it weakened Carpenter’s bill by raising the threshold level of coverage from 32 to 50 persons. The amendment also deleted H.F. 248’s coverage of one-room public places. House File 248 (n.d., by Lloyd-Jones); SHSI, DM.

76See below ch. 28. His motivations were unclear. According to Iowa legislator Minnette Doderer, Pavich “never does anything controversial...and I don’t know how you can argue with Emil, because he never takes a stand.” “A Political Dialogue: Iowa’s Women Legislators,” Box 1, Folder: Transcripts: Minnette Doderer, Part I at 79 (June 27, 1989), in IWA.
include “church, temple, synagogue, and meeting room” among the public places in which smoking was prohibited, but “Lloyd-Jones resisted Blanshan’s amendment as frivolous,” and he withdrew it. Democrat and smoker Bob Arnould offered an amendment, presumably designed to make enforcement more difficult, by adding a requirement that someone “knowingly” fail to perform a duty, which the committee adopted. In the end, however, the bill gained only 10 ayes, which did not amount to a majority of the committee’s 23 members, even though only six members voted nay.\footnote{Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 28, 2007).}

In trying to reconstruct almost a quarter-century later why her bill had been killed in 1983-84, when her party enjoyed such an impressive majority, Zimmerman noted that in her first month in the House (January 1983) she had already “done” a health bill, for which she had lobbied before being elected, and, despite the leadership’s hesitation to have her “do the whole thing,” dominated the debate, thus suggesting to the powerful speaker of the house, Don Avenson, that she “would be pushing him.” Although she could no longer remember what Avenson had said about the anti-smoking bill, her conclusion was that in 1983-84 “the biggest obstacle was the Senate. If the Senate leaders said they did not want to deal with the smoking issue, then Avenson had to consider what he wanted to get through both the House and Senate, and what it would cost him in chits.” Moreover, even without being able to recall the “machinations” involved in getting H.F. 248 out of committee, Zimmerman observed that: “If Avenson, or another member in leadership said it was dead, leadership/Avenson sometimes told committee chairs not to spend a lot of time on debate in committee as the bill would probably not be scheduled for debate. There are tricks to making something happen outside the purview of leadership—but one always has to look at what chits you spend doing this—especially if you are asking for other things to happen. This bill would have generated a lot of debate.”\footnote{Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 28, 2007).}

\footnote{Email from Meaghan McCarthy, archivist, SHSI, DM (Apr. 4, 2007).} The facts underlying Zimmerman’s observations on Avenson’s House leadership are reconcilable with a somewhat different evaluation by Rod Halvorson, one of Zimmerman’s anti-smoking colleagues, who argued that Avenson—regardless of his having acquiesced in smoking bans in the House itself—had not been a “friend” of the anti-tobacco struggle; rather, dismissing militants such as Halvorson and Johnie Hammond as “purists,” he had often aligned himself with and aided the pro-tobacco policies of Senate Majority Leader Bill Hutchins.79

The Blow-Up Between Cigarette Manufacturers and Iowa Wholesalers

Anti-smoking activists...are campaigning for laws to segregate smokers or to prohibit smoking in various public places. Their campaign is well orchestrated and publicized.
The views of smokers, and of the business people who serve them, have not been nearly as well heard. Often, their opposition arises at the eleventh hour when a law is well on its way to enactment.80

The travails of H.F. 248 coincided with a blow-up between the Tobacco Institute and its Iowa lobbyist, which was not public knowledge and of which Zimmerman was not aware at the time.81 Unlike Representative John Patchett, who during his tenure in the Iowa House from 1973 to 1980 did not perceive tobacco lobbying as prominent, Zimmerman recognized it as soon as she began in 1983 as a major presence, albeit somewhat less so than that mounted by the pharmaceutical and alcohol industries.82 But even Patchett, for whom in retrospect it “makes sense...that the tobacco industry started investing a lot more in Iowa and elsewhere from the early 80s on, given the bigger picture,” knew the tobacco lobbyist George Wilson in the 1970s as “one of the three or four ‘heavy hitters’ I would have thought of—serving multiple, business-oriented, moneyed clients.”83

George A. Wilson, Jr., a Des Moines lawyer and son of the same-named former Iowa governor and U.S. senator, had been a tobacco lobbyist since 1954.84

79 Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 8, 2007). In assessing Halvorson’s account of Avenson’s leadership it is worth noting that after he left the legislature Avenson as a lobbyist has represented Casey’s General Stores, a convenience store chain that may be the single largest seller of cigarettes in Iowa.
http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us.
502111961/6.
81 Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 28, 2007). Lawrence Pope, the Republican House Majority Leader during the 69th General Assembly (1981-1982) and later a tobacco lobbyist in his own right, stated that he had been aware of it.
Telephone interview with Lawrence Pope, Des Moines (May 11, 2007).
82 Telephone interview with Jo Ann Zimmerman, Des Moines (Mar. 28, 2007).
83 Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Mar. 29, 2007).
For some years he was both executive director of the Iowa Association of Tobacco Distributors and legal counsel/lobbyist for the Tobacco Institute, that is, the cigarette manufacturing companies.\(^{85}\) The cooperative relationship between these two organizations began to be stressed in 1982. Crucial to understanding the underpinnings of this fracture was the divergence in legislative priorities: whereas for the Iowa tobacco wholesalers retention of the Unfair Cigarette Sales Act, which set minimum wholesale and retail prices and guaranteed minimum profits,\(^{86}\) was the main thrust and a constant of Wilson’s lobbying on their behalf throughout his career,\(^{87}\) the cigarette companies’ entirely negative agenda entailed vehement opposition to the “The Big Four Issues”—legislation on taxation, smoking restrictions, sampling/advertising, and self-extinguishing cigarettes.\(^{88}\)

\(^{85}\)On the extant Iowa Senate Individual Lobbyist Registration forms from 1976-1978 and 1981 in the Iowa State Archives Wilson listed himself as representing the IATD in each year and the Tobacco Tax Council in the last three (in addition to a variety of non-tobacco clients). Copies furnished by SHSI, DM. No House forms have survived for the years 1976 to 1986. Email from Meaghan McCarthy, SHSI, DM (Apr. 12, 2007). In an interview Wilson claimed that he could not remember whether he had ever represented the Tobacco Institute, adding that he thought that Charles Wasker had. He cagily observed that in any event his tobacco lobbying income all came from the IATD (thus concealing the fact that the Tobacco Institute had funneled his lobbying fees through the IATD). Telephone interview with George A. Wilson, Jr., Des Moines (Apr. 11, 2007); see below. As early as 1978 a Tobacco Institute register of state lobbyists included a handwritten notation that Wilson lobbied for the Tobacco Tax Council, Tobacco Institute, and IATD. State: Lobbyist (Sept. 7, 1978), Bates No. 03678309/10. See also State Activities: TI & TTC Lobbyists (n.d.), Bates No. TCAL0413957; States Where TI & TTC Retain Same Lobbyist: 1978, Bates No. 03678307. A TI document from 1981 also listed Wilson as its and the TTC’s legislative counsel. State Summary (Mar. 1981), Bates No. 03667261/78.

\(^{86}\)“Senate Votes 5-Cent Cigarette Tax Boost,” \textit{DMR}, May 22, 1981 (1A:6, at 3A:1). Opponents such as Senate Democrat George Kinley (a smoker) asked: “Why are we guaranteeing profit to the wholesalers and retailers of cigarettes? What the hell kind of system is this when the Legislature gives an industry a guaranteed profit in the millions?” In response, “[s]upporters claimed price competition on cigarettes would threaten the economic existence of mom-and-pop grocery stores by allowing larger retailers to sell cigarettes at below cost.” Tom Witosky, “Iowa Senate Votes to Raise Minimum Price of Cigarettes,” \textit{DMR}, May 7, 1983 (2A:2). See also “Cigarette Tax Boost Voted; Session Ends,” \textit{DMR}, May 23, 1981 (1A:5, at 3A:1).

\(^{87}\)Telephone interview with George A. Wilson, Des Moines (Apr. 11, 2007).

\(^{88}\)Tobacco Institute, Field Staff Meeting (1985), Bates No. 6805011768/86. For a list of 15 states and several cities with sampling restrictions at the end of the 1980s, see Existing Sampling Bans/Restrictions (Apr. 3, 1989), Bates No. 670845079Y. Without
In September of 1982 Wilson wrote to John Kelly, a Tobacco Institute senior vice president in charge of state activities, regretting the need to ask him to give up a weekend “to help us resolve a possible conflict,” but emphasizing that it was “far better to resolve differences, if any, prior to the time when the legislature meets.” 98\textsuperscript{99} 99\textsuperscript{99} Exactly what conclusions Kelly and Wilson reached is unclear, but in early November, Kelly directed a background memorandum to the Tobacco Institute’s State Activities Policy Committee (copied to many others including Wilson) explaining that in 1981 the Iowa legislature had passed a five-cent cigarette tax increase, which was to sunset automatically in 1983. 99\textsuperscript{100} 100\textsuperscript{100} However, in 1982 the legislature considered making the increase permanent subject to amendments reinstating the state cigarette fair trade law (which IATD vigorously supported), and banning all cigarette sampling (which the cigarette manufacturers vehemently opposed). Because of the controversy sparked by the former amendment, Kelly reported, the whole package failed. The experience nevertheless persuaded “[l]egislative counsel” (i.e., Wilson) and Kelly that the five-cent tax increase proposal would reappear on the legislative agenda in 1983 because the deepest economic depression of the post-World War II period (“downturn in the general economy”) had left the state of Iowa strapped for revenue. Consequently, Kelly proposed a Tobacco Action Network mobilization in Iowa to be scheduled for the time between the election a few days later and the convening of the state legislature in January. 99\textsuperscript{101} 101\textsuperscript{101} By telling them that making the increased tax permanent “would cause hardship on [sic] those” who sold mentioning the more than 1,500 deaths annually caused by fires ignited by cigarettes, a Tobacco Institute senior vice president in a briefing in 1989 to the chairman of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. called the “‘fire-safety’ or ‘accidental fire’ issue...perhaps one of the most difficult we deal with...since careless smoking sometimes plays a role in the tragedy of accidental fire. On the other hand, the passage of one negative bill has the potential of prohibiting the sale of cigarettes completely in that jurisdiction.” Kurt Malmgren, Briefing for Mr. James H. Johnston Chairman R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company at 70 (September 27, 1989), Bates No. TIMN350847/916. On the deaths and the cigarette companies’ efforts to prevent legislation, see Andrew McGuire, “Cigarettes and Fire Deaths,” New York State Journal of Medicine 83(13):1296-98 (Dec. 1983); U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Reducing the Consequences of Smoking: 25 Years of Progress: A Report of the Surgeon General: 1989, at 614 (1989).

98Letter from George A. Wilson to John D. Kelly (Sept. 14, 1982), Bates No. 85704171.
991981 Iowa Laws ch. 43, § 1, at 175 (tax to begin on July 1, 1981 and expire on June 30, 1983).
100TAN Action Request from Jack Kelly to State Activities Policy Committee (Nov. 5, 1982), Bates No. 680580246/7. On TAN, see below this ch.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

cigarettes for a living and those who consumed them\textsuperscript{92} Kelly planned to motivate the industry’s “volunteers” to repeat this message to their state legislators.\textsuperscript{93}

Although there may be a gap in the correspondence between TI and IATD following the November 6 letter in the online collection of the tobacco industry’s internal documents, on December 17, 1982, TI President Samuel Chilcote wrote to IATD President James Gordon (with copies to Wilson and Kelly) to confirm in writing the relationship between the two organizations for 1983:

IATD will continue to assist in the tobacco industry’s government relations and public affairs support programs. Specifically, we ask that you and your members support the efforts of our legislative counsel, Charles Wasker, on matters of mutual concern to The Institute and IATD. In improving our total industry support program in Iowa, we ask also that IATD, for our mutual benefit, continue assisting Roger Sandman, our Area Director, as he expands the reach and impact of the Tobacco Action Network.

In consideration for IATD [sic] continued support of such mutual objectives, IATD will receive a contribution of $10,000.\textsuperscript{94} In addition to your contribution, your Executive Director [Wilson] will be reimbursed on an actual cost basis for travel expenses related to trips outside your State that we may request him to make.\textsuperscript{95}

For Wilson as a legislative consultant the TI budget had provided $5,000 for 1980 and $10,000 for 1981.\textsuperscript{96} The Tobacco Institute’s nationwide list of state lobbyist and association agreements for 1982 specified that the fee for Wilson, retained through IATD and representing both it and the Institute, was $27,000, whereas that for Wasker, retained directly as a lobbyist, was only $3,500.\textsuperscript{96} Thereafter, however, TI’s annual payments to Wasker rose sharply to $20,000 in 1983, $23,000 in 1984, $28,000 in 1985 and 1986, $31,000 in 1987, and $33,000 in

\textsuperscript{92}Sample TAN Volunteer Letter, Bates No. 680580248.
\textsuperscript{93}Sample Letter, Bates No. 680580249.
\textsuperscript{94}Letter from Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. to James Gordon (Dec. 17, 1982), Bates No. 03675845. On the only extant Iowa Senate Individual Lobbyist Registration forms for Wasker between 1976 and 1986—those for 1984-1986—he listed himself as representing the Tobacco Institute. Copies furnished by SHSI, DM. A former TI Midwest regional vice president observed that it was important to keep in mind that Chilcote and Wasker were “best friends,” who had known each other from careers in or representing the distilled spirits industry. Telephone interview with Michael Brozek, Madison, WI (June 5, 2007).
\textsuperscript{95}Schedule B The Tobacco Institute 1981 Budget Legislative Consultants Field Administration-Northern Zone (July 23, 1981), Bates No. TIMS0025149.
\textsuperscript{96}1982 Lobbyists/Association Agreements (May 4, 1982), Bates No. TIMS00026348/9; 1982 Lobbyists/Association Agreements (May 17, 1982), Bates No. 2024077695/6.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

Ten days later Wilson responded to Chilcote, referring to a meeting that TI Vice President Robert Hanrahan had held with Wilson and several IATD officers on December 14 concerning the organizations’ relationship. Claiming that either Chilcote’s letter must have been written before Hanrahan’s report or Hanrahan had failed to communicate to Chilcote the result of the meeting, Wilson noted that what Hanrahan had told them about the relationship generally agreed with the first of the paragraphs quoted above: “However, our committee suggested that the contribution of $10,000 was not acceptable and that if a revision were not made, we would discontinue our relationship with the Tobacco Institute and its programs in the State of Iowa.” In addition to the overriding issue of money, a conflict had emerged between the two organizations concerning legislation. On June 30, 1983, the state’s temporary cigarette tax increase from 13 to 18 cents was going to sunset, but Wilson knew that the legislature, because of the condition of the state treasury, would not allow this automatic repeal to go ahead. In his view, the legislature’s need to consider the cigarette tax created additional problems that would also have to be addressed, including: making the tax permanent or increasing it by some amount; prohibiting sampling of cigarettes; increasing tax on other tobacco products; “[a]s always present, the question of public smoking”; and the Unfair Cigarette Sales Act. Wilson emphasized that UCSA, which, by mandating minimum prices, tended to raise wholesalers’ and retailers’ profits while depressing sales, had, as Chilcote “would expect,” to be “the number one priority of our Association. ... The other items are certainly of concern to us, as they would be to the entire tobacco industry.” In this spirit Wilson then warned Chilcote that: “If our relationship does not continue, you should understand that our primary responsibility will be to correct the problem of the Unfair Cigarette Sales Act, and the Tobacco Institute will assume the responsibility for the other items.”

---

97[Tobacco Institute], State Activities Division, 1986 Proposed Budget (Sept. 18, 1985), Bates No. 680544610/90; [Tobacco Institute], State Activities Division, 1987 Proposed Budget (Sept. 26, 1986), Bates No. 684019007/16; [Tobacco Institute] [untitled] (Dec. 29, 1987), Bates No. TIMS0022453/4.

Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

Chilcote’s reply, a draft of which was dated January 4, 1983 and approved on January 12 (“O.K. by me”) by James R. Cherry, the Lorillard vice president and general counsel, was sent on January 17, and focused on the possible differences in legislative desiderata between the manufacturers and wholesalers/retailers without offering to renegotiate the $10,000 fee that manifestly preoccupied Wilson. Despite claiming that he did not understand IATD’s “‘position,’” Chilcote nevertheless understood IATD’s commitment to maintaining the UCSA and even declared that both sides had “always recognized that, at times, the interest of different parts of the industry will diverge” and “this is one of those times.” In turn, he expected Wilson to understand that the manufacturers’ “first priority has always been and will continue to be the defense of the entire industry against increased tobacco taxes, anti-smoking legislation and attempts to limit the marketing of our products.” Little wonder that years later Wilson remarked that the wholesalers had had their doubts as to whether the cigarette manufacturers had supported UCSA. Chilcote’s admonition should be read in the context of an internal Tobacco Institute document from the end of 1981 in preparation for a joint lobbyists’ meeting before which “all negotiations and arrangements” with individual state lobbyists had to be completed. Although Iowa was ranked in the lowest priority group, its entry did make it a requirement to “review sampling matters with Wilson....” And well the Tobacco Institute might have foreseen a looming conflict since sellers, as Wilson asserted much later, opposed sampling on the grounds that it reduced sales. The Tobacco Institute regarded the Iowa law, which permitted sampling only of packs of four cigarettes,\(^{104}\) as a “de facto ban,” and “the thorn in the ointment in Iowa...and the cause of this law, are the wholesalers who felt they had to curb what they viewed as excessive sampling. This marketing practice was costing wholesalers and retailers a large amount of money, they claimed.\(^{105}\)

Wilson’s lengthy reply shed considerably more light on the conflictual relationship, which allegedly had not existed many years earlier before the Tobacco Institute initiated its policy of having legal representatives in every state. Back then IATD had handled all the tobacco problems, paid for the service, and took any criticism that resulted from the position that it adopted for “the industry as a whole.” In contrast, “[a]s we see what you are doing today,” the position that the manufacturers present to the Iowa legislature “may or may not be a popular issue...in Iowa.” Wilson related that during the 1982 session, the question of sampling had arisen during debate on a bill amending UCSA. IATD tried to defeat the sampling provision, but it nevertheless passed the Senate. Before it was debated in the House, Hanrahan set up a conference call including Wilson, all the manufacturers, and TI representatives: “I was told that if I couldn’t \(^{104}\)The legislature imposed the cap of four in 1974, lowering it from five, which had been set when the law was first enacted. 1939 Iowa Laws ch. 73, § 35, at 102, 118; 1974 Iowa Laws ch. 1116, § 2, at 368, 369.

\(^{105}\)Kurt Malmgren, Briefing for Mr. James H. Johnston Chairman R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company at 63 (Sept. 27, 1989), Bates No. TIMN350847/909.
guarantee that the sampling issue would be deleted, the bill had to be ‘killed.’ In our business as legislative counsel, as you well know, no such guarantee could be given legitimately; and if it were, it would not have been worth the paper it was written on.” The bill passed by a vote of 26-24, but after a motion to reconsider had been adopted, sampling was never mentioned during the renewed discussion, and the bill died because the vote of 25 to 24 lacked a constitutional majority.106

106 Letter from George A. Wilson to Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. at 1 (Jan 24, 1983), Bates No. 85704162. According to the Senate Journal, the bill, S.F. 2299, failed to pass. An amendment by Democrat Arthur Small to do away with sampling passed on a voice vote, but an amendment to repeal UCSA lost 22 to 27; the bill then lost for lack of a constitutional majority 25 to 24. State of Iowa: 1982: Journal of the Senate: 1982: Regular Session Sixty-Ninth General Assembly 1200-1201 (Apr. 14), 1314-15 (Apr. 20), 1991-92 (S-5601, by Small), 2066 (S-5706, by Holden et al.). See also Diane Graham, “Cigarette Price-Fixing Law Survives Veto,” DMR, Apr. 15, 1982 (7A:1); Diane Graham, “Senate Shifts on Cigarette Price Bill,” DMR, Apr. 21, 1982 (2C:3-4). Unfortunately, a quarter-century later Small had no recollection of the events. Telephone interview with Arthur Small, Iowa City (Apr. 8, 2007). Lawrence Pope, who was the Republican House Majority Leader from 1979 to 1982, later characterized Wilson as a “very powerful” lobbyist, who had beaten him on this issue, but when asked to explain the basis of Wilson’s power, he was unable to do so. Telephone interview with Lawrence Pope, Des Moines (May 11, 2007). In considering a bill to make the temporary cigarette tax increase permanent, the Senate Ways and Means Committee had voted to repeal UCSA as proposed by Republican Edgar Holden, but Wilson, who claimed that it was not a price-fixing statute, but merely a prohibition on selling below cost, said his clients would fight it because it would harm small retailers, who could not compete against large-volume retailers. In contrast, Democrat Bob Rush argued that the law was on the books only to benefit 20 tobacco distributors. At the same time, the committee voted to remove all restrictions on free cigarette samples. Against the argument of Republican Jack Hester (who had opposed repeal of UCSA) that all free samples should be banned, supporters asserted that it was “no different than when a store hands out cheese or other food samples to customers.” Diane Graham, “Smokes Bill Puts Industry in a Huff,” DMR, Mar. 31, 1982 (6A:1). TAN undertook an effort to mobilize support against the restriction of handing out samples, offering such pseudo-reasons as that the technique was not designed to encourage non-smokers to smoke and that it provided many jobs for people handing out samples at a time of high unemployment. Letter from Roger Sandman to TAN Volunteer (Apr. 1982), Bates No. 680580272. The much ballyhooed cigarette lobbying juggernaut was far from universally successful on the question of sampling; in fact, its incompetence was at times comic, as described by a TI official: “[M]any times in the past, a sampling bill has been debated in the state capitol, while samplers—at the very same time—have been working the street in front of the capitol. This is absolutely one area where closer coordination between marketing and government relations in essential.” Kurt Malmgren, Briefing for Mr. James H. Johnston Chairman R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company at 59
Having subtly revealed his prowess as a tobacco lobbyist, Wilson then launched into a considerably less subtle lament about the opprobrium associated with that occupation in Iowa, combined with a doubtless unusual disparagement of his client’s product—especially since Wilson himself smoked—calculated, presumably, to justify a wage increase based on the job’s unpleasantness:

Tobacco representation for anyone is not an easy burden to carry. This product does not enjoy a favorable attitude with the majority of our population; and even the people who use it, generally say they would be better off if they didn’t. It is hard to find legislators, possibly outside of the tobacco South, who really want to lead a fight to defend tobacco against taxation, smoking restrictions, and so forth. Cigarettes are not manufactured in this state; tobacco is not grown in this state; tobacco distributors have businesses in this state.

Not because of the popularity of tobacco products, but because distributors provide jobs, pay taxes and have votes, are they able to provide some impact on the legislative process in Iowa.

The Tobacco Institute determined what our services were worth to your organization last year; and in light of what we see happening during this session, we are not prepared to accept anything less.

Wilson had changed his tune considerably since August 1981, when, toeing the party line, he had assured TI’s TAN house organ that: “‘Smoking has to be a courtesy matter. Basically it is something that comes down to a social grace.’”

By 1983, however, since legislators had already begun contacting Wilson about coming tobacco legislation, he wanted the Tobacco Institute to decide quickly whether it wanted the relationship to continue so he could give them “an appropriate response.”

Wilson got neither a quick response nor the additional money he wanted. On February 17, Chilcote wrote back that TI’s position remained unchanged and enclosed the check for $10,000. This exchange appears to have ended four (Sept. 27, 1989), Bates No. TIMN350847/905.

108Letter from George A. Wilson to Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. at 2-3 (Jan 24, 1983), Bates No. 85704162/3-4.

110Letter from George A. Wilson to Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. at 3 (Jan 24, 1983), Bates No. 85704162/4.

112Check from Tobacco Institute to Iowa Association of Tobacco Distributors for days later when Wilson advised Chilcote that IATD’s position also remained unchanged and returned the check. As late as November of that year, however, in transmitting the revised proposed budget for 1984 to the State Activities Policy Committee, Chilcote was still listing $10,000 for 1983 and $5,000 for 1984 for Iowa as a “Contingency” under the item “Contributions to Wholesale Associations.

The break-up with Wilson and IATD was sufficiently important that shortly thereafter, Kelly, TI vice president for state activities, sent a memorandum to the members of the State Activities Policy Committee—consisting of Shephard Pollock, the president and CEO of Philip Morris, Kinsley van Dey, Jr., the president and CEO of Liggett, W. Eugene Ainsworth, Jr., vice president of R.J. Reynolds, Ernest Pepples, the senior vice president and general counsel of Brown & Williamson, and James Cherry, vice president and deputy general counsel of Lorillard—attaching the correspondence with the Institute’s former lobbyist in order to keep them “fully apprised” in case their companies received questions from Iowa wholesalers. Four days later Cherry, in turn, wrote a partly sarcastic memo (“Re: Iowa Lobbyist”), attaching the same correspondence to higher-ups at Lorillard, which merits quotation in full:

You may remember that during last year’s session of the Iowa legislature we discovered our lobbyist, George Wilson, who is also executive director of the state wholesaler association, was trading a cigarette sampling ban for an unfair cigarette sales act. On the eve of a decisive vote, he advised us with brazen candor that his loyalties were not with us. We immediately dispatched Kelly and Flaherty to Iowa and commissioned them to take such measures (any measures, save those involving violations of the local weapons law) as might be necessary: (a) to the demise of the sampling bill; (b) to a guarantee that Wilson would not again have a like opportunity to traffic in our interests. These assignments were accomplished by Jack and Bill, and with a sense of political delicacy (vis-a-vis Wilson and his association) that does them credit. A new lobbyist was hired to represent us, and the funding arrangement with the local association was

$10,000 (Feb. 24, 1983), Bates No. 85704161.

Letter from George A. Wilson to Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. (Feb. 28, 1983), Bates No. 85704159.

Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. to W. E. Ainsworth et al., Re: State Activities Division - 1984 Budget (Nov. 10, 1983), Bates No. 03676534/88. An earlier budget proposal from August did not qualify these sums as a contingency. [No title] (Aug. 1983), Bates No. 2024731043/74. According to these documents Wasker’s lobbyist fee was $20,000 for 1983 and $25,000 (or $23,000) for 1984.

Memorandum from John D. Kelly to State Activities Policy Committee (Mar. 11, 1983), Bates No. 85704158.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

...commensurately adjusted (from $26,000 to $10,000). From that time to this, Sam Chilcote has been struggling manfully to maintain the good will of Wilson and his colleagues, but Wilson has not been making it easy and the attached correspondence reflects that.¹¹⁶

Recipients of the correspondence at Lorillard understood the tricky situation that Wilson had created for the tobacco companies. One jotted down in a comment to Cherry: “Could someone from the mfr group with a special relationship with the Iowa Assn try to act as intermediary—or should we just let the Assn ‘swing in the wind.’ Can they hurt us legislatively? I’ll bet they can.”¹¹⁷

Despite the appearance that TI regretted having lost Wilson (or at least the alliance with the wholesalers), replacing Wilson with Wasker was part of a nationwide plan “to retain lobbyists on direct basis instead of through wholesaler associations,” which it had accomplished in almost all states.¹¹⁸ Despite Wilson’s implausible after-the-fact claim that IATD had monitored but never taken a position or lobbied on anti-smoking laws in order not to dissipate its lobbying strength on other, more important, issues,¹¹⁹ IATD presumably had no rational self-interest in terminating its opposition to anti-public smoking laws, which ¹¹⁶ Memorandum from J. R. Cherry to C. H. Judge, J. R. Ave, and A. J. Stevens (Mar. 15, 1983), Bates No. 03675833. Curtis Judge was TI executive committee chair at the time and the next year became Lorillard’s chairman and CEO; Robert Ave was executive vice president for marketing and future president and CEO; and Arthur Stevens was general counsel. William Flaherty was the president of the Tobacco Tax Counsel. The State Activities Division credited the change of legislative counsel with the defeat of the sampling bill. Report of Tobacco Institute Activities 1982-1983 Confidential, at 18 (Dec. 31, 1982), Bates No. 2015018182/202.

¹¹⁷ Memorandum from J. R. Cherry to C. H. Judge, J. R. Ave, and A. J. Stevens (Mar. 15, 1983), Bates No. 03675833 (handwritten notation dated 3/19). The initials, which are difficult to decipher (EJS?), do not seem to correspond to those of the three named recipients, but might be Stevens’. Another officer, whose response bore an illegible name or initial, also weighed in with a “Fine with me” on the grounds that “Wilson’s now threatening to do what he was already doing.” Memorandum from J. R. Cherry to C. H. Judge, J. R. Ave, and A. J. Stevens (Mar. 15, 1983), Bates No. 85704157 (handwritten notation dated 3/18).

¹¹⁸ Report of Tobacco Institute Activities 1982-1983 Confidential at 18 (Dec. 31, 1982), 2015018182/202. Illinois and North Dakota were the only states in which the shift had not yet been effected.

¹¹⁹ Telephone interview with George A. Wilson, Des Moines (Apr. 11, 2007). When asked whether anti-smoking laws would not reduce smoking and sales, his empirically untenable response was that they did not seem to have had that impact wherever they had been enacted.
appears to have united all sectors of the tobacco industry. Thus, despite the rupture between manufacturers and distributors, and the lack of unified lobbying, Zimmerman’s bill nevertheless died before even reaching the House floor.

The Tobacco Action Network

“It’s hard to get worked up about an infringement of your rights when you realize it’s for your own good.”

The formation of the Tobacco Action Network dated back to 1977 as a reaction to the Tobacco Institute’s perception of a qualitatively new threat to the industry posed by a new initiative by the American Cancer Society. In 1976 the ACS embarked on a program to reduce smoking (Target 5), to promote the enactment of state and local legislation to restrict public smoking and regulate cigarette sales and advertising, and to develop a congressional “anti-smoking caucus” to support similar federal legislation. By February 1977, TI President Horace Kornegay, a former North Carolina congressman, had begun warning friendly audiences that: “The end of the tobacco industry as we know it is not 120The relationship between TI and IATD shrank for some time to such contacts as the inclusion of the former’s congratulatory statements in the latter’s annual convention program. Letter from George A. Wilson to Roger Mozingo (Jan. 25, 1988), Bates No. TII11510646; letter from Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. to George A. Wilson (June 3, 1988), Bates No. TII11510642. Presumably it was restored at some point, since in 1992 Chilcote informed Wilson that TI had decided to discontinue its active support of IATD. Letter from Samuel Chilcote to George A. Wilson (Jan. 30, 1992), Bates No. TI24000065/8, on tobaccodocuments.org. When the relationship was restored, however, is unclear, since as late as 1988 TI did not financially support IATD. Legislative Action Plan: Iowa: HF 327: Cigarette Tax (Feb. 12, 1988), Bates No. TII1LBC011360/3. A TI budget drawn up in August 1992 included nothing for the IA Association of Tobacco & Candy for the 1991 budget, but did include $10,000 for “1991 estimated” and the 1992 budget. Region IV State and Local Lobbyist Evaluation (Aug. 6, 1991), Bates No. TII28841730/64.

---

121William Petroski, “State Office Bans Smoking in Work Areas,” DMR, Mar. 18, 1986 (1M:2) (quoting Hazel Crocker, an employee of the Iowa Department of Human Resources, whose smoking ban had convinced her to quit smoking after 25 years).

unthinkable.” A week later at TI’s annual meeting Kornegay emphasized that whereas previously the Cancer Society had used propaganda and social pressure to induce people to quit smoking, now, in a “new turn of the screw,” it “for the first time...plans to openly lobby to bring about the vast power of government to bear on a matter of personal behavior.” In a bizarre rhetorical self-projection, Kornegay, accusing ACS of adopting the Nazi counter-offensive tactic near the end of World War II, declared that it was seeking to “turn the tide of a losing war against smoking by breaking through our weakened defenses on the Hill with a series of propaganda hearings and media events, in order to bring grassroots pressure on Congress and create ‘a mandate’ for disabling legislation.” In response, Kornegay proposed a three-point “reactive strategy”: (1) resisting and containing the “punitive legislation, especially in Congress”; (2) identifying legislators and interest groups that might oppose ACS’s strategy and involving them in ad hoc coalitions; and (3) in “face-to-face negotiation at the highest level” deterring “corporate leadership” that might be “the motivating force behind the Cancer Society attack on tobacco.” More tentatively he ventured as a fourth step an “initiative strategy...to dramatize our industry’s unmatched record of self-regulation and responsibility.” Listing such past pseudo-actions as ending “cigarette promotion to students” and “technical assistance to the FTC on ‘tar’ and nicotine testing,” Kornegay asked his audience whether 1977 was “the year for a voluntary agreement on a policy of maximum levels of tar and nicotine.” If so, he perorated, the industry would put the final touches on the “drop in the tar and nicotine content of American cigarettes” as “the story of how responsible business operations under the free market mechanism can meet public demand—and the demand of many of its critics—for a product they want.” Oratory like this prompted even Barry Goldwater years later to cry: “Hogwash. I’ve watched the tobacco industry make promise after promise to avoid government oversight for the past 40 years. With every promise, they give an

124 Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay, President[,] The Tobacco Institute Annual Meeting Tampa, Florida at 6 (Feb. 24, 1977), Bates No. TO48625/30.
125 Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay, President[,] The Tobacco Institute Annual Meeting Tampa, Florida at 3 (Feb. 24, 1977), Bates No. TO48625/27.
126 Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay, President[,] The Tobacco Institute Annual Meeting Tampa, Florida at 5 (Feb. 24, 1977), Bates No. TO48625/29.
127 Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay, President[,] The Tobacco Institute Annual Meeting Tampa, Florida at 7-8 (Feb. 24, 1977), Bates No. TO48625/31-32.

2592
inch, grudgingly, and buy enough time to hook another generation.”128

Four months after the Tobacco Institute’s annual meeting, Kornegay presented to the executive committee the “plan to deal with...an unprecedented condition of jeopardy” brought on by “the million dollar Cancer Society attack,” which “[w]e all agreed...would produce more legislative assaults on tobacco and tobacco smokers than we had faced before.” The “fundamental change...in the type of industry representation the Institute provides” involved “a move from the present reactive mode of operation to a calculated pro-active posture.”129 The change in Kornegay’s posturing relevant in the present context was his proposal to create a Tobacco Action Network, or if you will, a grass roots army of supporters in the precincts. Our opponents have taken the battle to the states and localities. This shift poses a double barrel threat to use. On the one hand it increases the likelihood of state and local antismoking legislation. And on the other it erodes our strength on Capitol Hill and encourages parallel Federal anti-smoking legislation.130

Despite its “pro-active” nature, TAN was, according to Kornegay, still merely one of several “defensive measures, imposed on us by a hostile environment,” which could not on their own “supply us with a positive posture, with winning issues....” Nevertheless, it was an indispensable component of the “longterm blueprint for Victory,” which Kornegay assured the executive committee was “in the planning stage....”131 In the meantime, until that Endsieg emerged, TAN would be crucial, as early as January 1978, in—as a pre-Power Point accompanying slide put it—identifying new anti-tobacco legislation and developing a “response capability to anti-smoking activities” by increasing “the effectiveness of state and local activities including the reach of Institute regional staff and independent lobbyists.” By alleviating the problem that the Tobacco Institute was “now spread ‘too thin,’” TAN would help “[i]dentify, locate, assess the attacks” embodied in “[a]nti-smoker group political pressure” and “‘passive smoking’ legislation,” which ominously might diminish the prevalence of smoking and “reduce tobacco industry revenues considerably.”

129 Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay President, The Tobacco Institute at the Executive Committee Meeting June 23, 1977 New York City at [1], Bates No. 03767437.

By 1979, the Tobacco Institute had developed a full-blown libertarian position in defense of a beleaguered minority subjected to discrimination, stigmatization, and criminalization. The chief points of what would soon thereafter be elevated to the status of “[t]he TAN philosophy” were:

that every adult citizen should have the basic right of freedom of choice, whether he or she smokes or not...
that the proper role of government is to inform, to present the facts as they are revealed, and to recognize half-truths and untruths for what they are, so individual citizens can make up their own minds about how they want to live their lives... that government at all levels has already encroached too far in many areas that are best left to individual discretion and personal judgment...and where smoking is concerned, to individual courtesy and consideration... that the issue of smoking is best resolved in a free and natural way, by people among themselves—without resorting to unenforceable legislation that is certain to create ill feelings as it attempts to segregate those who use tobacco.

Once it was operating, TAN also revealed another goal: “In the long range, to help generate a sense of common cause among everyone with pro-tobacco interests, with the ultimate goal of creating a more positive image of tobacco and the tobacco family.” The chairman of the board of Brown & Williamson Tobacco described TAN as “an organization on a state-by-state basis of the friends of tobacco who can be mobilized to generate constituent communications to state legislators and Congressmen.” TAN presented itself to its target audience of “volunteers” as consisting of “concerned citizens like you who believe that personal freedom should be preserved...that there doesn’t have to be a law for everything....” Declaring its objective as opposing “the enactment of restrictive anti-tobacco laws and the imposition of punitive taxation,” TAN insisted that every time it defeated such measures, reining in government growth was synonymous with “retaining that single greatest concept of American liberty—freedom of choice.”\(^{137}\) The Tobacco Institute warned potential volunteers that the impact of the numerous and “unrelenting” critics’ steadily increasing demands for governmental “prohibition, regulation and coercion” would, if successful, have an enormous impact on “your business and your own personal conduct....” If the anti-tobacco groups’ recent legislative successes were left unchecked, “the blind denial of public and private individual rights” and the “destruction” of the tobacco industry would be the result. The contribution that TI expected from a “volunteer” was, in the first instance, informing his state TAN office of any tobacco or smoking question taken up by his local government. In addition to contacting legislators, either on his own initiative or when asked by TAN headquarters, when an anti-tobacco measure was pending, a volunteer could seek support from other groups such as the Chamber of Commerce (whose “members shouldn’t have to enforce anti-smoking laws on their premises”), convention bureau (which “doesn’t want visitors to your community to find they can’t smoke in public places”), and the police (who “shouldn’t waste time enforcing no-smoking laws”).\(^{138}\)

---

To inform employees of tobacco industry businesses (“member[s] of the tobacco family”) of the existence of TAN, TI drafted a letter over Kornegay’s signature reminding them of the “severe attack” to which the industry and its consumers were being subjected and stressing the need to take action to “preserve the industry, protect jobs and defend our individual freedoms as citizens....” After encouraging recipients to volunteer to take part in the new program to “counteract the organized, anti-tobacco movement,” Kornegay revealed the two-way nature of TAN’s communication and action system by pointing out that they would be “alerted to unfair or unreasonable legislative proposals,”\(^{139}\) to which they presumably would be expected to respond by transmitting protest letters prepared by TI.

In light of the enormous and comprehensive lobbying resources that the tobacco industry had been bringing to bear on all legislatures in the United States for years, the insinuation that it had been turned into an underdog by scattered anti-smoking groups was risible. At the same time, however, it is unclear whether the message to the TAN foot soldiers that the struggle over smoking could be conducted without encountering passion among legislators was—especially since so many of the latter either smoked or were involuntarily exposed to tobacco smoke at their workplace, the statehouse—a product of deceit, self-deception, or ignorance. The Illinois/Iowa TAN director articulated this position in 1980: “The public smoking issue is not considered among the high priorities of the state government. Most of our legislators probably don’t have strong feelings one way or another about where and when people may or may not smoke. Such an issue, when considered in the chambers of government, can be defeated when people like you and me express our opposition to these proposals.”

---

\(^{137}\)“Your...Tobacco Action Network” (n.d.), Bates No. TIFL0039746/9.

Although the Tobacco Institute accorded Iowa a relatively high priority with respect to fending off enactment of state smoking restriction laws, the state was rather late in organizing staffing and beginning operations. With George Wilson as its legislative counsel, when Iowa TAN started up in January 1980, eighteen state programs were already operating, some (such as New Jersey and Pennsylvania) having begun as early as August 1978. In February 1980, of 16,554 enrollees nationwide, Iowa reported only 56. But between March 1981 and May 1981, “as the result of a vigorous campaign” by IATD, which “recruited new volunteers from businesses—grocery stores, restaurants, cocktail lounges, shops—where tobacco products are sold and in which anti-smokers want to restrict tobacco usage,” and in particular owing to Wilson’s efforts to get the project underway, Iowa enrollment exploded 14-fold, from 169 to 2,425 (which became its peak figure), while national enrollment rose only 22 percent, from 141An internal TAN document from July 1977 listed the 50 states in five groups of 10 each; 20 states, including Iowa, were asterisked, indicating that no smoking restriction law had been enacted in them. Iowa was ranked third in the second highest group; California was the highest ranked state in the highest ranked group, while Texas (whose legislature was not going to be in session in 1978) was the lowest of the lowest. “States in Order of Priority Tobacco Action Network” (July 15, 1977), Bates No. TIMS0036275 (the Bates number stamped on the document, TIMS0036275, appears to be erroneous).

143Tobacco Action Network, Quarterly Report State Audit (Aug. 31, 1979), Bates No. TIMS0036272 (the stamped Bates number erroneously included three initial zeroes).

144“Iowa TAN Leaders Spread the Message,” TO 6(4):10 (Aug. 1981). The article claimed that Iowa led all other states “in the proportion of enrollees” in TAN, but it failed to specify the denominator.

42,021 to 51,237. However, over the next five years, Iowa TAN enrollment stagnated, while national enrollment rose strongly at least through 1983, before leveling off.

To be sure, TI purported not to be concerned about numbers:

The quality of TAN volunteers is more important to a successful TAN program than the quantity. Recruits should be men and women in key areas who may have important contacts and who will respond promptly to requests for action. Potential TAN members include:

Sales representatives of the TI member companies.

All others receiving their direct livelihood from tobacco-related organizations and industries—other employees of TI member companies, tobacco growers, wholesalers, exporters, warehousemen, vendors, retailers.

All others who benefit from the tobacco industry—employees of TI member subsidiaries, major suppliers to the industry.

Others sympathetic to the industry position—friends of the tobacco industry, civil libertarians, people who enjoy smoking, owners, operators, and employees of businesses adversely affected by legislation that restricts or prohibits smoking.

TI was particularly interested in identifying potential volunteers with “personal relationships with legislators at the municipal level, county level, state level, and national level” who were members in local organizations.

By about 1984, TAN, according to Michael Brozek, the TI Midwest regional vice president in the 1980s, proved to be an ineffective organization and was permitted to dribble out of existence rather than being formally terminated.

Brozek—who by 2007 was a lobbyist in Wisconsin and declared during an interview that “I’m smoke-free now, haha” and that he had omitted all mention of that part of career from his autobiography on his firm’s website—insisted that any legislator with an IQ over 60 knew that TAN letters were mass produced.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

In fact, TAN limped on for several years until TI, goaded by several regional vice presidents, and especially by Brozek himself, tried but ultimately failed to transform it into a more serviceable tool. After four years of fruitless discussions of how to make the tobacco industry’s “primary grassroots vehicle” more effective, the process entered into a more decisive phase in December 1986 when Dennis Dyer, the New England regional vice president, sent a memo to Roger Mozingo, the head of State Activities, observing that “[u]nfortunately” the potential scope and impact of TAN, which had originally been “designed to provide a structure for an industry grassroots counterbalance for the burgeoning anti-tobacco movement,” had been “perverted and ‘oversold’” to the cigarette companies. The result was that TAN was unable to fulfill “any of the expectations” despite “an enormous...support structure and budget.” Dyer concluded that as a “hodgepodge of indifference,” TAN had become a “beemoth” that had “done the State Activities Division’s and the Tobacco Institute’s reputation nothing but harm since its inception.”

Dyer’s memo triggered “frank and serious discussions” about TAN, which prompted the formation of a study committee composed of Mozingo, four of his highest ranking subordinates, as well as Dyer, Brozek, and the Southwest/Great Plains regional vice president, Stan Boman. By the end of 1986, the three regional officials and Walter Woodson, the State Activities communications manager, had formed a subcommittee charged with writing a report on options and recommendations for TAN, which were to be presented to the full committee during a day-long review at the end of January.

Despite Woodson’s admonition that the project was to be “forward-looking,...not a rehash of past mistakes,” the process motivated Brozek and Boman to circulate thrashing critiques of the existing TAN. According to Brozek’s embarrassingly frank confession, TAN had become cumbersome, tedious, expensive and unmanageable due to its sheer size and lack of credibility as a consequence of shifting agendas and underutilization. In short, TAN became an 80,000 name “paper tiger” that staff members laughingly patronized by enrolling the names of friends, relatives and even pets in order to meet imposed “quotas.” These quotas were perfect for impressing Tobacco Institute supervisors, but did nothing to impress legislators.\footnote{Michael Brozek to George Minshew, Re: 12/30/86 Woodson Memorandum Regarding TAN Redesign at 1 (Jan. 13, 1987), Bates No. TI29261787.}

Since the governmental world had also recognized TAN for the sham it was, Brozek continued, the “tobacco industry is ‘perceived’ by state legislatures and state executive branches as having little or no constituency.” Consequently, Brozek brutally concluded, “we can either quit right now or clearly demonstrate that there is a ‘legitimate,’ non-manufactured constituency supporting the tobacco industry in each state.” The chief method that Brozek offered for achieving the goal of insuring that “the legislative and executive branches throughout the United States feel the ‘perception of constituency’ regarding tobacco industry issues” was disaggregating cigarette companies’ state legislative programs into defined issues such as taxes, smoking regulation, sampling, and advertising: “By focusing our operatives by issue, rather than mobilizing our operatives for every issue, we can attain a more motivated and effective local constituent contact effort. … In essence, not a S.W.A.T. Team approach, but a ‘SQUAT’ Team approach (shit or get off the pot). Quite simply put, dump the bad names, maintain the good names, pick your fights by issue....” To be sure, Brozek’s insistence that TAN’s chimerical character did not merely constitute a waste of resources, but actually created the important negative consequence that tobacco lobbyists’ overreliance on the vastly inflated number of TAN activists gave them a “false sense of security”\footnote{Michael Brozek to George Minshew, Re: 12/30/86 Woodson Memorandum Regarding TAN Redesign at 1, 2, 3 (Jan. 13, 1987), Bates No. TI29261787/8/9.} appeared inapplicable to Iowa, where TI’s prize lobbyist, Charles Wasker, was neither gullible enough to take TAN’s Potemkin village for reality nor so lacking in resources that he would have had to resort to make-believe reserve armies of supporters to attain his impressive string of legislative successes. In the end, despite Brozek’s doubtless accurate criticism of TAN, his recommendation to purge the membership lists, focus on primary selective interest groups of member company representatives, wholesalers, and retailers, mobilize only smokers who had been “qualified” through the primary group members, and recruit each group only for specific issues in which they were especially interested\footnote{Michael Brozek to George Minshew, Re: 12/30/86 Woodson Memorandum Regarding TAN Redesign at 1, 2, 3 (Jan. 13, 1987), Bates No. TI29261787/8/9.} was hardly designed to forge a “grassroots” organization that could plausibly have been regarded as a match for the proliferating mass anti-tobacco movement, especially since the advent of the scientific underpinnings of the resistance to secondhand smoke exposure.

Three days later Boman, reacting to Brozek’s blast, went him one better by charging that TAN, having been “ill-conceived...from its inception,” had “become an unwieldy and largely useless monstrosity.” His suggestions, too, amounted to little more than “streamlin[ing] the grassroots program.”

The memorandum drafted by the four-member Grassroots Program Subcommittee presented a minimalist approach culminating in the elimination of “the polite fiction that TAN has a useful membership of 85,000”—although an “activist response rate of 5-10 percent is exceptional on any issue,”—and the more “efficient mobilization of a limited quantity of known activists” generating “much better percentages” in the 90-percent range. That the revamped TAN was in no sense a “respon[se] in kind to anti-tobacco grassroots efforts,” but merely an attempt to manufacture greater verisimilitude of “evidence of popular support for industry perspectives to a variety of legislative audiences” was disclosed by the admission that all that would be accomplished under the new program was a demonstration that a “relatively small cadre of well-educated, motivated activists can be managed to handle our response needs...to the wide variety of anti-tobacco legislation.”

Already at the Tobacco Institute board of directors’ winter meeting in February 1987, Mozingo announced that State Activities had “completed a thorough review and reorganization of this program...previously known as TAN, or the Tobacco Action Network,” which had resulted in “strengthening our relationship with...tobacco family allies...and establishing realistic expectations of assistance from the tobacco family elements.” After having carefully avoided spelling out for the cigarette company overseers that those new expectations would be lowered, Mozingo let the oxymoronic cat out of the bag about how TI manufactured “public support for tobacco positions”: “While we must have top-to-bottom industry grassroots support for our issues, it is clear that the tobacco grassroots element—apart from actual smokers which you gentlemen are successfully tapping—is a very limited universe.” In order to free itself from the narrow confines of simulating and choreographing “grassroots” contacts by the small number of cigarette company sales staff, wholesalers, and retailers, TI was forced to “expand our general ally and coalition programs” to animate support from chambers of commerce, labor union leaders, hotel/motel association executives, restaurant owners, grocers, bowling alley owners, police and fire officials, and minority group members.

---

158 Grassroots Program Subcommittee (Boman, Brozek, Dyer, Woodson) to Roger Mozingo, Draft Memorandum at 1, 2, 19 (Feb. 6, 1987), Bates No. TIOK0023570/1/8.

159 Grassroots Program Subcommittee (Boman, Brozek, Dyer, Woodson) to Roger Mozingo, Draft Memorandum at 3, 4 (Feb. 6, 1987), Bates No. TIOK0023570/2/3.

The stripped-down version of TAN, designed to “generate popular...support for industry positions” that emerged from the review process was fleshed out in guidelines that TI issued in August 1987 following a field staff meeting. Although it was clear that TAN’s total membership of 85,000 was a “fiction,” even the subset of 17,000 “activists” “may also be inflated”: each region was charged with identifying the “real” ones—“a relatively small, but dedicated cadre of activists drawn primarily from member companies’ sales forces”—and “discard[ing] the names of those who are unwilling to help consistently on our issues.” In this overoptimistic view, the term itself would allegedly become “redundant” by the end of the “activist identification process” when “TAN members will, by definition, be activists, or they will be discarded from the TAN rolls.”

The best that Brozek was able to say about TAN after he had “revamped and reconstituted” his region’s “activist resource list” in early 1988 was that it was now “categorized by issues and motivation in order to maximize credibility on the state legislative district level.” TI’s 1989 strategic plan boasted that through TAN and its list of individual smokers and activists it could effectively reach a wide audience, but whether the claim was true and, more importantly, if true, whether such a duly informed audience could decisively influence legislators, appears doubtful. By 1992, Kurt Malmgren, the head of the State Activities Division, testified at a deposition that TAN was “not used very much anymore.” By 1993 TAN’s budget had been reduced to $25,000.
The Next Abortive Effort: House File 102 in 1985-86

Here is another bill that the good ole boys had fun with—jerking me around, HF102, smoking in public places.\textsuperscript{166}

In contrast to the unplanned process that prompted Zimmerman to file the anti-smoking bill in 1983, she noted many years later that:

By 1985, I had spoken to many businesses about what Pepsico had done in their wellness campaign to decrease smoking by employees—and discovering how much money they saved on illnesses attributable to tobacco smoking, lost time as smokers take more breaks and do not statistically complete as much work as nonsmokers, plus Pepsico discovered they cleaned the windows less often in nonsmoking offices, dry cleaned the drapes less often and painted the walls less often in nonsmoking offices. I had begun to gain business support for the bill. I had an intern helping me (a nurse if I remember) make calls to businesses to gain support. We concentrated on businesses whose leaders were on governing Boards of organizations which had registered against the bill.\textsuperscript{167}

Undaunted by the orchestrated death of H.F. 248 two years earlier, Zimmerman, who had become intent on reducing tobacco in the environment, regarded the measure as beginning “the process of cracking down on smoking in the work place.”\textsuperscript{168} She filed a very similar bill in the 71st General Assembly (1985-86), both of whose houses Democrats controlled by almost identical majorities to those in the previous legislative period (60 to 40 in the House and 29 to 21 in the Senate). H.F. 102, which 12 Republican and 9 Democratic cosponsors filed with her at the beginning of the first session,\textsuperscript{169} differed from the previous version in a number of disparate respects. While making it clear that it covered “all” retail stores, offices, and other commercial establishments, it added exclusions for residential rooms for students and others at educational institutions, and each resident’s room at a health care facility, but also lowered

\textsuperscript{165}Tobacco Institute 1994 Budget (Nov. 12, 1993), Bates No. 93797932/95.
\textsuperscript{166}Beverly Hannon [untitled note for IWA] (Oct. 16, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (3), IWA.
\textsuperscript{167}Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 29, 2007).
\textsuperscript{168}Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 29, 2007).
\textsuperscript{169}H.F. 102 (Jan. 28, 1985, by Zimmerman).
the exemption level for bars from serving meals to 50 to 32 people at one time.\textsuperscript{170} Finally, deterrence was increased by subjecting to the civil fine—which was changed from a minimum of five dollars to a maximum of $100—the owner of a public place who knew about a person smoking in a nosmoking area but failed to advise that person of the prohibition.\textsuperscript{171}

By 1985-86, a coalition of organizations had formed to work toward an Iowa Clean Air Act.\textsuperscript{172} To be sure, even at this point, Zimmerman’s bill did not even remotely create equal rights for nonsmokers and smokers since, except on elevators, smokers’ right to smoke always trumped nonsmokers’ right to breathe clean air by virtue of the bill’s permitting the creation of unimpeded juxtaposition of smoking and nonsmoking areas. (Indeed, in 1979, the Virginia Supreme Court held that a city ordinance that made it unlawful to smoke in a restaurant except in designated smoking areas and that the city enforced by permitting one table to be designated as nonsmoking was an unconstitutional exercise of the police power because the means it used were not reasonably suited to achieving the legislature’s goal of protecting nonsmokers from toxic smoke: “If smoke exhaled in such an environment is toxic, its harmful effects are ambient. Yet, the ordinance requires posting a sign which leads the non-smoking diner to expect that the place he has chosen to patronize is a wholly protected environment. By relying on the sign, he will be exposed to ‘the toxic effect’ from which the ordinance purports to protect him. Hence, these requirements tend to defeat the very legislative purpose the ordinance is supposed to promote.”)\textsuperscript{173} Nor was Zimmerman unaware of the bill’s limitations. In filing the new bill at the end of January 1985, Zimmerman, supported by a coalition of Iowa health groups, conceded that the new proposal was “only a partial step,” which “wouldn’t ban smoking in offices and other areas, such as a strict no-smoking ordinance approved in San Francisco last year. She said the state eventually should take that step also. If Americans quit smoking and changed their diet and exercise patterns \textsuperscript{170}H.F. 102, §§ 1-2 (Jan. 28, 1985). Curiously, the bill also modified the language of H.F. 248 and MCJAA from requiring owners to “ask[ ] smokers to refrain from smoking upon request of a client or employee suffering discomfort from the smoker [sic]” to a “person claiming discomfort from the smoke.” H.F. 102, § 3 (Jan. 28, 1985).

\textsuperscript{171}H.F. 102, § 6 (Jan. 28, 1985).

\textsuperscript{172}Press Release, Newsletter (Jan. 24, 1986), in Jo Ann Zimmerman Papers, Box 2, Folder: Political Career, Iowa House of Representatives, Newsletter, 1983-1986, IWA.

\textsuperscript{173}Alford v. City of Newport News, 220 Va. 584, 586 (1979). The restaurant owner was represented by Charles Morgan, Jr., a former civil rights lawyer associated with the Tobacco Institute. It is unclear why the court’s logic failed to prompt successful litigation to invalidate similar ordinances and laws in other states.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

‘we could cut health care costs in half....’”\(^{174}\) (In his January 1985 budget message, Republican Governor Terry Branstad—who, under prodding from his wife, had banned smoking in the governor’s mansion, making his own mother walk outside to smoke\(^{175}\)—requested an increase in the state cigarette tax to equalize a reduction in the federal tax on the grounds that: “Smoking does not need to be made more attractive.” But since he expressly observed that the resulting cost of cigarettes to the consumer would not increase, the anti-smoking impact was null.)\(^{176}\) Conspicuously missing from the Iowa Clean Indoor Air Coalition, which was composed of a dozen health-related organizations such as the Iowa affiliates of the American Cancer Society, American Lung Association, and American Heart Association,\(^{177}\) was the Iowa Hospital Association. Instead, Zimmerman noted years later, it joined the Tobacco Institute, the hotel and restaurant industry, and the Iowa Association of Business and Industry as registered lobbyists against Zimmerman’s bill on the grounds that its members “should not be forced to make patients...quit smoking in the hospital.”\(^{178}\)

Two weeks later—in the interim, Democrat James Wells, the anti-smoking stalwart in the House who had become a senator, and planned to ask the Senate Rules Committee “to force his smoking colleagues to sit in the back row of the...Senate,”\(^{179}\) had filed an identical bill in the Senate\(^{180}\)—the House Committee \(^{174}\)“Anti-Smokers Promote Bill to Curb Puffing,” DMR, Jan. 30, 1985 (2A:1), in Jo Ann Zimmerman Papers, Box 2, Folder: Political Career, Iowa House of Representatives, Newspaper Clippings, Miscellaneous, 1985, IWA. The San Francisco ordinance, which went into effect on July 4, 1983, attracted considerable media attention, although it was not the first or strongest such local law; it required office workplaces to institute smoking policies that accommodated both smokers’ and nonsmokers’ needs, but mandated a smokefree work area where the accommodation was not acceptable to nonsmokers. Wallace Turner, “Smoking at Office Restricted by a New San Francisco Law,” NYT, June 4, 1983 (9); Stanton Glantz and Edith Balbach, Tobacco War: Inside the California Battles 22-23 (2000).

\(^{175}\)Telephone interview with Terry Branstad, Des Moines (July 2, 2007). In the late 1970s, his wife had informed him that she was also banning smoking in their house; as a result his mother stopped visiting them for years. Id.

\(^{177}\)“New Bill May Expand Public Puffing Bar,” Shoppers, Feb. 6, 1985, in Jo Ann Zimmerman Papers, Box 2, Folder: Political Career, Iowa House of Representatives, Newspaper Clippings, Miscellaneous, 1985, IWA.

\(^{178}\)Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 30, 2007).

\(^{179}\)“New Bill May Expand Public Puffing Bar,” Shoppers, Feb. 6, 1985, in Jo Ann Zimmerman Papers, Box 2, Folder: Political Career, Iowa House of Representatives, on State Government recommended passage of the bill as amended by the committee, whose chair and vice-chair were anti-smoking activists, Jean Lloyd-Jones and Johnie Hammond, Democratic women representing the university towns of Iowa City and Ames, respectively. The committee, by a vote of 16 to 2, “toned down” the bill by proposing two major changes. First, instead of following the 1975 Minnesota statute in requiring the bureau of labor and public health commissioner to issue rules restricting or prohibiting smoking in factories and warehouses “where the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees,” the committee amendment merely mandated that employee cafeterias in such locations have designated nosmoking areas; and second, it halved the maximum civil fine (now renamed a “penalty”) from $100 to $50. Uncritically imbuing blue-collar workplaces with the attribute “private,” even Iowa City liberal Democrat Minnette Doderer favored deleting both the Minnesota language and subcommittee’s addition of cafeterias, thus excluding factories and warehouses altogether, on the grounds that: “I don’t think we can get into all the private places in the state.... We have an obligation on public places.” But her motion failed by a vote of 13 to 7.

Apart from individual members’ filing numerous amendments, the House took no further action on the bill in 1985 before adjournment. Many of the amendments were designed to weaken it by exempting certain public places such as as beauty salons, businesses operated only by the owner, the public areas of bus terminals, of airport terminals, and of railroad depots, barber shops, and—the most likely to succeed—restaurants with a seating capacity of fewer than 32 persons, and retail stores and offices with less than 200 square feet of floor space. The amendment least likely to be adopted was filed by Democrat Johnie Hammond and Republican Darrell Hanson, two of the bill’s strongest supporters: it added to the monetary fine for smoking in a non-smoking area the penalty of “death on a pyre of smoldering cigarettes.” Nor was passage its purpose. As Hammond explained two decades later: “One year the opponents used the strategy of piling on so many amendments that leadership would not take the time to debate them. So I added my own amendment: the penalty for violating the Clean Indoor Air Act was ‘death on a pyre of smoldering cigarettes.’”

---

Newspaper Clippings, Miscellaneous, 1985, IWA.

In 1985 the Democratic-controlled House took a major step toward a complete smoking ban in its own space. The rules resolution extended the scope of the ban by deleting the exception for the perimeter and simply prohibiting smoking “on the floor of the house while the house is in session.” Immediately two unsuccessful attempts were made to roll back the proposed extension. Democrat Jack Woods, a smoker, argued for retention of the old rule; pointing out that Speaker Don Avenson smoked, he joked: “If he gets out of the chair, comes down and lights up, the sergeant-at-arms is going to have to grab him and say, “Book him.” Woods sought to reintroduce the exception for the “perimeter

---

188 H-3234 (Mar. 5, 1985, by Pavich).
191 H-3292 (Mar. 8, 1985, by Tabor).
192 H-3291 (Mar. 8, 1985, by Tabor).
193 H-3502 (Mar. 27, 1985, by Paulin).
194 H-3323 (Mar 12, 1985, by Hammond and Hanson).
195 Email from Johnie Hammond to Marc Linder (Feb. 21, 2006). Zimmerman offered an alternative exegesis: “When we got upset with the guys trying to control everything, and excluding us, we piqued them with these kind[s] of things.” Email from Jo Ann Zimmerman to Marc Linder (Mar. 29, 2007).
196 House Resolution 4, at 17 (Rule 50) (Jan. 15, 1985).
197 Dewey Knudson, “Iowa House Cuts the Air with Wide Ban on Smoking,” DMR, Feb. 16, 1985 (2A:1-2). In fact, according to ex-Senator Beverly Hannon, Avenson’s willingness not to seek to impose his personal preferences on the House distinguished him from Senate Majority Leader Hutchins: “The House even voted itself non-smoking with Avenson, the Speaker, a smoker. He was a different kind of cat than the Senate area,” but his amendment lost on a non-record roll call vote by 34 to 48.198 The other amendment, offered by Democrat Tom Jochum, a heavy smoker, would have created an exception for “benches along the south walls,” but it too lost.199 This proposal to permit smoking along the chamber’s back wall ran into opposition from one of the occupants of a back row seat, Lloyd-Jones, who found it “particularly offensive to have smokers at the south wall blowing smoke at us.”199 After opponents’ rearguard actions had been defeated, anti-smokers seized the initiative to expand the ban beyond the scope of the rules resolution. Democrat Clay Spear asked and answered his own rhetorical question: “Is it fair that members of the Fourth Estate [the press] smoke while we are prohibited from smoking? ... What’s fair for us should be fair for those at the speaker’s station and those in the press box.”201 The House then adopted his amendment to include those two locations within the ban.202 The very sharp debate revealed deep animosities between smokers and nonsmokers. Republican Kyle Hummel—who had smoked three packs of unfiltered Camels from time he entered the military in 1953 until 1981203 and had voted against the ban on smoking in the House
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

199 Journal of the House: 1985: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 458 (Feb. 15) (H-3013). That Jochum was still a heavy smoker in 2007 was confirmed by email from a former legislator who requested anonymity to Marc Linder (July 13, 2007).

200 Dewey Knudson, “Iowa House Clears the Air with Wide Ban on Smoking,” DMR, Feb. 16, 1985 (2A:1-2). The otherwise informative article mistakenly asserted that the expanded ban meant that smoking in the House had “gasped its last” by including “puffers’ last retreats,” whereas in fact a total ban was not imposed until 1993.

203 Telephone interview with Kyle Hummel, Vinton, IA (June 26, 2007). Hummel quit smoking on Dec. 1, 1981, both because it was too much trouble to reach agreement with people on where he could smoke and because he recognized the health hazards. Neither his parents nor any of his eight siblings smoked; in part he began smoking in the military because during marches soldiers were given a ten-minute break every hour and if an officer saw that soldiers were not sitting and smoking, he would order them to perform tasks. The incentive structure that Hummel experienced was not unique: a former marine reported that in the late 1960s marines who did not smoke during smoking breaks were required to do sit-ups. Telephone interview with Jim Witkowski (Minnesota Health Dept.), St. Paul.
Chamber in 1979—lambasted his colleagues’ “sanctimonious attitude”; turning reality on its head, he charged that the expanded ban was tantamount to telling smokers to leave the House chamber: “We not only are not encouraging them to take part in the process. We are telling them to get out of the room.” Zimmerman pointed to the dangers of secondhand smoke exposure, while Republican Ray Lageschulte stressed that no one had the right to pollute the air for anyone else. Reflecting smokers’ weight in the leadership, Democrat Minnette Doderer, a self-confessed “temporarily...ex-smoker,” observed that: “Some mighty important people in both caucuses smoke, and if they get mad at us, we are in trouble.” Finally, a frustrated smoker, Democrat Gary Sherzan, chiding his colleagues for having “become fond of regulating other people’s behavior,” added that if what they really wanted to do was outlaw cigarettes, they should go ahead and do it.

In the interim between the 1985 and 1986 sessions, Brozek, TI’s Midwest regional vice president, informed headquarters that even during the legislative recess, “Iowa media has become extremely active with increasing coverage of anti-smoking activities. It is the opinion of our legislative counsel that our industry will face two major issues: statewide smoking restriction and the potential of a cigarette liability bill.” In addition, he noted, if coupled with such limitations on smoking, a bill banning the handing out of free samples “may become a part of a complete and comprehensive anti-smoking package.” Brozek expressed this concern despite having already reported to Washington that Iowa lacked such local grassroots organizations as a Group Against Smoking Pollution (GASP) or Association for Nonsmokers Rights (ANSR) branch.
Consequently, the American Lung Association of Iowa referred any calls it received about these groups to their offices in Colorado and Minnesota, respectively.\textsuperscript{208}

Interestingly, in spite of Iowa’s backward and stagnant anti-public smoking law—in the mid-1980s (and until 2008) it was still less comprehensive than Minnesota’s original 1975 statute—at the end of 1985 TI despaired that: “Of the six states in Region IV, Iowa is the least reliable in garnering support of tobacco segments. Its wholesaler association, notwithstanding recent overtures by TI staff...has not been responsive to general tobacco legislative concerns. It can be said that if a choice came to a vote on the state’s minimum mark-up law or an increase in the state’s cigarette excise tax, the wholesaler association’s choice would be no surprise [namely, for the mark-up law].”\textsuperscript{209}

However, H.F. 102 had not died, and at the beginning of the 1986 session, by a vote of 14 to 1,\textsuperscript{210} the House State Government Committee once again recommended its passage, this time subject to a different set of amendments.\textsuperscript{211} The principal changes included: (1) a requirement that educational and health care facilities “provide a sufficient number of rooms in which smoking is not permitted to accommodate all persons who desire such rooms”; and (2) deletion of the penalty imposed on public place proprietors who knew that someone was smoking in a nosmoking area and failed to advise the smoker of the prohibition.\textsuperscript{212} (Despite the deletion, opponents of the bill nevertheless faulted the bill on the House floor on the grounds that even asking customers to stop smoking or remain in designated smoking areas would not “help business.”)\textsuperscript{213}

---

\textsuperscript{208}Michael Brozek to Hurst Marshall, Re: GASP (June 26, 1985), Bates No. TITX0037767.

\textsuperscript{209}Tobacco Institute, Iowa: A State Analysis at 3 (Dec. 1985), Bates No. 505091164/7.

\textsuperscript{211}Journal of the House: 1986: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 90 (Jan. 16).

\textsuperscript{212}H-5009 (Jan. 16, 1986, by State Government Committee).

Now that Zimmerman’s bill after four years had finally made it to the House floor, a wildly exaggerated account of its scope and efficacy in the Des Moines Register declared that under this “‘equal rights bill’ for non-smokers” “smokers would be unwelcome in most public places and meetings or would be shunted off into designated smoking areas,” and fines would be imposed on “[r]enegade smokers....” Although the article quoted Hammond, who was “‘concerned about shoppers,’” as stating that “large areas of shopping malls would be included as nosmoking areas,” in fact neither H.F. 102 nor any later Iowa law (until 2008) did any more than leave it up to those in charge of public places (except elevators) to decide how to apportion the floor space between smokers and nonsmokers without imposing on proprietors any duty to insure that nonsmokers’ air space was not polluted by smoke drifting from one area to the other. In that sense Hammond (unintentionally and unknowingly) identified one of the scheme’s central flaws in praising it as “designed to be as simple and low-cost as possible for businesses and institutions charged with enacting it.” And although she may have been technically correct in asserting that the bill was “modeled after nosmoking laws in Minnesota,” she failed to mention that Minnesota’s implementing Health Department regulations, while far from stringent, at least potentially offered considerably more protection from secondhand smoke to nonsmokers than the bare Iowa statute—never supplemented by regulations—ever would.

A week later, on January 23, when the House took up H.F. 102, Hammond offered the committee amendment, to which, in turn, Republican farmer Hugo Schnekloth offered an amendment expanding the universe of “public places” to include churches and exclude bathrooms. Going much further with what was presumably designed as a killer amendment, he proposed changes that would have eliminated designated smoking areas, thus making public places nonsmoking, while at the same time also both eliminating proprietors’ duties except for posting nosmoking signs and retaining the 1978 statute’s first-violation penalty of five dollars. The House adopted the inclusion of churches (and thus possibly the... innovation of designated smoking areas therein), but on a non-record roll call defeated all the rest of Schnekloth’s proposals by a vote of 34 to 54. If these remaining provisions are regarded as having been intended to provoke the bill’s withdrawal or death, then the number of votes it secured accurately reflected the number of No votes on final passage later that day.

Claiming that the bill would “create a ‘nightmare’ for restaurant owners” forced to separate smokers and nonsmokers,219 Des Moines Democrat Jack Woods, a heavy smoker who had persistently sought to undermine anti-smoking bills, offered an amendment to exclude all restaurants from coverage.220 Relying, perhaps, on Hammond’s assurance that she had spoken to members of the Iowa Restaurant Association, who had said that they could “‘live with’” the bill,221 the House rejected Woods’s amendment.222 It then adopted two limiting amendments by Republican Donald Paulin excluding restaurants seating fewer than 32 persons and offices and waiting rooms with fewer than 200 square feet of floor space as well as sleeping rooms in hotels and motels.223 Republican farmer Virgil Corey, who in the end voted against the bill, offered an amendment requiring a ten-foot space separating a smoking from nonsmoking area in single-room public places—six feet wider than Minnesota’s alternative to 56-inch-high barriers—but the House rejected even this reasonable albeit feckless measure.224 Woods came back with an even more radical amendment, this time gutting the entire bill by permitting an owner or manager to designate an entire public place as a smoking area, but the House rejected it too.225 Having filed such an amendment, Woods

220Journal of the House: 1986: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 146 (Jan. 23) (H-5015 and 5025). Because the former amendment struck the line of the committee amendment that included the word “churches” that the House had just voted to insert by adopting Schnekloth’s amendment, the latter was “plac[ed] out of order,” thus eliminating it. Id. at 146. The Register erroneously reported that in the bill as passed “public place” was defined as including churches. Jane Norman, “Iowa House Approves Fine for Smoking,” DMR, Jan. 24, 1986 (1A:1, at 2A:5).
221Journal of the House: 1986: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 146, 147 (Jan. 23) (H-5015 and 5025). Because the former amendment struck the line of the committee amendment that included the word “churches” that the House had just voted to insert by adopting Schnekloth’s amendment, the latter was “plac[ed] out of order,” thus eliminating it. Id. at 146. The Register erroneously reported that in the bill as passed “public place” was defined as including churches. Jane Norman, “Iowa House Approves Fine for Smoking,” DMR, Jan. 24, 1986 (1A:1, at 2A:5).
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

appeared to be engaged in a very special kind of self-fulfilling prophecy when he declared: “It’s kind of stupid and ridiculous to pass a law with no teeth in it.” ²²⁶

Before voting on the bill’s final passage, the House adopted an amendment by Democrat Clay Spear restricting enforcement by weakening the requirement that proprietors ask smokers to refrain from smoking on request of someone claiming discomfort from smoke: now the person in control of a public place would be required to intervene with regard only to smoking that was taking place in a no-smoking area. ²²⁷ Thus, what had potentially been a powerful means for overcoming the bill’s failure to protect nonsmokers from exposure to drifting smoke was diluted so as to apply only to formal violations of the ban on smoking in nonsmoking areas—even in public places in which the vast majority of the space were designated as a smoking area, thus giving smokers very little occasion to smoke in the tiny nosmoking area. For this very reason Republican Dorothy Carpenter, a nonsmoking social liberal ²²⁸ and strong supporter of the bill, divulged a deeper truth about the bill than she herself presumably understood when she defensively observed that “[w]e’re not denying these people who wish to smoke.” ²²⁹ On the other hand, however, she was so swept away by anti-smoking rhetoric that she uncritically believed her own propaganda that H.F. 102 was actually an instantiation of the proposition that “those who choose not to smoke have the right to have clean air to breathe.” ²³⁰

In the face of “pleas for free enterprise,” ²³¹ the House at last passed Zimmerman’s bill. Though not strictly along party lines, the 63 to 35 vote rested on a small majority (22 to 17) among Republicans and an almost 70-percent majority (41 to 22) among Democrats. ²³² Whether legislators were reflecting constituents’ positions was called into doubt a few days later by an Iowa Poll revealing that 56 percent of Republicans favored legislation penalizing smokers who smoked in places where the act was prohibited compared with 50 percent of ²²⁸ Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (June 19, 2007).

Democrats.  Despite House approval, the bill faced “a cool reception” in the Senate, whose majority leader, Democrat C. W. “Bill” Hutchins, in an image nicely captured by Jane Norman for the Register, “smiled and looked at a cigarette smoldering in his hand when asked how the bill will fare. ‘I think it’ll have a tougher go in the Senate.... Historically the Senate has not gone along with that.’” Nevertheless, Republican Governor Terry Branstad supported the bill, but regarded the $50 penalty as too high.

On January 28, the Senate, composed of 15 tobacco users and 35 non-users, referred H.F. 102 to the Human Resources Committee, which was now chaired by anti-smoking activist Beverly Hannon, who appointed herself and two other nonsmokers—Democrat Robert Carr and Republican Ray Taylor, a member of the state board of the American Cancer Society and religious conservative who opposed smoking and drinking for religious and health reasons—to a three-member subcommittee to report back to the full committee.

By this time the Register had detected a shift in support, with a “substantial number of senators—smokers and non-smokers alike”—predicting that the bill would be enacted. This turn of events was surprising not only because allegedly “senators traditionally dislike governing public behavior,” but also because four of the chamber’s six leaders were heavy smokers or snuff dippers. Republican Minority Leader Calvin Hultman, who had been using snuff since he had stopped smoking six cigars a day three years earlier, fit this mold perfectly: “We shouldn’t always be telling people how to act.” The key parliamentary development was the fact that on January 31 Majority Leader Hutchins, who also did not like the bill and had the “power to keep issues he doesn’t like from floor action,” stated that he would not stand in its way because the committee would certainly recommend passage and “this kind of issue had to be decided by the Senate as a whole.” Some senators, however, opposed the bill simply because they themselves smoked. Perhaps the purest exemplar of the unreconstructed smoker was Democrat Joseph Coleman, who had smoked three packs of unfiltered cigarettes a day for almost 40 years and was “getting tired of being the one who get pushed around. I have rights, too, you know.” Other smokers, such as Democrat Joseph Welsh, the Appropriations Committee chairman, belittled the whole issue of smoking as “absolutely irrelevant” and distracting attention from “the key problems we have to resolve.” In contrast, at least one heavy smoker, Republican Jack Nystrom, who had repeatedly tried to quit, was open-minded enough to welcome the bill as possibly helping him to stay quit. Former smoker Hannon was “very optimistic” that the time had finally come to enact a nosmoking law because of the “very strong support” that had emerged to recognize nonsmokers’ “right to breathe fresh air,” yet even Zimmerman’s original bill lacked any process to implement such a right, based as it was on the dysfunctional system of designated smoking areas. Since that approach was twinned with the notion of smokers’ and nonsmokers’ “equal rights,” it was unclear how Hannon, who saw the chief hope for passage in a compromise that would “avoid a fiery debate on individual rights,” imagined the implementation of such a parliamentary strategy.240

237 Iowa Official Register: 1985-1986, at 41 (Vol. 61, Michael Triggs, ed.).
238 Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (June 20, 2007).

Hannon’s committee met on February 13, voting 7 to 3 to recommend passage of the bill as amended. The three no votes were cast by Republican Julia Gentleman, who had repeatedly opposed (and would continue to oppose) such legislation, Republican Arthur Gratias and Democrat Charles Miller, a chiropractor.241 Gratias, a tea-totaling, nosmoking teacher and principal, insisted that “Iowans can act without the Legislature always having to pass a law....” He admitted that people could “abuse their rights,” but asserted, without explaining, that there were “other ways to handle it.”242 The proposed changes themselves were few, but several were significant. The most prominent, designed perhaps to accommodate the governor, halved the penalty from $50 to $25.243 sought to justify it on the grounds of greater workability and enforcibility.\footnote{244}{Tom Witofsky, “Plan to Limit Public Smoking Clears Hurdle,” \textit{DMR}, Feb. 13, 1986 (2A:6).}

Potentially much more important, however, was the deletion of a word that had been in Zimmerman’s bills since 1983; taken from the 1975 Minnesota law, the requirement that those in charge of public places “[a]rrang[e] seating to provide smoke-free areas” created a norm of nonexposure to secondhand smoke that far exceeded the feckless designation of smoking areas from which smoke could drift to nonsmoking areas with impunity for smokers and proprietors. Despite this capacity for protection embedded in the term “smoke-free,” the committee chose to strike it and replace it with “no-smoking,” thus insuring virtually no disruption to smokers or owners and minimal protection for nonsmokers. Hannon’s committee also dropped the language requiring a bar owner who chose to exercise the discretion that the bill conferred on him of designating the entire bar a smoking area to post this designation at the entrances.\footnote{245}{S-5062 (Feb. 13, 1986, by Human Resources Committee). In 1986 the Minnesota Health Department made a similar proposal with regard to a provision in its administrative regulation implementing MCIAA that defined “acceptable smoke-free areas,” but did not actually carry out the change to “nonsmoking” until 1994. See above ch. 24}

Although Hannon’s conclusion that the bill now recognized “‘equal rights for non-smokers’”\footnote{246}{Tom Witofsky, “Plan to Limit Public Smoking Clears Hurdle,” \textit{DMR}, Feb. 13, 1986 (2A:6).} was both a wild exaggeration and incoherent since smoking and being protected from smoke in the same public places were increasingly being recognized by science, medicine, and even Iowa state government agencies\footnote{247}{See below this ch.} as mutually incompatible, her overly optimistic prediction that the amendments had fashioned a “‘compromise that can get through the Legislature’”\footnote{248}{Tom Witofsky, “Plan to Limit Public Smoking Clears Hurdle,” \textit{DMR}, Feb. 13, 1986 (2A:6).} underscored that, in Iowa at least, the time was still remote in which a majority could be found for a solidly protective law based on public health principles. (For example, the next year Hannon reiterated that she “would like to see a place set aside for smokers in public places.”)\footnote{249}{Beverly Hannon, [Untitled], \textit{Advocate News} (Wilton-Durant), Jan. 8, 1987 (15:2), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Scott County, IWA.}

Instead of going to the floor, however, the bill was, according to an announcement the following day by the Senate’s president pro tempore, James
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

Wells, referred from the Regular Calendar to the State Government Committee. Such a decision was presumably made by Majority Leader Hutchins, in this particular case probably because he and his smoking colleagues wished to delay the bill. At the time, Brozek at TI interpreted the referral as having “temporarily derailed” the bill. In the event, if delay was leadership’s objective, the State Government Committee provided almost six weeks of it.

In the interim between the House and Senate debates, the Des Moines Register, the state’s leading newspaper and editorially a longtime and ardent proponent of anti-smoking legislation, doubtless sought to intervene in the process subtly by publishing an overview of smoking bans in various state government departments. As early as 1982, the Health Department had issued a smoking ban, compliance with which continued to be “excellent,” and deputy health commissioner Dr. Ronald Eckoff, pronouncing a professional judgment that few legislators would have dared to express lest they jeopardize their re-election, observed that “‘certainly most of us feel smoking is a poor habit.’” Beginning July 1 (the date on which new laws would normally take effect) the Department of Human Resources had decided to prohibit all smoking in its Capitol Complex offices. Relying on “‘irrefutable evidence’” of smoking hazards, Commissioner Michael Reagan concluded that “‘there is no fair or reasonable course of action that we can take...other than issue a complete ban.’” This insight gave the lie to the rhetoric deployed (and perhaps even uncritically believed) by anti-smoking legislators to project the designated-smoking-areas model as the instantiation of an “equal rights” regime as between smokers and nonsmokers. Even the weak Iowa Department of Transportation rule repudiated that approach by permitting smoking in work areas “only if it does not bother neighboring employees.” Or, as the department’s employee safety officer unambiguously glossed the underlying anti-equal rights principle: “‘That means non-smokers’ rights prevail.’”

In the wake of House passage, the cigarette manufacturing companies ratcheted up their level of opposition as the specter of similar action in the Senate loomed more ominously. During March TI planned to continue its “use of coalitions and phone banks [to] stop the advancement of HF 102,” which was its

---

251 Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (June 20, 2007).
second highest legislative priority in the Midwest region.\footnote{Michael Brozek and Paul Jacobson to William Buckley, Memorandum: Monthly Summary - February, 1986 at 7 (Mar. 3, 1986), Bates No. TIMN457989/95. The highest priority was preventing enactment of a five-cent cigarette tax increase in Wisconsin.} On March 18, Brozek—who had noted in his monthly report for February that Zimmerman “is using HF 102 as a campaign issue in her efforts to become Iowa’s next Lieutenant Governor”\footnote{Michael Brozek and Paul Jacobson to William Buckley, Memorandum: Monthly Summary - February, 1986, at 2-3 (Mar. 3, 1986), Bates No. TIMN457989/90-91.}—wrote to headquarters that during the preceding two weeks the situation regarding H.F. 102 had “deteriorated,” adding unbureaucratically, albeit cryptically: “Due to the efforts of the Governor and his wife, bill author and candidate for Lieutenant Governor, Representative Zimmerman and the Iowa media, many legislative consciousnesses are being tested.” Despite House passage in January, “the strategy has been, and will continue to be, the playing of a ‘time game’ in order to delay the bill’s consideration in the Senate, strategically amend the measure to force the bill back to the House for concurrence and request accurate fiscal impact statements, thereby forcing the measure to a tax or finance committee.” Since the legislature was due to adjourn at the end of April, every day counted in TI’s efforts to defeat the bill. In spite of extensive use of phone banks and strategy meetings with legislative supporters and coalition members, Brozek rated the bill a “toss up.”\footnote{Michael F. Brozek to William P. Buckley, Re: State Tax and Smoking Restriction Legislation (Mar. 18, 1986), Bates No. TI20062203.} Hannon, the bill’s floor manager, corroborated this account, observing later in the year that she had had a “deal on the smoking bill,” but that Majority Leader Hutchins “cut me off at the knees....”\footnote{Beverly Hannon, [untitled note] (Nov. 7, 1986), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (3), IWA.} Years later she recollected that leadership had “let me bring it up as a ‘filler,’ but then kept letting it be deferred. When the anti-regulation guys wanted to defer, they weren’t given a time deadline because it was late in the session, or asked to go back and get their amendment drafted as I was different times when I asked to defer on something.”\footnote{Beverly Hannon [untitled note] (Oct. 16, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (3), IWA. In this retrospective Hannon referred to Junkins as the Senate leader, but she must have meant Hutchins since Junkins had left the Senate after the 1985 session to run (unsuccessfully) for governor.}

The State Government Committee stalled progress of the bill for five and half weeks, not issuing its report until March 25. On that date vice-chair William Dieleman, a Democrat and life insurance underwriter, who was very religiously oriented in his politics, sought unanimous consent finally to bring up H.F. 102. Describing the bill as “‘designed to help those who have problems with smokers,’” Dieleman saw it as “‘step toward making sure that all people’s rights are observed.’” The committee then voted 9 to 4 to approve two amendments. The first significantly limited coverage by excluding retail stores and offices with less than 1000 square feet of floor space. The other provision required the state fire marshal to make an annual inspection of each “public place” covered by the bill and to determine and post a notice of compliance within the public place (without explaining whether the compliance in question related to the Clean Indoor Air Act). This rather bizarre second amendment turned out be a “parliamentary trap” laid by opponents in order to thwart enactment of H.F. 102. Because the fire marshal’s inspections would require the expenditure of state funds, the bill’s passage by the full senate could force its referral to the Senate Appropriations Committee, whose chair, Joe Welsh, had “hinted strongly that the bill could die” there. Committee opponents trained their criticism on what they alleged was the measure’s unenforceability. For example, Democrat Wally Horn, lacking the capacity to imagine the present as history, asked: “‘Who is going to arrest someone for smoking in a building?’” In addition to Gentleman, the perennial pseudo-libertarian opponent of such regulation, the two heavy smokers, Coleman and Rife voted against even this diluted version of a public smoking bill.

Almost another month passed before the full Senate took up consideration of

---

259 Iowa Official Register: 1985-1986, at 29 (Vol. 61, Michael Triggs ed.).

260 Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (June 20, 2007).

261 Senate State Government Committee Minutes at 2 (Mar. 25, 1986) (copy provided by SHSI DM).

263 Senate State Government Committee Minutes at 2 (Mar. 25, 1986) (copy provided by SHSI DM).

266 State of Iowa: 1986: Journal of the Senate: 1986: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 1:881 (Mar. 25). The fourth Nay was cast by Republican Forrest Schwengels; Horn did not vote.
H.F. 102 on April 23. Gentleman, who viewed the bill as “a silly waste of time,” moved the adoption of the amendment that Thomas Lind—who played a prominent role in the House in opposition to passage of the original Clean Indoor Air Act in 1978—had filed on April 4 to amend the State Government Committee amendment. Lind’s amendment went even further than the committee’s by excluding all restaurants and eliminating the distinction between bars with and without the capacity to serve meals to more than 32 people. The Senate adopted it by a vote of 25 to 20, with heavy smokers Hultman, Hutchins, Coleman, and Rife all in favor. But by tying 23 to 23 on the other committee amendment, the Senate eluded the trap to kill the bill in Welsh’s Appropriations Committee.

By a voice vote the Senate then adopted both the weakening amendments recommended by Hannon’s Human Resources Committee and a set of even more far-reaching dilutions proposed by Republican Douglas Ritsema, who had voted against banning smoking in the House chamber in 1979, even though he had found smoking in committee rooms “oppressive.” A nonsmoker who had become more and more conservative during his eight years in the legislature, he came to resent government interference in people’s lives to the extent that he also opposed seat-belt laws. Since he articulated the scope of the principle at stake as bounded by actions that affected other people and nevertheless recognized that smoking created precisely such secondary impacts, he was, even years later, unaware of the self-contradiction inherent in his opposition to the clean indoor air bill, although his vote against the House resolution in 1979 did puzzle him in Ritsema’s proposals in 1986 excluded workplaces, meeting rooms, and private, enclosed offices even if they were not occupied exclusively by smokers, in addition to eliminating the requirement that educational and health facilities provide a sufficient number of nosmoking rooms to accommodate everyone who wanted one. The exclusion of workplaces would have been especially destructive of a comprehensive approach to secondhand smoke regulation since at that time large Iowa companies, even though many had instituted nosmoking policies, failed to segregate employees into smoking and nonsmoking areas and permitted them to smoke at their desks.

---

269See above ch. 25.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

That Rife’s obstructionist amendment to require the health department to issue rules to determine “the maximum level of toxic effect allowable for nosmoking areas” passed by a vote of 24 to 22 underscored that the Senate was living up to its reputation as the last bastion of know-nothing pro-tobaccoism. In a final wound, the chamber eliminated the coverage of public conveyances with departures originating in Iowa. Although Republican assistant minority floor leader John Jensen pierced proponents’ incoherent equal rights rhetoric, which was anchored to the scientifically almost worthless designated-smoking-areas approach, by insisting that “[y]our right to smoke is valid only when you don’t infringe on my right not to breathe your smoke,” since even Zimmerman’s flawed original bill could not come close to securing a majority, no more advanced measure incorporating Jensen’s insight had any chance of passage in 275 Telephone interview with Douglas Ritsema, Hutchinson, MN (June 21, 2007).

---

279 State of Iowa: 1986: Journal of the Senate: 1986: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 1:1350 (Apr. 23) (S-5730). The amendment was first defeated 26 to 19 and then passed 28 to 15 on reconsideration. The amendment was filed by liberal Democrat Arthur Small and the motion for reconsideration by the Senate’s only black member, Des Moines liberal Democrat Thomas Mann. Mann later had no recollection of the bill, let alone the amendment. Telephone interview with Thomas Mann, Austin, TX (June 21, 2007). Mann at the same time opposed the mandatory seat-belt law on the grounds that the issue was not whether it saved lives, but whether it was a person’s right to decide whether to use a seat-belt. Tom Witosky, “Senate Sends Seat Belt Law to Branstad, 27-20,” DMR, Feb. 13, 1986 (1A:4-6 at 2A:1).

1986.

After having been thoroughly gutted during 90 minutes of debate, H.F. 102 passed by a vote of 32 to 13, nine of the opponents being Republicans; even in this “virtually meaningless” condition the bill still triggered Nays from Hutchins and Hultman, the tobacco-using Democratic and Republican leaders. Floor manager Hannon, surprised by the intensity of the opposition, had to “admit I really don’t know what the bill does now.” Acknowledging the improbability of restoring it to its earlier condition, she took solace from the attention supporters had been able to bring to the issue. Hannon later divided opponents into two groups. Of the first, encompassing such heavy smokers as Coleman and Rife, who were “vehemently anti-[+]regulation,” Hannon judged that she did not think that “it ever crossed their minds that people had as much right to not breathe smoke as they had to put smoke in the air we breathe.” To the second group belonged legislators who “were against any regulations because the restaurant association, taverns and of course tobacco companies were—and those interest groups had PACs whereas the Lung Association and advocates didn’t.”

Coleman voted for the bill in order to be able to move for reconsideration as a delaying tactic, which succeeded inasmuch as the motion was not voted on and defeated until May 2, the last day before adjournment, thus leaving the House without time to concur in the Senate’s panoply of radical amendments even had it so desired. Excoriating the Senate’s destruction of the House bill, the Des Moines Register editorially observed that: “While society wouldn’t consider forcing sober drivers to get off the roads in favor of the drunks, it forces non-smokers to avoid smokers.”

Beverly Hannon [untitled note for IWA] (Oct. 16, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (2), IWA.

Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

While the 71st General Assembly was debating extension of the anti-public smoking law in 1985-86, it was also considering (and ultimately passed) a seat-belt law (S.F. 499), as were many other states, prompted by New York’s first-in-the-nation enactment in 1984. The rhetoric deployed by opponents of mandatory seat-belt use was remarkably similar to that on display in the smoking debates; significantly, but not surprisingly, opponents of both laws largely overlapped. For example, Republican Kyle Hummel, whose aforementioned irrational attacks on public smoking bans would be repeated in 1987, contributed this thoughtful analysis: “‘There are certain things I am not willing to do to save 150 lives…. [T]here are certain freedoms we have in this country…that supersede the saving of even 150 lives. I don’t know what your motivation is, but I think it’s playing God.’” Senator Joseph Welsh offered this insight into the limits of risk prevention: “‘We have recognized from the beginning of this country, we can’t insulate our people from all hazards.’” Joseph Coleman, the Senate’s leading anti-anti-smoking militant, took umbrage that the seat-belt bill “‘says that we are going to save your life whether you want us to or not,’” while his across-the-aisle confrere Jack Rife wondered whether “‘[b]ushing after every meal’” would be next. Because seat-belt use shared with smoking some dimensions of secondary impacts—including deaths caused to other passengers by unbelted human missiles, economic and other losses to families, and medical and economic costs borne by society at large—voting patterns on the two bills present an opportunity to compare the consistency of attitudes. Although no absolute one-to-one correspondence prevailed, most of the Senate’s prominent smoking opponents—including Coleman, Doyle, Hultman, Hutchins, Rife, and Welsh—and nonsmoking libertarian opponents of smoking regulation—including 290 Jane Norman, “‘Buckle Up,’ Iowa House Tells Drivers.” DMR, Jan. 31, 1986 (1A:3). Looking back 21 years later, Hummel reflected that he would not repeal the seat belt law, but not because he did not still believe that people should take responsibility for their own actions, but rather because he believed that human nature itself had been changed by the accumulation of government regulation, which made them incapable of doing what was best for themselves; because society had reached the point at which people would do almost anything if there was no law prohibiting it, he had lost his faith in humans’ ability to take responsibility for their actions. Telephone interview with Kyle Hummel, Vinton, IA (June 26, 2007).

Gentleman, Gratias, Horn, and Ritsema—also voted against the seat-belt bill. Similarly, most prominent advocates of public smoking regulation also voted for mandatory seat-belts.\(^{293}\) Also in the House, which voted on both bills within one week, most prominent advocates (including Hammond, Lloyd-Jones, and Zimmerman) and opponents (including Hummel, Renaud, Van Camp, and Woods) of H.F. 102 cast predictably consistent votes for and against S.F. 499.\(^{294}\)

In evaluating Charles Wasker, the Tobacco Institute’s Iowa lobbyist, after the close of the 1986 session, Brozek, the regional vice president, while crediting him (and his partner Bill Wimmer) with success in “killing” H.F. 102, voiced criticism that cast a comic light on the image of the well-oiled tobacco lobbying machine:

[Wasker] requires a great deal of “on site observance.” In other words, we sometimes have to “sit on him” in order to maintain a modicum of control when tracking and monitoring legislative activity. ... The solution to this problem was by no means easy to attain for Mr. Wasker still feels that our system of deadlines and reporting is nothing more than “posterior protection by use of nonsensical red tape contortions.” I made it clear that I too, feel the urge to complain however, when I pay my mortgage I realize how useful and essential our reporting system is. I suggested to Mr. Wasker that everyone should share my appreciation for this system. Chuck is a little less than diligent when analyzing legislation that he feels is unimportant. ... Both Paul Jacobson and I were rather irritated over the fact that Chuck did not know the specifics of HF 102. After repeated meetings with Paul Jacobson and after Paul’s almost continuous presence in the Iowa legislature, Mr. Wasker grew very familiar with the specifics in HF 102.\(^{295}\)

\(^{293}\)State of Iowa: 1985: Journal of the Senate: 1985: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 1:1080-81 (Mar. 27); State of Iowa: 1986: Journal of the Senate: 1986: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 1:303 (Feb. 12). The Senate voted a second time on S.F. 499 after the House had amended it. Most senators’ votes remained unchanged, but Hutchins switched from Nay to Aye and Hultman from Aye to absent or not voting. Taylor, an anti-smoker twice voted against seat belts, while Gronstal, a smoker who voted for anti-smoking measures, twice voted against S.F. 499, and heavy smokers Drake and Nystrom, who showed some sympathy for anti-smoking bills, voted twice for the seat-belt bill.

\(^{295}\)Iowa Charles F. Wasker Background (June 30, 1986), Bates No. T122431036/37-38, on tobaccodocuments.org. In the end, Brozek, who was apparently the author, recommended a minimum increase of $2,000 in Wasker’s retainer to $30,000 as “imperative” if his reporting was to be improved. Id., Bates No. T122431036/39, on tobaccodocuments.org. In his previous year’s lobbyist evaluation recommending that Wasker’s compensation be increased by no less than 9.5 percent, Brozek also sarcastically
The form of Brozek’s good-natured but ironically critical comments about Wasker may in part have been dictated by his own need for “posterior protection” combined with his “knowledge that Wasker was best friends with TI President Chilcote.”

Iowa Citizen Action Network (ICAN):

Vendor of Grassroots Lobbying to the Cigarette Companies

Although the growth of scientific research linking ETS to disease has unquestionably accelerated the smoking restrictions trends, it remains only one argument the antis use against us. Since science did not create the ETS issue, it cannot resolve it. ... In ETS studies, the plausible biological mechanism is present to the satisfaction of almost all scientists.

As elsewhere, in Iowa the Tobacco Institute was applying its strategy of developing and mobilizing allies in coalitions in support of its (anti-)legislative program. In Iowa, as Brozek revealed in his February 1986 report to headquarters, it constituted a remarkable example of strange bedfellows: “In the state of Iowa a new coalition group known as ICAN or the Iowa Citizens [sic] Action Network, has been designated as the front line defense against HF 102, a smoking restriction measure. Additionally, phone banking strategies have already been instituted to counteract the smoking restriction bill when it reaches the Senate State Government Committee.”

So crucial had ICAN become in the battle against H.F. 102 that TI’s Midwest regional director, Paul Jacobson, devoted all of March 17, 18, and 19 to “Mtgs with Wasker, Wimmer (Wasker’s partner); ICAN re pending smoking bill, HF 102.” In turn, the next week, Brozek twice reviewed this bill-specific coalition activity with Jacobson. The 296 Telephone interview with Michael Brozek, Madison, WI (June 5, 2007).

---

heightened importance that the cigarette companies attached to the bill was reflected in Brozek’s plans to “[a]ssess and react to changes in Iowa HF 102” on Monday March 31, spend Tuesday and Wednesday in Iowa to deal with the bill, and then reserve Thursday and Friday: “Schedule pending regarding Senate action in Iowa on HF 102.”

The Iowa Citizen Action Network, Iowa’s largest consumer group, was founded in 1979 and ten years later counted 200,000 individual members. ICAN regarded itself as organizing a “statewide progressive coalition to continue the fight for social and economic justice.” This “grassroots” organization, of which the affiliated unions of the Iowa Federation of Labor were the “backbone,” focused on issues of utilities, the environment, access to health care, insurance, and medical liability, and prided itself on having “stood up to intense pressure by insurance companies” and having held the line against regressive tax proposals that favored big businesses. That ICAN had allied itself with the tobacco companies on a vital issue of public health might seem counterintuitive, but a certain logic may have inhered in it.

One reason for the tobacco industry’s interest in availing itself of and subsidizing ICAN’s operations, was, as the Tobacco Institute bemoaned in late 1990 in connection with preparing its strategy “to stop a hodge-podge of local ordinances and to prevent the State Legislature from enacting a state-wide preemptive vending machine restriction bill,” that “TI has had a strange relationship with the Iowa Wholesaler group.” That relationship had, as discussed earlier, ruptured in 1982-83, when IATD and its executive director, George Wilson, who was also TI’s lobbyist, were unable to reach a compromise with the cigarette manufacturers over their conflicting legislative priorities. In 1986 Brozek—who in September 1985 apparently attended the IATD annual meeting in Des Moines for the purpose of “coalition building”—had revealed the strategic necessity for substituting ICAN for IATD as its legislative ally:

For the past several years, the Tobacco Institute has not contributed to the Iowa wholesalers association. This action was taken due to a legislative confrontation and, although we have kept in contact with that group, our relationship can be termed “tepid” at best.

Therefore we have had to pursue other areas and interest groups for allies and coalitions in our legislative support network. One such group, the convenience stores, have indicated interest with regard to excise taxation. Another group, The Iowa Citizens [sic] Action Network (ICAN), has directed its interest to the issue of citizens’ rights with regard to smoking in the workplace. Both groups will be pursued actively during the next legislative session.

A few months later Brozek highlighted ICAN in the same breath with business groups as allies in TI’s environmental tobacco smoke campaign. Under the heading, “ETS Briefing With Allies/Coalition Members,” he informed one of his bosses in Washington of a change in plans regarding briefing a University of Iowa panel on TI’s “scientific witness program.” Because Brozek in the meantime had come to “prefer a more structured and more comprehensive presentation plan,” he decided to “utilize the scientific witness program in order to initiate meetings with state legislators, the Iowa Citizen’s [sic] Action Network, the Iowa Restaurant Association and the Iowa Association of Manufacturers and Commerce.”

---

307 See above this ch.
308 Attendance was listed on Brozek’s calendar of events. Tobacco Institute Field Staff Meeting (Aug. 11-14, 1985), Bates No. 680501768/2024. However, his monthly summary to the State Activities Division in Washington, D.C. did not mention the activity, although other reports did mention successes at such wholesaler meetings in other states. Michael F. Brozek to William P. Buckley Re: Monthly Summary - September, 1985 (Oct. 4, 1985), Bates No. TIMN0457933; Michael F. Brozek to William P. Buckley Re: Monthly Summary - August, 1985, at 4 (Sept. 5, 1985), Bates No. TIMN0457939/42
310 Michael Brozek to George Minshew, Re: ETS Briefing With Allies/Coalition Members (Feb. 9, 1987), Bates No. TNWL0018977.
In August 1988, Brozek and Region IV director Dan Nelson, in preparation for the 1989 legislative session, accounted to their boss, Paul Emrick, the State Activities Division Northern Sector vice president in Washington, D.C., for the choice of Iowa as the target of a “concerted proactive effort” that would not “generate a ‘negative return’ from our opponents,” that is, “an equally aggressive anti-tobacco situation.” Their objective was to target the Iowa Senate “in order to maintain a majority position thereby enabling our operatives to enforce the sunset provisions in the Iowa cigarette tax increase of 1988.” While acknowledging “the fact that our proactive efforts are, theoretically, centered around that indoor air issue,” Brozek and Nelson interpreted remarks by TI President Chilcote at a staff meeting to mean that “proactive does not equate with compromise.” Characterizing the situation in Iowa as “precedential,” Brozek and Nelson argued that success would make Iowa “one of the very few states or localities to roll back a tax increase.” Provisionally agreeing with the TI’s Iowa lobbyist Wasker that the plan was “doable,” they urged immediate launching of the legislative project rather than waiting until January. Six weeks later they reiterated the higher taxonomic fit, informing Emrick that: “Although not the mandated, strictly construed public smoking issue, the potential for a state tax roll back is far too significant NOT to be termed proactive. Therefore, we have immediately launched our efforts with several diverse groups in the state of Iowa.”

Brozek and Nelson had apparently been influenced to move in this direction by Mike Lux (former ICAN director and an Iowa Federation of Labor vice president) and David Wilhelm (former director of the progressive, union-funded Citizens for Tax Justice), who co-founded the consulting firm Strategy Group and was a Democratic national political operative. Because TI had “used ICAN as an allied group in the past,” Brozek and Nelson suggested immediately working with ICAN to plan for the 1989 Iowa legislative session, during which Citizens for Tax Justice would testify before committees and speak to individual state senators. To secure this cooperation, TI was to budget $5,000 for ICAN in the last quarter of 1988 and $15,000 in 1989 on top of $10,000 for CTJ.\footnote{Michael Brozek and Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: Targets for Proactive Efforts (Aug. 25, 1988), Bates No. TI00260215/7.} (Under the rubric, “Special Projects,” TI had paid ICAN $1,000 in 1986 and budgeted another $1,000 for it in 1987.)\footnote{[Tobacco Institute], State Activities Division, 1987 Proposed Budget (Sept. 26, 1986), Bates No. 684019007/99. The purpose of the identical amounts that TI paid to the Dubuque Chamber of Commerce in those years is unclear.}

311 The Tobacco Institute, State Activities Division (Dec. 1988), Bates No. 2025870848.

313 Michael Brozek and Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: Comprehensive Public Smoking Program Region IV (Nov. 4, 1988), Bates No. TI08940761/2.

Two weeks before Brozek and Nelson sent their memorandum, Lux had sent one to Wilhelm on “The Upcoming Iowa Cigarette Tax Fight,” in which Lux gushed over the possibility that an anti-cigarette tax coalition might be able to defeat the drive to repeal the sunsetting of a three-cent tax, thus making Iowa a “landmark state,” which “revers[ed] the tide and actually lower[ed]” its cigarette tax. Lux saw “[t]he key” to winning in moving labor and “progressive citizen coalitions such as” ICAN “into active partnership with other cigarette tax opponents” because the former had “a great deal of clout with the Democratically-controlled legislature....” He went on to tout ICAN as the state’s largest and politically-legislatively most successful citizen’s group with a full-time staff of more than 40—one of whom, Tom Jochum, he boasted, was chair of the House Appropriations Committee—many of whom were door-to-door canvassers. Moreover, at the previous election in 1986, all ten of the state legislative candidates whom ICAN endorsed and worked for were elected. In a handwritten note on behalf of his “business associate,” Wilhelm, in turn, hailed ICAN’s “guys” as “do[ing] what they say they’ll do.” He also assured the Tobacco Institute that its Iowa lobbyist Bill Wimmer “would be very supportive” and that they could get the IFL “on board” as well.\footnote{Mike Lux to David Wilhelm, Re: The Upcoming Iowa Cigarette Tax Fight (Aug. 9, 1988), Bates No. TI00260222-3. The handwritten note, signed “David,” was directed to “Jan,” to whom the memo was apparently faxed. Jochum, when informed many years later of Lux’s boast, was nonplussed by the suggestion that he, a supporter of higher cigarette taxes despite being a smoker, had been used as advertising for a coalition with tobacco companies. Telephone interview with Thomas Jochum, Des Moines (July 21, 2007). Jay Larson, one of Lux’s successors as ICAN executive director, remarked that Lux had a tendency to blow things out of proportion. Telephone interview with Jay Larson, Everett, WA (July 19, 2007). More specifically he observed that: “Tom Jocham [sic] worked for ICAN for a very short time helping to coordinate our message and targeting of member outreach activities around the upcoming elections. I can not believe that he knew that Mike had written this in a memo nor do I believe that he would have approved of it if he had known.” Email from Jay Larson to Marc Linder (July 20, 2007).} By November 1988, Brozek and Nelson could tell their boss, Paul Emrick, that ICAN was “our most visible grassroots level allied legislative presence” in Iowa, reminding him that “this agreement” had been handled during their personal meetings in Washington with Wasker, Wilhelm, Lux, TI’s public affairs staff, and Emrick himself.318

By 1991, ICAN had indisputably allied itself with the cigarette companies on the issue of increased cigarette taxes, presumably on the grounds that the tax was regressive because it disproportionately affected poor and working-class people, who disproportionately smoked.319 In October 1990, in a forecast of the following year’s state legislative activities, TI’s State Activities Division reported that its Public Affair Division, through its Labor Management Committee, was taking part in a program in which labor unions and ICAN traveled across Iowa “advocating progressive tax alternatives. ... The intention of this effort is not only to elevate the debate on what are appropriate methods of taxation, but also to heighten the chance that selected union groups or ICAN reps would testify against regressive excise tax increases.”320 This seemingly high-minded talk about tax progressivity originated in the cigarette companies’ much more mundane drive to retain as much of their profits as possible: “Two legislative sessions ago, the industry was successful in reducing Iowa’s cigarette tax by three cents per pack (through a sunset clause). It is not lost on the legislature that this three cent tax reduction did not result in any lower cigarette prices to consumers.”321 By March 1991 TI noted internally that: “We agreed to provide support to Iowa Citizen Action Network (ICAN) for proposed tax-related activities in the state. The group requested assistance to produce and distribute two newsletters on the state budget issues.”322 At the same time, as part of its national strategy of creating state coalitions, the Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee justified its “[m]onthly support” to ICAN on the grounds that it had “a very successful grassroots canvass organization” and was “an effective lobbying and public education organization.”323 ICAN, as Lowell Junkins, the former Iowa Senate Democratic

318 Michael Brozek and Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: Comprehensive Public Smoking Program Region IV (Nov. 4, 1988), Bates No. TI08940761/2.

319 Susan Stuntz to Walter Woodson (Apr. 26, 1990), Bates No. TNWL0049694/5.

323 “Labor Management Committee Coalitions” (no date [1991]), Bates No. TNWL0050258/71. The report mentioned a “[g]rant in early 1991 for fair tax campaign.”

2629
Majority Leader and TILMC’s Iowa lobbyist commented years later, was a very left-wing messenger that went knocking on doors all across Iowa with very left-wing issues, but, because it was so strapped for money, had to tack on to them this one anti-anti-smoking issue for the tobacco companies.\textsuperscript{324}

Looking back at the 1991 legislative session and preparing for the next one, a memorandum to TI’s senior vice president for public affairs observed that “[w]e are not out of the woods on the cigarette tax as a funding mechanism, a key plank of the Governor’s plan during last year [sic] budget session, and we continue to work with ICAN to develop ways to build a coalition around the health care issue and to develop opposition to excise taxes as a funding method for the debt and/or healthcare programs.”\textsuperscript{325} By the 1993 session cooperation had intensified to the point that TI recognized ICAN as “instrumental to our grass roots efforts.”\textsuperscript{326} And, as TI senior vice president Mozingo observed as early as 1987, it was crucial to deliver the industry’s tax message “appropriately” to legislators through “grassroots efforts” because: “Frankly, the ‘ regressivity message’ can ring a little hollow when delivered solely by legislative counsel. As a result, we also attempt to send the message by way of those who would be hit especially hard by such taxes.”\textsuperscript{327}

Jim Wengert, who had been the president of the Iowa Federation of Labor in the 1980s, while not recalling the episode at the time that “everybody started picking on” smokers, later speculated that perhaps some international unions might have opposed legislation on the grounds that they wanted to bargain collectively over workplace smoking rather than have the state impose one rule on all workers.\textsuperscript{328} This conjectured recollection received empirical corroboration from Mike Lux, who had been ICAN executive director from 1984 to 1987 (and

\textsuperscript{324}Telephone interview with Lowell Junkins, driving somewhere in Iowa (Apr. 23, 2007).

\textsuperscript{325}Memorandum [October Report on behalf of Labor Management Committee], The Strategy Group to Susan Stuntz (Nov. 12, 1991), Bates No. TNWL0049609/10. Amusingly, the report went on to mention that TI’s Iowa labor counsel Junkins, had been meeting regularly with (Democratic) Senate Majority Leader Bill Hutchins and House Speaker Bob Arnould "to reinforce their commitment to a progressive agenda." \textit{Id}. Bates No. TNWL0049609/11.

\textsuperscript{326}Memorandum from The Strategy Group to Jim Savarese (Jan. 25, 1993), Bates No. TNWL0049259/67. The memo also noted that “AFSCME has played a key role in our progressive tax work in Des Moines.” \textit{Id}.

\textsuperscript{327}Roger Mozingo, Remarks at Tobacco Institute Board of Directors Winter Meeting (Feb. __, 1987), Bates No. TIDN0002823/33.

\textsuperscript{328}Telephone interview with Jim Wengert, Des Moines (Apr. 8, 2007).
as late as 1990 appeared on a TI list of proposed invitees to a Labor Management Committee legislative conference as an ICAN representative.\(^{329}\) Although he remembered Brozek, the author of the memorandum, Lux characterized the description “front line defense” as “ridiculous.” While indignantly insisting that ICAN had not “carr[ied] water” for the tobacco companies, he did admit that they had a common cause in opposing cigarette taxes. Nevertheless, he retained a “very vague memory” of conversations with “the tobacco folks” in which ICAN took the position that “cigarettes did not deserve all the blame” for workplace health and safety problems, which needed more comprehensive treatment, including good ventilation, than anti-smoking laws held out. Like, Wengert, Lux also recalled having heard unions ask why workplace smoking regulation was not just a collective bargaining concern.\(^{330}\)

Neither disingenuousness nor a poor memory prevented Ben Zachrich, ICAN’s co-director (1987-89) and lobbyist, from recalling “the darkest day” of his career as a consumer advocate when sometime around 1988 Wimmer, with whom he had worked in (what he regarded as) an ethically unchallenged relationship in connection with the Iowa Trial Lawyers Association on medical malpractice, called him over to his office, gave him $5,000, and Zachrich took the “blood money.” The basis of the quid pro quo was transparent: ICAN was always “scrambling for money” and ICAN’s lobbying for the cigarette companies’ issues gave them “credibility” that they would have been unable to draw on with some legislators. While specifically recalling the battle over the sunsetting of the three-cent cigarette tax rather than the anti-public smoking bill, Zachrich observed that if Wimmer had asked (or in fact did ask) him to speak to legislators about that... issue as well, he would have done it.\textsuperscript{331} Wimmer, who began as a lobbyist in 1979, later recalled dealing with ICAN on the tax issue, but not about public smoking, except insofar as ICAN was aligned with labor unions on the matter of workplace smoking rules. Although he stated that he did not remember giving ICAN money, if it did receive such money, ICAN would, Wimmer observed, have lobbied the legislature.\textsuperscript{332}

Further bright light was shed on the basis for ICAN-tobacco industry relationship by Jay Larson, its executive director from 1988 to 1992 and lobbyist from 1987 to 1992. A smoker who in the late 1980s and early 1990s did not think smoking was evil, he recalled many years later sitting in the capitol rotunda with the very “entertaining” tobacco lobbyists Wasker and Hultman engaged in the “sociable” activity of smoking. In retrospect he found it unbelievable that he used to go up to Johnie Hammond, the House’s most militant anti-smoker, in the rotunda with a lit cigarette in his hand.\textsuperscript{333} And one of his ICAN co-workers added that Larson had been a “chain smoker” who smoked in the office.\textsuperscript{334} Like Zachrich, Larson admitted that taking money to lobby and canvas on the cigarette tax issue was the aspect of his ICAN career that he was “the least proud of.” The origins of this deal, which had been prompted by the ever-present necessity of meeting a payroll, he associated with Lowell Junkins (or perhaps someone else he could not recall), who had approached him offering money in exchange for opposing cigarette taxes; his conscience had been assuaged by the statement that the money came from unions.\textsuperscript{335}

\textsuperscript{331}Telephone interview with Ben Zachrich, Des Moines (Apr. 11, 2007). Having failed to interview ICAN’s leaders, the authors of an otherwise illuminating piece on the relationship between the cigarette companies and Citizen Action organizations misleadingly understated money’s role in concluding that “their own financial needs...no doubt played some role in the alliance with the tobacco industry.” Richard Campbell and Edith Balbach, “Building Alliances in Unlikely Places: Progressive Allies and the Tobacco Institute’s Coalition Strategy on Cigarette Excise Taxes,” \textit{AJPH} 99(7):1188-96 at 1193 (July 2009).

\textsuperscript{332}Telephone interview with William Wimmer, Des Moines (Apr. 16, 2007).

\textsuperscript{333}Telephone interview with Jay Larson, Everett, WA (July 19, 2007).

\textsuperscript{334}Telephone interview with Amy Logsdon, Iowa City (July 20, 2007).

\textsuperscript{335}Telephone interview with Jay Larson, Everett, WA (July 19, 2007).
The Tobacco Institute Seeks to Co-opt a Skeptical and Resistant Iowa Restaurant Association

Science merely reinforces the social movement against smokers. Rebutting the science will not stop the movement... In focus groups we asked non-smokers about ETS: the health risk was clearly a subordinate concern to their simple dislike of tobacco smoke in the air. No scientific study can instill tolerance in the intolerant.\(^{336}\)

By the mid-1980s the Tobacco Institute, having resolved to mount “a complete campaign to stop smoking restrictions,”\(^{337}\) declared that it would “continue to oppose without compromise all public smoking legislation.” Even in “instances... in which a corporation may wish to implement a voluntary policy to avoid facing more restrictive legislated policies” TI would “continue to attempt to discourage implementation of any policy...” However, the cigarette oligopoly’s watchdog might possibly be prepared to deviate from its course of unrelenting public belligerence to make an exception: it would “consider working privately with those corporations who come to us for assistance to ensure that policies that are implemented are fair.”\(^{338}\) In light of the enormous number of cigarettes smoked and the iconic status of smoking in restaurants and the crucial linchpin status that the anti-smoking movement had bestowed on legislating freedom from exposure to secondhand smoke while eating in public, the cigarette manufacturers were not in a position to adopt the same scorched-earth policy vis-à-vis the entire restaurant industry that they had implemented against individual companies that had dared ‘cross’ them by restricting or banning smoking among passengers or employees.\(^{339}\)

In an attempt to persuade state restaurant associations to subordinate themselves to the cigarette companies’ legislative desiderata, TI drafted a Proposed Restaurant Manual in 1986. Its objectives included reinforcing their “awareness of: the tobacco industry’s opposition to further restrictions on smoking in restaurants[,] the users of tobacco products as a major restaurant market segment[,] legislative and other threats of common concern to the tobacco and foodservice industries[,] and the value of the tobacco industry as an ally.”

\(^{337}\)William Kloepfer, Jr. to Samuel Chilcote, Subject: Immediate Public Smoking Communications (Jan. 29, 1985), Bates No. T104110301.

The first strategy to be deployed to achieve these objectives was “[d]emonstrating[,]” general customer satisfaction with current foodservice practices toward smoking restrictions.” Oddly, the numerous “tactics” that the manual spelled out to implement this strategy included commissioning surveys of restaurant employees’ “attitudes toward their long-time customers” as well as of owners and managers “toward legislated smoking restrictions,” but none of customers’ attitudes.340 Perhaps the Institute deemed it a sufficient demonstration of “customer satisfaction” for a regional director merely to appear at a legislative hearing and tack on, as one did in 1984, to the assertion that it was “‘far from proven that ambient smoke is hazardous to public health’” the claim that “‘most people, including non-smokers, don’t care whether smokers light up or not....’”341

The final tactic suggested by the Manual—yet another pipe dream that the tobacco industry propagated as a technological fix for indoor locations to divert attention from the dangers of secondhand smoke exposure and the need for state intervention to prohibit it—would have rendered voluntary accommodation superfluous: “use of adequate ventilation equipment as an alternative to separate smoking and nonsmoking sections....”342 Ironically, anti-smoking scholars later pointed out, the cigarette companies persuaded many restaurants “to embrace expensive ventilation systems to avoid non-existent losses in business of going smoke-free.”343

By the mid-1980s, just as anti-smoking advocates in Iowa, undaunted by successive legislative defeats, were intent on incorporating restaurants into the 341Judy Johnson, “Anti-Smoking Bill Doused,” Tribune-Star (Terre Haute), Dec. 14, 1984, Bates No. TIDN0026693. Despite (or perhaps because of) the false statements by Brooke Cheney, the main speaker in opposition, the county council of St. Joseph County, Indiana (of which South Bend, the location of the University of Notre Dame, is the county seat) voted 8 to 0 against the proposed ordinance regulating public smoking.

clean indoor air law, TI, determined to maintain restaurants as locations for continued consumption of immense numbers of cigarettes regardless of the health consequences for nonsmoking customers and employees, strove to animate restaurant associations to cooperate in opposing governmentally imposed restrictions as well as smoking bans. Alone from 1985 to 1987, the number of bills introduced in state legislatures regulating smoking in restaurants rose from 43 to 68, while those approved increased from four to six; the figures for local bills increased from 118 to 169 and 68 to 88, respectively.\footnote{34} Although TI referred to the restaurant industry as “this traditional ally,”\footnote{35} and at least one regional vice president opined that “I cannot think of another TI ally that is more important in the fight against smoking restriction” than the restaurant industry,\footnote{36} the Institute was well aware that the regard was not mutual: “Many restaurant owners ‘do not look at the [tobacco] industry as an ally.’”\footnote{37} Indeed, as TI Midwest vice president Brozek observed many years later, the restaurant industry simply “wouldn’t line up” with the Institute—“you couldn’t control them”—some owners did not even want smoking in their restaurants.\footnote{38} Even when a state restaurant association did join forces with the tobacco industry to help defeat proposed restrictions on smoking, the Institute complained, “[m]any times, once a restaurant is amended out of the bill, the restaurant industry discontinues its involvement.”\footnote{39} The unintended consequence of such exemption, as one of the Institute’s regional field staff pointed out, was the loss of “a tremendous amount of our support”; this staffer even recommended that TI should “encourage associations to ‘hang in there’ and not amend themselves out of the bill. They only find themselves amended back into the legislation further down the road.”\footnote{40}

In fact, the legislative situation became even more complex and fraught with \footnote{34}Philip Morris, Corporate Affairs Issues Handbook (Apr. 1989), Bates No. 2022711366/78.

\footnote{35}Susan Stuntz to William Kloepfer (Apr. 23, 1986), Bates No. TI05221069, on tobaccodocuments.org. Stuntz was a TI vice president and director of issues management; Kloepfer was senior vice president for public relations.
\footnote{36}Stan Boman to Katherine Becker, Re: Proposed Restaurant Manual (July 1, 1986), Bates No. TIOK0023718.
\footnote{38}Telephone interview with Michael Brozek, Madison, WI (June 5, 2007).
\footnote{40}Proposed Restaurant Manual State Activities Field Staff Comments at 6 (July 28, 1986), Bates No. TIOK0030536/41.
snares for any alleged alliance or coalition by the end of the 1980s, once the cigarette companies’ highest state legislative priority became enactment of amendments to clean indoor air acts preempting local ordinances that imposed stricter regulation than the statewide laws. But even as late as 1986, when, in the afterglow of the successive defeats of Zimmerman’s bills, the Midwest regional office did not even list for the central office any “possible smoking restriction issues,” it did note that despite its having contacted the Iowa Restaurant Association, “no real relationship exists. The association is neither very large nor very strong.” At this juncture TI looked favorably on restaurant owners’ voluntarily creating smoking and nonsmoking sections in an “attempt to accommodate the varied preferences of all customers.” The Institute promoted such voluntarism because it “reduces the perceived need by legislators to introduce restrictive legislation that ignores the capacity of a restaurateur to determine and respond to the needs of his particular clientele.”

This approach also served the aforementioned purpose of keeping the restaurant industry on the hook permanently: without the protection of a formal statutory exemption, restaurant owners would retain an incentive to carry their lobbying weight against the enactment of new anti-smoking laws or the strengthening of existing ones. The Iowa Restaurant (and Beverage) Association was not one of the state organizations that had adopted this approach by mid-1986, but in January 1987, just as the legislative session was about to convene, it sent out to members an information fact sheet labeled “[Confidential—For Members [sic] Use Only],” which its current president and CEO assumed was “a result of [a] decision of the board.” After counseling members about IRS audits of restaurant employees for compliance with correct tip reporting, the informational advised that:

NO SMOKING AREAS are becoming more noticeable all of [sic] the time. Several 351Proposed Restaurant Manual State Activities Field Staff Comments at 5 (July 28, 1986), Bates No. TIOK0030536/40.

352Lisa Osborne, Tobacco Institute], “Foodservice Industry: Issue and Strategy
353Lisa Osborne [Tobacco Institute Project Coordinator] to Brook[e] Cheney [Regional Director for region including Indiana], Re: Voluntary Restaurant Program (July
1, 1986), Bates No. TI05221053.
354Lisa Osborne [Tobacco Institute Project Coordinator] to Brook[e] Cheney [Regional Director for region including Indiana], Re: Voluntary Restaurant Program (July
1, 1986), Bates No. TI05221053.
355Email from Doni DeNucci to Marc Linder (July 26, 2007).
companies here in Des Moines, along with some state buildings, have outlawed smoking entirely.

There is no doubt that a No-Smoking Bill will be introduced again this year in the legislature. It would be a lot better if we can say that the restaurants already have Non-Smoking Sections, and we do not need a law to enforce it. Our main concern is to be able to adjust the size of the Non-Smoking Area to the demand. If we get a law that specifies a certain percent of square footage for Non-Smoking you will not have your flexibility.

Please consider setting aside a small area for Non-Smokers and give your customers a choice. It would give you a good idea if it was needed and how much room was required. If we get the wrong bill passed you may not have a choice.\footnote{Iowa Restaurant & Beverage Association, “Information About Your Industry” (Jan. 1987) (copy faxed by Doni DeNucci, IRA Pres-CEO, July 26, 2007).}

Having now adopted this voluntarist-accommodationist strategy to warding off government intervention, after the close of the 1987 Iowa legislative session—from which restaurant owners unconcerned with public health emerged unscathed—the organization reoriented its policy further. Lester Davis, the IRBA’s executive director, contacted the National Restaurant Association, which referred him to the Tobacco Institute, to which he wrote at the end of July 1987 asking for information about its “Smokers Are Welcome Here” Campaign. He explained that: “We were able to have restaurants and bars excluded from the Clean Air Bill last [sic] year. Some of our members might like to let smokers know they are also good business.”\footnote{Lester R. Davis to Jeff Ross (July 31, 1987), Bates No. TI01941669/70.}

The relationship between Davis and the Tobacco Institute must have become more focused in the next few months: in mid-October Sharon Ransome, a project coordinator in TI’s Public Relations Division,\footnote{Ransome had begun working at TI in 1985. Samuel Chilcote to Members of the Executive Committee, Memorandum [Headquarters Staff] (Aug. 15, 1986), Bates No. 2021266909/11. Having been graduated from the University of North Carolina at Greensboro in 1985, she began working at the Institute doing online indexing of current tobacco articles and research for member companies. The Tobacco Institute’s Fourteenth College of Knowledge: Student Profiles (June 12-13, 1986), TIMN279457/61.} informed one of her supervisors that she was traveling to Des Moines to meet with Davis on the topic of the “Smokers Are Welcome Here Campaign.” The importance that the Institute attached to the meeting was underscored by the fact that Ransome went through a “dry run” preparation for it with another public relations staff member.\footnote{Sharon Ransome to Susan [Stuntz] (Oct. 13, 1987), Bates No. TI01941309.} On her return from Iowa, Ransome informed Susan Stuntz (who was in charge of public relations issues management) and Brozek of the remarkable discussion without commenting on its remarkableness. In addition to executive director Davis, the association’s president, Dick Wilderman, who owned Dick’s A & W Restaurant in Des Moines, was also present at the October 16 meeting, during which:

Mr. Davis immediately explained that the association which has twelve hundred members strongly encourages a voluntary approach to smoking in restaurants—designating smoking and nonsmoking sections based on the concept of supply and demand—for two reasons:

1. Restaurateurs are in the business to accommodate the preferences of all customers—smoking and nonsmoking.
2. To dissuade legislators from coming in and requiring the owner/manager to designate a certain percentage of the restaurant as smoking or nonsmoking. “After all, a man should be allowed to run his own business as he sees fit,” says Lester Davis.

While Wilderman agreed, he admitted that he would like to see a smoke-free society, and he’s a smoker. Both men emphasized the difficulty of convincing some restaurateurs of the importance of a voluntary program. Davis said restaurateurs are safe for now—during the second term of the Iowa legislature, and believes they have more than a 50 to 50 chance of maintaining [the] exemption for restaurants and bars in the next legislative term, but that’s no guarantee. The vote which originally exempted restaurants and bars from the Iowa Clean Air Act survived on a 29 to 21 vote in favor of exemption.

Mr. Davis explained that The Iowa Restaurant & Beverage Association will hold their annual convention during the last week of October. At that time he will introduce the materials and the idea of the voluntary program. He explained that a decision to engage in a program such as the one we are offering has to made by a joint body. Davis seemed interested in the program and felt it could be of some assistance; however, other members of the association may not share his opinion.360

Ransome, unfortunately, did not include her side of the conversation, record her reaction to the revelation that the president of the Iowa Restaurant & Beverage Association looked forward to a smoke-free society or her evaluation of its possible consequences for the tobacco industry, or comment on owners’ resistance even to adoption of a voluntary program. Wilderman, though unable to recall Ransome or the meeting two decades later, mentioned that he had introduced a nosmoking section in his restaurant—which was pointless since the smoke drifted into it—but stressed that he personally would have preferred enactment of a law because it would have taken matters out of his hands and 360Sharon M. Ransome to Susan Stuntz, Subj: Iowa Restaurant & Beverage Association Des Moines, IA (Oct. 26, 1987), Bates No. TI01941666/7. enabled him to blame the law if customers complained. Indeed, he insisted that “I’d have loved to go nosmoking,” but “I didn’t have enough balls to ban smoking”; even after he had finally quit smoking in 1990 (following many failed attempts), he still never banned smoking in his restaurant, in part because many of his customers smoked, thus contradicting his own speculation that many owners did not ban smoking simply because they themselves smoked and were not sensitive to the issue. He also acknowledged that a legally imposed total ban would have been “the best thing” that could have happened because customers and employees would have smoked less and revenue would not have fallen.361

---

Although the minutes of the Iowa Restaurant Association’s conventions from the 1980s are no longer extant,362 the outcome of the organization’s convention discussion of the TI’s voluntary restaurant program is known from Ransome’s report to the impatiently waiting TI hierarchy363 on her telephone conversation with Davis three weeks later. The “general consensus” at IRBA “was to not participate” because while some members “thought it might be effective...others thought it might be negative.” The most that Davis himself offered was that the program had “merit, and if he had the power to make the decision singularly, he might opt to participate in one form or another.” The membership’s rebuff to TI was blunt: in the face of IRBA’s encouraging restaurateurs to implement smoking and nonsmoking sections in order to demonstrate to the legislature that owners “are more than capable of governing their own establishments[, m]any members remain very adamant about maintaining their own policy which is nobody should be telling me how to run my establishment—not even IRBA.” In the end, while 361 Telephone interview with Dick Wilderman, Des Moines (June 10, 2007). Wilderman could also not recall any tension between the Iowa Restaurant Association and the tobacco industry or any financial support from the latter to the former. The point that the existence of a law gave a “convenient excuse” to business owners, who could blame government when responding to smokers’ complaints, was made by Republican Darrell Hanson at a House State Government Committee hearing on the chief anti-smoking bill in 1987. Thomas Fogarty, “Smoking Law Gets OK from House Panel,” DMR, Feb. 17, 1987 (2A:3).

362 The IRA’s current president and CEO characterized it as “[v]ery strange” that the organization had the minutes from the 1940s to the 1970s and then 1990s, but not from the 1980s. Email from Doni DeNucci to Marc Linder (July 26, 2007).

363 SMS to Sharon [handwritten note on copy of Ransome’s memorandum] (Oct. 29, 1987), Bates No. TI01941665; [No author, recipient, or title] (Nov. 6, 1987), Bates No. TI01941664; [No author, recipient, or title] (Nov. 16-17, 1987), Bates No. TI01941668; Tobacco Institute, “Executive Summary” (Oct. 16, 1987), Bates No. 506772574/5; [Tobacco Institute], Public Affairs Management Plan Progress Report (October 1987), Bates No. TIMN305174/84.
IRBA would “continue to urge a voluntary program,” all that the association might want from TI was “assistance when the public smoking issue comes before the Iowa legislature once again.”

IRBA may not have officially adopted and acted on the principle that voluntarily creating smoking and nonsmoking sections was the most practical way to persuade the Iowa legislature not to impose such designations, but it did begin cooperating with TI in related areas. Thus in the summer of 1988, Ransome and the State Activities division reported that IRBA (like other midwestern associations) had agreed to help the Tobacco Institute promote its Great American Welcome program, designed to foster hospitality and retail businesses’ “appreciation of smokers’ business and to encourage accommodation of smokers” as a response to the Great American Smokeout.

In launching the Great American Welcome on November 15, 1988—two days before the American Cancer Society’s annual Great American Smokeout—TI announced the pseudo-egalitarian policy of “recogniz[ing] the importance of smoking and nonsmoking customers,” which was “[d]edicated to the simple proposition that smokers and nonsmokers appreciate courtesy.” How and why the cigarette companies imagined that declaring that both “[s]mokers and nonsmokers are good customers” and seeking to mobilize owners “who accommodate all patrons regardless of their decision to smoke” could function

---

364Sharon Ransome to Susan Stuntz, Re: Iowa Restaurant and Beverage Association Follow-up (Nov. 18, 1987), Bates No. T128680438. Because Tiana Epps-Johnson, Richard Jones, and Stanton Glantz, The Stars Aligned over the Cornfields: Tobacco Industry Political Influence and Tobacco Policy Making in Iowa 1897-2009, at 43, 46 (2009), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/IA2009/, relied on an internal TI document (from October 1987) that had been overtaken by events in November (despite the fact that Ransome herself in the document stated that the outcome would not be known until November) and failed to use the documents cited in the text above, the authors were unaware that ultimately IRBA’s membership had rebuffed TI. This ignorance then contributed to their failure to grasp the conflicts between the restaurant owners and the cigarette manufacturers over preemption and restaurant coverage during the legislative debates of the 1990 session. See below ch. 27. The document in question was Susan Stuntz, Chip Foley, and Sharon Ransome, “Public Smoking Issue,” in [Tobacco Institute], Public Affairs Management Plan: Progress Report (Oct. 1987), Bates No. TIMN0305174/82/84.

367Tobacco Institute, “The Tobacco Institute Announces ‘The Great American as a meaningful antidote to the Smokeout’s message of the health consequences of smoking\textsuperscript{368} vis-a-vis the vast majority of smokers, who wanted to quit, is unclear. The absurdity of this pathetic initiative two years after publication of the surgeon general’s first major study of involuntary smoking\textsuperscript{369} and the powerful impetus this scientific synthesis gave to the anti-public smoking movement was only underscored by the accompanying visual image of “The Great American Welcome”—published as a full-page ad in \textit{The New York Times} and elsewhere—surrounding two right hands next to each other with thumbs up, one of the hands holding a cigarette.\textsuperscript{370}

Somewhat different in tone was TI’s pamphlet, “Open Door to Hospitality—Accommodating Smokers and Nonsmokers,” which appears to have come out at the end of 1988\textsuperscript{371} and was directed primarily at restaurant owners. “[D]esigned to reinforce the importance of smokers as customers and to provide practical information for the hospitality industry in accommodating smokers and \textsuperscript{369}U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, \textit{The Health Consequences of Involuntary Smoking: A Report of the Surgeon General} (1986). Such absurd tactics were not new. On the eve of the report’s publication and coinciding with the Great American Smokeout in 1986, Philip Morris announced its Great American Smoker program introduced by Milton Berle instructing smokers that “‘Nobody, and I mean nobody—not the anti-smokers, not the crusaders, not all the moralist groups and the pressure groups in the entire world—have the right to decide for you” whether to smoke. Philip Morris USA, News: Philip Morris U.S.A. and Entertainer Milton Berle Introduce “Great American Smoker’s Kit” at 3 (Nov. 19, 1986), Bates No. 2024274455/7. TI’s deputy director of public relations, Peter Sparber, pushed this farce one step further by proposing a strategy of making the Great American Smokeout a “liability” for the American Cancer Society—despite the fact that it had “gone to great lengths to avoid the appearance of harassment”—by forming the League Against Smoker Harassment (LASH) and asking members to “‘Back LASH.’” In addition, in order to disabuse the ACS of its “inappropriate preoccupation with smoking,” he explored the possibility of recruiting prominent public officials to ask the ACS board (whose members represented many industries) to broaden its approach to include all “‘causes’ of cancer” in order to confront them with the problem of considering one-day closings of chemical plants or one-day moratoria on coffee and red meat. Peter Sparber to Samuel Chilcote at 3-5 (Oct. 23, 1986), Bates No. TIOK0023532/4-6.

\textsuperscript{370}\textit{NYT}, Nov. 15, 1988 (D32).

\textsuperscript{371}“Production Services” (Dec. 19, 1988), Bates No. 09910965.
nonsmokers,” it was studded with false and deceptive claims, which boiled down to the assertion that “tobacco smoke is rarely the true culprit” in causing poor indoor air quality. Instead, by claiming that “[i]n the vast majority of cases the real problems are poor ventilation and air filtration,” TI left owners with the impression that “courtesy” and technology might render separate smoking and nonsmoking sections superfluous. After all, if one of the chief vices of “legislated smoking restrictions” that “threatened” “an effective host” was allegedly “chang[ing] your image from host...to enforcer,” it was difficult to discern how, “[i]f you establish no-smoking areas” and “[m]ake your smoking policy clear” and “[m]onitor” it, the owner could avoid becoming a “policeman,” albeit of his own rules. Significantly, once the Iowa legislature amended its law to cover restaurants, the discretion conferred on owners to designate smoking and nonsmoking sections was so capacious that it practically extinguished the difference between state-required and self-created designation: indeed, since owners, as the Iowa Restaurant Association would itself concede, could comply with the Iowa law by designating even one table as the nonsmoking section, that obligation might be even less burdensome than the TI’s proposed “flexible approach” of setting up “floating areas...adjusted to fit demand.”

The Tobacco Institute also targeted owners and operators of chain and independent restaurants in Iowa by means of advertisements in the monthly 378In an earlier and longer version of the pamphlet, the owner of a fancy New York restaurant “sums it up simply: ‘I’m not a policeman. I am a cook.’” Tobacco Institute, “Open Door to Hospitality—Accommodating Smokers and Nonsmokers” (July 1988), Bates No. 87716290/300.

---

379See below ch. 27.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88 publication of IRBA to “educate” them “about the negative effects of smoking restriction legislation will have on their business.”\(^{381}\) In September 1988, the Public Relations Division of the Tobacco Institute—as if TI did anything but PR—informed Davis (with a copy to lobbyist Wasker) that in connection with the Welcome program the Institute had decided to buy a full-page advertisement in six consecutive issues of the IRBA’s monthly magazine.\(^{382}\) Headlined, “What if they passed a law that took away 30% of your business?,” the ad claimed that this loss would be the result of a smoking ban in restaurants decreed by the legislature or city council. Without making clear the relation to the first claim, TI also asserted that almost 20 percent of the U.S. population would not visit a restaurant that prohibited smoking. Promising that it could help restaurant owners “make sure this never happens,” the Institute offered to “help you develop ways to accommodate all your customers—smokers and non-smokers alike.” And finally, deceptively suggesting that the cigarette companies’ interests were identical with restaurant owners”—a suggestion that the companies would strikingly refute in the Iowa legislature in 1990—the Institute stated that it would “help you ensure that your voice is heard when government takes up the issue.”\(^{383}\) In addition to enabling the tobacco industry to convey its misleading message to whichever Iowa restaurant owners actually read ads in the magazine, the $110 per month that TI paid IRBA\(^{384}\) for six months constituted modest financial support.

Scientific Advances in Understanding the Health Impacts of Exposure to Environmental Tobacco Smoke Sharpen the Industry’s Visions of the Endgame

For us the crux of the ETS issue is that restrictions and social opprobrium against smoking may reduce cigarette consumption and smoking incidence.... Between 1985...and February 1987...incidence [of smoking] dropped from 32.8% of population to 30.8%. The greatest decline has been among white males, age 30-44. This group is most likely to be subject to workplace restrictions or have children at home or both. Their most likely motivation is the fear that the ETS issue has instilled in them; they fear harming their children or their employment prospects.\(^{385}\)

---

\(^{382}\) John Lyons to Lester Davis (Sept. 14, 1988), Bates No. TI07731867.
\(^{384}\) Tobacco Institute Check No. 059994 (Feb. 27[?], 1989), Bates No. TI44070989.
\(^{385}\) JRN, The ETS Issue: Science and Politics at [4] (May 1987), Bates No.
In spite of the failure of Zimmerman’s bill in 1986, the Tobacco Institute knew that anti-smoking activists would once again reintroduce a statewide smoking bill in 1987. Losing no time, on June 10, 1986, just a few weeks after adjournment, its Midwest regional vice president Brozek and regional director Jacobson held an Iowa Tobacco Action Network Advisory Committee meeting in Des Moines at the Embassy Club on the top (25th) floor of the Financial Center, the state’s tallest commercial building when it was built in 1973. The purpose of the TAN Advisory Committee, which was composed of tobacco member company sales force representatives, was to inform those representatives fully of the “legislative environment and industry needs.” In reviewing the 1985-86 legislative session, the Iowa committee, whose first listed member was none other than Mike Lux, ICAN’s executive director, discussed “State Smoking Policy” and “Environmental Tobacco Smoke/Workplace” as well as upcoming primary and general elections and legislative projections for the next session. Looking forward to continuing the pursuit of legislative allies and coalitions, in early December Brozek informed his superior, George Minshew, that he had decided to take Philip Morris up on its offer to provide TI with its Philip Morris Magazine and coupon lists for use in phone banking efforts during the 1987 Iowa legislative session to oppose smoking restriction bills.

In its year-end “State of the States” report, TI summarized the strengths and weaknesses of the industry’s position in Iowa in somewhat greater detail. The state’s various “tobacco segments” were “not always dependable.” Alluding to the aforementioned breakdown of relations with lobbyist George Wilson’s organization, the report lamented that the “wholesaler association, even with 386 Paul Jacobson to [form letter] (May 28, 1986), Bates No. TI24190305-6, on tobaccodocuments.org.

---

387 [Tobacco Institute], State Activities Division, Legislative Action Plan, Iowa HF 327 Cigarette Tax (Feb. 12, 1988), Bates No. TIIIIBC013122/3.
388 Michael Brozek to George Minshew, Re: 12/30/86 Woodson Memorandum Regarding TAN Redesign, at 3 (Jan. 13, 1987), Bates No. TI29261787/9.
389 Paul Jacobson to Michael Brozek, Re: Revised TAC List - Region IV (Aug. 1, 1986), Bates No. TI24190283/4. The other ten members included three Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. employees, and one each from Philip Morris, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., Lorillard, and Liggett and Myers Tobacco Co.
391 Michael Brozek to George Minshew, Re: Philip Morris Proposal for Acquisition of Computerized Mailing Lists (Dec. 2, 1986), Bates No. TNWL0021450.
recent overtures, has not been responsive to general tobacco industry legislative concerns. If a choice between a vote on the state’s minimum mark-up law or an increase in the state’s cigarette excise tax [had to be made], the wholesaler association’s choice would be the former.” Weakening the cigarette companies’ potential legislative influence was the fact that labor unions, which several years earlier they had begun to cultivate as coalition partners within the framework of the Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee, had become “an unreliable ally” in Iowa because of the “depression” in the farm equipment manufacturing industry and several strikes in animal slaughter plants. Consequently, Iowa labor had “enough problems of its own.” On the bright side, TI tooted its own horn by asserting that “[t]he most valuable resource” that it had provided in Iowa was hiring “the best possible lobbyists...as well as the continuation of the honorarium program.” Although the industry boasted that it had been able to defeat clean indoor air bills for five sessions, “anti-industry forces headed by lung association operatives” had announced a “major new effort” for the 1987 session, which could alter the constellation of forces that until then had favored the tobacco companies: “The Iowa political environment has not succumbed to the national hysteria regarding indoor smoking restrictions.” Bolstered by “more professional fund-raising,” the Lung Association would “be in better financial shape and more able to organize locally regarding their agenda.” Consequently, TI anticipated a strong effort in 1987 by “our adversaries to enact comprehensive workplace smoking measures” accompanied by a ban on handing out free cigarette samples.\textsuperscript{392}

The tobacco industry anticipated the flood of anti-public smoking bills to be filed during the 1987 state legislative session with particular trepidation because it could not close its eyes to the sea change in public attitudes toward the dangers of secondhand smoke exposure that would surely be effected by the publication of two reports at the end of 1986: \textit{Environmental Tobacco Smoke: Measuring Exposures and Assessing Health Effects} by the National Research Council’s Committee on Passive Smoking in November,\textsuperscript{393} and the surgeon general’s first major study of \textit{The Health Consequences of Involuntary Smoking} in mid-December.\textsuperscript{394} In October, even before either study had appeared, Peter Sparber, \textsuperscript{392}Tobacco Institute, State Activities Division, “1987 The State of the States: Assessing the economic and political climate of each of the 50 states as they affect the tobacco industry; and evaluating industry resources for action on legislation projected for 1987,” Iowa at 3-4 (Dec. 1986), Bates No. 80420206/86-7.

\textsuperscript{394}U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, \textit{The Health Consequences of} a Tobacco Institute vice president and deputy director of its Public Relations Division, revealed in a memorandum to President Chilcote that the epithet “obfuscation” would not even remotely begin to do justice to the mendacious campaign that the cigarette industry was about to launch. Sparber recommended that in conversations with the executive committee (consisting of high-ranking cigarette company executives) Chilcote state that: “Our strategy will be to set the public agenda by making an issue out of the many anti-smoker attempts to intimidate our scientists and shut down the scientific debate over ETS.” Continuing in this preposterous vein, Sparber proposed meeting privately with the Secretary of Health and Human Services to request that he investigate the intimidation (allegedly) promoted by Surgeon General Koop. Unsurprisingly, the purpose of these and similar dirty tricks was to “divert public attention away from these two damaging reports [and] make the anti-smokers respond to us....”

The National Research Council study, issued in November, reported that studies of various populations in Europe, Asia, and North America had found the risk of lung cancer to be 30 percent greater nonsmoking spouses of smokers than among nonsmoking spouses of nonsmokers. The surgeon general’s report...

---

A few years later as an outside consultant to TI Sparber outdid himself with this contribution to discouraging or reversing mandatory or voluntary smoking bans in restaurants, where, absent laws, owners’ “whims—not necessarily logic or facts—are all that is necessary to set smoking policies”: “Demonstrate that far from being victims, restaurant workers pose a serious public health problem. Comment: Since restaurant workers are largely incapable of speaking out for themselves, we believe the only way that the ‘restaurant workers as victims of ETS’ issue can grow is if the anti-smokers can generate sympathy for them. But, given the public health problems reportedly caused by restaurant workers, it is ironic that restaurant workers could ever be seen as victims of any sort. The best way of countering the antis, is to encourage third parties to increase public awareness of the public health threat posed by restaurant workers. It may be hard to generate public concern over restaurant worker exposure to ETS, when the public is more concerned about contracting rare, Central American strains of tuberculosis from restaurant workers.” Joanna Hamilton and Peter Sparber to Karen Fernicola Suhr, Re: Restaurant Program Observations and Recommendations at 2, 5 (Aug. 17, 1993), Bates No. T1 01621160/1/4.

Peter Sparber to Samuel Chilcote at 1-3 (Oct. 23, 1986), Bates No. TIOK0023532-4.

National Research Council, Committee on Passive Smoking, Environmental Tobacco Smoke: Measuring Exposures and Assessing Health Effects 10 (1986). Even after “allowing for reasonable misclassification,” the adjusted increased risk was about 25 percent. Id. at 246. The opening sentence in the Times report bizarrely asserting that the turned out to be as traumatic as the tobacco industry had feared. At his press conference on December 16, Dr. Koop presciently predicted that the report would become the same kind of “‘turning point’” in its field that the original 1964 report had been in its.398 In fact, the new study’s catalytic force was likely to be brought to bear even more quickly and systematically both because Koop lacked the reticence of his predecessor Luther Terry to make policy recommendations399 and a much better organized and more mature anti-smoking movement was available to propagate and implement his advice. Koop declared point-blank that “the health danger to nonsmokers from coworkers who smoke cigarettes is so clear that smoke-free workplaces ought to be made available to nonsmokers.”400 Of the three major conclusions of the report itself the first and third would become especially disastrous for the cigarette industry’s battle against regulation of public smoking: (1) “[i]nvoluntary smoking is a cause of disease, including lung cancer, in healthy nonsmokers”; (2) the children of smoking parents had a higher frequency of respiratory infections than those of nonsmokers; and (3) “[t]he simple separation of smokers and nonsmokers within the same air space may reduce, but does not eliminate, the exposure of nonsmokers to environmental tobacco smoke.”401

A few days after the issuance of the surgeon general’s report, Roger Mozingo, the head of the TI State Activities Division, saw the looming catastrophe too clearly to bother with Sparberesque antics. In a memo to Chilcote he characterized the report as “a watershed event” that rendered projects that would help the industry “‘in the long run’” moot because: “Unless immediate steps are taken to educate our staff, allies and legislators—and to get some relief from the constant barrage of negative press coverage of ETS—there will be no ‘long run.’ The issue is that serious.” To be sure, the “education” Mozingo envisioned was also rooted in mendacious obfuscation designed “to (1) effectively reassure our allies that the Surgeon General is wrong and (2) then have that message delivered to appropriate lawmakers.” Starting with legislators in crucial states who had received campaign contributions or honoraria, Mozingo proposed “hammer[ing] home” the points that: (1) “ETS does not represent a proven health hazard to nonsmokers”; (2) “if legislators want to go after the real indoor air quality culprit, look to ventilation problems”; and (3) “the surgeon general has replaced scientific integrity with a political agenda.”

Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

One major impediment to convincing legislators that only the cigarette companies with tens of billions of dollars of accumulated capital and future profits at stake were holding high the banner of science and eschewing politics was a bad press:

Unless we can alter the tobacco story lawmakers read every day and hear/see on the news every morning and night, our efforts will be less effective. In our view, the negative tobacco press is one of the keys to the anti’s [sic] success. It makes it difficult for legislators to support our view, much less take the lead in our defense. If we can lessen the impact of some of these stories, and perhaps have our opinions aired or printed, this exercise will be a success.

Mozingo did not bother—presumably because he did not need—to explain to Chilcote why only very selective and manipulable interactions with news media were viable: “Frankly, when a TI spokesperson debates an anti-smoker on, say, McNeil/Lehrer, it seldom helps either the state or federal legislative situation.

---

403Roger Mozingo to Samuel Chilcote, Subject: State Activities’ ETS Plan of Action (Dec. 19, 1986), Bates No. TIOK0023509/13. Mozingo’s comment may have been sparked by a sarcastic memo he had received a few days earlier from Dennis Dyer, the New England regional vice president. Responding to Mozingo’s remark that he had not heard one new idea from his staff in two years, Dyer proposed “posturing” smoking restrictions and “other discriminatory devices of the anti-tobacco groups as elitist discrimination, bigotry, and an erosion of our basic freedoms of speech, property, assembly, etc.” He concluded that “[o]ne of the industry’s biggest problems” was being “viewed as the ‘black hats,’” while its opponents appeared as “protectors of the ‘faithful.’ From that flows the single most obvious reason why we lose legislation—overwhelmingly negative press coverage.” Dyer speculated that his proposal’s long-term effect “could be the return of balanced review of the issue by the people, press, and elected officials.” By balance he meant that the industry could look back on a “good year” if people had begun saying: “‘Yes, there are health questions here; but there are equally important freedom questions that must be weighed.’” Dennis Dyer to Roger Mozingo, Re: Idea #1 (Dec. 11, 1986), Bates No. TIOK0014388/9.
On-site background press work would be more useful in a legislative sense. Little wonder that just a half-year later an industry facing the credibility crisis that flat-earth societies tend to engender was desperate enough to want to explore the possibility of circumventing the press by becoming the press. As a Philip Morris communications department brainstorming group suggested to top management:

Consider acquiring a major media vehicle. Washington Times and Insight examples (Moonies). When founded, these vehicles were prejudged and ignored. Now they are reputable, respected and consulted. Initially, if we controlled such an information outlet, information would be subject to suspicion and scrutiny. But now Insight has a million and a half readers. This grassroots readership cuts the legs from under effete criticism.

Even before 1986 ended, as the tobacco industry processed the import of the surgeon general’s report and the world’s reaction to it, Hurst Marshall and George Minshew, the Tobacco Institute’s vice presidents for the Southern and Northern sectors, respectively, informed its outside legal and regional staff that it was already clear that the ETS report—which “may be the most devastating politically”—“will play a tremendous role in smoking restriction battles in 1987 and beyond. Indeed, the flood of legislative activity caused by the report could spill over into other issues such as cigarette excise tax earmarking.” In order to insure that 1987 was “a successful year on the smoking restriction front,” Marshall and Minshew declared that the State Activities staff had to be “familiar with the latest pro/con ETS arguments.” To that end, they were scheduling briefing sessions by Covington & Burling lawyer John Rupp and the Institute’s “scientific team” (aka International Air Pollution Advisory Group), which would “would review our side of the story and the solid arguments we can bring to the debate.” Their solidity can be gauged by the fact that exactly six months later Rupp, according to the minutes, was constrained to admit at a Philip Morris brainstorming conference on secondhand smoke: “Where we are. In deep shit.”

In fact, even though the surgeon general’s report could scarcely have been adequately digested by the time the state legislative sessions were underway in early 1987, that year did turn out to be a record-breaker for the volume of smoking regulation bills. The following table, included in the Philip Morris “Corporate Affairs Issues Handbook” and presumably based on information collected by TI’s army of state lobbyists, reveals 1987 as the peak for introduction and approval of state bills and local ordinances from 1979 to 1988:

406 M. Hurst Marshall and George Minshew to T.I. Legislative Counsel and Regional Vice Presidents/Directors (Dec. 24, 1986), Bates No. TI12240210/1.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>State Introduced</th>
<th>State Approved</th>
<th>Local Introduced</th>
<th>Local Approved</th>
<th>Total Introduced</th>
<th>Total Approved</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>114</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>172</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1980</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>149</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1981</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>35</td>
<td>165</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1982</td>
<td>86</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>79</td>
<td>42</td>
<td>165</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>86</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>120</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>206</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>109</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>180</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>289</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td>142</td>
<td>26</td>
<td>232</td>
<td>114</td>
<td>374</td>
<td>140</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1986</td>
<td>140</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>255</td>
<td>139</td>
<td>395</td>
<td>156</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>191</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>301</td>
<td>169</td>
<td>492</td>
<td>197</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1988</td>
<td>189</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>253</td>
<td>123</td>
<td>411</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Thus alone from 1986 to 1987 the number of state bills introduced rose 36 percent compared to a rise of only 23 percent from 1979 to 1986; the proportionate increase in the volume of local ordinances introduced from 1986 to 1987 was also significant, but not so high as in the first half of the 1980s. In spite of the large increase in state bills introduced in 1987, the rate of approval reached 15 percent, the second highest of the 10-year period (to 18 percent in 1985); although the rate of approval of local bills reached its high point in 1987, at 56 percent it was not significantly higher than in most other years.

---

House File 79 in 1987: Stores Finally Become a “Public Place,” But Restaurants Remain Excluded

When Zimmerman became lieutenant governor, her bill, as she later observed, became Johnie Hammond’s “baby”...it ended up being Hammond’s bill in the House and Hannon’s in the Senate.” Hammond, who had grown up in Mississippi and Texas and studied social work, was bothered by smoke “quite a bit.” The Zimmerman-Hammond-Hannon “baby” that finally saw the statutory light of day in 1987 fell far short of its progenitrixes’ intentions because it continued to lack what they regarded as its most important feature—coverage of restaurants. The bills that Hammond (H.F. 79) and Hannon (S.F. 244) filed in 1987 were not exactly identical with H.F. 102, which Zimmerman had filed in 1985 or that the House had passed in 1986. The Hammond-Hannon bill was stricter by virtue of lacking the exclusions of restaurants with fewer than 32 seats and of other public places with under 200 square feet of floor space of H.F. 102 as passed and the exclusion of factories and warehouses of both versions of Zimmerman’s bill; on the other hand, it was less stringent in lacking the provision in H.F. 102 as filed that imposed a penalty on a building proprietor who knew that someone was smoking in violation of the law and nevertheless failed to advise him or her of the prohibition, as well as in providing for a penalty of only $50 compared to the $100 penalty in H.F. 102 as filed.

At the end of January, the House State Government Committee to which H.F. 79 was referred constituted a five-member subcommittee, consisting of Hammond herself and two other Democrats and two Republicans, to report on it. Presumably two of its members, Democrat Dennis Renaud and Republican Philip Tyrrell, who prominently opposed regulation of smoking and ultimately voted against the bill on the floor—as Renaud had done regarding Zimmerman’s bill in 1985—were appointed to this body by their party leaders. The subcommittee released its report on June 1, 1987.

409 Jo Ann Zimmerman, Interview with Suzanne Schenken, Summer 1991 at 56, in Jo Ann Zimmerman Papers, Box 1, Folder: Biographical Oral History Interview 1991, IWA.
410 A Political Dialogue: Iowa’s Women Legislators,” Box 2, Folder: Transcripts: Johnie Hammond at 26 (Oct. 17, 1991), IWA.
411 H.F. 79 (Jan. 21, 1987).
413 State of Iowa: 1987: Journal of the House: 1987 Regular Session Seventy-Second General Assembly 1: 87 (Jan. 27). The other two members were Peterson and Shoning, the latter of whom had been a cosponsor of H.F. 102 in 1985.
1986—were responsible for the changes weakening the bill that the subcommittee reported back to the full committee at its meeting on February 16. The subcommittee amendment that Hammond offered encompassed several minor changes as well as one major restriction of coverage, one major restriction of enforcement, and one minor strengthening of enforcement. The most important restriction excluded from coverage factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces that the general public did not usually frequent, subject to the exception that their employee cafeterias were required to have a designated nonsmoking area. The committee quickly adopted this change by a show of hands 13 to 6. The major restriction of enforcement weakened the requirement that proprietors ask smokers to refrain from smoking on request of someone claiming discomfort caused by the smoke by limiting it only to smoking that was taking place in a no-smoking area. As a result, what in H.F. 79 was a potentially powerful tool to subvert the bill’s failure to protect nonsmokers from exposure to drifting smoke was defanged to apply only to formal violations of the ban on smoking in nosmoking areas—even in public places in which the vast majority of the space was designated as a smoking area, thus giving smokers very little occasion to smoke in the tiny nosmoking area. Finally, the minor improvement in enforcement required inspectors of public places subject to inspection under other laws to check for compliance with the posting requirement.

---

415 For example, the amendment expressly added lobbies and malls to the universe of named covered public places, but they already met the bill’s definition of a “public place as “any enclosed indoor area used by the general public” and as “other commercial establishments.” Subcommittee amendment to House File 79, attached to [House] State Government Committee [Meeting Minutes] (Feb. 16, 1987) (copy furnished by SHSI DM); H.F. 79, § 1.

416 Subcommittee amendment to House File 79, attached to [House] State Government Committee [Meeting Minutes] (Feb. 16, 1987) (copy furnished by SHSI DM). Although, as already explained, this exclusion of factories and warehouses derived from the 1975 Minnesota statute, the latter directed the Department of Labor and Industry to promulgate regulations “rules to restrict or prohibit smoking in those places of work where the close proximity of workers or the inadequacy of ventilation causes smoke pollution detrimental to the health and comfort of nonsmoking employees.” 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 4, at 633, 634. See above ch. 24. These rules, codified at Minn. Rules §§ 5205.0900-0950 (1987), were repealed in 1987. State Register 12:634, 662 (Oct. 5, 1987).

Before voting on these other provisions of the subcommittee amendment, the committee discussed individual members’ various amendments. First it rejected one—the personal motivation for filing which can only be guessed at—by Des Moines Democrat Florence Buhr, a heavy smoker, to exclude shoe repair shops from coverage by a show of hands 12 to 5.\footnote{Committee [Meeting Minutes] (Feb. 16, 1987) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).} That Renaud’s amendment to limit coverage of restaurants to those seating at least 50 persons and of offices and waiting rooms with at least 300 square feet of floor space lost on a nine to nine tie vote demonstrated already at this early stage in the legislative process that opposition to complete restaurant coverage—even under a bill that barely constrained smoking—was widespread. The same outcome on Renaud’s stripped-down follow-up amendment containing only the restaurant provision underscored the hard-core character of the membership of the anti-anti-smoking group. Undaunted, Renaud then tried to increase from 32 to 50 the number of people to whom a bar had the capacity to serve meals simultaneously before it was covered (although the only consequence of coverage, since a bar was the only public place that could lawfully be designated a smoking area in its entirety, was that such designation had to be posted at entrances), but the committee rejected it by a show of hands 10 to 8. At last, Renaud achieved a significant weakening of enforcement when the committee by a voice vote adopted his last amendment reducing the penalty from $50 to only $10. This willingness to diminish financial deterrence so drastically also augured ill for enactment of a capacious and strictly enforced anti-smoking law. Finally, the committee adopted by voice vote an amendment offered by Democrat Minnette Doderer (a sometime smoker) eliminating the aforementioned language requiring a request by someone claiming discomfort from smoke\footnote{Buhr had filed the same amendment in 1985. H-3287 (Mar. 8, 1985).} to trigger the proprietor’s responsibility to ask smokers to refrain from smoking as part of his duty to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place....”\footnote{Subcommittee amendment to House File 79, attached to [House] State Government Committee [Meeting Minutes] (Feb. 16, 1987) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).} Committee members who opposed H.F. 79 protested that the bill constituted

\begin{footnotesize}
\footnote{That Renaud’s amendment to limit coverage of restaurants to those seating at least 50 persons and of offices and waiting rooms with at least 300 square feet of floor space lost on a nine to nine tie vote demonstrated already at this early stage in the legislative process that opposition to complete restaurant coverage—even under a bill that barely constrained smoking—was widespread. The same outcome on Renaud’s stripped-down follow-up amendment containing only the restaurant provision underscored the hard-core character of the membership of the anti-anti-smoking group. Undaunted, Renaud then tried to increase from 32 to 50 the number of people to whom a bar had the capacity to serve meals simultaneously before it was covered (although the only consequence of coverage, since a bar was the only public place that could lawfully be designated a smoking area in its entirety, was that such designation had to be posted at entrances), but the committee rejected it by a show of hands 10 to 8. At last, Renaud achieved a significant weakening of enforcement when the committee by a voice vote adopted his last amendment reducing the penalty from $50 to only $10. This willingness to diminish financial deterrence so drastically also augured ill for enactment of a capacious and strictly enforced anti-smoking law. Finally, the committee adopted by voice vote an amendment offered by Democrat Minnette Doderer (a sometime smoker) eliminating the aforementioned language requiring a request by someone claiming discomfort from smoke to trigger the proprietor’s responsibility to ask smokers to refrain from smoking as part of his duty to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place....”} an “undue imposition” on smokers and business owners.\footnote{Thomas Fogarty, “Smoking Law Gets OK from House Panel,” \textit{DMR}, Feb. 17, 1987 (2A:3).} In particular, Tyrrell, a self-employed insurance agent\footnote{\textit{Iowa Official Register: 1987-1988}, at 79 (62d vol., Paulee Lipsman et al. eds.).} who had quit smoking after 36 years, seeing further into the future than any of the bill’s advocates could presumably have even dreamed, complained that the measure was “a step toward the banning of cigarettes in cars and homes.” For him, as for other opponents who had not yet grasped the import of the new learning about the health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure, there was no doubt that: “‘We’re just intruding too much and too far into people’s lives.’” Ignoring Hammond’s admonition that smokers threatened bystanders’ health, thus triggering the state’s obligation to protect the public health, Tyrrell offered up a self-caricature of his know-nothingism: “‘Some of you find tobacco smoke offensive. . . . To me, cheap perfume is offensive.’”\footnote{Thomas Fogarty, “Smoking Law Gets OK from House Panel,” \textit{DMR}, Feb. 17, 1987 (2A:3).} In the end, rejecting Tyrrell’s motion to defer the bill, the State Government Committee passed H.F. 79 by a vote of 13 to 6.\footnote{Section 3 of the Arkansas Protection from Secondhand Smoke for Children Act of 2006 prohibits smoking in all motor vehicles in which a child under the age of six and weighing under 60 pounds is restrained in a child passenger safety seat. In 2007 the city of Bangor, Maine passed an ordinance under which: “It shall be unlawful for the operator or any passenger in a motor vehicle, passenger van, pick-up truck or commercial vehicle, when any person under the age of 18 is present in the vehicle, regardless of whether the motor vehicle’s windows are down.” City of Bangor, Maine, Ordinance 07-50 (Jan 8, 2007) (codified at § 291-70(A), on http://www.e-codes.generalcode.com/codebook_frameset.asp?ep=fs&t=ws&cb=1684_A). For an example of a court decision virtually prohibiting a mother from smoking in her house, see Roofeh v. Roofeh, 525 NYS2d 765 (1988).} Nevertheless, the constricted coverage and less stringent enforcement that opponents succeeded in grafting onto the bill before it ever reached the House floor insured that the debate would begin from a less advantageous base for supporters.
\end{footnotesize}
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

bars as public places. So far ahead of its time that it took two decades for the legislature to catch up with it, the amendment lost on a non-record vote.\textsuperscript{427} Then Democrat Dennis Renaud, a smoker,\textsuperscript{428} succeeding where he had failed in committee, offered an amendment to exclude from coverage restaurants, retail stores, offices, and waiting rooms of under 300 square feet of floor space—apparently without explaining whether his own barber business\textsuperscript{429} fell below the minimum size threshold. Following its adoption on a non-record vote, the committee amendment as amended was also adopted.\textsuperscript{430} When the House resumed consideration of H.F. 79 after a two-day recess, it adopted a series of amendments further diluting the bill. By a non-record roll-call vote of 48 to 39, the House undertook the most significant and high-profile diminution of coverage by adopting Renaud’s amendment to exclude restaurants with a seating capacity of fewer than 50 persons.\textsuperscript{431} Also adopted were two amendments by Democrat Emil Pavich to exclude both retail stores at least 50 percent of whose sales were of tobacco products and even “the portion of a retail store” where they were sold.\textsuperscript{432} After adopting yet two more weakening amendments, excluding lobbies and malls encompassing under 300 square feet of floor space\textsuperscript{433} and hotel/motel rooms from the definition of a covered “public place,”\textsuperscript{434} the House rejected an initiative to expand coverage: on a non-record roll-call vote of 35 to 14, it defeated an amendment to strike the exclusion of dormitory residential rooms from the definition of “public place” offered by Republican Mike Van Camp, an International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers electrician, who had voted against H.F. 102 in 1986. On a close 48 to 46 vote Van Camp’s amendment to prohibit the assessment of court costs in addition to penalties also lost. Finally, the House rejected by a large majority (50 to 23) an amendment offered by the aggressive anti-regulatory Tyrrell that would have created a system of reverse local preemption under which the law would not have been effective in any city or county unless the city council or county board of supervisors passed an ordinance adopting it. Having been substantially watered down by the committee and individual amendments, and thus “contain[ing] plenty of exceptions,” H.F. 79 was able to secure an overwhelming 77 to 18 majority on final passage. Democrats controlled the House by a 58 to 42 majority, but equal numbers of Democrats and Republicans opposed the bill.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

On its arrival in the Senate, which had killed Zimmerman’s bill in 1986 and was still controlled by Democrats (30 to 20) and its largely smoking leadership, H.F. 79 was referred to the State Government Committee, whose members, according to chairman Bob Carr, included “five of the heaviest smokers in the Senate”—Democrat Joseph Coleman and Republicans Richard Drake, Jack Nystrom, Jack Rife, and John Soorholtz. As a result, Carr expected the committee vote on the bill to be “very close.” Coleman, the Senate’s most 435 State of Iowa: 1987: Journal of the House: 1987 Regular Session Seventy-Second General Assembly 1: 544 (Mar. 6) (H-3089). If dormitory rooms had been covered by the law, then educational institutions would presumably have banned smoking in them altogether since the alternative of designating a smoking area would have made even less sense than in other locations such as stores and offices.

2656
belligerent opponent of smoking regulation in the Senate itself, and “an unashamed two-pack-a-day puffer” who dismissively observed that there were “always those that have got to have a crusade,” was paired with Jean Lloyd-Jones, its most insistent anti-smoker, on the subcommittee to which the bill was assigned.\(^{444}\)

On March 12, before the Senate began dealing with H.F. 79, the Clean Indoor Air Coalition, consisting of 30 businesses and organizations, including the American Cancer Society (ACS), American Association of Retired Persons, Iowa PTA, and Drake University,\(^{446}\) organized a hearing before about 60 people at the Statehouse in Des Moines. A former chairman of the Iowa Republican Party, Steve Roberts, of the ACS, revealed how moderate and ready-to-compromise the group was when he contended that: “We are not here to support a bill that would cut off the rights of smokers.” Instead, they were seeking a “balance” to protect nonsmokers from risks associated with secondhand smoke exposure.\(^{447}\) To be sure, unless he held a highly technical notion of “rights,” Roberts’ position was manifestly disingenuous, since the whole point of the anti-smoking movement was to roll back the norms defining the spaces that smokers, powerfully aided by tobacco companies, had appropriated during the twentieth century. Much closer to the truth came another speaker, Dr. Miles Weinberger, a pediatric and lung disease specialist at the University of Iowa Hospital, who declared: “This law will be one incredibly small step in sending the ashtray to the same place we sent the spittoon years ago.”\(^{448}\)

In an unusual backgrounder on the bill, the Des Moines Register interviewed Senate Majority Leader Hutchins, who, without having counted the votes, allowed as H.F. 79 had a good chance of passage, but denied that the fact that he had quit smoking several months earlier had anything to do with the bill’s improved prospects. Indeed, he even asserted that the bill would also have passed in 1986 “if we had brought it up.” He insisted that one reason that the Senate had killed it was that it had also passed a mandatory seat-belt law and raised the \(^{444}\)Jane Norman, “Bill to Restrict Smoking Likely to Get Senate’s OK,” DMR, Mar. 15, 1987 (1B:5-6, at 4B:6).

---

\(^ {446}\)Jane Norman, “Bill to Restrict Smoking Likely to Get Senate’s OK,” DMR, Mar. 15, 1987 (1B:5-6).

\(^ {448}\)Jane Norman, “Bill to Restrict Smoking Likely to Get Senate’s OK,” DMR, Mar. 15, 1987 (1B:5-6, at 4B:6).
drinking age to 21: “I don’t think it’s wise politically to pass too many of those kinds of bills in one session.... There were just a lot of controversial issues last year and it’s those kinds of things that cause the public to throw people out of office.” Another reason for the bill’s brighter prospects in 1987 was its exclusion of smaller businesses. Although Hannon and Hammond agreed that Iowa was finally “ready to crack down on smokers,” they also recognized that—in a vast understatement—“the tobacco industry has a deep interest in the subject and has been using prominent lobbyists to fight the bill....”

In the event, at the March 31 meeting of the 15-member Senate State Government Committee, Lloyd-Jones reported that she and Republican Senator Forrest Schwengels had signed the subcommittee report recommending passage (meaning that Coleman had not). She then offered an amendment (which would almost immediately become moot) requiring restaurants with a seating capacity of fewer than 50 persons—which the House bill excluded from coverage—if they lacked a designated nosmoking area, conspicuously to post a sign to that effect at the entrances. It was adopted with nine Ayes. Then probusiness/libertarian Republican Senator Julia Gentleman offered an amendment to exclude all restaurants from the bill. She tried to justify it on the grounds that: “You don’t need government to tell restaurants what to do.” The bill’s manager, Jean Lloyd-Jones, who, in the aseptic words of the official minutes, “encouraged the committee to resist the amendment,” in fact countered: “I’ve heard a lot of people say when they go out to eat at a nice restaurant they’d like to sit and enjoy their expensive meal without smoke fumes on their plates.” Broadening her argument to encompass the non-well-heeled, Lloyd-Jones added a plea to “allow us our rights to inhale clean air free from what they call sidestream smoke, which is very dangerous....” Significantly, “with little discussion,” the committee then adopted the amendment with eight Ayes and by a vote of 8 to 4...
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

recommended passage of H.F. 79 as amended. Only three of the five heavy smokers (Coleman, Rife, and Soorholtz), joined by Gentleman, voted Nay. Overall, of the seven smokers three voted No, three voted Yes, and one abstained (at least from voting). To be sure, the two-thirds majority may have been a function of the adoption of the amendment eliminating restaurants, which, while not completely eviscerating the measure, by removing the most contentious location of secondhand smoke battles, presumably made the bill more acceptable to some smokers, libertarians ignorant of the public health consequences, and business owners opposed to any regulation.

When the full Senate took up H.F. 79 on April 22, Senator Edgar Holden, a very pro-business Republican, moved the adoption of his radical amendment, which would have banned smoking altogether in all public places (expanded to include bars and all restaurants) and not simply in designated areas, thus creating a level of protection against secondhand smoke exposure that no state had yet enacted. Given his generally conservative and anti-government intervention views and the prominent anti-regulatory role he had played in resisting passage of the original clean indoor air law in 1978, it is most implausible that Holden could have intended his proposal as anything but a killer amendment. His denial to the contrary notwithstanding, floor manager Lloyd-Jones rejected the amendment as going “too far. ‘We’re not telling you to stop smoking... We’re just saying give us an area where we can breathe clean air.’” Since the very weak provisions of H.F. 79 did not even purport to satisfy that minimalist criterion, heavy-smoking Republican Jack Rife may have anachronistically accused his opponents of pursuing a strategy that it is very implausible any of them even dreamed of being able to see realized in their lifetimes, but he nevertheless grasped the truth that nonsmokers “‘won’t be happy until we have an outright ban.’”⁴⁵⁹ For whatever reasons, three-fourths of Holden’s colleagues disagreed with him, defeating his amendment 36 to 13 on a non-record roll call.⁴⁶⁰

Gentleman then moved adoption of the committee amendment excluding coverage of all restaurants, which the Senate narrowly rejected 23 to 26 on a non-record roll call, thus restoring coverage for the time being.⁴⁶¹ Lloyd-Jones correctly interpreted the vote by reference to the fact that inclusion of restaurants had been, “after all, the major reason most people are supportive of “the bill. Rife’s scare tactic—“I think you’re playing havoc here with the business community”—failed as yet to secure the three vote-switches he needed for passage.⁴⁶²

Counterattacking, a bipartisan group of six Democrats and six Republicans—including the aforementioned five heaviest smokers—led by smoker Joe Welsh offered a floor amendment that would have severely undermined the bill by depriving those in control of public places of the discretion to declare them entirely nosmoking. Since such a power to declare places off-limits to smoking was presumably inherent in private property rights, and since one of the mainstays of prosmoking propaganda had always been the claim that the decision whether to permit smoking should be left to the property owner, this proposed legislative override was astonishing. And going ever further, Welsh’s amendment also imposed an affirmative duty on those in control to “provide sufficient area in which smoking is permitted to accommodate all persons who wish to do so.”⁴⁶³ Welsh’s justification for the initiative was

---

⁴⁶³ State of Iowa: 1987: Journal of the Senate: 1987 Regular Session Seventy-Second General Assembly 2:2607 (Apr. 22) (S-3723). The first provision of the amendment would have achieved its object by changing “Smoking areas may be designated” to “shall.” The sponsors were: Welsh (D), Rife (R), Linn Fuhrman (R), William Palmer (D), Alvin Miller (D), Soorholtz (R), Schwengels (R), Drake (R), Nystrom (R), Husak (D), Coleman (D), and Riordan (D). Palmer and Miller were also heavy smokers. Email from Beverly incoherent: “You can’t change behavior overnight.... By guaranteeing smokers a smoking area we could expect better compliance.”
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

Since the law notoriously provided no protection from drifting smoke, Welsh failed to address the question as to how compliance with a feckless law could be superior to possibly less than strict compliance with a stringent law. In the event, the amendment failed by a vote of 22 to 26; its supporters were equally divided between Democrats and Republicans, with Majority Leader Hutchins and two of his three assistant floor leaders and two of the assistant minority floor leaders voting Aye. The vote, however, was reconsidered the same day (25 to 22), though Hutchins had further action on it and the whole bill deferred. But before the deferral, the Senate voted 26 to 23 on non-record roll call to adopt an amendment offered by Holden that further gutted the bill by doing away with the enforcement provision altogether by eliminating the owner’s responsibility not only to ask smokers to refrain from smoking in nosmoking areas, but to inform them that smoking was prohibited by law.

The Senate did not resume consideration of H.F. 79 until May 7, devoting “the most time” to Welsh’s amendment that would have imposed the designation of a smoking area in every covered public place. The best argument that Coleman could muster for the requirement was: “‘Just be a little reasonable.’” But floor manager Lloyd-Jones and other senators rejected it on the grounds that “there are businesses in the state that want to set their own policy on whether or not smoking is permitted at all on their premises.” In particular, Robert Carr, the State Government Committee chair, pointed out the incongruous outcome that it “‘would mandate hospitals have a smoking place.’” For reasons that are unclear, further action was deferred at Senator Horn’s request and later in the day Welsh himself withdrew the amendment, thus bringing to an unsuccessful end that opportunistic initiative to nullify private property rights. Instead Welsh offered a new amendment that merely created a new code subsection setting out the same $10 civil penalty and prohibiting the imposition of court costs, which was adopted by a voice vote. Then, moving on to the central provision of the entire bill, Welsh moved to reconsider the Senate’s 23 to 26 vote two weeks earlier rejecting the committee’s amendment excluding restaurants from coverage. Having prevailed on that motion, Welsh reduced parliamentary power to its most brutal form in replying to Lloyd-Jones’s query as to why he was “pushing” an amendment that the Senate had already rejected: “Because at this time we have the votes to do it.” And in fact they did—29 of them against only 21 expressing a preference to include restaurants under a regime that would have excluded restaurants seating fewer than 50 people and would have permitted larger restaurants to comply by setting aside just one table as the nosmoking area. Approximately equal proportions of Democrats and Republicans voted to exclude restaurants, but both the majority and minority leaders and two of their three assistant floor leaders, together with almost all of the heavy smokers, joined them. The Senate then overwhelmingly passed H.F. 79 by a vote of 45 to 5. In a vast understatement before the bill was returned to the House, Lloyd-Jones, “disappointed at the way this bill is turning out,” bemoaned that “we have greatly weakened it.” The next day the House voted 75 to 15 to concur in the Senate’s amendments.

Hannon to Marc Linder (June 15, 2007). See below.

In the end, the new law did expand coverage to encompass workplaces, retail

---

472 State of Iowa: 1987: Journal of the Senate: 1987 Regular Session Seventy-Second General Assembly 2:1767 (May 7). Nystrom appears to have been the most prominent smoker to have voted for coverage.
473 State of Iowa: 1987: Journal of the Senate: 1987 Regular Session Seventy-Second General Assembly 2:1768 (May 7). Heavy smokers Coleman and Rife voted Nay together with Republicans Corning and Gentleman. Hannon’s vote might have been a protest against the gutting of the bill: “I imagine I was so disgusted with what had been done to the bill that I voted against it.” Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (June 18, 2007).
475 State of Iowa: 1987: Journal of the House: 1987 Regular Session Seventy-Second General Assembly 2:2164-66 (May 8). Of the 15 votes cast against the Senate amendments, 11 were cast by members who had also voted against H.F. 79 in March.
stores, offices and waiting rooms with at least 300 square feet of floor space, other commercial establishments, educational facilities, and hospitals, clinics, nursing homes, and other health care and medical facilities. In terms of enforcement alone, the measure dismantled much of the meager rigor of the 1978 statute. First, it repealed the requirement imposed on proprietors of informing persons they observed smoking in violation of the law that smoking was prohibited by law. Second, H.F. 79 substituted for this direct intervention two indirect “responsibilities of proprietors”: thenceforward, those in custody/control of a public place were merely required to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place or public meeting by posting appropriate signs indicating no-smoking or smoking areas and arranging seating accordingly.” (To be sure, just as under the 1978 statute no penalty attached to the failure to comply with the duty to inform, under H.F. 79 the responsibilities section was not subject to penalties, though failure to post signs was.) And third, the bill watered down the prescribed content of the required signs by deleting the language “‘smoking prohibited by law’ or words or symbols of similar effect” in favor of the much weaker “advising patrons of smoking and non-smoking sections.” All of these weakening amendments proved enduring, remaining in the code until 2008.

Once Governor Branstad had signed H.F. 79 into law, the struggle once again resumed to supplement Iowa’s weak anti-public smoking statute by finally incorporating restaurants. At the end of 1987, the Tobacco Institute overestimated the strength or tenacity of the anti-smoking movement in Iowa when it speculated that in 1988 “[t]here may be some attempt to restrict smoking further than in the measure enacted in 1987, but such attempts should be manageable.” On the other hand, its forecast was accurate that “Des Moines is the only likely area of local anti-tobacco activity; smoking and sampling restriction proposals are likely to surface there.”

4761987 Iowa Laws ch. 219, § 1, at 367.
4771987 Iowa Laws ch. 219, § 7, at 367, 368.
4781987 Iowa Laws ch. 219, § 3, at 367, 368.
4791987 Iowa Laws ch. 219, § 4, at 367, 368.
4801987 Iowa Laws ch. 219, at 367.
The Cigarette Oligopoly May Have Won a Partial Victory in Iowa, But Philip Morris Recognizes that Nationally “we are [i]n deep shit”

We propose three strategies:
1. Demonstrate that over-reaction to every day [sic] annoyances is anti-social.
...
3. And most importantly...help smokers realize that obnoxious anti-smokers are the social problem...not smokers themselves.482

During the last week of June 1987, just days before the new law would go into effect,483 Philip Morris held a four-day conference at swanky Sea Pines Vacation Resort on Hilton Head Island within the framework of its Project Down Under to deal with the deteriorating “public policy situation” of the metastasizing struggles against involuntary exposure to cigarette smoke reinforced by the recent surgeon general’s report on environmental tobacco smoke and “its alleged harmfulness to non-smokers.” The point of this exercise was not simply to exchange suggestions; rather, as Philip Morris vice chairman R. William Murray explained to Thomas Osdene, the firm’s director of science and technology, he and president and CEO Frank Resnik had “been instructed to...arrive at solutions that can be immediately implemented.” Among the “small” and “select group”484 of Philip Morris officials attending were two directors of science and technology, a vice president and general counsel, director of corporate affairs planning, the corporate affairs communications director, vice president for business and planning, and vice president for corporate staff.485 The agenda for these participants, who were housed “on the plantation” in “villas” with two bedrooms and a living room, was so studded with breaks, meals, cocktails, free time, and recreation such as golf, tennis, fishing, “beach fun,” and “poolside recreation,” that the conference strongly resembled a fully paid vacation.486 To be sure, the 483 Initial enforcement, to judge by events in Iowa City, may have been minimal: the police chief there admitted that “I don’t know how to issue a citation on it” and also did not know how long it would take before legal counsel would explain how, when, and where to issue citations so that the police force could begin writing up offenders. Joseph Levy, “Smoking Law Has Little Local Effect,” DI, July 9, 1987 (1:2-6 at 2-3).

484 R. W. Murray to Thomas Osdene (June 8, 1987), Bates No. 202351341/2.
485 The job titles of the participants listed in Guy L. Smith IV (v.p. corp. affairs) to Operation Downunder Participants (June 17, 1987), Bates No. 202351344/5, were taken from http://legacy.library.ucsf.edu/glossaries/pm_gloss_a.jsp 486 Operation Downunder Agenda (June 17, 1987), Bates No. 2024270524-7. convener characterized the sessions as including “entertaining meals and enough leisure time to facilitate thought, reflection, and introspection.”

The belligerent bravado that had characterized the industry’s initial response to the release of the surgeon general’s report half a year earlier had largely vanished, replaced, as the profoundly revelatory contemporaneous notes of this grotesque meeting document, by a desperate search for a magical means of avoiding the “devastating effect on sales” of the inexorable constriction of smoking that the anti-environmental tobacco smoke movement was manifestly accelerating. After conceding that a “scientific battle was lost with SG’s ’86 report,” that the direct problem was the threat to the number of smokers and the number of cigarettes they smoked, and that the broader problem included a “general decline in social acceptability of smoking,” the “[w]orst case scenario” of “[h]ow to support current smokers in face of overwhelming adverse information and publicity,” and the “[i]logic that if mainstream smoke is damaging, ETS must be too,” conference participants veered off into wholly implausible fixes for a “[b]ig, complex problem” such as “making people feel good about Philip Morris” and smokers.

John Rupp, the Covington & Burling partner who was the key lawyer in charge of overseeing the industry’s response to the ETS challenge, set the tone for the conference by laying out some of the reasons that “we are in deep shit.” The cigarette companies’ serious credibility problem” was in large part a function of the surgeon general’s “tremendous credibility.” With regard to the science of ETS, Rupp argued that despite the cigarette industry’s position that ETS had not been shown to be hazardous to nonsmokers’ health, “[w]e cannot say ETS is ‘safe’ and if we do, this is a ‘dangerous’ statement.” From the legal 487 Guy L. Smith IV (v.p. corp. affairs) to Operation Downunder Participants (June 17, 1987), Bates No. 202351344/5.

---

488 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 8 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/109.
489 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 11 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/112.
490 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 9 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/110.
491 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 10 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/111.
492 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 9 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/110.
493 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 4 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/105.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88 perspective, the tobacco companies’ position was scarcely any better: most anti-smoking laws were invulnerable to challenge and—or, more accurately, because—“[w]e won’t be able to establish “the right to smoke.” No legal basis for this ‘right.’” Under those circumstances, Rupp’s assurance that there was also “[n]o constitutional right to be free of ETS” offered little comfort since the ever expanding body of unchallengeable state and local smoking bans would eventually provide ample protection to the ever widening majority of non-smokers. In particular at the workplace, Rupp had to admit that it was “[f]rustrating” for his law firm to get referrals from smokers because “[n]ot much can be done except bluff threats.” The evolving character of the “REAL ADVERSARY out there” that the industry was battling was nicely captured by an especially ominous handwriting-on-the-wall scenario: “Detroit Free Press, NY Times, Miami Herald have all declared non-smoking news rooms. These are people who are spreading the news and their own attitudes have changed.”

The conference turned downright surreal during a 10 p.m. “Brainstorming Session” that dramatically underscored how clueless Philip Morris was. Despite the directive to “come away from Sea Pines with a reasonable, responsible, and rational approach to solving the problem,” the 116 numbered figments of this late-night fevered collective imagination included these bizarre “Solutions to problem”:

2. Develop products that have beneficial value to non-smokers.
11. Create a bigger monster (AIDS).
12. Make it hurt (political risk) to take us on.
15. Make non-smokers fearful of consequences of office smoking bans (drug testing, etc.).
33. Create science journal.
34. Create non-science journal.
39. Infiltrate W.H.O.
43. Mark packages “Please smoke courteously.”
49. Acquire major media vehicle.

[Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 5 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/106. Six years later the U.S. Supreme Court did in fact recognize that a prisoner did state a cause of action under the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution in alleging that prison officials had with deliberate indifference exposed him to ETS levels—his cellmate smoked five packs of cigarettes daily—posing “an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his future health.” Helling v. McKinney, 509 US 25, 35 (1993).

[Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 8 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/109.

Guy Smith IV to Operation Downunder Participants (June 17, 1987), Bates No. 2023551344.
69. Get Nader-like group to examine anti funding.
71. Fund major university media resources and training center for science writers.
73. Support social research on positive aspects of smoking to society.
97. Involve non-smoker in mystique of smoking.
112. Cement relationship with women smokers, e.g. child care
114. Condoms in cigarette packages.

By the sober light of day at 8:15 the next morning, an “[e]xamination of 116 ideas” revealed that “[w]e don’t have anything to slam them with on health issue.” In objection to what had perhaps been the most startling serious solution—“Adopt end game strategy. Maximize cash flow”—the morning session had nothing more weighty to offer than that an endgame option as a “controlled retreat [u]sually...accelerates into an abrupt end. Fighting back now is therefore better.”

Otherwise the most serious proposal concerned support for “segregating” smokers and nonsmokers, a “[m]ajor policy change” and “[g]ood market strategy,” which was marred by the fact that it gave a “foot in the door for antis.” In part this proposal was driven by the insight that if Philip Morris, like the “intransigent” RJR, did not “budge on accommodation,” it would “lose” because it would be perceived as no less “fanatic[]” than the antis; by the same token, the company could “create public perception that we are reasonable by saying we support accommodation”—but only “as long as smokers’ rights are not abridged.” (To be sure, if smokers could continue to smoke wherever and whenever they wished, “accommodation” of nonsmokers’ right not to be exposed to secondhand smoke would be even more of a hoax than laws confining smoking to designated smoking areas.) But at this point, despite acknowledging that “[t]he smoker is the underdog and nobody cares,” since the conference participants insisted that “[a]ll Americans should fear legislation,” virtually all they were willing to concede was the preservation of “free market choice.”

498[Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 17 (June 25, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/118.
499[Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 16 (June 24, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/117.
500[Philip Morris], Project Down Under Conference Notes at 18 (June 25, 1987), Bates No. 2021502102/119.
“reasonableness,” the communications group would consider “costless areas of compromise—e.g., ‘We will accept a no-smoking “policy” bill for elevators if you need to pass something.’”

Credulity buckles under the claim made at the outset of the third day of the conference, devoted to a group presentation to senior management, that the Philip Morris communications staff viewed the melange of mendacious, outlandish, and trivial proposals as “exciting,” let alone that they believed that the “brainstorming” constituted “rigorous testing....” The first of four “[b]asic recommendations” was the “Big Chill strategy” of advocating accommodation (to deal with the mere “annoyance” perceived by nonsmokers while denying that scientists had shown any health risk associated with secondhand smoke) and continued opposition to government intervention including a drive to repeal existing restrictive laws.503 “Big Chill”—designed to “chill anti-smoking rhetoric”—was “the unifying strategy providing...overall direction for the tactics applied to the different target audiences,”504 and was to be buttressed by support of pseudo-scientific “activity” on ETS and indoor air pollution in addition to a focus on the risible “positive sociological” and vastly exaggerated economic aspects of smoking. The other two recommendations encompassed the wishful thinking of identifying a “‘rainmaker’”-spokesperson (such as Lee Iacocca) who would publicly embody the company’s (fraudulent) “message” and the thuggish “N[ational]R[ifle]A[ssociation] strategy” of “[p]utting some people out of business who are trying to put us out of business.” That these corporate communications specialists conceived of this concoction as a “MIRV”505 (Multiple Independently Targetable Reentry Vehicle) suggests that they were themselves the primary victims of their own bunkum. This possibility was most visibly on display in the assertion that this pathetically transparent self-interested nonsense would “[m]ake non-smokers perceive ETS as a non issue,” “[i]solating anti-smokers and make them perceived as shrill and unreasonable,” and transform Philip Morris from “‘black hat’ to at least ‘gray hat’ on this issue.”506

503[Philip Morris], Project Down Under--Group Presentation to Senior Management at 1, 3 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/3.
504[Philip Morris], Summary: Operation Down Under Conference at 1-2 (June 24-26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502679/80.
505[Philip Morris], Project Down Under--Group Presentation to Senior Management at 1, 3 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/3.
506[Philip Morris], Project Down Under--Group Presentation to Senior Management at 2 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/2.
The top corporate brass was interested in probing the risks linked to the overall proposal. When the vice chairman of Philip Morris Companies, Inc., R. William Murray (who until then had been president and CEO of Philip Morris International and later would occupy the same positions at Philip Morris Companies) asked whether the initiative might “just make the situation worse,” he heard an earful:

The situation can’t get any worse. Sales are down, can’t be attributed to taxes or price increases. ETS is the link between smokers and non-smokers and is, thus, the anti’s silver bullet. The Equal Employment Opportunity Council [sic] reports most companies in country are working on regulations to control smoking based on ETS. There is a continual decline in smoking opportunities at work, in travel, in leisure time.

Raising profile of ETS could cause a link back to primary issue. This is the greatest risk. For example, ACS sees us raising noise level, comes back with “You are so responsible now about accommodating non-smokers, what about your own customers who you are killing?”

We have partitioned annoyance and health. Also we can turn valve off of entire program at any time if we see that primary issue is being stimulated.507

Despite having learned how widespread and profound the impact of the secondhand smoke rebellion had been, Murray nevertheless revealed that his grip on reality was more rather than less tenuous than his underlings’ by asking the communicators whether they thought that increasing restrictions based on ETS would “not fade out.” Murray was so disconnected from the development most likely to trigger the downfall of his industry that he had to be told there was “a practical irreversibility of laws and patterns of behavior that are [sic] taking effect here.”508 Apparently unable to believe such a message, he interrogated the messengers again at the end of the session:

Q: [Murray] I am worried about the fact that you say the ETS issue is on a one-way ascendency. Isn’t it possible that it is just at one end of the pendulum?

A: No. Look at the Rust belt news rooms. Five years ago, these were hard core smokers, places where smoking was part of the job description, the style, the support of the staff. Look at California and New York as bellweather markers. Look at airports. Look even at traditional tobacco states in the South where regulations are increasingly proposed and increasingly enacted. The problem is not going to diminish unless we do something about

507 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under--Group Presentation to Senior Management at 8 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/8.

508 [Philip Morris], Project Down Under--Group Presentation to Senior Management at 3 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/3.
Rebuffed on the secondhand smoke front, Murray wondered whether a “discrimination campaign” might work, but his subordinates had to disabuse him of this pipe dream as well. Noting that the company’s own research had revealed that people perceived discrimination against smokers as “quite different from racial discrimination,” the communications staff dashed Murray’s hopes once again by pointing out that “test ads using this theme tested lowest in terms of believability and acceptability.”

Dishonoraria

Regardless of the relevance of chemistry or physics, it would appear there is no way short of therapy to persuade an individual that smoke need not be an annoyance.

The tobacco industry’s use of some of its huge profits to pay “honoraria” to state legislators appears to have originated in emulation of what it must have viewed as a successful (and growing) congressional program. By 1984, the Tobacco Institute had emerged as the top giver of honoraria to members of Congress, its $129,691 being almost double the next highest sum. The combined payments of the industry, including those of R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., and U.S. Tobacco Co., totaled $173,634, doled out to 109 representatives and 17 senators. These members were able to “make $1,000 to $2,000 in an hour or so by dropping by TI and giving a speech...usually...about whatever they wish..., and unlike campaign contributions, the honorariums goes [sic] directly into the congressman’s pocket.” Common Cause, which compiled these data, stressed that such special interest groups did not give this money “just to hear members talk... These payments, which go directly to the personal benefit of members, are given to gain access and influence.”

---

509[Philip Morris], Project Down Under--Group Presentation to Senior Management at 8 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/8.
510[Philip Morris], Project Down Under--Group Presentation to Senior Management at 8 (June 26, 1987), Bates No. 2021502671/8.
511W[illiam]K[loepfer] [Tobacco Institute senior vice president, public relations], Preliminary Draft - ETS Project at 8 (May 24, 1984), Bates No. TI10411105/12.
In mid-1984, TI’s State Activities Division began requesting memoranda from Covington & Burling—for many years its leading legal adviser—about the legality of paying honoraria under state laws. In mid-July Daniel A. Rowley, a lawyer at the firm, wrote a letter to Mike Kerrigan of TI about paying honoraria at the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco then taking place. At the request of Roger Mozingo of TI Rowley revised that letter into a memorandum on a proposed honorarium program in Pennsylvania, at the same time noting that “preliminarily it looks as if many of the 20 states you have asked us to review will be very similar to Pennsylvania.” Intimating that any final decision by the tobacco companies would have to be informed by more than statutory law, Rowley added: “Of course, it still will be desirable to determine any local lore through The Institute’s lobbyists in each state to determine if there is any particular sensitivity.”

Responding to a request to examine the legality of the proposed honorarium program in ten states (which did not include Iowa), in October Rowley compiled another memorandum, in which he prefaced very brief summaries of the state laws with some general observations. The background facts, as the client had stated them to him, included TI’s holding meetings periodically in these states at which it would ask state officials to speak, in return for which it was considering paying them an honorarium ranging from $250 to $2,000 (which was to reflect the customary going rate as determined by the local lobbyist). While all ten states prohibited corporate contributions to candidates’ state campaigns, four either included honoraria among contributions or prohibited honoraria payments to non-candidate state officials. In addition, even in the remaining states permitting honoraria “some risk” arose from the further prohibition on corporations’ giving or legislators’ receiving “any money paid for the purpose of influencing the passage or defeat of legislation or some other official action.” Although the risk that “[s]omeone could always argue that the purpose of the honorarium was to influence the official’s conduct” was diminished by making clear that the money was paid for the speech, Rowley conceded that someone might still “challenge the payments if, at some later date, the official involved takes a position favorable to The Institute. This is especially true if certain circumstances exist that could be that $60,000 had been budgeted to and an estimated $53,000 paid by its Federal Relations Division to give 35 senators and representatives $1,500 each in honoraria; for 1984, $100,000 was budgeted to pay the same sum to each of 67 members of Congress. Tobacco Institute, 1984 Budget (Nov. 16, 1983), Bates No. 93488109/32.

513 Letter from Daniel A. Rowley to Roger Mozingo (July 19, 1984), Bates No. 680545146. Neither the letter to Kerrigan nor the memorandum on Pennsylvania appears to be among the documents archived on the UCSF Legacy or tobaccodocuments website.
read in an unfavorable light (e.g., a payment near in time to an important vote in the legislature).” The possibility of such challenges to honoraria as illegal gifts or contributions was heightened by the public filing requirements imposed on recipients and lobbyists and their employers, which “could alert individuals in the state to the payment....”

Five months later Rowley responded to another request from the Tobacco Institute, this time for a memorandum on the legality of paying honoraria in the ten other states that prohibited corporations (as contradistinguished from corporate political action committees) from contributing money to any political party, organization, or candidate. Iowa, one of this second group of states, all of which permitted honoraria, had prohibited corporations from directly or indirectly giving anything of value to political candidates until 1976, when the legislature, in response to the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Buckley v. Valeo, amended the law to permit corporate PACs to make such contributions. Unlike some states, Iowa did not cap the amount that a PAC was permitted to contribute. In spite of this complete freedom to give as much money to candidates as they wished, tobacco companies may have favored honoraria because they constituted income to the recipient-legislators, who could use it freely as they wished without being required to spend it on their election

---

514 The ten states were Connecticut, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, West Virginia, and Wisconsin, of which Connecticut, Ohio, West Virginia, and Wisconsin were the states in which honoraria would not have been lawful. Daniel A. Rowley, Memorandum for the Tobacco Institute: Re: Proposed Honorarium Program at 1-5 (Oct. 10, 1984), in Tobacco Institute, Field Staff Meeting (Aug. 11-14, 1985), Bates No. 680501768/902-6.

515 TI also handed out honoraria “to the extent possible” in some states that did permit corporate contributions. Kurt Malmgren, Briefing for Mr. James J. Johnston Chairman R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company at 8 (Sept. 27, 1989), Bates No. TIMN350847/54.

517 Iowa Code §§ 491.69-.71 (1975); Appendix II: State Laws Regulating Campaign Contributions, Expenditures for Political Purposes and Lobbying: Compilation by States (1970), Bates No. 91810501/17. According to Russell Ross, emeritus professor of political science at the University of Iowa and an expert on Iowa government, though unlawful, under-the-table corporate contributions were widespread and unpursued before 1976. Telephone interview with Russell Ross, Iowa City (May 10, 2007).

519 1978 Iowa Laws ch. 1078, § 14, at 162, 166 (codified at Iowa Code § 68A.503(3) (2007)).
campaign, even though both parties were required to report it. Rowley informed TI in March 1985 that: “The Iowa Attorney General’s Office has advised us that any payments to state officials are a matter of some sensitivity in the state and that such payments should be made with care to avoid any appearance of a conflict of interest.” Since, as it turned out, most, if not all, of the recipient-legislators in Iowa were heavy smokers who presumably would have voted against restrictions on smoking in any event, it is unclear what sort conflict of interest could ever have arisen; by the same token, however, it is also unclear what advantage the tobacco companies derived from paying legislators who did not require monetary incentives to vote the tobacco way. (The answer again, according to former TI Midwest vice president Daniel Nelson, was that they were Wasker’s friends.) At its State Activities Field Staff meeting in August 1985 TI drilled the participants in the basics of honoraria, stressing that a bona fide event or forum included a TAN Advisory Committee meeting, a wholesaler association convention, a member company sales meeting, or a special legislative briefing. As late as 1988, TI less than candidly characterized the honoraria program as providing a “forum in which key lawmakers and industry representatives can exchange ideas.”

Months before Covington & Burling had even given TI the legal go-ahead for paying out honoraria in Iowa, the practice had already begun. On December 18, 1984, Brozek sent a memorandum to the vice president for legislative support, Bill Cannell, on the “Iowa Honoraria Program,” which followed “numerous discussions” the two had had and “developed a more acceptable solution to a potential problem.” The issue involved John H. Connors—a former president of the Des Moines firefighters union and six-term Democrat from Des Moines (May 11, 2007).

Telephone interview with Lawrence Pope (former Iowa state legislator and later lobbyist), Des Moines (May 11, 2007).

TI sent a Form 1099 to any recipient of an honorarium in excess of $600. Tobacco Institute, Field Staff Meeting (Aug. 11-14, 1985), Bates No. 6805011768/897.

Telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007).

TI Field Staff Meeting (Aug. 11-14, 1985), Bates No. 680501768/897.

[Tobacco Institute], Executive Summary: Public Smoking Issue: State Activities Division, Appendix B at 4 (n.d. [1988]), Bates No. TI07561372/97.

Michael Brozek to Bill Cannell, Re: Iowa Honoraria Program (Dec. 18, 1984), Bates No. TI42030094.

Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

Moines—who had just completed his first two (of ten consecutive) years in the largely honorary position of speaker pro tempore, which, though not powerful in its own right, he doubtless owed to being influential and well liked. Brozek wrote that there had been a request (by whom he did not mention) “to have this honoraria recipient flown to Washington, D.C. for a legislative briefing in The Tobacco Institute Board Room,” but after “considering the costs involved, the logistical problems, the timing and the very concept of our honoraria program,” and speaking to Wasker, Brozek instead recommended that “an honoraria contribution be granted during calendar year 1984” under different circumstances. Inadvertently or cynically admitting the artificiality of this arrangement, which staged an opportunity to pay a legislator, Brozek stated that the “outline for the event surrounding this contribution” would be an honorarium of $500 for an appearance before the Iowa TAN Advisory Committee meeting on January 17, 1985, in the Board Room of the Des Moines Club, which would be an “informational and educational forum” to brief the members on important issues for the industry during the 1985-86 legislative session. The event, Wasker had assured Brozek, would comply with all state laws and administrative rules. Remarkably, the Tobacco Institute cut the $500 check to Connors—in response to an “invoice” from Brozek with a “Need by: ASAP” notation—already on December 21, almost four weeks before the meeting, whereas it otherwise paid honoraria in Iowa only after legislators had performed their alleged quid pro quo. Unfortunately, neither the cause of Connors’ apparently urgent need for cash right before Christmas nor—more importantly—the source of TI’s interest in Connors prompting it to go out of its way to accommodate him emerges from the industry’s internal documents. Although the reason for the tobacco industry’s solicitude for nonsmoking Connors is unclear, he was always known as being emphatically opposed to raising cigarette taxes on the grounds that they were unfair to workers. And in fact his votes on key tobacco-related bills reveal him 1997 (6M:2-4). In addition to having been union president for 20 years, Connors had also been a captain during his 28-year career in the Des Moines Fire Department. Id.

529 Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (June 25, 2007).

530 Michael Brozek to Bill Cannell, Re: Iowa Honoraria Program (Dec. 18, 1984), Bates No. TI42030094.

531 Tobacco Institute, Check Request (Dec. 19, 1984), Bates No. TI42030092/3, and Tobacco Institute Check No. 17795 (Dec. 21, 1984).

532 Telephone interview with former Representative Thomas Jochum, Des Moines (July 21, 2007).
to have been, both before and after the honorarium incident, largely in sync with pro-cigarette company positions: in 1978, he voted to eliminate the penalty in S.F. 2022 and was absent for or did not vote on the bill’s final passage; in 1979, he did not vote on the resolution to ban smoking in the House; in 1981, he voted twice against a cigarette tax increase; in 1987, he voted for passage of H.F. 79 the first time, but was absent for or did not vote on its final passage; in 1987, he voted twice for a cigarette tax increase, but on the final vote on the same bill in 1988 he voted against it; 1990, he was absent for or did not vote on the anti-smoking bill H.F. 209; in 1991, he voted for vending machines, free sampling of cigarettes, and preemption of local ordinances, and was absent for or did not vote on the final passage of the cigarettes sales bill, H.F. 232. This voting history must weigh more heavily than a stray anecdote relating that while accompanying another legislator in the 1980s to knock on doors for a fellow Democrat, Connors mentioned that when people asked him whether he minded if they smoked, he would ask them whether they minded if he farted. Although many years later Connors was unable to recall ever having given such a talk, the fact that he had been a friend of Wasker’s may, under the distinctly non-bureaucratic structure that governed the flow of the Tobacco Institute’s largesse in Iowa, have been all the explanation that was required.

During the latter half of the 1980s TI continued to tout the importance of paying honoraria to state legislators. To the board of directors the head of the State Activities Division explained in 1986 that campaign contributions and honoraria programs were used “with friendly legislators or those who may see the value of our case.” Two years later, TI’s Public Affairs Division launched its 534 Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (June 25, 2007). Connors’ bon mot has been attributed to Steve Martin.

---

535 Telephone interview with John H. Connors, Des Moines (June 24, 2007). Connors, who had himself been an Iowa Association of Professional Firefighters lobbyist for 17 years before becoming a legislator, and his wife Marjorie did recall that he had once received a check from the tobacco industry, but, not knowing what it was for and after having been told that “they” would tell him later, he returned it; he was unable to remember the year of this incident, which does not seem to fit the facts of the honorarium for which the quid pro quo was unambiguous.

536 Remarks by Roger L. Mozingo, The Tobacco Institute Board of Directors Winter
Conceptual Framework of Comprehensive Public Smoking Program—the latest iteration of the industry’s numerous desperate initiatives to stave off the inevitable. This time the objectives were: “1. To defeat mandatory and voluntary smoking restrictions. 2. To slow the decline of social acceptability of smoking.”

The latter project, at least, revealed a modicum of realism in suggesting the inexorableness of the proliferating unacceptability. In the context of this quixotic but well-heeled rearguard struggle the report noted that honoraria, like corporate campaign contributions, were “helpful in providing forums for lawmakers to hear industry views on ETS and other issues.” In most of the 20 states that prohibited direct campaign contributions, TI provided “honoraria forums for key lawmakers to facilitate an exchange of ideas with industry representatives”—to the budgeted tune of $49,000 in 1988, which represented one-seventh of its budget for state corporate campaign contributions ($350,000), 2 percent of its expenditure of $2.5 million for 61 state legislative counsel (i.e., lobbyists), and less than 0.5 percent of that year’s State Activities Division’s budget.

The exact volume of TI’s expenditures on state honoraria is unclear because of discrepancies among various internal documents, but according to one retrospective five-year overview, they rose from 0 in 1984 to $19,700 in 1985, and $24,900 in 1986, before declining to $20,750 in 1987, and rising somewhat to $21,950 in 1988. Of the total of $87,300 in honoraria spread among 20 different states that TI paid from 1985 through 1988, $12,500 or 14.3 percent went to legislators in Iowa, which received more than any other state and was one of only three states that received such payments in all four years—$1,000, $3,000, $4,000, and $4,500, respectively. To be sure, all these amounts were dwarfed by TI’s state campaign contributions (none of which went to Iowa), which exceeded one million dollars during these years and alone in California in one year amounted to more than twice the total honoraria during all four years.

Data are also available on the identities of the individual Iowa legislators receiving honoraria from 1985 to 1988 and in 1990. (In 1989, state legislators in only nine states received only $17,450—one-third of the $52,000 that had been budgeted. Iowa legislators, whom the TI document did not identify, received $2,850 or 16 percent of the total, the second highest amount.)

Table 11
Honoraria Paid by the Tobacco Institute to Iowa State Legislators, 1985-1988, 1990

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recipient</th>
<th>Party</th>
<th>Chamber</th>
<th>Position</th>
<th>Amount ($)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lowell Junkins</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Majority Leader</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John McIntee</td>
<td>R</td>
<td>House</td>
<td></td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1986</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bill Hutchins</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Majority Leader</td>
<td>1000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leonard Boswell</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td></td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joe Welsh</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Appropriations Cttee Chair</td>
<td>1000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thomas Jochum</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>House</td>
<td>Appropriations Cttee Chair</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bill Hutchins</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Majority Leader</td>
<td>750</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Emil Husak</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Assistant Majority Leader</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joe Welsh</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Appropriations Cttee Chair</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leonard Boswell</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Econ. Dev. Cttee Chair</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Calvin Hultman</td>
<td>R</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Minority Leader</td>
<td>750</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Richard Drake</td>
<td>R</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td></td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Edgar Holden</td>
<td>R</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Assistant Minority Leader</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

541 Honorarium Payments to State Legislators (Aug. 13, 1990), Bates No. TNWL0038148. The discrepancy between this $2,500 and the abovementioned $3,500 paid to seven senators may be accounted for by the $1,000 that Philip Morris had agreed to pay.
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>1988</th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bill Hutchins</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Majority Leader</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joe Welsh</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Appropriations Cttee Chair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wally Horn</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Assistant Majority Leader</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leonard Boswell</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Econ. Dev. Cttee Chair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>James Riordan</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Donald Doyle</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Judiciary Committee Chair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Larry Murphy</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Education Committee Chair</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>1990</th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bill Hutchins</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Majority Leader</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joe Welsh</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Appropriations Cttee Chair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Emil Husak</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Assistant Majority Leader</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Donald Doyle</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Judiciary Committee Chair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leonard Boswell</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Econ. Dev. Cttee Chair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Don Gettings</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Rules Cttee Vice Chair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gene Fraise</td>
<td>D</td>
<td>Senate</td>
<td>Justice Sys. Approp. Chair</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Unsurprisingly, during these years of Democratic legislative control, most of the recipients were Democrats. That almost all were senators and virtually none House members may be explained by the fact that, as the smaller body, the Senate was easier to control; moreover, since the House had proved itself to be more anti-tobacco in prohibiting smoking in its own chamber, the cigarette companies could more realistically rely on the power-holding smokers in the Senate to kill anti-smoking House bills.

---

542 Email from ex-Senator Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (May 15, 2007); telephone Democratic recipients were well-known allies of Majority Leader Hutchins strongly suggested to one ex-senator that the participation in the honoraria program was designed by Hutchins and lobbyist Wasker as a means of solidifying the majority leader’s power.\footnote{543} In fact, according to Daniel Nelson, Brozek’s successor as TI’s Midwest regional vice president, the answer to the question as to the criterion for determining which legislators to give money to, was: “Because Wasker said so.”\footnote{544} Payments to the Democratic Senate Majority Leader were a constant in every year; although some of lesser leadership also participated in the program, two recipients (Boswell\footnote{545} and Murphy) were in their first term. In 1985, TI, not even using up its $1,500 budget, paid honoraria only to two members: $500 to Lowell Junkins, the Democratic Senate Majority Leader, who left at the end of the year to run (unsuccessfully) against anti-tobacco Governor Branstad and then became a TI lobbyist; and $500 to second-term Republican House member John McIntee, a friend of Wasker who after seeking to become lieutenant governor instead became the (unsuccessful) Republican candidate for a vacant congressional seat in 1986.\footnote{546} McIntee’s chief qualification for receiving the money was apparently that he “is a very close friend of TI legislative counsel \footnote{543} Telephone interview with ex-Senator Jim Riordan, Des Moines (May 16, 2007).

\footnote{544} Telephone interview with ex-Senator Jim Riordan, Des Moines (May 16, 2007).

\footnote{545} Telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007).

Charles Wasker” and “a very close friend of the industry.” Because McIntee was such a loyal supporter, TI regarded his defeat in the congressional election as “not good news for the tobacco industry....” In 1986, the Institute paid $3,000 ($500 over budget) to three Democratic senators and one Representative, including $1,000 ($500 on two occasions) to the new Senate Majority Leader, Bill Hutchins (who after leaving his post in 1992 lobbied his ex-colleagues for R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company), $1,000 to Senate Appropriations Committee chair, Joe Welsh, and $500 to Thomas Jochum, a smoker, six-term House member and Appropriations Committee chair, who in retrospect regarded acceptance of the money as a lapse in judgment, even though he had never given the tobacco industry a quid pro quo (not even in the formalistic immediate sense of a talk—instead he merely chatted with someone). By 1987, the $4,000 in honoraria ($1,500 over budget) was shared among seven senators: the Democratic Majority Leader Hutchins and the Republican Minority Leader Calvin Hultman (who in 1990 became Philip Morris’s lobbyist) both received $750, while three other Democrats and two Republicans were paid $500. All these honoraria were paid for “presentations” to and meetings with TI staff and representatives of the member cigarette companies during the Council of State Governments conference in Des Moines in August 1987. Honoraria for five Democratic 551 Tobacco Institute, State Contributions Report at 36 (Jan. 4, 1989), Bates No. TNWL00222198/34. Though neither in a formal leadership position nor in the majority, Drake, a heavy smoker, was the Senate’s acknowledged expert on state tax law without whose help it was difficult to pass tax measures. Telephone interview with James Riordan, Des Moines (May 16, 2007).

552 Bates No. TI43971584/93-99, on tobaccodocuments.org. The Tobacco Institute’s senators in 1988 resulted from—or, perhaps more accurately, were the raison d’être for—the Iowa Economic Outlook Luncheon on September 21, co-hosted by TI’s Iowa lobbyist Wasker and its Midwest regional director Daniel Nelson, and attended by several Philip Morris and R. J. Reynolds salespeople. Nelson justified the expenditure to his superiors in part on the grounds that at the lunch Hutchins had made the encouraging comment that there was a “definite possibility” that the legislature would allow three cents of the state excise tax to sunset, “the biggest obstacle to achieving this major victory” being the Senate’s ability to persuade anti-tobacco Governor Branstad, who operated as “somewhat of a rogue” vis-à-vis his own Republican party and in fact requested repeal of the sunset. However, TI had already heard in February 1988 through “our Iowa magician Chuck Wasker” to whom it paid $35,000 a year in part to procure such intelligence, that Hutchins was “the key player” on cigarette taxes and that Wasker had “initiated a systematic contact program with 31 key senators sympathetic to our interests.” Consequently, it appears much more plausible that the lunch in September 1988 was designed to reward Hutchins—whose thousand-dollar “speech” the paying audience, as always, found “enlightening and informative” personally and to enhance his power by enabling him to arrange for four other members of his party to receive $500 each for chatting over an honorarium request forms included information on the legislators’ committee assignments, but not on whether they were chairmen. Brozek averred—also on behalf of lobbyist Charles Wasker—to Hutchins that the latter’s “insight...will be beneficial to us all.” Letter from Michael Brozek to Bill Hutchins (Aug. 12, 1987), Bates No. TI43971584/600.

554On the struggle over repeal of the sunset, see below ch. 27.

558Michael Brozek to Bill Hutchins (Nov. 10, 1988), Bates No. T144820138. It seems that the $500 honorarium that Assistant Majority Leader, future Majority Leader, and faithful pro-tobacco-industry-voting Wally Horn and the $1,000 honorarium that Joe Welsh received were for a different economic outlook meeting on October 25, 1988, about which nothing else appears in the online documents. Michael Brozek to Wally Horn (Nov. 14, 1988), Bates No. T144820137; Michael Brozek to Joe Welsh (Nov. 14, 1988), Bates No. T144820135.
In 1990, the generator of honoraria was the Annual Iowa Economic Policy Seminar, held in August by the law firm of TI lobbyist Wasker (whose $976 first-class airplane ticket between Iowa and Washington D.C. had recently prompted TI’s Washington headquarters to request his Midwest handler to “encourage” him to fly coach on future Institute trips). Accurately labeled “Iowa Honoraria luncheon” by Daniel Nelson, it featured seven state senators and a 30-40 member invited audience composed of member company representatives, Iowa trade association executives, and Des Moines area business leaders. Of the seven senators—two of whom (Hutchins and Welsh) Philip Morris informally agreed to pay—three were up for re-election. In his request to his supervisor for issuance of the checks, Nelson listed the leadership positions of each invitee: Boswell (vice chairman of Appropriations); Doyle (Judiciary chairman); Fraise (chairman of Justice System Appropriations) subcommittee; Gettings (Rules and Administration vice chairman); Husak (Ways and Means chairman); Hutchins (chairman of Finance Committee); Riordan (chairman of Judiciary Committee); Smith (minority leader); and Welsh (district leader). In his request to his supervisor for issuance of the checks, Nelson listed the leadership positions of each invitee: Boswell (vice chairman of Appropriations); Doyle (Judiciary chairman); Fraise (chairman of Justice System Appropriations) subcommittee; Gettings (Rules and Administration vice chairman); Husak (Ways and Means chairman); Hutchins (chairman of Finance Committee); Riordan (chairman of Judiciary Committee); Smith (minority leader); and Welsh (district leader).
Struggle for and Resistance to Regulation and Prohibition of Public Smoking: 1983-88

(majority leader); and Welsh (Appropriations chairman). They purportedly received their $500 for making prepared remarks and participating in a panel discussion with their colleagues.

In 1991-1992, Tobacco Institute documents on the state honorarium program available online appear to provide only aggregate data without identifying individual recipients (in Iowa). The program was scaled back in terms of expenditures, number of states, and maximum use of budgeted funds. In 1989, state legislators in only nine states received only $17,450—one-third of the $52,000 that had been budgeted. Iowa legislators received $2,850 or 16 percent of the total, the second highest amount. In 1990, legislators in only six states received honoraria, the total amounting to $20,700 from a budgeted allocation of $65,500. Iowa’s $2,500 represented 13 percent, ranking it third. By 1991, the Tobacco Institute budgeted only $31,500 for honoraria, of which $2,500 was allocated to Iowa, but the estimate of actual expenditures revealed that only $10,300 was spent in four states, and none in Iowa. For 1992, Iowa was one of seven states budgeted for a total of $16,500, but whether any of its allocated $2,000 was actual spent is unclear. The tobacco industry honorarium program in Iowa then apparently came to an end after the state legislature in 1992-93 had largely prohibited honoraria beyond legislators’ out-of-pocket expenses.

562 Dan Nelson to Pat Donoho, Re: Iowa Honoraria luncheon (Aug. 3, 1990), Bates No. TI23380570-1. According to the Iowa Official Register: 1989-1990, at 32 (Vol. 63, Elaine Baxter ed.), Husak was vice chair of Ways and Means. All seven checks were, despite the agreement with Philip Morris, issued by the Tobacco Institute. Bates No. TI23380543.

563 Letter from Daniel Nelson to Joe Welsh (Aug. 15, 1990), TI43200227, on tobaccodocuments.org. According to at least one (1986) recipient, there was no pretense of giving a talk at all. Telephone interview with Tom Jochum, Des Moines (July 21, 2007).

564 Honorarium Payments to State Legislators (Aug. 13, 1990), Bates No. TNW L0038148. The discrepancy between this $2,500 and the abovementioned $3,500 paid to seven senators may be accounted for by the $1,000 that Philip Morris had agreed to pay.

2683
House File 209 in 1989-1990: Restaurant Coverage Is Finally Achieved—But at the Price of Conceding to the Tobacco Industry What Purported to Be the Preemption of Local Anti-Smoking Ordinances

They [cigarette companies] didn’t [have to give money]. We [legislators] all smoked. There were no contributions from tobacco companies. We just smoked.\(^1\)

Despite the defeat of restaurant coverage in the Iowa legislature in 1987, the anti-smoking forces had good reason for pressing once again for its inclusion in the next iteration of the bill in 1989. After all, although the militant Americans for Nonsmokers’ Rights regarded the provisions regulating restaurants as “probably…the most controversial part of…comprehensive” nonsmokers’ rights legislation because they were “unlike any other public place and must be treated in special ways,” but also “[b]ecause of the extraordinary power of the restaurant associations,”\(^2\) by the end of 1988 almost half the states had passed clean indoor air acts that applied to restaurants.\(^3\) The chief objective of H.F. 209, as originally filed on February 6 by liberal Democrats Johnie Hammond, David Osterberg, and Jack Holveck, was to close one of the many outsized holes in Iowa’s clean indoor air law by expanding the universe of covered “public places” to include all restaurants,\(^4\) which had been excluded since the first law regulating public smoking was enacted in 1978. Within the limitations of the feckless law’s authorization of building owners to designate smoking areas, the bill required all restaurants to “provide a sufficient number of tables and seating at which smoking is not permitted to accommodate all persons who desire such tables and seating.”\(^5\) (To keep this structure in context, even the Model Ordinance of Americans for Nonsmokers’ Rights provided that its general prohibition of smoking “does not prevent...the designation of a contiguous area within a restaurant that contains a maximum of fifty (50) percent of the seating capacity of the restaurant as a smoking area....”\(^6\) The same requirement was imposed on establishments that served alcohol, but were nevertheless excluded from the definition of “bars” (because they had table and seating facilities for serving meals to more than 50 people at one time).\(^7\) Innovatively, the bill mandated that all covered retail stores, shopping malls, and public conveyances that had a public address system “announce hourly the measures taken by the public place to comply with this chapter and what is expected of the person using the public place.”\(^8\) H.F. 209 also provided for some enforcement by requiring that the state department of inspections and appeals inspect those facilities that it already inspected for compliance with the law’s existing nosmoking signage requirements.\(^9\) Finally, the bill both quintupled the fine for violations to $50 and eliminated the filing fee charge for complainants.\(^10\)

\(^1\)Telephone interviews with Don Avenson, Oelwein (July 12, 2007 and June 13, 2008). A decade later the Johnson County County Attorney stated that because in 1990 the proportion of state legislators who smoked had exceeded the smoking prevalence in the general population, the tobacco industry had not needed to apply a lot of pressure on them. Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Mar. 8, 2000) (audio tape archived at the Johnson County Public Health Department, Iowa City).

Smoking in the Des Moines Skywalks

That an increase in the fine was crucial in order to make enforcement possible had become obvious by the late 1980s in Des Moines, where the problem arose in the extensive system of skywalks that had begun being built in the 1980s to \(^4\)H.F. 209, § 1 (Feb. 6, 1989). Handwritten on the copy in the Tobacco Institute files was the annotation “Tobacco Institute Priority.” Bates No. TI00301650.

---

\(^5\)H.F. 209, § 3 (Feb. 6, 1989).

\(^7\)H.F. 209, § 1 (Feb. 6, 1989).

\(^8\)H.F. 209, § 3 (Feb. 6, 1989). For a similar proposal in Minnesota, see above ch. 24.

\(^9\)H.F. 209, § 2 (Feb. 6, 1989). The department was responsible for inspecting and licensing, inter alia, health care providers, restaurants, food stores, barber shops, hotels and motels.

\(^10\)H.F. 209, § 4 (Feb. 6, 1989).
connect downtown buildings. Although there had always been “some concern about smoking” in the skywalks, once the establishment of no-smoking policies in many of those buildings had prompted more smokers to smoke in the skywalks, complaints about smoking increased appreciably, and the city traffic director requested that the Skywalk Commission consider a ban. Two weeks before the 1987 amendments to the Iowa clean indoor air law, which declared “any enclosed area used by the general public” to be a covered “public place” in which smoking was prohibited “except in a designated smoking area,” went into effect, the Skywalk Commission had learned at a public hearing that it did not “need to decide whether to impose its own smoking ban because the walkways fit the state law’s definition of a public place.” Two days before the law went into effect, the commission had defeated a proposal to authorize businesses to permit smoking in the skywalk corridors running through their buildings—one commissioner had even unsuccessfully proposed turning the whole skywalk system into smoking and nonsmoking halves as was being done in restaurants—and the whole system thus became smoke-free. Because no areas were designated for smoking and nosmoking signs were posted throughout the system, the skywalks became off limits to smoking.

The Des Moines police department, which was hoping for “voluntary compliance,” immediately announced that enforcement (in or outside the skywalks) would not be a priority. Although the law provided for civil violations and the police dealt only with criminal violations and thus had no citations to issue (and, to boot, the civil citation had to be filed in small claims court where the $15 filing fee exceeded the $10 smoking fine), the police would nevertheless respond to calls by sending out an officer to “advise the individual what the law is.” Unsurprisingly, by 1988, one year after the commission had initiated the ban, smoking was not only on the rise in the skywalks, but smokers were becoming more defiant about their violations precisely because they could do so with impunity. The chairman of the commission and the traffic director complained that the state law was effectively unenforceable because it set the fine at a level half of the fee for the citation. Police officers, according to the Skywalk Commission, were “[o]bviously...not enthusiastic about approaching people and asking them” to stop smoking “when they are unable to enforce that request” because such a “confrontation...would result in the officer...having to merely walk away from the situation.”

The city sought to circumvent this problem of fear-of-loss-of-face-induced inaction by passing an ordinance making it a criminal violation to fail to stop smoking in the skywalk at a police officer’s request. The city council did not pass such an ordinance until the end of January 1990, stiffening enforcement by making it possible to arrest violators for loitering, thus subjecting them to a fine of $100 or 30 days in jail. Nevertheless, as the legislature was debating H.F. 209 in the winter of 1990, both the Skywalk Commission and the traffic director 19 Melanie Lewis, “Skywalk Smoking Increases Despite Longstanding Ban,” DMR, Mar. 23, 1989 (M1:5); [Des Moines] Skywalk Commission, Regular Meeting - Apr. 19, 1989, Item: Smoking in the Skywalk System (copy furnished by Gary Fox, City Traffic Director). The chairman erroneously stated that the fine was $7; in fact it was $10. Iowa Code § 805.8(11) (1987). A Des Moines city attorney, who had worked for the city in the 1980s, later contested this account, though not its outcome. She insisted that the real obstacle had been that prosecutions had to be conducted by the counties, and that Polk County had made it clear that it had higher priorities than prosecuting smokers. She insisted that had the City of Des Moines controlled prosecutions, the deficit would not have been a problem. Since the skywalks, at least the sections of them that bridge city streets, are city property, the city, both before and after the state legislature amended the law to preempt local governments from passing ordinances stricter than the city law, was empowered to prohibit smoking on its property, just as it banned smoking in city buildings in 1988. Why the city did not apply this approach to the skywalks Moser could not explain. Telephone interview with Carol Moser, Des Moines assistant city attorney (May 29, 2007). Despite Moser’s alternative account, the press reported her as stating that the law was unenforceable “without a financial loss....” Lee Rood, “D.M. Skywalk Smoking Law Starts Monday,” DMR, Feb. 2, 1990 (M1:6).

---

20 James Thompson (Skywalk Commission Secretary) to Mayor and Members of the City Council [City of Des Moines] (Dec. 27, 1989), Bates No. TI28922820-1. pointedly emphasized that “ideally the ban would be enforced under the state law with a fine that would cover processing costs.”

Sunsetting the 1988 Cigarette Tax Increase

Our Iowa magician Chuck Wasker....

Also vying for the attention of the legislature in 1989—when Democrats controlled majorities of 30-20 in the Senate and 61-39 in the House—were bills to repeal the sunset provision that had been attached to the 1988 cigarette tax increase as a concession to secure its passage. In the legislative budget priorities attached to his budget message in 1987, Republican Governor Terry Branstad had proposed raising the per pack cigarette tax by 10 cents “[c]onsistent with United States Surgeon General reports on the risks of smoking.” Citing the Lung Association of Iowa, he stated that a smoking employee cost an employer $624 more per year than a nonsmoker, resulting in potential additional annual costs to 22Cynthia Hubert, “Skywalk Puffers Feel the Heat,” DMR, Dec. 7, 1989 (A1:2-3, 8A:1-5); Perry Beeman, “Skywalk Panel Approves Making Smoking a Misdemeanor,” DMR, Dec. 21, 1989 (M1:2-4) (quote at col. 4); Skywalk Commission, Regular Meeting, Item #4: Smoking in Skywalk System (Dec. 20, 1989), Bates No. T128922822; Lee Rood, “D.M. Skywalk Smoking Law Starts Monday,” DMR, Feb. 2, 1990 (M1:6). After the legislature had passed such a law in April, Des Moines corporation counsel Roger Nowadzky stated that tobacco industry lobbyists had assured him that the bill exempted the Des Moines ordinance. Thomas Fogarty, “New Restaurant Smoking Law Called Toothless,” DMR, Apr. 25, 1990 (1M:2-5, 2M:6). The bill contained no such exemption, but since the city, like any other building owner, was (and is) free to ban smoking on its own property without running afoul of the preemption provision, it is unclear why exemption would have been deemed necessary. Unfortunately, many years later the then city attorney could no longer recall the details of this matter. Telephone interview with Roger Nowadzky, Marshalltown (May 25, 2007). The press had also erroneously reported before enactment that the new preemption provision “could hamper” the city’s efforts to ban smoking in the skywalks. Thomas Fogarty, “Senate Passes a Smoking Rule for Restaurants,” DMR, Apr. 5, 1990 (1A:5, at 2A:2). On continued flouting of the ban on smoking in skywalks after enactment of the new law, see “Is the Coast Clear? Sneaking Skywalk Smokes,” DMR, May 6, 1991 (10) (NewsBank).

---

23Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Re: Region IV General Update (Jan. 3, 1990), Bates No. 507628585.

24“Members of Iowa General Assemblies 1981-2002,” at iv, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Pubinfo/Library/Members19812002.pdf
employers of $278 million. The proposal to increase the tax from 26 to 36 cents was welcomed by health experts and Don Avenson, the Democratic House Speaker, while the Tobacco Institute promoted obfuscatory counterclaims denying that increased taxes (and prices) reduced teenage smoking or that there were any “net public health care costs of smoking.” Unsurprisingly, the initiative ran into opposition from the governor’s own party: on the initial House vote in February not a single Republican supported the measure, while 40 voted Nay, causing it to fail 46 to 51. In March the tobacco industry issued a legislative alert to Iowa businesses requesting that constituents “emphasize to their state legislators the negative impact this tax would have on Iowa’s economy.” In particular, the alert pointed out that tobacco accounted for 16 percent of all non-food sales and 4.5 percent of total supermarket sales; at convenience stores, cigarettes were, after gasoline, the number one product, with tobacco accounting for 18.9 percent of gross profits. The alert named nine House Democrats whom it was especially important to contact before the House voted to reconsider. The industry’s relative lack of influence in the lower house was reflected in the fact that the only one of the nine who switched on reconsideration went from Nay to Yea (the first time seven had voted Yea, one Nay, and one had not voted). Two months after the first vote, under pressure from the state’s worsening financial prospects and looming adjournment, a more than large enough minority of Republicans changed their votes to pass the bill. But whatever power the cigarette companies failed to wield in the House they more than compensated for among the Senate leadership, where Majority Leader Hutchins quickly signaled that the tax increase did not enjoy much support in the other chamber, which in fact failed to consider it during the 1987 session.

Branstad returned to the issue in his January 1988 budget message, this time basing his proposal for a yet bigger, 12-cent, rise, again squarely on health considerations: “Smoking has been identified as one of our nation’s greatest health problems. Over 350,000 Americans died last year from smoking related illnesses and it is costing Iowans a lot of money to take care of these problems. So, I think it is appropriate for us to raise additional revenue to help pay for those costs.” The increase would have boosted the tax to 38 cents a pack, the highest in the country (along with Minnesota’s), but Hutchins, once again, made it clear that it was unlikely that the Senate would support the full amount requested.

Two weeks later the Senate Ways and Means Committee nevertheless recommended the House bill, but on February 17, in a significant compromise to secure passage, the Senate adopted by voice vote an amendment (filed by liberal Democratic committee chair Charles Bruner, an educationally aberrant Iowa legislator with a Ph.D. in political science from Stanford) to lower the tax in the House measure from 36 and 34 cents starting March 1, and more importantly, to terminate three cents of the tax on June 30, 1989. The concessions and a day of inter-party negotiations notwithstanding, only a bare majority of senators voted 24 to 23 to approve the amended bill both to balance the state budget and to “force some Iowans to stop smoking or cut down,” but the vote fell two short of the constitutionally required majority of 26 votes. Only six of Branstad’s 21 Republicans supported the bill together with 18 of 29

---

Democrats. However, Hutchins, a pro-tobacco smoker who supported the increase for budgetary reasons, arranged the parliamentary maneuvers necessary to reconsider the vote the next day, when, he hoped—and his Republican mirror image, pro-tobacco smoker Minority Leader Calvin Hultman, gave reason to suspect—that two absent Republicans might be prevailed on to vote Aye.\(^{37}\) Despite pleas from some Democrats that the tax (the second highest in the Midwest) would make Iowa retail stores “uncompetitive” and cause an “unbelievable” “drain” as consumers drove to adjoining states to buy cheaper cigarettes and everything else while they were at it,\(^{38}\) the two absent Republicans reappeared and the bill passed 26 to 22.\(^{39}\) The same day the House concurred in the Senate’s compromise, and the eight-cent tax increase subject to the three-cent sunset in mid-1989 went into effect.\(^{40}\)

By 1989, Governor Branstad recommended retaining the full eight cents permanently,\(^{41}\) and bills were filed by Republicans in both houses to repeal the repeal, but neither got out of the Ways and Means subcommittee, and the Senate in particular opposed the initiative, insuring that the sunset would take place as scheduled.\(^{42}\) Bruner, a member of the three-person Senate subcommittee, recalled two decades later that the second vote was there to recommend the bill’s adoption to the full committee, but that such action would have been “pointless” because joint opposition by the Democratic and Republican leaders, Hutchins and Hultman, meant that the Ways and Means Committee would not have taken it up anyway.\(^{43}\) Repeal of the sunset also appeared in amendments to two unrelated

\(^{43}\)Telephone interview with Charles Bruner, Des Moines (July 3, 2007). Bruner was bills, but one was declared not germane and the other withdrawn by its sponsor.\textsuperscript{44}

After the Iowa legislature had adjourned, the cigarette industry celebrated the defeat of these rather feeble efforts to repeal the sunset of the three-cent tax as one of its greatest lobbying victories ever. In a special briefing in May for Ralph Angiuoli, the outgoing CEO of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco, the head of the Tobacco Institute’s State Activities Division, Kurt Malmgren, exuberantly proclaimed:

Thanks to our team effort, the impossible happened, a tax goes down this year.

Again, our traditional lobbying efforts were instrumental, as was our ability to coordinate the people and program resources you and others brought to the table.

We also worked with our public affairs division to solidify our relationship with Iowa’s liberal/labor community, via a labor consultant to shore up that side of the aisle.\textsuperscript{45}

At the outset of 1990, Daniel Nelson, the Tobacco Institute’s Midwest regional vice president, to his boss in Washington praised “our Iowa magician Chuck Wasker” for having “sunsetted 3 cents of the cig tax.”\textsuperscript{46} TI’s report card on its Iowa lobbyist, Charles Wasker, credited him with having pulled off a “spectacular victory” in insuring the preservation of the sunset.\textsuperscript{47} The industry’s special fervor certain that Riordan would have voted with him, while presumably Gentleman, who both times had voted against H.F. 327, would have voted against repealing the sunset.

\textsuperscript{44}\textit{Journal of the House: 1989: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly} 2:1727 (Apr. 19) (H-4003 to S.F. 363, by Lundby, not earmarking tax for state agency appropriations); \textit{Journal of the House: 1989: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly} 2:1677, 3012-13 (Apr. 17-18) (H-4070 to H.F. 753, by Schnekloth, earmarking the three-cent cigarette tax for waste tire abatement). Since both of these Republican representatives had twice voted against any cigarette tax increase in 1987 and 1988, it is unclear why they would have proposed eliminating the sunset of the tax they opposed in the first place. In addition, S.F. 703, which was passed by both houses, earmarked three cents of the cigarette tax to back rural community infrastructure improvement bonds, but Governor Branstad line-item vetoed this provision on the grounds that earmarking tax revenue reduced the state’s flexibility in dealing with changing financial needs. \textit{Journal of the House: 1989: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly} 2:3092 (June 5).

To be sure, S.F. 703 did not repeal the sunset of the three-cent tax, but by removing the tax from general tax revenues, the bill presumably would have put pressure on the legislature to do so.

\textsuperscript{45}Briefing for Ralph Angiuoli R. J. Reynolds Tobacco: Remarks by Kurt L. Malmgren Senior Vice President The Tobacco Institute at 15 (May 24, 1989), Bates No. T111503432/46.

\textsuperscript{46}Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Re: Region IV General Update (Jan. 3, 1990), Bates No. 507628585.

\textsuperscript{47}Tobacco Institute, Region IV State and Local Lobbyist Evaluation: State of Iowa:
over this tax issue was later explained by Nelson, who characterized combating cigarette tax increases as an even higher priority than achieving local preemption or defeating anti-public smoking bills because the cigarette companies “wanted all the money”: if the total price (with tax) could have been increased by three cents, the tax reduced the firms’ room for raising the price.\textsuperscript{48} Why, however, the infliction of this defeat on the anti-smoking forces was chalked up to consummate lobbying skills is difficult to reconstruct given Senator Bruner’s observation that the Senate’s smoking leadership’s definitive and quasi-instinctual opposition to repeal of the sunset had rendered the outcome a foregone conclusion.\textsuperscript{49} Then House Appropriations Committee chairman Thomas Jochum agreed that once Hutchins had made it clear that repeal would not be taken up in the Senate, it became senseless to consider it in the House and no magical skills were required.\textsuperscript{50} Moreover, since opposition to repeal among some leaders (for example, House Speaker Avenson) was not based on a substantive policy, but on the principle of keeping the promise—made at the time the eight-cent tax increase was enacted in 1988 in order to secure a voting majority—that the three cents would be sunсетted, lobbying magic was hardly needed.\textsuperscript{51} On the other hand, Malmgren’s allusion to Iowa lib-labs underscored a crucial dimension of the tobacco industry’s overall legislative strategy in coopting the Iowa Citizen Action Network and the unions active in the Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee to combat the tax.\textsuperscript{52}

House File 209 Stalls in 1989

The industry’s lobbying and campaign effects should not be ballyhooed. Our aim is a clean iron fist inside a clean velvet glove.\textsuperscript{53}

---

\textsuperscript{48}Telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007).

\textsuperscript{49}Telephone interview with Charles Bruner, Des Moines (July 3, 2007).

\textsuperscript{50}Telephone interview with Thomas Jochum, Des Moines (July 21, 2007). At the same time, Jochum argued that the sunset was not repealed because the legislators had been “rolled” by the tobacco lobbyists. \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{51}Email from Don Avenson to Marc Linder (July 20, 2007). Ex-Representative Jochum took the position that generally speaking the argument that the promise to sunset had to be kept had been a smokescreen for some other reason to oppose repeal. Telephone interview with Thomas Jochum, Des Moines (July 21, 2007).

\textsuperscript{52}See above ch. 26.

\textsuperscript{53}[R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.], Social Acceptability of Smoking: Voicing the
After being assigned to a State Government subcommittee chaired by Hammond herself, H.F. 209 made little progress during the 1989 session other than securing the recommendation of the State Government Committee that it pass subject to amendments, which significantly weakened both the existing statute and the amendments embodied in H.F. 209. No sooner had the bill for the first time covered restaurants than Hammond herself at a meeting on March 2, 1989 offered the proposed subcommittee amendment H-3309, which most prominently excluded restaurants with a seating capacity of 25 or fewer. In addition, it eliminated the newly proposed requirement that restaurants provide enough tables and seats for all persons wanting to be seated at such locations. In a constriction of coverage under the law as passed in 1987, Hammond also proposed excluding from coverage all public places containing fewer than 250 square feet of space. After discussion by the full committee, the amendment failed by a show of hands; Hammond asked that the bill be deferred, but Mary Lundby—who would soon emerge as a key opponent of H.F. 209—objected, and Hammond’s motion to defer passed on a voice vote. Five days later, on March 7, the State Government Committee reconsidered its vote on the amendment, giving Hammond an opportunity to explain it; then without any discussion the committee on a non-record roll call voted 12 to 8 to pass H.F. 209 as amended. Hammond may have diluted her own bill in order to overcome obstacles to getting it to full committee and/or out of committee and onto the House floor (or to the Senate), where, she may have hoped, other forces might restore its original vigor.

The cigarette companies nourished an especially contemptuous animus against Hammond, the bill’s chief sponsor. Shortly after the bill’s passage, the Des Moines Register reported that, in the context of an embryonic national campaign, Hammond was advocating divestiture by the Iowa Public Employees’ Retirement System of its tobacco company stock on the grounds that: “It is inconsistent that we enjoy the profits of tobacco companies and then we tell... people, “Don’t smoke.”” With $34 million of Philip Morris stock held by IPERS at stake, by the next day, Pat Wilson, Philip Morris’s Midwest regional government affairs director, informed her boss that in response several activities had been initiated, including an analysis of Hammond and obtaining new Iowa counsel. Belittling Hammond’s “reputation of being an anti-tobacco activist at the Legislature,” Wilson alleged that Hammond had tried to add vending machine restrictions to H.F. 209, but that the amendment had “failed miserably.” More damning was the claim that Hammond was “not well respected by her colleagues.” Finally, Wilson attacked Hammond’s bona fides by citing the Tobacco Institute’s and Philip Morris’s lobbyists’ opinion that raising the issue was a way to obtain publicity and money for her legislative race. That new lobbyist (“counsel”) turned out to be former Republican Senate Minority Leader Calvin Hultman, who had just retired. He, in contrast, was “very well respected on both sides of the aisle.” The Philip Morris money machine had also managed to solicit a comment from Republican Senator Jack Nystrom, one of two legislators on the IPERS board, who opined that “Hammond’s idea is ‘stupid and she doesn’t know what she’s talking about.’ ‘Just let her introduce something, we’ll blow it out of the water.’” Finally, another ex-legislator doing the bidding of the cigarette companies, Lowell Junkins, the Democratic Senate Majority Leader as late as 1985, and now the Tobacco Institute’s “labor consultant,” elicited from the president of the Iowa State American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, whose members were IPERS beneficiaries, that he saw no problem so long as tobacco stocks were a sound investment. Amusingly, while Philip Morris was instantaneously implementing this elaborate strategy to kill Hammond’s proposal half a year before the legislature was even 58William Petroski, “Critics to State: Don’t Invest in Tobacco,” DMR, June 10, 1990 (1A:6, 6A:5-6). IPERS also held RJR Nabisco stock and bonds worth more than four times as much.

59Pat Wilson to Jack Nelson, Subject: Iowa - Divestiture (June 11, 1990), Bates No. 204672792/3. Ironically, two years later, Don McKee, the AFSCME president, arguably the best-known union official in Iowa, proposed that IPERS divest itself of Time Warner stock because of an anti-police song it had produced. William Petroski, “Divest to Protest Rock Song,” DMR, July 25, 1992 (1) (NewsBank). Later he was sentenced to federal prison for embezzling union funds. William Petroski, “McKee Gets Prison Term,” DMR, Aug. 5, 1995 (1) (NewsBank). The amendment to restrict vending machines, which was not filed by Hammond, did pass the House and was defeated in the Senate on a relatively close vote of 26 to 19, Hultman and Nystrom both voting with the cigarette companies. State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the Senate: 1990: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 1:1107-1108 (Mar. 15). scheduled to reconvene, the Register article quoted Philip Morris’s vice president for public affairs as calmly acknowledging that “Iowa officials are entitled to invest their state pension money as they see fit” and modestly pointing out that 60 percent of the company’s revenues were derived primarily from food products.

The only other action on H.F. 209 was the filing of 16 amendments by pro-business Des Moines Democrat Tony Bisignano and 11 amendments by Republican Mary Lundby. Bisignano, whose family owned restaurants, was also president of an American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees union local representing workers of Polk County, which in early 1987, as part of a “statewide push for smoke-free worksites,” began planning to remove all cigarette machines from offices and to restrict smoking in county buildings. Bisignano, who allowed as “I’d love to quit smoking,” objected that “by jerking the machines, you don’t accomplish anything.” The county board of supervisors may have believed that it was “probably not right to subject the public to having to put up with our smoke” while doing business at county offices, but when it decided to create a “smoke-free environment” gradually over a year by limiting the number of places where smoking would be permitted until August 1, 1988, when smoking would be prohibited in private offices and allowed only in designated smoking rooms, Bisignano complained that the policy was “going to extremes”.... Although he charged that the county had violated the union contract by instituting the policy without having consulted the union and asked the Public Employment Relations Board to negotiate a new policy, only 8 percent of Polk County employees signed a petition requesting the board of supervisors to rescind the ban on the grounds that smokers’ “freedom of choice and civil rights [should] be given as much consideration as the nonsmokers’.” Since the policy was already the result of a compromise—several supervisors had supported a complete ban—the chairwoman signaled that reconsideration was unlikely. Carrying on in the House where he had left off in Polk County, Bisignano filed amendments that were designed to weaken the bill, in particular with respect to restaurants. Most of Lundby’s were of a similar character except for her proposal to expand “smoking” to include tobacco chewing. In April, by unanimous consent, H.F. 209 was deferred and placed on the unfinished business calendar, and then in May, not having been withdrawn, defeated, or indefinitely postponed, it was rereferred to the State Government Committee (making it eligible for committee action at the beginning of the second session in January).

---

60 In fact, almost three years passed before Hammond filed a bill, on which the legislature then took no action. H.F. 543 (Mar. 17, 1993).

64 Telephone interview with ex-legislator David Osterberg (Apr. 1, 2007).

At the end of 1989 Branstad recommended that the bill be passed with an exemption for restaurants with more than 31 seats. In a vast understatement of the needs of public health and especially of the 78 percent of Iowa adults who did not smoke, the governor, deploying one of the cigarette oligopoly’s key propaganda terms, grounded coverage in the “courtesy and convenience that we ought to provide our citizens.” That resistance could be expected was immediately made clear by Democratic Senate Majority Leader Bill Hutchins, who suggested that legislators might want a broader exemption for restaurants. Inadvertently pointing to the root defect of the law since its inception (and lasting until 2008)—the conferral on building owners of virtually total discretion to designate as large or as small smoking areas as they wished and the absence of a requirement that physical barriers and ventilation systems other than already “existing” ones “shall be used to minimize the toxic effect of smoke in adjacent nonsmoking areas”77—Hutchins correctly and pertinently observed: “‘There are small places where you don’t really accomplish that much. All you do is put a no-smoking sign on one table and...if someone smokes, it’s all over the place....’”78

---

The Cigarette Manufacturers Fit Iowa into Their Nationwide Preemption Campaign

[Johnson County Attorney J. Patrick] White isn’t sure how such a pre-emption came about, but he has his ideas. “Legislative history in Iowa is very difficult to go by.... There’s not serious record-keeping. The most frequent version is it was a compromise to get enough votes to pass the basic statute, to win over a couple people more aligned with tobacco. So long as there was specific language to keep local government” from banning smoking they would vote for it.79

In the meantime, from Washington the Tobacco Institute had been keeping a close watch on the Iowa legislature in connection with its nationwide panoptic monitoring of possibilities for enacting preemption of local government control. The proliferation of statewide laws and local ordinances restricting smoking had reached the point that in mid-1987 TI’s State Activities Department—whose “mission statement” committed it to “defend against adverse legislation and anti-78 Governor: Expand Law on Smoking to Include Most Iowa Restaurants,” DMR, Dec. 28, 1989 (1), Bates No. 507593272. In this regard Hutchins understood more about the reality of the law of the legislature and the laws of physics than one of the leader’s of the Iowa City-based group, Clean Air for Everyone, who, uncritically conflating smoking-free and smoke-free, falsely claimed that the 1990 amendment “create[d] smoke-free areas in all restaurants seating more than 50....” Megan Sheffer and Christopher Squier, “Up in Smoke: An Assessment Process Related to Smoke-Free Restaurant Ordinances in Iowa,” in Needs and Capacity Assessment Strategies for Health Education and Health Promotion 166-71 at 166 (Gary Gilmore and M. Campbell eds. 3d ed. 2005 [1996]).

79 Julie Mickens, “Group Pushes to Ban Smoking in Restaurants,” Icon, Oct. 7, 1999 (5:1-2). Four years later White self-contradictorily claimed that because “he had been the Chair of the County Attorney’s Legislative Committee at the time the preemptive language was passed...he knew the history of it.” Minutes of the Informal Meeting of the Johnson County Board of Supervisors at 2 (May 7, 2003), on http://www.johnson-county.com/auditor/min2003/030507ws.htm (visited Oct. 23, 2008).
House File 209 in 1989-1990: Restaurant Coverage Is Finally Achieved tobacco activities of any nature at state and local levels”—surveyed its field staff and lobbyists to “gain a clearer picture in discussing the question ‘is it prudent and/or possible to seek state level smoking restriction laws which preempt local jurisdictions?’” The conclusion of this “extremely confidential” survey that enactment of a local preemption law might be possible in 22 states (including Iowa) during the state legislative sessions from 1987 to 1989 was based on consideration of six points: (1) the strength of home rule concepts and the likelihood of the legislature’s taking preemption seriously; (2) the history of and prognosis for local smoking restrictions; (3) the strength of the anti-tobacco movement; (4) whether allies would continue to support the tobacco industry’s position and resources could continue to be provided for dealing with the threat of local enactments; (5) whether a statewide smoking restriction law existed, what the possibility was of serious efforts to strengthen such a law, and whether the tobacco companies could defeat them; and (6) whether the tobacco industry weakened “its position on all issues by adopting an alternative position on smoking restriction legislation” and whether such legislation could be controlled.

The “confidential” Iowa report, which was written on June 4, 1987, four days before Governor Branstad signed the clean indoor air law amendments, judged legislative adoption of preemption “possible,” but “only if an attempt were made to strengthen present state law.” Without fleshing out the implications of such a trade-off, the report presumably meant that restaurant and workplace coverage, the law’s most notable gap, was the price that would have to be paid for preemption—assuming that the author did not have in mind enactment, as the Texas report put it, “through some coy, subtle manipulation of the legislative process.” Since the law passed in 1987 was “very weak,” there would

---

81“Statewide Smoking Restrictions with Preemption” (ca. 1988), Bates No. 506624412.
82“Statewide Smoking Restrictions with Preemption” (ca. 1988), Bates No. 506624412/3. Iowa was not listed among the four states (California, Missouri, New York, and Wisconsin) in which “[i]nfluencing activity now happening.”
83“Statewide Smoking Restrictions with Preemption” (ca. 1988), Bates No. 506624412.
84“Statewide Smoking Restrictions with Preemption” (ca. 1988), Bates No. 506624412/23.
85“Statewide Smoking Restrictions with Preemption” (ca. 1988), Bates No. 506624412/47.
“undoubtedly be an attempt to strengthen it in 1988 [sic; must be 1989].” The Iowa author (who may well have been a lobbyist himself) regarded the industry’s lobbyists as “[v]ery strong,” tobacco company strength” as “very good,” and (unnamed) “[n]ew allies developed by phone banks also as “very good,” but was constrained to admit that wholesaler strength was “nonexistent” (presumably for the unexplicated reason that in 1982-83 lobbyist George Wilson’s wholesalers split with the manufacturers over the precedence to be given to the Unfair Cigarette Sales Act). Although the report did not pass judgment on the strength of the anti-tobacco movement other than to advise the Tobacco Institute that it continue to try to strengthen the law, the finding that the existing local ordinances that would run afoul of any preemption law were weak appeared to lessen the urgency for enactment. Nevertheless, a certain inexorability seemed to inhere in the process, especially since the “Governor hates tobacco industry, wife active in GASP.” Consequently, regardless of what the tobacco companies might have wished: “Legislature preoccupied with budget problems, as soon as they straighten the budget out, they will probably come after us in this area (workplace smoking).”

In July 1989, Dan Nelson, the TI Midwest regional vice president, responded to a request from Paul Emrick, the vice president for the northern sector, for an analysis of “preemption possibilities” in those states by pointing out that since the bill expanding the Clean Indoor Air Act (H.F. 209) that lobbyist Wasker had “held off” in 1989 would be carried over to the 1990 session, “Wasker will wait to review approved amendment language. Mr. Wasker prefers an outright defeat of any smoking restriction expansion but if his defensive position deteriorates, a preemption amendment is a possibility.”

86 “Statewide Smoking Restrictions with Preemption” (ca. 1988), Bates No. 506624412/23-24. On Wilson, see above ch. 26. TI called the Iowa and Vermont acts passed in 1987 “loose workplace laws....” Kurt Malmgren, Briefing for James H. Johnston Chairman R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company at 41 (Sept. 27, 1989), Bates No. TIMN350847/87. Under the rubric “continuing local legislative problems” the report mentioned only Des Moines with regard to “local smoking restriction legislation.” On action by the City of Des Moines regarding smoking in its own buildings and skywalks, see above.

87 Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: State Preemption on Smoking Restrictions and Local Excise Taxes (July 14, 1989), Bates No. T100260228. One of the State Activities officials to whom the memo was circulated wrote on it that while agreeing with most of its conclusions, “I think the focus on ‘preemption’ has blurred vision on things that PM [Philip Morris] is interested in, ie, smokers’ rights.” (The writer, based on the hard-to-decipher initials, may have been Walter Woodson, director of legislative support, and its recipient (BC) may have been Bill Cannell, vice president for legislative support.) In light regional office forwarded to Wasker for his consideration examples of preemption clauses that the Washington headquarters had furnished.

2700
House File 209 in 1989-1990: Restaurant Coverage Is Finally Achieved

The Tobacco Institute’s initiation in 1988 of the Comprehensive Public Smoking Program (CPSP) — into which the abortive accommodationist Operation Downunder had morphed — added to its primary charge of defeating legislation adverse to the tobacco industry the “proactive” mission of seizing opportunities to promote legislation that would benefit the industry. Broadened still further by the State Activities Division in 1989, the charge came to include:

State preemption bills. One of the industry’s toughest, most time-consuming and expensive areas is in fighting local smoking restrictions. The Institute will lead industry efforts to preempt localities’ abilities to adopt restriction laws. ...
Likewise, The Institute will take a hard look at opportunities to preempt local sampling bans and local taxing authorities.
In addition, The Institute will work to ensure smokers a right to smoke in places of employment and elsewhere. The basic idea is to carve out a reasonable smoking niche for tobacco customers.
Further, our proactive efforts also include efforts to roll back existing anti-tobacco laws in the states and localities to make them more reasonable to the industry and tobacco consumers.

The cigarette manufacturing companies were able to intensify the potency of their new strategy by channeling some of their extraordinary profits into the financing of legislative counter-agendas at levels designed to force anti-smoking groups to scatter and dissipate their resources. As the head of TI’s state activities field staff explained to his regional lieutenants:

The fact that a given CPSP legislative concept may have a limited chance of passage should not automatically rule out an attempt to work for its passage.

of Philip Morris’s very focused efforts on behalf of enactment of preemption provisions, this criticism appears to have been misguided.

88 Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Action-Trac [Iowa HF 209] (Jan. 16, 1989), Bates No. TI00301663/4, on tobaccodocuments.org
89 Kurt Malmgren to John Kochevar et al., Subj: Comprehensive Public Smoking Program (CPSP) Update (Feb. 8, 1989), Bates No. TI00260318.
90 See above ch. 26.
91 Walter Woodson to Roger Mozingo, Subject: Goals of The Institute’s “Proactive” Program (Aug. 14, 1989), Bates No. TI00260200. The initial round of CPSP projects did not include any in Iowa. Comprehensive Public Smoking Program Projects in Progress (Rev. Feb. 8, 1989), Bates No. TILBC010851.
...

Set the agenda for the anti-tobacco forces; i.e., push for legislation to tie up the anti-tobacco forces’ resources and put them on the defensive. In this case, outright legislative victory is not the only goal.92

On October 2, 1989, Kurt Malmgren, the head of TI’s State Activities department, sent its “1990 Proactive Legislative Plans” to representatives of various tobacco companies and TI officers. In an accompanying memorandum Malmgren announced that in 1990 the Institute would expand the effort begun in 1989 to develop and implement plans to enact favorable legislation, while at the same time seeking to “set the tobacco agenda in the state legislatures, rather than simply reacting defensively to our anti-tobacco opponents.” For 1990, Malmgren had targeted 35 states with one or more legislative actions, the first two mentioned being “Preemption of local smoking restrictions” and “Rollback or modification of existing smoking restrictions.” To carry out this “ambitious undertaking” as part of the Institute’s “mission to the industry,” Malmgren stressed that close coordination with the member companies was necessary.93

What the press’s coverage of the preemption issue lacked was more than compensated for by internal tobacco industry documents that defendants have been forced to produce and have been made available on the internet. Iowa was hardly the only or even an especially high-profile example of the cigarette companies’ nationwide preemption campaign,94 their highest state legislative priority in the 1990s.95 Indeed, by 1994, Tina Walls, Philip Morris vice president for government affairs, declared at an internal corporate meeting that enactment of preemption legislation in all 50 states was one of the company’s “most important priorities for 1994 and 1995” because smokers’ right to smoke where they worked, played, and lived was “under attack as never before”:

---

92Walter Woodson to Kurt Malmgren, Subject: Comprehensive Public Smoking Program (CPSP) Procedures (Jan. 31, 1989), Bates No. TI00261033/6. See also Kurt Malmgren to Regional Vice Presidents/Directors, Subject: Comprehensive Public Smoking Program (CPSP) Procedures (Feb. 21, 1989), Bates No. TI00260320/2.
House File 209 in 1989-1990: Restaurant Coverage Is Finally Achieved

The immediate implications for our business are clear: if our consumers have fewer opportunities to enjoy our products, they will use them less frequently and the result will be an adverse impact on our bottom line.

Even more important, accommodation/pre-emption laws shape the real-world environment in which our customers and their non-smoking friends and associates live every day.

If smokers are banished to doorways and loading docks in front of buildings, it makes smokers feel like outcasts and gives encouragement to the antis.

On the other hand, if we live in a society that accommodates smokers and non-smokers alike, it sends the message that smoking is a viable life-style choice and an adult’s decision to use a legal product should be respected.

In mid-1989 a memorandum to the heads of TI’s State Activities department listed Iowa among 24 states in which there was “Low Priority for Local Preemption” because “local activity on smoking restrictions is not customary...or anti-smokers have already achieved tough state laws, making local ordinances ‘unnecessary.” Since Iowa’s law was so weak, presumably it was the lack of local activity that must have prompted the classification. As of 1987, the Tobacco Institute was aware of only three local smoking restriction ordinances in Iowa. In fact, of the three, which were all passed in 1978, those in Johnston were 96 CAC Presentation #4 (July 8, 1994), Bates No. 2041183751/2. See also Ellen Merlo, (untitled), at 9 (Oct. 24, 1994), Bates No. 2040236685/93.

---

97 Cathey Yoe [director, legislative information] “Memorandum: State Preemption of Local Smoking Restrictions,” to Kurt Malmgren [senior vice president] et al. (June 20, 1989), Bates No. TII0026-0294. Minnesota’s placement in the same category was presumably motivated by the other rationale.

98 Tobacco Institute, Breakdown of Approved Local Smoking Restrictions (1987), Bates No. 2025833059. See also Tobacco Institute Field Staff Meeting (Aug. 1985), Bates No. 680501768/831.

99 Debate over the action by the Johnston city council was contentious. Described by the local press as “smokers against non-smokers at the Council table,” the council on first reading approved an ordinance that would have allowed smoking in all areas of city hall not designated/posted nosmoking. However, after a motion to waive the second and third readings failed by a vote of 3 to 2, a nonsmoking councilman and another who had recently quit offered a compromise to designate about half of the audience area of the council chambers as nonsmoking, which was adopted unanimously. “Water Main Extension Discussed at Council Meeting,” Northern Polk County News (Johnston), 9(40):1:1-6 at and Cherokee merely designated smoking areas in city-owned governmental buildings pursuant to the just enacted statewide statute. Only the Ames ordinance imposed an absolute smoking ban—at meetings of the city council and other city government bodies. To be sure, apart from the fact that the 1978 statewide clean indoor air law did not contain a provision preempting local ordinances, even the 1990 preemption amendment no more prohibited cities and counties qua building owners from banning smoking in their own buildings than private owners.

In June 1988, however, Bill Cannell, TI vice president for legislative support and administration, told the executive committee that Des Moines (in addition to Appleton, Wisconsin and Palo Alto, California) was a possible site for rolling back or repealing local “laws.” 102 Presumably the perceived opportunity in Des Moines prompted the inclusion in TI’s State Government Relations Legislative Counsel 1989-90 briefing book of Iowa among only 14 states that TI had “targeted” for action regarding preemption of local smoking restrictions as part of the “‘pro-active’” role it had taken in 1989 and would expand in 1990 to develop legislation favorable to the industries. Its goal was “to set the tobacco agenda in the state legislatures, rather than simply reacting to our anti-tobacco opponents.” 103

The situation Cannell had in mind was the decision by the City of Des Moines to ban smoking in almost all city buildings on June 1, 1988. Since the 1987 amendments to the clean indoor air law had been in effect, the city had been complying by banning smoking except in designated areas. “But,” as the Des Moines Register noted, “a recent trend toward completely smokeless buildings has not been lost on Des Moines city officials.” 104 The city manager, Cy Carney, animated by complaints from municipal workers, such as those who ate in the city hall lunch room, astutely drew the appropriate public health conclusion from the basic flaw in the state statute in a letter to department heads by pointing out that the restriction of smoking to designated areas “‘has the general effect of confining and concentrating smoking in various parts of city buildings. That, of course, has intensified the smoke in areas which are used by both smoking and non-smoking employees.’” 105 Thus, on March 10, 1988, Carney issued a directive “relative to the creation of a smoke free environment in all City facilities in an effort to provide a cleaner, healthier work place,” which prohibited city employees from smoking in any city building or facility; it also applied to the general public except in the public areas of the airport and convention center. 106

102 Bill Cannell, Public Smoking Program: State Activities Division Presentation to Tobacco Institute Executive Committee, in Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr., Comments, Executive Committee The Tobacco Institute (Draft #2) (June 16, 1988), Bates No. TI01770102/36.

103 Tobacco Institute, State Government Relations, Legislative Counsel, Briefing Book 1989-90, Bates No. 507621719/48.

105 “Ban in Almost All City Buildings Begins June 1, Carney Says,” DMR, Mar. 16, 1988 (3M:3).

For Brozek and Nelson, the heads of TI’s Midwest region, the ban fit well as “an additional target for our Comprehensive Public Smoking Program” since it embodied two matters with which the Institute was authorized to deal: “modification/roll back of existing anti-smoking laws” and “smokers rights.”

Having previously discussed the Des Moines ban with headquarters, in September 1988 Brozek and Nelson informed their northern sector boss, Paul Emrick, that its Iowa lobbyist/counsel, Wasker, had recently held “in-depth meetings” with union representatives of the municipal white-collar workers and firefighters, on the basis of which Wasker had “developed a scenario that could force a repeal, or a roll back, in Des Moines.” Wasker’s “objective” was not merely to gauge how “angry” employees’ were about the ban, but to “[e]ncourage and facilitate” their opposition. Notifying Emrick that Wasker had already “urged” that Brozek and Nelson “immediately undertake a preemptive and proactive stance,” they pointed out that in addition to working under an agreement with TI as counsel, Wasker “continues to act in a legal advisory position with potential aggrieved parties.” News of this second function signaled a request for a $15,000 budget for the fourth quarter of 1988 to finance Wasker’s other activities. By October Emrick had already approved a check to Wasker for $10,000 for “Iowa Legal Services/CPSP.”

A few days later, in another report to Emrick on CPSP in the Midwest, Brozek and Nelson reiterated that Wasker had determined that the firefighter and white-collar unions were “irritated” over the smoking ban: the former were demanding that the issue be taken up in then ongoing contract negotiations, while the latter and the police union were considering adopting the same position: “Much of this activity has been generated and directed by Mr. Wasker himself,” who had also “extensively organized our legislative strategy...”

Moines Clerk’s Office. Whereas violations by employees were subject to “the usual disciplinary process involving violations of work rules,” the general public could only be “courteously advised of our smoke free environment.” Nevertheless, in spite of this lack of enforcement power, one of the city clerks stated that she had never seen any nonemployee smoke in city hall. Email from Karen Herzberg to Marc Linder (May 31, 2007).

107Michael Brozek and Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: Targets for Proactive Efforts, (Sept. 6, 1988), Bates No. T142680947
109Michael Brozek and Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: Targets for Proactive Efforts, (Sept. 6, 1988), Bates No. T142680946/7.
111Michael Brozek and Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: Comprehensive Public throughout this past summer and fall.”

The proposed $15,000 budget for 1989 included $10,000 for a survey. Rolling back the Des Moines municipal smoking ban was thwarted in mid-February 1989 both Brozek and Nelson met in Des Moines with Wasker and Pat Wilson, their counterpart from Philip Morris, to review what in the meantime had turned into a grievance over the ban. The no-smoking policy, however, remained on the books and smoking remained prohibited in city buildings. In the end, then, neither “our magician” Wasker nor the nicotine purveyors’ super-profits were able to implement this “proactive” roll back pipe dream. And by 2007, the Des Moines Professional Firefighters Association did not even permit smoking during union meetings.

Indeed, to judge by information provided two decades later by the presidents of the firefighters and white-collar workers unions in 1988, what Wasker and perhaps Brozek and Nelson as well generated was a vastly inflated picture of the

---

112 Michael Brozek and Dan Nelson to Paul Emrick, Re: Comprehensive Public Smoking Program Region IV (Nov. 4, 1988), Bates No. TI08940761/2.
113 Public Smoking Program, Des Moines, Iowa (n.d.), Bates No. TI08940767, on tobaccodocuments.org. It is unclear to whom the $2,500 in honoraria was to be given. Separately it was estimated that $9,000 was spent in Iowa in 1988 and $28,500 was to be budgeted for the Public Smoking Program in 1989; by far the largest item was a phone bank. The location of the non-Des Moines program was not identified. Public Smoking Program (n.d.), Bates No. TI08940766.
114 In January 1989, for example, the board of trustees of the Des Moines Water Works unanimously rejected a petition from 89 of the utility’s 205 employees to designate indoor smoking areas so they could “satisfy their nicotine craving” without having to go outdoors in to the cold. Charles Bullard, “Smoking Ban Reiterated,” DMR, Jan. 25, 1989 (6M:4-5).
115 Bi-Weekly Report Michael F. Brozek - RVP - Region IV (Feb. 13-14, 1989), Bates No. TI28811593/4; Bi-Weekly Report Dan Nelson - RD - Region IV (Feb. 13-14, 1989), Bates No. TI28811593/7. Although Wilson was Brozek’s counterpart in the sense that she was Philip Morris’s Midwest regional director in Chicago, the cigarette companies (which financed the Institute), according to Brozek, did not trust TI staff; despite having no formal authority over him, Wilson, on visits to his office in Madison, bossed him around, symbolically demonstrating her power by sitting in his chair. Telephone interview with Michael Brozek, Madison, WI (June 5, 2007).
116 According to Carol Moser, a Des Moines Assistant City Attorney, who began working for the city in the early 1980s, municipal white collar workers welcomed the ban, while some police were annoyed by its application to police stations, but the ban was never rescinded and was always complied with. Telephone interview with Carol Moser, Des Moines (May 29, 2007).
dissatisfaction among the members. According to Ray Thomas, a union vice president who also owned a cigar store had been the initial link to the tobacco industry representative, who in meeting with Thomas made promises about having a lot of money—$10,000 was a figure Thomas still remembered—to hand out, but the union never saw any of it. And since Thomas supported the indoor smoking ban, his heart was not in any arrangement to foment unrest anyway. Moreover, because smokers were already at that time a minority among the firefighters, the tobacco representative was unable to gain a foothold in the union; and since the nonsmoking majority was vocal, if anyone had said at a union meeting that the union would soon be receiving tobacco industry money, the majority would have rejected it.118 Similarly, according to Andrew Hennesy, who at the time was the president of the Municipal Employees Association, which represented white-collar workers in the municipal government such as those who worked in city hall, a majority of the members were not opposed to the indoor smoking ban. He recalled no grievances having been filed.119

TI’s Midwest regional staff’s analysis of H.F. 209 focused on the proposed expansion of “public places” to include restaurants and the industry’s counter-proposal of preemption. In reviewing its roster of “pro-active” legislative proposals, Region IV analyzed the circumstances that might give rise to a preemption amendment to H.F. 209:

HF 209 remains in its house of origin due to the extensive lobbying efforts of TI, and the Iowa Restaurant Association. The Restaurant Association will stay opposed to HF 209 with or without local preemption clauses if percentage designations are included in the bill. In fact, at this time, the Tobacco Institute remains opposed to HF 209 in its present or deleted form. Several amendments have been considered including the changing of fines, mandates that require public places with a public address system to regularly announce their smoking policy, and additional inclusions or deletions of affected public places.

If HF 209 begins moving through the legislature, we will attempt to amend strong preemption language into Iowa’s Clean Indoor Air Act. Region IV staff has received several examples of preemption clauses which have been forwarded to Iowa counsel, Chuck Wasker, for his consideration.

In the House of Representatives absent an outright kill of the bill, TI counsel will first try to amend the bill in the House. If the bill progresses to the Senate, we will once again 118 Telephone interview with Ray Thomas, Ankeny, IA (May 30, 2007). Thomas did not recall the name of the tobacco industry representative, but from his account it appears that Wasker was that person.

119 Telephone interview with Andrew Hennesy, Des Moines (June 1, 2007). Hennesy did not recall having been approached by or having met with anyone from the tobacco industry.
Despite TI’s emphasis on implementing a “proactive” strategy, until this point in the analysis it appeared to be using preemption primarily as a tactical weapon to destroy any bill that sought to expand coverage to include restaurants. At this juncture, however, preemption became the priority in its own right to which TI’s national campaign had subordinated coverage. Although TI did not plan any “grassroots mobilization” at that time, it did foresee the need for and potential conflicts with “coalition allies”:

[T]he Iowa Restaurant Association opposes HF 209 and has indicated to Region IV staff that they have no intention of changing their position. In spite of this opposition, if the bill starts to progress we will seek the aid of trade groups interested in state wide [sic] uniformity in smoking restrictions. At the proper time, we will contact the Iowa Restaurant Association and state and local chambers of commerce to educate them on the benefits of uniformity in smoking restriction laws.121

---

121 Kurt Malmgren, “Pro-Active Legislative Targets 1990” at 33 (Oct. 2, 1989), Bates No. TI00310001/42. TI foresaw an even more probable clash of interests emanating from Iowa’s de facto ban on sampling, which resulted from tobacco “wholesalers’ concern with excess amounts of free cigarettes being distributed.” The manufacturers could not successfully amend the law in any “‘overt’” way; instead, they “need to have an amendment inserted into a revenue bill dealing with other subjects” and “to secure a friendly legislator to insert the language...and gain the cooperation of leadership in protecting that language when it is inserted. This methodology does not lend itself to press releases, industry and grassroots mobilizations and other traditional support instruments. In short, if we are not able to accomplish this move quietly, we will be unsuccessful.” The key to pulling off this surreptitious coup was maintaining “low visibility for a large portion of the legislature, capitol press corps and the general public,” while demonstrating to the wholesalers by means of comparative data from states with active sampling programs that the practice did not reduce wholesalers’ and retailers’ sales. Id. at 34, Bates No. TI00310001/43. According to R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., the Iowa wholesalers were “adamant with respect to not changing this...extremely restrictive law....” Betty C. Royal Preemption now seemed to take on a life of its own and become a goal in its own right rather than merely a tactic designed to thwart the passage of more radical anti-smoking bills: the point was to persuade restaurant and other business owners that preemption was of such overwhelming importance for all industries that they should abandon their resistance to coverage for the sake of the greater good of the tobacco industry. 122 Years later, Brozek, TI Midwest regional vice president until 1988 (and a Philip Morris lobbyist in Wisconsin for a time thereafter), completely corroborated this analysis. No matter what anyone might say, he declared, by the years 1989-1991, preemption was without any doubt the cigarette companies’ highest state legislative goal simply because they lacked the capacity to fight and win in myriad communities, which would have inflicted “a thousand wounds” on them. Consequently, he confirmed that, if forced to choose between no restaurant coverage and no preemption, on the one hand, and restaurant coverage and preemption, on the other, there was absolutely no doubt that the tobacco industry would have chosen and—in states such as Iowa—did in fact choose the latter, relegating the restaurant associations’ goals to matters of utter indifference. 123

This position was subtly and indirectly reinforced in a letter that TI’s communications director Walker Merryman sent at the beginning of 1990 to Lester Davis, the Iowa Restaurant & Beverage Association executive director, in his capacity as a member of the International Society of Restaurant Association Executives, which the Institute had joined two years earlier. Though a form letter, it nevertheless abstractly alluded to circumstances that were on the verge of confronting IRBA, warning restaurant owners and offering them quid pro quo’s at the same time:

[W]e want to make certain we keep the lines of communication open between our two industries so that we may avoid any conflict.

There are obvious legislative and regulatory matters where our interests coincide. Naturally, we intend to vigorously defend the rights of our member companies and will welcome your participation when those matters arise. There may also be times when you need a little assistance on an issue which may not seem to be a logical fit. I want to assure you that we stand ready to play whatever role we can mutually determine.\textsuperscript{124}

In reporting right after new year to his boss in Washington on legislative plans for 1990 in the Upper Midwest, TI’s regional vice president, Daniel Nelson—who, 16 years after having quit his post, was still filled with admiration for Wasker’s lobbying prowess\textsuperscript{125}—boasted of the “clean records” that “we” had had in 1989 in Iowa (as well as in Minnesota and South Dakota), where “Wasker had a banner year” rolling back a three-cent cigarette tax in addition to killing smoking restriction and advertising bills. Admitting that “[w]e are late out of the blocks on our pro-active efforts,” Nelson characterized their “intended goal” as “interesting” in requiring TI both to persuade the tobacco wholesalers and their lobbyist George Wilson to abandon their long-time support for the (de facto) statutory ban on free distribution of samples as well as to bring them “back on to the team” and to secure their “cooperation...on the whole legislative front”—a task that he “frankly” recognized “may take more time than this leg session will allow.” Finally, without explaining the basis for the innovation, Nelson reported that, unlike the situation in other Region IV states, where labor consultants were hired “initially to work in the area of clean indoor air,” TI was retaining former Iowa Senate Democratic Majority Leader Lowell Junkins as a labor consultant to “work primarily on delivering union opposition to proposed excise tax increases.”\textsuperscript{126}

\textsuperscript{124}Walker Merryman to Lester Davis (Jan. 2, 1990), Bates No. T129842334/75.
\textsuperscript{125}Telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007). Unprompted, Nelson volunteered this reason for having chosen to work for the Tobacco Institute: “Hey, this is America—there are two sides to every story.” \textit{Id.}
\textsuperscript{126}Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Re: Region IV General Update (Jan 3, 1990), T128870894-6.
H.F. 209 Passes in 1990 as Restaurant Coverage Is Traded Off for a Version of Preemption of Local Control that Even the Cigarette Manufacturers Deemed No Broader Than What “Iowa Constitution already says”

“This bill just died of lung cancer.”

Although Lieutenant Governor Zimmerman focused on environmental and health issues in her opening address to the Senate on January 8, 1990, her “Report Card on Iowa” failed to mention smoking. On January 11, by a vote of 14 to 2, the House State Government Committee recommended passage of H.F. 209. For the next day, January 12, the tobacco industry scheduled a high-level legislative forecast meeting, attended by Wasker, TI’s lobbyist, Serge Garrison, R. J. Reynolds’ lobbyist, Joe Murray, Reynolds’ state government relations official with responsibility for many states including Iowa, and Pat Wilson, the Midwest regional director for governmental affairs at Philip Morris. Garrison, who had been the director of the Legislative Service (Research) Bureau and thus the Iowa legislature’s chief bill drafter from 1967 to 1984 before joining a corporate law firm in Des Moines, chose to lobby for Reynolds Tobacco 128State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the Senate: 1990: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 1:1-5 (Jan. 8). Zimmerman did not mention smoking in any of her other opening addresses during her tenure as lieutenant governor.

131RJR, I. Introduction, III. Programs and Resources, A. Legislative, 1. Legislative and Regulatory Counsel, at 3 (May 15, 1989), Bates No. 507639332/7.
132Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Re: Region IV General Update (Jan 3, 1990), T128870894. On Murray, see RJRT State Government Relations, IV. Staff & Structure, C. State Assignments (Mar. 6, 1989), Bates No. 507619305/6. On Wilson, whose participation was noted as “pending,” see Philip Morris USA, Government Affairs Regions (June 1990), Bates No. 2070158962. According to a Philip Morris in-house organ, “all she ever dreamed about while growing up in Billings, Montana was becoming a professional lobbyist.” “Tapgram Profile: Regional Government Affairs Director Pat Wilson,” Tapgram 11(3) (Mar. 1991), Bates No. 2024332327/8.
because, according to his widow, it was a “good-paying client,” although “his heart was not in it.” The $24,000 in 1989 and $26,000 in 1990 (plus about $1,000 in expenses) that Reynolds paid Garrison apparently overcame whatever qualms he may have had. (In contrast, his gross pay in his final two calendar years at the legislature was $48,235.20 and $59,709.42.) Whether he and the entities involved believed that his simultaneous executive directorship of the Iowa Life and Health Insurance Association constituted a conflict of interest is unclear.

By January 16, Nelson, based presumably on information exchanged at this meeting, was able to notify headquarters that it was likely that two amendments—dealing with smokers’ individual rights and uniformity (i.e., preemption)—would be introduced. The chances of passage in the House were, according to Wasker, good, with prospects in the Senate less certain. At this point, Nelson was still adhering to the aforementioned strategy of trying to introduce a strong preemption clause if the bill began progressing and, in support thereof, “educat[ing]” IRBA and state and local chambers of commerce on the “benefits of uniformity in smoking restriction laws.” To be sure, Nelson’s word choice suggested that enactment of preemption was not some second-best necessity, but a goal in its own right: “If the opportunity to advance a preemption amendment occurs, it will be beneficial to have a smokers list mobilization in support of the amendment.” Although the Register’s statehouse reporter also 134Telephone interview with Caryl Garrison, Des Moines (June 16, 2007).

136The data for 1983 and 1984 (Garrison’s termination date was Dec. 7, 1984) were furnished by the Iowa Department of Administrative Services. Email from Lisa Elliott, payroll accountant, to Marc Linder (Jan. 24, 2011). For budgetary reasons, the State of Iowa stopped publishing state employees’ salaries between 1980 and 1988.

138Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Action-Trac: Iowa HF 209 (Jan. 19, 1990), Bates No. TI00301663/4, on tobaccodocuments.org (italics added). Something of a puzzle attaches to Nelson’s knowing that a preemption amendment—which Mary Lundby and Tony Bisignano filed the next day—would be filed: if TI put them up to it, why did it not give them a text that its lawyers had drafted rather than one that it immediately pronounced almost worthless; if (as seems implausible) they filed it on their own initiative, but Wasker knew about it, why did he not persuade them to drop it in favor of one of the texts that TI had sent Wasker months earlier?
regarded the prospects for House passage as good, he stressed that dozens of amendments had been offered to weaken or kill the bill, specifically mentioning one to redefine “smoking” to include chewing.\textsuperscript{139}

On January 19, when the House took up H.F. 209, Hammond offered the aforementioned weakening amendment H-3309,\textsuperscript{140} which the State Government Committee had filed and included in its recommendation of the passage of the bill in 1989.\textsuperscript{141} But even the chief sponsor’s self-censored compromise was quickly overtaken by events. First, the House adopted a floor motion to amend the cigarette sales license law by requiring vending machines to be “in clear view” of the person responsible for preventing purchases by minors and imposing a $500 civil penalty on the cigarette vendor and the retail licensee for a first offense and permit/license revocation for additional violations.\textsuperscript{142} Then the bill’s chief opponent, Democrat Tony Bisignano, and Hammond joined to file an amendment that eliminated H.F. 209’s partial coverage of bars and the public address system announcements (denounced by TI as “‘big brother’ language”).\textsuperscript{143} Based on a deal between the leading antagonists, this amendment was adopted.\textsuperscript{144} Lundby’s amendment to expand the scope of covered “smoking” to include tobacco chewing—which, laudable as it may have been as a public health measure with respect to combating the rise in prevalence of smokeless tobacco use,\textsuperscript{145} was extraneous to the issue of involuntary smoke exposure and may have been designed to subvert support for the bill—lost narrowly (39 to 47) on a non-record roll call vote.\textsuperscript{146} Bisignano then filed a floor amendment raising the exemption

\textsuperscript{143}Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Action-Trac Iowa HF 209 (Jan. 22, 1990), Bates No. TI28751244/46.

\textsuperscript{146}\textit{State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the House: 1990: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly} 1:126 (Jan. 19). By 2007, the chewing tobacco amendment was the threshold for restaurants from the 25 seats that the committee itself had proposed to 50, which was adopted on a voice vote. On Hammond’s motion the House then adopted the now amended committee amendment as a whole.\textsuperscript{147}

The bill’s proponents, to judge by the Register’s account of the debate, vastly exaggerated its potential impact by asserting, as did Democrat Rod Halvorson, that it would protect “the people that don’t want interference with their right to breathe clean air....” Hammond may have correctly argued that “[w]e should isolate the smokers from the non-smokers in order to protect their health,” but empowering building owners to designate that and where the twain should meet hardly satisfied that criterion. Although the bill’s failure to protect nonsmokers was manifest even as applied to larger public places, her justification for excluding stores of fewer than 250 square feet on the grounds that it did not “make sense” to include, for example, barber shops\textsuperscript{148} revealed the absence of a meaningful public health principle.

Even more momentous was the next amendment, which Republican Mary Lundby and Bisignano had filed two days earlier.\textsuperscript{149} (The next year Lundby may have disclosed the personal basis of her opposition to smoking bans. After having revealed in an interview for an oral history of Iowa women legislators that she loved fast cars, she was asked what else she liked that was fun: “I love to play cards. I love to smoke and drink beer with the people downtown.”)\textsuperscript{150} Their amendment prescribed that: “Enforcement of this chapter shall be implemented in an equitable manner throughout the state.” Adopted on a close non-record roll call vote of 47 to 43,\textsuperscript{151} this provision was the first (and, as it turned out, mildest and vaguest) version of preemption designed to deprive local governments of the power to pass ordinances stricter than the weak and “toothless” statewide law. This crucial matter of preemption was not even mentioned in the lengthy account of the debate in the next day’s Register. Before Wasker had even had time to “sort through the various amendments to get an accurate picture of what form the Legislation is now in,” Nelson, immediately reported to Washington that Wasker had called the amendment “nebulous”; although its wording “was not to our specifications,” it did nevertheless “speak to uniformity of enforcement.”

\textsuperscript{150}A Political Dialogue: Iowa’s Women Legislators, Box 3: Folder: Transcripts: Mary Lundby at 50 (Oct. 1, 1991), in IWA.

\textsuperscript{151}State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the House: 1990: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 1:127-28 (Jan. 19). Unfortunately, when interviewed in 2007, Lundby stated that she was unable to recollect whether she had filed the amendment on her own initiative or anything else about this preemption battle. Telephone interview with Mary Lundby, on the road near Ames (June 1, 2007).

Lundby’s amendment to prohibit employment discrimination against smokers (or nonsmokers)—another legislative desideratum of the cigarette companies—was held not germane on Hammond’s point of order. Then on successive non-record roll calls, Lundby’s motion to reduce the civil penalty from $50 to $10 was defeated 43 to 46, but her follow-up amendment to reduce the amount to $25 was adopted 54 to 32, prompting Senate Majority Leader Hutchins to opine that the bill’s chances of passing in the Senate had just improved. After defeating Lundby’s final obstructionist amendment to reverse the bill’s facilitation of enforcement by imposing filing fees on complainants, the House passed H.F. 209 by a large majority of 67 to 22. Though by no means along party lines, the vote did reveal a difference between the parties: only 21 percent of Democrats (who controlled the House 61 to 39) who voted opposed the bill in contrast to 31 percent of Republicans. Of the 18 (of 19) female representatives who cast a vote, five or 28 percent opposed H.F. 209; only one (or 20 percent) of five Republican women voted Nay, whereas four (33 percent) of the 12 voting Democrats did. Thus, when party and gender are taken into account, only seven (or 16 percent of) Democratic men who voted opposed the bill, whereas 10 (or 30 percent of) voting Republican men voted Nay.\textsuperscript{161}

155See below ch. 29.

The mindset of some who opposed the bill may be illuminated by the self-observations of Democrat Josephine Gruhn from the small northwestern town of Spirit Lake near the Minnesota border. Still a smoker in her fourth and last term, Gruhn, who was one of only five representatives who also voted against the bill after it had been returned to the House by the Senate, stressed many years later that she and other members had taken the position that the restrictions “infringed” on their rights and took away their “privileges.” Interestingly, she analogized her vote against public smoking to her vote against a bill requiring seat restraints for children in automobiles. And in both instances she readily conceded that over time she learned that she had been mistaken. Although on her own she argued that designated smoking sections in restaurants and other public places were senseless because the smoke wafted over to the no-smoking sections, the main lesson that she drew from her own self-transformation was that what the anti-smoking law had been attempting to achieve should have been phased in over a longer period of time: it was necessary to “sneak up on” smokers rather than impose radical change all at once.\textsuperscript{162}

Lundby, who had so significantly shaped the bill, was the only one of six Republican women who voted against the bill. Lundby’s explanation of her vote captures her understanding of the requirements of public health: H.F. 209 “was another example of government trying to regulate people’s lives. ‘We’re all celebrating the freedom of Eastern Europe, and we’re giving ours away here.’”\textsuperscript{163}

\textsuperscript{161}\textit{State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the House: 1990: Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly} 1:129-30 (Jan. 19); Iowa Official Register: 1989-1990, at 89-90 (Vol. 63). Of the five women who voted against the bill, two (Florence Buhr and Josephine Gruhn) smoked; of all the men who voted Nay, ex-Representative Gruhn could identify with certainty only one (Stewart Iverson) as a smoker and most as non-smokers. Telephone interview with Josephine Gruhn, Spirit Lake, IA (May 30, 2007). To be sure, it is possible that some representatives voted against the bill because they believed that it was not strong enough—for example, Philip Brammer, who was arguably the fiercest opponent of smoking in the legislature. See below.

\textsuperscript{162}Telephone interview with Josephine Gruhn, Spirit Lake, IA (May 30, 2007). To be sure, the law in Iowa was so weak in each of its incremental iterations that it always fully satisfied Gruhn’s guideline: the very fact that, as she herself noted, H.F. 209 did not stop anyone from smoking in a restaurant (or protect nonsmokers) is the best illustration.

Little wonder that Lundby was one of only seven Iowa state legislators to whom the RJR Political Action Committee disbursed money later in 1990. Motions to reconsider filed by Hammond and Democrat Dan Jay, an opponent of the bill who had opposed restaurant coverage in 1987 and would be praised by the Tobacco Institute in 1991 for defending preemption, tied the bill up for only three calendar days, and on January 25 Hammond’s was overwhelmingly defeated 8 to 66.

The greater “clout” that smokers wielded in the Senate made the bill’s fate there uncertain despite the large majority for it in the House. Nevertheless, the primus inter pares of the smokers, Majority Leader Hutchins, commented that the exemption for small restaurants and the reduction in the fine had improved H.F. 209’s chances.

TI Midwest regional vice president Nelson’s reaction to the House adoption of the preemption provision was muted. In a report to headquarters three days later, he did not even mention it until the fifth paragraph, observing merely that the “[p]reemption language...wasn’t our preference.” Indeed, since it appeared to be “rather weak,” he had had to ask the Washington staff for a legal opinion as to whether the language was even “beneficial to us.” But even if the worst came to the worst, “TI Counsel Chuck Wasker says we should be able to defeat this bill in the Senate.”

In a more thematic memorandum on “Proactive Legislation 1990 targets” to the same recipient on the same day, Nelson and Alice O’Connor, the leadership of Region IV, directed the faintest of praise at the provision passed by the House, observing that it contained “[l]anguage that could be interpreted as [a] preemption..."
clause....” Nevertheless, despite her amendment’s inadequacy and the bill’s imminent departure for the Senate, where she would have no influence, they announced that they had “identified Mary Lundby...as a sponsor for our amendment.” By January 22 the midwestern leaders had still not clarified what function a preemption clause was supposed to serve. Since TI’s “proactive” initiative in Iowa was not designed to be embodied in a “freestanding” measure, it had to be attached to a smoking-related bill such as H.F. 209, whose sponsors were supporting it for its anti-smoking features. With the bill’s passage regarded as “likely,” it made sense for the tobacco industry to “intend to protect our preemption clause, strengthen it if necessary, and water down other objectionable portions of the bill.” What injected ambiguity into the strategy was the simultaneous declaration that: “We want a state wide [sic] preemption, however, we prefer to kill 209 outright. We will review our prospects of killing this legislation in the Senate.” The cigarette manufacturers’ first choice would have been simply to add preemption to the existing clean indoor air law without any accompanying strengthening amendment. But since Nelson and O’Connor recognized that passage of such a vehicle was politically undoable, the question became whether second-best was a watered-down version of H.F. 209 with a stronger preemption clause than Lundby’s or the status quo. Odd as it might seem, the latter seems to have been the case: “[S]ince our overall strategy [is] to kill the bill, if possible, we request that member company Grass Routs [sic] Programs be directed against passage of HF209 in the Iowa Senate.” To be sure, even this support program was second best: Nelson and O’Connor would have preferred direct mail or phone mobilization, but, for reasons they did not explain, they implausibly claimed that the “issue of preemption is too technical to translate into” that kind of mobilization. ¹⁷⁰

Immediately after the House’s adoption of the aforementioned preemption provision, TI’s prioritization of preemption for Iowa shot up. Three days after passage, Diana Avedon, the State Activities department’s legislative analyst, ¹⁷¹ sent a memorandum to Melinda Sidak, a lawyer at Covington & Burling, stating that a previous request that she had sent her regarding Iowa’s preemption clause “has reared its ugly head again,” and relaying a request from Nelson for a memo explaining “why the clause does not preempt local smoking restriction ordinances.” Nelson was especially interested in “language to amend the clause to specifically include local preemption (if that is possible) or sample language that could be used as a separate preemption amendment.” Avedon requested a written response by February 7.

¹⁷¹ In 1986, after one year at TI, Avedon was listed as a word process operator. Samuel Chilcote to Members of the Executive Committee, Memorandum: Tobacco Institute Headquarters Staff (Aug. 15, 1986), Bates No. 2021266909/13. Half a year later she was listed as a secretary to Cathey Yoe, legislative affairs manager. Tobacco Institute, State Activities Headquarters Staff (Mar. 3, 1987), Bates No. TITX0031947.

Preemption was sufficiently important to prompt the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company to be monitoring developments on its own. Commenting on the company’s (and industry’s) “potential pro-active accomplishments in 1990,” on January 22, Hurst Marshall, who had previously worked for TI, conveyed to his boss, Roger Mozingo, vice president for state government relations (and former TI vice president), his “best guess” that smoking restriction preemption was “likely” to pass in Iowa.

Two days later, Marshall sent his weekly Midwest regional report to Mozingo, noting that H.F. 209 had passed the Iowa House with “unclear preemption language.” Marshall—whose report Mozingo graded “good”—added that “RJRT counsel has been sent suggested preemptive language in order to clarify intent and assist in redrafting wording. All activities will be coordinated with TI personnel.” A month later Mozingo himself informed a long distribution list at the company that of the 30 states considering bills to restrict smoking, Iowa was one of six states posing “[t]he most difficult challenges,” but at month’s end he received another update rating passage of preemption in Iowa as still “likely.”

On arrival in the Senate, H.F. 209 was referred to the Human Resources Committee on January 29, which was chaired by the anti-tobacco liberal Beverly Hannon. A week later she appointed a subcommittee consisting of herself, Al Sturgeon (chair), another anti-smoking liberal Democrat, and James 172Diana Avedon, Memorandum, to Melinda Sidak (Jan. 22, 1989 [sic; must be 1990]), Bates No. TI0030-1649. Presumably Avedon’s reference to her previous request as also having been made on January 22 was a typo, but the earlier request appears not to be included among the millions of tobacco industry documents on the internet.

173Hurst Marshall to Roger Mozingo, 1990 Pro-Active Legislative Projections (Region IV) (Jan. 22, 1990), Bates No. 507627588.

176Henry Stokes to Roger Mozingo, Legislative Projections Update (Feb. 26, 1990), Bates No. 507627542/3.

Riordan, a liberal Democrat whose position on smoking was not clearly delineated, to study the bill further and make recommendations to the full committee.178 Hannon later explained that “as chair I would have appointed the sub-committee, and I appointed them according to the outcome I wanted. I think all chairs did. But I usually always had an opposing voice on subcommittees, so I’m surprised if I just appointed us three unless I had doubts about Riordan. Maybe at that time I thought Riordan was leaning toward tobacco folks. ... I had observed that a couple times he was swayed by forces I didn’t support, like the gambling forces. ... I knew Sturgeon and I were yes votes, and 2 out of 3 is what’s needed, so I might not have cared how Riordan would vote.”179 As committee proceedings would reveal a week later, there was reason to question the stringency of Riordan’s anti-smoking stance.

Not knowing these senators’ “leanings,” TI regional vice president Nelson informed headquarters that he would have to check with Wasker. Two days later the word back from the lobbyists was that Sturgeon and Hannon were “strongly against tobacco.”180 Interestingly, Nelson did not mention whether Wasker had reported on Riordan, in particular on whether the $500 honorarium that the Tobacco Institute had given Riordan in 1988 to chat over lunch might have prompted Wasker to regard him as a friendly vote.181

The Iowa lobbyists—the Philip Morris and R. J. Reynolds lobbyists and TI staff met in Iowa on February 8 to discuss “preemptive smoking restriction legislation” as well as tax study bills and pending vending machine legislation182—also informed Nelson that they had “stronger preemption language” and were “looking for sponsors.”183 Then on February 12, Sidak—who, three months later, testified on TI’s behalf at a New York City Council hearing on a proposal to ban cigarette vending machines that “‘smoking has not been shown to cause cancer or any other disease’”[184]—weighed in with her response. Without citations, she opined that the language in Lundby and Bisignano’s amendment had been “interpreted by some as a state preemption clause.” Nevertheless, although it was unclear what their “vaguely worded provision is intended to mean, it clearly would not operate as a preemption clause” because it said “nothing whatsoever about the bill’s relationship to local ordinances. Absent “a clear expression of the legislature’s intent to preempt,” Sidak considered it “unlikely” that a court would hold the bill to preempt local regulation of public smoking.[185] Sidak then suggested the following language for an amendment:

“Chapters 98 and 98A are expressly intended to preempt all laws, ordinances or regulations by any municipal, county or other governmental unit or political subdivision relating to the consumption, sale, distribution or use of tobacco or tobacco products.” All such laws, whether enacted before or after this Act shall be or become void, unenforceable and of no effect upon the [effective date of the Act].[186]

Adoption of the phrase “relating to” made this version of preemption rather comprehensive.[187]

On February 12-13 another flurry of faxes flew between the Tobacco Institute and Covington & Burling concerning the text of an appropriate preemption provision. TI’s Midwest regional director, Alice O’Connor, sent headquarters an amendment drafted by Serge Garrison, Reynolds’ Iowa lobbyist, asking: “In lieu [185] Melinda Ledden Sidak, Memorandum at 1 (Feb. 12, 1990), Bates No. TI00372359.

---

[186] Melinda Ledden Sidak, Memorandum at 3 (Feb. 12, 1990), Bates No. TI00372359/61. It is unclear why Sidak used quotation marks for the first part of the proposal and omitted them from the second part, which she took virtually verbatim from an Iowa Code provision on obscenity (Iowa Code § 725.9 (1974)), which the Iowa Supreme Court determined to be a statement of express preemption. Chelsea Theater Corp. v. City of Burlington, 258 NW2d 372, 373 ((1977)).
[187] A decade later, in an opinion requested by then Senator Johnie Hammond, the Iowa attorney general observed that in another context the legislature had “expressed its intent to preempt with unmistakable clarity” when it prohibited local governments from making any law, regulation, or ordinance “‘relating to obscenity.’” 2000 WL 33258478, Docket No. 00-11-5 (Nov. 14, 2000). See Chelsea Theater Corp. v. City of Burlington, 258 NW2d 372, 373 (Iowa 1977).
of concerns expressed by C&B memo, would this language take care of our concerns? Does it raise any new red flags?"  Garrison’s proposal tacked on to the House bill’s single sentence (“Enforcement of this chapter shall be implemented in an equitable manner throughout the state”) the following new text: “For the purpose of the uniform application and equitable enforcement of state and local laws and regulations, this chapter shall supersede any law or regulation which is inconsistent with or conflicts with the provisions of this chapter.” (In 2004, shortly before his death from cancer, Garrison, lobbying for Tobacco-Free Iowa, stated with regard to the enactment of Code section 142B at a House Local Government subcommittee hearing on a bill to repeal local preemption that “I had a few things to do with some of the amendments adopted at that time, some of which I regret.”) Undoubtedly it was considerably weaker than the version Sidak had proposed. A handwritten notation on the fax offered this criticism: “1) Don’t advise. Would not necessarily include vending & sales & distribution. 2) Iowa constitution already says this - could pass something tougher - need word preempt vague - depends.” Since Garrison’s draft was, with minor exceptions that did not alter the meaning, ultimately embodied in the bill that the legislature passed and that remained in the Iowa Code until 2008, this attack on the proposal’s fecklessness by agents of preemption’s beneficiaries will be crucially important in evaluating the litigation over the scope of the provision a dozen years later.
On February 12, Hannon failed to persuade her own Human Resources Committee to recommend a Senate study bill, supported by the Iowa Medical Society, that would have raised the legal age for buying cigarettes and other tobacco products to 21 as well as required that cigarette vending machines be supervised by someone over 21 in order to prevent minors from using them. The bill would also have prescribed a fine and/or imprisonment for those who provided minors with tobacco. The position that Senator Riordan took on the bill suggests why chairwoman Hannon might have had her doubts about his being an anti-tobacco stalwart: he opposed the bill on the grounds that “it would be inconsistent to prohibit the purchase of tobacco by young adults who are legally old enough to join the military, marry and enter into contracts.” First-term Republican Senator Mark Hagerla, a right-wing, pro-business grocery store owner, opposed the bill because, lacking enforcement provisions, it “would do nothing to change the smoking habits of young people.”

Three days later, in a comprehensive overview of “proactive plans” to regional vice presidents for a February 22 policy committee meeting, Malmgren, the head of TI State Activities, reproduced the Midwest region’s rather colorless 194 State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the Senate: 1990 Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 1:348 (SSB 2205, by Hannon, Sturgeon, and Corning) (Feb. 5); Human Resources Committee Minutes (Feb. 12, 1990), SHSI DM (information supplied by Meaghan McCarthy, email (June 4, 2007)). According to the Legislative Services Agency, study bills as we know them today originated in 1989. Before that, there were extremely few of them and they were such informal documents that they were considered ‘throwaway’ ephemeral items with no lasting value to anyone. Supposedly, they were ‘formalized’ in 1989 in response to the public’s perception that lobbyists were writing most of the bills produced by the legislature—this process apparently provided some proof that the legislators were, in fact, conceiving their own legislation.” Email from Mandy Easter, Law Librarian, State Library of Iowa, Law Library (June 6, 2007).

---

195 Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (May 29, 2007).

and minimalist report that: “Attempts will be made to amend bill to clarify local preemption clause.”\(^{197}\) If the cigarette companies’ expectation was that that attempt would be made at the February 21 Senate Human Resources Committee meeting, at which H.F. 209 was discussed, their lobbyists’ intelligence reports let them down. Though his vote in favor of the bill would not have pleased the tobacco companies, the admonition that Riordan delivered to the committee would have consoled them. Warning his colleagues about “strong public opposition, particularly among small-town cafe and business operators,” Riordan declared that: “This is really big out there.... They are upset that Big Brother is stepping in on them again.” Hagerla asserted that it was “senseless to expand the 1987 act because it has gone virtually unenforced. ‘It’s a worthless piece of paper....’”\(^{198}\) By a vote of 10 to 2, the committee then recommended passage of H.F. 209, proposing only an amendment of the provision dealing with vending machines.\(^{199}\) The two Nays were cast by Julia Gentleman, whose anti-state-intervention position is documented later, and Hagerla. In updating headquarters on the bill’s progress Nelson appeared to be surprised or unsettled that: “Our preemption language wasn’t added. We are consulting with TI Counsel Chuck Wasker.”\(^{200}\) In contrast, the R. J. Reynolds weekly report was not concerned that no attempt had been made in committee to strengthen the House’s preemption language; implementation of that plan, Marshall knowingly added, would take place during Senate floor debate,\(^{201}\) which began three weeks later.

No sooner had Senator Sturgeon, the floor manager, offered the Human Resources Committee bill on March 14 than the Senate’s most vociferous \(^{197}\) Kurt Malmgren to Regional Vice Presidents, Re: Proactive Plans Updates (Feb. 15, 1990), Bates No. T153762244/53.

\(^{199}\) State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the Senate: 1990 Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 1:669 (Feb. 21); Thomas Fogarty, “Restaurant Smoking Bill OK’d by Panel,” Des Moines Register, Feb. 22, 1990 (2A:2-4). The amendment deleted the provision punishing cigarette vendors. State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the Senate: 1990 Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 2:1946-47 (S-5183). The minutes mentioned only an amendment by Senator Michael Connolly, which as unanimously amended by an amendment by Sturgeon passed by a vote of 10 to 2 (Taylor and Bruner voting Nay), without alluding to its substance. Human Resources Committee Minutes (Feb. 21, 1990), SHSI DM.

\(^{200}\) Dan Nelson to George Minshew, Action-Trac: Iowa HF 209 (Feb. 6 and 8, 1990), Bates No. T128751244/5.

\(^{201}\) M. Hurst Marshall to Roger Mozingo, Weekly Report Region IV, at 1 (Feb. 28, 1990), Bates No. 507628547.
opponent of smoking restrictions, Joseph Coleman, received unanimous consent that action on the bill be deferred. Two amendments filed that day are of especial interest. Republican Minority Leader Calvin Hultman—who by June left the Senate to become Iowa counsel to Philip Morris—together with Coleman and three other Democrats and two Republicans filed an amendment that merged the two that Sidak and Garrison, respectively, had drafted a month earlier for TI and Reynolds. It weakened the former by narrowing the capacious scope of “relating to” by limiting it to the latter’s universe of “inconsistent” laws and regulations. It now read:

In order to provide uniform application of this chapter and chapter 98A relating to the regulation of cigarettes, the imposition of tobacco taxes, and the enforcement of smoking prohibitions, this chapter and chapter 98A shall preempt all inconsistent laws and regulations of political subdivisions of this state relating to the consumption, sale, distribution, or use of tobacco and tobacco products. Any laws or regulations of political subdivisions of this state, whether or not enacted prior to July 1, 1990, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this chapter or chapter 98A, are void.

Imposing the additional requirement of inconsistency to trigger preemption created wiggle room for local action that might not have met the tobacco companies’ expectations, but may well have been necessary to secure a legislative majority for the provision. On the other hand, retention of “preempt” fulfilled one of Sidak’s desiderata.

More important than this formal filing was Wasker’s behind-the-scenes activity. In his daily update for March 14 to headquarters, Nelson reported that the lobbyist “has sponsors lined up for a floor amendment on preemption and has counted 28 votes in support.” With two more votes than required for passage the game seemed to be over before it had ever begun, but it was complicated by yet another iteration of the aforementioned ambivalence in the cigarette company strategy: “Wasker is checking with Lobbyists from member companies on the question of whether to amend HF 209 or to kill it outright.*204

---

202 George Kinley (D), Richard Drake (R), Joe Welsh (D) Don Gettings (D), Joseph Coleman (D), Dale Tieden (R). State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the Senate: 1990 Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 1:1078 (Mar. 14) (S-5490). Kinley, Drake, Welsh, and Coleman were smokers. Email from Beverly Hannon (Mar. 11, 2007). Hultman and Welsh were also the only two senators who the previous fall had appeared on the legislative panel of the Iowa Association of Candy and Tobacco Distributors annual meeting in Des Moines. Bates No. 94136113/28.

The other amendment was filed by Senator Julia Gentleman (a generally pro-business Des Moines Republican who, three weeks earlier, had cast one of the two no votes on H.F. 209 in committee) to amend the Iowa Code provision on the Legislative Council thus: “The council shall recommend that the senate and house rules shall provide for a prohibition of smoking in the chambers and committee rooms of the senate and house.”205 The basis for Gentleman’s advocacy of this position is unclear in light of a statement she had made just a year earlier for an oral history interview. When the interviewer pointed out that her district had supported limitations on smoking in public places except in designated areas, she feistily replied:

They did. Well, I think that’s silly. I did not ever support that; I thought that policy could be put in place wherever anybody wanted to do it, and if the public didn’t like it, they could take their business elsewhere. I’m getting more conservative as I get older, and I really don’t like so much government involvement. But then, of course, one of the tenants [sic] of my republican philosophy was that government only does for people that which they cannot do for themselves. And my party seems to have forgotten that. They want to be everywhere, even into your bedroom.206

Whether Gentleman believed that non-smoking senators who for years had not wanted to be exposed to secondhand tobacco smoke, but whose smoking leadership had refused to ban smoking “could take their business elsewhere” she did not say. Comments she made later, however, revealed that her amendment was merely designed as a provocation to bring to legislators’ attention what they were imposing on the world outside the statehouse.207

---

206 “A Political Dialogue: Iowa’s Women Legislators,” Box 2, Folder: Transcripts: Julia Gentleman at 44 (Jan 29, 1989), in IWA.

207 In an interview years later Gentleman asserted that she had filed the amendment out of “fairness”—if the prohibition was being imposed elsewhere, why not in the legislature? When asked whether she therefore hoped that it would not be imposed in either setting, she replied that she was not interested in such silly matters, but rather in such important issues as war and “choice”; when asked whether 450,000 deaths annually in the United States
When Senate consideration of H.F. 209 resumed on March 15, Hultman moved the adoption of his (and Coleman’s) industry amendment striking the House provisions imposing sharper restrictions on cigarette vending machines. Sturgeon pleaded for retention of the $500 penalty (and revocation for a second violation) on the grounds that vending machines gave junior high and high schools “‘ready access to cigarettes.’” In addition, Davenport Democrat Pat Deluhery pointed out, cigarette advertising aimed at minors, which he called a “‘disgrace,’” reinforced the temptation of vending machines. (However, Deluhery apparently did not regard secondhand smoke exposure in restaurants as disgraceful: four days later he voted to exclude them from coverage.) Republican Richard Drake, a heavy smoker and reliable cigarette company vote, fended off these arguments by asserting that the $500 penalty was too high and “‘out of line’” with the fine for selling liquor to minors. In the end, the cigarette oligopoly succeeded in securing a 26 to 19 majority for Hultman’s amendment; though not party-line, the vote nevertheless revealed a difference: Democrats were almost evenly divided (voting 14 to 13 in favor), while two-thirds of Republican toed the tobacco line. Hultman then raised the point of order that Gentleman’s amendment was not germane and the chair, Lieutenant Governor Jo Ann Zimmerman, ruled the latter out of order. When, in turn, Hultman offered his preemption amendment, it died by the same procedural sword that Hultman had just wielded against Gentleman’s. The quality of argument deployed by the bill’s fiercest opponents can be gauged by the comment by Jack Rife, who, after referring to himself and his 14 smoking colleagues as “‘us addicted senators,’” called peanut butter sandwiches “‘a very toxic substance.’” Senator Joseph Welsh, a another reliable vote for the tobacco industry, then received unanimous consent to defer action on the bill. In his update to headquarters on the day’s proceedings on H.F. 209, TI Midwest regional vice president Nelson, after pointing out that the lieutenant governor, who had been presiding, was “‘a health care professional,’” explained Welsh’s parliamentary move: TI’s and company lobbyists had “‘arranged for final passage to be deferred so that the preemption amendment could be re-drafted in a germane form.’”

---

Undaunted, four days later, Hultman, Coleman, and four of the five colleagues who had offered the previous amendment filed a somewhat less sweeping version of the preemption amendment (which also deleted the application to the cigarette sales chapter of the Code): “For the purpose of equitable and uniform implementation, application, and enforcement of state and local laws and regulations, the provisions of this chapter shall supersede any local law or regulation which is inconsistent with or conflicts with the provisions of this chapter.” The adoption, virtually verbatim, of Garrison’s draft embodying the alternative requirement of local action in conflict with state law removed Iowa’s preemption standard even further from TI’s ideal; likewise, the deletion of “preempt” also weakened the provision. This version was thus fully subject to the aforementioned anonymous inside criticism that it added no limitations not already contained in the constitutional home rule article. (This weakness would later reemerge to haunt a Philip Morris-inspired challenged to the validity of a city ordinance—but only until the Iowa Supreme Court helpfully evaded the problem.) In the event, this time preemption secured a 25 to 20 majority, Democratic Majority Leader and future tobacco industry lobbyist Hutchins joining forces with future Philip Morris lobbyist Hultman. Though not completely along party lines, the vote again revealed a difference: whereas the Democrats split evenly (14 to 14), 11 of 17 or almost two-thirds of Republicans

---

215 “Debate on Smoking Limit Draws in Other Topics,” CRG, Mar. 16, 1990 (9B:3-5 at 4).
219 See below ch. 33.
voted for cigarette companies’ highest priority.220

This victory was just one in a long succession that undergirded the image offered by former (smoking) Democratic Majority Leader and then tobacco industry lobbyist Lowell Junkins of Coleman and others as having the power and the cigarette in their hands.221 That future Democratic Majority Leader and anti-prohibitionist Wally Horn voted with them nourished Hannon’s judgment that: “The senators seemed very beholden to tobacco interests, even some who didn’t smoke.”222 The preemption amendment was no stealth clause: the source of the pressure to prevent local communities from enacting stronger measures was publicly known. As Democratic Senator Mike Connolly summed it up: “There is no question where this amendment is coming from... The tobacco lobby out there is flexing its muscle.”223 In this sense, then, although Iowa was no exception to the general finding that in the 1990s “the tobacco lobby maintains a...far flung political presence, which is deeply entrenched in all states, monitoring every state government with respect to anything that impacts tobacco use and the tobacco industry,” the lobby in Iowa was definitely not “virtually invisible....”224 To be sure, contributing money to legislators’ campaigns that could make up a significant proportion of their total cost was not the only means available to the cigarette companies for acquiring legislative quid pro quo’s. Many members traveled to the annual meeting of the National Conference of State Legislators, at which cigarette companies offered lavish entertainment and side excursions.225 As a Cedar Rapids physician pointed out a few months after the end of the session about the 1990 meeting in Nashville:

This gala affair is a forum for special-interest groups, the largest of which is the tobacco lobby....
Our elected state senators continue to allow the use of tobacco products in the Senate offices and chambers despite numerous complaints. Perhaps insight to their reasons for opposition may be found at the Philip Morris breakfast to be held at the National Council meeting. Former Iowa Sen. Cal Hultman will be a host for Philip Morris at that event.

As a physician caring for numerous patients dying due to the ravages of tobacco smoke, I hope local senators would spend “equal time” in my office to receive an “education” about tobacco products to balance that which the tobacco companies will present in Nashville.

Immediately after the preemption vote, Cedar Rapids Democrat Richard Running, a former smoker, offered an amendment from the floor to strike even the partial inclusion of restaurants. Running appeared, based on his floor remarks as reported in the Register, to be a market-knows-bester, arguing that “restaurants have done a good job of voluntarily setting aside non-smoking areas and the Senate should not dictate to them” because he believed that “we are coming down too hard on an important sector of the economy.” His real motivations for filing the amendment, as he explained in an interview 17 years later, were more complex and less pedestrian. Running, who was Director of the Iowa Workforce Development from 1999 to 2006 (when the governor requested his resignation in the wake of a scandal in his agency) after having been a state legislator from 1981 to 1995 and a U.S. Department of Labor regional administrator in Kansas City from 1995 to 1999, stated that one basis for his amendment had been his sympathy for restaurant owners engendered by his parents’ ownership of a restaurant in Wisconsin. More important, however, had been the fact that he had “acquiesced” in the lobbying pressure that beverage and hospitality businesses in Cedar Rapids had brought to bear on him to exclude restaurants from the bill. In particular, he singled out the Hawkeye Area Licensed Beverage Association. In retrospect he insisted that, absent these specific influences, he would not have filed the amendment. Nevertheless, his 226Dean Gesme, M.D., “Cigarette Lobby,” CRG, Aug. 12, 1990, clipping in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA. Gesme may have received this information from Hannon herself, who had attended several of these meetings. Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (Mar. 2007).

227Running had stopped smoking ten years earlier when he began his first term in the Iowa House. Telephone interview with ex-Senator Richard Running, Des Moines, IA (May 5, 2007).

229Telephone interview with Richard Running, Des Moines (May 5, 2007). Running amendment revealed consistence: in 1986, as a House member, he had been one of only 18 Democrats voting against—compared to 41 voting for—the anti-smoking bill that covered only restaurants seating 32 or more persons; and again in 1987 he had been one of only 18 representatives voting against H.F. 79, which, supported by 77 members, would have expanded the coverage of the clean indoor air law to include restaurants with seating for 50 or more persons.

2731

During the Senate floor debate on March 19, 1990, Democrat John Peterson chimed in that “the free enterprise system will solve the problem without government interference.” Having forgotten his majority leader’s aforementioned (inadvertent) insight into the fecklessness of nonsmoking sections, Peterson insisted that: “‘If you non-smokers stop going there, it won’t be long before there is a non-smoking area.’” Hannon’s plaint that the chamber was “‘not interested in good public health policy’” hinted at the hopelessness of the cause. The Senate then adopted the exclusion of restaurants by a non-party-line vote of 26 to 21. In addition to anti-smoking stalwarts such as Hannon and Lloyd-Jones, the losers surprisingly included Hutchins himself. Reacting to the success of the killer amendment, Democrat Al Sturgeon, the bill’s floor manager—appointed by committee chair Hannon probably because he would have fewer problems with the “good ol’ boys” who ran the Senate and made life hard for Hannon, but trusted him—declared: “‘This bill just died of lung cancer.’” Realizing that the singed out the head of HALBA, David Hammock, who owned the Stadium Lounge in Cedar Rapids, as having pressured him to oppose restaurant coverage. According to the other Democratic senator from Cedar Rapids, Wally Horn, Hammock may have been Running’s campaign manager. Telephone interview with Wally Horn, Cedar Rapids (May 6, 2007).

233State of Iowa: 1990: Journal of the Senate: 1990 Regular Session Seventy-Third General Assembly 1:1178-79 (Mar. 19) (S-5567). Sixteen Democrats and 10 Republicans voted for the amendment, while 13 Democrats and eight Republicans voted Nay. Former Democratic Senate Majority Leader Lowell Junkins, a tobacco industry lobbyist in 1990, explained Hutchins’ vote to exclude restaurants as possibly the result of his ability to count votes and thus to know that since the amendment would pass anyway, he could propitiate some Democrats by voting against exemption. Telephone interview with Lowell Junkins, driving in western Iowa (Apr. 23, 2007).

234Telephone interview with Al Sturgeon, Sioux City (Apr. 28, 2007); email from House File 209 in 1989-1990: Restaurant Coverage Is Finally Achieved

bill’s supporters lacked the votes to pass it, he asked and received unanimous consent to defer action indefinitely on H.F. 209. (Seventeen years later Sturgeon still remained scathing in his appraisal of the generally conservative and ethically questionable Democratic leaders, many of whom were also “incredibly aggressive smokers,” whose attitude was: “I’m a goddamn smoker and fuck you.”) By 2007 he forgot that he had even been the anti-smoking bill’s floor manager, but he still vividly remembered that the “smoking bastards” had produced smoke so thick in the Senate that “you could get high on the nicotine.” As Marshall interpreted Sturgeon’s decision for Mozingo, after the Senate had “gutted the bill...the sponsor recognized the only provision left was preemption so he pulled the bill from consideration.” Commenting on the Senate’s action that same day, R.J. Reynolds opined that further action that year was “questionable.” Even two weeks later the press was still reporting that the bill “was thought to be dead” after the Senate had stripped out restaurant coverage.

Even more specific but nevertheless more ambiguous was Nelson’s account to his superiors of the proceedings, which presumably derived from Wasker:

The bill postponed indefinitely which means it is not likely to come up again prior to adjournment on March 31, 1990. Prior to postponement action, the bill was amended to include our preemption language which prohibits any local regulations from being more stringent than state law. The Senate also took out the smoking restrictions for restaurants. Basically, the bill was gutted in our favor before being shipped out to pasture.

Apart from the slight exaggeration that the preemption language was the Tobacco Institute’s—in fact, it was less capacious than the provision suggested by 237Telephone interview with Al Sturgeon, Sioux City (Apr. 28, 2007).

239[R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.], “1990 Proactive Legislative Opportunities by Category” at 7 (Mar. 19, 1990), Bates No. 507595166/74.

Covington & Burling—Nelson’s analysis left unexplained whether, with the bill’s (apparently definitive) defeat, the maintenance of the status quo of no preemption constituted a victory for the tobacco industry and its favored outcome (since even the strategists never assumed they could secure passage of a stand-alone preemption bill, although at the end of the day on March 19 they in fact had passed such a bill, in which, to be sure, they knew the House would not concur) or merely second-best to preemption at the price of restaurant coverage. 242

An alternative tactical interpretation of Sturgeon’s pulling the bill was also available, though Representative Mary Lundby did not offer it until many years later and then only speculatively: pulling a controversial bill near the end of a session sometimes provides an impetus to create a ground swell of support by signaling constituents and others that backing has to be expressed now or the measure will die. 243

The very next day after Sturgeon’s bill pulling—but nevertheless one day too late—the Register published the remarkable results of an Iowa Poll under the understated front-page headline: “Iowans Favor Smoking Curbs in Restaurants.” Asked whether they favored or opposed a law requiring restaurants to provide non-smoking sections, a “whopping 79 percent of Iowans” said they favored it, while only 18 percent were opposed. Contrary to legislators’ claims that attitudes toward restaurant smoking broke down along an urban-rural divide (with city restaurant owners not “overly resistant” to such a law and small-town cafe owners “staunchly resistant” on behalf of the midwestern tradition of farmers’ congregating daily to drink coffee, gossip, and smoke), the poll found that more than 80 percent of Iowans expressed support for the measure regardless of whether they lived in rural areas or cities with populations above 50,000. In fact, the 85-percent support rate among farmers exceeded that for white-and blue-collar workers. Educational levels (presumably reflecting differential smoking prevalence rates) also revealed some difference: 85 percent of college graduates

242 Majority Leader Hutchins’ statement many years later that he and not Sturgeon had pulled the bill because that is how the legislature works may have embodied the deeper meaning that even if Hutchins had (had) the votes to pass the now otherwise denuded preemption bill, he knew that it was a waste of time to send it back to the House. Telephone interview with Bill Hutchins, Apache Junction, AZ (May 2, 2007). In contrast, ex-Minority Leader Hultman’s later denial that the bill could have passed only with both preemption and restaurant coverage and his speculation that one side or the other might have been able to live with a bill lacking one of the elements appears implausible, as evidenced by Sturgeon’s killing H.F. 209 once it had been gutted into a preemption bill. Telephone interview with Calvin Hultman, West Des Moines (May 19, 2007).

243 Telephone interview with Mary Lundby, on the road near Ames (June 1, 2007).
favored the law compared to 73 percent among those who lacked a high school degree. Finally, age, too, was correlated with varying degrees of support, with more than 90 percent of 18-to-24 year-olds in favor compared to just under 80 percent of those 65 and older.²⁴⁴

Neither the legislative proceedings in Iowa nor the overwhelming majority of Iowans favoring legally imposed nosmoking sections may have been specifically on the minds of the high-ranking Philip Morris executives who, the following day, March 20, met to discuss “Top Secret Operation Rainmaker,” but the developments prompting this new initiative were playing themselves out in Iowa as elsewhere. In response to a question as to what they were trying to accomplish, R. William Murray, the vice chairman of Philip Morris Companies, Inc., noted: “Prevent further deterioration of overall social, legislative, and regulatory climate, and ultimately actually improve the climate for the marketing and use of tobacco products.” Murray viewed the company’s predicament as sufficiently dire that, even “assuming that we are not employing an end game strategy,”²⁴⁵ he discussed possible actions that were irreconcilable with the carefully nurtured profile that a TI vice president had praised just two years earlier: “Many of our current successes are a result of our image as the toughest, non-compromising industry in the country.”²⁴⁶ Among the ways out of the potentially approaching dead-end Murray mentioned: disbanding the Tobacco Institute and replacing it with an “information-oriented” organization that was “not the flat-earth society”; buying a major media outlet such as Knight-Ridder or United Press International; confronting the American Association of Retired People; and the necessity of immediately changing the name of Philip Morris.²⁴⁷ Meanwhile back on planet Earth in Iowa, the cigarette companies and their lobbyist acted as if it were the anti-smoking activists’ game that was approaching its end.

On April 4—after a 16-day hiatus, during which R. J. Reynolds as late as March 29 and April 2 still deemed the whole bill as having been “defeated”²⁴⁸—

²⁴⁸Henry Stokes to Roger Mozingo, Pro-Active Legislative Assessment (Mar. 29, 1990), Bates No. 507627514/5. This assessment was still being circulated on April 2.
just four days before the session ended, Democrat Jack Kibbie called up his motion to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment to remove restaurants from the bill: the basis for rethinking his position was the aforementioned Register poll disclosing that 79 percent of Iowans favored separate sections in restaurants. Most of the ensuing “contentious debate” predictably focused on restaurants. While Kibbie confessed error, Republican Richard Vande Hoef changed his vote because a restaurateur-constituent had expressed support for legally mandated separate sections. Floor manager Sturgeon denied that the bill’s advocates were “‘picking on smokers.... They can smoke their brains out. They just have to smoke in the places they’re supposed to.’” In contrast, Republican Senator Jack Rife, a heavy smoker, continued to resent the “‘infringement on businesses’ rights.’”

(Since Rife was for many years also a strident legislative opponent of severe penalties for drunk driving the lethal impact of which—unlike that of secondhand tobacco smoke—it is impossible for the non-drunk to avoid, his laissez-faire attitude toward smoking was at least consistent, albeit marginally less irrational.) Democrat Alvin Miller intoned the “‘pocketbook will dictate’” dogma, according to which owners would provide whatever customers demanded. Running, the only legislator or lobbyist interviewed years later who could even recall that the bill had died and been revived, reported that between March 19 and April 4 he had received many letters berating him for having excluded coverage of restaurants. In particular he remembered one writer who had expressed the hope that Running would have to eat in smoke for the rest of his life. Oddly, however, these letters were not from his constituents, and Running did not change his vote.

Becki Turner to Roger Mozingo, Pro-Active Legislative Assessment (Apr. 2, 1990), Bates No. 507595158/9.

251 Telephone interview with former Republican Representative and Senator Andy McKean, Anamosa, IA (Apr. 16, 2008).

252 Thomas Fogarty, “Senate Passes a Smoking Rule for Restaurants,” DMR, Apr. 5, 1990 (1A:5, at 2A:2). Oddly, Miller then voted to reconsider and later for the bill as well. Kibbie’s statement many years later that he may have voted to exclude restaurants on March 19 merely in order to be entitled to file the motion to reconsider does not jibe with his contemporaneous statement that the poll published on March 20 had made him see the error of his ways. Telephone interview with Jack Kibbie, Emmetsburg, IA (May 5, 2007).

The motion to reconsider the vote on Running’s amendment to remove restaurant coverage then prevailed by a vote of 29 to 17, after which Running’s motion to (re-)adopt his amendment lost on a non-record roll call by a vote of 20 to 27. Shortly afterwards the Senate passed the whole bill embodying the restored partial restaurant smoking ban and the new preemption provision 37 to 12, with the cigarette companies’ conduit, Hultman, voting yes. Unable to recall years later why he had voted against reconsideration, Hultman found it plausible that others had changed their votes based on the Iowa Poll results and/or constituent complaints. Wholly implausible, however, was his speculation that Hutchins might have voted for reconsideration because he needed a favor from Sturgeon.

Back in the House, on April 7, three days before adjournment, Hammond herself moved that the chamber concur in the Senate’s stronger preemption provision. Having adopted it, the House then passed the whole bill by an overwhelming 90 to 5 majority, saddling Iowa with a very weak statewide public smoking prohibitory law (covering some restaurants) whose gaping toothlessness, ultimately meaningless—coverage of restaurants was a price worth paying for preemption. Telephone interview with Lowell Junkins, driving in western Iowa (Apr. 23, 2007). Indeed, Junkins speculated that the tobacco companies could easily have convinced restaurant owners that preemption was vital for them since, regardless of whether the statewide law covered them, preemption would protect them from strong(er) local ordinances. Former Senator Hannon, without recalling the incident, regarded such speculation as in no way fanciful: “I doubt that the poll was the only thing that changed their minds. Something else must have been going on. It’s possible Philip Morris knew about public support for smoking restrictions and decided they’d better take what they could get when they could get it.” Email from Beverly Hannon (Mar. 11, 2007). Another possible resolution of the puzzle is that Hutchins flew to Florida earlier: the Senate recessed from Thursday afternoon March 8 (on account of a major winter storm) until Monday March 12, the beginning of the week in which it took up H.F. 209. Hannon later commented that this chronology made more sense. Email from Beverly Hannon (Mar. 12, 2007).

257 Telephone interview with Calvin Hultman, West Des Moines (May 19, 2007).

259 In a stunningly incompetent piece of legislative history, Tiana Epps-Johnson, Richard Jones, and Stanton Glantz, The Stars Aligned over the Cornfields: Tobacco Industry Political Influence and Tobacco Policy Making in Iowa 1897-2009, at 52 (2009), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/IA2009/, falsely assert in the conclusions to their seven-page discussion of the bill that: “Led by Charles Wasker, tobacco interests were able to both remove provisions that would have regulated smoking in restaurants....” See also id., tab. 23 at 51 (showing that restaurants were missing from the final bill). In addition to revealing a failure to follow the proceedings in the House or Senate Journal (which the authors did not cite) or even to understand the session law (which they also did not cite), this breathtaking factual error made clear that the authors had developed no sense of everyday life during the next 18 years in Iowa under the 1990 amendments. The error, which also included ascribing to the House (rather than the Senate) sponsors the pulling of the bill (id. at 51), also precluded the authors from formulating, let alone pursuing, the holes local governments were thenceforth purportedly prevented from filling.

Kaleidoscopic Accounts of the Reasons for the Resurrection and Passage of H.F. 209

As in 1987, the number one issue for the industry is the continuing drive by many groups to reduce the social acceptability of smoking. All types of legislation to reduce the opportunity to smoke, coupled with a private business move toward a “smoke free” workplace, is [sic] sending the message to people who enjoy smoking that they will pay a price for their enjoyment. Smokers do not like to receive these uncomfortable social messages on a frequent basis and can be expected to react in various ways. One mode may be feelings of guilt, but another might be hostility toward the forces which are producing the harassment. In any case, the end result is likely to be a cycle where smokers slowly become a shrinking, increasingly embattled minority.

The 1986 report of the Surgeon General which implicated environmental smoke for undesirable health effects in others has produced a significant increase in state level restrictions on smoking. Not since 1975 have so many states passed restrictive laws regarding smoking. How it came about that H.F. 209 was resurrected from the bill morgue remains a puzzle—except to Hultman, who years later viewed that framework as “reading too much into it.” Without offering a concrete counter-analysis, he speculated that reconsideration might simply have been driven by an end-of-session “mentality” pushing legislators just to want to get out of town. When pressed as to how a desire to wrap up the session as quickly as possible could be reconciled with adding a bill back to the agenda that had already been disposed of, Hultman self-contradictorily replied that the majority had wanted it.

Nelson’s Tobacco Institute update for April 4 failed to problematize the bill’s reappearance at all: he neither remarked on the fact of rebirth nor commented on whether or why passage was better than no bill or why both defeat and passage interestings and important question of the reasons for the defeat and resurrection of restaurant coverage.

260 On the litigation over the reach of the preemption provision, see below ch. 33.
261 R. N. Ferguson to Dr. E. B. Sanders, Subject: Social and Political Context of Cigarette Sales in the US - 1988, at 1 (July 25, 1988), Bates No. 2021556798. Robert Ferguson was the manager of the analytic research division of Philip Morris; Edward Sanders was associate principal scientist for scientific affairs at Philip Morris.
262 Telephone interview with Calvin Hultman, West Des Moines (May 19, 2007).
could be victories for the cigarette companies.\textsuperscript{263} His silence on the matter may have been a function of the fact that Wasker, as a free-wheeling master lobbyist, often “unilaterally” decided what to do and told Nelson afterwards according to the precept: “I’ll tell you what you need to know when you need to know about it.” This behavior and relationship exasperated Nelson’s hierarchically oriented bosses in Washington, but it proved hard to argue with what they viewed as Wasker’s spectacular successes.\textsuperscript{264}

Exploration of the reasons for the reversal of the bill’s fate is hindered by the fact that, with the partial exception of Senator Running, none of the numerous legislators interviewed 17 years after the events was able to remember that the bill had died, let alone why it had been reanimated, while still others could barely recall the bill’s existence altogether.\textsuperscript{265} Even Running could not remember why his amendment had been defeated on the second vote, but suggested that senators who had voted to exclude restaurants might have received complaints from constituents that had prompted them to change their votes. Much more intriguing to Running, however, was another possibility: hearing during his interview in 2007 about the intense behind-the-scenes campaign that the tobacco industry had conducted on behalf of preemption—of which he said that had known nothing in 1990—he speculated that tobacco lobbyists might have pressured senators to vote for restaurant coverage on the second vote if that was the only way to secure enactment of preemption. As for himself, Running insisted that despite not having changed his vote out of loyalty to those who had initially lobbied him about restaurants, he had also not put up a fight because even at that time he had not been wholeheartedly in favor of complete freedom to smoke in public (and by \textsuperscript{264}Telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007). In addition, Wasker’s pre-existing friendship with TI President Samuel Chilcote (dating back to Chilcote’s employment at and Wasker’s lobbying for the Distilled Spirits Council of the United States) enabled him to take liberties that other lobbyists might not have gotten away with. \textit{Id}.

\textsuperscript{265}For example, neither Ann Wright, who had lobbied on the bill for the Cancer Society and prided herself on her memory for details, nor Carol Sipfle, her counterpart at the Lung Association, remembered the death and rebirth. Telephone interview with Ann Wright, Ankeny (May 4, 2007); email from Carol Sipfle (May 8, 2007). Senator Joy Corning, who the following year became lieutenant governor, barely retained any memory of the bill at all. Telephone interview with Joy Corning, Des Moines (June 3, 2007).
2007 he would have voted differently).

Former Senate Democratic Majority Leader Lowell Junkins, who was a tobacco industry (TILMC) lobbyist in 1990, generally agreed that since the absence of preemption was a “real nightmare” even for Philip Morris, which lacked the resources to lobby every local government in the country that might consider anti-smoking ordinances, it stood to reason that the tobacco industry pressured the restaurant association to acquiesce in coverage as the quid pro quo for preemption. To the extent that the restaurant industry resisted and lost this battle, the defeat was softened by virtue of taking place over a period of time.

It is noteworthy, as a matter of the quality of legislative policy formation in Iowa, that Senate Majority Leader Bill Hutchins, who was a crucial figure in the passage of the state’s anti-public smoking law, even 17 years later erroneously believed that alcohol caused more deaths in the United States than tobacco, when in fact the latter causes five times as many deaths as the former. Whether this ignorance was a prerequisite for or a consequence of his post-senatorial career as R.J. Reynolds Tobacco’s Iowa lobbyist is unclear. Hutchins stated in an interview in 2007 that he neither recalled how it came about that the bill had been revived nor knew how (or whether) the tobacco companies had persuaded restaurant owners between March 19 and April 4 to abandon their resistance to coverage for the sake of preemption. However, he was clear in 2007 that some time before 1990 he had informed restaurant-type businesses that coverage would eventually come and that he would give them a couple of years to make arrangements to comply with the law. (His claim that such owners needed lead time in order to do the requisite “pretty extensive remodeling” contradicted not 266 Telephone interview with Running (May 5, 2007).

---

267 Telephone interview with Lowell Junkins, on the road somewhere in Iowa (Apr. 23, 2007).
268 Telephone interview with Bill Hutchins, Apache Junction, AZ (May 2, 2007).
270 Without specification Hutchins noted that the tobacco companies had “made some mistakes.” Telephone interview with Bill Hutchins, Apache Junction, AZ (May 2, 2007). A decade earlier he had told a reporter that “[t]heir public good,” but offered only a “No comment” in response to the question of whether he supported the firm—which had paid him $40,000 in 1995—“out of conviction or simply for the money...” Martin Kuz, “Snuffed Out,” Cityview, Apr. 10, 1996, at 8 (copy in Johnie Hammond Papers, Box 6, Folder: Legislative Press, IWA).
only reality but his own aforementioned insight that they could comply with the feckless law by doing as little as putting a no-smoking sign on one table.) Hutchins also remembered with absolute certainty that he would never have permitted local governments to gain control over smoking regulations (thus overlooking the fact that from 1978 until 1990 the Iowa clean indoor air law not only did not prohibit local control, but expressly permitted it). He based his opposition to local control on his feeling that local officials were “pretty irresponsible.” Revealingly, when asked for examples, the only one he was able to offer to illustrate his “lack of respect” for them referred to what he regarded as unfair treatment that a local government had meted out to him personally in a business deal in which he had engaged while a legislator. If Hutchins accurately reported this idiosyncratic reason for insisting on preemption, it constituted a basis for his engagement on the issue independently of pressure or encouragement emanating from the tobacco industry.

Whether in fact Hutchins accurately portrayed his position on the smoking bill is unclear. Doubt on this score is generated by his incorrect statement that R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company never gave campaign contributions to Iowa state legislators in general and that he specifically never received campaign contributions from that company. When the interviewer began reading to him the names of his fellow legislators who had received such contributions from Reynolds during the Fall 1990 campaign period and the sums given, starting with the smallest amounts and obviously working upwards, Hutchins interjected: “Did I get any?”271 Yes he did: the $1,000 that the RJR Political Action Committee/RJR Nabisco, Inc. gave Hutchins for Senate on October 12, 1990 was the highest amount that it reported to the Federal Election Committee for any state legislator in its pre-general election report. The amounts given were: Sen. Bill Hutchins (Dem. Majority Leader, $1,000), Sen. Jack Rife (Rep. Minority Leader, $500), Sen. Joseph Coleman ($500), Sen. John Jensen (Rep. Assistant Minority Leader, $1,000), Rep. Mary Lundby (Rep. Assistant Minority Leader, $300), Rep. Harold Van Maanen (Rep. Minority Leader, $300), and Rep. Bob Arnould (Dem. Majority Leader, $300).272 All of these legislators were in formal 271 Telephone interview with Bill Hutchins, Apache Junction, AZ (May 2, 2007).

272 Report of Receipts and Disbursements, For Other Than an Authorized Committee, RJR Political Action Committee; RJR Nabisco, Inc. (Covering Oct. 1-17, 1990), Bates No. 507921438/64. This was the only tobacco industry FEC reporting form for this period showing contributions to Iowa state legislators found on tobacco industry documents websites. For an internal company document showing the same information, see RJRT PAC Contributions to Candidates 1990 - 1996 [sic] Election Cycle (Jan. 2, 1991), in RJRT State Government Relations 1991 Action Plan and Budget (Nov. 15, 1990), Bates No. leadership in 1990 and/or 1991 except Coleman, who was, nevertheless, a powerful figure.

The Iowa contributions were part of Reynolds’ nationwide program to support state legislators: after having contributed $23,300 to 107 state candidates in North Carolina and $16,000 to four in Texas during the 1987-88 election cycle, it tentatively budgeted $150,000 in RJR PAC funds for the 1989-90 cycle, Iowa being one of eight states in which it was considering establishing separate RJR state PACs. In 1991-92, RJR PAC contributed another $3,130 to 24 Iowa state leadership in 1990 and/or 1991 except Coleman, who was, nevertheless, a powerful figure.

The Iowa contributions were part of Reynolds’ nationwide program to support state legislators: after having contributed $23,300 to 107 state candidates in North Carolina and $16,000 to four in Texas during the 1987-88 election cycle, it tentatively budgeted $150,000 in RJR PAC funds for the 1989-90 cycle, Iowa being one of eight states in which it was considering establishing separate RJR state PACs. In 1991-92, RJR PAC contributed another $3,130 to 24 Iowa state leadership in 1990 and/or 1991 except Coleman, who was, nevertheless, a powerful figure.

The Iowa contributions were part of Reynolds’ nationwide program to support state legislators: after having contributed $23,300 to 107 state candidates in North Carolina and $16,000 to four in Texas during the 1987-88 election cycle, it tentatively budgeted $150,000 in RJR PAC funds for the 1989-90 cycle, Iowa being one of eight states in which it was considering establishing separate RJR state PACs. In 1991-92, RJR PAC contributed another $3,130 to 24 Iowa state legislative campaigns equally divided between Democrats and Republicans, ranging from a high of $215 to Senator Boswell to a low of $65 to Hutchins. Recipients included heavy smokers and/or prominent tobacco industry advocates such as Bisignano, Horn, Iverson, Lundby, McLaren, and Rife, the last four each receiving $200.  Of the eight senatorial recipients who voted on the Hultman-Coleman preemption amendment on March 19, 1990, seven (Boswell, Hutchins, Fraise, Hagerla, Horn, Kibbie, and Rife) voted for it, while only Majority Whip Gronstal (a heavy smoker who received $200) opposed it. Similarly, on Running’s amendment to strike restaurant coverage, six voted for it, while only Gronstal and Hutchins opposed it. In addition, Philip Morris’s PHIL-PAC contributed $2,600 to 21 Iowa legislators as well as to the Iowa Democratic Party’s Truman Fund, which funneled money to legislative candidates.275 (When told of these surprisingly small sums, former Governor Branstad laughingly opined: “They sold out pretty cheap.” By the same token, he stressed that money was not the only source of the tobacco industry’s power. Outcomes in the Senate were often simply a function of the fact that the leaders smoked and that many senators were too intimidated by leadership to risk good committee assignments and other benefits by voting against its pro-tobacco positions.)276 in 37 other states. Id., Bates No. 507639332/44-45.

274 Data furnished by Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board (Apr. 4, 2008). The recipient of one $100 contribution was not an individual legislator, but the “Iowa 2000 Committee,” which was a Republican entity. The RJR PAC contributions for 1991-92 are, for reasons unknown, the only out-of-state tobacco PAC data that the IECDB did not (unlawfully) “purge.” Telephone interview with Karen Hudson, Des Moines (IECDB, Administration/Electronic Filing) (Apr. 4, 2008). For further use of these data, see below ch. 20.

275 Jonathan Roos, “Bill Curbs Cigarette Sales to Kids,” DMR, Mar. 28, 1991 (2) (NewsBank). This contemporaneous newspaper article, which was based on examination of records on file at the time at the Iowa Campaign Finance Disclosure Commission, also confirmed the RJRT PAC’s $3,900 in contributions; unfortunately, it did not identify the 21 legislators. These records are among those unlawfully destroyed by the agency. As small as the PHIL-PAC contributions to individual legislators were, former Iowa State Senator Milo Colton has interpreted them to be signals from lobbyists that the legislators should approach them for more during the next election cycle. Email from Milo Colton to Marc Linder (May 29, 2007). Steve Conway, who in 1990 was a Democratic party caucus staffer assigned to Hannon’s Senate Human Resources Committee and in 2007 was special assistant to the Senate president, was “really surprised” by how little money such a powerful lobby had contributed, having imagined that it would have given several times more. Telephone interview with Steve Conway, West Des Moines (June 4, 2007).

276 Telephone interview with Terry Branstad, Des Moines (July 2, 2007).
Charles Wasker, the tobacco industry’s much ballyhooed lobbyist, offered a much different perspective on H.F. 209’s tortuous career. Still exercising full bragging and proprietary rights 17 years after the events, he asserted that once he had gotten through with Hammond’s anti-tobacco bill in the Senate, it was “my bill.” The reason, he insisted, for H.F. 209’s death in March was Majority Leader Hutchins’ mistaken belief that it was anti-tobacco; but when Wasker told Hutchins shortly before the end of the session that he (Wasker) liked the bill, Hutchins brought it back. After noting that at that point he (Wasker) considered preemption more important than restaurant coverage, he triumphantly responded to the question as to whether the restaurant owners agreed with that assessment: “I didn’t ask them.”

This latter boast, as one Democratic caucus staffer put it later, can also be interpreted as expressing the (empirically correct) judgment that in Iowa the tobacco lobby was simply stronger than the restaurant lobby. If accurate, Wasker’s account would explain how the bill, despite not even being among the top 15 end-of-session priorities of the Democratic party caucus, was able to reemerge for floor consideration. However, one major flaw in Wasker’s logic is that Hutchins’ view of the bill after restaurants had been exempted was not mistaken at all: since the cigarette companies’ highest priority was preemption, and preemption was politically impossible without restaurant coverage as a quid pro quo, Hutchins may have correctly perceived that excluding restaurants would not be in the tobacco industry’s interest. In other words, some pro-tobacco senators (for example, Coleman, Horn, Hultman, and Rife) might have considered the result of restaurant exemption to be the tobacco companies’ dream-come-true of a free-standing preemption bill and thus voted for it, but Daniel Nelson speculatively interpreted their votes (many years later) as a function of their inability to understand the convoluted logic of the firms’ position and of the impracticability of informing them of the right way to vote on the Senate floor in the heat of the battle. As to how so crafty a politician and leader as Hutchins could possibly have mishandled this vote, one close observer found it thoroughly plausible that a majority leader could not pay close attention to three thousand bills and, instead, had to rely on committee chairs and floor 277 Telephone interview with Charles Wasker, Des Moines (May 14, 2007).

278 Telephone interview with Steve Conway, West Des Moines (June 4, 2007).
279 Telephone interview with Dennis Harbaugh, Waterloo (June 3, 2007). According to Harbaugh, who had been the director of the Democratic caucus in 1990, if a bill that had already died was not a caucus priority toward the end of the session, practically speaking it could return only if it was some senator’s individual priority and that senator was able to arrange a deal involving some other piece of legislation.
280 Telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007).
managers to give him the appropriate signal, which, in this case Sturgeon had done.\textsuperscript{281}

The mystery surrounding the rebirth of the bill is deepened by information provided by Democrat Wally Horn, who had been an assistant majority leader in 1990. Although many years later he, too, could not recall that the bill had died or that he had changed his vote, Horn did remember with absolute certainty that Majority Leader Hutchins had wanted the bill killed. Horn, for his part, felt exactly the same way as Hutchins (whom he replaced as majority leader in 1993): though a nonsmoker, Horn, perceiving smoking “almost like a right,” was willing to do anything to kill the bill so that people could continue to have the right to smoke wherever they wanted to. From this perspective, in 2007 he speculatively interpreted Hutchins’ vote for restaurant coverage on March 19 as an effort to make the bill too radical to pass. But when confronted with the illogic of voting to kill a bill indirectly when Hutchins could have killed it directly by voting with Horn and the majority who were already doing so, Horn had no response. And indeed, he was “baffled” by his own change of vote, which he could also interpret only as an effort to kill the bill, though he could no longer explain how. Horn, in response to a question, denied both that Hutchins had ever explained to him before the second vote that the tobacco companies had changed their strategy and now wanted the bill passed with restaurant coverage so that they could secure the local preemption that was their highest priority and that he personally would have changed his vote in reaction to such intelligence (though other senators might have done so). He did, however, slyly volunteer that if Hutchins had, instead, informed him that the bill with restaurant coverage and preemption was the weakest measure—that is, the least restrictive of smokers’ freedom to smoke—that could be passed, he would have changed his vote.\textsuperscript{282}

Horn’s denials and memory lapses to the contrary notwithstanding, Lawrence Pope, a former Republican House Majority Leader (1979-82) and smokeless tobacco lobbyist (1995-2000), who throughout was a law professor at Drake University in Des Moines teaching lobbying, characterized Horn as a tobacco industry supporter whose vote change had to be interpreted as clear evidence that word must have reached him one way or another that the industry wanted to trade preemption for restaurant coverage. Indeed, based on his knowledge of them and \textsuperscript{281}Telephone interview with Steve Conway, West Des Moines (June 4, 2007).

\textsuperscript{282}Telephone interview with Wally Horn, Cedar Rapids (May 6, 2007). Horn was still a senator at the time of the interview. Passing no bill at all might have appeared to restrict smokers’ freedom even less, but, as noted earlier, in the absence of preemption, cities could have passed ordinances that would have significantly restricted smoking in restaurants.
their support for the tobacco industry, Pope judged the seven other vote-changers similarly.\textsuperscript{283} Ex-Senator Sturgeon frankly speculated to the same effect that by April the cigarette companies must have told their people in the legislature to pass the bill with restaurants included.\textsuperscript{284}

The then lobbyist for the Iowa Restaurant Association, Mark Truesdell, while recalling that passage had been a defeat for his client, speculated that some horse-trading wholly extraneous to the content of the anti-smoking bill might have prompted some senators to change their votes. He also conjectured that during the two-week interim anti-smoking constituents might have expressed their displeasure to senators who had voted against restaurant coverage, prompting some to change their vote. At the same time he distinctly recalled that no tobacco lobbyist (including George Wilson and Charles Wasker) had ever suggested to him that since preemption was more important, restaurant owners should acquiesce in coverage. Moreover, apart from any question of tobacco industry advocacy, Truesdell insisted that owners would have rejected the argument that without preemption restaurants would have been exposed to the risk of stricter local ordinances because it was merely a distant “bogeyman,” whereas statewide coverage was certain reality.\textsuperscript{285} This view was independently corroborated by the executive director of the Iowa Restaurant Association between 1982 and 1995, Lester Davis, who maintained that in 1990 owners did not regard the risk of the passage of ordinances as significant because the anti-smoking movement had not yet become strong enough to make the threat credible. And as for coverage itself, he argued that owners—even ones who had already voluntarily made their restaurants nosmoking without any loss in business—had simply not wanted the government telling them what to do.\textsuperscript{286}

Though Daniel Nelson, TI’s Midwest vice president in 1990, was familiar \textsuperscript{283}Telephone interview with Lawrence Pope, Des Moines (May 11, 2007).

\textsuperscript{284}Telephone interview with Al Sturgeon, Sioux City (Apr. 28, 2007).

\textsuperscript{285}Telephone interview with Mark Truesdell, Des Moines (May 4, 2007). Neither Michael Brozek, the Tobacco Institute’s Midwest regional vice president until 1988, nor his successor, Daniel Nelson, credited the assertion that no tobacco lobbyist spoke to the Iowa Restaurant Association in 1990 about the overriding importance of preemption. Telephone interview with Michael Brozek, Madison, WI (June 5, 2007); telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007).

\textsuperscript{286}Telephone interview with Lester Davis, Johnston, IA (May 3, 2007). Unfortunately (and surprisingly), the April to September, 1990, issues of the Iowa Association of Restaurants newsletter, \textit{Appetizer}, contained, according to its current president and CEO, nothing on legislative issues at all. Email from Doni DeNucci to Marc Linder (June 7, 2007).
with this latter “1,000-percenter” attitude and confirmed IRBA’s resistance to coverage, he also recalled that it had begun changing its attitude at some point once it came to see the wisdom of the view that demands for smoke-free restaurants were a problem that was not going to go away. He speculated that this change might have been facilitated by increased financial and education participation by Philip Morris and R. J. Reynolds Tobacco in the Association.287

As with Horn, Pope, who had participated in strategy meetings with other tobacco lobbyists, was skeptical of Truesdell’s and Davis’s recollections. Although he deemed it possible that the final deal to cover restaurants and include preemption might have been “cut” without the participation of the association, he considered it implausible that the restaurant business representatives would have been unaware at the time of the “machinations” going on. Moreover, he found it hard to believe that they would not have recognized the extraordinary importance to them of preemption: after all, he reasoned, if, for example, the Des Moines suburb of Urbandale, in the absence of preemption, had passed an ordinance prohibiting smoking in restaurants, it would have “killed” the business there.288

Post-Mortems

Hammond’s self-congratulatory gloss that the amended law meant that nonsmokers “can have a meal without having to choke and cough”289 was so at variance with experience and the laws of physics that it did not even have to await empirical refutation. The same day that the governor signed the bill,290 Lester Davis, the executive director of the Iowa Restaurant and Beverage Association, who estimated that fewer than one-third of restaurants in Iowa voluntarily provided separate seating, praised it for not having “a whole lot of teeth....” The law’s lack of any directives as to apportioning smoking and nosmoking space gave owners broad discretion: “Some will just put in two or three tables and say that’s their no-smoking section....” Consequently, the association opposed the bill, but not so strongly as “tougher” bills debated in earlier years: “It’s not as bad as it could have been....” The law’s glaring toothlessness was not merely substantive in nature: its enforcement may have left everything to be desired. The legislative lobbyist for the Iowa Department of Inspections and Appeals, which 287Telephone interview with Daniel Nelson, Sioux Falls, SD (June 8, 2007).

288Telephone interview with Lawrence Pope, Des Moines (May 11, 2007).
2901990 Iowa Laws ch. 1189 at 265.
was tasked with checking restaurants for the presence of the required signs designating smoking areas, observed that even if inspectors referred violations to county attorneys, state officials did not know whether the latter were authorized to take owners to court. Moreover, it was also an open question as to whether prosecution was even “‘something a county attorney is going to want to mess with.’”\textsuperscript{291} Precisely what gratified R. J. Reynolds about the bill—its failure to specify the size of the non-smoking areas that had to be set aside\textsuperscript{292}—prompted the Register’s editor to excoriate the “wimpy” “restaurant smoking” law as creating merely “piddling little restrictions,” which did not even extend to specifying what proportion of the space had to reserved for nonsmokers.\textsuperscript{293}

The question as to whether the trade-off promoted public health still preoccupied the American Cancer Society’s lobbyist 16 years later. Ann Wright, noting that the organization had opposed preemption in any form, admitted that in retrospect it was hard to know whether it would have been better to have passed no bill at all.\textsuperscript{294} Unlike the situation in some other states,\textsuperscript{295} however, the cigarette companies’ preemption initiative in Iowa did not split the (to be sure, rather weak) anti-tobacco coalition over whether to push for restaurant coverage at the price of acquiescing in preemption. Even former Governor Terry Branstad mused in retrospect that perhaps he should have vetoed the bill because the local preemption provision outweighed the benefits of restaurant coverage, which, under the designated smoking areas regime, was, he insisted, as useless as separate sections had been on airplanes.\textsuperscript{296}

Four days after the end of the session, Nelson heaped fulsome praise on Wasker in a “Dear Chuck” letter designed both to flatter the lobbyist and curry favor with headquarters:

\textsuperscript{291}“Thomas Fogarty, “New Restaurant Smoking Law Called Toothless,” DMR, Apr. 25, 1990 (1M:2-5, 2M:6). To be sure, the previous year the attorney general, in response to an inquiry from a county attorney, had issued an opinion stating that the statute did not appear to create a private cause of action, and that the prosecution of actions fell within county attorneys’ statutory obligation. Iowa Attorney General Opinion #89-5-5(L) (May 24, 1989).

\textsuperscript{292}Hurst Marshall to Roger Mozingo, Subject: Weekly Report (Region IV) (Apr. 11, 1990), Bates No. 507628591.

\textsuperscript{293}“Iowa’s Wimpy Smoking Law,” DMR, Apr. 30, 1990 (8A:1-2) (edit.).

\textsuperscript{294}Telephone interview with Ann Wright, Ankeny, IA (Feb. 2, 2006).

\textsuperscript{296}Telephone interview with Terry Branstad, Des Moines (July 2, 2007).
It goes without saying that you had your usual excellent record. In fact Chuck, it is kind of boring to congratulate you because you lose so seldom.

I am well aware that the preemption amendment to HF209 is probably the best example of the pro-active concept within my region. I intend to make that point very clear to my superiors in Washington, D.C.297

In its internal report card on Wasker, judging his activities during the 1990 session, TI noted at the beginning of June that he had been “chiefly responsible for severely weakening a smoking restriction bill and then adding a state-wide preemption clause.” That this “pro-active victory” had been “the only significant one in this region” and had come in the wake of his “spectacular victory” in 1989 in preserving the sunsetting of a three-cent cigarette tax undergirded the recommendation that his annual retainer be increased from $40,000 to $45,000, especially since he bore more of the lobbying load than the member cigarette companies’ lobbyists.298 In fact, TI—which was just one of Wasker’s numerous clients—raised the retainer of its “legislative consultant” to $44,000 in 1991,299 at a time when legislators’ salary was only $18,100 and even that of the six highest legislative leaders was only $27,900.300 Despite the preemption provision’s dilution in which the cigarette companies had been forced to acquiesce, the cheering at TI apparently never stopped. A week later Nelson informed headquarters that: “The Region IV office is thrilled with the smoking restriction preemption language that was included in HF209.”301 And later that year, Kurt Malmgren, the head of the Institute’s State Activities division, confided to the annual convention of the Iowa Association of Candy and Tobacco Distributors that enactment of the restaurant coverage cum preemption law was “without a doubt, a substantial victory.”302 298Tobacco Institute, Region IV State and Local Lobbyist Evaluation: State of Iowa: Charles F. Wasker (June 1, 1990), Bates No. TI23011588/9/91. The evaluation was presumably Nelson’s. On his previous evaluation and raise from $35,000 to $40,000, see Tobacco Institute, Region IV State and Local Lobbyist Evaluation: State of Iowa: Charles F. Wasker (July 12, 1989), Bates No. TI20892037.

299Tobacco Institute, 1994 Budget: State Activities Division (May 14, 1993), Bates No. TI16561571/87.
301Dan Nelson to Pat Donoho, Re: Proactive and Tax Targets (June 7, 1990), Bates No. TI28842920/1.
302Kurt Malmgren, [untitled], in “1990-2000: What’s on the Horizon? Iowa Association of Candy and Tobacco Distributors 42nd Annual Convention” at 7 (Sept. 14-
Anti-Smoking Senators—Purportedly as Powerless as Inmates in the Maximum-Security State Penitentiary—Make Yet Another Unsuccessful Attempt to Clean the Air in Their Workplace: 1990

At the same time that H.F. 209, designed to reduce secondhand smoke exposure statewide, was making its way through the legislature, “[a]nti-smoking forces [we]re gearing up for a test of democracy in the Iowa Senate. Although no more than 15 of 50 senator smoked, according to Hannon, many were “veteran members....” Consequently, she argued, “we can pass laws regulating smoking in the rest of the state but have no control over own chamber....” In order to overcome this democratic deficit, the anti-smoking senators circulated a note calling for a meeting to discuss restricting smoking in the Senate.303

The impact of the Senate’s laissez-faire smoking policy on the Senate qua workplace was poignantly revealed by the administrative assistant to a member of the Iowa House who on March 16, 1990 wrote to Hannon that the representative, who was running for the Iowa Senate, had requested that she accompany him to that chamber should he be elected. Confiding to Hannon that she and the representative “consider ourselves a team that operates smoothly and productively” and that the latter would tell Hannon that they were “mutually dependent,” she had nevertheless “hesitated to commit myself because smoking is allowed in the Senate itself, as well as in the work areas. Tobacco smoke causes me great physical distress in the form of allergic reactions and headaches.” Rejecting the “argument of infringement of smokers’ rights,” she insisted that: “Smokers choose to smoke; the rest of us cannot choose to breathe—it is a necessity. It seems unfortunate that people can be driven away from jobs they love and are good at simply because smoking is allowed in that work place.”304

Hannon herself had good reason to empathize with her correspondent: at the same time she was seeking health care for eye irritation caused by being in a “room full of smokers all day long.” The health care giver’s diagnosis read: “Conjunctivitis is irritation from smoke.”305

For March 28, 1990, Lloyd-Jones and two other senators had called an open

---

304Letter from Nancy Brooker Bowers (Adm. Asst to Ralph Rosenberg) to Senator Hannon (Mar. 16, 1990), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.
305Iowa Department of Public Health: Disease Prevention, Case Record (Mar. [*] 19, 1990), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA. meeting on smoking policy that, because of a conflict with another meeting, ultimately was not held, but they nevertheless solicited suggestions for a smoking policy for the next year. From the handwritten suggestions submitted that same day by Hannon, arguably the Senate’s most militant anti-smoker, a sense emerges of how far even she was from proposing a total ban at a time when the House had almost achieved it:

1.) No smoking on Senate floor while in session
2.) Senators smoke in Lounge back of Senate
3.) Secretaries & staff smoke at designated benches which have exhaust fans (to the outdoors)
4.) “Visiting smokers” restricted to those areas.
5.) No smoking during committee meetings unless smokers sit near exhaust fans to outdoors.
6.) No smokers at work stations (computers, typewriters)
7.) Private offices adopt a policy by consensus.
8.) No smoking in lounges adjoining switchboard area, including phone booths.

Significantly, Hannon solicited and galvanized support from outside of the closed circle of her 49 fellow senators. The reservoir of antagonism was close to overflowing: “Several of the clerks and anti-smoking legislators formed a support group and worked on their legislators/leadership to resolve the smoking impasse before some of the clerks quit or there were physical fights. Some of the smoking clerks smoked at the computers. The next person to use it had ashes and odor to contend with. The phone booths senators had to use in the senate lounge reeked from stale tobacco.”

In a piece she published in a small-town newspaper the next day, Hannon reported to her constituents that “[a]s in the past, the tobacco lobby and the Senate smokers [had] savaged” the public smoking prohibition bill (HF 209) that the House had passed. (Hannon’s colleague Don Gettings wanted “smoking opponents to walk out and shut the place down,” prompting Hannon to interject: “fat chance.”) She reminded them as well that she had 306 Memorandum from Senators Lloyd-Jones, Gettings, & Jensen on Senate Rules on Smoking (Mar. 28, 1990), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA. To be sure, Hannon later speculated that her suggestions may have incorporated other senators’ as well. Email from Beverly Hannon (Mar. 1, 2007).

---

307 Untitled, unaddressed (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.

309 Undated and unaddressed letter on her Senate letterhead, in Beverly Hannon Papers, also long been a proponent of Senate rules recognizing non-smokers’ rights. It would be interesting to know whether it is rare for legislators to voice their complaints about their own physical working conditions to their constituents as Hannon did: “Currently smokers can smoke anywhere at any time in the Senate, and they do. Some of the committee meetings I must attend are physical torture.” 310 She then keyed them into the collective action tactics that she and her allies had developed to improve their workplace:

This year some of the Senate pages and secretaries who are especially bothered by the clouds of smoke in which they must work approached some of us non-smoking Senators for help. We held meetings and talked about positive suggestions that we hoped to present to Senate leadership. Some smokers were very offended by this exercise in democracy and informed the pages and secretaries that they were just help and didn’t have anything to say about Senate rules or lawmaking. Some secretaries have been personally harrassed [sic] by co-workers because of our meetings, which are open to everyone.

Irritations spilled over into debate on HF 209. ... An older man who lobbies for the elderly phoned me, very upset after hearing the debate on the radio. He has chronic bronchitis and can’t do his job as well as he would like because he can’t stand the second-hand smoke here at the Capitol. A Senate leader’s wife who was a secretary used to sit next to me. She has emphysema. There were times I thought she would choke to death at my side. She is now on constant oxygen and can no longer work here or attend legislative events!

What do you think? Do non-smokers have rights too?
If you have comments...please contact me. 311

Poignantly, at this very juncture a correspondence intervened between a prisoner at the maximum security state penitentiary at Fort Madison, who on March 22 wrote Hannon after having read a newspaper article about her fight

---

311 Bev Hannon, “Hannon Speaks Out on Public Smoking,” Advocate News (Wilton-Durant, IA), Mar. 29, 1990 (19:3-4). In a later unpublished memorandum Hannon added this background to the incident: “When JoAnn Hutchins, Hutch’s wife, worked for Joe Welsh, I sat right next to them. I used to be afraid she was going to expire right there on the floor from the smoke, she was gasping for breath and leaning on the pull-out shelf. She had emphysema so bad, often had oxygen inhaler and finally oxygen tube in her nose. Joe wouldn’t smoke at his desk because of her, but others smoked wherever they wanted, including Hutch. I don’t know if she was too subservient [sic] not to say anything to him or if he just ignored her. He actually was killing her with second hand smoke.” Untitled (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA. against smoking in the Senate chamber. A non-smoker who wanted to live in a smokefree environment, he related that the prisoners were “forced to be locked” in their cells 16 hours a day, during which “you are assaulted with a lot of smoke....” Believing that his health and well being had been put in jeopardy by being forced to “live in this type of environment against my will,” he had already filed a section 1983 civil rights action in federal court. To Hannon he complained: “I always see articles in the paper where the state representatives and the governor are always concerned about smoking in public, but I have never seen one thing mentioned about curbing smoking in the state institutions. It’s like we don’t count for anything just because we are locked away for the time being.”

From Hannon (and her nonsmoking colleagues) the prisoner—who knew that “your concern for an inmates [sic] is not on the top of your list in priority of things to accomplish this session”—requested the filing of “a bill that will make the warden set aside a portion of this institution for non smokers [sic].”

Replying a week later, Hannon, after briefly mentioning that she would speak to the Corrections lobbyist, devoted half of her letter to this remarkable piece of self-commiseration, which was presumably designed to put her interlocutor subtly on notice that if she lacked the power to protect herself, it was even less likely that she would be able to help him:

Even though only 14 Senators out of 50 smoke, we non-smokers have been unable to get the Senate to adopt rules that accord us non-smokers any rights at all. Like you, we are assaulted with second-hand smoke most of the day. It has created poor working conditions and poor morale. Some people become physically ill from the smoke.

A few days later Hannon followed up with a “Sorry” letter, explaining that the Corrections lobbyist had informed her that overcrowding as well as conflicting segregation criteria based on gang activity, personal vendetta, and homosexual activities, had prompted the department to terminate its former segregated cell assignments for smokers and nonsmokers.

---

312Stephen Leonard to Beverly Hannon (Mar. 22, 1990), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 20, Folder: Corrections; Anamosa Reformatory, IWA.
313Beverly Hannon to Stephen Leonard (Mar. 30, 1990), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 20, Folder: Corrections; Anamosa Reformatory, IWA.
314Beverly Hannon to Stephen Leonard (Apr. 4, 1990), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 20, Folder: Corrections; Anamosa Reformatory, IWA. A year later Leonard, serving a 25-year sentence for attempted murder and other crimes, and Steven Wycoff, serving a life sentence for murder, filed suit in federal district court in Des Moines claiming that the unconstitutional imposition of cruel and unusual punishment entitled them to an order (like the Clean Indoor Air Act) dividing the penitentiary into designated smoking and nosmoking cells. While requesting that the suit be dismissed, a penitentiary spokesman and the state attorney general’s office noted that officials were considering declaring certain areas nonsmoking or even banning smoking altogether in the prison. William Petroski, “Iowa Inmates in Dispute over Smoking Rights,” DMR, May 29, 1991 (1A, 6A), Bates No. TI00911091. Beginning Dec. 31, 1995, indoor smoking was banned in Iowa prisons. William Petroski, “Smoke-Free Prisons Soon,” DMR, July 8, 1995 (1) (NewsBank).
Instead of Repealing Preemption of Local Anti-Public Smoking Ordinances in 1991, the Legislature Enacts What the Tobacco Industry Purported to Be the Preemption of Local Cigarette Sales Ordinances

[S]moking legislation in Iowa is largely symbolic; enforcement is minimal and voluntary compliance is expected.¹

The cigarette companies’ victory in inserting preemption into the 1990 amendments to the clean indoor air law did not prompt the anti-smoking forces in the Iowa legislature to abandon the struggle to confer power on local governments to pass and enforce ordinances that were stronger than the weak statewide law that had been on the books since 1978. Already by July 1990, the Tobacco Free Coalition, composed of representatives of the Iowa Medical Society and the Iowa branches of the American Cancer Society, American Heart Association, and American Lung Association, met and identified elimination of the preemption clause of the 1990 Clean Indoor Air Act as one of its four legislative priorities for the 1991 session.² However, in the event, the tobacco industry succeeded not only in defeating the TFC’s repeal initiative, but also in securing enactment of yet another preemption provision, this time purportedly depriving localities of their home-rule powers to issue ordinances regulating cigarette sales, free samples, and vending machines—the last being of special concern since the legislature of neighboring Minnesota just the previous year had defeated the tobacco companies’ preemption bill³ and instead voted to empower local governments to adopt ordinances more restrictive than the new statewide law’s regulation of vending machines;⁴ consequently, that state’s localities were on the way to passing more total bans than those of any other state.⁵

²Carol Sipfle, American Lungs Association of Iowa, to Tobacco Free Coalition (July 30, 1990), in Folder: Tobacco: 1999-, Johnson County Department of Public Health, Iowa City.
³1990 Proactive Legislative Opportunities by Category, at 10 (Mar. 19, 1990), Bates No. 507595166/78; Smoking Control Advocacy Research Center, Action Alert, at 1 Mar. 30, 1990, Bates No. TIMN363192.
⁴1990 Minn. Laws ch. 421 § 3, at 831, 832.
⁵Joseph Sullivan, “Bans on Cigarette Machines Are Upheld,” NYT, Apr. 1, 1994 (B5).
The Tobacco Institute Solidifies Its Coalition with the Iowa Citizen Action Network and Iowa Federation of Labor

Both sides were aware that the 1991-92 legislative session would witness new drives to pass bills on all these subjects. Intertwined with these measures, as had almost always been the case in recent years, was yet another proposal by Governor Branstad to increase the cigarette tax, which would force the legislature to deal with this issue again. As early as April 27, 1990, less than three weeks after adjournment, Lowell Junkins, the former Democratic Senate Majority Leader who was the Iowa consultant or labor counsel of the Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee, informed the Tobacco Institute that the cigarette companies’ success on excise taxes—which primarily rested on diverting attention to spending reductions—“was a near miracle” given the estimated $40 million state budget deficit for 1991. Junkins feared a much less favorable outcome in 1991 “unless we have an army of support and not the small cavalry of folks we had this year.” To gain allies he secured the support of Mike Lux, the Iowa Federation of Labor vice president, “in assisting with building a coalition of support for comprehensive clean air legislation and support against the use of excise taxes to balance the state’s budget.” The requisite “formal coalition” might be effected through the Iowa Citizen Action Network. The mention of clean air legislation and IFL and ICAN was an unambiguous reminder that the industry continued to understand cigarette taxes and clean indoor air laws as interconnected programs to restrict smoking; consequently, because opposition to one implicated the other, co-opting left-liberal grassroots labor and consumer organizations was vital for success in a state governed by a Democratic legislature and an anti-tobacco Republican governor.

In the meantime, ICAN itself was busy preparing its “progressive tax alternative plan,” which its director, Jay Larson, submitted to its board in early July. Worried about the regressive impact of proposals to increase excise taxes to deal with a potential budget deficit in 1991, Larson argued that one of ICAN’s “top priorities” should be “a campaign...to lower taxes for those who are having trouble meeting their day-to-day needs” and raise them for those who could afford to pay. However, passing this type of plan would not be easy because organizations such as David Stanley’s Iowans for Tax Relief had “convinced

---

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Iowans that sales and excise taxes are preferable to income taxes even though most Iowans would pay less taxes under a progressive plan.” Reversing such beliefs would require “extensive public education and grassroots pressure on legislators.” Vital to such a campaign was presenting the plan to 30,000 ICAN members in the group’s newsletter, to 50,000 ICAN members, who did not get the newsletter, through an education piece, and to 500,000 Iowans by means of the newsletter network of ICAN’s affiliates and allies. Larson then envisioned concentrating ICAN’s canvass, which would reach 75,000 people and generate thousands of letters to legislators, in districts in which legislators were “still on the fence”; mail and phone calls in key districts would create still “more grassroots pressure on legislators.” The total expenses for this project were estimated at $79,979.7

It was precisely such large sums that had been driving ICAN into the waiting and outstretched arms of the cigarette companies since at least 1986.8 Two days after Larson had presented his plan to the ICAN board, Junkins furnished a copy to his handlers at the Tobacco Institute, explaining how it might fit into his own strategy for the 1991 session. Following up on his April report, Junkins urged quick action because it was “clear the tax question in this state will be resolved prior to the opening of the session and not after January 1, 1991.” Half a year before the new legislature convened, the major vehicle for increasing state revenues to close the budget deficit was “the ‘easy’ taxes”—excise and sales taxes. Junkins’ plan was to help generate a debate during the upcoming gubernatorial campaign by offering an alternative to those taxes. Whereas Branstad, during his first two terms, had made known his preference for increased cigarette, gas, alcohol, and sales taxes, Junkins hoped that “we can get” the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, House Speaker Don Avenson, “to offer the alternative choices”: since more progressive taxes fit with Avenson’s “philosophy,” Junkins urged “mov[ing] Avenson into this mode quickly.” The point of this exercise was to position the cigarette industry so that during the legislative session it could at least “point at the other choices and not leave us alone as the preference.” To this end Junkins had already secured commitments from ICAN and IFL to initiate “the process of focusing on the choices....”9 (To be sure, Junkins made it clear that he was not overconfident by attaching to his 7Jay Larson to ICAN Board of Directors and other interested parties, Re: A Progressive Tax Alternative Organizing Plan (July 6, 1990), Bates No. TI21010580-2.

---

8See above ch. 26.
9Lowell Junkins to James Savarese, Dan Nelson, Susan Stuntz, and David Wilhelm, Memorandum: Subject: Suggested Strategy for 1991 Legislative Session (July 8, 1990), Bates No. TI21010572/3.

2758
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

An excerpt from the document is as follows:

memorandum an article from the same day’s Register disclosing that both Branstad and Avenson had stated that it was likely that cigarette taxes would be increased.\textsuperscript{10} The special roles performed by these two organizations that made them virtually unique and indispensable were implicit in the crucial interconnection between excise taxes and anti-public smoking legislation that Junkins highlighted:

A supplementary part of this strategy has to be to get the focus of attention off of cigarettes and the accompanying arguments about their relationship to health. The more complete and comprehensive clean air legislation gives us an opportunity to do this. I do not believe we can win this battle with the clean air alternative alone but we must have the two alternatives, progressive taxes and clean air, linked together.\textsuperscript{11}

Just how tricky managing the tobacco industry’s alliance with ICAN was emerged a few weeks later when Susan Stuntz, TI vice president for issues management, informed Patrick Donoho, State Activities vice president for the Northern Sector, that Philip Morris had offered its own support to the Iowa fair tax program, but that while appreciated, it “should be turned down” because the Institute, through the Labor Management Committee, “will make sure that Iowa Citizen Action has all of the resources it needs to get this project underway.” The reason for excluding cigarette company financing was that “the only way this will work is if ICAN also raises funds of its own.”\textsuperscript{12} Stuntz’s strategical insight was presumably that the whole point of the coalition with ICAN was to tap into its legitimate grassroots organization; if the tobacco industry subsidized it so heavily that it no longer had to raise its own funds through grassroots drives, it would turn into a mere industry front organization—of which the cigarette companies already had more than enough—and lose its unique raison d’être as a large-scale authentic \textsuperscript{11}Lowell Junkins to James Savarese, Dan Nelson, Susan Stuntz, and David Wilhelm, Memorandum: Subject: Suggested Strategy for 1991 Legislative Session (July 8, 1990), Bates No. T121010572/3.

\textsuperscript{12}Susan Stuntz to Pat Donoho (July 25, 1990), Bates No. T121010570. Without being able to pinpoint the date or determine whether the incident was related to that mentioned in the text, Jay Larson, the ICAN executive director between 1988 and 1992, later recalled that Wasker had once approached him on behalf of Philip Morris to ask whether ICAN needed more money; after asking around ICAN, however, Larson decided that taking money from Philip Morris was not doable in contrast to taking it from TILMC, which was okay because that money seemed to be coming from unions (although in fact it was also from Philip Morris and other tobacco companies as channeled through the Tobacco Institute). Telephone interview with Jay Larson, Everett, WA (July 19, 2007).
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

anti CORPORATE CONSUMER GROUP, about whose Tawdry clandestine connection to the most despised corporations in the United States neither the ICAN rank and file nor targeted legislators knew anything at all.

Junkins was also making progress with the labor wing of the coalition. In August he succeeded in achieving several important objectives: at its annual convention the Iowa Federation of Labor not only passed resolutions on unfair taxes and indoor air quality, but also called for lobbying of federal and state legislators on the matter of unfair taxes at the local level. (At the following year’s convention Junkins succeeded in insuring that IFL reaffirmed its position on both resolutions.) The tax resolution, submitted by the Federation’s executive council, simply came out for progressive income taxes on all levels of government and against regressive sales and excise taxes without singling out cigarette taxes, which, within the covert coalition framework, would not have been in the tobacco industry’s interest. The indoor air quality resolution was 13 When interviewed 17 years later, Donoho (who had reincarnated himself as vice president for government relations at the International Bottled Water Association), without prompting, spontaneously commented that if the tobacco companies had financially supported ICAN to such an extent that it no longer needed to raise its own funds, it would have become a “front organization” rather than the grassroots organization that the Tobacco Institute needed as a coalition partner. Telephone interview with Patrick Donoho, Alexandria, VA (July 19, 2007). Stuntz (who claimed that she had never before agreed to speak to anyone about the Tobacco Institute, which she left in 1993), at first stated that it was the labor members of the Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee who had objected to Philip Morris funding because they wanted TILMC to fund ICAN the coalition partner. When it was pointed out to her that this objection seemed to be based on a distinction without a difference, since Philip Morris was the largest funder of the Tobacco Institute (which funded TILMC) and thus was funding ICAN indirectly anyway, Stuntz revised her position to argue that the labor members believed that if Philip Morris had given money to ICAN, then ICAN would not have been a labor partner but a Philip Morris partner. Although even this logic seems tenuous, in some not trivial sense it overlaps sufficiently with the argument offered in the text to buttress it. The cigarette manufacturing companies were not directly represented on TILMC because, whereas Philip Morris was unionized and enjoyed close relations with the Tobacco Workers union, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco was unorganized and anti-union. Telephone interview with Susan Stuntz, Annandale, VA (July 17, 2007).

---

14Lowell Junkins to David Wilhelm, Susan Stuntz, Jim Savarese, Memorandum Re: Iowa AFL-CIO Resolutions on Unfair Taxes and Indoor Air Quality (Aug. 28, 1990), Bates No. TI23661101.

16Iowa Federation of Labor, State Convention Resolution No. 19 (Aug. 1990), Bates more complex. First, it was, incestuously enough, submitted by none other than ICAN executive director Jay Larson, who also happened to be vice president of Local Lodge 2760, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, a local combining public librarians and ICAN employees. The resolution focused on “bad design and inadequate, poorly maintained ventilation systems” as contributing to “polluted indoor air that contained known toxic contaminants, bacteria, viruses and allergy-causing fungi, which have been linked to employee health problems.” The cigarette company-ICAN-IFL resolution then called on workplace health and safety officials to “recognize that identification of pollutants, cleaning or replacement of poor ventilation systems, and building modifications to provide adequate fresh air are essential to assure all workers a safe job site.” The crucial diversionary support that the tobacco industry sought was embodied in the intentionally unspecific declaration that “inasmuch as a number of substances are proven pollutants of the air we breathe, no single one shall be targeted.” The industry’s other desideratum found expression in IFL’s urging the state legislature to require indoor air quality testing to develop clean air standards. Finally, the cigarette companies’ coalition strategy, as developed by its TILMC’s cooptation of the Sheet Metal Workers Union, was furthered by the demand that ventilation systems be “evaluated by qualified unions’ affiliated contractors to assure proper and effective performance.”

In a legislative analysis prepared some time in the fall of 1990 before the November election, which was predicted to leave Democrats firmly in control of both houses and Republican Branstad as governor, TI noted that it had not been “lost on the legislature” that the sunsetting of three cents of the cigarette tax in 1989 “did not result in any lower cigarette prices to consumers” because...
manufacturers had increased prices. Following the unsuccessful attempt to reinstate the three cents in 1990: “Without a doubt, at least that three cent figure will be back this year in tax proposals.” Pressure in that direction was being generated by a projected budget shortfall of tens of millions of dollars, eliminating part of which both Branstad and his Democratic opponent, outgoing House Speaker Avenson, had endorsed by means of a cigarette tax increase. As far as the cigarette companies’ staff and lobbyists were concerned, a “consensus” prevailed that “keeping the Iowa cigarette tax at 31 cents is the number one priority” and defeating any proposed increase would be more easily achieved in the Senate. Success, TI estimated, would cost approximately $50,000. First, in order to secure the cooperation of “coalition allies,” contributions in the range of $500 would have to be made to three or four associations to cover mailing and other “grassroots programs” costs in connection with efforts by retailers, wholesalers, and cigarette company sales representatives to “demonstrate economic arguments against regressive excise taxation.” Next, $10,000 to $20,000 would be needed to “mobilize a grassroots phonebank targeted at retailers” throughout Iowa but especially in areas bordering Missouri, Nebraska, and South Dakota, where cigarette taxes were lower; this effort was facilitated by previous phone banks, which had created a list of a thousand “pre-qualified” convenience stores, liquor stores, and bars. Finally, “$25,000 plus” was required to finance a campaign organized by the Public Affairs Division—through TILMC and directed by its Iowa labor counsel (Junkins)—in connection with which unions and ICAN traveled around Iowa “advocating progressive tax alternatives.” The purpose here was “not only to elevate the debate” on appropriate taxation methods, “but also to heighten the chance that selected union groups or ICAN reps would testify against regressive excise tax increases.” TI also contemplated a television advertising program in support of ICAN’s efforts. Not included in the cost estimate was activation by R.J. Reynolds and Philip Morris of their “smokers grassroots programs” targeting legislative committee members and leadership as well as swing votes in both houses.¹⁹

In addition to the anti-tax campaign:

The reference to Iowa City and vending machines pointed back to an initiative undertaken by several medical students at the University of Iowa, members of Doctors Ought to Care, who in April 1989 and March 1990 drove 15- and 17-year-olds to a large number of stores, including grocery stores, convenience stores, gasoline stations, and vending machines, in Iowa City and Coralville, at 83 to 96 percent which they were able to buy cigarettes unlawfully. Having concluded, based on this experiment, that the state law prohibiting the sale of cigarettes was not being enforced in the area, they appeared at city council meetings in the two towns to request the adoption of ordinances making such purchases more difficult. The proposed ordinances would, inter alia, have banned cigarette vending machines in restaurants, supermarkets, convenience and drug stores, and service stations. Even such a tentative and amateurish effort in a small backwater did not escape the manically attentive and panoptically vigilant Tobacco Institute. Two days after an article on the event had appeared in the Des Moines Register, Midwest regional vice president Daniel Nelson, informing Iowa lobbyist Wasker that “we will have to deal with” this situation, asked him to find out both what action the city councils intended to take and whether—since state permits were required for cigarette vending machines but the law did not deal with locations—state law preempted local ordinances on the machines’ location. One dimension of the tobacco industry’s profits-über-alles approach was captured by Nelson’s closing comment: “I am encouraged that this anti-smoking group from the University is not asking for a total vending machine ban. However, let’s not give these people anything for free.”

To be sure, Iowa City, contrary to TI’s assertion, did not “take action” to restrict cigarette vending machines. In connection with a letter/petition signed by 21Marge Gasnick, “Study Shows Cigarette Law Has Little Effect,” ICP-C, May 21, 1990 (1B:4-5). In April 1989, 49 or 83 percent of 59 stores sold to the two 17 year-olds and two 15 year-olds. In March 1990, 54 or 96 percent of 56 businesses sold to the four 17 year-olds, while 20 or 83 percent of 24 stores sold to the two 15 year-olds.

---

23Dan Nelson to Chuck Wasker, Re: Iowa City Vending Machine Ordinance (June 28, 1990), Bates No. TI21010451/2.
98 medical students and physician assistants submitting a proposed ordinance to restrict minors’ access to tobacco, the council at its meeting on June 26, 1990, scheduled a special discussion in the course of which it determined that the recently enacted preemption provision in the clean indoor air act did not apply to ordinances dealing with tobacco sales, and raised, but did not answer, the question as to whether it was permissible for a local ordinance to ban all vending machine sales.\textsuperscript{24} Further discussion took place at meetings in October\textsuperscript{25} and November 1990,\textsuperscript{26} but the council adopted no ordinance. In January 1991, an ordinance was prepared for the city council requiring locks on cigarette vending machines, but soon after vendors had complained about the expense,\textsuperscript{27} the council deferred consideration\textsuperscript{28} (and then ceased pursuing the matter after the legislature had passed amendments to the cigarettes sales act that included the local preemption provision urged by the tobacco industry).\textsuperscript{29}

Regardless of the events in Iowa City, TI was well aware that some local activity had already taken place—not requiring local bans, but confining vending machines to bars—and more was in the offing, necessitating tobacco industry sponsorship of a “state-wide preemptive vending machine restriction bill” that would serve the dual purpose of stopping the proliferation of a “hodge-podge of local ordinances” and “prevent[ing] the State Legislature from enacting a total vending machine ban” (which would render local preemption superfluous, but not to the cigarette companies’ satisfaction), which TI knew with certainty would be on some (probably House) legislator’s agenda. The industry’s strategy was to introduce preemption as a “compromise” amendment to such a ban bill. The chief impediment to legislative success was the fragmented nature of the cigarette vending industry in Iowa, its lobbyist’s marginal position at the statehouse, and the tobacco industry’s failure to develop contacts with it. This problem was exacerbated by the “strange relationship” that TI had for some time had with wholesalers, of which many vending machine companies, as in other states, were a part. Here, too, the lobbying campaign would cost considerably more than Charles Wasker’s retainer. Cultivating “coalition allies,” including tobacco wholesalers, vending machine companies, the Iowa Restaurant Association, and other segments of the hospitality industry was a priority: “These groups will be enlisted to lobby the legislature in order to protect vending machines as a service to their customers. Contributions of between $500-$1,000 may be needed to stimulate cooperation on behalf of the aforementioned allies.” TI anticipated that it would cost an additional $10,000-$20,000 to “mobilize hotels, bars and restaurants to call the legislature...to support compromise vending machine legislation” during crucial floor action.30

\textsuperscript{24}Iowa City City Council, Regular Council Meeting, Agenda, at 1554, 1556-58 (June 26, 1990), http://www.iowa-city.org/weblink/PDF/kwu54sbqwsj4xn45m1slnqaz/1/1990-06-26%20Agenda.pdf.

The other “pro-active” initiative that the tobacco companies contemplated pushing was (as in other states) a hiring discrimination/policy measure to prevent employers from refusing to hire smokers31 that would “not guarantee smoking in the workplace but does protect smoking away from work.” The reason that tobacco industry lobbyists and TI Government Affairs executives had concluded that “a free-standing bill would create unnecessary problems” was their having “no desire to create a vehicle on which germane anti-tobacco legislation can be added.” Instead, turning the strategic tables on their adversaries, the lobbyists were “confident” that during Senate floor action they would be able to tack on a “ready to go amendment” (drafted and “acceptable to all parties concerned” by December 1, 1990) to some labor or employment conditions bill. The stealthy nature of this Senate floor amendment approach, to be followed by a “contested conference committee with the House,” meant that successful “grassroots mobilization” would be rendered superfluous because the stratagem would be “successful only if the lobbyists are able to complete the task in-house.” Nevertheless, Junkins, TILMC’s Iowa consultant, would still need to “educate” labor groups on the measure’s desirability in order to make them willing to lobby the legislators to whom they had access. Although this quasi-covert approach did not require a supportive media campaign, if news organizations decided to cover the debate, TI could not formulate the appropriate response until the wording of the amendment had been agreed on; but even in the fall of 1990 it was clear that if the amendment addressed not only smoking but other issues as well, the companies might be well advised to “soft-peddle industry involvement.” In the meantime, TI would need to recycle its (false) refutation of the often repeated claim that smokers have higher absenteeism and less productivity” in order to “prepare amendment sponsors and supporters for floor debate.”

31See below ch. 29.

Once the predicted Iowa elections returns were in, TI understood that in 1991 the legislature would probably debate measures imposing further restrictions on public smoking and repealing the just enacted local preemption provision, while bills would be introduced to include tobacco use on death certificates and ban billboard advertising.

H.F. 104: Regulating Children’s Access to Tobacco (and Repealing Local Preemption)

At the outset of the 1991 session—the Democrats’ majority had been reduced somewhat, but they still controlled the Senate 28-22 and the House 55-45—a Governor Branstad revealed the extent of his commitment to the anti-tobacco movement by announcing that he would ask the legislature to raise cigarette taxes again and to increase the age at which tobacco could lawfully be bought to 21, but at the same time refusing health advocates’ call to ban all cigarette vending machines. Immediately R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company—whose Allied Forces and Morning Team on January 10, the day after Branstad’s announcement, recommended making Iowa the number one priority for the week—began calling smokers in Des Moines to encourage them to protest the governor’s proposal. Two weeks later Senate Ways and Means Committee chairman William Dieleman proposed a study bill increasing the cigarette tax by ten cents to 41 cents. But that same day a closed meeting of the Senate Democratic majority agreed on budget cuts after leadership concluded that the tax increase lacked majority support, though Majority Leader Hutchins acknowledged that such support might be forthcoming later, when the legislature would be forced to deal with a large projected deficit. The next day House Democrats approved a similar approach, while TI’s Midwest regional office met in Des Moines with its lobbyist, Wasker, Philip Morris and R. J. Reynolds Tobacco, and the smokeless tobacco staff and lobbyist, all agreeing that phone banking operations should begin immediately and focus on first-term legislators and retail contacts in the state’s border areas. Nevertheless, TI insisted that phone
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Although in the account presented here Branstad emerges as a relatively consistent proponent of anti-smoking positions, Rod Halvorson, one of the most militant anti-smokers during his two decades (1979-98) in the House and Senate, which encompassed Branstad’s 16-year gubernatorial career, argued, without contesting the bona fides of the governor’s policies, that his failure to persuade more Republicans to vote for anti-tobacco bills was a function of his failure to prioritize the struggle against smoking sufficiently to trade off other chits to achieve this objective. Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 8, 2007).

21 Eyed as Legal Age for Purchase of Tobacco,” DMR, Jan. 10, 1991 (14A) (NewsBank).

Senate Study Bill 39 (n.d. [Jan. 23, 1991], by Fraise, Murphy, Dieleman, Hedge, and Taylor).

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

banks were needed because lobbyists felt that this arrangement might break down in the House.32 Branstad tried to overcome legislative opposition to his proposed tax increase to 41 cents per pack—the nation’s highest—by stressing at his weekly news conference in late January that its purpose was not just to raise revenue, but to discourage smoking and finance smoking-related health costs.33

In the midst of these preliminary tax skirmishes, on January 24, six House Republicans and three Democrats, led by Johnie Hammond, filed H.F. 104, which: (1) prohibited persons under the age of 18 from buying or trying to buy any tobacco, tobacco products, or cigarettes; (2) eliminated the provision permitting someone under 18 to buy tobacco products with a note from a parent; (3) empowered the Iowa Department of Public Health, county and city health departments, and cities to enforce the prohibition of selling to minors directly in district court and to file proceedings before permit-issuing authorities (i.e., city councils and county boards of supervisors) against violating permit-holders; (4) struck the higher penalty (serious misdemeanor) for second and further violations of the prohibition on selling to minors/buying by minors, thus establishing a uniform simple misdemeanor for all violations; (5) substituted for the existing mandatory one-year revocation of a retailer’s cigarette sales permit for selling even once to someone under 18 a series of graduated intermediate penalties (which would now also apply to making any vending machine sales or giving away any free samples) beginning with a $300 fine for a first violation (subject to a 14-day permit suspension for failure to pay the penalty), and progressing to a 30-day suspension for a second violation within two years, a 60-day suspension for a third violation within five years, and a one-year revocation for a fourth violation within five years; (6) prohibited all vending machine sales of tobacco (and not merely of cigarettes); (7) prohibited all giving away of free samples; (8) repealed the local preemption provision added to the clean indoor air law in 1990; and (9) coordinated the cigarette sales law and juvenile justice laws so as to assimilate enforcement against juveniles to that against adults for committing a simple misdemeanor, except that a $100 fine or performance of community service could be imposed on the former.34

The reforms embodied in H.F. 104 must be understood in the context of both the existing law in Iowa and the national anti-smoking movement’s proposals and 34H.F. 104 (Jan. 24, 1991, by Hammond). The same day David Osterberg filed H.F. 103, which would have prohibited vending machine sales.

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

the opposition conceived, mobilized, and organized by the cigarette oligopoly. Beginning in 1921, when the legislature repealed the statewide absolute prohibition of the sale of cigarettes, which had been in effect since 1896, the State of Iowa underscored the merely quasi- and contingently lawful status of cigarettes, the sale of which without a permit remained illegal, by introducing and maintaining (what later might be called) a zero-tolerance policy toward permit-holders’ sales to minors. Thus the 1921 statute provided that the city councils and county boards of supervisors—on which was and continues to be conferred the discretion to issue sales permits—“shall revoke the permit of any person who has violated any of the provisions of this act, and no such permit can again be issued for a period of two years thereafter.”

To be sure, included among the code amendments passed by the legislature in 1939 (which, inter alia, prohibited vending machine sales of cigarettes) was a revision converting mandatory into discretionary revocation, although the legislature did retain the criminal penalty of a $25 to $100 fine and up to 30 days’ imprisonment for a first violation and a $100 to $500 fine or one to six months’ imprisonment for a second and further violations. This permissive regime lasted from 1939 to 1959, which coincided approximately with the zenith of smoking laissez-faire in the legislature. But when the legislature lowered the legal age for buying tobacco from 21 to 18 in 1959, it also restored the original mandatory revocation provision by converting “may” back to “shall.” And the successor provision in the Iowa Code in force in 1991, when the legislature was considering amendments, still provided that the local permit-issuing governmental bodies “shall revoke the retailer’s permits” if the retailer sold to minors and conferred (“may revoke”) discretion on these local governments to revoke “the retailer’s permits” if the retailer violated any other provisions of the “division.” Local bodies were prohibited from issuing a new permit to any such retailer for one year following revocation “unless good cause to the contrary” was shown.

The reason that H.F. 104 did away with the zero-tolerance regime for sales

45See above ch. 15.
461921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 3, at 213, 214.
47See above chs. 19 and 22.
48Iowa Code § 1556.17(2) at 294 (1939). The provision was contained in S.F. 128, § 18(2). H.F. 207 included the same provision.
49Iowa Code § 1554 at 294 (1939).
51Iowa Code § 98.22(2) and (3) (1991). to minors was, as Representative Mark Haverland, chair of the House Human Resources Committee, to which it was referred, later explained, rooted in the legislative sense that such a "draconian" law was difficult to enforce: on the social-psychological level the police, especially in a small town where everyone knew everyone else, would simply not want to be the agent delivering a "crushing blow" to a store; on the contrary, a policeman would think it was "nuts" to shut down the sales of cigarettes because a clerk inadvertently sold a pack to a 17-year-old who looked 35. And even Haverland, an ardent anti-smoker who was sympathetic to merchants, was able to understand why Hy-Vee would take strong exception to losing its permit because of a clerk’s error. In contrast, he and other legislators regarded H.F. 104’s incremental punishment as a more rational approach.\footnote{Telephone interview with Mark Haverland, Polk, IA (June 6, 2008).} (Ironically, the gradualist law enacted in 1991 was no more enforced than the draconian law that it replaced.)\footnote{See below.} Nor was Haverland alone in his view: former House Speaker Don Avenson agreed that the one-strike-and-you’re-out law was too strict to be enforceable.\footnote{Telephone interview with Don Avenson, Oelwein (June 13, 2008).}

The Tobacco Institute and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services: Dueling Model Bills Regulating Children’s Access to Tobacco

Anti-tobacco initiatives in Congress and federal agencies and cigarette firms’ efforts to thwart them between 1989 and 1991 also shaped legislation in Iowa. The focus on youth access was sharpened by the startling finding, published in the surgeon general’s 1989 report on smoking on the 25th anniversary of the catalytic first report in 1964, that in contrast to “virtually all other tobacco-related public policy measures,” which had been strengthened during the intervening years, fewer restrictions on child tobacco use were in place than in many decades despite what had been learned about the health risks, addictive properties, and early age of initiation. In particular, during the intervening years more states had repealed than reenacted tobacco access laws and more states had lowered the age for tobacco sales to children than raised it; in addition, beginning in the 1970s, law enforcement declined as high schools began setting aside areas for students to smoke even in some states in which it was unlawful for persons of their age to buy or possess tobacco.\footnote{U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, \emph{Reducing the Health Consequences of Smoking: 25 Years of Progress: A Report of the Surgeon General} 598 (1989).} The need for legal intervention was undergirded by the surgeon general report’s further finding that most adolescents were able to buy their own cigarettes directly from retailers or (to a lesser extent) vending machines.\textsuperscript{56} Indeed, the volume of such transactions was so significant—guesstimated at $500 million annually in cigarettes and another $130 million in smokeless tobacco—that “[r]etailers have a strong financial incentive to sell cigarettes to children.” Nevertheless, in the face of hundreds of millions of such sales violations annually, “[l]aw enforcement officials throughout the country ha[d] difficulty recalling instances in which a vendor was charged with violating the law.” Ultimately, then, if adolescent access to cigarettes was to be reduced, “attitudinal barriers” on the part of those officials, who believed that no-sales-to-minors laws could, should, or need not be enforced, had to be overcome\textsuperscript{57} along with the prevailing “‘climate of social acceptability’” that enabled merchants to sell cigarettes to children without internalized shame or public embarrassment.\textsuperscript{58}

At the end of 1989, TI complained that “[u]nder the guise of ‘protecting’ children,” several legislators had introduced bills “that would severely curtail the right to advertise cigarettes.” In particular, the cigarette oligopoly’s PR/lobbying organization singled out Representative Synar’s Children’s Health Protection Act of 1989, Representative Thomas Luken’s “Protect Our Children from Cigarettes Act of 1989, and Senator Frank Lautenberg’s Adolescent Tobacco Prevention Act. The bills, which, inter alia, banned giving away free samples and vending machine sales, were anathema to the manufacturers because portraying such restrictions “as necessary for child protection has become a powerful public relations tool for anti-smoking activists.” The cigarette companies were especially worried about vending machine sales’ vulnerability to “‘child protection’ concerns,” which had intensified with the increasing volume of state and local legislative restrictions since the mid-1980s, in part inspired by a model bill advocated by the American Medical Association.\textsuperscript{59} The fact that none of the three congressional measures came anywhere close to floor debate\textsuperscript{60} did not \textsuperscript{59}[(Tobacco Institute), Agenda for Discussion: Youth Smoking Issues (Dec. 1989), Bates No. TIMN0171342/3.

\textsuperscript{60}The House took no action on H.R. 1493 (Mar. 20, 1989, by Synar) and the Senate relieve TI of the need to ask several questions (for internal consumption only) that underscored the industry’s increasingly desperate rhetorical-propaganda and strategic situation:
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Can we credibly and effectively demonstrate that our member companies truthfully and fairly market their products to adult smokers, not youth? ...

How do we increase the level of awareness among local, state and federal officials and opinion leaders that smoking is only one of a constellation of adult practices that young people often emulate...?

Anti-smoking groups seek to involve tobacco in the war on drugs calling it a “gateway drug,” and “our number one drug/abuse problem.” What can we do to foster public acceptance of the “monumental difference between Camels and crack,” as the New York Post put it? ...

The anti-smoking agenda calls for protecting so-called vulnerable population groups by reducing their exposure and access to cigarette advertising and sales by banning signs, billboards, and sampling around schools, hospitals, churches and vending machines in many locations. Tobacco is often combined with alcohol in paternalistic efforts designed to “safeguard” minorities as well as young people. Should we develop a more “accommodating” strategy? If so, where do we draw the line? 61

The manufacturers’ immediate response was to have their lawyers at Covington & Burling draft a Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990. Already on January 9, 1990, Kurt Malmgren, TI vice president in charge of the State Activities Division, sent a copy of the draft “minors bill” to the division’s policy committee, four of whose nine members represented Philip Morris and R. J. Reynolds. Pointing out that “‘youth’s easy access to tobacco products’ was one of the main arguments that the anti-tobacco forces used in promoting its agenda” in 1989, Malmgren observed that the model bill was written so that it could be used defensively, proactively, or preemptively. In view of the volume of relevant pending proposals in state and local lawmaking bodies, he scheduled a telephonic conference for January 15 in order to reach consensus on the draft’s wording and uses. 62

Accompanying the model law was a memorandum by David Remes, the Covington & Burling lawyer who presumably drafted it and/or under whose supervision others did. The law firm’s website advertises Remes as “[r]epresenting such clients as...leading cigarette manufacturers in Commerce Clause, Supremacy Clause, First Amendment, and Takings Clause challenges to state and local laws,” but he was manifestly available for carrying more mundane and intellectually less challenging non-constitutional water for one of the storied law firm’s presumably more lucrative clients (though, interestingly, Covington & Burling did not care to include any of its many tobacco clients on its website list of “representative clients”). In his memorandum, labeled “Attorney’s Work Product Privileged and Confidential,” Remes emphasized with regard to licensing that the “important point” was to “avoid placing licensing authority in any state agency with an anti-smoking agenda.” To explaining to his client how facilitating the politically maximum feasible proliferation of the world’s most lethal consumer commodity was consistent with Covington & Burling’s self-professed “commitment to public service” he apparently did not bother to devote billable hours. But Remes did call special attention to the draft bill’s specification that tobacco sales would be protected from “local interference” by means of a “preemptive effect....” Finally, he pointed out a provision applying to both types of sales and free samples that prohibited soliciting minors to buy or receive and thus “would prevent private citizens from enlisting minors to generate violations of the law” —thus presumably protecting the industry from nongovernmental sting operations.

62Kurt Malmgren, Policy Issue: Draft Model “Minors” Bill (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0150205.

Unsurprisingly, to the extent that the draft bill embodied an “accommodating strategy,” the industry accommodated itself. The dual purposes of the draft bill, which dealt with retail licensing, retail sales, vending machine sales, and sampling, were strengthening already existing state laws designed to prevent underage minors from getting access to tobacco products and making the latter’s sale and distribution “subject to a single uniform system of state licensing and 63Http://www.cov.com/dremes (visited June 4, 2008). The website also boasts that Remes was Harvard Law School Professor Laurence Tribe’s “first full-time post-graduate assistant.”

65David Remes, Memorandum: Re: Model “Minors” Bill at 2 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043862/3.
67David Remes, Memorandum: Re: Model “Minors” Bill at 4 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043862/5
68David Remes, Memorandum: Re: Model “Minors” Bill at 3 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043862/4.
This latter purpose dovetailed snugly with the manufacturers’ overarching political-legal strategy of preemption of local control over any aspect of the industry and conferral of exclusive power on state legislatures or, better yet, Congress, whose centralized statutory productions were vastly easier to steer through lobbying. The draft bill prohibited political subdivisions of the state from “imposing any requirement or prohibition” concerning tobacco products’ sale or distribution at retail, through vending machines, or by sampling, beyond those imposed by the state law.

The crucial affirmative defense that Covington & Burling devised for its clients’ retailers was embedded in the proof of age provision, which required a seller to “require proof of age from a prospective purchaser if an ordinary person would conclude on the basis of appearance that the prospective purchaser may be under” the legal age, and then conferred a defense to any action by the municipality for selling to an underage person on any seller who reasonably relied on the buyer’s appearance (or proof of age). If, despite this enormous loophole, the license holder—who was co-liable for employees’ unlawful sales—nevertheless violated the law, he was subject to a fine (the amount of which the lawyers did not specify).

Lavishly bathing their clients’ retailers in due process, Remes & Co.’s draft bill delegated power to suspend and cancel licenses exclusively to an (aforementioned non-anti-tobacco) state agency, which, after finding that a licensee had committed (an unspecified number of) “repeated violations,” was required to “notify the licensee that any further violation of this Act may result in administrative action to suspend” the license for retailing (or a vending machine or sampling) for a maximum of 30 days. Even if the agency found that requisite further violation, it was still required, before initiating such action, to “permit the licensee an opportunity to show why suspension of the license is unwarranted and would be unjust.” Cancellation of a license that had been suspended was possible only if within two years of the most recent violation the licensee committed yet another violation. Finally, the state agency was authorized to deny/refuse to renew a license to/of a person only if a court had determined him to have committed “repeated knowing violations,” and even then the applicant was entitled to the same “opportunity to show why.” And all of the 69 Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990 § 1 at 1 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043850.

---

70 Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990 § 11 at 12 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043850/61.

71 Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990 §§ 4(c) and (d) at 4 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043850/3.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

The aforementioned adverse administrative actions were subject to judicial review.\textsuperscript{72}

The vending machine sales provisions also accommodated the industry. Vending machine sales and free samples were both prolific sources of minors’ access to tobacco,\textsuperscript{73} the former bulking so large that that same year the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services in its Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Law recommended their outright prohibition.\textsuperscript{74} In contrast, TI’s model law was, all too predictably, extraordinarily accommodating. It permitted such machines in places: that were not open to the public such as factories, businesses, and offices; to which underage persons were not permitted access; in which alcoholic beverages were sold; and in which the machine was “within the immediate vicinity and plain view of the owner” or his employees.\textsuperscript{75}

The same affirmative defense available to retail licensees applied to vending machine licensees,\textsuperscript{76} as it did to sampling, to which the draft bill attached only one condition (apart from banning giving samples to minors)—a prohibition within 500 feet of any youth activities center.\textsuperscript{77}

Among the cigarette companies that financed TI the draft was rather contentious, becoming the subject of discussion at several Policy Committee meetings in January, February, and March.\textsuperscript{78} At the end of January, Gene \textsuperscript{72}Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990 § 10(b) at 10-12 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043850/59-61.

\textsuperscript{74}U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Law, sect. 5(b) 4 (May 24, 1990). The Institute of Medicine soon recommended banning both vending machine sales and free sampling. Institute of Medicine, Growing Up Tobacco Free: Preventing Nicotine Addiction in Children and Youths 214, 217 (Barbara Lynch and Richard Bonnie eds 1994).

\textsuperscript{75}Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990 § 6(a) at 6 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043850/5.

\textsuperscript{76}Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990 §§ 6(d) and (e) at 7 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043850/6.

\textsuperscript{77}Model State Tobacco Product Youth Protection Act of 1990 §§ 7-8 at 7-10 (Jan. 9, 1990), Bates No. TIFL0043850/6-9.

\textsuperscript{78}Kurt Malmgren, Model “Minors” Bill--Draft #2 (Jan. 17, 1990), Bates No. 507609519; Minutes of the State Activities Policy Committee (Jan. 31, 1990), Bates No. 947143342; Kurt Malmgren, Model Sampling/Vending/Retail Sales Bill (Feb. 16, 1990), Bates No.TIMN342042; Minutes of the State Activities Policy Committee (Feb. 22, 1990), Bates No. 947143253; Kurt Malmgren, Model Bills for Sampling/Vending/Retail Ainsworth, an R.J. Reynolds vice president on the committee, sent out a memorandum explaining that the bill had been divided into four separate draft bills on age restrictions, retail licensing, vending machines, and sampling, which the tobacco industry might introduce in state legislatures, but “only as a fall-back position to counteract” anti-tobacco bills seeking to “restrict tobacco product sales and distribution under the guise of preventing youth access to tobacco products” that “may appear to pass.” This legislative tactic, revealing that the bills were purely reactive and that the industry would prefer to leave the state no-sales-to-minors laws in their existing ineffective status, gave the lie to the oligopolists’ public pretense that they did not want minors to smoke. Ainsworth emphasized that since the tobacco industry would strongly oppose retail licensing of tobacco products, the model licensing bill would be used “only in extreme circumstances.”

By the end of February, all licensing provisions were in fact removed from all the bills—together with, conveniently enough, those for license suspension or revocation. In mid-March Malmgren was able to send the texts of the three model bills to the TI’s regional vice presidents and directors, underscoring that they were not “‘blueprint’” bills that “could be ‘dropped in’ for introduction verbatim; rather, the language would need to be revised and inserted into specific state statutes and legislation that would best serve the industry’s goals.” And even when regional officials—who, in accordance with “our established procedures,” were kept on a short leash—used them appropriately as “guidelines in the development of proactive, preemptive, or alternative language,” Malmgren reminded his subordinates not to introduce them before having secured both the concurrence of the cigarette companies’ government affairs staff and lobbyists regarding language and strategy and Covington & Burling’s approval of the 79Gene Ainsworth, Model Bills on Age Restrictions, Retail Licensing, Vending Machines and Sampling (Jan. 30, 1990), Bates No. 507745121. This version of the drafts does not appear to be among the online industry documents, but the summary of each bill appended by Ainsworth did not indicate any changes; in particular each featured preemption. Summary of Draft Model Bills (Jan. 30, 1990), Bates No. 513253533.

---

80Model State Tobacco Product Retail Sales Act of 1990 (Draft 3/2/90), Bates No. TIOK0029667; Model State Tobacco Product Sampling Act of 1990 (Draft 3/2/90), Bates No. TI24610581; Model State Tobacco Product Vending Machine Act of 1990 (Draft 3/2/90), Bates No. TI24610585. See also the handwritten annotation on removal of licensing in Kurt Malmgren, Model Sampling/Vending/Retail Sales Bill (Feb. 16, 1990), Bates No.TIMN342042.

2776
language.\(^{81}\)

By the time TI forwarded the approved model bill to its field lieutenants, many of the state legislative 1990 sessions were nearing their end.\(^{82}\) Moreover, almost as soon as Remes et al. had completed their drafting chores, the smoking battle front had shifted, necessitating—since the oligopoly’s strategy in this area was largely reactive—new reactions. In May 1990, the Office of Evaluation and Inspections of the Office of Inspector General of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services issued a report, Youth Access to Cigarettes, in response to a request by Secretary Dr. Louis Sullivan, as part of his smoking initiative, to survey state laws on cigarette sales to minors, particularly with respect to the extent to which they were enforced. The report found that: youth access laws were not being enforced; children were easily able to buy cigarettes; the very few areas of active enforcement were on the local level; and the chief elements of such local enforcement included licensing, fines, stings, and restrictions on vending machines.\(^{83}\)

More specifically, the inspector general learned from two-thirds of state health department officials that there was virtually no enforcement of their state laws, while another fifth characterized it as minimal. The vast majority of local public health officials, students, adults, and cigarette sellers interviewed did not know of anyone who had ever been caught under youth access laws.\(^{84}\) In the ten active local enforcement initiatives identified by the report, license suspension/revocation—for which only four state laws provided\(^{85}\)—was considered to be much more effective in motivating merchants to comply than a fine inasmuch as lost sales could amount to hundreds of dollars a day in addition to the loss of customers.\(^{86}\) Most of the local efforts favored civil penalties because they were more expeditious than the criminal justice system in

\(^{81}\)Kurt Malmgren to Regional Vice Presidents/Directors, Memorandum: Model Bills for Sampling/vending/Retail Sales (Mar. 16, 1990), Bates No. TIMN342020.

\(^{82}\)The “Iowa Draft Minors Tobacco Product Sales Act” found among the Tobacco Institute online documents is unfortunately undated and it is unclear what use was made of it. Bates No. TI24642949.

\(^{83}\)Office of Inspector General, Department of Health and Human Services, Youth Access to Cigarettes i, 1 (OEI-02-90-02310, May 1990), Bates No. 2046627300/3/5.

\(^{84}\)Office of Inspector General, Department of Health and Human Services, Youth Access to Cigarettes 3-4 (OEI-02-90-02310, May 1990), Bates No. 2046627300/7-8.

\(^{85}\)Office of Inspector General, Department of Health and Human Services, Youth Access to Cigarettes 1 (OEI-02-90-02310, May 1990), Bates No. 2046627300/5.

large part as a result of using “non-traditional” enforcers such as health and licensing inspectors; in addition, the lack of solid public opinion that selling cigarettes to minors qualified as criminal activity and merited jail time militated in favor of using a civil money penalty regime. More than any other enforcement technique, active local enforcers singled out stings—conducted not only in response to complaints, but on a regular basis—as vital. In the words of one enforcer: “‘Stings are the only way to enforce. Complaints are not enough; no one complains. There is no alternative to stings.’” The urgent need for such a method had been made abundantly clear by dozens of stings organized by researchers and press reporters in addition to police and health departments demonstrating that minors had been able to buy cigarettes in defiance of statutory prohibitions about 80 percent of the time. With vending machines accounting for an estimated 16 percent of illegal cigarette sales to minors and younger children even more likely to buy from machines, enforcement experts also agreed that any set of effective youth access regulations had to deal with vending machines. The divergence between the handful of active enforcement communities and the states was palpable: whereas a majority of the former banned the machines totally, required locking devices, or limited their placement to locations where children were not allowed to be, more than half of states had no policy, while another third merely required posting a warning sign. Because experience with locking devices had revealed that clerks and other employees often activated them without checking buyers’ ages, a large proportion of state health department officials stated that “total bans are the only way to prevent teens from using vending machines.” Finally, active enforcers of local ordinances urged that state laws not preempt stronger local regulations.

At a U.S. Senate Finance Committee hearing on Health Impact, Costs of Smoking on May 24, 1990, HHS Secretary Sullivan—as the president of the TI, which was clearly worried about the possible ramifications of the proceedings, at which its representatives also testified, explained in a memorandum to his executive committee—“took center stage,” using the hearing as a forum for releasing the Inspector General’s report together with a Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act. Sullivan set the tone by declaring that it was “‘a moral and medical outrage that our society permits such ready access to our children’ by tobacco companies” and that “‘[w]e must put an end to the time when any child with a handful of change can commence slow-motion suicide.’”
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

* * *

* * *

93One of its witnesses was Robert Tollison, an economist, who headed a “stable” of “very well rewarded,” largely supply-side, economists whom Philip Morris enlisted “to gain intellectual respectability for the industry....” Richard Kluger, Ashes to Ashes 626-27 (1996). Based entirely on an unproven and empirically and theoretically untenable assumption—“Suppose that consumers make well informed choices”—he asserted that since there was “no compulsion forcing the worker into the risky occupation or into motorcycling...or into smoking,” that “individual confronts the risks embodied in these activities and makes his choices accordingly.” Tollison pretended to dismantle the reality of the social costs of smoking by claiming that to call actuarially early deaths from engaging in such activities as parachuting, swimming, and boating “‘premature’” was “completely arbitrary” because such a view assumed that “the risk of dying while engaging in one’s favorite activity was not freely chosen.” As to who bore the loss of premature death, Tollison claimed that it could only be the “individual who chooses to engage in these activities” because “to argue otherwise would imply that the worker is the property of society.” Consequently, imputing social “‘costs’ of premature death attributed to such activities as smoking is meaningless. Individuals choose their lifestyles in such a way as to promote their general well-being as they construe it. ... Some will find smoking preferable, and some not. Some will die young, and some will die old. ... The consequences of early death are thus internalized into individual choices in the economy, and it is meaningless to count the value of these consequences as a social cost of consumption activity.” Health Impact, Costs of Smoking: Hearing Before the Committee on Finance United States Senate 126, 127 (101st Cong., 2d Sess., S. Hrg. 101-1117, May 24, 1999) (prepared statement of Robert Tollison). For the manuscript, see Bates No. 508086978/82.

94Samuel Chilcote, Jr. to Members of the Executive Committee (untitled memorandum) (May 24, 1990), Bates No. T112250525.

96Philip Hilts, “Health Secretary Proposes State Licensing to Keep Cigarettes Away from Children,” NYT, May 25, 1990 (A16:1).

The model statute that Sullivan unveiled was accompanied by an explanatory introduction, which emphasized that merchants’ disregard of no-sales-to-minors laws was a function of virtually nonexistent enforcement as well as of sheer ignorance. The circumscribed scope of HHS’s anti-tobacco commitment was suggested by its goal of greatly reducing teenage smoking “without disruption...to sales to adults.” Expressed slightly differently, a merchant’s license would be held hostage to compliance with the minors law: “a store may sell tobacco to adults only if it avoids making sales to minors”; those unwilling or unable to comply either “may elect to stop carrying tobacco products” or would lose their license. But Sullivan was also willing to be accommodating to the final link in the great chain of corporate profit from the manufacture and sale of lethal commodities: in order to “minimize burdens on retail outlets,” they would have to require “identification only for those...not clearly above the age of 21,” would receive a merely “nominal penalty for the first violation,” and would be excused one “accidental violation” every two years if “effective controls” were in place.

The preamble to the Model Act—and in this respect it differed radically from contemporaneous Iowa law—cited facts and figures about smoking-caused deaths (390,000 annually), addictiveness, numbers of minors beginning to smoke daily (3,000), the proportion of smokers initiating smoking before 18 (50 percent) and before 21 (90 percent), and the amount spent annually by minors on cigarettes and other tobacco products ($1 billion). Within a mandatory license system, which was to be overseen by an Office of Tobacco Control, the law imposed a two-tier license fee of only $50 on stores whose tobacco sales were below $5,000 annually and $300 on those whose sales exceeded that threshold. These sums were designed to generate enough revenue to finance enforcement while sparing small businesses onerous costs in relation to sales. Sullivan’s model law set the minimum age of the buyer to whom a license holder could legally sell at 19. The point in setting the age at 19 was to postpone the time at which teenagers lawfully “experiment with ‘adult’ behaviors” until an age when “mature judgment has a better chance of overcoming the intense pressure” to do so; the higher age would mean that most high school students would “not have ready access to tobacco.” The 19-year-old limit was implemented in a manner that, again, accommodated merchants by prohibiting license holders and their employees from selling tobacco products to anyone they knew was under 19 or to anyone (other than a person who appeared “without reasonable doubt” to be over 19) who did not present a driver’s license or similar photographic identification. HHS decided to ban vending machines altogether because the lack of human intervention by a clerk defeated the whole plan of preventing over-the-counter sales. The department left it to states’ discretion to determine whether to permit vending machines either in places that minors were not permitted to enter by law or controlled by electronic disabling devices requiring human intervention, but HHS stressed that Utah had found such devices to be ineffectual. The Model Act conferred yet another accommodation on retailers by exempting them from liability for more than one violation per day.

---

104 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act” § 5(a) (May 24, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0171222/32.

106 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act” § 5(a)(1) and (2) (May 24, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0171222/32-3.

107 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act” § 5(b) (May 24, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0171222/33.

109 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act” § 5(c) (May 24, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0171222/33. Sullivan offered neither explanation nor justification for this bizarre exemption for multiple daily
Although HHS viewed civil money penalties assessed by administrative law judges as a more effective means of enforcement, the Model Act also authorized criminal fines to provide greater flexibility. License holders and employees selling to minors—the latter’s violations were attributed to the former—creating a vending machine were subject to a fine or civil money penalty of $100 for a first violation, $250 for a second violation within two years, $500 for a third violation within two years, and $1,000 for any additional violation within two years. A license holder was not subject to liability for an employee’s sales to minors if he affirmatively demonstrated that he had in place an “effective system...to prevent” sales to minors, but he could avail himself of this exception only once within a two-year period. The Model Act subjected employees to penalties “both to emphasize their responsibility under the law and to protect employers against the carelessness of employees.” Similarly solicitous of employers was the mitigation of progressive penalties for repeated violations “over wide periods of time,” which were deemed to be “truly isolated lapses...” On top of these progressive monetary penalties/fines, the Model Act also imposed, on a per outlet basis, a set of progressive suspensions/revocations/non-renewals: of seven days for a second violation within two years, of one to six months for a third violation within two years, and of nine to 18 months for any further violation within two years. HHS imparted some severity to the penalty for chain stores by suspending, revoking, and not renewing for nine to 18 months all the licenses for outlets under common ownership or control if fines or civil money penalties had been assessed for three or more violations at three or more outlets within two years. The provision was calculated to create a “strong incentive for retail chains to ensure compliance by all of their outlets.”

---

110 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act” § 8(c) (May 24, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0171222/36.
113 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act” § 8 (May 24, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0171222/35-6
114 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act: A Model Law Recommended for Adoption by States or Localities to Prevent the Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors” at 6 (May 24, 1990), Bates No.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Although the Model Act did not address several important issues, including penalties for minors’ possession of tobacco, the preemption of local ordinances stronger than statewide laws, and the use of sting operations, their omission was not a signal to the states to ignore them. HHS left out a penalty for possession because it would be “far harder to enforce” and less relevant to “preventing widespread availability” than banning sales. The department did not explain why it did not deem the other two matters “necessary or appropriate” within the framework of the Model Act but it did stress that stings were “the most powerful technique for both investigation and enforcement...in most circumstances,” and that “[t]he worst possible outcome would be to enact a state statute which failed to establish an effective and workable enforcement system while preempting local governments from filling this void.”

The Bush administration’s initiative may have secured “enthusiastic support” from the chair of the National Governors Association, Iowa Governor Terry Branstad who a few days later published an op-ed in USA Today supporting Sullivan’s ban (or restrictions) on vending machines and loss of license—but it did not satisfy anti-smoking groups or some congressional Democrats, who criticized it as a “half-hearted gesture....” In particular, Senator Edward 119 Philip Hilts, “Health Secretary Proposes State Licensing to Keep Cigarettes Away from Children,” NYT, May 25, 1990 (A16:1-3 at 1).

---

Kennedy lambasted as “‘irresponsible’” the “‘White House tactic of paying lip service to important national goals while rejecting Federal action.... We cannot simply dump our major national problems on the states. This Articles of Confederation approach did not work 200 years ago, and it will not work today.’”122 The triangular dispute involving Sullivan, Kennedy, and the Tobacco Institute as representative public figures can be traced back at least to November 1989, when Kennedy filed the Tobacco Product Education and Health Protection Act which, inter alia, would have created a Center for Tobacco Products within the Centers for Disease Control to make grants to entities to develop anti-tobacco information campaigns and to a limited number of states to enforce a ban on tobacco sales to minors.123 In February 1990 Sullivan testified at a Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee hearing on Kennedy’s bill that cigarette companies were “‘trading death for corporate profits,’”124 but he nevertheless opposed creating ”another Federal bureaucracy to carry out enforcement in the states and cities.”125 In contrast, the cigarette companies, through their Tobacco Institute, acknowledged that it opposed Kennedy’s bill on the substantive grounds that it would give $50 million to anti-tobacco groups to produce anti-tobacco advertising, “even though Americans are already universally aware of the claimed risks of smoking” and the “funds could be used for ‘attack’ ads vilifying the tobacco companies themselves,” and $25 million to states to enforce no-sales-to-minors laws, even though “[t]he states already are acting aggressively in these areas and further Federal support is unwarranted.”126

The advent of Sullivan’s Model Act prompted TI to deal with this much more authoritative competitor. Malmgren immediately informed the policy committee that “[n]o doubt we will see the model in the states,” adding that State Activities would have to take “another look at our model bills in the ‘youth area.’”127 By (A14), Bates No. TCAL0348831.

125Philip Hilts, “Health Secretary Proposes State Licensing to Keep Cigarettes Away from Children,” NYT, May 25, 1990 (A16:1-3 at 3).

126The Tobacco Institute Statement Kennedy Bill (S. 1883) Mark Up (May 6, 1990), Bates No. 87705847. With some changes the committee reported Kennedy’s bill out as S. 2795 (May 16, 1990).

127Memorandum from Kurt Malmgren to John Nelson et al. (May 31, 1990), Bates No. 0171220.
June 11, Remes, at the State Activities Division’s request, had prepared a draft Model State Tobacco Product Sales Act “for internal discussion purposes only.” It modified his earlier draft minors law “for possible use as a counter to” Sullivan’s model law. In an accompanying memorandum Remes pointed out that his work product, unlike HHS’s model law, would not require a license to sell tobacco, establish a special state bureaucracy, or ban vending machines, but would prohibit youths (defined as under 18 rather than 19) from possessing tobacco products.128 What he did not mention was the most important change effected by his new draft—namely, that the owner was no longer co-liable for employees’ sales or distribution of samples to minors; indeed, the owner was not even liable for vending machine sales to minors if he made the employee responsible for supervising the machine.129

Revealingly, TI’s “Side-by-Side Analysis” of its model law and Sullivan’s failed even to make it clear that unlike the latter, the oligopoly’s scheme did not make owners jointly liable with employees. However, embarrassment over this gift to allied retailers—whose expendable low-wage employees were not envisioned as fit for membership in the industry’s grand coalition—could not have been the reason for this distortion: after all, TI did not shy away from counterposing its mandatory but feckless sign (“By law, tobacco products may be sold only to persons 18 and older”) to the clear warning Sullivan required (“It is a violation of the law for cigarettes or other tobacco products to be sold to any person under the age of 19”).130 The cigarette manufacturers’ lack of bona fides was impressively on display in their failure to mention (let alone to include in their proposal) Sullivan’s requirement that the sign both be in red letters at least one-half inch high on a white background and “include a depiction of a pack of cigarettes at least two inches high defaced by a red diagonal diameter of a surrounding red circle.”131

On the same day Malmgren distributed to the policy committee the outline of

---

128 David Remes, Memorandum (June 11, 1990), Bates No. 507635833.
129 Model State Tobacco Product Sales Act § 5(b)(1)(B) (Draft June 11, 1990), Bates No. TI10481640/3-4. The new draft also introduced a fine/civil money penalty for a third violation, but the amount was not specified. Id. § 5(b)(1)(A).
130 [Tobacco Institute], Side-by-Side Analysis Tobacco Retail Sales/Youth Model Legislation” (June 13, 1990), Bates No. 507635827; [Tobacco Institute], Side-by-Side Analysis Tobacco Retail Sales/Youth Model Legislation” (June 15, 1990), Bates No. 507635824.
131 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, “Model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act” § 3(d)(1) and (2) (May 24, 1990), Bates No. TIMN0171222/32.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

a project to “defeat the passage of HHS Model Vending Law”\textsuperscript{132} and scheduled a conference call for two days later to discuss it. Like Malmgren, the committee members were already aware that on June 11 HHS staff had met with “representatives of major state public interest organizations and Governors’ offices in Washington in an effort to solicit support for HHS Secretary Sullivan’s “model Sale of Tobacco Products to Minors Control Act.”\textsuperscript{133} Malmgren’s laundry list of problems to be dealt with by the cigarette oligopoly’s vast resources for its never-ending war against yet another ‘anti’ included:

1. Sullivan has become Bush’s Koop. No high marks for anything before this anti-tobacco campaign and therefore, likely to keep looking for the next Dakota.\textsuperscript{134} Timing of June 11 meeting suggests serious effort to build toward 1991 sessions.
2. Proposal is so multi-faceted, it could withstand lots of amendments and still be a problem.
3. Campaign must attack proposal, without being pro-tobacco to the general audience.
4. Proposal may appeal to traditional tobacco-rights supporters, because of focus on youth.
5. Must move quickly in order to have funds for 1991 effort incorporated into association and corporation budgets.\textsuperscript{135}

Optimistically, Malmgren perceived the following “opportunities” in the form of potential allies spawned by the impact of Sullivan’s approach:

1. Proposal represents more federal interference in state policy, despite growing antagonisms in state capitals.
2. Bill opens up many revenue impact and direct cost questions at a time when states are least able to afford new expenditures or revenue losses.

\textsuperscript{132}[Tobacco Institute], Project Outline (June 11, 1990), Bates No. 507635844.
\textsuperscript{133}Memorandum from Kurt Malmgren to John Nelson et al. (June 12, 1990), Bates No. 507635829.
\textsuperscript{134}In 1989-90 R. J. Reynolds began developing Dakota, a cigarette brand to compete with Marlboro among 18-to-20-year-old white “virile females” with no post-high school education. After an anonymous source had leaked the plans to the Women vs. Smoking Network, its director appeared on television with Sullivan, who condemned Reynolds’ planned targeting of women. The cigarettes were withdrawn in 1992, but it was unclear whether market or anti-smoking forces were the prime cause of their demise. Department of Health and Human Services, U.S. Public Health Service, \textit{Reducing Tobacco Use: A Report of the Surgeon General} 402-403 (2000); Department of Health and Human Services, U.S. Public Health Service, Office of the Attorney General, \textit{Women and Smoking: A Report of the Surgeon General} 512-13, 603 (2001).
\textsuperscript{135}[Tobacco Institute], Project Outline (June 11, 1990), Bates No. 507635844.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

3. There is no solid evidence that sale of cigarettes/tobacco products to minors is a problem of any proportion, let alone to justify this approach.
4. Impact is spread well among non-tobacco interests, providing good opportunity for coalition.

The possible participants in this ad hoc coalition included a number of trade organizations whose members sold tobacco such as the National Restaurant Association, National Association of Convenience Stores, National Association of Truck Stop Operators, National Association of Tobacco Distributors, National Federation of Independent Business, Independent Gas Stations, National Automatic Merchandising Association, and fraternal organizations. In addition, the cigarette companies’ coalition would have to engage various government associations such as the National Governors Association and the National Conference of State Legislatures, in whose magazines the tobacco firms would place ads. And finally, the puppeteers would “build editorial opposition,” and recycle such editorials (and op-eds) into packets for further redistribution.

The version of the revised model bill to which the State Activities Division Policy Committee agreed on June 13 and which would be used in response to state and local legislation based on Sullivan’s model measure was virtually the same as Remes’s draft except that it deleted from the definition of “sampling” the distribution of coupons or other vouchers.

The Struggle over and Enactment of H.F. 232: Kindofsortof Regulating Tobacco’s Access to Children and Preempting Local Control of Cigarette Sales

After having thwarted the legislative attack on vending machine sales for Iowa in 1990, the industry was prepared for yet another assault. In the mode of sham indignation in which cigarette company representatives had been taught to luxuriate, Kurt Malmgren, the Tobacco Institute’s senior vice president for State Activities, had instructed the Iowa Association of Candy and Tobacco

---

136[Tobacco Institute], Project Outline (June 11, 1990), Bates No. 507635844.
137[Tobacco Institute], Project Outline (June 11, 1990), Bates No. 507635844/5/6.
138Kurt Malmgren to John Nelson et al., Re: Model Vending/Youth Bill (June 15, 1990), Bates No. 507635818.
139Model State Tobacco Product Sales Act § 2 (Draft June 11, 1990), Bates No. TI10481640/1; Model State Tobacco Product Sales Act § 2 (June 15, 1990), Bates No. TI17320441/2.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Distributors at their annual convention back in September 1990 that laws “prohibiting access by adult smokers to vending machines are flagrant encroachments on the public’s freedom to choose and the right of merchants to sell or vend a lawful product.” The easy access to cigarettes that vending machines created for children was of no concern to profit-maximizing tobacco companies, which fiercely resisted any detraction from the social acceptability generated by the ubiquity of availability to which vending machines contributed.

By January 1991, R. J. Reynolds’ public issues department had “completed a mailing to more than 57,000 smokers across the state to generate opposition to the tax.” On January 30, the Reynolds Tobacco Company public issues department began a telephone bank, targeting 45 friendly or neutral senators, House leadership, and newly elected House members; it also asked smokers to call their legislators and send them a letter protesting the proposed tax increase. The campaign was designed to last three weeks until debate on H.F. 104 began. A few days later, Tom Ogburn, Jr., RJR’s vice president of public issues, informed Tom Griscom, the executive vice president of external relations, that the phone bank was already targeting 45 senators and 25 representatives.

On February 11, the House Human Resources Committee, after Jane Teaford, the subcommittee chair, had explained H.F. 104, and the full committee’s anti-smoking chairman, Democrat Mark Haverland—a Navy pilot during the 146Despite being the subcommittee chair and bill floor manager, Teaford had merely been “given the bill,” had not been involved in drafting it, and did not know anything about its origins. Telephone interview with Jane Teaford, Cedar Falls (June 1, 2008).

---

144Tom L. Ogburn, Jr. to Tom Griscom, Subject: Public Issues Weekly Update February 4 - February 8, 1991 (Feb. 8, 1991), Bates No. 507655694.

147Telephone interview with Mark Haverland, Polk, IA (June 6, 2008). Four years earlier Haverland had sponsored a bill that, in addition to banning vending machine sales, would have raised the legal age for selling cigarettes back to 21 (albeit subject to a counterproductive “not knowingly” condition). H.F. 235 (Feb. 11, 1987, by Haverland),
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Vietnam war as well as an ordained Methodist minister with masters degrees in divinity and public administration from Harvard University—had showed the committee petitions from more than 700 Iowans favoring the bill, passed the bill by a vote of 19 to 0. Before adopting it, the committee, on a voice vote, failed to pass a so-called sense amendment offered by Republican Lee Plasier, which would have limited to one per year the number of times that the Iowa Department of Public Health, the county or city health department, or the city was authorized to inspect retail permit holders for the purpose of enforcing the no-sales-to-minors provisions. The rationale for Plasier’s opposition to (what were presumably) sting operations was his fear of “harassment of businesses.” Had he been a tad more imaginative (or merely waited about a decade until cities began enforcing the law), he probably would not have expressed an inability to “understand how inspections are going to be effective in apprehending a person either selling or buying cigarettes.”

In the event, Plasier received a prompt and revealing response from the bill’s chief sponsor, Hammond, who, in arguing that the opposite of harassment was the probable outcome, suggested that she had no expectation that her bill’s radical provisions would be enforced: “Overworked police forces...aren’t very likely to devote substantial time to a smoking crackdown.” The chief purpose of the Adolescent Smoking Prevention Act was to deter tobacco use by the 35,000 Iowans under 18 who smoked, half of whom were 11 to 15 years old. Haverland conceded that floor passage would not be easy, despite the decision not to include a provision—recommended by Branstad—increasing the age for legal purchase from 18 to 21, in part because it would have been too difficult to gain sufficient support for such restrictions with so many soldiers aged 18 to 21 fighting (and presumably smoking) in the Persian Gulf or to enforce it if enacted.

---

149 [House] Committee Minutes for Human Resources (Feb. 11, 1991) (copy furnished by SHSI DM). The committee passed on a voice vote a subcommittee amendment having to do with vending machines and gifts the exact contents of which the minutes did not make clear. Oddly, the Index to the House Journal failed to list this meeting (HBH-37).
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

principal object in raising the legal was, as Teaford pointed out, increasing the number of people who never started smoking and therefore were, as many surveys demonstrated, unlikely ever to start if they refrained until the age of 21. The resistance to raising the legal age to 21 represented a deviation from the bill’s objective of making the penalties similar to those for buying alcohol by and selling alcohol to minors. The press, by and large, focused on the bill’s ban on vending machines, which, Teaford acknowledged, would “probably be a stumbling block to passage” because “business interests” would lobby against it.

Two days later the House Human Resources Committee filed H.F. 232 as the successor to H.F. 104, which retained all the major provisions of the earlier bill, with which it was, with several minor exceptions not relevant here, identical. Two weeks later Republican Senator Richard Vande Hoef filed a bill, “based,” as handwritten internal R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company notes stated, “on Governor’s anti-tobacco proposal”:

154 Eric Woolson, “Smoking Bill Runs into Fire,” WC, Feb. 12, 1991 (A10:1). At the time the penalties for selling alcoholic beverages to underage buyers were: $300 for a first violation; a 30-day suspension for a second violation within two years; a 60-day suspension for a third violation within five years; and revocation for a fourth violation within five years. Iowa Code § 123.50(3) (1991). The ban on selling alcohol to 19- and 20-year olds was at § 123.47A.
155 Two days later the House Human Resources Committee filed H.F. 232 as the successor to H.F. 104, which retained all the major provisions of the earlier bill, with which it was, with several minor exceptions not relevant here, identical. Two weeks later Republican Senator Richard Vande Hoef filed a bill, “based,” as handwritten internal R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company notes stated, “on Governor’s anti-tobacco proposal”:
156 Two weeks later Republican Senator Richard Vande Hoef filed a bill, “based,” as handwritten internal R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company notes stated, “on Governor’s anti-tobacco proposal”:
157 Two weeks later Republican Senator Richard Vande Hoef filed a bill, “based,” as handwritten internal R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company notes stated, “on Governor’s anti-tobacco proposal”:
159 S.F. 272 (Mar. 4, 1991), Bates No. 507628145.

In the meantime, the tobacco companies were engaged in seemingly cooperative extra-parliamentary activity. TI, as Patrick Donoho, the head of the northern sector later reported to Malmgren, head of State Activities, “developed a strategy to amend the legislation with sampling and vending restrictions, pre-emption, and reduced retail penalties. Because of the interest in the issue of sampling by STC [Smokeless Tobacco Council], they drafted language for the amendment. It was circulated to the member companies in Iowa.160 STC’s substitute amendment, which applied to H.F. 104 and was drafted on February 12, before that bill was superseded by H.F. 232, deleted the total ban on sampling, replacing it with a ban merely on giving away tobacco products to anyone under 18 or within 500 feet of any school or playground.161 (The language of this section and of the other three sections of the STC’s amendment was ultimately enacted word for word.) This amendment was faxed on February 21 by the R. J.
Reynolds Government Relations department apparently to Roger Mozingo.
Faxed at the same time was Philip Morris’s proposal (which, referred to H.F. 232 and was drafted on February 20), which merely tacked on to the STC amendment wording to conform the existing tax liability to the proposed sampling.162 (The subsequent conflict between the STC and the Tobacco Institute over the amendment is taken up below in its chronological order.)

Philip Morris developed its internal position on H.F. 232 in a February 21 memorandum on “Youth Initiatives” that Karen Daragan, the company’s administrator of media programs, drafted for Sheila Banks, the director of media affairs. Her “[b]asic message” for Banks was that as much as Philip Morris and the entire tobacco industry agreed that “cigarettes are not for children,” bans on cigarette vending machines and cigarette sampling were “not the answer.” The oligopolist’s stance was rooted in its opposition to “any laws that unnecessarily limit our ability to provide our cigarette brands to our legitimate customers—adults who have already made the informed decision to smoke.” This position was supposedly all the more necessitated by the firm’s (risible) claim that it was “already imposing severe restrictions upon its own marketing practices....”163 (As an example of such restrictions the company’s president and CEO swore that “[w]e will manufacture tobacco branded clothing items in large adult sizes only....”)164 Daragan’s efforts were directed toward the production of 160Patrick Donoho to Kurt Malmgren, Subject: STC Conflicts with TI (June 21, 1991), Bates No. 508121169.

161Substitute Language for Iowa House Bill 104, Sec. 7 (faxed Feb. 21, 1991), Bates
No. 507628142.
162PM Proposal: Amend House File 232 as follows (faxed Feb. 21, 1991), Bates No.
507628143.
163Karen Daragan to Shannon Toole, Subject: Youth Initiatives (Feb. 21, 1991), Bates
No. 2025895042.
a youth initiative propaganda video for Iowa in which Banks starred. Five days after Daragan had sent her memo, the PR firm Burson-Marsteller faxed the first draft of the video’s opening and closing segments. After claiming that Philip Morris “has been taking steps to keep cigarettes out of the hands of minors right here in Iowa,” the text misleadingly asserted that the company was “currently supporting amendments in the state legislature that would restrict access to vending machines and sampling of cigarette brands,” thus suppressing the fact that it opposed the bill’s much more efficacious bans. The video apparently served as a come-on to interest “talk shows” in Iowa in inviting Banks to disseminate Philip Morris’ propaganda in connection with the legislative debate. A letter, designed to be used in various states with modifications, drafted by Daragan in March asserted, without explanation, that restricting and limiting vending machines and sampling were superior to outright bans as means of preventing minors from smoking, which was an “adult choice,” in which the company did not want minors to engage.

The battle over the proposed cigarette tax increase, which was complicated by the mutual paralysis of forces between the governor and Democratic legislature and the Republicans’ knee-jerk opposition to any tax increases, continued throughout the session: “Democrats don’t like Branstad’s tax increases—like the cigarette tax. He doesn’t like their idea of raising income taxes on those earning more than $100,000. They don’t want him to cut their programs. He can’t cut theirs.” Regardless of legislators’ resistance, the rest of the state’s population broadly supported the governor’s proposed 10-cent increase. Eighty-five percent of smokers may have opposed it, but they accounted for only 21 percent of those surveyed by the Iowa Poll; with 81 percent of nonsmokers favoring it, 68 percent of all Iowans supported Branstad’s position.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Three days after the Register published the results of the poll, House Democrats decided to deal with the looming state deficit by adopting Branstad's cigarette tax increase after all (as well as most of his budget proposals) because, blocked from raising other taxes, they now needed all the revenue they could secure.

At this juncture in early March, Reynolds Tobacco, whose government relations department just a week earlier had boasted that the Democratic leadership had shelved Branstad's cigarette tax increase after many members had reported having received calls and letters from “our smokers,” informed its division managers in Iowa that “Governor Branstad is pushing through the State Legislature a broad range of anti-smoking bills which would have a big, direct impact on your customers.” Knowing that the managers “share our enthusiasm to work for smokers’ rights in Iowa,” the company put it to them that if their sales representatives made their customers aware of “these unfair proposals,” they “could be effective in helping defeat them by spreading the word to other business owners.”

In mid-March the House voted 76 to 23 for an amendment deleting the cigarette tax increase, with Democratic leaders able to secure only 17 votes in opposition from their own party ranks. The amendment's chief sponsor, Republican David Millage, justified the deletion by reference to regressivity: this “bad tax...takes money from the family budget and...hits the poorest the hardest.”

One of the Democrats who voted to jettison the tax increase,

---

DMR, Feb. 25, 1991 (2) (NewsBank). Interestingly, 24 percent of Democrats, but only 14 percent of Republicans smoked; whether this skew was a function of education, occupation, and/or income is not clear. In 1991, 22 percent of male and 20 percent of female adults in Iowa smoked; as elsewhere in the United States, smoking prevalence was highly negatively correlated with educational and income level. Iowa Department of Public Health, Healthy Iowans 2000: Health Promotion and Disease Prevention Goals and Steps 20 (n.d. [1993?]).

Jonathan Roos et al., “Democrats Say They'll Back Branstad's Budget Plans,” DMR, Feb. 28, 1991 (2) (NewsBank).

David Yepsen, “Leaders Have No Clear Solution to the ‘5,000-Piece’ Budget Puzzle,” DMR, Mar. 4, 1991 (2) (NewsBank).

R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company to Our Division Managers in Iowa, Governor’s Anti-Smoking Bills Introduced in Iowa (Mar. 8, 1991), Bates No. 507682738.

Representative John Connors (to whom the Tobacco Institute had given a $500 honorarium in 1984), claiming that the problem was everybody’s—and “not just the poor, the working class, the elderly who smoke cigarettes”—welcomed Millage’s amendment as saying that “we are not willing to take the coward’s way out and put the burden on just one segment of our population.”

Having failed to mobilize enough Democrats for the cigarette tax increase, leadership instead secured passage, on an almost perfect 55-43 party-line vote, of an increase in taxes on richer Iowans by reducing the deductibility of federal tax payments. Basing himself on a fourth-hand account of legislators’ overheard talk about the “avalanche of mail they had received,” Ogburn of R. J. Reynolds Tobacco boasted to his boss Griscom that phone banks, direct mail, and smokers’ rights group activity had helped defeat the excise tax increase.

While Senate action on the cigarette tax was pending, the House debated H.F. 232 on March 27. Two days earlier, TI’s Midwest regional director, Alice O’Connor, informed Patrick Donoho, State Activities vice president for the northern sector, that “[t]he TI amendment” permitting sampling, which had been filed several weeks earlier, would be introduced on the floor. She added: “Floor sponsors include legislators who had been supporting the smokeless amendment unaware that cigarette sampling would be prohibited.” Oddly, O’Connor failed to mention that another TI amendment had also been filed even earlier, both deleting the committee bill’s repeal of the local preemption provision that had been grafted onto the clean indoor air act in 1990 and inserting the same provision into the cigarette sales act. Both amendments were filed by ninth
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

(and last-) term Democrat Emil Pavich, a nonsmoker and former Millers union member from Council Bluffs. As to why he would have been so industrious on behalf of the cigarette companies, a very knowledgeable contemporary of his in the legislature speculated that he was a very lonely man without family whose support a tobacco lobbyist cultivated simply by spending time talking to him.\(^{183}\)

The cigarette companies’ aggressive push for more permissive sampling represented a sharp turn in policy that was all the more remarkable in light of the pronounced absolute and relative deemphasis of sampling as an advertising and promotional practice since the mid-1980s: whereas expenditures on sampling rose from $11.8 million and 3.3 percent of total advertising and promotional expenditures in 1970 to $141.2 million and 7.9 percent in 1982, and $148.0 million (while falling to 7.1 percent) in 1984, by 1989, the figures had dropped to $57.8 million and 1.6 percent, before plunging to only $49.3 and 0.9 percent by 1992.\(^{184}\) Inter-company competitive conflicts had caused the manufacturers in 1990 to suspend their lobbying to authorize sampling packs of six or more cigarettes. A January 1990 TI State Activities memo revealed that Hurst Marshall, an ex-TI employee who by then was working for R. J. Reynolds, had recounted to Bill Cannell, a TI vice president, the substance of his conversation with Pat Wilson, Philip Morris’s Midwest regional director for government affairs on the subject. Reynolds, which sampled in full packs of 20, had, according to Marshall, “no real interest in resuming sampling in Iowa.” Moreover, “RJR did not really want to open up all the old wounds with the wholesalers which is where this all started some years ago.” Finally, and most importantly, Marshall observed that “it was considerably more important that the industry spend its chits on the local preemption bill” (that is, the effort to insert such preemption into H.F. 209’s amendments to the clean indoor air act of 1990). Although Marshall did not directly oppose TI’s efforts on sampling, Cannell

Regular Session 1:407 (Feb. 20) (H-3077, by Pavich).

\(^{183}\)Telephone interview with a former legislator who demanded anonymity (2007). Although this ex-legislator mentioned George Wilson, in fact, Wilson, as representative of the IATD, would have opposed relaxation of the de facto ban on sampling; it was much more plausible that Wasker was the lobbyist. Another of Pavich’s former colleagues, David Osterberg, opined that Pavich did whatever Senate Majority Leader Hutchins told him to do. Telephone interview with David Osterberg, Mt. Vernon, IA (Apr. 1, 2007). Although it seems odd for the leader of one house to give directives to a member of the other house, if correct, Hutchins’ thoroughgoing pro-tobacco position might explain Pavich’s actions.

\(^{184}\)Federal Trade Commission, Cigarette Report for 2003, tab. 2 and 2A (2005). Since the dollar amounts are unadjusted for inflation, the drop in real terms was even greater.
“could tell that he didn’t want us to be working on a measure that only their biggest competitor wanted.” Two months later an internal Reynolds document disclosed that the “[p]roject” to amend the law to permit sample packages of six or more cigarettes was “not feasible at this time—Unable to reach company consensus on the size of sampling packages.”

A few hours before the House took up H.F. 232 on March 27, HHS Secretary Sullivan, whom Branstad had invited to Iowa—and who characterized the package sent by the governor to the legislature as based on HHS’s model law—spoke to the tax writing and human services committees to promote the governor’s anti-smoking proposals, including the 10-cent cigarette tax increase. The ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, ten-term Representative Wayne Bennett, did not explain by what logic Sullivan’s having “provided a lot of ammunition for those who say cigarettes aren’t paying their fair share of the costs now’” had failed to “change[ ] any minds.”

During the debate—which, according to the Associated Press, “generally broke down between smokers and non-smokers”—the House adopted a number of crucial amendments. First, Democrat C. Arthur Ollie, a middle school social studies teacher from Clinton and chair of the House Education Committee, offered an amendment to make it illegal for anyone under 18 to smoke or use tobacco—a type of statute that had largely gone out of style in the states where, in recent years, the “general pattern” had been “to continue letting youngsters decide for themselves whether to smoke, regardless of law.”

Strictly speaking, Iowa had not had on the books a statute banning smoking cigarettes by those under a certain age since absolute prohibition on cigarette sales was repealed in 1921; that law also replaced the ban on smoking by those under 21 that the legislature had enacted in 1909 providing that anyone caught in possession of a cigarette anywhere but on his or her parents’ premises was guilty of a misdemeanor if he or she refused to give information as to the source of the cigarette. The successor to this provision was finally repealed in 1987, when, after Senator Beverly Hannon had filed S.F. 222, which would merely have made it illegal both to furnish smokeless tobacco to anyone under 18 and for those underage persons to refuse to identify the source of smokeless tobacco they were found in possession of, the House passed an amendment repealing the latter provision and the Senate concurred in it. According to the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health, in 1969 five states made it illegal for minors to smoke, while seven others provided that minors found smoking were subject to arrest and a fine, but that their sentences could be suspended if they revealed who had sold or given them the cigarette. Ollie’s amendment, which was adopted on a non-recorded vote, does not appear to have been tainted by the fact that he had introduced it “at the urging of a lobbyist for the tobacco industry, which he said has taken a position against youth smoking, but which in fact favored deflecting attention from its own overwhelming responsibility by focusing on statutory punishment for children who bought and smoked its commodities.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

---

193 See above chs. 13 and 15.

On another non-record vote the House then adopted an amendment offered by the bill’s floor manager, Jane Teaford, to delete a provision empowering the Public Health Department, county and city health departments, and cities to inspect the premises of retail cigarette permit holders for purposes of enforcing the prohibition on selling to persons under 18. Next, the chamber adopted in a similar manner another amendment offered by Teaford to substitute for the bill’s blanket ban on vending machine sales of tobacco the requirement of a lock-out device, controlled by someone over the age of 18, subject to exemptions for: commercial establishments (not also licensed as food service establishments) with a liquor license or beer permit; private facilities not open to the public; and workplaces not open to the public. This very significant dilution of the bill—lock-out devices did not adequately prevent youth access—undercut Teaford’s own floor statement that “keeping cigarettes out of the hands of teenagers is one of the best strategies to reduce tobacco use among the population as a whole, because most users acquire the habit early in life.” Many years later Teaford, while certain that she had not filed the amendment out of “conviction,” conjectured that since her two co-sponsors were anti-smoking Republicans, that party’s caucus must have concluded that it would not be able to guarantee enough votes for passage without this weakening amendment, and that she had agreed 197 Tom Carney, “Juvenile Smoking Law Is Apparently Ignored by Iowa’s Law Enforcers,” DMR, Aug. 1, 1991 (4M) (NewsBank). Whether Ollie actually identified the impetus for the amendment and rehearsed the industry’s preposterously mendacious claim is unclear. Unfortunately, 17 years later Ollie had no recollection at all of the amendment; he conjectured that he had filed it as a favor for a tobacco lobbyist, but assumed that he also supported the amendment. In any event, he was certain that he had not offered it based on moral outrage over having seen students smoke in school (though he had in fact seen them). Telephone interview with Arthur Ollie, Clinton (May 30, 2008).

---

201 Jonathan Roos, “Bill Curbs Cigarette Sales to Kids,” DMR, Mar. 28, 1991 (2) (NewsBank). Unfortunately, the Register offered virtually no account of the debate on this important bill.
to it in order to secure those votes.\textsuperscript{202}

Democrat Mark Haverland, the House Human Resources Committee chair, describing the lock-out device as a “‘Rube Goldberg’ method of selling cigarettes,” pleaded with his colleagues: “‘If we can’t at the very least ban the sale in vending machines, we ought to be embarrassed with ourselves.’” As far as Haverland was concerned, the amended bill was a “‘compromise with the devil.... We’re giving in to the merchants of death here. These folks are selling a product that is killing us.’”\textsuperscript{203} Years later, Haverland, who pointed out that there had been enough legislators who sympathized with vendors’ complaints that they could not watch the machines all day, characterized the setback as simply an example of how “sometimes the good guys just lose.”\textsuperscript{204} Although the adoption of Teaford’s amendment had already deleted the prohibition of all cigarette vending machine sales, the House resumed consideration of an amendment to delete the prohibition. On a non-party-line roll-call vote the amendment was defeated 36 to 59 (though the prohibition remained repealed).\textsuperscript{205} This puzzling procedure may have been designed to undo the lock-out requirement as well as the total ban on vending machine sales, though it would have been a very unorthodox way of achieving that end.\textsuperscript{206} To be sure, since the amendment’s \textsuperscript{202}Telephone interview with Jane Teaford, Cedar Falls (July 22, 2007). The amendment, which was not filed from the floor, was cosponsored by Dorothy Carpenter and Lee Plasier. \textit{State of Iowa: 1991: Journal of the House: 1991: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth Regular Session} 1:881 (Mar. 26) (H-3342). To be sure, they had filed a virtually identical amendment four days earlier, which they withdrew before offering H-3342. \textit{State of Iowa: 1991: Journal of the House: 1991: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth Regular Session} 1:791 (Mar. 22) (H-3300). One possible source of opposition to Teaford’s bill bringing about its eventual dilution was an amendment filed by Bisignano and four other representatives that would have declared the ban on cigarette vending machine sales a taking and required compensation and that Bisignano did not withdraw until after both of Pavich’s amendments had been passed. \textit{State of Iowa: 1991: Journal of the House: 1991: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth Regular Session} 1:407, 905 (Feb. 20, Mar. 27) (H-3076).

\textsuperscript{204}Telephone interview with Mark Haverland, Polk, IA (June 6, 2008).

\textsuperscript{206}Former House Speaker Avenson agreed that the amendment should have been declared out of order after Teaford’s had been adopted and that if its purpose was to eliminate the lock-out provision, it should have been an amendment to the amendment and sponsor, David Schrader, had operated a (cigarette) vending machine business before entering the legislature, such an objective seems plausible, even though it could not have been Schrader’s purpose when he originally filed the amendment at a time when the bill contained no lock-out requirement. Schrader argued that a ban would merely injure the vending machine industry without reducing the number of underage smokers, in part because most machines were in out-of-the-way places where minors seldom went.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

At this point Pavich offered TI’s amendment that removed the restriction on sampling to cigarette packages of no more than four cigarettes, substituting for it a ban on giving away cigarettes or tobacco products to anyone under 18 or within 500 feet of a playground, school, or other facility when it was being used by people under 18. It narrowly passed 51 to 45 on a non-party-line vote, though three-fifths of Democrats voted for the pro-tobacco position, while fewer than half of Republicans did.

Next, Pavich offered his other amendment, deleting the language in the bill repealing the local preemption provision from the 1990 amendments to the clean indoor air act and inserting the identically same preemption into the cigarette sales act. It passed by a larger margin, 58 to 35; this time, a bare majority of Democrats voted (25 to 22) for preemption, whereas almost three-fourths of not to the bill. Telephone interview with Don Avenson, Oelwein (July 22, 2007). Schrader’s amendment to H.F. 232 was the first to be filed. State of Iowa: 1991: Journal of the House: 1991: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth Regular Session 1:388 (Feb. 18) (H-3071, by Schrader). The unofficial but comprehensive Iowa Legislative News Service Bulletin # 47 at (Mar. 27, 1991), which described Schrader’s amendment as “striking the limitations on cigarette vending machine sales,” supports the view that adoption of his amendment would have deleted the lock-out provision.

Telephone interview with David Schrader, Des Moines (July 23, 2007). Schrader, who by 2007 was the deputy clerk of the House, had no recollection of having filed this amendment and stated that he was surprised to hear that he had voted in favor of sampling. He noted that his business had been juke boxes and game machines, but in order to retain customers he had also had to provide them with cigarette machines. Though also unable to unravel the procedural puzzle, he admitted that it was possible that the purpose of his amendment might have turned into undoing the lock-out requirement, which would have been very burdensome to vending machine owners and lessees; he also noted that since the vast majority of bars sold food, they would not have been exempt.

Telephone interview with David Schrader, Des Moines (July 23, 2007). Schrader, who by 2007 was the deputy clerk of the House, had no recollection of having filed this amendment and stated that he was surprised to hear that he had voted in favor of sampling. He noted that his business had been juke boxes and game machines, but in order to retain customers he had also had to provide them with cigarette machines. Though also unable to unravel the procedural puzzle, he admitted that it was possible that the purpose of his amendment might have turned into undoing the lock-out requirement, which would have been very burdensome to vending machine owners and lessees; he also noted that since the vast majority of bars sold food, they would not have been exempt.

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Republicans voted (33 to 13) for it. 210 The campaign contributions that RJR PAC made to House incumbents in 1991-92 aligned predominantly, but not perfectly with their votes on preemption: Bisignano, Roger Halvorson, Krebsbach, Hahn, Lundby, Iverson, Knapp, Kremer, and Wise voted Aye, but Bartz, Brand, Dvorsky, and McKinney voted Nay. 211 (Dvorsky, a strong anti-smoking advocate, remembered years later that he had never understood why he had been a recipient or what the company might have thought it was getting in return, but his election committee treasurer had immediately cashed the check.) 212

The replicated language read:

Enforcement of this chapter shall be implemented in an equitable manner throughout the state. For the purpose of equitable and uniform implementation, application, and enforcement of state and local laws and regulations, the provisions of this chapter shall supersede any local law or regulation which is inconsistent with or conflicts with the provisions of this chapter. 213

In mechanically grafting this language from the anti-smoking law onto the cigarette sales and licensing law the cigarette companies’ battalion of high-priced lawyers overlooked one overriding historical-structural-contextual fact: whereas local preemption made some sense in the former statute, which was statewide in its scope, it was nonsensical and incoherent as applied to the latter’s permit provisions, which, from the statute’s origins in 1921, conferred complete discretion on local governments to grant or deny sales permits. Since these permit provisions lacked a uniform statewide dimension, it would be literally impossible for local governments to identify any uniform content with which local permit decisions could be inconsistent or conflict. Since the statute, as authoritatively interpreted by the Iowa Supreme Court, conferred power on city councils and county boards of supervisors, for example, to deny all permits, to grant some and deny others, or to impose limits on the number of permits outstanding at any one time, 214 local permit policies could vary widely—indeed, that very local control and potential heterogeneity was part and parcel of the 211 Data provided by the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board (Apr. 4, 2008).

212 Telephone interview with Robert Dvorsky, Coralville or Des Moines (Apr. 6, 2008).
214 See above ch. 21.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

compromise that made abolition of statewide prohibition possible in 1921. Consequently, there was (and is) no uniform statewide model for local governments to take as their framework or reference point. In order to implement their intent coherently, the cigarette oligopolies would have had to lobby to revamp the entire structure of the permit provisions so as to eliminate local control and centralize all permit authority in the state. The consequence of their failure (even to imagine the need) to reconfigure the statute is that until the present day the preemption provision cannot be plausibly interpreted to prohibit the hundreds of local governments in Iowa from adopting what would aggregate to a checkerboard of permit policies (although in fact city councils, in addition to being unaware of having this freedom, have become so beholden to commerce über alles that they would no longer, as some did in the 1920s and 1930s, even consider issuing permits other than automatically).

HHS Secretary Sullivan had told legislators earlier on the day of the

215 See above ch. 15.

216 See above ch. 20. In what was presumably an extraordinarily rare instance, in 1993 a physician in Grundy Center, animated by cigarette displays in front of cash register counters that enticed youths to steal, requested that the city council insure that all cigarettes be displayed behind counters, but added that ultimately he wanted the council to place a ban on cigarette sales altogether, which he hoped to see extended to the whole county and state. Although the council was purportedly “sympathetic” to the request, its vision of public health was encumbered by its understanding for commerce: “The council...said they could not tell the businesses where to display cigarettes and in fact understood the tobacco companies pay the stores to display them in certain areas.” Helen Brandl, “Grundy Center Hears Plea About Sale of Cigarettes,” Times Republican (Marshalltown), May 6, 1993, Bates No. TI28922767. See also “Doctor Voices Objection to Council on Cigarette Sales,” Spokesman (Grundy Center), May 6, 1993, Bates No. TI28922767.

217 Nevertheless, the Iowa League of Cities, which “kn[e]w of no city that has attempted to deny a permit on local discretionary items pursuant to local ordinance,” takes the position that “cities do not have the authority to deny issuing a permit on any grounds unrelated to the specific statutory authority.... Our inclination is that cities are pre-empted from defining other grounds for denying permits.” Email from Tom Bredeweg, Executive Director, Iowa League of Cities, to Marc Linder (Feb. 1, 2006). Similarly, the Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Division, which administers and oversees enforcement of the state’s tobacco laws, when asked whether cities and councils could establish their own criteria for issuing or revoking permits, took the position that “State law currently pre-empts local ordinances,” citing the irrelevant Iowa Supreme Court decision interpreting the anti-smoking statute. In the same vein, it opined that a “city cannot enact an ordinance limiting the number of tobacco permits issued with the city’s jurisdiction. A city could not legally start denying applications for new permits.” Email from Nicole Gehl, Operations Manager, ABD, to Marc Linder (Jan. 19, 2006).
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

preemption vote that although he believed that tobacco had “no redeeming value,” he nevertheless acknowledged that “it would be virtually impossible to ban the product because it has been part of the U.S. culture for centuries.” Despite his admission that such a ban would result in a black market, critics of the bill tried to paint its supporters into an absolutist corner, insisting that anti-smokers “should outlaw smoking directly” rather than indirectly by means of bans on sampling or vending machines. Speaking perhaps for some other legislators, but definitely for the cigarette manufacturers, Democrat Dan Jay argued: “‘If you want to ban cigarettes, ban cigarettes and be upfront about it,’”218 His fellow Democrat, Tony Bisignano, a smoker, was unable to refrain from availing himself of the ignorant taunt: “‘If it’s so bad for public health, why aren’t we striking the death blow?’”219

The House then voted 72 to 25 to pass H.F. 232. Among the 18 Democrats and 7 Republicans opposing the bill were both strong advocates of regulation of smoking and tobacco such as Democrats Philip Brammer and Mary Neuhauser and vehement opponents such as Republican Stewart Iverson and Democrat Tony Bisignano as well as Pavich himself; on the other hand, the House’s two most prominent anti-smoking advocates, Democrats Hammond and Osterberg, voted for the deeply flawed bill, while Republican Mary Lundby, a traditional opponent, nevertheless supported it.220 Such seeming anomalies in voting patterns suggest that the several compromises comprising the core of the bill may have stripped voting decisions of principle and rendered judgments inconsistent and therefore unpredictable as to whether the measure was still worth passing. Teaford’s motion to reconsider having failed by an overwhelming vote of 8 to 68,221 the bill was transmitted to the Senate. In a post-mortem analysis, Branstad and Sullivan blamed the tobacco industry’s intense lobbying, which had “inundated the legislature,” for watering down the bill.222 Teaford agreed with their charges, but none of them explained exactly how that lobbying motivated legislators to vote in conformity with the cigarette industry’s interests.

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

In the interim attention shifted back to the tax bill. In support of it ICAN issued an “Action Update” dealing with regressive taxes in Iowa generally, but presenting graphs focusing on the impact on various income classes of an increase in tobacco taxes. Although in fact the proportion of income paid in the lowest income quintile (with a ceiling of $12,000) would rise only from 1 percent to 1.33 percent if the cigarette tax were increased from 31 to 41 cents, even at the lower (current) tax, the regressivity was clearly on display: once the 80th to 95th percentile (with a ceiling of $74,700) was reached, the proportion of income paid in tobacco taxes was no longer even captured by the graph. To be sure, ICAN failed to point out that this monotonic drop was in part a function of the perfect negative correlation between income level and smoking prevalence.

ICAN requested and TI provided assistance for production and distribution of two newsletters on the state budget. Lowell Junkins, TILMC’s Iowa labor counsel, underscored “ICAN’s commitment to our cause. They have been at the forefront on this issue and have already begun lobbying key senators.” The amount of money that ICAN was getting from the cigarette companies at this time was considerable and increasing. In 1990, TILMC paid ICAN $11,000. In 1991, TILMC’s funding of ICAN jumped to $46,500, which consisted of $3,000 a month plus an additional $10,500 in April. The rubric under which TI categorized these disbursements provides a profoundly (albeit inadvertently) ironic insight into the self-degradation by which ICAN’s leaders had warped this anti-corporate, populist, consumerist organization: “Grassroots Lobbying by Vendor.” That ICAN’s leaders had agreed to turn this progressive movement behind its members’ backs into a seller of grassroots lobbying services to the likes of Philip Morris and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco sheds fascinating light on how the tobacco industry was able to use its huge profits covertly to buy the kind of legitimacy that the creation of a front group that could have been traced back to the cigarette companies would never have furnished. That without exception the leading Iowa government officials and legislative leaders and rank and file of the period, when informed, almost two decades later, of the discovery of this connection in the industry’s internal documents, were all shocked and astounded suggests how well the secret was kept.230 With total revenue estimated at only about $1.1 million 1991,231 the money from the cigarette manufacturers represented a significant proportion of ICAN’s budget—significant enough that when the $3,000 a month subsidy stopped it was definitely noticeable.232 The funding of ICAN was also significant to TILMC: although the $46,500 amounted to only 2 percent of the almost two million dollars that TILMC dispensed under 230 Under these circumstances the protestation in 2007 by Jay Larson, ICAN’s executive director from 1988 to 1992, that he did not know whether ICAN’s members had known that ICAN was taking money from the tobacco industry seems highly implausible. Telephone interview with Jay Larson, Everett, WA (July 19, 2007). Jan Laue, an IFL vice president who was an ICAN board member from 1993 to 2006, stated that with the exception of a $10,000 check that she helped secure in 1998 from TILMC through the Tobacco Workers Union, she had been unaware of any subsidies that ICAN had been getting from the tobacco industry. Telephone interview with Jan Laue, Des Moines (July 24, 2007).

---

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

---

231 This figure was extrapolated from total telephone canvassing income of $573,670, which was estimated to have been about one-half of total revenue. Email from Amy Logsdon, ICAN, Iowa City, to Marc Linder (Aug. 10, 2007). Earlier the same source had estimated ICAN’s annual gross revenues at about $800,000 in the early 1990s. Email from Amy Logsdon, ICAN, Iowa City, to Marc Linder (July 24, 2007).

232 Telephone interview with Amy Logsdon, ICAN, Iowa City (July 20, 2007). Logsdon, ICAN political director, who had been with ICAN since the early 1990s, reported that the staff had been told that the money came from the Bakery, Confectionary, and Tobacco Workers Union; when ICAN finally decided to stop taking this money in the late 1990s, the union representative on the ICAN board was very insulted on the grounds that this funding had been collectively bargained for. Id. Assuming that this monthly $3,000 was the same money discussed in the text, the attribution of the source to the union was incorrect: TILMC’s funds came overwhelmingly from the Tobacco Institute—which was, in turn, fully funded by tobacco companies, including R.J. Reynolds, which was nonunion and antunion—the rest coming from individual tobacco companies. Michele Radell to Susan Stuntz, Memorandum: Subject: Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee [Receipts and Disbursements December 31, 1992] (Jan. 8, 1993), Bates No. TI14920961/62-63.
the heading “grassroots lobbying,” not only was it the thirteenth largest sum, but ICAN in fact received more than any other grassroots organizing group in the country.\textsuperscript{233} The occasion for the additional $10,500 “grant” that ICAN received in April 1991 was a special nationwide “fair tax campaign”\textsuperscript{234} that Citizens for Tax Justice (a union affiliated research group to which TILMC gave even more funding) had launched of which ICAN was a prominent co-sponsor.\textsuperscript{235} Its executive director, Jay Larson, held one of numerous nationally coordinated press conferences in Des Moines on CTJ’s “A Far Cry from Fair” on April 22.\textsuperscript{236} TIl President Chilcote, in a report the following day to his executive committee, singled out ICAN’s mention of the recent Iowa Senate vote to raise excise taxes.\textsuperscript{237} The additional funding that ICAN received in April may have been used for the following lobbying and canvassing activities:

In April with the release of A Far Cry from Fair, ICAN mailed excerpts from the report and the Iowa analysis to all Iowa legislators. The entire report was sent to legislative leaders and key committee members. As you will recall, by late April the Iowa legislature was in the final throes of its budgeting process, for this reason ICAN chose to hold off on sending full copies of the report to legislators until their undivided attention could be focused on it and until they were more accessible to their constituents.

Next month we plan to send the report to all Iowa representatives and senators. Upon that mailing we will do the first round of legislative targeting for the 1992 session. The mailing will then be followed up with a phone call to targeted house and senate members requesting a meeting in the legislator’s district. Supporters and allies from each targeted district and ICAN staff will attend these lobby visits.\textsuperscript{238}

At least through 1993, TILMC continued the $3,000 monthly payment to ICAN

\textsuperscript{233}Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee Receipts and Disbursements December 31, 1991 (Feb. 6, 1992), Bates No. TI14920991/1015/1017, on tobacco documents.org. Those receiving more money were largely profit-making entities; the only two advocacy organizations (Citizens for Tax Justice and Coalition on Human Needs) that got more money were not involved in organizing as ICAN was.

\textsuperscript{234}Labor Management Committee Coalitions (no date), Bates No. TNWL0050258/71.

\textsuperscript{235}State Co-sponsors of Citizens for Tax Justice Tax Study (April 22, 1991), Bates No. TIOK0011525.

\textsuperscript{236}Opening Statement for CTJ Study--Des Moines Iowa (Apr. 21, 1991), Bates No. TITX0037520.

\textsuperscript{237}Samuel D. Chilcote, Jr. to Executive Committee (Apr. 23, 1991), Bates No. TIOK0011522.

\textsuperscript{238}Preview of ICAN’s Upcoming Tax Work (Aug. 15, 1991), Bates No. TCAL0067719.
as a vendor of grassroots lobbying.\textsuperscript{239}

The end of the protracted controversy over the shape of taxes and the budget began to emerge by April 12, when Democratic and Republican senators agreed that a five-cent increase in cigarette taxes would be part of the deal.\textsuperscript{240} Junkins had boasted to his TI handler as recently as April 5 that Hutchins, his successor as Senate Majority Leader, was “on our side” and the chances of Branstad’s “gaining ground” on his proposed cigarette tax increase were “slim...given the friends we have made.”\textsuperscript{241} Nevertheless, the dim prospects for government revenues had “forced” senators to reconsider their opposition to raising the cigarette tax. Hutchins simply said that “[w]e need some additional revenue,” while Republican Minority Leader Rife intoned: “It’s not an easy tax to raise, but we pretty much have to.”\textsuperscript{242} The import of the Iowa tax to the cigarette manufacturers can be gauged by the fact that four days later the R. J. Reynolds executives in charge of government affairs conveyed to the company’s CEO, president, and chairman, James Johnston, the tobacco firm’s Midwest regional director’s intelligence that “[d]espite a well coordinated industry effort, it now appears there will be a 3-5¢ per pack increase” in Iowa. The Senate did quickly fall in line with leadership’s decision on the five-cent increase, but the House continued to reject the cigarette tax provision while its Democratic members fended off Republicans’ efforts to drop the limit on federal tax deductibility. In the end, however, 12-hour “private negotiations among Democratic leaders” produced an agreement to raise the cigarette tax by five cents but to delete the reduction in deductibility, thus letting richer Iowans off the hook.

\textsuperscript{239} Michele Radell to Susan Stuntz, Memorandum: Subject: Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee [Receipts and Disbursements December 31, 1992] (Jan. 8, 1993), Bates No. TI14920961/83; Michele Radell to Walter Woodson, Subject: Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee (Jan. 13, 1994), Bates No. TI16360860/84, on tobaccodocuments.org (annual total of $46,000 including an additional $10,000 in April). In 1997 TILMC paid ICAN $15,000. Larry Schmitt to Bill Adams, Summary of Vendor Payments TI LMC - 1997 (Jan. 16, 1997 [should be 1998]), Bates No. TI14920829/30. As late as 1998 ICAN accepted a $10,000 donation from TILMC. Letter from Jan Laue (IFL executive vice president and ICAN board member) to Frank Hurt (president, Bakery, Confectionary, and Tobacco Workers) (Dec. 22, 1998), in Iowa Labor Collection, Iowa Federation of Labor, AFL-CIO, Records, 1894-2000, Z61, Box 24, Folder: Iowa Citizen Action Network-Correspondence and Survey, 1984, 1987, 1998, SHSI IC. Despite having been an ICAN board member from 1993 to 2006, Laue insisted that this donation, which she solicited at a time when ICAN was especially in need of funds, was the only money she was aware of that ICAN had ever received from the tobacco industry. Telephone interview with Janice Laue, Des Moines (July 24, 2007). TILMC issued the check on Sept. 16, 1998 for the purpose of “support contribution” as requested by Jim Savarese. TILMC, Check Request (Sept. 9, 1998), Bates No. TCAL0097877/8; Iowa Citizen Action Network 1998 (LMC-111) (Sept. 16, 1998), Bates No. TCAL0097875/6.

H.F. 232 began making its way through the Senate on April 11, when, by a vote of 8 to 2, Hannon’s Human Resources Committee recommended the bill’s passage. The meeting minutes contain no information concerning the committee’s discussion of H.F. 232, but TI lobbyist Wasker reported that although an attempt to remove “tobacco products” from the tax stamping of the sampling provision had failed, he had “converted committee opponents to become sponsors of a floor amendment” and did not “anticipate any problems on the floor.” Moreover, before the bill went back to the House for concurrence on this amendment, “Wasker said he will be sure House Leadership doesn’t open the bill up for any other amendments. Wasker feels confident at this point that we are in very good shape. The smokeless problem will be taken care of on the Senate floor.”

A few days later Democrat Elaine Szymoniak filed an amendment adding court costs to the penalty section of the clean indoor air act and, more importantly, modifying that statute’s preemption provision to permit cities to enact ordinances “for which a violation is a civil or criminal penalty in an amount not exceeding the amount specified in section 364.3, subsection 2, or section 364.22”—$100/30 days for a first offense and $200 for repeat offenses.

---

243 M. B. Oglesby, Jr. (executive vice president government relations) and Roger Mozingo (vice president state government relations) to J. W. Johnston (Apr. 16, 1991), Bates No. 507628075.

248 Email from Meaghan McCarthy, Archivist, SHSI DM, to Marc Linder (July 11, 2007).

Wasker faxed this amendment to TI, prophetically adding that it “may not be germane, and he’s working on it.”

After deferring consideration of the bill on April 19, the Senate finally debated H.F. 232 on May 1, when, as Wasker had predicted, Szymoniak’s weak anti-preemption amendment, challenged by Assistant Minority Leader John Jensen as being not germane, was ruled out of order. In a last-ditch effort to delete local preemption entirely from the cigarette sales act, Jean Lloyd-Jones filed a floor amendment, which failed by the very narrow margin of 23 to 24. Although the vote was not at all strictly along party lines, 15 of 26 voting Democrats but only 8 of 21 Republicans favored the amendment. What did bridge the gap between the parties, however, was the fact that of the 10 leaders and assistant leaders, only one (Republican Maggie Tinsman) supported Lloyd-Jones’s initiative. And, as always, most of the prominent heavy smokers—who included Majority Leader Hutchins and Minority Leader Rife—voted as the tobacco industry wished. As was the case with House members, RJR PAC’s 1991-92 campaign contributions to senators matched up predominantly but not completely with their votes on preemption: whereas Hutchins, Fraise, McLaren, Hagerla, Horn, and Rife, voted against deleting preemption, Democrats Boswell, Gronstal, and Kibbie voted to delete. Presumably having concluded from that vote that nothing more could be done to remove other pro-tobacco provisions, Sturgeon moved for a final vote, the near unanimity of which (45 to 2) seemed to express anti-smokers’ exhaustion. Lloyd-Jones nevertheless filed a motion to reconsider, which, despite securing 25 votes to its opponents’ 22, failed because 255 Data provided by the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board (Apr. 4, 2008).

---

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

it lacked the 26th vote required by the constitution for passage.\textsuperscript{257}

Several days before the end of the session, the House concurred in the Senate amendment and went on to pass the bill by a vote of 79 to 16. Presumably as a protest against a bill that did more to protect tobacco companies than public health, several of the chamber’s most ardent anti-smoking Democrats, including the entire greater Iowa City delegation (Minnette Doderer, Robert Dvorsky, Mary Neuhauser, and David Osterberg) as well as Rod Halvorson (but not Johnie Hammond), voted Nay. Also among the Nay-sayers were, oddly, two of tobacco’s most faithful legislators: Emil Pavich and David Schrader.\textsuperscript{258}

Once H.F. 232 had been revamped to delete the bans on sampling and vending machines as well as the repeal of preemption, it became “industry endorsed.” Branstad, on the other hand, was, as Reynolds’ Midwest regional director reported, “very unhappy with the measure, but [wa]s expected to sign it.”\textsuperscript{259} And although the governor’s spokesman termed the bill “a half-step in the right direction,” in part because “[t]obacco still does not pay its own way in terms of health costs,”\textsuperscript{260} he nevertheless signed it.\textsuperscript{261} During the four weeks between legislative passage and gubernatorial approval, TI was maintaining a low profile because its Midwest regional staff had “worked out with TI lobbyist, Chuck Wasker, a provision that is in the bill which we do not want publicized at this point because the Governor has not yet signed the bill. The provision makes it illegal to conduct sting operations.”\textsuperscript{262}

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{257}State of Iowa: 1991: Journal of the Senate: 1991: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth General Assembly 1:1635-36 (May 3). Eighteen of 28 Democrats (including two assistant leaders), but only seven of 19 Republicans voted to reconsider.
\item \textsuperscript{259}[R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.], Governor Branstad’s Anti-Tobacco Proposals (May, 8, 1991), Bates No. 507628838.
\item \textsuperscript{261}1991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, at 493.
\item \textsuperscript{262}Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa HF232 (May 8, 1991), Bates No. TI28711385. It is unclear what provision in the bill could have prohibited sting operations. H.F. 104 and H.F. 232 originally contained a provision empowering the Iowa Department of Public Health, county and city health departments, and cities to “inspect the premises of a retail permit holder for purposes of enforcing” the section prohibiting the sale of cigarettes or tobacco products to persons under 18 and the purchase of the same by the latter. H.F. 104, § 3; H.F. 232, § 3. But the House adopted an amendment offered by Teaford striking this provision. State of Iowa: 1991: Journal of the House: 1991: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth General Assembly 1:899 (Mar. 27) (H-3301).
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

As enacted, H.F. 232 included a number of notable provisions. (1) Persons under 18 were prohibited from buying, smoking, or using cigarettes or tobacco products; violations were punishable by a maximum fine of $100 or the performance of court-ordered community service. Supporters did not specify how strict local enforcement would be, but Ollie, who had offered the amendment, argued that the provision would give school officials "a strong leg to stand on by saying, "You may not do that here".... They're not going to call the police into [sic] sweep the bathrooms, but this will give strong moral authority for school district policies...." In the event, enforcement, was, for almost a decade, virtually nonexistent. Legislators were not only aware of this failure, but, according to Haverland, realizing that the 1991 amendments merely represented a "baby step," had not even expected a high level of enforcement in the short term. This minimalism resulted, on the one hand, from a desire not to close down stores and, on the other, from a very long-term incrementalist perspective of the struggle against smoking. (2) A minor was no longer permitted to buy cigarettes with a parent’s written order. (3) Instead of banning vending machine sales altogether, as the bill’s sponsors had originally intended, the law now authorized such sales subject to the lock-out mechanism, which the legislature then unanimously repealed just six years later. (4) Instead of a

2631991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, § 3, at 493.
2641991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, § 10, at 493, 495.
266See below ch. 31.
267Telephone interview with Mark Haverland, Polk, IA (June 6, 2008). In 2008 Haverland mentioned that as a legislator he had spoken of a 25-year incrementalist plan to ban smoking outright. Such a plan appears to have left no trace in the written record and if it was ever publicly articulated, it seems unlikely that it attracted any significant number of legislative adherents.
2681991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, § 3, at 493.
2691991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, § 6, at 493, 494. Despite the watered down and ineffective version that Iowa enacted, a National Public Radio reporter, when told by the IDPH government relations chief of this provision, absurdly declared: “Good heavens! You sound like sort of an armed tobacco camp to me.” Radio TV Reports, Inc., Teenage Smoking Ban in Iowa at 2, Weekend Edition (July 13, 1991), Bates No. TIMN219964/5 (Susan Stamberg interviewing Michael Coverdale).
270In 1997, after studies had revealed that underage teenagers were able to buy cigarettes from vending machines 94 percent of the time in 1994 and 79 percent of the time in 1996, both houses unanimously passed a bill (sponsored by Stewart Iverson, the legislature’s most prominent smoker, and supported by Attorney General Tom Miller),
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

total de jure ban on sampling—which for years cigarette companies had complained was “already illegal de facto [sic] in Iowa” because the law permitted sampling only in packages of four or fewer cigarettes, which “nobody makes”271—as the bill’s sponsors had originally intended, the law now authorized sampling, provided that it took place more than 500 feet away from a school or playground and was not directed at minors.272 And (5), instead of repealing—as the bill’s sponsors had intended—the preemption of local ordinances that the tobacco companies had succeeded in having inserted into the clean indoor air act in 1990, the legislature inserted the identically same preemption language into the cigarette sales law.273 Finally, the new law, like H.F. 232 itself, did not, as the governor had proposed, raise the age for buying tobacco from 18 to 21. Overall, then, the tobacco companies benefited considerably more from the amendments than the anti-smoking movement. No wonder that National Public Radio reported that the “Tobacco Institute...supports the anti-tobacco law in Iowa.”274

The close of the 1990 session marked the end point of legislative progress on the regulation and restriction of public smoking until 2008. The foregoing account of efforts to repeal local preemption in 1991 is illustrative of repeated failures over the next 17 years to achieve this elusive and important goal in a state with an increasingly anachronistically weak statewide law.275

2721991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, § 7, at 493, 494-95. In the wake of the Master Settlement Agreement, the Iowa legislature in 2000 enacted the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Partnership law, which repealed the partial sampling law and instead prohibited manufacturers, distributors, wholesalers, and retailers from giving away cigarettes or tobacco products. See below ch. 31.

2731991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, § 8, at 493, 495.

274Radio TV Reports, Inc., Teenage Smoking Ban in Iowa at 4, Weekend Edition (July 13, 1991), Bates No. TIMN219964/7. Michael Coverdale, the IDPH government relations chief, stated that the only reason for the support was the tobacco lobby’s success in “defeating another part of the legislation which would have restricted smoking in public places.”

275See below ch. 35 on the 2008 session. Even the relatively strong statewide public smoking law enacted in 2008, which struck the preemption provision, was still subject to
The Cigarette Oligopolists Celebrate Their Victory and Their Helpers

In his post-session summary, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco’s Midwest regional director, Hurst Marshall, boasted to his boss, Roger Mozingo, of all the anti-tobacco bills that had been defeated, including one to eliminate the deductibility of cigarette advertising for state tax purposes. As for the five-cent cigarette tax increase, Marshall self-congratulatorily declared: “The effort put forth by RJRT, PM and TI lobbying teams was exceptional. The RJRT grassroots program utilizing phone banks and letters had a tremendous impact leading to the defeat of a 10¢ and 5¢ increase in the House. We are disappointed in the final result but not the effort.”

That the tobacco industry lobbying juggernaut was less monolithic than some imagined was in the process of being revealed—at least to its operators. Between the time the House committee had reported the bill without amendments and the House floor vote, TI held a meeting in Des Moines that reviewed STC’s sampling amendment. Although, according to Donoho, representatives of STC and of the largest smokeless tobacco producer, United States Tobacco Company, who were present agreed to TI’s aforementioned broader amendatory strategy, the next day he “was notified that STC was pursuing an independent strategy to have their amendment adopted. They had already secured sponsors and votes for a floor fight. On a conference call, they indicated that they had the necessary votes.” Nevertheless, on the floor, TI’s amendment was adopted, whereas STC’s was not considered. This legislative conflict—one of only several that had arisen with constitutional and statutorily codified limitations of home rule because the legislature did not, in the new statute, expressly confer power on local governments to pass stronger ordinances.

---

277Donoho’s assertion was misleading in the sense that, as noted above, the legislature adopted STC’s proposal on sampling, as far as it went, verbatim; TI’s more far-reaching amendments included STC’s. On Feb. 27, 13 House members filed an amendment to H.F. 232 that would have subjected only “tobacco products” to the aforementioned 500 foot rule, leaving cigarette sampling completely banned. State of Iowa: 1991: Journal of the House: 1991: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth Regular Session 1:486 (Feb. 27), 2:2478 (H-3111, by Brown et al.). Brown, the chief sponsor withdrew the amendment after the adoption of Pavich’s sampling amendment, for which Brown and all the other 12 cosponsors voted (except one who was absent or did not vote). State of Iowa: 1991:
STC in various states—prompted Donoho, after the close of the session, to inform Malmgren in anticipation of a policy committee meeting at which R. J. Reynolds was expected to raise the issue, that it had become “very difficult to work with STC as a tobacco partner” because it failed to share its objectives and strategies and was reluctant to “operate within the TI structure...”278

TI itself singled out Democratic Representatives Dan Jay and Steve Hansen as having “worked very hard on our behalf to preserve preemption. We can anticipate their help again” in 1992 if Governor Branstad pushed to remove preemption; although at the end of 1991 it had no reason to believe that he would, lobbyists would be “very alert to covert attempts which may be made.”279

What exactly Jay and Hansen, who were close friends, running buddies, and nonsmokers, did on behalf of preemption is not clear, though Jay’s pro-tobacco voting record was solid, and their then Democratic House colleague Rod Halvorson later distinctly identified them both as prominent advocates of the tobacco industry’s positions.280 In 1987, Jay had questioned whether the pending amendments (H. F. 79) to the anti-public smoking law constituted a “legitimate role of government in light of the fact that we have restrictions already on smoking in public places. I also question whether we should dictate to business to allow or not allow smoking in their establishments.” He also asked constituents whether it would be “better to let public pressure influence the business owner to designate these areas.”281 In the event, Jay was absent or did not vote on passage of H.F. 79, but Hansen voted for it.282 Similarly, both had voted for a cigarette tax increase in 1987 when the House reconsidered its first vote, Hansen doing so despite being listed in an alert to businesses as one of nine House members it was especially important to contact immediately.283 In 1990, Jay voted for H.F. 209, while Hansen voted against it, and on its return from the 278 Patrick Donoho to Kurt Malmgren, Subject: STC Conflicts with TI (June 21, 1991), Bates No. 508121169/70/72.

---

283 See above this ch. Jay switched his voted from Nay to Yea on reconsideration.
Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

Senate, Hansen voted for it, while Jay, again, either was absent or did not vote.\textsuperscript{284} In 1991, both Jay and Hansen voted for preemption (as well as for the pro-cigarette company sampling provision), and Jay even voted against passage of H.F. 232.\textsuperscript{285} Sixteen years later, Hansen, who stated that he had always been anti-smoking, had no recollection of having worked for preemption; at best he could explain his vote by reference to requests by the hospitality industry of his Sioux City constituency and/or of individual working-class constituents\textsuperscript{286} (though the latter in fact would presumably have been indifferent to preemption as applied to the cigarette sales act as contradistinguished from the clean indoor air act). Jay, who was chairman of the House Judiciary Committee for ten years, might have been influenced by his close relationship to Bill Wimmer, Wasker’s partner and a TI lobbyist,\textsuperscript{287} but 16 years later he denied any such influence. Although he was unable to recall having worked on behalf of preemption in 1991, Jay—who observed in 2007 that, being more a “libertarian” than a Democrat in this regard, he still held the same view he had expressed in the aforementioned 1987 newspaper column to the effect that the government should not interfere with restaurant owners’ decisions as to whether to permit smoking—conceded that it was possible that he had spoken to other legislators about voting for preemption.\textsuperscript{288}

In preparation for issue awards at TI’s lobbyist meeting the next month, in August, Cathey Yoe, the legislative information director, nominated Wasker and his associate Bill Wimmer for having enacted “reasonable limits on sampling near schools and youth facilities” and “getting local preemption.”\textsuperscript{289} At a post-legislative session meeting at the ultra-posh Greenbrier resort in White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, in September 1991, Kurt Malmgren, the head of TI’s State Activities Division, in the course of a guided tour of “outstanding jobs done,” could hardly help calling attention to the feat pulled off by lobbyists (and former Democratic Farmer-Labor Party operatives Tom and Doug Kelm), who in the “major bellwether anti-tobacco state” of Minnesota “saw to it that the

\textsuperscript{286}Telephone interview with Steve Hansen, Sioux City (July 22, 2007).

\textsuperscript{287}Information provided by two of Jay’s ex-House Democratic colleagues, who did not want to be identified.

\textsuperscript{288}Telephone interview with Dan Jay, Centerville/Moulton IA (July 23, 2007).

\textsuperscript{289}Cathey Yoe to Walter Woodson, Memorandum Re: Lobbyist Awards (Aug. 13, 1991), Bates No. TIOK0030221.
governor vetoed a 7-cent cigarette tax that...was earmarked to subsidize uninsured health care...a mom and apple pie issue if there ever was one.” Manifestly unembarrassed by the disease and death that he, his regional employees, and lobbyists were facilitating, Malmgren proceeded to bemoan that during the previous year it had been—and presumably would in the foreseeable future remain—almost impossible to avoid reading about young people and tobacco, tobacco vending, advertising, and sampling. (The most intriguing event involving young people and tobacco sales in 1991 was the settling out of court of an unprecedented suit against a convenience store chain by two teenagers who claimed that as a result of the illegal sales they became addicted to nicotine.) Malmgren went on to congratulate those who had “found ways to turn the issue to our advantage”:

On sampling, Iowa’s Chuck Wasker and his associate Bill Wimmer worked to change existing law which...had the effect of banning sampling. They managed this by working for the enactment of reasonable limits on sampling near schools and centers of youth activities.

At the same time, Chuck was able to get pre-emption of local sampling bans in Iowa. As most of you know, when we can shut down the localities, we’ve won a major victory. Finally, he did this while successfully minimizing a nasty tax increase.

Tobacco Industry Money in the Iowa Legislature

International tobacco companies have taken an interest in the relatively small stakes of Iowa politics.

---

291[Kurt Malmgren], Greenbrier Meeting KLM Notes: Summary of Key Legislation in 1991 and Outstanding Jobs Done at 7-8 (Sept. 15, 1991), Bates No. TI25400640/6-7.

292Alix Freedman, “Chain to Enforce Ban on Minors Buying Tobacco,” WSJ, June 18, 1991 (B1, B7), Bates No. TITX0035846; Advocacy Institute, Smoking Control Advocacy Resource Center (SCARC), Action Alert, “Issue: Kyte Liability Case Settled Out of Court” (July 1, 1991), Bates No. TIMN374680.

293[Kurt Malmgren], Greenbrier Meeting KLM Notes: Summary of Key Legislation in 1991 and Outstanding Jobs Done at 7-8 (Sept. 15, 1991), Bates No. TI25400640/6-7.

294[Kurt Malmgren], Greenbrier Meeting KLM Notes: Summary of Key Legislation in 1991 and Outstanding Jobs Done at 8-9 (Sept. 15, 1991), Bates No. TI25400640/6-7.

In his very influential (but scantily documented) book on the cigarette industry, Richard Kluger advanced the thesis that nationally the corporations’ political power rested centrally on money. He linked this unexceptionable argument, however, to the further claim that Philip Morris, by far the largest producer, had displaced the Tobacco Institute as the motor and brain determining the “shape, pace, and locus of the industry’s lobbying operations”; indeed, Kluger asserted that its lobbying operations were “almost certainly far larger than the Tobacco Institute’s.” Whatever the accuracy of these contenions elsewhere, they do not fit the industry’s efforts to influence the legislative process in Iowa, where Philip Morris did not even employ a lobbyist until Republican Senate Minority Leader Calvin Hultman retired in 1990 and the Tobacco Institute clearly orchestrated lobbying overall. More relevant to Iowa was Kluger’s information that PAC contributions to individual legislators’ campaigns “were only the most visible ploys,” with entertainment, consulting fees, honoraria for talks, and “gifts to charities designated by targeted lawmakers” representing other methods of gaining access. Applicable as well to Iowa was Kluger’s finding that “[t]he key to purchasing influence at the state level was personal friendships.”

Whatever successes tobacco companies achieved during the 1991-92 legislative sessions do not appear to have hinged crucially on large amounts of money given directly, publicly, and lawfully to legislators. For example, data no longer extant revealed that for 1991 no tobacco industry political action committee was even among the top 59 according to amounts given to legislators. Similarly, at an event held on March 12, 1991 for the Truman Fund of the Democratic Party that raised more than $29,000 to be distributed to Democratic candidates, Philip Morris PAC contributed only $500 (earmarked for the Senate, which had always been the easier house for the industry to control). Neither the RJR Tobacco-PAC nor the Tobacco Institute-PAC was listed as donating any money. Interestingly, George Wilson, the lobbyist for the Iowa Association of Tobacco Distributors contributed the same amount (also earmarked for the Senate).

The answer to the seeming conundrum may simply be as Don Avenson, the powerful Democratic House Speaker during the 1980s, put it tersely when asked whether tobacco companies handed out money to secure votes in Iowa: “They didn’t. We all smoked.”

---

299 Truman Fund Event (March 12, 1991), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 7, Folder: Campaign, 1992: Finances: Contributions (folder 1), IWA.

Although this answer was always something of an exaggeration (though much less so in the Senate than in the House) and became more so as smoking prevalence declined even among legislators, it may well go a long way toward explaining why paying off members to vote for the tobacco industry was, for a time at least, about as necessary as carrying coals to Newcastle. In addition, although the connection was not understood at the time, it became an (unsubstantiated) commonplace among Democratic lobbyists and legislators that Iowans for Tax Relief, a right-wing anti-tax organization founded in the 1970s by former legislator David Stanley, was funded in part by the tobacco industry—which always and everywhere opposed excise taxes on cigarettes—in whose interest the organization’s Taxpayers United PAC then disbursed contributions to appropriate legislators.

Perhaps even more importantly, Iowans for Tax Relief devoted funds to polling and staffing on behalf of Republican candidates that was not reported as linked to particular candidates. In fact, although no online tobacco industry documents were identified for earlier years, in 1995 the Tobacco Institute donated $20,000 to Iowans for Tax Relief and in 1999 Philip Morris contributed $40,000 under its “public policy program” to Iowans for Tax Relief (Tax Education Foundation).

Whether much of the organization in fact directly supported pro-tobacco legislators is less clear. In 1991, one year for which data from now destroyed documents are extant, Taxpayers United was the leading giver in Iowa, but none of the $6,500 it contributed that year went to prominent tobacco industry supporters. The previous year, however, Taxpayers United made nine contributions totaling $3,000 to Jack Rife, the heavy-smoking opponent of smoking regulation, and in 1992 he received $9,000 from Taxpayers United to 300 Telephone interview with Don Avenson, Oelwein (July 12, 2007).

---

301 Telephone interviews in 2007 and 2008 with two former Democratic legislators who did not wish to be identified. When told about these payments, ex-Democratic House Minority Leader Richard Myers said of the Truman Fund: “We were performing a money laundering function.” Telephone interview with Richard Myers, Iowa City (May 8, 2008).
302 Email from a former Democratic legislator who demanded anonymity (2007).
304 [Philip Morris], 1999 Public Policy Contributions, Check No. 21073, Bates No. 2065282083/6.
305 “Political Contributions,” DMR, Apr. 5, 1992 (8A:5). The only (marginally) larger giver was a PAC formed by two legislators.
307 Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 8, Folder: Campaign, 1992, Rife, Jack (Opponent), General, IWA. help defeat anti-smoking militant Beverly Hannon.\textsuperscript{308}

Other Iowa legislators argue that money per se was not the fulcrum for leveraging votes.\textsuperscript{309} Rather, “relationships” with lobbyists, carefully cultivated over a long period of time, were the crucial element, though, to be sure, often those relationships were sustained over large numbers of lavish meals paid for lobbyists or their principals. For example, TI’s lobbyists Charles Wasker and William Wimmer were well known as good entertainers.\textsuperscript{310} The “favors” that lobbyists requested from legislators (who had either no views on the matters in question or no principles) in the form of votes could be treated as a quid pro quo for their friendship in general or, more specifically, for the mentorship that very experienced tobacco lobbyists like Wilson, Wasker, and Wimmer could offer to legislators, most of whom knew less about the intricacies and tricks of the trade of passing bills than they did.\textsuperscript{311}

By 1991-92 public opinion was becoming increasingly critical of the unbridled lobbying system. A long piece in the Des Moines Register during the 1992 session gave expression to this repugnance:

It seems to be working well, at least for the participants. Legislators get fat donations and lobbyists get pretty much what they want.

“There’s been a strong feeling in the last few years that lobbyists have called the shots on what the Legislature will debate or won’t debate,” says George Kinley, D-Des Moines, a 22-year veteran of the General Assembly.

Speaking of the tens of thousands of dollars PACs and lobbyists inject into the campaign accounts of key legislators such as Bill Hutchins, the Senate democratic leader, Kinley says: “You can’t raise that kind of money unless they’re getting something in return.”\textsuperscript{312}

\textsuperscript{308}Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (July 14, 2007). Although Hannon stated in her papers that Rife received $9,000 from one PAC, she did not identify it.

\textsuperscript{309}Telephone interviews with John Patchett (Feb. 2007).

\textsuperscript{310}Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 7 and 8, 2007). Wasker’s firm’s contract with TI specified that the retainer covered all entertainment expenses. Samuel Chilcote, Jr. to Charles Wasker, Letter Agreement (Dec. 10, 1993), Bates No. TI15811209-10, on tobaccodocuments.org. According to a former legislator and lobbyist who demanded anonymity, $44,000 was “pretty good money” in 1992; since Wasker had many clients, if he spent some of his fee from each client on entertainment “he still did well.” Email to Marc Linder (Aug. 15, 2007).

\textsuperscript{311}Telephone interview with former legislator/lobbyist who demanded anonymity (2007).

Enactment of What Tobacco Industry Claimed Was Preemption of Local Ordinances

A few days later, former state senator Steve Sovern called PAC money—amounting to almost $128,000, $41,000 of which was given to only 10 leaders—"'unconscionable legal bribery....'"\textsuperscript{311}

The 1992 Session:
The Cigarette Companies’ Lobbying Juggernaut Fails to Pass a Bill Prohibiting Employers from Discriminating Against Smokers

Oppose a “smoker’s rights bill” or “smokers discrimination bill” introduced by the tobacco lobby. In 1990, the Tobacco Institute introduced legislation in several states designed to prevent employers from making hiring, promotion or firing decisions based on whether an applicant or employee smokes. Indications are that similar legislation will be introduced in other states in 1991.¹

Preliminary Skirmishes at the 1992 Session

The 1992 Iowa legislative session, as the Tobacco Institute predicted, did not witness an attempt by Governor Branstad to push for repeal of local preemption.² The only preemption-related bill, filed by Senator Szymoniak and six other Democrats, would, without repealing the 1990 preemption provision, have permitted cities to pass ordinances concerning smoking in public places, violation of which would have been a civil or criminal penalty not exceeding 25 dollars.³ The Senate Local Government Committee recommended passage, by a vote of six to four, but only after having severely diluted it to authorize enactment of local ordinances merely “concerning smoking in airport facilities, skywalks, or both”—a marginalization that apparently still constituted too much local intrusion for the four dissenters (three Republicans and heavy-smoking Democrat Florence Buhr).⁴ Szymoniak presented the weakening amendment, which presumably was ¹Carol Sipfle, American Lung Association of Iowa, to Tobacco Free Coalition, Subject: Legislative Priorities - 1991 (July 30, 1990) (copy in Folder: “Tobacco 1999 -”, Johnson County Department of Public Health, Iowa City.

⁴State of Iowa: 1992: Journal of the Senate: 1992: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth General Assembly 1:609, 2:1992 (Mar. 4) (S-5132). In 1993, the Des Moines City Council passed an ordinance prohibiting anyone from engaging in activities at the airport in disregard of signs promulgated by the airport director or from refusing to comply with a lawful order of the police at the airport. City of Des Moines City Council passed an ordinance prohibiting anyone from engaging in activities at the airport in disregard of signs promulgated by the airport director or from refusing to comply with a lawful order of the police at the airport. City of Des Moines City Council, Ordinance No. 11,958, §§ 4-6.01 and 4-6.02 (Mar. 22, 1993), Bates No. T128922797. TI lobbyist Charles Wasker opined that whereas the city council was in compliance with state supported by a clarification by Des Moines City Attorney Roger Nowadzky, who had had experience with enforcing the nosmoking ban in the capital’s skywalks. Even in this watered-down version, Majority Leader Bill Hutchins secured unanimous consent to rerefer the bill to committee, which reassigned it to Szymoniak’s subcommittee, which once again recommended passage; after re-referral to the committee, the measure expired.
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

In a rare manifestation of bad conscience, the Tobacco Institute worried as the new session loomed about “[a]nother potential challenge that faces us,” which “depends on the personal agenda of Rep. Minnette Doderer (D-Iowa City). She is very bitter about the recent death of her husband who died of cancer. Industry lobbyists all agree she is very tough, hardworking and highly regarded. If she launches a crusade against us, she will be a formidable opponent.” The cigarette companies’ analysts neglected to specify that a fund for the prevention of smoking had been established in the name of Doderer’s husband, a former Iowa City mayor, a smoker who had died of lung cancer at 71. But Doderer, a self-preemption, the airport authority had violated the statute by banning smoking by changing the signs. Wasker and his partner Wimmer, according to the head of TI’s Midwest region, Al Shofe, were requesting permission to seek an injunction or writ of mandamus to compel compliance. Shofe observed that the “ordinance is very interesting since they have figured out a way to get around preemption. It would be interesting to see if similar work is surfacing in states where we have preemption.” Al Shofe to Pat Donoho, Subject: City of Des Moines, Iowa (July 6, 1993), Bates No. TI28922796. Shofe was apparently unaware that the city had used the same procedure in the skywalks in 1990; presumably the intent of the second effort, like that of the first, was to enable the city to enforce the ban more effectively than the statewide law permitted. See above ch. 27. The airport announced in May 1993 that it would become nosmoking as soon as the signs were put up. “News and Notes,” DMR, May 2, 1993, Bates No. TI28922798. According to the city attorney who represented the airport, no such suit was filed. Telephone interview with Kathleen Vanderpool, Des Moines (Aug. 3, 2007). The two ordinance provisions are still in effect. Municipal Code of the City of Des Moines, Iowa, §§ 22-7 and 22-8 (2000), on http://www.municode.com/resources/gateway.asp?pid=13242&sid=15.

6See above ch. 27.

9Charles Bullard, “Former Iowa City Mayor Fred Doderer, 71, Dies,” DMR, July 6, 1991 (9) (NewsBank). In 1994 Doderer decided to close the account for her husband’s professed sometime smoker, who had never in her long career been one of the legislature’s most militant’s antismokers, found many other important social and economic issues on behalf of which to advocate in the House in 1992. Although she was indeed very angry about her husband’s death, according to her daughter, she never “took on” the tobacco industry because her own heavy (albeit intermittent) smoking meant that she lacked the “clean hands” necessary for such a battle.11
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

Even in the absence of a threat by Doderer, Lowell Junkins, styling himself and his associates “Public Affairs Consultants,” reported to his Tobacco Institute handler, Susan Stuntz, as early as September 1991, that “we have no reason to doubt” that Governor Branstad would “look[ ] to the cigarette tax as a funding vehicle....” Indeed, “[k]nowing” that an increase was a “likely outcome” of the deliberations of the governor’s task force on spending, Junkins had been meeting regularly during the summer with ICAN, the new House Speaker Bob Arnould, and the industry’s ever reliable Senate Majority Leader Hutchins “to solidify our coalition in the General Assembly on the progressive tax message,” to which leadership had “reiterated its commitment....”12 Later that fall, with Branstad “still angry” that the legislature had conceded him only half of the 10-cent cigarette tax increase he had called for in 1991, TI foresaw the ongoing need to deal with this perennial issue: its analysis regarded it as “not...unreasonable” for the governor to request a 25-cent increase and settle for something less. In the event, the tobacco industry was confident that it could continue to rely on the “[e]fforts by the Iowa Citizens [sic] Action Network (ICAN) and other labor groups [which] during the non-session months have been very helpful in laying the ground work for grassroots activity against any new regressive taxes.” And, again, as always, with pro-tobacco legislators in leadership: “Our best defense will be to defeat tax measure in the Senate.” If the legislature debated the issue, TI’s Midwest regional staff reminded headquarters that “[d]uring the 1991 tax battle, TI spent about $25,000 on phone banks,” but added that: “We may be able to just as effectively reach targeted areas by subsidizing retail associations and

---

10 Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 8, 2007).
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

wholesaler organizations for specific efforts. Region IV believes this may be...considerably cheaper." Once the session was underway, the head of Region IV informed her boss that in the welter of ethics scandals roiling the legislature, the “Governor still wants a dime,” and a bill was filed in the House to raise the tax by 10 cents to 46 cents, but the chamber took no action on it. Efforts were also made in both houses in February to amend the budget bill (S.F. 2116) to include a cigarette tax increase, but they failed by large margins. And the initiative was similarly unsuccessful during the special session.

The Tobacco Industry’s Nationwide Drive to Outlaw Employment Discrimination against our customers

“While these measures may have an intuitive grasp of fairness, in practice it’s a respiratory apartheid.”

The second session of the biennium was, however, the scene of a major, but unsuccessful, effort by the cigarette companies to replicate their success in other states by securing enactment of a law prohibiting employers from discriminating against employees who smoked. Nationally the tobacco industry, “in a series of titanic lobbying struggles,” had, with the help of labor unions and civil 14Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Subject: Assessment about Iowa (Jan. 31, 1992), Bates No. TI28710967.

15H.F. 2087 (Jan. 23, 1992, by Hanson et al.)
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

liberties groups, secured enactment of such laws in about half of the states just since 1989. The cigarette manufacturers’ counter-campaign was a response to the fact that during a period of less than 10 years thousands of companies had begun to act on the available economic data—showing, for example, that smokers could cost firms as much as $5,000 more in insurance premiums annually—by prohibiting employees from smoking on or off the job. In addition to reducing the annual direct cost of more than $20 billion for providing health care to those with smoking-related diseases, not hiring smokers improved workplace safety conditions, reduced absenteeism, and “minimize[d] the need to train new employees to replace those who retire early because of lung cancer, emphysema and other diseases related to smoking.” Illustratively, in announcing that it would no longer hire people who smoked cigarettes, management of the Lockheed Aeronautical Systems Company plant in Marietta, Georgia stressed that almost 77 percent of the workers there with cardiac problems smoked.

In 1992 the Tobacco Institute in detail described its profit-preserving strategy as a veritable human and labor rights initiative:

Since the late 1980’s, the tobacco industry has gone beyond simply opposing legislation hostile to the rights of smokers, to promoting affirmative legislation to protect its consumers from anti-tobacco attacks. Depending on the language, employment discrimination legislation provides protection in the workplace from hiring, firing or promotion discrimination because of smoking, drinking or other legal activities engaged in outside the workplace.

Employment privacy legislation responds to the recent increase in discriminatory workplace policies directed against employees and prospective employees who smoke. These actions include refusal to hire smokers, and disciplining or discharging those who smoke during off duty hours. A growing number of states and localities have adopted legislation or enacted policies discriminating against public safety employees who smoke. Some employers have gone so far as to subject employees to polygraph tests and urinalysis to ensure that they do not smoke on their own time.

To counteract these public and private policies, legislation has been proposed to protect smokers from employment discrimination. In some states, the issue has expanded beyond the protection of the smoker’s right to smoke off the job. Anti-discrimination legislation can also protect an employee’s right to have an occasional drink after work, to engage in risky sporting events, to participate in unions, or to publicly advocate political stances. In broad terms, anti-discrimination language can protect an individual’s right to make private lifestyle choices.

Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

The first employment privacy bill was adopted by Virginia in 1989. The law prohibits local governments from requiring an applicant or employee “to abstain from smoking or using tobacco products outside the course of his employment.” Police and firefighters are exempt from the provision.

By mid-1992, privacy laws had been adopted in more than half the states. While the laws differ in language, their intent is similar—to protect against employment discrimination. The Oregon law prohibits employers from requiring employees to refrain from smoking off the job except when the restriction relates to “a bona fide occupational requirement” or if off-duty smoking is prohibited by collective bargaining agreement. Colorado, however, enacted a law that prohibits unfair employment practices due to an employee’s “engaging in any lawful activity off the premises of the employer during nonworking hours.” The Illinois law protects an employee’s right to use lawful products off the job.

Legislation commonly includes language similar to Oregon’s exemption for bona fide occupational requirements. Occasionally, legislation has included an allowance for employers to offer health or life insurance policies which make distinctions in coverage or cost based on an employee’s off the job use of tobacco, or other lawful products or activities.

Advocates who support equal rights in employment practices include the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), various organized labor unions, tobacco distributors, manufacturers and wholesalers and many government and private sector employers. Privacy has become a bipartisan issue, with Democratic and Republican Governors approving an almost equal number of laws, as well as one Independent Governor.

Those who oppose such legislation include Action on Smoking and Health (ASH), Americans for Nonsmokers Rights, Coalition on Smoking OR Health and Group Against Smokers’ Pollution (GASP). In some cases, business employers may object to legislation that they consider to be written too broadly.

The industry has served as the catalyst for this type of legislation, aiding other proponents in supporting adoption of legislation. The industry will continue to work diligently to see that all states adopt employment discrimination legislation, as well as other legislation to protect the legal rights of its customers.

Legislation to end these unfair and discriminatory practices is warranted. First, discriminating against smokers disproportionately harms the employment opportunities of minorities, who smoke in larger numbers. Second, discrimination—particularly when the result of unilateral action by an employer—can undermine employee collective bargaining rights. Third, such discrimination is inconsistent with the fundamental values of equal protection.

---

23The Tobacco Institute, State Activities Division, Issue Briefs (Aug. 1992), Bates No. 2023959421/33-4.
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

The Early Twentieth-Century Movement Among Employers to Refuse to Hire Cigarette Smokers

Again the cigaret is given a black eye. The Dutch Superior Traction company has issued a manifesto that it does not employ users of the coffin stick and 25 employes have been discharged for smoking them. This is a lesson more valuable than half a hundred legislative enactments against the pestilent habit.24

WANTED—Intelligent, well dressed single man to travel on road as collector. Permanent position. Chance for advancement. No drinkers or cigarette smokers need apply.25

Expert repair man wanted. Good pay and steady work. Cigarette smokers need not apply.26

The end of the twentieth century was by no means witnessing the first effort by cigarette manufacturers to deter employers from discriminating against consumers of their commodities (and other kinds of tobacco). The later drive was directed at passing legislation prohibiting discriminatory employment decisions, whereas at the turn of the century the Cigarette Trust had turned its attention directly to nipping in the bud the burgeoning trend in the work world to fire/refuse to hire cigarette smokers. In this sense, the earlier opposition resembled late-twentieth-century attempts by cigarette companies to use and threaten boycotts to force companies that had banned smoking among their employees and customers or even to sell nicotine-containing gum to aid would-be quitters to drop those practices.27 In both instances, to be sure, the later cigarette manufacturers undertook incomparably more concerted, widespread, and better-financed operations.

Employers’ initiatives to prohibit cigarette smoking by their employees began gaining momentum at the very end of 1899 when, as The New York Times reported, the Southern Railway issued a general order and “ironclad rule” applying only to its South Carolina division that all employees had to stop using cigarettes or resign and that in the future the company would not employ anyone smoking them.\(^{28}\) Although the newspaper published a correction to the effect that a special ban on cigarettes was unnecessary because a general rule prohibited all smoking while on duty,\(^{29}\) a flurry of press reports at the outset of the new century revealed that workplace-related anti-cigarette policies were a reality, proliferating especially in Chicago business offices. In addition to prohibiting cigarettes during working hours, some also suggested that it “would be better for employees not to be seen smoking cigarettes out of hours.” While Montgomery Ward “refused to employ boys addicted to cigarette smoking,” Marshall Field gave employees bimonthly lectures on the subject. Whereas the Board of Education based its ban on odor, other employers argued that cigarettes destroyed discipline in addition to wasting time. Significantly, downtown business in Chicago not only admitted Anti-Cigaret League lecturers, but sent their “boys” to the League’s monthly meetings.\(^{30}\) The salient point from employers’ perspective was that cigarette smoking was so “incompatible with efficient service”\(^{31}\) that users were “only useful in standing at the foot of the stairs.”\(^{32}\)

26DMDN, Oct. 24, 1917 (9:1).

2827
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

This “growing conviction among business-men and employers that the inhaling of cigarette smoke is physically and intellectually injurious,” which was prompting many in Chicago toward the end of March and beginning of April 1900 to discourage or prohibit their employees from smoking cigarettes,\(^{33}\) should be viewed in the context of a decision issued by the Illinois Supreme Court on April 9 sustaining the constitutionality of a Chicago ordinance imposing a $100 license fee on all cigarette dealers.\(^{34}\) The ruling thwarted a multi-year legal challenge by the Tobacco Trust, which regarded the ordinance as causing “a falling off in its income and a precedent which they [sic] they feared other cities

\(^{28}\)“An Anti-Cigarette Order,” \textit{NYT}, Dec. 13, 1899 (5). See also [Untitled], \textit{WNC}, Dec. 16, 1899 (4:3) (expressing puzzlement over the railway’s “sudden moral spasm”).

\(^{30}\)“Shut Out the Cigaret,” \textit{CT}, Mar. 27, 1900 (16).

\(^{31}\)“Put a Ban on Cigarets,” \textit{CT}, Apr. 9, 1900 (2).

\(^{32}\)\textit{Boone Standard} (Iowa), Mar. 31, 1900 (3:4) (untitled).

\(^{33}\)“Cigaret Ordinance Valid,” \textit{CT}, Apr. 11, 1900 (12) (edit.).

\(^{34}\)Gundling v Chicago, 177 US 183 (1900).
and towns might follow.”

By April 1900, prohibitions at Chicago firms, including the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad, affected 1,100 employees, 80 percent of whom were boys under 18, 600 of whom had previously smoked. In addition to the aforementioned lowered efficiency, demoralization, nervousness, and stunted mental acuity, the reasons for the ban assigned by employers included the annoyance for customers and non-using employees of the nicotine smell on employees’ breath. Montgomery Ward, which impressed upon the boys that the ban was prompted by their own and not the company’s interest, did not shy away from special efforts required to see to it that the ban was observed outside of working hours.

A turning point in the movement toward the imposition of bans was the decision in mid-1900 of the Rock Island Railroad to implement the policy, which intrigued other Chicago-based railroads that did not permit smoking in their offices, and impelled the Anti-Cigarette League to induce other roads to adopt it. Denying that “any puritanical motives” were involved, the Rock Island management in refusing to hire anyone “who is addicted to cigarettes,” which were “thus placed on a par with whisky,” gave employees the choice between quitting cigarettes and their employment; cigarette smokers’ applications would be “consigned to the waste basket” and the applicants, no matter how proficient they might be in railroading, would not be able to “break into the Rock Island’s service with a crowbar.” The railroad’s president, Warren G. Purdy, charged that cigarette smoking was a “vicious habit” that tended to “befog the mind and make one listless and careless...sleepy and of no account...irresponsible and lazy.” The initiative in this matter had been taken by the general superintendent, A. J. Hitt, who allegedly had devised it “after a long study of the effect of the weed upon the human system, augmented, of course, by the judgment of the most eminent physicians in declaring the cigaret to be injurious.” This story, however, was incompatible with the further account that some weeks earlier, while Hitt had been investigating an worker’s actions in an unidentified matter, he overheard two other employees censuring the worker as a “confirmed cigaret fiend,” whose smoking had been “the fault of the whole business....” Astonishingly, based, apparently, on this one case, Hitt and two superintendents, after discussing the 35. To Combat Cigaret Tax,” CT, Oct. 21, 1897 (12). See also above ch. 6.

---

36. Put a Ban on Cigaretts,” CT, Apr. 9, 1900 (2).
37. Asks Ban from All Roads,” CT, July 4, 1900 (8).
39. Cigarets Put Under a Ban,” CT, July 8, 1900 (43).
issue for a week, ordered the embargo. Convinced, based on his own observations and the aforementioned doctors’ opinions, that without any doubt the cigarette “‘unfits a man in a measure for work’”—after all, a “‘person addicted to the habit always has a languid feeling that is markedly evidenced in the drooping eye and the nervous body’”—Hitt ventured the prediction that if all the railroads in North America followed the Rock Island, “‘the cigaret habit will no doubt receive a death blow.’”

A confirmation of this death sentence appeared in an editorial in the Chicago Tribune on August 3, the day after the paper had reported that, pushed by Lucy Page Gaston’s Anti-Cigaret League, which had been holding meetings in the Stock-Yards district, August Swift & Company had announced that it too would no longer employ cigarette smokers. Bracketing the whole health issue, the editorial explained that cigarette smokers’ severe handicap in business could no longer be overlooked. And regardless of whether it was well founded or not, many businessmen had come to feel that a cigarette smoker was not a desirable person to “have around the shop” or the office. Many of the largest firms in the city make it a fixed and immovable rule not to employ cigaret smokers in any capacity. On...almost every day another business house falls into line with this policy. ... Other things being equal it is almost universally true that of two men, one of whom uses cigarettes while the other does not, the latter will be preferred in a business house or even in a factory.

The wise cigaret smoker will face the facts as they exist and not waste his time...trying to persuade people that cigarettes are harmless. He will make up his mind whether his ruling ambition is to succeed in business or to smoke cigarettes.... Business-men have apparently made up their minds that they do not want cigaret smokers in responsible positions and business-men are too busy...to listen to arguments on the subject. It is a condition and not a theory which confronts the man who is wedded to the cigaret.

Heady with success and confident of an avalanche of large businesses following suit, Gaston took the remarkable step of interviewing the heads of Bradstreet’s and R. G. Dun to induce them to add to the questions (about their habits) they posed to businessmen seeking commercial ratings whether they used cigarettes.

On August 7, 1900, shortly after the Rock Island had implemented its ban and 41“Cigaretts Put Under a Ban,” CT, July 8, 1900 (43).

---

43“The Cigaret Smoker’s Handicap,” CT, Aug. 3, 1900 (6) (edit.).
44“Anti-Cigaret League Pushing Its Crusade Among Chicago Firms,” CT, Aug. 5, 1900 (13). the snowballing impact in the business world was becoming so undeniable that the Cigarette Trust seemed on the verge of monopolizing a commodity for which solvent demand capable of valorizing its capital would soon disappear, J. B. Duke himself, the president of the American Tobacco Company, wrote a letter to Purdy, appealing to a sense of intercapitalist solidarity while urging him to back off:

Through the kindness of Mr. A. R. Flower, and Mr. Anthony N. Brady, one of our directors, I have been shown a letter written by you on the 28th ultimo to Mr. Flower, relative to the order recently made by your road, forbidding the use by your employees of cigarettes.

I realize that the newspapers have made more of this order than was intended by its own scope, and I realize further that the executive officers of your road have the right to make such regulations as they see fit for their employees, without having their motives or judgment questioned by any one.

But the Company with which I am connected is engaged very largely in the manufacture of cigarettes; a very substantial portion of its profits comes from the sale of cigarettes, and a very substantial portion of its investment is in plants for the manufacture of cigarettes. In this company is invested the means of a great many individuals...who are identified with your road, and perhaps otherwise with you in business. These investments would be made less profitable, and less secure, by the diminution of the cigarette business.

On account of these things, and on account of my decided and earnest, and I believe, intelligent conviction that cigarette smoking is no more injurious than smoking in any other form, I am taking the liberty of writing to you...and am sending you...a pamphlet..."The Truth about Cigarettes," which contains the result of scientific investigation, which Pamphlet I respectfully ask you to read. The statements of these scientific authorities are undoubtedly genuine, and the character of those quoted is as such to make impossible the belief that these statements have been secured by any improper method.

Anson R. Flower, brother of ex-New York Governor Roswell Flower—who was also a financier and leader of the New York Stock Exchange who had invested heavily in the Rock Island Railroad—became a director after his brother’s death. Anson Flower was linked to Anthony N. Brady through their investments in the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company. “Roswell P. Flower Dies Suddenly, NYT, May 13, 1899 (1); “Sensational Drop in Flower Stocks,” NYT, May 14, 1899 (1); “Rock Island RR Directors,” NYT, June 8, 1899 (8); “Brooklyn Rapid Transit,” NYT, Jan. 27, 1900 (5). In 1900 Flower & Co. also owned 1,950 shares of common stock in the American Tobacco Co. United States v

Brady, an immensely wealthy capitalist, was by 1906 the largest shareholder of the American Tobacco Company and, qua director, a defendant in the antitrust suit that led to the trust’s break-up. Report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the Tobacco Industry, Part 1, tab. 18 at 202 (1909); “Anthony N. Brady Dead,” NYT, July 23, 1913 (1);
“A. N. Brady as a Financier,” NYT, July 24, 1913 (7); “Brady’s Fortune May Be $100,000,000,” NYT, Aug. 6, 1913 (7).
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

Now this Company has no disposition to take notice of the attacks made on cigarettes made by irresponsible agitators, or professional so-called reformers, but we are concerned when an attack is made on the products of our Company by a prominent and large business corporation, such as yours. We feel, and I personally feel, that to discriminate against cigarettes as opposed to other forms of tobacco is entirely unjust, and would not have been made if you had the information which I hope you will derive from the pamphlet.... Just as a manufacturer of cream of tartar baking powder would have ground for complaint if you issued an order condemning its use, and leaving your employees free to use alum baking powder; or just as a producer of coffee, if you permitted the use of tea and forbade the use of coffee, so, and in the same way, and to the same extent, I think we, manufacturers of cigarettes, are authorized to ask you to consider the facts in favor of, as well as against, cigarettes, before putting them under a ban, under which other tobacco products are not put.

I will esteem it a favor if you will...conclude...whether it is wise and just for your Company to thus attack the business of another company.

I will appreciate a reply to this letter, and if you think that a conference with some representatives of our Company would probably lead to a clarification of the order which you have made, or if you desire additional information, I will arrange such.\footnote{Letter from J. B. Duke to W. C. [sic] Purdy (Aug. 7, 1900), in JBDP, Box 5, Correspondence, Letterbook (1894, July 31-1904, Oct. 10), RBMSCL (the text was transcribed by Rodney Clare from a handwritten copy too faint to photocopy). The tenor of the pamphlet that Duke sent can be gauged by the opening salvo by W. H. Garrison, Esq., who launched the discussion before the Medico-Legal Society that resulted in the pamphlet. He alleged that a petition to Congress in 1892 to impose a tax on cigarettes designed to encourage manufacturers to abandon production as well as statutes in Iowa and Tennessee banning their sale were based on “‘popular prejudice.’ Absolutely that and nothing more.” A petition to tax tomatoes was “nearly analogous [sic] to that of the cigarette.” W. H. Garrison, “A Brief for the Cigarette,” Medico-Legal Journal 15:280-91 at 281 (Dec. 1897). Garrison also claimed that the “inhalation question was disposed of” by an 1882 (unidentified) article in Lancet stating that “the inhaled smoke rarely passes beyond the bronchi,” and if any did enter air vesicles, it “must be a very small quantity” because it would be “nearly immediately expelled,” leaving no time for diffusion. \emph{Id.} at 288. A response to another lawyer’s request for comments on Garrison’s paper by Dr. Harold Moyer, a professor at Rush Medical College in Chicago, provided what was perhaps the only comment that would withstand scientific scrutiny more than a century later: attacking Garrison’s claim that smoke at most reached only the larynx and larger bronchi, he observed that “the very mildness of the cigarette brings about one of its chiefest dangers.... The majority of cigarette smokers...inhale deeply, and consequently there may be a much greater absorption of nicotine....” Clark Bell, “The Cigarette: Does It Contain Any Ingredient Other Than Tobacco and Paper? Does It Cause Insanity?” Medico-Legal Journal 15:443-85 at 457 (Mar. 1898). These quotations and the rest of the two articles were republished in \emph{The Truth About Cigarettes: Papers Read and Discussed by the Medico-Legal Society of N.Y.} (n.d.), which is unpaginated. See also above ch. 2.}
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

In spite of Duke’s intervention, employment-based cigarette bans continued to proliferate, taking root on the New York Central and Pennsylvania Railroads as well as at Macy’s, Wanamaker’s, and other big department stores and smaller institutions in New York. By 1906, the Iowa Board of Health reported that alone in Detroit 69 merchants had agreed not to employ cigarette smokers, while numerous railroads, including the New York, New Haven, and Hartford, had ordered employees not to smoke while on duty. Emblematic of an increasingly widespread attitude was the statement by E. H. Harriman, the head of the Union Pacific Railroad, that his company “might as well go to a lunatic asylum for their employees as to hire cigarette smokers.” When the Brotherhood of Engineers and Firemen in 1906 opposed an order by the Norfolk & Western Railroad prohibiting employees from smoking cigarettes on the grounds that it affected their “personal liberty,” one newspaper deemed the argument as inapt as one resisting a ban on entrusting a railroad engine to a man who drank. As late as 1910 the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fe Railroad joined the ranks of those refusing to employ cigarette smokers. (It is a desideratum of research to trace where, when, how, and why such workplace (cigarette) smoking bans later fell into desuetude or were abolished before being reimplemented in the late twentieth century as a result of scientific discoveries concerning the health impacts of secondhand tobacco smoke exposure and of an ever more militant anti-smoking movement.) Yet in spite of these disruptions by employers, which expressed, 48Duke’s papers include no reply from Purdy or similar letter from Duke to other railroad or other company presidents.

---

49“Iowa Press Comment,” DDR, Nov. 3, 1900 (4:5) (taken from Des Moines Register). Despite these reports, the Times later asserted that eastern railroad companies had not deemed it worthwhile to follow the western roads’ policies. “Users of Cigarettes,” NYT, Dec. 8, 1910 (12) (edit.).
51“Comment About Various Matters,” Landmark (Statesville, NC), July 6, 1906 (1:3).
52“Users of Cigarettes,” NYT, Dec. 8, 1910 (12) (edit.). In fact, nine years earlier a press report stated that the Santa Fe had already “issued an order that no one addicted to the use of cigarettes shall be given employment” and dismissed a number of cigarette-smoking employees. “‘No Cigarette Smokers Need Apply,’” Anaconda Standard (Montana), Dec. 10, 1901 (14:5) (taken from Indianapolis News).
53As late as World War II, at the Jefferson Avenue Chrysler factory in Detroit, according to the UAW, bosses were allowed to smoke all the time in glass-enclosed offices, but workers were disciplined for “‘snatching a few puffs in the washrooms.’”
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

codified, and solidified a growing societal denormalization and condemnation of cigarettes by means of a withdrawal of physical and social space from cigarette smoking and of a livelihood from cigarette smokers, production and consumption nevertheless raced forward. Thus, after the 35.7 percent drop in the Trust’s domestic cigarette sales from 1896 to 1901 associated with the first wave of state anti-cigarette sales enactments, the number of cigarettes it sold in the United States between 1901 and 1910 rose 248 percent from 1,990,911,000 to 6,930,986,000, while profits increased 236 percent from $2,056,553 to $6,904,304.55

The City Government of Clinton, Iowa Tries to Prohibit Its Newly Hired Employees from Using Tobacco At or Away from Work

Three-quarters of a century later, the cigarette firms had been monitoring the situation in Iowa56 ever since the City of Clinton adopted a resolution on December 30, 1986, requiring all of its employees hired after January 1, 1987, to “agree in writing as a condition of employment not to smoke, chew or use tobacco products on or off duty during the tenure of their employment with the City of Clinton,” violation of which agreement subjected employees to dismissal for cause.57 The proposal had originated in September as a means of reducing disability retirement benefits of firefighters’ and police—whose heart or lung illnesses were, by a new state law, deemed job-related. Councilman Darrell Smith, the proponent, alleged that additional costs of pensions, early retirements, 55Report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the Tobacco Industry, Part III, tab. 53 at 155 (1915). These figures exclude exports and foreign manufacturing business. During these years the Trust accounted for between 81.7 and 89.9 percent of total U.S. cigarette output. Id. tab. 52 at 153. See above ch. 1.

57American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees, Council 61 (AFSCME) v. City of Clinton at 2 (Iowa Public Employment Relations Board, June 17, 1987), Bates No. TI0600003/4 (reprinting resolution). and two-thirds disability payments would cost Clinton $900,000; of five city employees recently awarded heart- or lung-illness based disability payments, most, he claimed, were moderate to heavy smokers. Charles Boldt of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees took the position that barring the hire of smokers was “unreasonable”: “‘Until they outlaw tobacco, they cannot make that a condition of employment.’” Interestingly, the chairman of the Clinton Police Department bargaining unit, Charles Klaes, did not object to the proposal, so long as it was confined to job applicants. But he did tell the council that the rule would be impossible to enforce—in part because the police did not want to be used as the enforcers: “‘We don’t want to be peeking around to see if employees are smoking.’” Smith was unfazed because he envisioned an “honor system”: “‘If someone is going to smoke off duty, there isn’t much we can do…. We are not going to run around with search warrants to see if employees are smoking at home.’”

As adopted by the city council by a 5 to 4 vote, the resolution encompassed all newly hired employees. The majority argued that an employer was entitled to prohibit smoking on a worker’s own time “‘if the employer is footing the worker’s health insurance and disability retirement benefits,’” although the council recognized that the ban would not affect a majority of the city’s employees for 25 years. The resolution recited that “the smoking, chewing or use of tobacco products has an adverse effect on the health of the employee that directly affects the ability of the employee to perform his job while increasing the health care costs that are borne by the City.”

Clinton’s mayor stressed that although the city could fire new employees who violated the agreement not to smoke, enforcement would be on an honor system.

Boldt immediately charged that the ordinance was “‘absolutely unenforceable and patently illegal....’” AFSCME Council 61 challenged the ban to the Iowa
Public Employment Relations Board; both the hearing officer63 and the board itself ruled that the city had violated the Public Employment Relations Act by unilaterally implementing a policy subject to mandatory bargaining (namely, health and safety) without having given the union an opportunity to bargain over it and secured AFSCME’s consent.64 PERB was able to reach this conclusion by rejecting the city’s contention that its no-tobacco-use policy was merely the establishment of a job qualification, which was not subject to its duty to bargain collectively and which, therefore, the City of Clinton was free to implement unilaterally. Although the Board agreed that employers were not required to bargain over job qualifications, duties, content, or responsibilities, it ruled that the policy did not implicate any of these dimensions; and although determining whether an applicant was physically fit and able to perform a job was part of setting a job qualification, PERB asserted that the record did “not demonstrate that employee abstinence from tobacco products is required for the successful completion of specified job duties and responsibilities.”65 At the same time, the Board did make it clear that public employee bargaining rights did not trump the statewide mandates of the anti-public smoking law and consequently did not “provide[] opportunities to smoke in areas where Chapter 98A would otherwise prohibit smoking.”66 The city enforced the ordinance against police, firefighters, and nonunion employees, adhering to the board ruling only with regard to AFSCME members, who had numbered 70 to 80 in 1987.67

63 American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees, Council 61 (AFSCME) v. City of Clinton (Iowa Public Employment Relations Board, June 17, 1987), Bates No. TI28922676/82-83.
64 American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees, Council 61 v. City of Clinton at 9 (Iowa Public Employment Relations Board, Aug. 9, 1988), Bates No. TI28922676/84. To be sure, PERB then erroneously claimed that: “Chapter 98A clearly delineates, as a public policy consideration, the areas where smoking is not permitted and requires that those areas be designated as no-smoking areas.” Id. at 9-10. In fact, the statute confers almost complete discretion on those in charge of covered buildings to designate such areas, thus raising the question of whether the employer is required to bargain over and secure the union’s consent to these designations.
65 Clinton Union Exempted from Smoker Ban,” DMR, June 20, 1987 (3A:3).
Such a ruling applied only to Iowa state employees subject to the Public Employment Relations Act, under which, if an employer and union reach impasse, an arbitrator must resolve the disputed issue. Such a requirement would not have operated as an obstacle for an employer in the private sector covered by the National Labor Relations Act, under which an employer is privileged to implement a contract proposal if the parties reach impasse; and, a fortiori, in the majority of nonunion private workplaces in Iowa in which no collective bargaining took place, employers would, under the capacious at-will rule of employment, have faced no legal impediments to establishing a rule that they would hire no smokers. Thus, despite the outcome, the narrow scope of applicability of the PERB ruling presumably strengthened the cigarette companies’ resolve to seek a statewide law to prevent Clinton’s smokers-need-not-apply policy from spreading and potentially discouraging large numbers of their customers from jeopardizing their employability by giving up tobacco.

In the aftermath of the ruling the City of Clinton decided to pursue its anti-smoking policy by negotiating with AFSCME, while the union insisted that it would agree only to a policy that accommodated both smokers and nonsmokers. In the words of the Council 61’s associate director, Jan Corderman: “‘They can’t tell someone not to smoke at home.’” The city did bargain with the union, which, raising the issue to a matter of principle, refused to cede ground; seeing that the union was immovable, the City of Clinton did not press the point by declaring impasse or requesting arbitration. In fact, the surviving records of contract negotiations reveal that the city never even raised the question and that no such provision ever appeared in the City of Clinton-AFSCME contract. While the police and firefighters unions voluntarily agreed to the nosmokers rule, in part because the members did not want to work with smokers, and the Board

---

70 Telephone interview with Bruce Johansen, Clinton (Aug. 1, 2007) (City of Clinton attorney during the events in question).

71 Telephone interview with Ty Cutkomp, AFSCME, Council 61, Des Moines (Aug. 7, 2007) (union official in charge of negotiating and administering the City of Clinton contract since 1988).

72 Telephone interview with Bruce Johansen, Clinton (Aug. 1, 2007) (City of Clinton attorney during the events in question).
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

ruling did not apply to non-AFSCME-unit employees, it appears that despite the failure (then or later) to include a provision dealing with off-the-job smoking in the collective bargaining agreement, the city nevertheless continued to apply the rule to all job applicants, including nonuse of tobacco as a job requirement in advertisements and requiring newly hired employees to sign the aforementioned agreement, violation of which gave the city the right to terminate an employee, although in fact compliance was never monitored.\footnote{Telephone interviews with Deborah Neels, City of Clinton finance department director (began work in 1989) and Brenda Lies, financial accounting and human resources (began work in 1999) (Aug. 1, 2007). Announcements posted on the City of Clinton website for a job in sewer maintenance in the public works department and part-time bus driver, which were both covered by the AFSCME agreement, included as a job requirement,“Non-user of tobacco products”/“Not a user of any tobacco product(s).” http://www.ci.clinton.ia.us (visited Aug. 1 and 7, 2007). Surprised by this requirement, the former city attorney speculated that someone in city government had either inadvertently copied the provision from the non-AFSCME job announcements or “slipped it in” and AFSCME had not caught it. Telephone interview with Bruce Johansen, Clinton (Aug. 1, 2007). AFSCME official Ty Cutkomp confirmed that he had been unaware of such a requirement. Telephone interview with Ty Cutkomp, Des Moines (Aug. 7, 2007).}

Iowa’s Turn:
The Cigarette Manufacturers Try But Fail to Pass a Law Prohibiting Employers from Discriminating Against Smokers

In August 1990, Region IV staff was able to report to Tobacco Institute headquarters that member company lobbyists had agreed to try to pass a measure in Iowa to prevent employers from refusing to hire smokers. Staff and lobbyists were already cobbled together elements from bills passed in other states “to produce an acceptable amendment for use in Iowa,” on which they anticipated achieving agreement by December 1. On a tactical level, a meeting of industry lobbyists and Government Affairs executives had decided that “introduction of a free standing bill would create unnecessary problems for the industry. There is no desire to create a vehicle on which germane anti-tobacco legislation can be added. The lobbyists are confident that if they have in hand a ready to go amendment, they will be able to add it on during Senate floor action to a bill dealing with labor issues or conditions of employment.” This last point prompted the further tactical insight that TILMC’s Iowa labor consultant would be working with “labor groups to educate them about the desirability of this legislation” in order to “enduce [sic]” them to lobby legislators to whom they had access.
Unlike some issues, such as excise taxes, on which TI could never get too much press coverage, the legislative strategy on anti-smoker discrimination measures was distinctly covert: “Only if and when this effort on the part of the industry is detected by the media, some thought will have to be given as to the appropriate industry response. If the agreed upon amendment addressed more issues than smoking, then perhaps media spokespeople could soft peddle [sic] industry involvement.” The reason for this approach was not difficult to uncover: “The practice of passing smokers’ rights laws without mentioning smoking or tobacco in them is an attempt to deceive the public about the main purpose of the law.”

During the 1991 session, TI and TILMC drafted language of an amendment and waited for an opportunity to insert it into pending legislation. But it soon became apparent that, because of the “tax situation,” it was not feasible to pursue the measure before adjournment. In late summer, Junkins met with IFL board members, confirmed that labor was still “supportive of some type or privacy legislation,” and therefore planned to prepare for the 1992 session. TI geared up during the closing months of 1991 to return the issue to the legislative agenda in 1992, the documents for which were conveniently collected in a file folder labeled, “Iowa 92 Proactive Plans.” In November, TI’s Midwest regional staff reported that labor was “very interested in pursuing this issue,” but that while the tobacco industry could “seek support for labors [sic] position covertly,...at no time should we directly or publicly indicate support for this legislation.” Fissures within the industry were on display in the intelligence that Philip Morris might be “interested in doing a separate bill instead of pursuing an amendment,” and that if it actually did so, it would be “important that TI step back and let PM be fully responsible for the very real possibility that we will have to fight to kill our own bill in the Senate.” Moreover, the tactical question still had to be answered as to whether “we want to use up a chit on this particular bill when we might need 74Kurt Malmgren to Samuel Chilcote, Memorandum at 1, 3 (Apr. 17, 1991), Bates No. TIOK0029427/30.

---

751991 Proactive Legislative Plans at 7 (June 18, 1991), Bates No. TIOK0024936/42.
77[Tobacco Institute], Iowa 92 Proactive Plans (Dec. 11, 1991), Bates No. T128843109, on tobaccodocuments.org.

2839
leadership to help us defeat a tax bill.”

On December 5, 1991, Region IV’s vice president, Alice O’Connor (requesting that the information not be widely publicized), reported to her boss Pat Donoho that TI’s lobbyist, Bill Wimmer—Wasker’s partner, who was responsible for lobbying Democrats—had met with AFSCME and IFL, which had agreed to “push the privacy bill.” Although they preferred to try to amend a different labor bill, they appreciated the tobacco industry’s “desire to push a separate bill as well.” They would, moreover, meet privately with “the two main anti-tobacco legislators,” Hammond and Lloyd-Jones, to ask them not to attach any amendments to the separate bill, if that vehicle were pursued. Why either or both of them would be willing to do this service for the cigarette companies, O’Connor did not explain. Finally, she faxed Donoho the “suggested privacy language for Iowa that Labor groups will push once the companies have signed off.” Since labor wanted to line up sponsors before year’s end, she needed headquarters’ approval “ASAP.”

The “language” that O’Connor faxed to headquarters in Washington turned out to be a full-fledged bill that amended Iowa’s Employer-Employee Offenses statute without ever mentioning smoking. Headed “Employees [sic] Use of Lawful Products During Nonworking Hours” and inserted directly after a provision on drug testing, the measure made it “unlawful for an employer to refuse to hire or to discharge any person, or otherwise disadvantage any person, with respect to compensation, terms, conditions or privileges of employment because the person uses lawful products off the premises of the employer during nonworking hours.” It exempted from this prohibition the use of lawful products “which impair an employee’s ability to perform the employee’s duties” as well as any nonprofit employer “that, as one of its primary purposes or objectives, discourages the use of one or more lawful products by the general public.” In addition, the proposal permitted an employer to provide health, disability, or life insurance policies with coverage and price differentials based on an employee’s use of lawful products if the differentials reflected cost differentials to the employer. Violations (which were simple misdemeanors) triggered an entitlement to affirmative relief including reinstatement, hiring, and backpay. Four days later O’Connor also faxed the proposed bill to Hurst Marshall, the head of R. J. Reynolds Tobacco’s Midwest region, who faxed it back with the notation: “This is fine with me!”

---

81Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac (Dec. 5, 1991), Bates No. TI28922691. O’Connor claimed that “Wayne Cox from IA Citizens for Tax Justice has agreed that he will work closely with labor.” Cox was with Minnesota Citizens for Tax Justice and there was no such Iowa organization. Close attention to detail does not appear to have been O’Connor’s strong point: a week earlier she had sent Donoho a copy of an alleged PERB decision of Nov. 25, 1991 concerning AFSCME and Clinton, but Cathey Yoe of the D.C. office had to call to her attention that they had received the decision more than three years earlier. Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac (Nov. 27, 1991), Bates No. TI28922697.
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

A week later, the TI’s Midwest regional office reported to headquarters that labor was being recontacted to “reaffirm their commitment to push a separate bill as a labor issue.” At the same time, staff made it clear that numerous disparate obstacles to passage of an acceptable bill had been identified but not yet overcome, including the eventual need to address the possibility that the whole campaign might yet be outed as a “tobacco issue”:

Tobacco lobbyists behind the scenes will work with legislative leadership to finesse procedural moves. Separately, an amendment is ready to go if an appropriate separate labor bill or one dealing with conditions of employment surfaces.

On the separate bill, if hostile language ends up being attached, we face the very real possibility of fighting to kill our own bill, probably in the Senate.

In the Senate, it takes only a simple majority to suspend the rules in which case with a lot of additional terms added to our bill ruled germane, [they] could leave us with a bill we do not like very much. Noone [sic] wants to use any chits on the privacy bill which TI lobbyists feel is a very real possibility. PM staff and lobbyists say this is an unfounded concern and won’t happen.

We need to recognize when Branstad chaired the National Governor’s Conference, his top platform was on health care and non-smoking issues. If a separate bill passes both houses identified even remotely as a tobacco bill, we stand a possible gubernatorial veto.

Region IV also stressed the need to use labor management contacts with “national ACLU activists...to educate and motivate local unions, media and key legislators.” In light of AFSCME’s key role in the Clinton dispute, it was self-explanatory that this union was singled out for special mention as an important

---

82 A Bill for an Act prohibiting the refusal to hire (faxed Dec. 5, 1991), Bates No. TI28922689-70.
83 A Bill for an Act prohibiting the refusal to hire (faxed Dec. 9, 1991), Bates No. TI28922693-94.
Iowa ally. The regional office also shared the insight that since “[t]he feeling among Iowans” was the Clarence Thomas “ought never have been put through the ordeal,” “the issue of privacy may play very well in Iowa.”\(^{86}\) Region IV did not explain its cryptic statement that “[b]usiness support will depend on whether we opt for legal products or legal activities,”\(^ {87}\) but it presumably meant that the employers whose support the tobacco industry sought to secure might acquiesce in the former, but not in the latter, which, as events revealed, could encompass dating co-workers.

Already on January 13, 1992, the day the legislative session convened, Conservative Democrat Dennis Renaud, chair of the House Labor and Industrial Relations Committee, who, as previously discussed, had been an active and outspoken opponent on the House floor of anti-smoking bills in the latter half of the 1980s\(^ {88}\) and was known to have been “in the pocket of the tobacco lobby,”\(^ {89}\) submitted TI’s “lawful products” draft bill with a request for drafting to the Legislative Service Bureau. Renaud was listed as the sponsor, but the request form identified Ted Anderson, a multi-client lobbyist, as the person from whom the request had been received.\(^ {90}\) While not unprecedented, naming a lobbyist as the requester was uncommon.\(^ {91}\) A former John Deere Company worker and UAW member, Anderson had been a one-term Democratic state senator from Waterloo (1981-84), who then lobbied for 16 years until his death in 2000.\(^ {92}\) Anderson’s clients in 1992—including the National Cattle Congress, Iowa Independent Bankers Association, and Iowa Library Association, as well as

\(^{88}\) See above ch. 26.

\(^{89}\) Email from Rod Halvorson to Marc Linder (Aug. 9, 2007). Years later Renaud stated that he was unable to recall the study bill’s provenience, though he heatedly denied that the “lawful products” bill was about tobacco; when told that the Tobacco Institute had in fact supplied the text of the study bill, he immediately demanded to know where this line of questioning was going, although he admitted that he would have passed the study bill onto the Legislative Services Bureau even if it had come from used car dealers. He also refused to confirm or deny that he smoked in the early 1990s, but did inadvertently mention that he was unable to recall whether he still smoked at that time. Telephone interview with Dennis Renaud, Altoona, IA (Aug. 12, 2007).

\(^{90}\) Legislative Service Bureau, Request for Bill or Amendment Drafting, LSB# 5557HC (Jan. 13, 1992) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).

\(^{91}\) Email from Don Avenson to Marc Linder (Aug. 21, 2007).

Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

numerous health-related entities—may not have been plausible advocates of pro-smoking legislation, but AFSCME Local Council 61 could have been. Since the real requester in this case was the Tobacco Institute, whose lobbyists were Wasker and Wimmer, a question arises as to why the latter, a Democrat, did not hand the draft directly to Renaud instead of using an intermediary. Perhaps Anderson’s union background and contacts made him a more credible conduit, especially since he famously “loved cigars.” In addition, as former legislator Linda Beatty speculated years later, tobacco lobbyists might have used him because “Teddy” was a “big Democrat” whom “everyone” in the legislature liked and who was very popular, especially with older Democrats. Another possible explanation for Anderson’s role as a front may be linked to Renaud’s not having opted for confidentiality for the request: since a nonconfidential request meant that “the Legislative Services Agency will list the request in the index of bill or research requests, and will release the name of the requester, a working title for the bill draft or research request, and the general subject matter classification of the request,” had Renaud listed Wasker/Wimmer or the Tobacco Institute as the requester, other lobbyists would have been able to discover that the measure’s veiled reference to “lawful products” was code for tobacco; with a non-tobacco lobbyist as the purported requester, anti-smoking legislators and groups might have been thrown off the trail and misled to believe (as may have been the case in the Senate) that the bill, requested by AFSCME’s lobbyist, vindicated a new right for workers rather than protecting tobacco company profits.

---

94. Wimmer stated in 2007 that he had absolutely no recollection of the bill, but speculated that he might have given it to Anderson because of the latter’s labor connection. Telephone interview with William Wimmer, Des Moines (Sept. 5, 2007). Although Wasker had revealed a vivid memory of events surrounding his success in achieving local preemption in 1990, when asked why the anti-smoker discrimination bill failed in 1992, he protested that it was too long ago to remember. Telephone interview with Charles Wasker, Des Moines (Aug. 30, 2007).
98. Whereas ex-House members Halvorson and Beatty found this speculation plausible, former House Speaker Avenson archly observed that no one except law professors 15 years after the fact pays attention to bill draft requests, although he conceded that some lobbyists do. Email from Rod Halvorson to Marc Linder (Aug. 22, 2007); telephone
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

In any event, neither Renaud (“OK for Com Study Bill for Labor”) nor Anderson was apparently embarrassed that the draft submitted to the Legislative Service Bureau still bore the Tobacco Institute’s computer document identifier code (including the “smoker.doc” extension). The next day the same study bill was submitted as a companion by the chair of the Senate Business and Labor Relations Committee, Richard Running, a pro-union, former executive board member and organizational representative of United Food and Commercial Workers Local 3-P, who had filed the amendment to excluded restaurants from the clean indoor air act in 1990, and was known to accommodate tobacco lobbyists Wasker and Wimmer.

On January 20, 1992, liberal Democrat Jane Teaford filed a short bill that would have amended the unfair employment practices section of the Iowa Civil Rights Act to prohibit an employer from firing an employee for his or her “participation in a lawful activity off the premises of the employer during nonworking hours” unless the restriction was (1) related to a bona fide occupational requirement or was reasonably related to the employment activities and responsibilities of a particular employee or group of employees as opposed to all of the employer’s employees, or (2) necessary to avoid (the appearance of) a conflict of interest with any responsibilities owed by the employee to the employer. The bill was referred to the Judiciary and Law Enforcement Committee, chaired by the tobacco industry’s reliable representative, Daniel Jay; Philip Brammer, the House’s most outspoken anti-smoking advocate, was appointed to the three-member subcommittee, chaired by liberal Democrat Linda Beatty, assigned to vet the bill. Significantly in this context, Beatty, just a few months earlier, had told a historian that she viewed her role in the legislature as interview with Linda Beatty, Indianola (Aug. 22, 2007); email from Don Avenson to Marc Linder (Aug. 21 and 22, 2007). On the Senate, see below this ch.

99Legislative Service Bureau, Request for Bill or Amendment Drafting, LSB# 5557HC (Jan. 13, 1992) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).

100Legislative Service Bureau, Request for Bill or Amendment Drafting, LSB# 5557SC (Jan. 14, 1992).

102See above ch. 27.

103Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 8, 2007).

105See above ch. 28.

Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

protecting civil rights and individual rights. In 1991 she had voted with the tobacco industry on vending machines and sampling, and in February 1992 she voted against the cigarette tax increase. Even as late as 2007, Beatty took the position that so long as cigarettes were a “legal product,” she not only would support prohibiting employment discrimination against smokers, but believed that smokers should be given some place to smoke at work.

During the six weeks before the committee acted on Teaford’s H.F. 2058, several other bills pertaining to the same subject were filed. On January 30, House Study Bill 584 was assigned to the Labor and Industrial Relations Committee, which assigned it to a five-member subcommittee, which was also chaired by Beatty and of which Brammer was also a member. H.S.B. 584 was largely identical to TI’s proposal—that tobacco industry lobbyists wrote the Iowa bill was not unique: Philip Morris lobbyists had written the law that New Jersey passed in 1991—the substantive provisions differing only in several insignificant formal respects; the enforcement provisions were also materially the same, differing only with respect to minor rearrangements. Even the “Explanation” furnished by the Tobacco Institute was retained. This bill, TI observed, was being “pushed by labor.” The next day O’Connor shared her “Assessment about Iowa” with Donoho, reporting under the heading, “Privacy Bill,” that “PM lobbyist...Cal Hultman and TI Labor Consultant...Lowell Junkins and Bill Wimmer have both House and Senate bills set to be introduced by Labor 107 A Political Dialogue: Iowa Women Legislators, Box 1: Transcripts: Beatty, Linda at 21-22 (Sept. 26, 1991), IWA.

---

112 H.S.B. 584 (n.d.). The Legislative Service Bureau’s bill request file includes the drafter’s handwritten marginal changes including her question/comment to her supervisor: “‘Legal’ rather than ‘Lawful’? Lawful OK I guess—breaking new ground!” Legislative Service Bureau, Request for Bill or Amendment Drafting, LSB# 5557HC (Jan. 13, 1992) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).
113 Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa HF (Feb. 7, 1992), Bates No. TI23670050/2.

2845
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

The ease with which the study bills could be referred to these committees was a function of the study bill system and of the political orientation of their chairmen. Although Iowa’s apparently unique study bills are primarily the venue by which the governor, executive agencies, and the judiciary can place bills before committees, committee chairs also have the prerogative to request the Legislative Services Agency (formerly Legislative Service Bureau) to draft bills, which may have been handed to them by lobbyists, but of which the chairs will appear as the sponsors. Some committee chairs, at one extreme, may adopt a laissez-faire policy with regard to lobbyists’ requests to insert their proposals into the study bill system, whereas at the other extreme others may refuse to process any such requests unless they substantively approve of them. In 1992, the tobacco industry would not have encountered any access problems with the aforementioned House and Senate labor committee chairmen, Dennis Renaud and Richard Running. One reason for lobbyists’ tendency to use study bills is that by securing a committee chair’s approval of the bill they get over one major hurdle; moreover, chair-backed study bills enable lobbyists to avoid association with the possible negatives attached to the name or party of an individual sponsor—which include losing votes.

Although it was crucial to the tobacco industry’s strategy that the real purpose of the bill (to prevent employers from discouraging employees from smoking) be hidden behind vague talk about privacy, the unofficial but authoritative Iowa Legislative News Service Bulletin pierced this veil by calling H.S.B. 584 the day it was assigned to a subcommittee “Off-Duty Smoking/Drinking.” By February 7, TI reported that H.S.B. 584 was “the priority bill for labor and likely to be pushed out of committee in the next two weeks. Even though a similar bill HF 2058 (legal activities) is also likely to move. This is the bill of choice for Labor.” O’Connor—who was herself registered as a Tobacco Institute lobbyist

---

114 Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Subject: Assessment about Iowa (Jan. 31, 1992), TI28710967/8. She also mentioned that Philip Morris was doing a separate privacy poll but not through ICAN.

116 Telephone interview with John Pollak, Legislative Services Agency, Des Moines (Aug. 9, 2007). Interim committees also produce study bills.

117 Email from Don Avenson to Marc Linder (Aug. 15, 2007).

119 Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa HSB584 (Feb. 7, 1992), Bates No. T123670050/1.
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

in the Iowa legislature—and added that TI’s lobbyists Junkins and Wimmer were “working very closely with labor behind the scenes coordinating this effort.” On February 26, the House Labor and Industry Committee voted it out as a committee bill, recommending that it pass as amended. During the 45-minute meeting, which was also devoted to discussing three other bills, the committee took up an amendment, the most important provision of which expanded the exemption beyond nonprofit employers, but also narrowed it by tackling on qualifications. It now applied to an “employer which has previously manifested as its primary purpose its discouragement of the use of one or more lawful products by the general public in its legal charter, by-laws, or established organizational or business plan, and which has provided written notification of this purpose to its employees and applicants for employment.” It is not intuitively obvious what for-profit employers could have satisfied this primary purpose criterion, but whichever nonprofits or for-profits met it would have had to surmount the other obstacles created by the amendment as well. HSB 584.504 also imposed tighter limits on employers’ privilege to charge lawful product-using employees higher insurance premium rates by requiring state insurance agency approval of such rates. And finally, the amendment would have empowered 123Some confusion attends the author of this amendment. According to the committee meeting minutes, Beatty, the subcommittee chair, asked for unanimous consent to reconsider amendment 584.502, to which there was no objection; then Rep. Steve Hansen—whose pro-tobacco stances were mentioned in ch. 28—asked for unanimous consent to reconsider his amendment, to which there was also no objection. At that point Amendment HSB 584.504 was distributed and debated. Amendment 584.504, which was appended to the minutes, was presumably Hansen’s amendment (rather than Beatty’s 584.502); although it bore the Legislative Services Bureau designation HSB 584.504 74, it was labeled “Proposed Committee Amendment by Beatty of Warren.” The fact that Beatty and Hansen asked the committee to “reconsider” their amendments suggests that the committee had already considered them at an earlier meeting as does the statement that after the committee had adopted HSB 584.504, “the previous amendments adopted were out of order.” Committee Minutes for Labor & Industrial Relations (Feb. 26, 1992) (copy furnished by SHSI DM). According to the Iowa State Archives, no committee meeting minutes for February contained any discussion of HSB 584. Email from Meaghan McCarthy to Marc Linder (Aug. 23, 2007).

121Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa HSB584 (Feb. 7, 1992), Bates No. TI23670050/1.
courts to order liquidated damages of up to $5,000 for wilful violations and deleted the provision in the original study bill making a violation a simple misdemeanor. After the committee had adopted the first two changes by a voice vote and the latter two by a vote of 10 to 8, it adopted the whole bill by a vote of 12 to 8. Two days later, on February 28, the committee’s bill was introduced and placed on the House calendar as H.F. 2329, but it never reached the floor, and died after having been rereferred to committee.

What later became House Study Bill 653 was submitted to the Legislative Service Bureau for drafting at the request of Linda Beatty on February 12. As submitted, it was styled as an amendment of H.S.B. 584, striking everything after the enacting clause and inserting instead an amalgam of H.S.B. 584 and H.F. 2058, using the latter’s “lawful activity” instead of the former’s “lawful products.” Chairman Renaud handwrote on the draft to the LSB drafter: “O.K. draft study bill as directed by Rep. Beatty.” The LSB’s more polished product, now H.S.B. 653, was assigned on February 18 to the same Labor and Industry five-member subcommittee chaired by Beatty, but it too died in committee by virtue of having failed to meet the March 6 cross-over (funnel) deadline.

H.F. 2058 was being held up in the Judiciary Committee, TI reported on February 7, because it was tied to the state civil rights statute, but it was beginning to gain “additional interest” and to be called a “Walmart Bill,” because Walmart fired two employees who work in their store for dating. Walmart has a policy against that during work hours and Teaford’s bill addresses legal 124 House Study Bill 584, appended to Committee Minutes for Labor & Industrial Relations (Feb. 26, 1992) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).

125 Committee Minutes for Labor & Industrial Relations (Feb. 26, 1992) (copy furnished by SHSI DM). Although the vote was by roll call, the names were not recorded in the minutes. Since 12 Democrats and 8 Republicans were present and voting and several other committee and floor votes on these bills were along party lines, possibly this vote was too.
127 H.S.B. 653 (Labor and Industrial Relations) (n.d.).
128 Legislative Service Bureau, Request for Bill or Amendment Drafting, LSB # 6137HC (Feb. 2 [1992]) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).
130 Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa HSB653 (Mar. 23, 1992), Bates No. TI23670053. activities.” In fact, the Iowa Court of Appeals, ruling in August 1990 in a case that had arisen in 1985 involving two nonsupervisory employees who had allegedly violated the company’s “fraternization” policy that “Wal-Mart had legitimate reasons for banning relationships at work,” had held that there was “no public policy preventing the regulation of relationships at the work place.”

Popular and legislative reaction to this decision that the at-will rule of employment developed by the Iowa Supreme Court did not prohibit an employer from firing an employee for dating a co-worker was about to interact with the tobacco industry’s efforts to pass its own bill. On February 26, the House Judiciary Committee discussed amendments to H.F. 2058, the content of which even TI’s lobbyist Wasker had been unable to determine, but he assured his client that there would not be “any quick action [on] it, because all attention” was focused on the budget. Nevertheless, Region IV reported to headquarters its belief that “one of the amendments include[s] language which says that business can put in their by-laws proper employment language that could discriminate against smokers.” If such an amendment ratifying employers’ powers at the expense of the cigarette companies’ sales and profits was actually adopted, O’Connor confided to Donoho: “This absolutely will have to be taken out.” After Beatty’s subcommittee had recommended the bill’s passage, on 133 Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa HF 2058 (Feb. 27, 1992), Bates No. TI23670050/2. Neither the House Journal, the Index to the Journals, the Iowa Legislative News Service Bulletin, nor the Des Moines Register mentioned any such committee meeting. The State Archives also has no record of any such meeting. Email from Meaghan McCarthy to Marc Linder (Aug. 6, 2007). Perhaps O’Connor conflated this bill and meeting with the House Labor and Industry Committee meeting of that date on H.S.B. 584; see below. It is not clear what amendment O’Connor had in mind, but after the House had defeated H.F. 2058, Beatty filed an amendment that attached a third condition to the permissibility of employers’ restrictions on employees’ off-premises lawful activities: “The employer has notified the employee in writing of the restriction at the time of hire or at a time sufficiently in advance of the employee’s activity so that the employee can modify the employee’s participation if the employee so wishes.” S.F. 2271, H-5393 (Mar. 19, 1992, by Beatty), House Clip Sheet at 1 (Mar. 20, 1992).

---

131 Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa HF 2058 (Feb. 7, 1992), Bates No. TI23670050/2.

134 Record of Committee Action on Bills & Resolutions and Subcommittee Members, H.F. 2058, Judiciary & Law Enforcement, Subcommittee Report (n.d.) (copy furnished by SHSI DM). The undated subcommittee report was signed by Beatty and Brammer.
March 3, the House Judiciary Committee finally recommended passage of H.F. 2058. The 11 to 7 vote perfectly tracked party affiliation with one exception: Democrat Rod Halvorson, who prioritized the struggle against smoking above formal workplace democracy, joined six Republicans in the minority. The bill, according to subcommittee chair (and bill floor manager) Linda Beatty, had been “prompted” by the aforementioned Wal-Mart decision, which she called “an example of how businesses sometimes try to regulate the private lives of their workers. ‘We can’t stop dating in business. That’s where people make their social contact.’” Moreover: “‘If an employee does the job, why would an employer want to butt into your personal life. I don’t understand that.’” Beatty later confirmed that she supported the bill because it was good for employees.

When the House (controlled by Democrats 55 to 45) took up H.F. 2058 on March 17, opponents argued that the bill went too far because there were “situations where employees engage in types of behavior that, while legal, reflect poorly on the business.” Republicans’ unabashed pro-employer opposition was led by first-term member Charles Hurley, a lawyer in private practice and member of the Christian Legal Society, who, without explaining how his guideline related to the Wal-Mart case, claimed: “‘When an employer is forced to retain an employee who is basically destroying his business, we’ve gone too far.... We can’t delve into free enterprise and expect it to flourish. We only shoot ourselves in the foot when we tie employers’ hands.’” Jane Svoboda, one of the very few Democrats aligning themselves with the model of the autocratic workplace, drifted even farther from the dating question by insisting that “government should not try to ‘micromanage’ business. ‘You’ve got to give the employer some opportunity to maintain law and order in the workplace.’” Other critics of the bill insisted that it would deter businesses from locating in Iowa.

---

Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

In contrast, Beatty insisted that if employers were to make rules about workers’ personal lives, “‘they’d better relate to the job.’”143 Hurley, a very conservative representative who was not even close to his fellow Republicans,144 gave his colleagues the chance to determine how central the Wal-Mart question was to the bill by offering an amendment that struck the entire bill, replacing it with a prohibition exclusively of employers’ firing an employee for “dating another employee.” Its defeat by a vote of 47 to 50 was almost perfectly along party lines: not a single Republican joined the 50 Democrats in opposition, while only four conservative145 Democrats (all of them farmers) voted with 43 Republicans to dilute the intrusion into employers’ exercise of unfettered power to fire workers for any or no reason.146 After having been thwarted in their effort to narrow the bill’s scope, the Republicans turned around and voted against passage of H.F. 2058 in a solid block of 44, not a single one joining the 47 Democrats who supported the original bill; the bill’s 47 to 51 defeat resulted from four new Democratic Nays’ being added to three of the four who had voted with the Republicans on the Wal-Mart amendment.147 (One of the Nays was cast by Rod Halvorson, perhaps the chamber’s most consistently militant anti-smoker, who believed that employers should be entitled not to hire smokers for health reasons—a position that prompted some objections from labor unions in his Fort Dodge district, though his otherwise strong support for unions muted the criticism.)148 In the end, then, the cigarette companies’ strategy ran aground on Iowa Republicans’ ineradicable support for perpetuating employers’ longtime rule of the workplace “with an iron-hand by reason of the prevailing common-law 144Telephone interview with former Representative Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 7, 2007).

146State of Iowa: 1992: Journal of the House: 1992: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth General Assembly 1:650-51 (Mar. 17). Fogarty, Koenigs, Mertz, and Svoboda were farmers, two of whom (Fogarty and Mertz) had cosponsored the amendment. Although her entry in the Iowa Official Register failed to mention that Svoboda farmed, she discussed her multigenerational farming at length in her oral history. A Political Dialogue: Iowa’s Women Legislators Box 4, Folder: Transcripts: Svoboda, Jane (Oct. 29, 1991), IWA.
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

rule” that an employment contract for an indefinite period “is presumed to be at will....”149 The cigarette companies had also been boxed in by their ill-chosen statutory terms: although the losing anti-Wal-Mart bill’s use of “lawful activity” would literally encompass smoking, their preference for “lawful products” was not capacious enough to include dating bans.

With the defeat of the last House bill, attention turned to the Senate, where Senate Study Bill 2120, proposed by the Business and Labor Relations Committee, was identical to H.S.B. 584, TI’s “lawful products” measure.150 Referred to committee on February 4, it was assigned the next day to a three-member subcommittee chaired by William Palmer,151 a heavy-smoking insurance businessman highly protective of smoking in the Senate itself.152 After the committee had unanimously approved it (now S.F. 2271) on March 4,153 the full Senate took it up on March 16, adopting by a vote of 44 to 2, even Hannon, one of the chamber’s most reliable anti-smoking stalwarts voting Aye.154 The following day—the same day that the House defeated H.F. 2058—the Senate overwhelmingly passed S.F. 2271 by a vote of 44 to 2, even Hannon, one of the chamber’s most reliable anti-smoking stalwarts voting Aye.155 Indeed, despite her quasi-outsider status, the reasoning that Hannon later offered to justify her vote may well have been typical for many of her colleagues: “If the bill said that workers could use lawful products where not prohibited, I would have voted for it, whether it was alcohol, tea...Tylenol...or 150 S.S.B. 2120 (Proposed Business and Labor Relations Committee by chairperson Running).

152 Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 8, 2007).

155 State of Iowa: 1992: Journal of the Senate: 1992: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth General Assembly 1:818 (Mar. 17). Representative Rod Halvorson, who a month later lambasted the bill in the House as the tobacco industry’s creature, speculated that lack of opposition in the Senate might have resulted from lack of knowledge at that time about the bill’s real origins and purposes. Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 8, 2007).
tobacco. ... If it’s ‘legal’ it’s legal.” Although she did not recall whether she had been aware of the bill’s origins in the Tobacco Institute, she stated that even if she had known, “it wouldn’t have changed my vote.”\footnote{Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (Aug. 10, 2007).} That even an anti-smoker of Hannon’s stature favored such a legalistic approach—by whose logic smoking would not be prohibited in public places—in 1992 and still clung to it in 2007 helps explain why until that time the Iowa legislature, unlike 20 other states, still had not passed a rigorous and comprehensive anti-smoking law. (Linda Beatty, too, still adhered to this position in 2007).\footnote{Telephone interview with Linda Beatty, Indianola (Aug. 22, 2007).} Whatever the senators knew at the time of voting, the Register’s one-line summary of the bill in its list of bills passed that day let the cat out of the bag, albeit ungrammatically, as to what the bill was really about: “Outlaws policies by most employers that prohibits [sic] smoking and alcohol consumption away from work.”\footnote{“Legislative Bills,” \textit{DMR}, Mar. 18, 1992 (4) (NewsBank). The Iowa press did not cover the debate on S.F. 2271.}

When the Register editorialized under the title, “Does the Boss Own You?” on April 6 that the House had recently defeated a bill that would have made illegal firings based on whether employees engaged in lawful activity such as smoking cigarettes, watching x-rated movies, or riding in a motorcycle group, it failed to point out that the “lawful products” approach that the Senate had passed would definitely cover cigarettes and movies, though it would not have applied to dating. The newspaper did, however, mention that Teaford was seeking to “include language preventing employees from being hired or fired based on their lawful use of products.”\footnote{“Does the Boss Own You?” \textit{DMR}, Apr. 6, 1992 (12) (edit.) (NewsBank).} This confused and confusing claim actually referred to the fact that Teaford had filed on March 30 an amendment not to her own defeated H.F. 2058, but to S.F. 2271 (which the Senate had passed) that was apparently designed to give the House another opportunity to vote on H.F. 2058: Teaford’s amendment struck “use of lawful products” from the heading of the bill’s proposed new section of the Employer-Employee Offenses statute and replaced it with “lawful activity,” but did not insert such a substitution into the body of the main prohibition, which continued to speak only of “lawful products.” The amendment did, however, import from H.F. 2058 the exceptions to the prohibition of discharging an employee for participating in off-premises lawful activity, thus giving S.F. 2271 a disjointed hybrid character.\footnote{S.F. 2271, H-5585 (Mar. 30, 1992, by Teaford), House Clip Sheet at 25 (Mar. 31, 1992).} In the event, however, Teaford’s amendment was placed out of order and never voted on when the House took up the bill later in April.\textsuperscript{161}
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

After the House Labor and Industrial Relations Committee had recommended passage of S.F. 2271 on March 25,\textsuperscript{162} TI’s Region IV learned that its faithful advocate, Representative Daniel Jay, had filed an amendment that would have exempted from the bill’s prohibitions employer programs “establishing and enforcing blood content levels for alcohol, prescription drugs, or other medications while the employee is on duty, on the employer’s premises, or using the employer’s equipment.”\textsuperscript{163} The Midwest regional office informed headquarters that: “Labor does not like this amendment. The sponsor will be asked to withdraw his amendment.”\textsuperscript{164} In fact, it was placed out of order during floor debate and never considered.\textsuperscript{165}

When the House took up S.F. 2271 on April 15, the bill’s opponents called it a “‘paper tiger’ concealing a tobacco industry drive.”\textsuperscript{166} In particular Democrat Rod Halvorson, a longtime antismoking militant, turned a bright light on the cigarette companies’ camouflaged machinations by explaining that “the tobacco industry is pushing such legislation throughout the country because of public health efforts to discourage tobacco use. ‘This is a direct assault of the tobacco industry to bring this issue before us,’” adding that some employers had prohibited smoking by employees on account of the increased illness and medical costs linked to smoking.\textsuperscript{167}

Democrat Patrick Gill, a construction businessman and nonsmoker who had chaired the Labor and Industrial Relations subcommittee that had vetted the bill\textsuperscript{168} and argued that “businesses should not be allowed to meddle in the private lives of workers,”\textsuperscript{169} offered an amendment striking the entire bill, but then readopting the Senate-passed bill with the same amendments to H.S.B. 584 that \textsuperscript{163}S.F. 2271, H-5661 (Apr. 2, 1992, by Jay), House Clip Sheet.

\textsuperscript{164}Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa SF 2271 (Apr. 8, 1992), Bates No. T128711514, on tobaccodocuments.org.
\textsuperscript{166}“Smoking Bill Fails,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Apr. 16, 1992 (4B:1).
\textsuperscript{167}“Statehouse Notes,” DMR, Apr. 16, 1992 (4) (NewsBank).
\textsuperscript{169}“Smoking Bill Fails,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Apr. 16, 1992 (4B:1).
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

Beatty had proposed and the House Labor and Industrial Relations Committee had adopted on February 26. The most relevant change reproduced verbatim the requirement for exemption introduced in H.S.B. 584/H.F. 2329 that employers (and not just nonprofits) have solemnly manifested their purpose to discourage use of a lawful product in a legal or business organization document and given employees and applicants written notification of it. What proved to be a deal-breaker, however, was a floor amendment offered by Gill that simply struck the language added by the Senate exempting “employer policies” (but not labor contracts) in existence on March 1, 1992. On a roll-call vote this amendment passed by the narrowest of margins—50 to 49. All 50 Ayes were cast by Democrats, while only 4 Democrats, including the chamber’s leading anti-smokers Hammond and Rod Halvorson, voted with all 45 Republicans in opposition. This voting pattern is difficult to reconcile with TI’s intelligence that labor and business “said they would have the bill vetoed if ‘policies’ were not included. Attempts to put ‘policies’ back into the bill failed.” If Labor wanted that language restored, Democrats could have been expected to accommodate that preference rather than vote solidly against it. (Halvorson later interpreted this amendment as possibly designed to stick it to non-union employers, whose non-collectively bargained employer practices would not be exempted.) Gill’s overall amendment was adopted on a voice vote, but the bill (which now consisted of Gill’s amendments) was narrowly defeated 51 to 48. Again, the vote was along party lines: 47 Democrats voted for the pro-tobacco industry bill joined by a lone Republican, Mary Lundby, an ardent smoker and loyal cigarette industry legislator. The bill was defeated because the other 44 Republicans 170See above this ch.

171State of Iowa: 1992: Journal of the House: 1992: Regular Session Seventy-Fourth General Assembly 2:1479 (Apr. 15) (H-5858). By amendment of the amendment H.F. 2329’s requirement that the employer have “previously” manifested its purpose was deleted. Id. at 1480 (H-5914). The amendment also conditioned employers’ imposition of higher insurance premium rates for users’ of lawful products on approval by the commerce department insurance division. Id.

174Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa SF 2271 (Apr. 8, 1992), Bates No. T128711514, on tobaccodocuments.org.

175Telephone interview with Rod Halvorson, St. Paul (Aug. 8, 2007).

Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

(who were presumably representing businesses’ opposition to any diminution of their power to hire and fire) were joined by seven Democrats, including Gill himself, three anti-smokers (Halvorson, Hammond, and Teaford), and Svoboda and Koenigs, who were presumably pro-business. Gill, however, may have voted Nay simply in order to be on the prevailing side in order to be eligible to file a motion to reconsider, 177 which he did the next day, but it failed by a vote of 42 to 49. 178

Despite the tobacco industry’s best efforts to conceal the real purpose of the bill, the press was not misled. Even the headline of the AP article in the Cedar Rapids Gazette read “Smoking Bill Fails,” while the text observed that the House had rejected a bill prohibiting employers from firing employees “for smoking off the job.” 179 After the motion to reconsider the vote had failed, TI realized that success had probably eluded it: although its lobbyist was still seeking a “vehicle bill to attach privacy provisions to,” the looming end of session left a conference committee report as the only possibility, 180 which never materialized. In contrast to Wasker’s failure in Iowa, TI’s lobbying resulted in the passage of anti-discrimination laws in neighboring Minnesota, Missouri, and Wisconsin, as well as in other states, though tobacco industry initiatives failed in even more states. 181

In spite of this defeat, TI increased lobbyist Wasker’s annual retainer from $44,000 for 1992 to $50,000 for 1993 182—thus perhaps inadvertently substantiating the boilerplate recitation in TI’s standard lobbyist retainer agreement that it was the parties’ intention that payments for services rendered 179 “Smoking Bill Fails,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Apr. 16, 1992 (4B:1).

---

180 Alice O’Connor to Pat Donoho, Action-Trac: Iowa SF 2271 (Apr. 17, 1992), Bates No. T128711514, on tobaccodocuments.org.
181 State Activities Division, Coordinating Committee Meeting (July 20, 1992), T124360512/7-8, on tobaccodocuments.org. In Minnesota and Wisconsin the bills were keyed to “lawful activities,” whereas the Missouri bill hinged on tobacco or alcohol use. Id. at T124360529/30/34.
182 State Activities Division 1993 Budget [Confidential] at 3-9 (Dec. 23, 1992), Bates No. T135952338/60. Wasker’s retainer in 1992 was, considering Iowa’s size and the difficulties associated with blocking anti-tobacco bills, definitely not outlandish compared with the retainers that TI paid lobbyists elsewhere—for example, $100,000 to the well-known Democratic political operative Tom Kelm in Minnesota. Id. at 3-8 to 3-12, Bates No. T135253559-63.
Cigarette Firms Fail to Pass Bill Prohibiting Employer Anti-Smoker Discrimination

were “not in any way contingent upon the defeat or enactment of any legislative...proposal.”

Failure in 1992 did not cause the cigarette companies to abandon their effort to dismantle this particular interference with smoking in Iowa. Nevertheless, although in 1993, the Senate, still controlled by Democrats (27 to 23), passed by a vote of 36 to 11 a bill identical to S.F. 2271, which it had passed in 1992, it died in committee in the narrowly Republican House. Never in the years thereafter did the tobacco industry succeed in securing enactment of a statute in Iowa barring employers from firing or refusing to hire smokers.

---

Cigarette Manufacturers Thwart All Anti-Smoking Legislation During the Years of Divided Party Control of the Legislature: 1993-1996

The [Iowa Restaurant] association’s executive director said most restaurants are not likely to totally ban smoking unless forced to by law for fear of losing customers.¹

Yes, Branstad was a strong tobacco control advocate. It was about the only thing he and I agreed on!²

When the 75th General Assembly convened in January 1993, Democrats, for the first time since 1982, were no longer in control of both houses of the legislature: in addition to having narrowly lost the House majority to Republicans (51-49), they saw their control of the Senate slip to 27-23 (from 29-21). And although they hung on to that Senate majority in the 76th General Assembly (1995-96),³ the fact that Republicans secured an overwhelming 64-36 majority in the House should have made it obvious to anti-tobacco forces that they would, for the time being, be unable to overcome the cigarette oligopoly’s capacity to defeat any legislation designed to subvert its interests.

For the 1993 legislative session the Tobacco Free Coalition in Iowa formulated an extensive lobbying agenda, including a ban on smoking in indoor work sites, restaurants, and other public places, an increase in the cigarette tax, and repeal of the pre-emption provision in the indoor clean air act that prevented local governments from passing ordinances stricter than the (weak) state law.⁴ In addition to a bill to prohibit possession (beyond purchase or smoking) of tobacco by minors,⁵ advocates filed a whole raft of proposals, including a ban on the sale

---

²Email from Johnie Hammond to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 2006). Democrat Hammond was an anti-smoking militant.
⁴“Group Moves to Ban Smoking Areas in Restaurants, Offices,” AP (Jan. 7, 1993), Bates No. 2021174557. See below on the bills. of candy resembling cigarettes, a ban on advertising tobacco products, tobacco stock divestment, and denial of deductibility of tobacco advertising expenses for corporate income taxes, but none saw any action beyond initial assignment to a subcommittee, where they all died, and the legislature ultimately failed to enact any of the Tobacco Free Coalition’s measures.

On March 16, the House Human Resources Committee approved a public health bill (H.F. 542) that included several provisions strengthening Iowa’s weak clean indoor air law that would have been inconsistent with continued smoking in the capitol rotunda. The bill removed both the 250 square foot limit on coverage of public places and the 50-seat limit on coverage of restaurants, but its most important innovations were the repeal of local preemption and confining the designation of smoking areas to situations in which the “transmission of environmental tobacco smoke to adjacent areas can be completely eliminated.” Representative Brammer, a member of the committee, stated that the bill’s practical effect would be to eliminate smoking in public places because not many restaurants would be willing to install the expensive equipment required to remove the smoke. Opponents agreed with this assessment, but asserted that the result would be the loss of business. Little wonder that news of the committee’s recommendation to pass prompted the director of legislative information of the Tobacco Institute’s State Activities Division to exclaim “[t]his is very bad!” and to instruct the Midwest regional office to revise its bill-tracking summary to say that it would toughen the current smoking restriction law by requiring any smoking areas to be enclosed and separately ventilated, and that it would repeal preemption of local smoking, sales and sampling restriction ordinances, and give enforcement authority to Dept. of Public Health. Or something like that! ...

---

This bill is on the House calendar now. I’m sure that Chuck [Wasker] is going to kill it, but losing preemption in Iowa would be a lot worse than gaining it in North Dakota, I’d think!

A few weeks later the full House, after narrowly rejecting (51 to 47) a motion to strip out the antismoking provisions, passed the whole public health bill by a vote of 68 to 32. Republican Stewart Iverson—soon to become the legislature’s highest-profile smoker and anti-anti-smoker—could devise no more telling critique than the rhetorical question as to “[h]ow far we should go in controlling people’s lives,” whereas his fellow party member, David Millage, was more worried about the alleged loss of business in Iowa’s border cities to restaurants in other, less public health-minded states. Some restaurants in one such border city (Council Bluffs) echoed such doomsday forecasts, but at least one manager, 40 percent of whose customers smoked, begged to differ: “‘I honestly don’t think the law would hurt our business that much.... People will still go out to eat, even if they can’t smoke. They can go for an hour or so without a cigarette.’” But general anti-public smoking legislation died in the Senate “at the hands of a senator who smokes”—Des Moines Democrat Florence Buhr, who chaired the Senate Health and Human Rights budget subcommittee and to whom committee chair Elaine Szymoniak generally assigned health issues. The legislation died, according to the Register, because Buhr failed to “push” it for consideration. Elevating profits over people’s health, Buhr claimed that the proposals were “too restrictive to pass muster in the Senate. ‘They could present economic hardship on small restaurants if they have to put in equipment so people don’t smell smoke.’” (Not until a year later did the Senate Appropriations Committee act, 12 Cathey Yoe to V Brown, Subject: Iowa HF542 (Mar. 19, 1993), Bates No. TI28923050.

---

14 See below ch. 32.
removing the anti-smoking provisions, as committee chair Larry Murphy put it, “to avoid entangling a contentious budget fight with the smoking issue.” The next day the Senate adopted an amendment that struck Brammer’s amendment, the provisions of which were never enacted.

Reviewing the 1993 session, Hurst Marshall, the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company’s regional director of government relations for the region including Iowa, informed Roger Mozingo, the company’s vice president for state government relations, that no legislation had been enacted “having an [sic] major impact on RJRT or the tobacco industry,” adding—incongruously—that: “Iowa is a very difficult state for the tobacco industry. The Legislature continues to be anti-tobacco and liberal.” More ominously, he observed that “1994 will be a real test for the industry. The ‘floods of 1993’ have weakened the economy and additional revenues will be needed to offset the losses which have occurred.”

That the cigarette manufacturers passed the test to their self-satisfaction—“an excellent year for the tobacco industry”—was in no small part due to Democratic Senate Majority Leader Wally Horn, a former Cedar Rapids high school teacher and coach, who in 1986 had opposed a weak clean indoor air bill.

---

21Before starting at Reynolds in 1988, Mozingo had been employed at TI, being senior vice president of the State Activities Division from 1983 to 1988; before being a vice president of Tobacco Associates (1970-74), where he developed foreign markets for U.S. flue-cured leaf, he had been an assistant agricultural extension agent/tobacco market specialist for the North Carolina Department of Agriculture. R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., IV. Staff and Structure. D. Staff Bios (1980), Bates No. 507639363/4.

22Letter from Hurst Marshall to Roger Mozingo (Aug. 16, 1993), Bates No. 513336236. Marshall incorrectly reported that H.C.R. 22 prohibiting smoking in the state capitol building had been enacted. RJR Tobacco did not even have its own lobbyist in Iowa, relying instead, on industry lobbyists.

Cigarette Manufacturers Thwart All Anti-Smoking Legislation: 1993-1996

because "I just don’t think we should be approving this kind of legislation," and now chose to kill yet another bill to strengthen the state’s clean indoor air law. At the outset of the 1993 session, Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee consultant Lowell Junkins, one of Horn’s predecessors as Iowa Senate Democratic Majority Leader in the mid-1980s, “met several times with leadership,” including Horn. Surely Marshall did not mean Horn when he repeated in 1994 that “Iowa continues to be a very difficult state due to an anti-tobacco and liberal legislature.” After all: “Horn, a non-smoker, said he decided against allowing a smoking debate this year in deference to smokers, who are finding their habit increasingly restricted. ‘You have to take into consideration that smokers are addicted…. There’s a certain amount of tolerance you have to have, and I think we’re moving as fast as we can’ in controlling secondhand smoke.” The Des Moines Register saw absolutely no need for tolerance: vis-a-vis “downright deadly” secondhand smoke “non-smokers needn’t jeopardize their health to cater to the self-inflicted addiction of the few.” Although even the editors were unable to shed all of their market-knows-best biases (the “bill went too far in dictating to restaurateurs policies that should be 26 TILMC’s purpose was allegedly to “contribute to greater cooperation among the various segments of the tobacco industry” by educating the public about problems facing the tobacco industry including unwarranted restrictions on the sale, advertising, and promotion of cigarettes. In 1985, its members included the Tobacco Institute and the Bakery, Confectionery, & Tobacco Workers International Union, United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners, International Brotherhood of Firemen & Oilers, and Sheet Metal Workers International Association. “Tobacco Industry Companies, Committees and Organizations (as of 9/16/88)” at 8-9, on http://tobaccodocuments.org/ness/15.html.

27 In 1990 Junkins was TI’s labor consultant. Pat Wilson to Jack Nelson at 2 (Philip Morris USA Interoffice Correspondence, Gov. Affairs, June 11, 1990), Bates No. 20246722792. By 1991, when he had formed Junkins-Hultman and Associates with former Republican Senate Majority and Minority Leader Calvin Hultman, Junkins wrote a memorandum to TI about his “educating House members on the regressive mature [sic] of sin taxes,” mentioning that Senate Majority Leader Bill Hutchins “is on our side....” Lowell Junkins to Susan Struntz (Apr. 5, 1991), Bates No. TNWL0051551.

private business decisions”), it did hail the bill’s proposed repeal of local preemption (“[t]hat’s called home rule, one of the hallmarks of participatory democracy”) and assail the “cancer-pushers” whose “expensive array of lobbyists” it hoped would “not prevail over the well-being of the three-fourths of Iowa adults who do not smoke.”

Horn’s Democratic colleague, Senator James Riordan, who had been named floor manager of the stillborn clean indoor air bill S.F. 2298, appeared to harbor some skepticism as to the real object of Horn’s deference when he admitted that he had “never been confident that it had enough support to pass because of opposition from ‘the big hitters in the rotunda,’ the pro-tobacco lobbyists.” That session’s anti-smoking bill, observed the Register, had “drawn the attention of a small army of lobbyists, many of whom [we]re certain to be prominent in financing lawmakers’ re-election campaigns this year.” Chief among them was Calvin Hultman, Philip Morris, USA Inc.’s registered lobbyist, who had shown boundless tolerance for smoking as Republican Senate Majority and Minority Leader from 1979 to 1990, and became Philip Morris’s counsel as soon as he retired. For Brammer, these well-paid lobbyists—for example, Hultman received $27,500 from Philip Morris in 1995, while TILMC paid Junkins $18,000— were “‘the unholy friends of the tobacco holocaust.’” That cigarette companies were paying such amounts to former Senate leaders so that they could “avoid scrutiny by discreetly currying favor with former colleagues” may have seemed only commonsensical, but former Senate Majority Leader and later R. J. Reynolds Tobacco lobbyist Hutchins nevertheless hurled a counterintuitive “‘I think that’s bullshit’” at the notion. Indeed, since most of the tobacco industry’s legislative payments were made not in the form of direct campaign contributions to individual legislators, but in “soft money” channeled through parties, financing junkets, and making donations to legislators’ favorite charities, they were able to make their exercise of influence less conspicuous.

Horn made no effort to hide his acquiescence in the cigarette industry’s anti-regulatory, market-knows-best agenda, which, according to Senator Beverly Hannon, one of his most outspoken adversaries, was rooted in his principled 32See below this ch.

34Pat Wilson to Jack Nelson (Philip Morris USA Interoffice Correspondence, Gov. Affairs, June 11, 1990), Bates No. 20246722792.

Cigarette Manufacturers Thwart All Anti-Smoking Legislation: 1993-1996

opposition to government regulation and restriction of individual behavior.\textsuperscript{36} Seeking to justify his refusal to permit debate on the bill that would have increased restrictions on smoking in restaurants—an effort that Lester Davis, head of the state restaurant association, dismissed on the grounds that there was no need to “‘try to fix what doesn’t seem to be broken’”\textsuperscript{37}—he claimed that “restaurants are banning smoking on their own, and that government interference is not needed. He also said that smokers’ rights need to be considered. ‘I think it’s consideration of the smokers....’” Horn’s defense of involuntary smoke exposure in restaurants was continuous with his refusal to protect his Senate colleagues and employees. Horn was, as the press also noted, keeping “the Senate a bastion of smokers’ rights at the Capitol. The only cigarette vending machine in a state building in Iowa is located behind the Senate chamber, where smoking is allowed in an open area alongside the space where Senate clerks work at typewriters and computer terminals.” Using his own rearguard inaction as an excuse, Horn declared: “‘We’ve got our own problems in the Senate. How can we push faster on the outside?’” And, completing the self-executing vicious circle, when asked whether there was “‘any other workplace in Iowa where workers are subjected to such a smoky environment,’” he replied—apparently without the slightest tinge of self-consciousness or self-irony—“‘I’d say every restaurant and bar.’”\textsuperscript{38} Years later, Horn sought to explain his opposition to restrictions on smoking as rooted in the fact that the “group” he “represented” consisted of heavy smokers such as Rife.\textsuperscript{39} Though it might seem odd that the Democratic majority leader represented the Republican minority leader, presumably he meant that he needed to accommodate Rife on this issue in order to secure his cooperation on some other matters.\textsuperscript{40}

In 1994, the counter-democratic character of Horn’s refusal to permit debate on the strengthening amendments to the clean indoor air bill (S.F. 2298) was grotesquely underscored by Horn’s own public admission that the bill had been gaining Senate support: “‘It would be real close, and I almost assume that it would pass.’”\textsuperscript{41} The bill, which the Human Resources Committee had approved

\textsuperscript{36}Telephone interview with Beverly Hannon, Anamosa, IA (Feb. 28, 2007).

\textsuperscript{37}“Statewatch,” [Philip Morris] Smoker’s Advocate 5(2):(2) (Mar./Apr. 1994), Bates No. 204332072/3.

\textsuperscript{39}Telephone interview with Wally Horn, Cedar Rapids (May 6, 2007).

\textsuperscript{40}Email from Beverly Hannon (May 7, 2007).

by a vote of 9 to 2 on March 3, 42 would have amended the clean indoor air law to cover public places with fewer than 250 square feet of floor space and restaurants with 50 or fewer seats (but nevertheless permitted such small restaurants to be designated as smoking areas in their entirety, provided that they “issue a written health warning to prospective and current employees which states that due to the environment of the restaurant, the employee may be working in a hazardous environment”); permit designation of smoking areas “only...if transmission of environmental tobacco smoke to adjacent areas can be eliminated”; and repeal local government preemption. 43 Despite the “reprieve” that the committee granted small restaurants, Democrat Jim Riordan called the bill “another major step moving us toward a smoke-free environment’ in public places.” 44 Since the bill would have repealed the preemption language that the tobacco industry, as part of a nationwide strategy to undermine state anti-smoking laws, had had inserted as an amendment in 1990 designed to prevent local governments from passing ordinances stricter than the weak state law, 45 it was hardly surprising that one of Horn’s predecessors as Majority Leader, Hultman, was closely monitoring the bill’s progress for Philip Morris as its lobbyist. Hultman immediately faxed to the company a copy of the Senate Human Resources Committee’s proposed amendment with his handwritten comments on the positions adopted by various members on an amendment to strike preemption. Republican Mary Kramer had observed that “local situations require local decisions. Take preemption off.” Republican Maggie Tinsman, referring to a controversy over another local preemption issue, had said: “Home Rule, not like fertilizer where preemption is needed.” Democrat Florence Buhr (a heavy smoker), had opined, “Good,” but for a different reason: “if we do away w/preemption then we don’t need the amendment we just adopted” (namely, the aforementioned deregulation of smaller restaurants). For Riordan the proposed amendment was “Very Good - If we 43 S.F. 2298, §§ 1-3, 5 (Mar. 4, 1994). Bars declared to be smoking areas in their entirety were also required to issue health warnings. The study bill from which it derived did not permit restaurants with 50 or fewer seats to be declared entirely smoking. S.S.B. 2005 (1994). It is unclear why Lloyd-Jones, one of the Senate’s strongest supporters of smoking regulation, presented amendment SSB 2005.701 75 embodying this backdoor restoration of the exemption for smaller restaurants. No Nay votes were registered in committee. [Senate] Committee Minutes for Human Resources (Mar. 3, 1994) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).

45 See above ch. 27.

2865
eliminate preemption a local entity could disregard the 50 seat law and make smaller rest. comply w/larger rest. requirements.” And finally Democrat Elaine Szymoniak also held local control to be good because it was a minimum and “local could go stronger.”

By this point the restaurant industry had already begun “gearing up to block a legislative effort to protect diners from cigarette smoke.” Davis, the executive director of the Iowa Restaurant and Beverage Association, opined that these proposed rules “simply go too far in trying to balance the interests of non-smokers.” Reciting the cigarette oligopoly’s accommodationist nonsense, he insisted that the existing system was “working well” by virtue of members’ doing “their best to make allowances for all their patrons, regardless of whether they smoke or not.”

Davis may have grasped the ultimate point of the new anti-smoking initiative when he charged that more than half of his organization’s members would have to prohibit smoking because they would not be able to afford the installation of separate ventilation for smoking rooms. A membership survey revealed that 55 percent guessed that they would lose 20 percent or more of business if they totally banned smoking. Interestingly, while only 8 percent of members stated that they at the time accommodated smokers’ and non-smokers’ interests by not allowing smoking at all, 29 percent responded that banning smoking altogether was “the most reasonable policy towards accommodating the wishes of smokers and non-smokers in your establishment.”

On March 28, 1994, S.F. 2298 was referred to the Human Resources Committee, where it died. (The cigarette “industry plan,” following the bill’s passage by the Human Resources Committee on March 4, had been to have it “referred to second committee where legislation will die,” but killing it proved to be even easier.) After Horn had “refused to allow that bill to be debated by the 46Junkins-Hultman, “Senate Study Bill 2005” (Mar. 3, 1994), Bates No. 2065503468/9. The amendment by Republican Merlin Bartz to strike the preemption language (meaning apparently the repeal of preemption) lost by a vote of 4 to 6. Two Democrats voted for it: Buhr and Patty Judge, whom as lieutenant governor in 2008 the governor (inaccurately) singled out as a key actor in the passage of the statewide smoking ban. [Senate] Committee Minutes for Human Resources (Mar. 3, 1994) (copy furnished by SHSI DM); below ch. 36.

50[R. J. Reynolds,] Hurst Marshall to Jan Krebs, Subject: Weekly Report - Region III full Senate,"\textsuperscript{51} the irrepressible and ubiquitous Representative Brammer offered it in the House as an amendment to the appropriations bill for various public health programs,\textsuperscript{52} stressing that the "danger of second-hand smoke is well known."\textsuperscript{53} The House adopted the amendment by a close 51 to 47 roll call vote,\textsuperscript{54} and then passed the whole bill 79 to 19.\textsuperscript{55} However, the Senate Appropriations Committee rewrote the bill, which then no longer included Brammer's amendment,\textsuperscript{56} and the full Senate adopted the committee amendment 29 to 21,\textsuperscript{57} showing yet again, as the press put it, the "strength of smokers in the Senate, where cigarettes are sold alongside candy in a vending machine."\textsuperscript{58} Although senators agreed that that vote did not constitute a "true reflection of the Senate's sentiment on tougher smoking restrictions," some were seeking a "middle ground," and Riordan declared that "[w]e're going to get something done this year,"\textsuperscript{59} the initiative remained dead. Two days later the House concurred in the
Cigarette Manufacturers Thwart All Anti-Smoking Legislation: 1993-1996

Senate version of the bill by a vote of 78 to 19,60 putting an end to yet another attempt to reduce secondhand smoke exposure in Iowa. As the R.J. Reynolds regional official in charge of the Midwest proudly reported at the end of the biennium in 1994: “All legislation having an adverse impact on RJRT and the tobacco industry was defeated.”61

As the 76th General Assembly was getting underway, the Human Resources Committee in February 1995 filed and approved by a vote of 6 to 262 yet another bill (S.F. 203) that authorized designated smoking areas only “if transmission of environmental tobacco smoke to adjacent areas can be eliminated.”63 Although such attempts to apply statewide anti-smoking laws to the Senate were never successful before, the Capitol, according to the Register, was “one of the main targets” of the bill because the statehouse’s smoking area was “at the back of the staff room behind the Senate, but smokes drifts into the chamber and into other areas.”64 The bill, however, was then referred to the Small Business, Economic Development, and Tourism Committee, where, unsurprisingly, it died.65

That the bill was so easily killed may in large part have been a function of the early and massive organized resistance that Philip Morris directed at it. Looking back in September 1995, one member of the company’s huge public relations staff informed two company writers that: “Last year we generated pre-season letters to several legislators in Iowa and want to do so again because we got a lot of positive feedback.” The technique involved letters to identified Iowa

---

63 S.F. 203, § 1 (Feb. 23, 1995, by Human Resources Committee).
65 State of Iowa: 1995: Journal of the Senate: 1995 Regular Session Seventy-Sixth General Assembly 1:904 (Mar. 28). Ex-Senator Beverly Hannon surmised that Majority Leader Horn had not favored the bill and therefore assigned it to a hostile committee. Email from Beverly Hannon (Mar. 15, 2007). The committee chairman, Steve Hansen, had been hailed by the Tobacco Institute in 1991 for helping preserve preemption. State of Iowa: 1995: Journal of the Senate: 1995 Regular Session Seventy-Sixth General Assembly 1:24; above ch. 28. At the outset of the next session the new executive director of the Iowa Hospitality Association made sure to urge Hansen to make no changes in current smoking laws, which were “working well....” Doni DeNucci to Steven Hansen (Jan. 8, 1996), Bates No. 2061860066.
consumers of Philip Morris's cigarettes who would then write letters to their state legislators. Then on January 12, 1995, at the outset of state legislative sessions across the country, a young public relations employee at corporate headquarters engaged in this interoffice email banter with the midwestern regional office: “I feel like it’s the official start of mob[ilization] season, and no better way to start it then [sic] with a mob for you guys & Cal [Hultman] in IA...(Really, I don’t say that to all the RD’s).”

On January 19, 1995, more than a month before S.F. 203 had even been filed, Philip Morris, through a consulting entity (Optima Direct, Inc.), was finalizing its targeted propagandizing of voters by telephone on the “Issue: Oppose Any Anti-Smoking Legislation.” One script, targeting the constituents of Representative Horace Daggett, a twelfth-term Republican chairing the House Human Resources Committee, instructed callers to ask contactees, on behalf of Philip Morris, whether they were aware that in a few weeks the Iowa legislature might be considering “legislation that restricts the rights of smokers....” Regardless of whether they did or not, constituents next heard: “Despite paying more than their fair share of taxes, smokers in Iowa often have to comply with strict governmental regulations. It is simply unfair for politicians to continue to single out adults who choose to smoke for such restrictive and punitive legislation. Do you agree?” Those who did agree were told that their “state representative needs to hear that!” The caller then asked whether they would be willing to call Daggett “to let him know you oppose any more legislation restricting the rights of smokers such as increasing the cigarette excise tax or banning smoking in more public and private areas....” Those who were willing received Daggett’s phone number, but only if they “understand the issue, are articulate, and polite, and...adamantly oppose anti-smoking legislation.” In contrast, callers were to say good-bye to those who would not call, were undecided, not interested in the issue, or preferred another action. “I am sorry to have disturbed you” was the script for those who became “irate or hostile.” After the script had been finalized on January 23, surviving 66Celeste Victoria to Randall Eiger and Mike Folie (Sept. 5, 1995), Bates No. 2046761659. At the age of 41, Victoria was killed in the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001. “Portraits of Grief,” NYT, June 16, 2002 (29:1-5 and 4-5).

68In 1977 Daggett had filed H.F. 154 mandating the teaching of creationism in schools.

reports of 154 calls made (of a universe of 480 planned calls) during the next five days stated that 58 people said they “will call” Daggett, while 53 were undecided or not interested and 9 hung up early or refused.70

On January 27, Junkins-Hultman faxed a copy of Senate Study Bill 61, which, as proposed by Senate Human Resources Committee Democratic chairperson Elaine Szymoniak, was identical with what was filed later as S.F. 2174. Its most prominent innovations were the deletion of local preemption and conditioning of designated smoking areas on the ability to eliminate the “transmission of environmental tobacco smoke to adjacent areas....”71 In faxing SSB 61 to corporate headquarters on February 14, 1995 to give an “Iowa Heads Up,” Philip Morris’s Chicago office called attention to these features by stressing that “Cal [Hultman] called this afternoon saying we may have to prepare a phone bank to the full Senate as early as next week.”72 (A phone bank, ex-Senator Hannon explained, involves hiring people or getting volunteers “to man the phones from a central location (multiple phones). They’d probably call tobacco supporters they knew of in each senator’s district and urge them to call their senators against Hammond’s bill.”)73 Already the next day Philip Morris and Optima Direct were exchanging drafts of a telephone script directed at motivating smokers to call their state senators in opposition to SSB 61. Though the “issue” was labeled “pre-emption,” in fact it was not even mentioned in the script; instead, those calling on behalf of Philip Morris were instructed to ask whether the smokers were aware that the bill “would virtually ban smoking in all public places such as restaurants and bars.” Whether they were or not, they were next told that if SSB 61 passed, “smokers in Iowa would no longer be able to enjoy a cigarette in restaurants and other public places in the state.” If they agreed that “the total smoking ban in all 70State: Iowa, Issue: Oppose Anti-Smoking Legislation, ODI Code: PM702, Targets: calls were bad numbers or disconnects, while 8 were “deceased.” At the same time Philip Morris was also making calls to the constituents of at least seven other legislators, including Tony Bisignano, Nancy Boettger, Donna Hammitt, Steven Hansen, Neil

71SSB-61, §§ 2, 1 (Jan. 27, 1995), Bates No. 2046761585/87. The addressee of the fax was not stated, but presumably it was Philip Morris’s Chicago office.

72Sherree Niepomnik to Joan Cryan (Feb. 14, 1995), Bates No. 2046761522. In the further remark that “Cal would like people to tell the Senate to leave the bill as is; do not amend it,” the writer presumably meant “law” rather than “bill.” It seems implausible that Hultman wanted the Senate to vote on this bill as it was.

73Email from Beverly Hannon to Marc Linder (Mar. 16, 2007).
restaurants is unfair and unnecessary,” which “a small but vocal group of anti-smokers” was trying to impose along with their beliefs on smokers, the caller urged them to tell their senator that the current system of smoking and nonsmoking sections “works fine.” The script even suggested a script for smokers to use in their calls to senators focusing on Philip Morris’s buzzword “accommodation.” On March 30, two days after S.F. 203 had been referred to the Senate Small Business Committee, Philip Morris was already drafting a telephone script directed at smokers who were asked to call one of four key members of the Senate Finance Committee with the same message that had been drafted for SSB 61. Apparently believing that smokers needed such other-directed psychological support to weigh in on the side of further exposure of nonsmokers to secondhand smoke, Philip Morris had one script assert that “[a]ccording to recent public opinion polls, most Americans believe that smokers and non smokers should be accommodated in restaurants and public places.” (One group of smokers whom Philip Morris sought to avoid were those who declared: “My spouse/relative just died from lung cancer....” The company’s “cue sheet” instructed callers to terminate such calls with: “I am very sorry. Thank you for your time.”)

Nor did Philip Morris’s mobilization end with the end of the session and the death of the bills it had opposed. On May 23, Philip Morris’s Chicago regional office emailed the public relations headquarters in New York asking it to draft “letters for a mobilization to select Iowa members.” The “message points” for the five to six letters for each of eight legislators (including Sen. Bisignano and Rep. Daggett) included: “Understand that legislative efforts to ban smoking or severely restrict smoking in restaurants and public places failed to get passed...during the last legislative session.” “The legislation is advanced by a few 74Iowa ODI Code: 721, Targets: Full Senate, Issue: Pre-Emption, Draft 3: 02/16/95, Bates No. 2046761518. See also Draft 1: 02/15/95, Bates No. 2046761520 (from Joan Cryan to Gretchen).

---

75[Philip Morris] Iowa ODI Code: 755, Targets: 4 Senate Finance Committee Members, Issue: Smoking Ban SF203, Draft 2: 03/30/95, Bates No. 2046761513. See also Final 2: 04/04/95, Bates No. 2046761507.

77Philip Morris Cue Sheet (Mar. 18, 1996), Bates No. 2061860077. This phone bank dealt with a similar bill (S.F. 2174). The cue sheet also prompted callers, when confronted with a skeptical “Why should I help?...Philip Morris is just concerned about profits,” to concede that point, but then to add that the company was “also concerned with educating consumers about smoker’s [sic] rights.”
zealots to limit the rights of individuals to enjoy themselves while out in public.”
“We believe in accommodating the preferences of nonsmokers and smokers alike through establishing smoking and non-smoking areas is [sic] the best policy.”
Within a few minutes headquarters emailed back indicating that it had initiated the process for drafting a letter “which would be mailed to our smokers who took part in IA in opposition to repeal of preemption to generate letters thanking the legislators who voted in our favor on the issue.”

The drafts of the “Iowa Mobe/Thanks for Preemption” letters told smokers that thanks to their efforts and those of their state representative, Iowa “still has a reasonable state-wide smoking law...that prevents the imposition of harsher local restrictions.” Without identifying the defects of grassroots local democracy, Philip Morris commented that preemption “means that anti-smoking zealots cannot use their influence at the local level to ban restaurant or other public smoking in Iowa’s cities, towns, villages and counties.” In offering “talking points” that smokers could use in writing letters to legislators, Philip Morris stressed that: “Anti-smoking bans are not supported by the public. They are proposed by a handful of zealots determined to limit the freedom of individuals to enjoy themselves in public.” The company did not explain how such a tiny minority, bereft of public backing, could possibly secure the requisite majority in any political subdivision to pass any ordinance. The only sense that could be teased out of Philip Morris’s accusation that anti-smoking zealots were “determined to limit the freedom of individuals to enjoy themselves in public” was that they were puritans; yet the company’s talking point that smokers “believe in smoking policies that accommodate the preferences of both non-smokers and smokers in restaurants and other public places” made no sense: if nonsmokers’ objective was to prevent smokers from enjoying themselves by smoking, how could nonsmokers’ preferences be accommodated by permitting smokers to smoke in restaurants? And if Philip Morris had been forced to admit that nonsmokers’ real goal was not to be exposed to secondhand smoke, then it would have had to deal with the public health issue, which its propaganda never mentioned. Instead, it suggested that smokers praise their legislators for having “stood firm in support of individual liberty and smokers’ rights” and “letting businesses decide how best to serve their own customers,” which was “the best 78Sherree Niepomnik to Joan Cryan, Subject: Iowa Thank You’s (May 23, 1995), Bates No. 2046761574A. The other legislators were Senators Hansen, Boettger, and Maddox, and Representatives Hammitt, Harrison, and Vande Hoef.

79Joan Cryan to Sherree Niepomnik, Subject: Iowa Thank You’s (May 23, 1995), Bates No. 2046761574.
policy.” In another draft, Philip Morris offered as a talking point for smokers to use with legislators that “most Iowans support the concepts of personal liberty, individual choice and personal responsibility”—without indicating who was to take responsibility for the thousands of deaths caused annually by exposure to secondhand smoke.

Already by the end of August 1995, the lobbying firm of the former Democratic and Republican Senate Majority Leaders Junkins-Hultman sent Philip Morris’s public relations department a “mob list” of Iowa legislators to whom the company should urge consumer-smokers to send letters of continued support. The lobbyists suggested that this “pre-session mob,” which included seven of the eight legislators on the previous list as well as Democratic Senate Majority Leader Wally Horn and Republican House Majority Leader Brent Siegrist, stress “accommodation.” A few days later the corporate public relations department was offering to drafters as “message points” the expression of appreciation to legislators for acknowledging “the rights of smokers and non-smokers” as well as “for not tampering with laws that are already in place that...allow business owners the right to decide whether or not to accommodate [sic] people, employees or customers who choose to smoke.” Philip Morris’s PR department did not explain how leaving in place a law that empowered building owners to designate virtually all of the public space as smoking areas constituted acknowledgment of nonsmokers’ rights. A sample finished letter from Lance Pressl, a Philip Morris regional director of Government Affairs, to a Des Moines smoker requested that he write his state senator, Tony Bisignano, and encourage him by telling him that “[i]t takes political courage to stand up for freedom.” In particular, Bisignano was to be praised for having helped keep on the books a law under which businesses “can still use common sense, and their own judgment, when deciding whether to provide accommodation for their customers who choose to smoke.” What “common sense” meant and what its relationship was to scientific knowledge about the health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure were, once again, left unexplained.

On January 4, 1996, a few days before the second session of the 76th General Assembly convened, Governor Branstad announced a year-long Campaign for the Family, supported by a melange of “strong families” legislative recommendations,

---

80 Draft Iowa Mode/Thanks for Preemption (May 1995), Bates No. 2046761572/3.
82 Junkins-Hultman to Joan Cryan (Aug. 29, 1995), Bates No. 2046761651.
83 Celeste Victoria to Randall Eiger and Mike Folie (Sept. 5, 1995), Bates No. 2046761659.
84 Lance Pressl to John Q. Sample (Oct. 10, 1995), Bates No., 2046749017.
ranging from a tightening of the state’s no-fault divorce law to denying benefits increases to welfare mothers who had additional children. Branstad’s use of his “bully pulpit” to “engage people in a positive and constructive way of how we can reinforce and support families” embraced among his “healthy families” recommendations an array of repeatedly defeated anti-smoking initiatives, including a ban on distributing free tobacco samples and on outdoor advertising within a thousand feet of schools and playgrounds and a smoking ban in public places regardless of size (without, however, repealing the exemptions for bars and small restaurants). Of especial importance to the governor was conferring on cities the power to adopt smoking restrictions stricter than the state law’s. As Branstad explained to reporters: “We believe that as a matter of home rule, this pre-emption ought to be eliminated and local government be given the authority to do that.... It was one of the things that the tobacco lobby got stuck in the law that I think was not good public policy.”

In an immediate reaction the very next day, Jack Lenzi, the Philip Morris regional director for governmental affairs in Chicago, informed the PR department in New York that in Iowa “we also face a Gov. who is supporting a public place smoking ban, excluding restaurants/tarvers [sic] under 50 persons.... That message is simple, no new smoking restrictions are needed in Iowa, current law is sufficient. The Iowa Hospitality Assoc. is already engaged on this later issue.” Lenzi’s sense of certainty was not misplaced: three days later the IHA’s new executive director, Doni DeNucci, gave him the we-know-which-side-our-bread-is-buttered-on assurances that Philip Morris had come to expect—but did not always receive—from such entities in exchange for its “generous membership investment.” Noting that the Association’s “effective legislative platforms...would not have been possible without the continued loyal support of corporate members, like Philip Morris,” DeNucci assured Lenzi that she was “looking forward to our partnership in 1996 and into the future.”

At the same time Lenzi jotted down an eleven-point campaign for mobilizing support from various targeted groups and tobacco-allied industries/companies to which he assigned Philip Morris, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco, and UST Inc. (a large smokeless tobacco producer) and/or their lobbyists. For example, under the very first heading “Grass Roots,” he wrote: “Retailers - PM, RJR[.] Consumers - PM
Cigarette Manufacturers Thwart All Anti-Smoking Legislation: 1993-1996

To the largest cigarette sellers in Iowa, “High V” [sic; should be Hy-Vee], Casey’s, and “Come & Go” [sic; should be Kum & Go] he delegated lobbyists Charles Wasker and Cal Hultman/Kim Haus, who were also designated as the agents to approach the Iowa Association of Business and Industry; Wasker’s partner, William Wimmer, would be charged with securing the cooperation of river (gambling) boats and race tracks. Reynolds was tasked with involving the chambers of commerce, while each of the three tobacco companies was to organize its own sales force.\(^88\)

In launching his Campaign for the Family during his Condition of the State address to the legislature on January 9, Branstad, who traced many national and state problems to “the decay of the family,” also proposed making communities safer by enacting the death penalty, a move that, together with his call for a tougher divorce law and parental notification for minors’ abortions, prompted Democratic leaders to opine that his (conservative) program might not be crowned with success.\(^89\)

Within a few days Philip Morris was bulking up its armory of anti-preemption-repeal arguments by asserting, without any supporting evidence, that local control “would unreasonably burden...adult customers,” who “should be able to purchase tobacco products, like other age restricted products, on the same terms and conditions from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Adult smokers would be able to find the products they are seeking on the shelves, comparably displayed and promoted, regardless of whether the retail outlet is located in Sioux City, Des Moines or Iowa City.”\(^90\) Why its addicted consumers would be unreasonably burdened by having to ask a store employee for their preferred trademarked delivery device of their next “nice jolt of nicotine,” Philip Morris did not

---

\(^{88}\)Untitled, undated handwritten sheet attached to the aforementioned “Strong Families” page, Bates No. 2061860091. These pages were kept in a file folder labeled “SB 2074,” which presumably designated S.S.B. 2074, the source of S.F. 2174, the chief anti-smoking bill of 1996. Bates No. 2061860074. The conclusion that Lenzi wrote these notes is based on the very strong resemblance to the handwriting on another nearly contemporaneous handwritten document on a personalized sheet from a pad bearing his printed name. Untitled (Feb. 28, 1996), Bates No. 2061860139.

\(^{90}\)“Iowa Tobacco Uniformity Provision” (Jan. 15, 1996), Bates No. 2078842294/5.

Cigarette Manufacturers Thwart All Anti-Smoking Legislation: 1993-1996

explain.

Later in January, Ally Milder, an R. J. Reynolds Midwest regional field employee, attended a meeting in Des Moines about a proposal that Branstad would be introducing to repeal preemption, raise fees for local enforcement, “enact a smoking ban,” and restrict billboard advertising. In what, against the foregoing account of the 1995 session, must be viewed as a vast exaggeration, Reynolds’ “Public Issues Update” for the latter half of January, which was sent to Tom Griscom, the executive vice president for external relations, asserted: “The industry barely hung onto preemption last session when Branstad was not leading the charge for repeal. With his involvement now it is a much more dangerous situation.” In order to vanquish this perceived threat a coalition was formed composed of Philip Morris, the Tobacco Institute, R. J. Reynolds, tobacco wholesalers, the smokeless tobacco industry, TILMC, and IHA. In addition, the industry immediately began a program to contact House members.92

On January 23, 1996, Hammond introduced S.F. 2069, which would, beginning July 1, 1999, have eliminated the designated smoking area exception to the prohibition on smoking in a public place (except in factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces that the general public did not usually frequent) or a public meeting. It would also have eliminated preemption by causing more restrictive local ordinances to “supersede any inconsistent or conflicting provision” of the statewide smoking law. S.F. 2069 would also have amended the cigarette sales law by: banning all vending machine sales; banning all tobacco advertising within 1000 feet of any playground or school used primarily by persons under 18; limiting tobacco advertising to black and white text; and eliminating local preemption in the same way as in the public smoking law.93 The bill did not even make it out of subcommittee.94

Two weeks later Hammond’s Senate Human Resources Committee filed a weaker bill (S.F. 2174), which would have extended smoking restrictions marginally by eliminating the exemption for public places of fewer than 250 square feet, covering licensed child care centers, and repealing local preemption; it would also amended the cigarette sales law by including the 1000 foot advertising ban and preemption repeal of S.F. 2069.95 The same day, February 9,

---

95S.F. 2174, §§ 1, 2, 5, 6 (Feb. 9, 1996, by Human Resources Committee). It was formerly S.S.B. 2074 (by Hammond, Dvorsky, and Kramer), which Hammond had it passed Hammond’s Human Resources Committee (by a vote of 8 to 0). At the same time the committee passed by a vote of 8 to 1 a bill prohibiting cigarette vending machine sales except in bars, for which Senator (and soon to be Governor) Tom Vilsack voted while criticizing it as unlikely to do much good because instead of discouraging underage smoking, it would only encourage formation of a black market. Two weeks later R. J. Reynolds was working on a program “to get smokers and retailers to contact their state senators about the bill, which appears to be stalled for the moment.” By mid-March the Philip Morris telephone mobilization machine was again in full swing. The “troops” this time were retailers, who were supposed to be directed to “senate targets” on the issue of “repeal of uniformity.” The crucial trigger for launching retailers was the claim that they “may no longer be able to compete on a level playing field. Your business may be at a significant disadvantage compared to those in neighboring communities who are not subjected to any new restrictions.” A week later the bill died before the full Senate took it up. It was presumably this bill that Lenzi, the Philip Morris Midwest governmental relations director, meant successfully amended to include the preemption repeal language. SSB 2074.50176, Bates No. 2061860085 (undated). The account by Holli Hartman, “Committee Passes Smoking Bills,” DMR, Feb. 9, 1996, Bates No. 2061860153, drastically distorted the bill by misreporting that under it the only indoor places for smoking would be “bars, restaurants, tobacco stores, or their own homes. Or they would have to restrict their nicotine habit to tightly controlled designated areas.”

101It was referred back to the Human Resources Committee. State of Iowa: 1996: Journal of the Senate: 1996 Regular Session Seventy-Sixth General Assembly 1:985 (Mar. 25). Presumably R. J. Reynolds’ legislative agents meant S.F. 2174 when they erroneously predicted that the senate would “soon vote on a bill by Governor Terry Branstad that is a mini-version of the FDA’s proposed regulations complete with advertising, self-service, coupon and promotion bans. Retailers in 18 key senate districts are being notified and will call to urge opposition to the bill.” Tim Hyde to Tom Griscom, Public Issues Update Mar. 18-22, 1995 [sic; must be 1996], (Feb. 24, 2002 [sic]), Bates No. 530289574/5.
when, on February 28, supremely and justifiably confident in the majority leader’s commitment to Philip Morris’s cause, he handwrote himself a note: “Sen - Wally will hold, no re-referral.”

In one of his last anti-tobacco initiatives before he left the legislature, became a named plaintiff in a class-action lawsuit against cigarette manufacturers, and died of emphysema caused by 40 years of cigarette smoking, Representative Philip Brammer on April 1, 1996, filed an amendment to the appropriations bill for the Public Health Department and other related agencies that, based on the declaration of “the use of cigarettes and other tobacco products to be an immediate health emergency of epidemic proportions and a menace as an entry-level drug in the youth population,” would, inter alia, have repealed the local preemption provisions in the public smoking and cigarette laws, prohibited vending machine and self-serve display sales, and instructed the attorney general to file a civil action against cigarette manufacturers to recover the full amount of the sums that the state had paid for medical services for Iowa residents attributable to the use of cigarettes or other tobacco products (for which expenses the companies would be held strictly liable).

After Brammer had raised the point of order that his own amendment was not germane and finally secured a roll call vote on suspending the rules to consider his amendment, the 35 to 59 defeat was almost perfectly along party lines: only one Republican and one Democrat defected. The Republican was Rosemary Thomson, a self-characterized conservative, who had previously worked for drug-free schools for the U.S. Department of Education, and attributed the generally unsuccessful efforts to strengthen the anti-tobacco laws during her years in the legislature to the powerful tobacco company lobby. The lone Democrat was Michael Cataldo, a cigarette smoker, who four years later resigned from the House after he had been convicted of having repeatedly made obscene telephone calls to a woman he called at random.

102Jack Lenzi (Feb. 28, 1996), Bates No. 2061860139/40.
106Telephone interview with Rosemary Thomson, Marion, IA (Apr. 3, 2008).
108Lindsey Henry, “Cataldo Convicted, Leaves Race,” DMR, Aug 2, 2000 (1A)
Although none of the opponents of Brammer’s amendments had spoken against them, when Governor Branstad later that day insisted that the state should consider a lawsuit, legislative leaders commented that his position would not change the outcome. At the end of November Democratic Attorney General Tom Miller, backed by Branstad, did finally file the suit—financed in part by Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Iowa—against the cigarette manufacturers, which would eventually lead to the Master Settlement Agreement.
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: Stalemate and Stagnation in the General Assembly, 1997-2006

“At some point this Legislature is going to have to stand up to the tobacco industry,” said [Senator] Dvorsky. “Nationwide, the industry is on the run. I don’t know why it’s not on the run in Iowa.”

If Iowa Democrats were able to achieve only modest legislative advances in the fight to suppress secondhand smoke exposure from 1983 to 1992, when they controlled both the House and Senate and Republican Governor Terry Branstad’s positions were more consistently anti-smoking than either party’s, the chances for further progress grew even dimmer with Democrats’ loss of their House majority in 1993 and plummeted to nil when, by a hefty margin, Republicans gained control of the Senate as well in 1997, giving them mastery of the legislature for the first (and last) time during Branstad’s 16-year incumbency and an opportunity to devote their attention to their favored subjects such as facilitating employer-administered drug tests, reducing taxes, and reintroducing capital punishment.

The Republican Party’s and Senate Majority Leader Iverson’s Ascendancy

The fate of bills committed is generally not uncertain. As a rule, a bill committed is a bill doomed. When it goes from the clerk’s desk to a committee-room it crosses a parliamentary bridge of sighs to dim dungeons of silence whence it will never return. The means and time of its death are unknown, but its friends never see it again.

Party composition of the Iowa House and Senate for the quarter-century between 1983 and 2008 is set out in Table 12.

2See above chs. 26-29.
4Woodrow Wilson, Congressional Government: A Study in American Politics 69 (1901 [1885]).
5Sources: http://www.state.legis.ia.us/Archives.html; “Members of Iowa General
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Table 12
Party Control of the Iowa Legislature, 1983-2008 (Majority in Bold Numbers)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Session</th>
<th>Democrats</th>
<th>Republicans</th>
<th>Democrats</th>
<th>Republicans</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1983-84</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985-86</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987-88</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989-90</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1991-92</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1993-94</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>49</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1995-96</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1997-98</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1999-2000</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2001-02</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2003-04</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2005-06</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>49</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2007-08</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The 1997-98 biennium marked the first time since 1981-82 that Democrats failed to control either house, but they would have ten consecutive years in which to re-acquaint themselves to a status that had once seemed their permanent fate in the nineteenth and earlier in the twentieth century. The sharp reversal suffered Assemblies 1981-2002,” at iv-v, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Pubinfo/Library/Members 19812002.pdf. After Republican Senator Jim Lind, purportedly frustrated over differences with the party over tax policy, had resigned in March 1997 during the session, a Democrat won the seat at a special election in April, reducing the Republicans’ majority to 28 to 22. Thomas Fogarty, “April Election Will Replace Lind, Who Quit,” DMR, Mar. 22, 1997 (1M) (NewsBank); “Voters: Harper to Replace Lind,” DMR, Apr. 9, 1997 (4M) (NewsBank). The Democrats’ House majority in 2007 was reduced from 54-46 to 53-47 when Dawn Pettengill switched parties at the end of April. See below ch. 34.

2881
by Senate Democrats left them “a bit disheartened,” whereas their colleagues in the House, having cut the gap between themselves and Republicans from 18 to 8, were “in an insurgent mood.” In fact, however, at least in terms of anti-smoking legislation, House Democrats were neither more active nor more successful than their Senate counterparts.

Despite the Democratic party’s minority position in 1997, several of its leading anti-smoking members filed bills to accomplish what was becoming a perennial effort to repeal the preemption of local regulation, which the cigarette companies had succeeded in inserting into both the clean indoor air law and the cigarette sales law in 1990 and 1991, respectively. The label on the file folder that Philip Morris was maintaining on the issue captured both sides’ attitude: “Iowa—Pre Emption Battle ’97.”

To be sure, the victor in that battle should not have been difficult to predict in a legislature under Republican control, especially that of Senate Majority Leader Stewart Iverson, a “strong conservative” and heavy smoker who strenuously opposed anti-smoking legislation, in particular as it might have applied to him personally in the Senate. Already by the time of his second term in the House (1991-1992), he had been one of only four Iowa state legislators to whom the RJR PAC gave its highest campaign contribution of $200. Iverson was, in the words of his fiercest anti-smoking opponent, Democrat Michael Connolly, “very close to the tobacco lobby throughout his leadership years.”

A more telling description of Iverson’s position on smoking and cigarettes would be difficult to imagine than the fact that in 1996, midway through his first term in the Senate and two months before the November elections and the caucus’s choice of him as majority leader, he applied for the job of regional vice president of the Tobacco Institute’s Region III (Midwest). On September 5 he was interviewed in St. Paul by Patrick Donoho, the senior vice president of the State Activities Division. As Donoho later told Institute President Samuel Chilcote

---

7Iowa Code sects. 142B.6 and 453A.56. See above chs. 27-28.
8Bates No. 2061860270.
10bSenate Leaders Short on Tenure,” DMR, Dec. 30, 1996 (1A:1, at 8A:5); below ch. 32.
11Data provided by Iowa Ethics & Campaign Disclosure Board (Apr. 4, 2008).
12Email from Mike Connolly to Marc Linder (Apr. 24, 2008).
13Patrick Donoho Time & Expense Report, (n.d. [1996]), Bates No. TI16020508/45. Iverson later claimed that he had not initiated the process: someone had contacted him and asked whether he might be interested in the job. Telephone interview with Stewart in connection with arranging Iverson’s interview with Chilcote: “Stewart Iverson...was referred to me by Chuck Wasker [TI’s Iowa lobbyist]. He is currently a farmer and also a Republican State Senator with two years left in his term. He is looking for a career change from both a successful farm and elective politics. He is willing to move to St. Paul.”\(^1\)\(^4\) (One Democratic legislator, devoid, to be sure, of fly-on-the-wall knowledge, described the tight relationship between Iverson and Wasker as symbolized by the lobbyist’s sitting and smoking in the majority leader’s office—in which alone smoking was still permitted—telling him what to do on bills.)\(^5\) Iverson was not Donoho’s first choice, but even after that person (who worked for the Minnesota Chamber of Commerce) withdrew, Donoho asked TI’s chief lobbyist in Minnesota, Tom Kelm, to suggest other candidates.\(^6\)

Although the Tobacco Institute never offered him the job (“I came in second place”), Iverson later claimed that even had he received the nod before the election, he would have turned it down because he had been convinced both that the Republicans would gain control of the Senate and that he would become majority leader.\(^7\) Indeed, the Republicans did win a majority of seats in the Iowa Senate (even while Democrats gained 10 seats in the Iowa House and President Clinton carried Iowa), in large part because of Iverson’s efforts on behalf of half a dozen Republican challengers who ousted incumbent Democrats...

\(^{14}\) Patrick Donoho to Samuel Chilcote, Subject: Candidates for Region I and III Positions (Oct. 1, 1996), Bates No. T1117211186.

\(^{15}\) Telephone interview with legislator who wished not to be identified (May 5, 2008). Christopher Rants, who was Republican House Majority Leader/Speaker from 1999 to 2006, characterized the smoke in Iverson’s office as awful, but not godawful. Telephone interview with Christopher Rants, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).

\(^{16}\) Patrick Donoho to Samuel Chilcote, Subject: Candidates for Region I and III Positions (Oct. 1, 1996), Bates No. T1117211186; Patrick Donoho to Samuel Chilcote, Jr., Re: Candidate for Region III Position (Oct. 9, 1996), Bates No. T1117211185.

\(^{17}\) Telephone interview with Stewart Iverson, Clarion, IA (Apr. 6, 2008). Iverson apparently did make it to an interview with TI President Chilcote in Washington, D.C., on Oct. 9, 1996. Bates No. T111721156/9 (file folder), on http://tobaccodocuments.org. Ironically, Iverson’s career might have suffered had he been offered and taken the job since TI was dissolved pursuant to section III(o) of the Master Settlement Agreement of 1998. For example, it apparently ceased its lobbying activities in Iowa by the beginning of 1999. Ginny Brown to Beth Percynski, Re Termination of Lobbying Within Region III (Jan. 11, 1999), Bates No. T116610043; Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board (no payments made by client Tobacco Industry Labor Management Committee to lobbyist Lowell Junkins during first half of 1999) (Sept. 21, 1999), Bates No. T14929381.
and then played a “deciding role” in electing him majority leader over the outgoing minority floor leader, Jack Rife, another heavy smoker. When asked, a dozen years later, whether his having been interviewed for the Tobacco Institute job had been publicly known in 1996, Iverson fudgingly suggested that it had. However, the implausibility of this claim was impressively underscored by Senator Maggie Tinsman, who was a Republican assistant minority leader in 1995-96 (at a time when Iverson had not yet climbed into leadership). When told in 2008 of Iverson’s job interview, a shocked Tinsman spontaneously declared that, had the information been public in 1996, Iverson would have lost all credibility. Another veteran Republican and anti-smoker, Andy McKean, also later expressed the opinion that, despite the fact that it had been common knowledge at the time that Iverson was looking for another job, his political career would have been harmed, if not fatally embarrassed, had Iowans known that he had sought that particular job.

Iverson may not have been the Tobacco Institute’s first choice for or become Midwest regional vice president, but the cigarette oligopoly continued to value all that he was doing for it in the Iowa Senate. One token of its esteem was that he was, apart from the Institute’s chief Iowa lobbyist, Charles Wasker, the only person from Iowa invited to its “cigar reception” at the August 1998 meeting in 18 Paul Cohan, “Senator Stewart Iverson Jr. of Iowa,” Stateline Midwest, Sept. 1997, at 11, Bates No. TI141131866/76. State Republican leaders had pushed aside Rife, who had been floor leader from 1990 to 1996, as the centerpiece of the party’s efforts to gain control of the Senate in part, apparently, because Rife had supported Branstad’s primary opponent in 1994. Thomas Fogarty, “Senators Pick New GOP Leaders,” DMR, Nov. 8, 1996 (1M:2-6, 2M:3). Another reason the Republican caucus did not choose Rife, according to Republican Senator Andy McKean, was that many perceived him as an absolutist loose cannon, who was unable to compromise. Telephone interview with Andy McKean, Anamosa, IA (Apr. 16, 2008).

---

19 Telephone interview with Maggie Tinsman, Davenport (Apr. 13, 2008).

20 Telephone interview with Andy McKean, Anamosa, IA (Apr. 16, 2008).

21 According to the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board, Iverson received no campaign contributions from any out-of-state tobacco PAC in 1997 or 1998. After the official in charge of state candidate documents had mentioned that the Board had a file for every such PAC and was asked to determine whether tobacco PACs had made contributions to any candidates, she observed that the Board had “purged” (i.e. “destroyed”) them when it moved two years earlier; a computer file for R. J. Reynolds PAC existed, but, oddly, contained no data. Telephone interview with Linda Andersen, Des Moines (Apr. 3, 2008).
Chicago of the American Legislative Exchange Council—a “bipartisan membership association for conservative state lawmakers who shared a common belief in limited government, free markets, federalism, and individual liberty.”

The Preemption Battle of 1997

Given the legislative balance of votes, Democrats’ strategy on anti-smoking legislation was simply to keep the “discussion alive until we can act.” Or, as Richard Myers, the House Minority Leader starting in 2001, put it when asked whether it was a foregone conclusion that no anti-smoking legislation could be enacted once Republicans regained control over both chamber in 1997: “I couldn’t have gone to work” operating under that assumption—“I was there to fight.” Although Iverson—and therefore presumptively the cigarette companies—knew that as long as he was majority leader there was no chance that preemption would be repealed, and even Democrats realized that repeal under Republican majorities in both houses “probably was impossible,” the industry was not taking any chances. In early December 1996 Philip Morris began the process of internal approval by various high-ranking corporate officials in state government affairs and other departments of two mass mailings: one to tobacco retailers to prompt them to write to their legislators “in opposition to any upcoming attempts to repeal the current statewide law”—that is, to repeal the local preemption in the cigarette sales law—and a second to consumers urging them to write to their legislators opposing “any attempts to enact a statewide smoking ban.” The letter to retailers (1,500 copies of which cost Philip Morris 21Beth Percynski to Pat Dougherty, Subject: ALEC Cigar Reception (Aug. 11, 1998), Bates No. T16531394.

---

23Email from Representative Mary Mascher (Dem. Iowa City) to Marc Linder (Mar. 25, 2008). Mascher has been a House member since 1995.
24Telephone interview with Richard Myers, Iowa City (May 8, 2008).
25Telephone interview with Stewart Iverson, Clarion, IA (Apr. 6, 2008).
26Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Mar. 31, 2008). Bolkcom, by 2008 a Senate assistant majority leader, was elected to the Senate in 1998, but before then had worked on youth access to tobacco issues for the Johnson County Health Dept. http://www.joebolkcom.org 27Celeste Victoria to Distribution (Dec. 4, 1996), Bates No. 2061860179. The drafts went, inter alia, to senior vice president Ellen Merlo, vice president for state government affairs Tina Walls (who approved them the same day), and state government affairs official
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

$8,300), stressed that the governor and “several members of the state legislature” who had failed to repeal Iowa’s “reasonable” cigarette sales law in 1996 would “be back in ’97,” wanting to permit cities and counties to pass their own regulations, which “would result in a confusing patchwork of local laws that could adversely affect many businesses.” The first and only entrant to cross the finish line in Philip Morris’s parade of horribles was that: “You could even lose merchandising allowances if certain sales restrictions were imposed.”

With similar language, the other letter reminded Iowa consumers, i.e., smokers, that if the previous year’s proposal to ban smoking totally in public places supported by the governor and “several state legislators” had been enacted, “designated smoking areas would have been eliminated and you would have been unable to enjoy a cigarette in restaurants and other public places.” But because these supporters would “be back in 1997,” the megabillion-dollar cigarette manufacturing behemoth “need[ed] your help to stop them.” The status quo was preferable because it allowed “businesses serving the public to accommodate both non-smokers and smokers in designated areas. It is a reasonable law that gives business owners the flexibility to tailor their smoking policies to the preferences of their customers.” In contrast, under a statewide ban, “owners would be forced to ban smoking in their own place of business regardless of what they or their customers wanted.” Philip Morris urged smokers to tell their state legislators that they “oppose any attempts to change Iowa’s smoking law. The last thing we need is more state regulations.” The “talking points” that the company offered for inclusion in smokers’ letters and calls to legislators stressed that current law was “working fine” and was “fair to all concerned” without explaining how toxic and carcinogenic smoke drifting throughout a room in any way “accommodated” nonsmokers. Celebrating the infallibility of the free market and millions of individual capitalists’ self-regarding exegeses thereof, Philip Morris suggested enlightening legislators to the effect that: “If there were significant customer demand for a ‘smoke free’ environment in restaurants and other public places, Jack Lenzi (in whose name the letters were eventually sent).

Faithful to the role as an “anti” that the cigarette firms had imputed to him, Governor Branstad stated in a year-end survey of his legislative plans for 1997 that he would push for repeal of preemption of local governments’ adoption of anti-smoking ordinances targeting minors stricter than the statewide laws. To be sure, the governor rigidly cabin this one anti-corporate stance: he delightedly interpreted voters’ ousting of the Democrats from their Senate majority as meaning that he would “no longer have to ‘fight off anti-business legislation that would have hurt our competitive situation. You’re not going to have to worry about that, because those things are not going to be coming out of committee.’”

A week later, on the last day of 1996, Democratic Attorney General Tom Miller—who, about 15 years earlier, at his wife’s urging, had finally “kicked the smoking habit,” which for reasons he could no longer recall, he had initiated in college and continued into his 30’s—a announced that he was joining the efforts to enable local governments to “tackle the problem of youth and tobacco with all the enthusiasm and creativity they can muster.” Thus both officials were supporting the Tobacco-Free Coalition of Iowa (led by the American Cancer Society, American Heart Association, and American Lung Association), which appeared to be concentrating on the cigarette sales law. One of Miller’s assistants, Bob Brammer, viewed the new campaign as much more focused than previous ones, but the attorney general nevertheless did not shy away from expressing self-doubts: “As far as we know, pre-emption has never been repealed anywhere.... It will be tough, but I think we can get the job done in Iowa if we all work together.”

---

32Philip Morris, [Ltr to Iowa Consumers re: Smoking Ban] (est. 1996), Bates No. 2061860182. For an earlier version with handwritten comments, see Draft Iowa Consumer Ltr2 EFI [Ltr to Iowa Consumers re: Smoking Ban] (est. 1996), Bates No. 2070321524. On the 1996 bill, see above ch. 30.

37Anti-Smoking Effort Gets Boost,” DMR, Jan. 1, 1997 (5M:1-2). In fact, Maine had repealed a tobacco control preemption provision in 1996. Robin Hobart, “Preemption: Taking the Local Out of Tobacco Control” at 15 (2003), on first state to repeal preemption of local clean indoor ordinances. Id.

38The Des Moines metered postmark appears to be Jan. 3, 1996, which is doubtless erroneous.

40Tobacco-Free Coalition of Iowa, “Communities for Tobacco-Free Kids: Bringing Home Rule Back to Iowa,” Bates No. 2061860174.

(accessed Mar. 27, 2008). In 2008 Cameron continued to lobby for Reynolds and the Iowa Matt&Service=Lobby&frame=1 (accessed Mar. 27, 2008).

42Fax to Jack Lenzi, Philip Morris (Jan. 8, 1997), Bates No. 2061860172.

43Tobacco-Free Coalition of Iowa, “Communities for Tobacco-Free Kids: Bringing

2888
lobbyists, Hultman and Kimberly Haus, told Jack Lenzi, the company’s director of strategic planning for tobacco in State Government Affairs, that “we are working on notifying our allies to get attendance at some of these sites.”

By mid-January 1997 the Cancer, Heart and Lung organizations were laying the groundwork for the attack. Under the title, “Effect of Repealing Tobacco Preemptions,” the coalition analyzed the provisions—which, it correctly pointed out, had been written by the tobacco industry—in the context of the home rule grants of the Iowa Constitution. The constitutional amendment in question, added in 1968, provided that: “Municipal corporations are granted home rule power and authority, not inconsistent with the laws of the general assembly, to determine their local affairs and government, except that they shall not have power to levy any tax unless expressly authorized by the general assembly.” The legislature codified this constitutional grant by providing that “[t]he enumeration of a specific power of a city does not limit or restrict the general grant of home rule conferred by the Constitution” and specifying that an “exercise of city power is not inconsistent with the state law unless it is irreconcilable with the state law.” After pointing out that the cigarette companies’ preemption sections were “modeled after” the home rule provisions, the anti-smoking alliance critically observed that the “use of the word ‘supersede’ in the preemptions has had the effect of making people believe that local government cannot legislate any tobacco laws. While this is not true, preemptions have effectively detoured cities and counties from taking any action to regulate smoking even when the local legislation would be consistent with the state law.” The health groups were at pains to stress that even if the 45Philip Morris [State Government Affairs organizational chart] (Nov. 14, 1997), Bates No. 2072634065.

---

46Fax from Cal Hultman & Kim Hultman to Jack Lenzi (Jan. 8, 1997), Bates No. 2061860172.

47ACS, AHA, ALA, “Effect of Repealing Tobacco Preemptions” (Jan. 1997), Bates No. 2061860300/1. It is unclear how Philip Morris, in whose collection the document was found, came into possession of this paper, which bore a fax date of Jan. 15, 1997, from a state government telephone number in Des Moines.

48Iowa Constitution, Art. III, sect. 38A.

51ACS, AHA, ALA, “Effect of Repealing Tobacco Preemptions” (Jan. 1997), Bates
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

preemptions were repealed, the general constitutional/statutory limitations on home rule would still not permit local governments to pass ordinances inconsistent or irreconcilable with state law. For example, even after repeal city councils and county boards of supervisors could not lawfully institute regulations irreconcilable with section 142B’s mandates regarding designated smoking areas.\(^32\) (Three years later, when the Ames city council initiated consideration of just such an ordinance, the health groups might have come to regret their earlier stance, but they were too preoccupied with denouncing the substance of the halfhearted measure to focus on it.)\(^33\) Becoming more concrete with respect to the cigarette sales law, the coalition conjectured that after repeal of preemption, local governments might “better define what constitutes ‘control’ of vending machines,...regulate more strictly the sale of smokeless tobacco because state law does not provide many guidelines, and...better provide control of tobacco products and...access by youth.”\(^34\)

Although the alliance members seemed frustrated by their apparent inability to persuade cities and counties that they continued to possess some home rule powers even after preemption, the memo chose to focus instead on the “effective ‘shield’ that the tobacco companies had acquired that allowed them to ‘concentrate their efforts at the state level without being concerned about local programs.’ The argument that statutory preemption had “effectively prevented local governments from addressing unique concerns of interest to specific localities”\(^35\) was in part misleading: banning smoking in restaurants, for example, was not some kind of “unique” local concern, but a widespread (national and international) objective that some city councils were interested in implementing if they could get around the (apparent) barrier that the cigarette oligopoly had managed to erect in the statewide law. Although the campaign for local control of anti-smoking regulation undeniably embodied a highly valuable dimension of democratic debate and public health education, at the same time it was also an opportunistic approach in the sense that the health organizations were not

---

\(^{32}\)ACS, AHA, ALA, “Effect of Repealing Tobacco Preemptions” (Jan. 1997), Bates No. 2061860300/1.

\(^{33}\)See below ch. 33.

\(^{34}\)ACS, AHA, ALA, “Effect of Repealing Tobacco Preemptions” (Jan. 1997), Bates No. 2061860300/1. The memo did not deal with the question of whether the preemption provision had any effect whatsoever on local governments’ discretionary power to deny permits. See above Pt. III.

\(^{35}\)ACS, AHA, ALA, “Effect of Repealing Tobacco Preemptions” (Jan. 1997), Bates No. 2061860300/1.
championing the political principle of the general superiority of home rule over laws of statewide applicability; rather, operating under very unfavorable party alignments in the state legislature, they were simply formulating the most effective strategy for achieving their underlying tobacco control goals. Had they been in a position to pass a statewide law without exemptions, they would surely never have eschewed it in favor of trying to mobilize support for passing broad ordinances in a thousand city councils and county boards of supervisors.

On January 23, Democratic Attorney General Miller urged the legislature to increase the cigarette tax from 36 to 40 cents in order to generate funds for anti-tobacco education, but Republican House Majority Leader Brent Siegrist declared that legislators would not increase that or any other tax. Acknowledging the difficulties involved, Miller nevertheless ventured that there was a better than 50 percent chance that the legislature would “do something substantial in this area,” including, apparently, repeal of preemption as well as a ban on cigarette vending machines in youth-accessible locations (made necessary by the failure of lock-out devices).

A few days later Philip Morris counterattacked. In what Pat McGoldrick, the former national board chairman of the American Heart Association, called “a prime example of why” Miller and Branstad were “justified in suing the tobacco industry for consumer fraud” and “a blatant attempt to stop” their proposal to repeal local preemption,  Philip Morris on January 27 ran a full-page color ad in the Business Record, the state’s leading business magazine. Titled, “Iowa: A Great State to Be In,” the ad, throwing together the activities of the cigarette company and wholly owned Kraft Foods Inc., trumpeted their 2,727 employees, $133 million in taxes paid or generated, and $555 million of purchases. Assuring readers that they were “very much at home in Iowa,” Philip Morris, under the slogan, “We work for Iowa,” claimed that: “We are committed not only to making high-quality food, beverage and tobacco products, but also to improving the quality of life in the communities where we live and work.” McGoldrick deconstructed the ad’s oxymoronic character by asking how “high-quality killers” improved the quality of life and pointing out that tobacco killed more people yearly in Iowa than Philip Morris employed there and that the taxes devoted to 58Business Record, Jan. 27, 1997 (copy supplied by Jim Pollock, editor, Business Record).

recovering the health costs of tobacco by far exceeded those paid by Philip Morris.⁵⁹

Even before any anti-preemption bills had been filed at the 1997 session, the cigarette companies had prepared additional propaganda material alerting “supporters of statewide preemption...to be ready” for the filing of a bill by the anti-smokers, who “are committed to repealing this law, and were disappointed that they were unable to do so last year”⁶⁰ and urging tobacco retailers and smokers to inform legislators and Governor Branstad “to leave well enough alone.”⁶¹ The oligopolist predicted that if anti-smokers got their way and gave municipalities “the freedom to enact their own restrictions,” they “would likely try and persuade local officials to enact extreme restrictions—if not outright bans—on the sale of tobacco products.” How the antis could possibly achieve this result, however, remained a mystery in Philip Morris’s propaganda universe since there was, “in fact...no widespread public outcry to increase towns’ and localities’ authority to enact restrictions on the sale of tobacco products” and “[v]irtually the only people supporting this effort are the state’s anti-smoking extremists, who are only interested in furthering their crusade against cigarettes and smoking.”⁶²

On February 5, the Cancer-Heart-Lung coalition sought to bring pressure to bear on the legislature in support of Miller’s proposal⁶³ by highlighting the results of a survey finding that 70 percent of those polled favored authorizing local governments to pass “their own tough restrictions on smoking....”⁶⁴ Not by coincidence, the next day, semi-stalwart, semi-smoking Representative Minnette Doderer from Iowa City introduced a streamlined bill (H.F. 172) embodying the coalition’s anti-preemption program. It repealed the provisions in both laws, but

⁶⁰[Philip Morris], Anti-Smokers Seek Repeal of State Tobacco Uniformity Law (est. 1997), Bates No. 2061860293.

⁶¹[Philip Morris], Gov. Branstad Asks Legislature for Tough New Cigarette Sales Restrictions (Feb. 1997), Bates No. 2061860258. Although the Legacy website estimates the document date as Feb. 1997, this material was recycled from previous campaigns and made reference to bill numbers that did not correspond to relevant ones in 1997.

⁶²[Philip Morris], Anti-Smokers Seek Repeal of State Tobacco Uniformity Law (est. 1997), Bates No. 2061860293.

⁶⁴Anti-Smoking Group Points to Survey,” DMR, Feb. 6, 1997 (5M:1), Bates No. 2061860259.
tacked on to the cigarette sales law a grant of discretionary power to cities and counties to adopt regulations “specifically targeted to reduce or eliminate access to, sale to, or use of cigarettes or tobacco products by persons under eighteen...which shall supersede any inconsistent or conflicting provision” of the law.\textsuperscript{65} However, H.F. 172’s referral to the Local Government Committee was the only action that the House took on it.\textsuperscript{66} Twelve days later Iowa City Senator Mary Neuhauser introduced the almost identical S.F. 156, which got as far as a Human Resources subcommittee before expiring.\textsuperscript{67} The same day 10 senators, headed by Republican Maggie Tinsman and including four other Republicans as well as Democrats Johnie Hammond, Robert Dvorsky, and future governor Tom Vilsack, filed an even cleaner bill, S. F. 157, which repealed both preemptions and added nothing, but it, too, went no further than a Human Resources subcommittee.\textsuperscript{68} Its House companion bill, which was filed by a Republican and co-sponsored by three Republicans and three Democrats, did not even get that far.\textsuperscript{69} However, S. F. 157 was, through legislative metempsychosis, about to experience rebirth.

One vehicle for support of preemption repeal was a bill (S.F. 163) filed on February 19 by, of all people, Majority Leader Iverson together with Republican Senator Nancy Boettger, which would merely have amended the cigarettes sales law by repealing the lock-out device provision of the section on vending machine sales and substituting for it a ban on the sale of any cigarettes or tobacco products through vending machines unless they were “located in a place where the retailer ensures that” no one younger than 18 was “present or permitted to enter at any time.”\textsuperscript{70} On February 27 the Senate Human Resources Committee, chaired by Boettger, recommended passage of S.F. 163 with several amendments, three of which are pertinent here. First, Senator Robert Dvorsky, a consistently anti\textsuperscript{65}H.F. 172 (Feb. 6, 1997, by Doderer).

\textsuperscript{66}House Journal 1997, at 1:249.
\textsuperscript{67}S.F. 156 (Feb. 18, 1997, by Neuhauser); Senate Journal 1997, at 318, 353 (Feb. 18 and 20); Senate Journal 1998, at 102 (Jan. 21). The bill differed from H.F. 172 by virtue of omitting the clause beginning “which shall supersede...”
\textsuperscript{68}S.F. 157 (Feb. 18, 1997, by Tinsman); Senate Journal 1997, at 318, 353 (Feb. 18 and 20); Senate Journal 1998 102 (Jan. 21).
\textsuperscript{70}S.F. 163 (Feb. 19, 1997, by Iverson and Boettger). The quoted language was enacted verbatim. 1997 Iowa Laws ch. 136 at 281 (codified at sect 453A.36(6)). The language was taken from an FDA regulation that was enjoined before it was to go into effect on Aug. 28, 1997. 21 CFR § 897.16(c) (1999).
smoking Democrat, presented the aforementioned S. F. 157, which repealed both preemptions; it passed 7 to 6, with all five Democrats being joined by two Republicans, Tinsman, the chief sponsor of S.F. 157, and John Redwine, an osteopath, who as a physician always took a principled stance against smoking, which did not stand him in good stead with Republican party leaders, whose position on smoking and tobacco legislation was in large part determined by the fact that they smoked: “It was as simple as that.” Then Senator Hammond, one of the legislature’s leading anti-smoking militants, presented an amendment, which, going beyond preemption repeal, would have specifically empowered local governments to reclothe the cigarette sales permit fee with the deterrence it originally was designed to have in 1921 by using economic means to reduce the number of cigarette sellers: “A city or county may establish a local retail permit fee in addition to the annual state retail permit fee. A local retail permit fee shall be retained by the city or county imposing the fee and shall be used by the city or county exclusively for the purpose of enforcing section 453A.2,” which prohibits the sale of cigarettes to persons under 18. This language was taken verbatim from Senate Study Bill 68, “An Act relating to the local regulation of cigarettes and tobacco products including a provision for the establishment of a local fee,” which the Human Resources Committee received on February 3. In addition to the aforementioned provision, the study bill declared that notwithstanding the “uniform application” (or preemption section) of the cigarette sales law, “any local laws and regulations specifically targeted to reduce or eliminate access to, sale to, or use of cigarettes or tobacco products by persons under eighteen years of age shall supersede any inconsistent or conflicting provision of this chapter.” The study bill would, as a Philip Morris report 71[Iowa Senate] Committee Minutes for Human Resources at 1 (Feb. 27, 1997) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).

---

73Telephone interview with John Redwine, Fayetteville, AR (Mar. 30, 2008). In addition to Iverson, Redwine mentioned such leaders as Daryl McLaren and Jack Rife. In contrast, neither Boettger, nor Rensink, nor Schuerer smoked; neither Senate President Mary Kramer nor four of the five assistant majority leaders smoked (the one exception being Mary Lou Freeman).
74163 Amend 3 by Hammond, attached to [Iowa Senate] Committee Minutes for Human Resources at 1 (Feb. 27, 1997) (copy furnished by SHSI DM).
75It was assigned to a subcommittee composed of Schuerer, Tinsman, and Dearden. Senate Journal 1997 at 189, 191 (Feb. 3). observed, “eliminate smoking and marketing uniformity.” Hammond’s amendment prevailed by a vote of 10 to 3, with five Republicans joining all five Democrats; the three Republicans who cast Nays included Neal Schuerer, a restaurant owner, who, oddly, had been the chief sponsor of S.S.B. 68. In the end, the committee voted out the bill, including all proposed amendments, with a recommendation to amend and pass, by a vote of 9 to 4, with Republicans Boettger, Redwine, Rensink, and Tinsman joining the five Democrats. Although neither the Des Moines Register nor the Cedar Rapids Gazette, both of which reported other Senate Human Resources Committee meetings, covered this one, the following Sunday’s Register editorially lauded the committee and urged the legislature to adopt the same position as the three health groups and to end local preemption “[f]or the sake of both home rule and health....” The newspaper was inspired by Food and Drug Administration rules, scheduled to go into effect in August, prohibiting some cigarette vending machine sales, enforcement of which, according to “[c]ancer fighters,” would be greatly enhanced if local ordinances fleshed them out.

The same day that the committee met, Majority Leader Iverson demonstrated his control of the Senate’s tobacco control agenda by filing a second bill (cosponsored by eight other Republicans, including Senate President Mary Kramer), this time altering the penalties for under-18-year-olds who bought or tried to buy or smoked cigarettes or other kinds of tobacco. The Republicans’ solid Senate majority insured passage of Iverson’s bill in approximately the same measure as Iverson’s endorsement guaranteed that the legislation would not harm the cigarette oligopoly’s interests. S.F. 237 substituted the following gradations for the existing scheduled $25 fine: for a first offense the civil penalty was $100; a second offense subjected the person to a 60-day suspension of his or her motor vehicle license or, if the person had none, 50 hours of community service; a third offense triggered a one-year suspension or 100 hours of community service for anyone without a license.\(^{81}\) (In fact, as early as 1991 the legislature had amended the cigarette sales law and penal code to confer on judges the discretion to impose the performance of community service on minors as a penalty for violating the ban on buying or smoking tobacco.)\(^{82}\) The chain-smoking Iverson asserted: “We need to send the toughest message possible to Iowa teen-agers that underage smoking is wrong. There is no better way to send that message than to take away that person’s driver’s license.”\(^{83}\) Though self-irony appears not to have been his strong suit, Iverson, whose addiction dated back to his teenage years, but who was only 13 years old when the Surgeon General’s epochmaking report on smoking was released in 1964,\(^{84}\) did allow as: “If the law was there when I was a teen-ager, who knows?”\(^{85}\) It is unclear whether Tobacco Institute applicant Iverson realized that the best way to send a message to teenagers that the ban on underage smoking was just a joke was to have it delivered by the state’s most powerful legislator in the same newspaper article that pointed out that he was a “chain-smoker.” Despite the bill’s lack of a local control provision, Branstad stated that he would be able to support it.\(^{86}\)

---

78Senate Journal 1997 at 49.

The Senate Human Resources Committee’s recommendations presumably gave rise to the confident tone adopted by the anti-tobacco coalition at the press conference it held on March 3 to insist on the “growing grassroots support for new restrictions on cigarettes.”\(^{87}\) In particular, at least 20 local governments (including Des Moines, Cedar Rapids, Sioux City, Dubuque, Iowa City, Davenport, and Bettendorf)\(^{88}\) sought the power to impose such restrictions as limiting the public places where smoking was permitted and increasing the cigarette sales permit fees. Attorney General Miller’s seemingly unbounded public optimism prompted him to express his “sense that there’s enormous support in both houses of Legislature.”\(^{89}\) Remarkably, Miller’s claim seemed not wholly implausible.

\(^{81}\) S.F. 237 (Feb. 27, 1997, by Iverson et al.).
\(^{82}\) 1991 Iowa Laws ch. 240, § 10, at 493, 495 (amending Iowa Code § 903.1(3)).
\(^{84}\) Iowa Official Register: 1997-1998, at 43.
\(^{88}\) “Cities and Cigarettes,” DMR, Mar. 9, 1997 (1C:4) (edit.).
On March 6 the Senate Human Resources Committee amended and approved S.F. 237 as a committee bill, which then became S.F. 377, which, inter alia, differed from its predecessor by virtue of creating alternative penalties for a second offense of a 60-day motor vehicle license suspension, 50-hour community service, or a $200 civil penalty, and for a third offense of a one-year suspension, 100-hour community service, or a $300 civil penalty. The committee voted 7 to 4 in favor of these changes, Democrats Szymoniak, Dvorsky, and Hammond being joined by Rensink in opposition, while all the remaining Republicans favored them. Boettger, the committee chair, insisted on the measure’s functionality: “We’ll make kids who consider it cool...think twice before smoking because there are severe consequences.” Dvorsky, who declared that the approach would not work “because many fines already go uncollected,” analyzed the bill as intended “to divert attention from” the effort to repeal local preemption: “It’s a sidetrack. This is diversion, clearly. We seem unwilling to stand up to the tobacco lobbyists, so we’re taking it out on teen-agers.”

Opponents—including Hammond, who, referring to a 1995 law that imposed a license suspension for minors found with small amounts of alcohol in their blood, rhetorically wondered “how many times we can take driver’s licenses away from those kids”—contended both that the penalties were excessive and that the bill’s whole underlying strategy was “bound to fail.” That Iverson and Senate President Mary Kramer were co-sponsors boded well for the bill’s passage, which, according to the Des Moines Register, would bestow some public relations benefit on Republicans:

Its passage also would give lawmakers some claim to anti-tobacco legislation in a year when they’re expected to ignore a more controversial proposal that would permit local governments to enact anti-tobacco ordinances that are more stringent than state laws.

---

90 State of Iowa: 1997: Journal of the Senate: 1997 Regular Session Seventy-Seventh General Assembly 1: 537-38 (Mar. 6). The history of S.F. 237 in the Index to the House and Senate Journals lists no such action, the last two being appointment of a subcommittee on Mar. 3 and filing of an amendment on Mar. 4. Index at SBH-97.

Gov. Terry Branstad, with support from health associations, asked lawmakers to repeal the legal barrier against tougher local tobacco ordinances. But lobbyists for tobacco companies and retailers have fought that proposal bitterly.95

In a weekly report for the period ending March 13, R. J. Reynolds’ field agent for Iowa, Ally Milder, noted that the “repeal of preemption is our big issue in Iowa. So far the consensus among our coalition partners is that no substantial grassroots activity is called for at this time. I have discussed doing a few grassroots letters to the subcommittee chairman with our lobbyist and David Horazdovsky of TI. I am going to meet with Horszdovsky [sic] next week to discuss this further.”96 By the following week, Milder was able to report that my fears about preemption in Iowa are somewhat allayed. The Speaker of the Iowa House who was pushing a repeal (in Iowa it is total preemption i.e. display bans, public facilities) of the current preemption law has not been able to muster much enthusiasm [sic] with it. We have reached an accommodation [sic] with the Senate Leadership which will ban vending machines in establishments where minors have access. In addition, A [sic] minor would face a $100 fine for his first violation. On the second violation he would lose his drivers license. We were involved with our coalition partners including the wholesalers and retailers in coming up with this position.97

House Speaker Ron Corbett later confirmed that he had in fact favored repeal as part of his overall strategy of working for compromise on the issue of smoking. Although he agreed with others’ judgment that under Iverson’s leadership in the Senate there was no chance of repeal, he argued that some room for movement still survived in the House. One reason for his failure to generate more support for repeal was, in his view, tobacco lobbyists’ having effectively convinced rural representatives that there was a slippery slope from repeal of smoking preemption to local regulation of livestock confinement based, in part, on an analogy between the odors of manure and tobacco smoke.98

---

98 Telephone interview with Ron Corbett, Cedar Rapids (Apr. 7, 2008). In a parallel universe, anti-smoking Representative Mary Mascher, who was in the House in 1997, commented that “Corbett was definitely not anti-tobacco, in fact, over the years he probably collected more money from big tobacco than [Rep. Christopher] Rants ever did.”
Whatever momentum had seemingly built up for repeal of preemption in the public smoking and sales laws soon dissipated. First, on March 26, Dvorsky and Hammond offered it in the form of floor amendment to an olio of a criminal justice bill (S.F. 503), but the chair ruled well taken a point of order by Republican Larry McKibben that it was not germane. A week later, Dvorsky and Hammond’s successful committee gambit attaching repeal to S.F. 163, Iverson’s cigarette vending machine bill, came to naught on the Senate floor. As soon as Human Resources Committee chair Boettger had offered committee amendment S-3102, Republican Wilmer Rensink, who had voted for it in committee, raised the point of order that the amendment was not germane, which the chair ruled well taken, thus ruling it out of order and killing that initiative.

In the meantime, on March 17, Iverson, now acting as sole sponsor, introduced S.F. 499 as a substitute for S.F. 377, with which it was textually identical. After the Judiciary Committee had unanimously recommended passage with an amendment striking the suspension of drivers licenses and imposing community service, while lowering the three-tiered monetary penalties to $25, $50, and $100, Senate Democrats passed up the opportunity to attach their preemption repeal amendments on the floor to Iverson’s bill, which passed in the committee’s stripped-down version by a vote of 47 to 0. While Hammond, who had criticized an earlier version as too drastic, now belittled the result as “‘a pretty weak sister,’” Boettger continued to insist that it would deter

Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Apr. 2, 2008).

99State of Iowa: 1997: Journal of the Senate: 1997 Regular Session Seventy-Seventh General Assembly 1: 823 (Mar. 26) (S-3259). In 2008 McKibben would become one of the most strident and incoherent critics of the statewide anti-smoking bill, which was finally enacted. See below ch. 35.

101Id. at 942.

102In the meantime, on March 17, Iverson, now acting as sole sponsor, introduced S.F. 499 as a substitute for S.F. 377, with which it was textually identical. After the Judiciary Committee had unanimously recommended passage with an amendment striking the suspension of drivers licenses and imposing community service, while lowering the three-tiered monetary penalties to $25, $50, and $100, Senate Democrats passed up the opportunity to attach their preemption repeal amendments on the floor to Iverson’s bill, which passed in the committee’s stripped-down version by a vote of 47 to 0. While Hammond, who had criticized an earlier version as too drastic, now belittled the result as “‘a pretty weak sister,’” Boettger continued to insist that it would deter 103TMA, Legislative Bulletin, Leg 97-14, at 3 (Apr. 23, 1997), Bates No. 158103681/3.

104State of Iowa: 1997: Journal of the Senate: 1997 Regular Session Seventy-Seventh General Assembly 1: 918 (Apr. 2) (10-0 vote). This structure was ultimately enacted. 1996 Iowa Laws ch. 74, § 4, at 116, 117.

some teenagers by sending them the smoking is “‘not cool’” message. Anti-smoking Democratic Senator Michael Connolly took a different tack, charging that whatever deterrent the bill embodied was undercut by senators’ hypocritical refusal to “abide by state laws prohibiting smoking in public buildings.” Finding irony in the Senate’s flexing its muscles with teenagers, Connolly predicted that they would “look at what lawmakers do rather than what they say....”

Making up for the senators’ omission, House Democrats sought to achieve preemption repeal. On April 7, Representative Richard Myers, a third-term Democrat from Iowa City, the owner of a truck stop—where he sold cigarettes—whose long governmental career, including two decades as city councilman and mayor of Coralville and Johnson County supervisor, was coupled with membership on the board of directors of the Mid-Eastern Council on Chemical Abuse, filed an amendment (H-1566), identical to Neuhauser’s S.F. 156, which embodied repeal of both laws’ preemption provision and authorized local governments to adopt regulations to reduce minors’ access to or use of cigarettes. When the bill came up for debate on April 14, a Republican raised a point of order that the amendment was not germane, which the chair ruled well taken. After Myers’ request for unanimous consent to suspend the rules to consider his amendment had run into a fatal objection, he moved to suspend the rules to consider H-1566. The result of the roll call vote revealed the weakness of the anti-smokers’ position: the 40 to 57 defeat exceeded the Republicans’ majority in the House because more Democrats (11) opposed the amendment than Republicans (6) crossed over to support it. R. J. Reynolds’ legislative intelligence apparently knew whereof it spoke: the Republican Speaker of the House, Ron Corbett, was indeed one of the six voting to suspend the rules. In the House S.F. 499 was unable to duplicate the Senate’s unanimity: 19 representatives (all Democrats) balked. Critics who favored stronger provisions argued that “the bill would have only a limited impact on teen smoking and represented a victory of tobacco lobbyists.” Myers himself berated the House for its unwillingness to “face up to some of the real causes” of smoking.

109Telephone interview with Richard Myers, Iowa City (May 8, 2008). At the end of 1999, when Myers, attending an American Cancer Society forum, heard that 3,000,000 packs of cigarettes were sold illegally to children in Iowa annually, called “those numbers...outrageous and wonder[ed] if he should continue selling cigarettes in his store. ‘I’m almost to a point where I’m going to take them out.’” James McCurtis, “Anti-Smoking Plan Gets Support,” ICP-C, Dec. 9, 1999 (3A) (NewsBank).
110Iowa Official Register: 1997-1998, at 83. A one-time Republican, when he became the House Minority Leader in 2000, Myers was praised by the Register’s political commentator as a “small-business owner and...one Democrat who isn’t afraid of someone making a profit” (by this time he was selling Harley-Davidson motorcycles). David Yepsen, “Democrats’ New Leader Leans Toward Compromising with GOP,” DMR, Nov. 14, 2000 (9A) (NewsBank).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Later in 1997, Iverson claimed in an interview that he believed in general that local control over environmental regulation—the issue at hand was large hog lot operations—“and other standards would undermine Iowa’s basic approach to government.” Iverson, a “family farmer” in whose district more large livestock facilities were located than any other in Iowa, thought “‘this is much bigger than just the livestock issue.... I think it would be a dramatic turn in Iowa—because we do not allow local governments to have any laws that are more stringent than state laws. That’s a debate that we’ll have again this year. But I’m a firm believer in statewide regulation.”113 The cigarette oligopolists (and other large corporations) may have been delighted to know that the Senate Majority Leader had so opined, but it was, nevertheless, astonishing that the state’s most powerful legislator was unaware that the Iowa Code provided (and provides) that: “A city may not set standards and requirements which are lower or less stringent than those imposed by state law, but may set standards and requirements which are higher or more stringent than those imposed by state law, unless a state law provides otherwise.”

116Iowa Code, sect. 364.3(3) (1997). When interviewed more than a decade later, Iverson repeated virtually verbatim the erroneous “we don’t allow local governments” assertion. Telephone interview with Stewart Iverson, Clarion, IA (Apr. 6, 2008).
Ironically, the 1997 forecast attached in the Tobacco Institute’s regional budget for 1997—which included $60,000 for lobbyist Charles Wasker in addition to $1,000 in support of the Iowa Restaurant Association and $500 for the Iowa Retail Merchants Association—had not even bothered to mention defensive action on behalf of the preemption provisions, although repeal of smoking restrictions was the sole item under the “Proactive” rubric.

The Iowa Attorney General’s Medicaid Reimbursement Lawsuit Against the Cigarette Oligopoly: 1997-1998

This Was a Good Week in Iowa for BIG TOBACCO.

The latter part of 1997 witnessed a controversy over whether a special session of the legislature would be called to accommodate Attorney General Tom Miller’s request for additional legal tools to prosecute the state’s lawsuit against the cigarette companies for the recovery of Medicaid expenses for tobacco-related disease. On November 27, 1996, months after the legislature had taken no action on a bill to provide such a cause of action, Governor Branstad and Miller announced that the state had filed suit against the tobacco companies to recover millions of dollars in restitution for the state’s costs in providing health care to state citizens and employees to deal with the tobacco-related diseases resulting from the companies’ wrongful conduct and unlawful activities as well to seek restitution and civil penalties for violations of the Iowa Consumer Fraud Act committed by the defendants in systematically misleading the public about the health consequences of smoking and failing to disclose that nicotine was 118 Tobacco Institute, 1997 Budget, State Activities Division, Region III (Nov. 1, 1996), Bates No. TI16551698/700. Defensive measures included “excise tax threat.” See also Tobacco Institute, 1997 Draft Forecast Smoking Restrictions at 1, Bates No. TI02581247. For a list of the various tobacco industry lobbyists in Iowa in 1997, see Tobacco Institute, State Activities Division (Jan. 1997), Bates No. 83678016/27.

---

119 Iowa Healthy Kids Project, “This Was a Good Week in Iowa for Big Tobacco” (n.d.) (faxed from Hultman & Haus to Jack Lenzi, Sept. 30, 1997), Bates No. 2061860317.
120 H.F. 2482 (Mar. 21, 1996, by Brammer).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

addictive. On August 26, 1997, Polk County District Court Judge Linda Reade denied the defendants’ motion to dismiss the Consumer Fraud Act claim, but did sustain their motion to dismiss the Medicaid indemnity claim. Because Iowa, unlike Florida, had not enacted legislation specifically empowering the state to proceed directly against tobacco companies for recovery of medical expenses incurred by the state on its citizens’ behalf, the judge ruled that the common law tort theories pleaded by the state did not justify recovery of Medicaid costs, thus remitting the state to a statutory claim that it characterized as procedurally impractical and inconvenient. Robert Levy, a cigarette company apologist at the Cato Institute whom Philip Morris called on to write op-eds, promptly weighed in with one in the Des Moines Register hallucinatorily admonishing the Iowa legislature that if it “permits this outrageous, retroactive application of the law, it will have tapped the deep pockets of a feckless and friendless defendant.” Then training his sermon on Iowans in general, he warned them that they might wind up bequeathing their children “a message even more perfidious than cigarettes”—namely, that they “can engage in risky behavior, then force someone else to pay the bills.” Conveniently, Levy did not pass judgment on the message that millions of people, whom cigarette manufacturers, withholding the knowledge that morbidity and mortality would result from using their commodities, urged to smoke, would not be able to force someone else to die their deaths for them.

Although House Speaker Corbett, who purported to support Miller’s efforts, initially favored a special (one day) session, it very soon became clear that he and other Republicans were eager to accommodate the Iowa Association of Business and Industry’s demand that any law not expose “‘manufacturers of other legal products to future liability concerns.’” What a

---

121 Office of the Governor of Iowa [and] Iowa Department of Justice, Iowa Files Lawsuit Against Tobacco Companies (Nov. 27, 1996).
123 Email from Jack Lenzi to Joanne Mendes et al. (Jan. 19, 1998), Bates No. 2071794891.
125 Telephone interview with Ron Corbett, Cedar Rapids (Apr. 7, 2008).
127 David Yepsen, “Business Group Wary of Tobacco Bill,” DMR, Sept. 12, 1997 (4A) (NewsBank). Nevertheless, half a year later the Register recharacterized the earlier situation as one in which Republicans had walked away from Corbett’s call for a special member of his caucus may have meant a decade later in calling the nonsmoking Corbett a “practical” politician was illustrated by his plan to impose such far-reaching restrictions on the suit as excluding damages from secondhand smoke exposure and, especially, limiting claims to future medical expenses, which would have reduced the state’s potential recovery. Miller estimated, by 300-500 million dollars. By mid-September the Republican legislative leaders made it clear that Miller would not get all that he had requested. House Majority Leader Brent Siegrist, for example, acknowledged that the legislature would try to strengthen the attorney general’s hand, but would not “‘give him a lead-pipe cinch victory because that could have some impact on other businesses....’” And Corbett, responding to some legislators’ reluctance to convene a special session unless the millions of dollars in fees that private lawyers, to whom the state had contracted out the prosecution, stood to gain were reduced, added that any law enacted might lower them. The improbability of legislative intervention, including provision for retroactivity enabling the state to recover for past damages, increased once the defendants, and especially Philip Morris—given the influence that the cigarette companies had long wielded in the Iowa legislature—announced that they would vigorously attack such a law as well as the convening of a special session. Republican legislative leaders’ decision not to give Miller anything more than the right to sue the tobacco firms for damages to poor people covered by Medicaid prompted the attorney general to call it “‘an evernous missed opportunity.’” Corbett dropped Miller’s proposal to assign damages based on each tobacco firm’s market share because “introducing a new idea like that into Iowa’s liability laws made Iowa businesses [sic] leaders nervous.” Also rejected was the proposed right to calculate damages by statistical formulas. Corbett defended that decision on the grounds that that approach “‘would really take away the right of tobacco companies to face their accusers....
As bad as the tobacco companies are, in America everybody deserves to have their day in court.’” The coup de grace appeared to be administered by a letter to members of the legislature from the American Legislative Exchange Council, an 128 Telephone interview with Rosemary Thomson, Marion, IA (Apr. 3, 2008).

---

(NewsBank).
(NewsBank).
131 David Yepsen, “Iowa’s Tobacco Plan Called Too Broad,” DMR, Sept. 15, 1997
(1A:1, 4A), Bates No. 2080368028-30.
organization of conservative legislators\textsuperscript{132}—whose involvement Philip Morris apparently managed\textsuperscript{133}—which opposed the lawsuit altogether,\textsuperscript{134} calling it possibly “‘misguided, hasty, unconstitutional....’” The group’s sway was great enough, according to Corbett, to prompt some members to “‘second-guess their decision to support this,’” thus “deal[ing] a blow to Iowa’s plans.” More straightforwardly, the Register pointed out that “[p]olitically, it also has become difficult for GOP members to differ with the business community, which bankrolls many Republican campaigns.”\textsuperscript{135} The Iowa Healthy Kids Project put it more pithily: “Big Tobacco and their friends went to work on Republicans. Within a week, they managed to get republicans [sic] to do their bidding and the special session was off.”\textsuperscript{136}

The credibility of the Republican leadership’s denials that “members had succumbed to pressure orchestrated by tobacco interests”—Siegrist implausibly claimed that “‘I don’t know if it’s big tobacco so much as hard-working Iowans out there saying, ‘Let’s look at this longer’”\textsuperscript{137}—suffered from the fact that Representative Jeffrey Lamberti, whose father was the founder of Casey’s General Stores, Inc., one of Iowa’s biggest cigarette sellers, aggressively declared that “[w]e’re addressing that court case and we’re not going any farther than that....”\textsuperscript{138} On September 18, the Republican legislative leadership decided not to meet in special session, provoking Democratic House Minority Leader David Schrader into charging that: “‘They’re obviously working hard to give the tobacco industry every advantage in the process.’”\textsuperscript{139} Philip Morris would have agreed. At 8:54 p.m., scarcely two hours after the special session had been nixed, Jack

\textsuperscript{133}Email from Jack Lenzi to Joanne Mendes et al. (Jan. 19, 1998), Bates No. 207194891.

\textsuperscript{136}Iowa Healthy Kids Project, “This Was a Good Week in Iowa for Big Tobacco” (n.d.) (faxed from Hultman & Haus to Jack Lenzi, Sept. 30, 1997), Bates No. 2061860317.

Lenzi triumphantly informed 13 of his co-conspirators in an “URGENT” communication:

> Though it looked at times like defeat would be snatched from the jaws of victory, in the end Senate Republican leaders, particularly Stu Iverson, would not give the AG what he wanted. They stood on legal principle and good policy.

> In the end the business community, lead [sic] by ABI, proved to be absolutely critical. They would not give their blessing to statistical evidence, market share liability, or strict product liability, even limited to tobacco, period.

> There is much to learn from this experience, and we will put those lessons into a plan for use in future debates.\(^{140}\)

While the recipients of the message also earned his praise, Lenzi emphasized that ultimately Philip Morris lobbyists Hultman and Haus had “made it happen.”\(^{141}\)

Governor Branstad may still not have given up on the possibility of salvaging a special session,\(^{142}\) but Majority Leader Iverson’s and Attorney General Miller’s dueling op-eds in the Register made the unbridgeability of the gap between the parties transparent. Ever the loyal cigarette industry propagandist, the would-be Tobacco Institute vice president sought to reduce the entire anti-tobacco campaign to the one issue for which the cigarette manufacturers’ feigned support—“reducing teen smoking.” Iverson rebuffed Miller’s plan to “tilt the law in his favor by using statistical analysis to show that smoking caused illnesses” without proving that smoking had caused the illnesses of identified individuals.

Asserting that such an approach “could result in fraud” and even preclude a defendant from proving that a medicaid recipient had never used its product, Iverson bridled at setting “a precedent that might be used against all manner of job-creating businesses in our state.” Iverson concluded with the cigarette firms’ tried and true tactic of pretending that their unique legal battles to spare them liability for producing and selling commodities that killed millions of their customers and to insure their future for-profit lethality were really being fought selflessly on behalf of average Americans: “I am not willing to sacrifice Iowans’ constitutional protections that guarantee due process under the law for a pot of gold, no matter how large it is.”\(^{143}\)

\(^{140}\)Jack Lenzi to Mary Carnovale et al. (Sept. 18, 1997), Bates No. 2078311510.

\(^{141}\)Jack Lenzi to Mary Carnovale et al. (Sept. 18, 1997), Bates No. 2078311510.

Lenzi also singled out Greg Little, who was a Philip Morris lawyer.

By mentioning House Speaker Corbett and Senate President Mary Kramer as moving in the direction of his and Branstad’s goal of making “tobacco a bipartisan issue in Iowa” while “some Republicans still have a way to go,” Miller took an inferential dig at Iverson. But he also dispassionately explained how the state’s lawsuit would have proceeded if Republicans had not blocked enactment of the statute he had requested:

We would have to prove that tobacco use caused lung cancer, emphysema and heart disease. Then, by a statistical model, we would show the total cost to the state for the treatment of tobacco-caused disease for Medicaid recipients.

The tobacco companies then could defend by proving what they have steadfastly told Americans for 50 years—that tobacco doesn’t cause lung cancer, emphysema or heart disease. They could attack our model, the concept of a model or anything else to disprove our case. An Iowa jury would decide whether we proved our case and, if so, determine the amount of the state’s damages.

Some of the Republican leadership wanted the state to prove in court for each and every one of tens of thousands of Medicaid recipients whether tobacco caused their disease, what percentage of fault to assign to the tobacco companies, and what percentage of each company’s cigarettes each recipient smoked. This is impossible and caused the breakdown of negotiations over the special session.

Some say my concept is revolutionary and without precedent. They are wrong. The concept is similar to strict liability covering explosives, flammables and even dog bites. It also has some similarities to the way hazardous waste is covered in Superfund cases.

Some say it is unconstitutional and unfair to single out tobacco companies. It is not. We would argue that tobacco is unique—no other product, when used for its ordinary purposes, kills 420,000 Americans each year and is highly addictive for virtually every user. No Iowa company should think that its product is similar to tobacco.

Some say that it’s unfair to change the rules in the middle of the “game.” It may be a “game” for tobacco companies, but there is a lot more at stake for the rest of us. In any event, our revised proposal would apply only to the future and would not be retroactive. In the event, no special session was called.

In mid-September 1997 the attorney general’s office was also engaged in another aspect of the cigarette wars. In response to a request by Senator Johnie Hammond and Representative Minnette Doderer, who were presumably gearing up for yet another assault on preemption, for an opinion as to whether sections 142B.6 and 453A.56 of the Iowa Code “preempt all local ordinances relating to smoking or tobacco or whether these statutes merely prohibit those local regulations which are inconsistent with chapters 142B and 453A.,” Solicitor General Elizabeth Osenbaugh wrote that the attorney general had “concluded as a matter of policy that this office will support local regulation of smoking to the extent not inconsistent with state law. We also believe this is the meaning of the two Code sections.... However, because of our strong public statements on this issue during the legislative debate, we believe it would be inappropriate to issue an official Attorney General’s position on the question.” Nevertheless, Osenbaugh proceeded to present a brief outline of the logic leading to her office’s conclusion. Based on the home rule provisions of the Iowa Constitution (Art. III §§ 38 A and 39A) and their codification in the Iowa Code (chapters 364 and 331), which empowered local governments to enact legislation “not inconsistent with” state law, “inconsistent” being defined as “irreconcilable,” she cited case law holding that “[o]rdinances that are irreconcilable, impossible to make consistent or harmonious, incongruous, or incompatible will be deemed inconsistent and preempted.” And more precisely, an ordinance was inconsistent when it “‘prohibits an act permitted by a statute, or permits an act prohibited by a statute.’” Although the legislature could also reserve an area of the law to the state by “‘occupying the field,’” “extensive legislation within a particular area of the law does not by itself establish preemption” because local governments were permitted to create “‘standards more stringent than those imposed by state law unless state law provides otherwise.’” Because the last sentence of the two statutory provisions preempted only an ordinance that was “inconsistent with or conflicts with” the statutes, Osenbaugh concluded not only that it did not demonstrate a legislative intent to “‘occupy the field,’” but that the legislature’s

---

146Elizabeth Osenbaugh to Johnie Hammond and Minnette Doderer at 1 (Sept. 16, 1997), in Minnette Doderer’s Papers, Topical Files-Last Accession, Folder: Tobacco, IWA. It is unclear whether Osenbaugh was implying that the attorney general would have supported non-inconsistent ordinances even if he did not believe that “this is the meaning of the two Code sections....”

147Elizabeth Osenbaugh to Johnie Hammond and Minnette Doderer at 2 (Sept. 16, 1997) (citing Green v City of Cascade 231 NW2d 882, 890 (Iowa 1975)).

148Elizabeth Osenbaugh to Johnie Hammond and Minnette Doderer at 2 (Sept. 16, 1997) (quoting Decatur County v PERB, 564 NW2d 394, 397 (Iowa 1997)).

149Elizabeth Osenbaugh to Johnie Hammond and Minnette Doderer at 2 (Sept. 16, 1997) (citing City of Council Bluffs v Cain, 342 NW2d 810, 812 (Iowa 1983), and City of Clinton v Sheridan, 530 NW2d 690, 695 (Iowa 1995)).

150Elizabeth Osenbaugh to Johnie Hammond and Minnette Doderer at 2 (Sept. 16, 1997) (quoting City of Des Moines v Gruen, 457 NW2d 340, 343 (Iowa 1990)).
“more general statement of purpose (‘equitable and uniform implementation, application, and enforcement’)” also had to be interpreted “in context with the specific prohibition of ‘inconsistent’ regulations.” Finally, the solicitor pointed out that in cases in which the Iowa Supreme Court had held that a statute did preempt a local ordinance, “the statutory language more explicitly preempted local action” than did the smoking and cigarette laws. As an example of a clear legislative intent to occupy the field, she instanced that “no municipality, county or other governmental unit within this state shall make any law, ordinance, or regulation relating to obscenity.”

With even greater certitude and capaciousness, in November, Assistant Attorney General Steve St. Clair of the Consumer Protection Division told the annual meeting of the Iowa Municipal Attorneys Association under the suggestive heading, “Non-preemption of local ordinances,” that although the two provisions “could be claimed to preempt local regulation,” their “thorough analysis...in light of the home rules principles” in the state constitution and the code “strongly supports the conclusion that there is no preemptive effect.”

Miller’s efforts to bolster the state’s lawsuit against the tobacco companies became the latter’s highest Iowa intelligence priority from the end of 1997 into 1998. Already at the beginning of December, Kevin Narko, one of Philip Morris’s lawyers at the Chicago-based law firm of Winston & Strawn, informed one of the firm’s on-the-payroll lawyers that Miller’s proposed bill was scheduled to be introduced in the Iowa legislature more than five weeks later. On Christmas eve Narko emailed the same Philip Morris lawyer and Jack Lenzi, one of the company’s top regional officials, a copy of the minutes of a recent meeting of the Board of Directors of the Iowa Defense Counsel Association at which an attorney whose firm represented the Council for Tobacco Research (which was controlled by industry lawyers, inter alia, to prepare scientific witnesses for trials and legislative testimony) moved that the board oppose Miller’s proposed 151Elizabeth Osenbaugh to Johnie Hammond and Minnette Doderer at 3 (Sept. 16, 1997) (quoting Chelsea Theater Corp. v City of Burlington, 258 NW2d 372, 373 (Iowa 1977)).

153Kevin Narko to Steve Rissman, Subject: Iowa Special Legislation (Dec. 5, 1997), Bates No. 2077024635. This terse factual statement of fact was none the less headed: “Confidential Attorney-Client Communications Containing Opinion Work Product of Retained Outside Counsel.”

2909
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

legislation, arguing that it “tilted the scale against industry”; the board, the firm of one of whose members represented the State of Iowa in tobacco matters, unanimously approved the motion. Manifestly aware of the extent to which Philip Morris demanded complete control of its legal environment and thus foreseeing the possibility that his client might not be satisfied with this (hardly surprising) victory, Narko pointed out that his firm had been given no advance notice of this vote and wondered whether the client wanted the law firm to look into better coordination for the future.

On New Year’s Eve Lenzi recommended to the staff dealing with Iowa “strong consideration of early/preemptive activity” including mobilizations. On January 6, 1998, Philip Morris operatives paid to counteract anti-tobacco initiatives were speculating through email about what Miller at his news conferences the next day would be including on his annual legislative tobacco agenda. They assumed that product liability would be on his list, but were not so sure about tax increases. Having learned from an Iowa AP wire story that Republicans, including Branstad, considered tax questions “D.O.A.,” they wondered whether it would be best to let them attack tax increases of any kind in the media, while Philip Morris focused its allies’ efforts on Miller’s other proposals. Lenzi quickly replied that he had spoken to Greg Little and Steve Rissman (two of the company’s high-ranking lawyers) and taken the “liberty of calling Cal Hultman for the local scoop.” Hultman, a one-time Republican Iowa Senate Majority Leader and company lobbyist in the 1990s, informed him that “last year’s failed FL[orida]-style legislation” (which would have given the state a statutory action for recovering Medicaid expenditures), was on Miller’s agenda. Lenzi also reported that “Business community is galvanized and opposed, as are some key leaders in Capitol.” One of Philip Morris’s lawyers was supposed to stand by “as a possible spokesperson,” but it was “best if it occurs locally” and an Iowa lawyer was prepared to speak on behalf of the Iowa Association of

155Kevin Narko to Jack Lenzi et al. (Dec. 24, 1997), Bates No. 2077024639.
156Email from Jack Lenzi to Betsy Giles et al. (Dec. 31, 1997), Bates No. 2077024636A.
157Email from Brendan McCormick to Betsy Giles et al. (Jan. 6, 1998), Bates No. 2077024636A. According to AP, “IA-Preview Taxes, Only Tax Question Is How Much to Cut” (Jan. 6, 1998), Bates No. 2074181026A-7-8, discussion of increasing the cigarette tax was an “apparent non-issue” because Republicans wanted to be able campaign as having instituted no new taxes.
On January 7, 1998, the day of—but before a report reached Philip Morris of the content of—Miller’s news conferences, Lenzi and the staff discussed on a conference call how to deal with the presumed elements of the attorney general’s proposals and assigned preemptive, reactive, and other roles to various staff members. The importance that the company accorded the campaign was signaled by the fact that corporate affairs and issues management personnel were “in the loop” as were two lawyers, one of whom was tasked with speaking about the “Fl-style” legislation to the Iowa House Judiciary Committee chair, Jeffrey Lamberti, whose sympathies the leading cigarette manufacturer could count on inasmuch as his family’s Casey’s General Stores was one of Iowa’s biggest sellers.

At his news conferences on January 7, Miller urged the legislature to enact a law creating a clear and direct cause of action enabling the state to sue tobacco companies to recover the Medicaid funds that it paid to treat Iowans for tobacco-related diseases. The attorney general expressly declared that the cause of action he was requesting would apply to future Medicaid costs only and would not be retroactive. Among Miller’s other proposals was a 25-cent increase in cigarette taxes from 36 cents to 61 cents, of which five cents (about $12 million annually) would be used for a media campaign and other activities aiming at a reduction in smoking among teenagers beyond what the tax increase itself would prompt. Teenagers’ access to tobacco would be further reduced by five additional legislative proposals: (1) a ban on self-service displays of tobacco products; (2) a doubling of the annual retail permit fees—which had not been increased since their initial establishment in 1921—the revenue from which would be reserved for local tobacco law enforcement; (3) providing judges with the flexibility to impose community service in addition to or instead of a monetary fine for underage tobacco use on the grounds that “[t]ime is often a more valuable commodity to teenagers than money and community service may be a greater punishment than fines”; (4) an increase in fines for retail sales to underaged buyers; and (5) a ban on tobacco advertising within 1000 feet of schools. Finally, the attorney general requested that the legislature ban smoking in day-care centers.\textsuperscript{161}

---

158 Email from Jack Lenzi to Joan Cryan et al. (Jan. 6, 1998), Bates No. 2077024636. Hultman purported to have a “[g]ood relationship” with Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller and a “solid working relationship” with the director of the Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Division, Lynn Walding. [Philip Morris,] AAA 2000 Plan - State Outreach at 4 (Oct. 2, 2000), Bates No. 2083650722/5.

159 Email from Shuanise Washington to Jack Lenzi et al. (Jan. 7, 1998), Bates No. 2074181028A. Lamberti’s name was misspelled “Lomberdi.”

In spite of widespread press coverage of the attorney general’s public statements, the cigarette companies’ army of lawyers was carefully shadowing Miller at his press conferences. For example, on the day of his appearance in Des Moines, Debra Rectenbaugh Pettit, a first-year associate at the corporate law firm Davis, Brown, dutifully sent a two-page outline to Kevin Narko at Winston, Strawn in Chicago, which ended with a single answer that Miller gave to a question: “Believes can work with Senator Stu Iverson; otherwise Iverson will isolate himself.”\textsuperscript{162} The lack of commentary in the report leaves it unclear whether the wire-pullers at Philip Morris viewed Miller’s dream of an alliance with their faithful agent Iverson as risible or alarming. For his part, Iverson insisted that he had not changed his position that he preferred waiting for a national settlement with the tobacco companies to changing Iowa’s laws. Otherwise, he (like Philip Morris)\textsuperscript{163} could support several of Miller’s proposals such as raising fines for selling to youths, requiring community service, and banning smoking in day-care centers.\textsuperscript{164} That Miller at least was articulating a consistent political analysis emerged from the memo that an attorney at Lane & Waterman prepared on the attorney general’s press conference at the Davenport airport, which was attended by three of Miller’s associates, three cameramen, three TV news reporters, several local anti-smoking organizations’

\textsuperscript{161}“Attorney General Tom Miller: Proposed Tobacco Legislation” at 5-7 (quote at 6) (Jan 7, 1998), Bates No. 2077024662/6-8.

\textsuperscript{162}Debra Rectenbaugh Pettit to Kevin Narko, Re: Tom Miller Press Conference, at 2 (Jan. 7, 1998), Bates No. 2077024650/1. Interviewed a decade later, Pettit not only had no recollection of ever having attended that or any other press conference, but denied any knowledge of the matter. Telephone interview with Debra Rectenbaugh Pettit, Des Moines (Apr. 15, 2008). After having been emailed her report, she replied: “I have no present recollection of the memorandum dated ten years ago.” Email from Debra Rectenbaugh Pettit to Marc Linder (Apr. 15, 2008).

\textsuperscript{163}Philip Morris claimed to “support enactment of reasonable state legislation” including reasonable fines, license suspension or revocation for repeated violations, proof of age requirements, unannounced inspections of retailers, and restrictions on vending machines. P. Desel [Philip Morris], “Q & A Concerning Proposed Resolution and State Issues” at 4 (Discussion Draft, Feb. 11, 1998), Bates No. 2074532291/4. On the cigarette manufacturers’ agreement later in 1998 not to lobby against such measures, see below.

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

representatives, “and me.”\textsuperscript{165} Again, the report concluded with the only question that a reporter posed and Miller’s response, which, if accurate, would have been deeply troubling to Philip Morris (which, to be sure, presumably knew better than Miller whether it had recently been encountering difficulties unloading some of its addiction-aided superprofits as a quid pro quo on Iowa legislators):

The reporter wanted to know how tough the potential fight would be due to the strong lobby that the tobacco industry has. The Attorney General stated there has been a shift in the balance of power; tobacco no longer has a very strong lobby. The Attorney General stated that politicians are embarrassed to admit they take money from tobacco companies, and because they no longer take tobacco money, these politicians now have no reason to support the tobacco companies’ agenda.\textsuperscript{166}

To Miller’s proposed cigarette tax House Speaker Corbett initially reacted favorably—provided that any resulting revenue were used to lower other taxes.\textsuperscript{167} Majority Leader Iverson, however, perceived no support in the Senate for raising “any kind of tax,” even if some of the increase went to cutting some other tax; instead, he preferred “‘real relief’” to a “‘tax shift.’”\textsuperscript{168} Although the differences between Corbett and Iverson on taxes in general were somewhat fuzzier,\textsuperscript{169} before the end of January the House leadership acquiesced in the Senate leadership’s

\textsuperscript{165}Lane & Waterman, RBM to TOMW, Re: Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller’s Press Conference, at 1 (Jan. 12, 1998), Bates No. 2077024655. RBM was Robert B. McMonagle and TOMW was Tom Waterman. McMonagle, who had been at Lane & Waterman only about two years, was sent to the press conference because of his low status; he did not otherwise work on the case and this occasion was the only time he ever “billed” Philip Morris, which was one of the firm’s biggest clients. A paralegal or secretary with stenographic or shorthand skills, he observed, could have done a better job (but could not have billed as much). Telephone interview with Robert McMonagle, Davenport (Apr. 10, 2008).

\textsuperscript{166}Lane & Waterman, RBM to TOMW, Re: Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller’s Press Conference, at 2 (Jan. 12, 1998), Bates No. 2077024655/6. Former House Speaker Siegrist later dated the decline in the tobacco lobby’s power to the settlement of the Iowa lawsuit. Telephone interview with Brent Siegrist, Council Bluffs (May 4, 2008).

\textsuperscript{167}Tom Carney, “Miller Seeks Higher Cigarette Tax,” \textit{DMR}, Jan. 8, 1998 (5M) (NewsBank). Corbett later confirmed that he had not been opposed to a tax increase, but would not have pushed it. Telephone interview with Ron Corbett, Cedar Rapids (Apr. 7, 2008).

refusal to increase the tax cigarette tax. As of January 13, however, Philip Morris assessed at 60 percent the risk of the passage of an increase in the Iowa excise tax, which, together with a ban on self-service, it deemed to be “[t]he anti’s priorities this session.” Its own objective was to defeat the tax increase and the Florida-type Medicaid legislation. The company’s “Tactical Plan” focused on securing passage by the Iowa legislature of a resolution urging Congress to pass a federal resolution (approving the national tobacco settlement of June 20, 1997) in order to “offset any legislation by the anti’s, Attorney General and excise taxes.” During the plan’s “Phase I” the goal was to “introduce the resolution within the first few weeks of the session.” On February 11, Philip Morris assistant general counsel Paula Desel apparently began drafting “Q & A Concerning Proposed Resolution and State Issues,” which were “paraphrases of questions that may be asked by reporters covering state capitals.” The nub of the company’s position was to “encourage state legislators who want to make an immediate difference on the issue of youth smoking to work with their federal representatives to seek enactment of the federal Resolution into law.” The objective of distracting state legislatures from enacting measures that would injure Philip Morris’s interests was paired with the goal of not “infring[ing] on the rights of adult smokers,” also stated as not “needlessly burdening retailers and adult consumers.” Openly the company joined retailers in rejecting state and local self-service display bans as putting them at a competitive disadvantage vis-a-vis retailers in other jurisdictions. An even more transparent formulation (as applied to increases in state excise taxes) asserted that it was “grossly unfair to penalize 50 [? 45?] million adults to attempt to influence the behavior of a relatively small number of children when more precisely tailored approaches are available that do not disproportionately burden adults.” Anticipating a bluntly incisive question—“Are you going to keep trying to frustrate local tobacco control measures by seeking State preemption?”—Philip Morris declared its continuing belief that “a level playing field is best....” This same evasion underlay its opposition to Florida-style tobacco liability bills: “Laws that don’t treat all parties equally are bad laws.”

The very next day, February 12, Senator Boettger, who by this time had 172P. Desel [Philip Morris], “Q & A Concerning Proposed Resolution and State Issues” at 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7 (Discussion Draft, Feb. 11, 1998), Bates No. 2074532291/2/4/5/6/7. The number in square brackets was handwritten in the margin.

---

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

proven to be a reliable agent of the cigarette oligopoly, executed Philip Morris’s plan by filing Senate Concurrent Resolution 105—whose “Whereas” clauses focused on minors—which expressed the Iowa legislature’s intent that Congress enact legislation based on the aforementioned national agreement, which allocated to the states, including Iowa, a “fair share of the tobacco industry’s payments...”173 The resolution was referred to Boettger’s Human Resources Committee, which on February 23, by a vote of 9 to 2, recommended passage. Although perennial anti-smoking militant Johnie Hammond voted for it, her anti-smoking colleague Robert Dvorsky voted against it,174 and a week later, perhaps to make amends, Hammond filed a radical amendment that would have been anathema to the cigarette firms and therefore to their legislative executors. In addition to detailing tobacco’s annual death toll, Hammond’s “Whereas” clauses urged Iowa to lead the nation in providing freedom from environmental tobacco smoke, declared that “the tobacco industry has lied to the public and policy makers..., quashed relevant scientific data..., and improperly utilized industry attorneys to claim such information as privileged,” and culminated in the judgment that “the most significant and effective deterrent to tobacco industry misconduct is to hold tobacco companies fully accountable for the industry, misery, and death caused by use of industry products.” Unlike the Philip Morris-Boettger resolution, Hammond’s amendment urged the President and Congress to “accept national tobacco control legislation that would protect Iowa’s ability to protect the public health from tobacco products....” In a final direct assault on cigarette companies, Hammond urged disclosure of all documents bearing on tobacco industry misconduct, “including those claimed to be privileged....”175

Once the resolution had been introduced, Phase II of Philip Morris’s Tactical Plan called for “mobiliz[ing] phone banks of consumers for a stand-by position (timing is everything).” The phone message, which was to be coordinated with 173S.C.R. No. 105, at 4 (Feb. 11, 1998, by Boettger). A decade later Boettger stated that she had been “asked” to file the resolution, but when given the foregoing background about Philip Morris’s plan to have it filed in Iowa, she was unable to remember who had asked her and then purported not even to recall having filed the resolution, but in any event did not believe that any tobacco lobbyist such as Cal Hultman or Charles Wasker had asked her to do so. Telephone interview with Sen. Nancy Boettger, Harlan, IA (Apr. 12, 2008). The day after the filing the resolution was faxed to Philip Morris. Bates No. 2077024626.

“Our allies” the Hospitality, Lodging, Grocers, and Business and Industry Associations as well as convenience stores, was to emphasize that “the benefits for Iowans” from the resolution “as opposed to the Attorney General’s bill, efforts to ban self-service and tax increases.” Not content with mobilizing cigarette consumers, Philip Morris also planned to request the (market-knows-best) Cato Institute to “come to Iowa to discuss the effects of an excise tax increase on the productivity of tax cuts with the House leadership.” Whether the company ever implemented Phase II is as unclear as whether Hammond’s proposed amendment was the effective coup de grace or not; but in any event, the Senate took no further action on the resolution, which died.

However, that the possibility of passage of a Florida-type Medicaid bill had not died was clear to Philip Morris, whose senior counsel on March 3 received a letter from Narko to which was attached a news report that 81 percent of the constituents surveyed by a Republican House member favored changing the law to permit a direct cause of action against the tobacco companies. At the beginning of 1998, House Majority Leader Siegrist, unable to resist game metaphors, rebuked Miller for having “‘entered into that lawsuit knowing he was going to lose and then [having] c[o]me to us for help.... He wanted the bases loaded for himself when he got back in the game. All we would give him is a man on base.’” Then, during the 1998 session the legislature, once again, took no action on the Judiciary Committee’s “controversial” bill to create a civil cause of action for the state to recover the full amount of its medical assistance payments resulting from tobacco-caused injury disability, or disease. Committee approval was meant merely to keep the bill alive for the session while leadership, with no consensus as to how the bill should be structured, was not even certain whether it would be debated at all.
Two unsuccessful attempts were made to attach the Medicaid recovery bill as an amendment to two other bills. After the Senate had unanimously passed a Human Resources bill (S.F. 2286) to ban smoking in day care centers and tobacco advertising within 1,000 feet of a school or playground, two such amendments were filed in the House. On March 24, the day after the second one had been filed, Betsy Giles, Philip Morris’s state government affairs director of the midwestern region encompassing Iowa, faxed, under the heading, “The bill that will never go away,” a copy of the amendment to company lawyers and regional officials, adding that it might be proposed on the House floor the following day as an amendment to S.F. 2286. Interestingly, in addition to the attorney general and House Democrats, Giles stressed that the “Fl-style Medicaid language is being pushed by the [Republican] Speaker” Corbett. However, the bill was not debated the next day or any other day: despite having been passed unanimously in the Senate, S.F. 2286 saw no further House action and died.

Giles may have been wrong about the vehicle in which Miller’s Medicaid bill would reach the House floor on March 25, but she was right about the date: that morning Senator Tom Vilsack (who was running for the Democratic nomination for governor), arguing that it was “clear that the vast majority of Iowans would like to see that industry held responsible,” especially since a billion dollars was potentially at stake, filed the bill as an amendment (S-5372) to the spending bill for the Public Health Department and several other agencies (S.F. 2280). Vilsack found a hook for attaching his amendment to the agency appropriations bill by including a directive that the Public Health Department use $1,000 of its appropriation regarding the existence, prevalence, and causal linkage between injury, disease, and disability and tobacco use by Medicaid recipients. The amendment also directed the department to “coordinate in assisting the attorney general in litigation efforts for state recovery of tobacco-related medical assistance payments pursuant to section 100 of this Act,” section 100 being the main part of the amendment creating the statutory cause of action that Miller sought for the state’s lawsuit.\textsuperscript{190}

---

185 Betsy Giles to Steve Rissman et al. (Mar. 24, 1998), Bates No. 2077024589.

That this initiative was doomed was soon signaled by Iverson, who counterfactually claimed that the amendment “created the same problems that prevented lawmakers from coming in for a special session last year”—namely, that “the proposals did not limit lawsuits to tobacco.”\textsuperscript{191} Wiping out his credibility entirely, the wannabe Tobacco Institute vice president then swore (in words that the Register enshrined as “Quote of the Day”): “I’m not protecting the tobacco industry here. This goes way beyond that. It sets a dangerous precedent for other businesses.”\textsuperscript{192} Iverson’s protestations to the contrary notwithstanding, “Republicans were criticized for backing big tobacco....”\textsuperscript{193}

If the public had only known how closely the Republicans were cooperating with the cigarette oligopoly: at 3:57 p.m. Philip Morris’s lobbyist, Kimberly Haus of former Republican Senate Majority and Minority Leader Hultman’s firm, faxed Giles from the State Law Library that Vilsack’s amendment, which was attached, had been “offered on Dept of Public Health bill. We are in the process of dealing with it.”\textsuperscript{194} Haus was virtually communicating in real time: less than an hour later,\textsuperscript{195} Republican Senator and Assistant Majority Leader Merlin Bartz, a farmer\textsuperscript{196} who was a consistently reliable pro-tobacco vote,\textsuperscript{197} offered floor amendment S-5380 to Vilsack’s amendment. Bartz’s subtle amendment merely

\textsuperscript{191}Tobacco, Gambling Center of Health Spending Debate,” Communicator (Des Moines), Mar. 25, 1998, Bates No. 2077024580.

\textsuperscript{194}Kim Haus to Betsy Giles (Mar. 25, 1998), Bates No. 2077024582. For the attached amendment, see Bates No. 2077024583/4.

\textsuperscript{195}Bartz had offered the amendment before Senator McKean took the chair at 4:50 p.m. Senate Journal 1998 at 1:911 (Mar. 25).

\textsuperscript{196}Iowa Official Register: 1997-1998, at 28, 34.

\textsuperscript{197}In 1995 Bartz was one of a small group of Iowa state legislators (including Iverson, Rife, and Lundby) who did the tobacco industry’s bidding by writing letters protesting the FDA’s initiative to assume jurisdiction over tobacco. Tobacco Industry Reports on FDA in the States as Reported to the TI State Activities Division at 11 (Dec. 22, 1995), Bates No. 2046948917/8.
deleted the last seven words of the first part of S-5372, thus severing the link between the appropriation and the creation of the cause of action. On the roll call vote on S-5380, only two Republicans defected to the Democrats, producing a 25 to 23 majority for Philip Morris. The extent of the Republicans’ beholdenness to the tobacco industry was underscored by the way that Maggie Tinsman, the party’s strongest anti-tobacco advocate, explained her Yes vote: Vilsack’s amendment “‘went too far.... That’s why the attorney general didn’t get it the first time.’” After the victorious Bartz had called for a division of the now amended S-5372 into two parts (his part and Vilsack’s) and Senate Minority Leader Gronstal had received unanimous consent for action on Bartz’s to be deferred, Bartz delivered the coup de grace by raising the point of order that Vilsack’s decapitated S-5372B was not germane, which Republican Senate President Mary Kramer, who had just voted for Bartz’s amendment, ruled was well taken. Conceding that he had been checkmated because S-5372A now “‘essentially renders the balance of this language moot and meaningless’” and “‘Big tobacco has won again,’” Vilsack also withdrew rump S-5372A.

After the Iowa Supreme Court, on an interlocutory appeal in April 1998, had unanimously upheld the trial court ruling dismissing the state’s Medicaid reimbursement count, in October the district court judge also dismissed the state’s deception and criminal conduct counts, leaving intact only its conspiracy and nuisance claims. Despite these pre-trial setbacks, Iowa’s claims were nevertheless compromised in the Master Settlement Agreement into which the states and the tobacco companies entered on November 23, 1998. But no sooner had Miller trumpeted Iowa’s $1.7 billion share of the 46-state, $206 billion national settlement (to be paid out over the first 25 years of the agreement in perpetuity), than disagreements erupted over how to spend the money. Remarkably, Republican House Speaker Corbett proposed that it be devoted to Iowa’s children, including child care, health insurance, and smoking reduction. Less surprisingly, his partymate, David Millage, House Appropriations Committee chair—who hurled at Attorney General Miller the taunt that “you know and I know had the case gone to trial, we would have gotten zero”—urged returning it all to taxpayers rather thanfunneling it into government programs. In contrast, Miller warned that unless the states met their moral and fiscal obligation to use the money for anti-tobacco and public health programs, Congress might insist on retaining two-thirds of it to reimburse the federal government for its share of the Medicaid costs—especially since the Clinton administration had put the states on notice as early as November 1997 that the federal government’s entitlement to its share of all Medicaid recoveries applied to the tobacco settlement payments.

Cigarette Tax and Cigarette Sales Legislation: 1998

Miller’s lawsuit was hardly the only smoking-related measure the legislature was debating during the 1998 session. No longer a member of the House, Philip Brammer, the chamber’s most militant anti-smoker, was dying of cigarette-smoking-induced emphysema. He nevertheless remained intensely, if not frenetically, engaged. At 4:05 a.m. on January 15, 1998, he emailed Doderer that he had three bills being prepared for her “guidance.” One would have raised the 208Jeff Zeleny, “Questions over Tobacco Deal,” DMR, Nov. 24, 1998 (5M:1) (NewsBank). Although the stream of payments was discussed in the press as spread over 25 years, in fact the payments were to be made in perpetuity and would exceed the amounts mentioned in the text.

211See below ch. 32.
tobacco tax by 24 cents, generating $4 million for anti-tobacco programs for children, $11 million for uninsured Iowa children, and $45 million to increase the Iowa income tax standard deduction; the second would have banned smoking in restaurants, bowling alleys, and daycare centers; and the last would have dealt with advertising and “sensible penalties for possession by kids” since the previous year’s bill was unenforceable. Bewailing ever worsening news for tobacco forces, he preached to a member of the choir: “Sidewing smoke has now been PROVEN to cause irreversible arteriosclerosis [sic] in nonsmokers exposed to restaurant smoke. How can the Iowa Legislature NOT act on this public health menace.”

A few days later Brammer and Doderer exchanged emails invidiously comparing their bill with one introduced by Republican Rosemary Thomson, which, Brammer complained, “is kinda crappy but just look how the news grabbed at it. You need to call a press conference as soon as possible to show how your bill is just exactly what the Governor says he will sign.”

Disappointed that Thomson’s bill would have raised the tobacco tax by only two cents, which hardly seemed “worth the fight,” Doderer wondered whether Brammer had “any influence with Rosemary.” Brammer’s response has not been preserved, but two days earlier he appeared to believe that he had some with the Republican House Speaker when he excitedly emailed his fellow Cedar Rapidsian Corbett an article from an Omaha newspaper about a bill’s having been filed in Nebraska to raise the cigarette tax by 5 cents to 39 cents. His fervor aglow, Brammer informed Corbett that “this removes the last barrier to Iowa raising tobacco tax. Every border is now higher than us except Missouri which has local option cigarette tax.” Turning ever more instructional, Brammer continued: “Ron, this gives you several answers you should be looking for: (1) Cedar Rapids needs additional revenue for recreational purposes. Add cigarette taxes to the allowable list of local option and you will solve all the local problems.... (2) get in touch with Nebraska and see if they are willing to raise to $0.60 on revenue neutral basis.”

The notion that Corbett, who was manifestly unable to persuade either Majority Leader Iverson or even Governor Branstad to raise cigarette taxes, could move another state’s legislature to act indicates the flimsiness of the straws Brammer had been reduced to reaching for in his increasingly frantic anti-tobacco campaign.216
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Brammer’s belittlement of Thomson’s bill was largely rooted in her call for a mere two-cent cigarette tax increase when Miller was requesting 12 and a half times as much. The press viewed her proposal, which would also have used the $3.2 million generated by the increase to promote teen smoking prevention and crack down on retailers who sold to minors, as significant because both Thomson and her co-sponsor, Robert Brunkhorst, were conservative Republicans, whereas their party opposed cigarette tax increases. Party “strategists” purportedly argued against a cigarette tax increase on the grounds that being able to boast to voters that they had rejected all tax increases would put them in a better position during the next election.217

Thomson, who had been a member of the U.S. Department of Education National Commission on Drug-Free Schools, a school substance abuse prevention specialist, and Linn County American Cancer Society board member, and considered herself a “conservative,” was not speaking merely archly when she commented a decade later that she would have thought that the Republican party would have regarded the anti-tobacco effort as a conservative issue.218 (Her right-wing activist bona fides had been more than adequately documented by virtue of having been Illinois state director of Phyllis Schlafly’s Eagle Forum and her appointment as executive director of National Advisory Council of Women’s Educational Programs during the Reagan administration.)219 But the party did not welcome even her modest reform proposals, stamping her as something of a maverick,220 especially after she proceeded on January 22 to file her aforementioned bill (H.F. 2067), which, in addition to the marginal tax increase, would have effected, inter alia, the following changes: (1) banned smoking in day care centers; (2) banned self-service displays and sales of cigarettes in smaller numbers than a carton; (3) increased the criminal penalty from $100 to $250 for a retailer or its employee who sold tobacco products or cigarettes to anyone under 18; (4) increased the cigarette sales permit fee by $25; (5) banned cigarette or 218 Telephone interview with Rosemary Thomson, Marion, IA (Apr. 3, 2008).

220 Telephone interview with Rosemary Thomson, Marion, IA (Apr. 3, 2008).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

tobacco advertising within 1000 feet of a school; (6) imposed a flat $100 fine for anyone under 18 smoking, using, possessing, buying, or trying to buy cigarettes or other tobacco; (7) established community service of 25 hours or fewer as an alternative to the civil penalty; and (8) appropriated $150,000 to the Public Health Department for the performance of compliance checks on cigarette retailers.\textsuperscript{221} But Thomson’s bill, after referral to Human Resources and rereferral to Ways and Means, died in subcommittee.\textsuperscript{222}

Apparently perceiving which way her party’s real conservative winds were blowing, Thomson alone filed a second bill a week later while her first bill’s death rattle could already be heard. H.F. 2120 was a radically stripped-down version, which retained only one element of H.F. 2067—the ban on self-service sales. Otherwise the new bill was distinguished only by virtue of its expression of legislative intent, which, though confined to the question of minors’ access to cigarettes through unsupervised sales and shoplifting, nevertheless embodied the recognition that “a large percentage of adult smokers begin smoking before they can legally purchase tobacco products,” thousands of minors began smoking daily, and smoking killed hundreds of thousands of people annually.\textsuperscript{223}

While Thomson’s bill was still in State Government subcommittee, House anti-smoking activists Doderer, Myers, and Mascher on February 9 introduced an omnibus tobacco amendments bill that would have strengthened the cigarette sales law, inter alia, in the following respects: (1) for a third violation of the ban on buying or using cigarettes or tobacco, the motor vehicle license of persons under 18 would have been suspended until they reached 18; (2) the fee for permits would have been increased to $100, $150, and $200, according to city size; (3) local governments would have been empowered to use the revenue from the permit fees to enforce the sales and the public smoking laws; (4) tobacco products would have been prohibited from being advertised within 500 feet of a school or playground; (5) retailers would have been prohibited from selling or offering for sale cigarettes or other tobacco products by means of a self-service display (except a vending machine); and (6) the penalties for underage smoking, use, possession, or buying would have been increased from $25 and $50 to $50 and $75 for a first and second violation, and the option of community service for a third violation would have been added.\textsuperscript{224} However, the bill, which was both \textsuperscript{221}H.F. 2067 (Jan. 22, 1998, by Thomson and Brunkhorst).

\textsuperscript{223}H.F. 2120, § 1 (Jan. 30, 1998).

\textsuperscript{224}H.F. 2180 (Feb. 9, 1998, by Doderer, Myers, and Mascher). Just several days earlier a researcher explained to Iowa legislators that increasing penalties for underaged stronger and weaker than Thomson’s original H.F. 2067 (and contained no tax increase), suffered the same fate of never making it out of subcommittee.225
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Instead, the legislature passed Thomson’s H.F. 2120 by huge majorities, but not before watering down even her modest bill. The House unanimously passed the bill after amending it to ban, from January 1 to June 30, 1999, self-service displays quantities of less than a carton, and then, from July 1, 1999 forward, of a carton or less.226 The Senate Human Resources Committee, by a vote of 8 to 4, recommended striking the second phase from the House bill, thus permanently permitting displays of a carton or more as of January 1, 1999.227 The way this change came about is instructive: Iverson, who was not a committee member, stated that the amendment permitting the continued sale of self-service cartons had been passed “at his behest,” the Register explaining his amendatory power as based on his “authority to kill the legislation by refusing to schedule it for floor debate.” Reminding readers that Iverson was a smoker, the newspaper recounted that he had sought to justify the change on the grounds that cartons were harder to steal and that retailers would face lower compliance costs if they could continue to keep cartons on the shelves. Unsurprisingly, Human Resources Committee chair Boettger, another cigarette business facilitator, “agreed with Iverson’s decision to dilute the House bill.” Nevertheless, she self-congratulatorily insisted that “‘[w]e’re moving in the right direction.... We got vending machines last year, and (retailers) know that cigarette cartons are around the corner’”228—a corner that more than a decade later still had not been turned.229 After rejecting an amendment that would have permitted self-service displays in plain view of a staffed check-out counter, the Senate passed the bill 43 to 4.230 Acting on the principle that a “‘baby step is better than standing in place,’”231 the 227 Senate Journal 1998 at 773-74 (Mar. 18); Thomas Fogarty, “Senate Panel Dilutes Bill designed to Stop Theft of Cigarettes,” DMR, Mar 18, 1998 (4M:1), Bates No. 2074030365. After this vote on the amendment, the committee voted 11 to 1 to recommend the bill as amended.

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

House then concurred in the Senate’s weakening amendment by a vote of 96 to 2, Doderer and Myers casting the only Nays.\(^{232}\) So inoffensive was the new law\(^{233}\)—in spite of the catastrophic public health consequences specified in the preamble—that the powerful tobacco retailers’ lobby did not even bother to fight the measure.\(^{234}\)

Tobacco companies’ defeat of Miller’s bill and their successful fight against “a proposal to move all cigarettes off open store shelves” were precisely the kind of legislative outcomes the Register had in mind when, shortly after the end of the session, the paper observed that “[i]t would be wrong to call the recently completed 1998 session of the Iowa Legislature business as usual. This year it was business more than usual.”\(^{235}\)

For Philip Morris, however, even more business than in 1998 was needed. According to the final draft of the company’s “Iowa State Plan -1999,” which was completed in September 1998, Philip Morris expected “a whole host of tobacco issues” to be raised during the 1999 legislative session. Its level of concern over prevailing on these issues was heightened because the House was “at risk of losing the Republican control.” But whichever party was governing—and the “current political situation looks good for Republicans”—one of the company’s “proactive” objectives was to “[c]reate a forum to educate Legislators on key issues and to outline Philip Morris companies’ presence in the state....” More specifically: “In Iowa, a vision of success would focus on creating a positive business environment and company image. This objective will surely be greatly enhanced by Kraft’s huge presence in the state; an Oscar Meyer plant in Davenport, a pudding plant in Mason City, and another Oscar Meyer plant in Sigourney. When these plant employees descend on the Capitol for Kraft Day at the Capitol next Spring, all issues will be addressed.” Those that these slaughter house and pudding workers would be programmed to emphasize to legislators were (in rank order): (1) no increase in alcohol or tobacco excise taxes; (2) defeat of any “Florida-style legislation”; (3) defeat of any smoking restrictions in public places or workplaces; (4) defeat of tobacco stock divestiture proposals; (5) protection of state preemption; and (6) defeat of proposals to ban tobacco and alcohol advertising.\textsuperscript{236}

\(^{233}\)1998 Iowa Laws ch. 1129, at 286.

The Struggle over the Use of the Master Settlement Agreement Funds: 1998-2000

Although the initial payments provided for by the Master Settlement Agreement, which the state attorneys general and cigarette companies reached in November 1998, would not be made until the middle of 2000, the beginning of 1999 already witnessed the emergence of sharp disputes over how that money should be spent between Democratic Governor Tom Vilsack and Attorney General Tom Miller, on one side, and the Republican legislative leadership, on the other. Whereas Vilsack wanted to allocate some funds to health care for the poor and Miller’s focus was an anti-tobacco campaign, House Majority Leader Brent Siegrist made the chasm blindingly visible by opining that he was not sure how much the Republican caucus “would be willing to spend on an anti-tobacco campaign aimed at children: ‘I defy you to find a kid in the state who doesn’t know smoking is bad for you.’”\textsuperscript{237} Yet four days later House Republicans outlined a proposal to make a priority of increasing the reimbursements for Medicaid providers and using up to 5 percent (or $85 million over 25 years) of the Agreement money for anti-smoking campaigns and educational programs.\textsuperscript{238}

This dispute was complicated by the absence in the Agreement itself of any obligation on the part of the states to commit any set proportion of the payments they would be receiving from the cigarette manufacturers to tobacco control programs to reduce smoking and its impact on morbidity and mortality, which had purportedly motivated the attorneys general to sue the industry in the first place. (For example, the Iowa legislature, according to Siegrist, felt no sense of disproportion in voting to spend such a small percentage of the Agreement payments on the tobacco issues that underlay the litigation.)\textsuperscript{239} Both this policy void and declarations by officials in various states that they planned to allocate no or only minuscule funds to anti-tobacco initiatives prompted the Clinton administration to try to secure enactment of legislation mandating payment of part of the 206 billion dollar settlement to the federal government—which, based on its financing of at least half of Medicaid expenditures, believed that it was entitled to share in the recovery—in order to insure that at least a significant portion would be dedicated to tobacco control. Not only did the National Governors Association make exclusive state control of the money its highest political priority for 1999, but Democratic Governor Tom Vilsack and Iowa’s liberal Democratic Senator Tom Harkin split over the issue, even though they largely agreed on how the funds should be spent: Harkin would have supported a compromise under which the states would have kept all the money subject to a requirement that they spend a certain proportion on anti-smoking programs, and Vilsack admitted that attaching no conditions to the receipt of the payments would have been counter-productive in some states, whose governors wanted to use them to cut taxes. However, on March 18 Harkin’s amendment to an emergency supplemental appropriations bill that would have required the state to use 20 percent of the Agreement money for smoking reduction programs and 30 percent for public health and enabling tobacco farmers to shift to growing other crops, was decisively defeated (29 to 71). Two months later the emergency appropriations bill was passed freeing states of any tobacco control spending mandates, prompting the Clinton administration, the National Center for Tobacco Free Kids, and Mississippi Attorney General Mike Moore (who had filed the first state suit and signed the first settlement agreement) all to bemoan that states would be free not to allocate any funds at all to deal with the underlying purposes of the litigation.

\textsuperscript{236}Iowa State Plan - 1999, at 1-3 (Sept. 24 [1998]), Bates No. 2074874333-5.

\textsuperscript{239}Telephone interview with Brent Siegrist, Council Bluffs (May 4, 2008).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

By the summer of 1999, with the question of complete state control resolved, but the receipt of Iowa’s first installment of $76.6 million still a year away, a “‘feeding frenzy,'” according to Siegrist, the new House Speaker, was already on the horizon. And, as politicians turned “giddy about the prospect of a new cash source that could be sustained for 25 years or more,” the new Republican House Majority Leader, Christopher Rants—an aggressive right-winger whose narrow-gauge intellectual universe was exquisitely captured by his practice of lending “dog-eared copies of Ayn Rand’s ‘Atlas Shrugged’” to legislative clerks: “I tell them if they get it, and like it, they’ll get more out of it than four years of college”—suggested using the money for building a new arena or baseball stadium. The anti-smoking movement, which created much of the political basis for the state lawsuits, was relegated to the status of mere “[s]pecial-interest groups” by the Register when the American Cancer Society called for funding cessation programs.

---

244 Lynn Okamoto, “State Debates How to Spend Tobacco Cash,” DMR, July 16, 1999

On September 10, Attorney General Miller weighed in with a proposal to devote almost $20.5 million or about one-third of the first year’s payment to a variety of anti-smoking projects, including media campaigns, youth and community partnerships, cessation programs, local enforcement of tobacco laws against those selling to children, school programs to reduce tobacco use, and research. Siegrist, who acknowledged that use of the Agreement money would be “one of the biggest debates of the 2000 session,” immediately expressed doubt that the amount that the legislature would appropriate for anti-smoking programs would be “nearly as much as the attorney general wants it to be.”

---

247 Lynn Okamoto, “State Debates How to Spend Tobacco Cash,” DMR, July 16, 1999 (1A) (NewsBank). Republican Representative Bob Brunkhorst later explained the party’s initial support for such discrete building projects as rooted in its aversion to becoming “addicted to one-time money.” Telephone interview with Bob Brunkhorst, Waverly, IA (Apr. 27, 2008). This account appears to carry little weight since the MSA payments are in perpetuity.

248 “A Thousand Lives: Protecting Iowa Kids from Tobacco Addiction, Disease and Death: Recommendations of Attorney General Tom Miller for a Partnership to Reduce the Damage Inflicted by Tobacco on Iowa’s Health, Economy and Future” at 2, 5 (Sept. 10, 1999); see also Jeff Zeleny, “Tobacco Money Flames Fanned,” DMR, Sept. 11, 1999 (1A) (NewsBank). In a brief section on “Iowa’s History of Leadership” Miller’s report erroneously stated that Iowa had been “one of only three states to have banned” cigarette sales “at the turn of the century.” “At Thousand Lives” at 6. In fact, five states had. See above Parts I-II.

of such programs Miller hoped in five years to reduce Iowa’s adult smoking prevalence from 23 to under 20 percent, and in ten years to lower that among high school students from 37 to 26 percent.\footnote{Worth a $20 Million Try,” DMR, Nov. 14, 1999 (4A) (NewsBank).} In order, presumably, to make it clear to legislators that supporting Miller’s plan in no way involved going out on a political limb, his ally, Tobacco Free Iowa, commissioned a survey of 800 Iowans, 65 percent of whom (including 74 percent of Democrats and 59 percent of Republicans) identified anti-smoking efforts as the highest spending priority for the tobacco settlement payments. In addition, allocating at least one third to those programs was favored by 69 percent, including 37 percent who wanted most or all of the money to be used in that way.\footnote{Poll: Use Money from Tobacco to Slow Smoking,” DMR, Nov. 4, 1999 (2M) (NewsBank).} Whereas Vilsack shared Miller’s belief in the need to devote significant resources to these types of initiatives, Rants, insistent that the legislature was dealing with taxpayers’ money, conceded that that it made sense to dedicate some funds to tobacco prevention, but $21 million was “‘a lot of education...a lot of billboards.’”\footnote{Jeff Zeleny, “Tobacco Money Flames Fanned,” DMR, Sept. 11, 1999 (1A) (NewsBank).} At least one member of Rants’s House Republican caucus pooh-poohed any concessions: Bill Dix denied that the public saw any reason to spend any of the money on smoking cessation or prevention; while many were sympathetic to adult smokers’ plight, they were “leery of spending public money on helping them quit.”\footnote{Thomas O’Donnell, “Vilsack: Use Windfall Wisely,” DMR, Oct. 29, 1999 (8M) (NewsBank).} As the 2000 legislative session, in which tobacco would play a “key role” and form a “centerpiece of...debate,” was about to get underway, Vilsack presented his plan to use $55 million from the Agreement on expanding health care and reducing tobacco and other drug use. Cutting Miller’s proposal for anti-tobacco spending in half from $20 to $10 million but pairing it with more than $8 million in federal grants met with the attorney general’s approval as a “‘masterful move’” that would make the measure more acceptable to the legislature. And, as if on cue, Speaker Siegrist certified it as “‘not totally out of whack.’”\footnote{Jeff Zeleny, “Teen License Threat Rejected,” DMR, Mar. 31, 2000 (1M) (NewsBank).}

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997–2006

the Republican-led legislature would eventually reach an agreement with the governor became more likely when Rants announced in mid-February that his party’s plan would partly resemble Vilsack’s and be “devoted completely to expanding health care and preventing smoking.” Until this point the “battle over the tobacco settlement ha[d] been waged quietly,” largely in the form of non-public meetings between the governor and the Republican leaders, but when an impasse arose in late February, Siegrist, Rants, Iverson, and Kramer finally announced their proposal, touting their resolve to make Iowa the first state to dedicate all of its Agreement money to health care; in particular, their plan would make health care more accessible to low-income Iowans by allocating $25 million to increasing the state’s payments for Medicaid-covered doctor visits in order to induce more physicians and dentists to treat Medicaid patients; they relegated the $9.3 million for smoking cessation and prevention programs to a fourth-place mention.

In addition to criticizing the Republicans’ plan for devoting only one-fourth as much as his to substance abuse and for setting aside $9 million for an escrow account, Vilsack objected to their exclusion of adults from smoking cessation and similar programs. Republican Representative David Heaton, co-chair of the committee that administered the Agreement money, asserted to his constituents that whereas in the fall of 1999 there had been “talk of using the money for tax cuts or addressing infrastructure needs,” by March 2000 the legislature was “rall[y]ing behind the original intent of the lawsuit—to provide relief in the cost and the future cost...of the damage resulting from the use of tobacco.” To be sure, three weeks later, Rants pronounced the competing plans not “terribly [far] apart” from each other, as the House Appropriations Committee halved the escrowed amount and set the funds for tobacco prevention and cessation (for teenagers only) at $9.3 million.\textsuperscript{262}

---

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

And in fact a few days later Vilsack and the Republican leaders did fashion a $55 million compromise plan that, inter alia, allocated $9.3 million to tobacco cessation (without resolving the dispute over inclusion of adults, although even Vilsack conceded that young people had to be a focus), $21 million to expanding health care access, $12.5 million to substance abuse treatment and prevention, and $3.8 million to a set-aside account for future health programs. Iowa, the governor boasted, “would become the first state to devote its entire share of the tobacco settlement to health care....”\textsuperscript{263} In the end, as Vilsack explained later, the Republican leadership accepted his priorities because “I told legislators I would not approve their alternative and I had sufficient political clout at the time to pull it off with support from a number of health care associations and organizations.”\textsuperscript{264} Siegrist later agreed that Republicans’ shift had in part been \textsuperscript{263}Jeff Zeleny and Jonathan Roos, “Tobacco Money Agreement Reached,” \textit{DMR}, Apr. 5, 2000 (1M) (NewsBank). House Speaker Siegrist repeated the boast in a self-congratulatory valedictory to the 78th General Assembly: “We should all take a bow for the fact that we were the first state to dedicate all of our tobacco settlement money to health care.” \textit{House Journal 2000}, at 2:1932 (Apr. 26). This claim, according to some later legislative critics, was inaccurate because in fact the state was involved in a “shell game”: the sums that went to Medicaid would otherwise have had to have been taken from the general fund, thus eliminating the money for certain capital projects; consequently, the MSA payments could just as well be described as having financed these other budget items. Telephone interview with Tony Leys, Des Moines Register reporter (Apr. 24, 2008). A member of the House Democratic caucus staff described the financing mechanism more diplomatically: “The only problem with paying off the bonds with tobacco revenue is that bond proceeds had to be expended on capital projects to be tax exempt and the Legislature had already had made a commitment to place the tobacco settlement revenue into a separate endowment fund and use it only for health care, substance abuse, and tobacco cessation programs. The solution, primarily embodied in SF 532, involved a sort of double-transfer. Step one was to use the tobacco revenue to pay off the bonds, and then use the bond proceeds to pay for capital expenses (thus earning the tax advantage). Step two involved transferring a reciprocal amount from other accounts—accounts that would otherwise be used to pay for capital expenses—into the separate endowment fund to be allocated for health-related programs.” Email from Ed Conlow to Rep. Mary Mascher forwarded to Marc Linder (Apr. 24-25, 2008).

\textsuperscript{264}Email from Tom Vilsack to Marc Linder (Apr. 20, 2008). Republican Rosemary Thomson, who purported to have had very few allies in her struggle to secure most of the determined by the governor’s stance, but offered some other considerations. Initially, when reacting to the prospect of the payments, the party looked at its Republican “core concepts”—tax reductions. However, in the course of further discussion, the fact that the chairman of the House Human Services Appropriations Subcommittee, Representative David Heaton, had felt strongly about using the funds for health-related matters pushed the party toward perceiving that allocation as ultimately making the budget work better.265

Although the Tobacco Settlement Appropriations Bill (H.F. 2555) ultimately passed the House and Senate by votes of 100 to 0 and 47 to 0, respectively,266 Democrats first made two unsuccessful efforts to amend the bill in order to shift funds from the reserve account to anti-tobacco programs. In one instance, Minority Leader Michael Gronstal—who himself after decades of smoking went onto a nicotine replacement regimen—proposed transferring $575,000 to a program for smoking cessation products for Medicaid recipients, but it lost on a nearly party-line vote of 22 to 26.267 Gronstal’s second and more significant amendment, which would have shifted $1.5 million to tobacco prevention and control, was defeated even more decisively on a perfect party-line vote of 20 to MSA funds for tobacco use prevention and control, stated years later than even Attorney General Miller had refused to ask for more money on the grounds that it was politically undoable. Telephone interview with Rosemary Thomson, Marion (Apr. 27, 2008). Representative Shoultz, who also stated that he had opposed securitization, expressed doubts that Democrats, if they had controlled the legislature, would have allocated more money to tobacco control; he buttressed this opinion by reference to experience in most other states and to the likelihood that leaders would have charged that smoking cessation programs simply were not all that effective. Telephone interview with Donald Shoultz, Waterloo (May 6, 2008). Oddly, Majority Leader Iverson also recollected that he had supported using more of the MSA funds for tobacco use prevention. Telephone interview with Stewart Iverson (Apr. 28, 2008).

265Telephone interview with Brent Siegrist, Council Bluffs (May 4, 2008).
266House Journal 2000, at 2:1602-1603 (Apr. 18); Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1301 (Apr. 20). A week later the legislature passed S.F. 2452 creating a Tobacco Settlement Endowment Fund, in which all MSA money (after payment of litigation costs) was to be deposited and “shall be used only in accordance with appropriations from the fund for purposes related to health care, substance abuse treatment and enforcement, tobacco use prevention and control, and other purposes related to the needs of children, adults, and families in the state.” 2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1232 § 12(3), at 828, 830. The bill passed the Senate 48 to 0 and the House 90 to 6. Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1434 (Apr. 26); House Journal 2000, at 1:1938 (Apr. 26).
In the end, then, the legislature allocated more money from the Agreement to the substance abuse treatment program ($11.9 million) than to tobacco use prevention and control ($9.3 million), about $24 million for various reimbursements to health care providers and expanding health care access in addition to setting aside $3.8 million. Heaton—a former smoker who quit when he got tired of hearing his lungs rattling when he went to bed and was unable to understand why more smokers did not quit—saw no reason to allocate a greater share of the Agreement funds to tobacco because there were just not enough tobacco programs to spend money on that could have further reduced smoking prevalence; advocates, he claimed, simply wanted more money.

In February Vilsack had mocked Republicans’ plan to set aside some of the annual tobacco payments in an escrow account in case declining cigarette sales caused the amounts that Iowa was to receive to drop and thus led to underfunding of the various programs that the legislature was establishing in 2000. The governor ridiculed the notion that Philip Morris was on the road to bankruptcy: “As near as I can tell, just about every product on the grocery shelf is connected in some way, shape or form to Philip Morris.” Seven weeks later, however, Vilsack reconsidered: as lawsuits against cigarette manufacturers were being settled across the country, he was no longer convinced of the industry’s financial solidity. As a result, the governor and legislators began drafting plans to securitize the settlement through the sale of bonds, which quickly became law.

\[268\] 2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1221, at 672. Representative Mary Mascher explained the focus on the reimbursements this way: “Health care needs in Iowa are great but at the time using the money on Medicaid was necessary. Without it, many Iowans, including children and seniors, would have lost their health care coverage and nursing home care. We did not want that to happen, so we put some of the money into Medicaid. Iowa has some of the lowest reimbursement rates for hospitals and other Medicaid providers in the nation. It is getting harder and harder to attract new doctors to Iowa because of this. In addition, some doctors no longer are willing to see Medicaid patients because they claim they are losing money. So, yet it is important to increase provider rates in order to maintain health care for many Iowans, especially those in small communities and rural towns.” Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Apr. 23, 2008).

\[270\] Telephone interview with David Heaton, Mt. Pleasant (May 10, 2008).

\[272\] Jeff Zeleny and Jonathan Roos, “Tobacco Money Agreement Reached,” DMR, Apr. 5, 2000 (1M) (NewsBank); 2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1208, at 611. For changes made the next year to accommodate securitization and the newly created Health Iowans Tobacco Trust, see S.F. 232 and 2001 Iowa Laws ch. 164, at 406.

2933
In 2001, Lamberti, the Senate Appropriations Committee chair and Casey’s scion, opined that securitization “takes the risk out of” the Agreement payments’ drying up—but only at the expense of “collecting $650 million now compared to receiving annual payments over 25 years that would total about $1.8 billion.”

“Everyone,” according to then-House Majority Leader Christopher Rants, “bought into” the bond program because it enabled the legislature to fund a number of health programs when revenues declined. Iowa, like some, but not most, other states, thus mortgaged most of its next 25 years of Agreement payments to investors in exchange for up-front payments; consequently, the fact that it must devote 78 percent of annual proceeds to servicing the debt on these securitized funds means that the funds available for future health care and tobacco use prevention and control programs are diminished.

274 S. Dinnen, “Tobacco Bonds to Produce $650 Million,” DMR, Sept. 5, 2001 (1D) (NewsBank). The legislature’s failure to build up the planned $1 billion endowment over 25 years (because it used the accruing money for general fund purposes to balance the state budget) meant that securitization did not become “‘really a prudent idea’” that the state treasurer had prophesied. Id; David Yepsen, “Legislature’s Questionable Spending Clouds Future,” DMR, May 23, 2005 (9A) (NewsBank). Former Senator Jack Rife stated long after the fact that he had regarded securitization in 2000 as “stupid” because exchanging $500 million for $2 billion did not sound like a good deal. Telephone interview with Jack Rife, Des Moines (Apr. 29, 2008).

275 Telephone interview with Christopher Rants, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

devolution prompted one leading academic anti-tobacco activist to bemoan that: “Probably the tobacco industry will win in the long run, largely because of the securitization of the money putting pressure on states to keep tobacco consumption up to get their bonds paid off.”

In any event, if at the end of the first 25-year period it turns out that the Iowa legislature guessed wrong and cigarette company sales did not plummet, the state will have received much less from the bonds than it would have received from relying solely on the Settlement Agreement payments. By 2008, when Iowa had spent nearly all of the $500 million in cash that it had received from the sale in 2002 of the rights to 78 percent of about $1.7 billion in Agreement payments, Attorney General Miller, who, unlike the American Cancer Society, had not opposed securitization, admitted that he wished that the state had not sold off the rights because if the money had flowed in more gradually, “it would have lasted longer and been more carefully targeted.” The exhaustion of the funds meant that anti-smoking programs in the following year would have to be completely financed from the general fund.

At the same time that the legislature was considering and passing the 279 Telephone interview with David Reynolds, Iowa Legislative Fiscal Bureau (Apr. 24, 2008).

280 The authorization for the bond sale is found in 2001 Iowa Laws ch. 164, at 406.

281 Later, ACS representative Cathy Callaway stated that the “tobacco control community was never in support of the securitization. The idea that tobacco companies were going to go bankrupt or out of business was preposterous.” Darwin Danielson, “State About to Burn Through Tobacco Trust Fund,” Radio Iowa (Dec. 1, 2008), on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited July 4, 2009).

appropriations bill for the tobacco use prevention program, it was also debating the plan itself (H.F. 2565), which created within the Department of Public Health a Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division and a commission, which was to develop policy and provide direction.\footnote{2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1192, § 3, at 565, 565-67.}
The legislature’s anti-tobacco behavioral and cultural goals were, as the statute’s preamble made transparent, extraordinarily capacious:

1. The purpose of this chapter is to establish a comprehensive partnership among the general assembly, the executive branch, communities, and the people of Iowa in addressing the prevalence of tobacco use in the state.

2. It is the intent of the general assembly that the comprehensive tobacco use prevention and control initiative established in this chapter will specifically address reduction of tobacco use by youth and pregnant women, promotion of compliance by minors and retailers with tobacco sales laws and ordinances, and enhancement of the capacity of youth to make healthy choices. The initiative shall allow extensive involvement of youth in attaining these results.

3. It is also the intent of the general assembly that the comprehensive tobacco use prevention and control initiative will foster a social and legal climate in which tobacco use becomes undesirable and unacceptable, in which role models and those who influence youth promote healthy social norms and demonstrate behavior that counteracts the glamorization of tobacco use, and in which tobacco becomes less accessible to youth. The intent of the general assembly shall be accomplished by engaging all who are affected by the use of tobacco in the state, including smokers and nonsmokers, youth, and adults.\footnote{2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1192, § 3, at 565, 565-66.}

One of the plan’s most prominent gaps—apart from the deeply flawed absence of any ban on public smoking, which Senator Michael Connolly repeatedly but unsuccessfully sought to rectify\footnote{On Connolly’s amendments, which were focused on banning smoking in the legislature, see below ch. 32.}—was, as Iowa City Democratic Senator Joe Bolkcom, who cast the only Nay against the bill in either chamber,\footnote{2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1192, § 3, at 565, 565-66. The phrase “less accessible to youth” had read simply “less accessible” in H.F. 2565; a floor amendment added the put it, that it did “little to help adults smokers kick the habit. ‘I wonder if Big Tobacco doesn’t like this bill (which) really relies on all these adult smokers to keep the money flowing in.

The resistance that Bolkcom encountered from Republicans in this respect was exemplified by the reaction prompted by an amendment he filed to add the following underlined language to the bill’s preamble: “The intent of the general assembly shall be accomplished by assisting current tobacco users in terminating use and by engaging all who are affected by the use of tobacco in the state, including smokers and nonsmokers, youth, and adults.” On an almost perfect party-line vote the modest amendment was defeated 19 to 30. Opponents, such as Republican Senator Tinsman, stressed the importance of concentrating the resources on youth because most smokers started smoking as teenagers. In any event, with only $9 million a year available for the anti-tobacco program, she worried about diluting its impact. (In a separate category was Senator Jack Rife, one of only a handful of still smoking senators, who wondered, with this kind of “social engineering...who we’re going to sue next over what...”)

Concretely the results that it was the purpose of the initiative to attain were:

a. Reduction of tobacco use by youth.

b. Strong, active youth involvement in activities to prevent youth tobacco use and to promote cessation of youth tobacco use.

c. Enhanced capacity of youth to make healthy choices.

d. Reduction of tobacco use by pregnant women.

e. Increased compliance by minors and retailers with tobacco sales laws and ordinances.

In order to promote the law’s tobacco use prevention and control partnership—as well as to avoid accusations of hypocrisy in “profess[ing] their devotion to curbing smoking while winking an eye at flashy tobacco industry marketing ploys”—the legislature imposed two marketing prohibitions:

a. A manufacturer, distributor, wholesaler, retailer, or distributing agent or agent thereof shall not give away cigarettes or tobacco products.

288Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1260 (Apr. 19) (S-5446). Democrat Patricia Harper was the only senator to break ranks.

2902000 Iowa Laws ch. 1192, § 6(2), at 565, 569.

b. A manufacturer, distributor, wholesaler, retailer, or distributing agent or agent thereof shall not provide free articles, products, commodities, gifts, or concessions in any exchange for the purchase of cigarettes or tobacco products.\(^{292}\)

Prohibiting the Free Distribution of Cigarettes:

The Federal Courts Undo the Cigarette Manufacturers’ Rare Defeat in the Iowa Legislature: 2000-2001

Until this time,\(^{293}\) the Iowa law had merely required that a “manufacturer, distributor, wholesaler, retailer, or distributing agent or agent thereof shall not give away any cigarettes or tobacco products to any person under eighteen years of age, or within five hundred feet of any playground, school, high school, or other facility when such facility is being used primarily by persons under age eighteen for recreational, educational, or other purposes.”\(^{294}\) The blanket ban on sampling that which was the subject of contentious House floor debate on April 13, 2000, had a prehistory during the 78th General Assembly.

On the last day of 1998, Attorney General Miller included a ban on free samples of tobacco products and on coupon promotions in a package of anti-tobacco proposals that he was going to ask the legislature to enact during the 1999 session.\(^{295}\) By early February, a bill had been filed by 42 Republican and Democratic members, including such high-profile anti-smokers as Representatives Doderer, Fallon, Foege, and Mascher, which contained a general ban on distributing free cigarettes or tobacco products or other products in an offer for sale of cigarettes or tobacco products in language similar to that just quoted.\(^{296}\) (Interestingly, a week before the bill was filed, Bill Wimmer, a prominent cigarette industry lobbyist in Des Moines, faxed to the Lorillard general counsel a copy of a very similar, but not exactly identical, bill, which bore official looking stamps and indicated that it had been filed on January 26, although no such bill was filed.)\(^{297}\) On March 1, the State Government

---

\(^{292}\)2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1192, § 6(6), at 565, 569.

\(^{293}\)On earlier legislative regulation of sampling, see above ch. 28.

\(^{294}\)Iowa Code § 453A.39(2)(a) (1999). All of § 453A.39, which contained other provisions, was repealed by 2000 Iowa Laws ch. 1192, § 12, at 565, 571.

\(^{296}\)H.F. 204 (Feb. 3, 1999, by Martin [State Government Committee chair] et al.).

\(^{297}\)Fax from Bill Wimmer to Ron Milstein (Jan. 28, 1999), Bates No.83777339-42. The bill, which lacked a House File number, bore a stamp “Legal Counsel’s Copy Drafted Committee recommended passage by a vote of 20 to 1. Committee chair Mona Martin underscored that children were very attracted to promotions, mentioning that recently cigarettes were included in a bag of goodies given away at a dance attended by people of all ages. Des Moines Democrat Frank Chiodo may have worried about increases in youth smoking sparked by identification with Joe Camel, but some legislators were “leery” because the measure might prevent “tobacco makers from sponsoring sporting events” such as a rodeo in Fort Madison and auto racing. Although the Register predicted that the full House would also pass the bill, it was rereferred to committee, where it died.

During the same period the Senate Human Resources Committee filed an identical bill as the successor to a study bill presented by Tinsman, Szymoniak, and Dr. Redwine. The same day the bill was approved by the committee by a vote of 10 to 3, the prominent anti-smokers Hammond and Dvorsky voting Aye, but it, too, saw no further action.

The ban on distribution of free tobacco products and promotional items reemerged in March 2000 as an amendment in the House to a Senate Judiciary bill designed to prohibit the re-importation, sale, or possession of so-called gray market cigarettes that had been exported from or manufactured for use outside the United States. (Because U.S. cigarette manufacturers, in the wake of the Master Settlement Agreement, increased prices for domestic markets, they widened the gap between those prices and the prices of exported cigarettes; when such cigarettes were reimported and sold at lower prices, they reduced the market share of the manufacturers participating in the MSA and thus tendentially reduced the payments to the states under that agreement.) Tobacco wholesalers, objecting to the price-cutting competition, had already initiated the introduction of gray market legislation in many other states. In November 1999, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company’s State Government Relations regional director for Iowa expressed the firm’s concern with the gray market issue to George Wilson, the 299 House Journal 1999, at 1:549, 1051 (Mar. 3 and Apr. 6).

300 S.S.B. 1073; S.F. 205 (Feb. 23, 1999, by Human Resources).

301 Senate Journal 1999, at 1:369 (Feb. 23).

Democrats' Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

lobbyist for the Iowa Association of Candy and Tobacco Distributors, stressing the availability of Reynolds’ “legislative counsel in Iowa,” former Democratic Senate Majority Leader Bill Hutchins and (his daughter) Susan Cameron, “to assist in the passage of this legislation.” The quantum of availability and assistance that Hutchins and Cameron were expected to provide can be gauged from the $42,000 and $43,000 that Reynolds paid them for in the second half of 1998 and 2000, respectively. (Reynolds also paid Wilson’s tobacco wholesaler’s association $3,000 in lobbying fees.)

S.F. 2079, a very short bill for suppressing this gray market—whose language was virtually identical with the text proposed by the Iowa Attorney General at the beginning of the session—was unanimously approved in committee and unanimously passed the Senate in February. When the bill reached the House floor on March 23, Representative Donald Shoultz, a ninth-term Democrat and former high school mathematics teacher from Waterloo who had quit smoking almost two decades earlier, offered an amendment prohibiting the giving away of cigarettes or tobacco or providing free products in connection with cigarette or tobacco product sales. Shoultz, who took a strong anti-tobacco stance, filed the same amendment the same day to another Senate bill that, inter alia,

---

303 M. Hurst Marshall to George Wilson, Jr. (Nov. 30, 1999), Bates No. 528953528/9.
304 R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board Lobbyist Client-Executive Branch (Jan. 22, 1999), Bates No. 522533301; R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board Lobbyist Client-Executive Branch (Jan. 26, 2001), Bates No. 525161815. Reynolds also reimbursed Hutchins and Cameron $4,031.67 and $1,662.49 for expenses in 1998 and 2000, respectively. Unfortunately, the online industry documents do not appear to include Reynolds’ lobbying payments to Hutchins and Cameron for 1999; the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board also lacks Reynolds’ form for that year as does the Iowa State Archives. Telephone interview with Sharon Wright, IECDB, Des Moines (May 5, 2008); email from Meaghan McCarthy, SHSI DM (May 7, 2008).
305 Karen to Lynn (Jan. 16, 2001), Bates No. 525161821/3. Reynolds also paid $1,000 to the Iowa Retail Federation and $507.80 to Wasker’s law firm.
311 Telephone interview with Bob Brunkhorst, Waverly (Apr. 27, 2008).
proposed to increase the penalties for underage smoking, though he ultimately withdrew it. Earlier in the 2000 session Shoultz had also filed a bill that would have amended the public anti-smoking law to exclude from the definition of “bar” (which alone among “public places” could be designated a smoking area in its entirety) any establishment with table and seating capacity, regardless of seating capacity, that served meals. The House, however, took no action on the bill, and two weeks after it had been filed R. J. Reynolds’ midwest regional state government official dismissively but correctly reported that it was “not a serious threat.” Much more serious a threat was Shoultz’s amendment to the gray market cigarettes bill, which a Republican tried to eliminate by securing a ruling that it was not germane; after the Speaker had ruled the point well taken, Shoultz asked for unanimous consent to suspend the rules to consider his amendment, but encountering an objection, he moved to suspend the rules and requested a roll-call vote, which produced a 56 to 42 majority (only one Democrat voting Nay). The House then adopted the amendment and unanimously passed the bill with Shoultz’s ban on the free distribution of cigarettes and paraphernalia to adults. A week later, however, the Senate on a voice vote refused to concur in the House amendment and the same day the House, on a motion by the bill’s House floor manager, Rosemary Thomson, receded from its amendment on a non-record roll call vote of 53 to 33. The chamber then, by a vote of 93 to 1, Shoultz casting the lone Nay, passed the bill.

The cigarette oligopoly not yet having definitively slain the proposed total ban on free distribution of cigarettes and promotional products, the initiative reappeared on April 13, 2000, when the above-quoted language was filed from the House floor as an amendment to the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control bill (H.F. 2565), first by a group of 10 Republicans led by first-term Representative Scott Raecker and two Democrats (one being Shoultz); after Raecker had withdrawn it as a result of procedural obstacles and anticipated opposition by representatives who wished to avoid a confrontation with the Senate, it was offered by the other Democrat, Chiodo, who also withdrew his before finding the proper procedural vehicle for avoiding a non-germaneness ruling.\textsuperscript{318} Chiodo, according to Republican Bob Brunkhorst, felt very strongly that distribution of free cigarettes was simply wrong from a public policy standpoint; although Brunkhorst agreed with him (and voted for the amendment), he tried to persuade Chiodo that, since it would not pass or, if it passed the House, the Senate would again strip it out of the bill, it was not worth fighting over.\textsuperscript{319} Chiodo took the floor to frame the debate in terms of voting on “whether we’re going to support big tobacco or not.”\textsuperscript{320} Raecker, executive director of the Institute for Character Development at Drake University in Des Moines,\textsuperscript{321} urged his colleagues to “break a compromise with the state Senate and the governor” over the $9.3 million dollar tobacco use prevention program: “We won’t give away tobacco.... Are you going to buy into the laws we’re going to pass this year or are you going to become part of our efforts to curb smoking for youths?” He insisted that it was “hypocritical for legislators to tout their devotion to curbing smoking if the tobacco industry is allowed to give away cigarettes and flashy promotional gimmicks.”\textsuperscript{322} Raecker later specified that although probably no formal \textsuperscript{318}Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1480 (Apr. 13); Kathie Obradovich, “Ban on Tobacco Freebies OK’ed in House, But Has Dim Future,” WC, Apr. 14, 2000 (A3:1-2). H-8894 and H-8897, which were withdrawn, differed from the third and successful amendment, H-8900, by virtue of not having repealed Iowa Code § 453A.39. According to Chiodo, who eight years later appeared to have a virtually total recollection of the proceedings, the first two amendments—the first of which he had asked Raecker to “run”—were found non-germane (although the Journal does not reflect such a ruling). Telephone interview with Frank Chiodo, Des Moines (May 5, 2008).

---

316 Senate Journal 2000, at 1:1010 (Apr. 5).

\textsuperscript{319}Telephone interview with Bob Brunkhorst, Waverly, IA (Apr. 27, 2008).

\textsuperscript{320}Kathie Obradovich, “Ban on Tobacco Freebies OK’ed in House, But Has Dim Future,” WC, Apr. 14, 2000 (A3:1-2). Chiodo, a smoker, who after graduation from college at the beginning of the 1990s had unsuccessfully applied for a job with the Tobacco Institute as a regional lobbyist, was an improbable tobacco foe: together with his father, a former state legislator and smokeless tobacco lobbyist, he was a dynastic leader of a Des Moines Democratic party club. Telephone interview with Frank Chiodo, Des Moines (May 5, 2008); Adam Nagourney, “Key to Iowa Caucus May Be the Living Room,” NYT, May 27, 2003 (A16); Smokeless Tobacco Council, Inc., State Legislative Consultants (Jan. 1992), Bates No. TI03522699/702. Rep. Shoultz did not associate Chiodo with an anti-smoking stance. Telephone interview with Donald Shoultz, Waterloo (May 6, 2008).

\textsuperscript{321}http://www.drake.edu/icd/about/team/index.php (visited May 6, 2008).

\textsuperscript{322}Jeff Zeleny, “House Vote Threatens Tobacco Compromise,” DMR, Apr. 14, 2000 agreement had existed, there may have been some more nebulous deal among party leaders that, for example, tobacco use prevention supporters would get $9.3 million, while Iverson got continued free distribution of cigarettes and paraphernalia. Nevertheless, neither freshman Raecker nor sophomore Chiodo was part of any such leadership deal, which they regarded as bad public policy because it facilitated continued incentivizing of cigarette purchases in contravention of a legislative intent to reduce smoking. Anti-smoking activist Mary Mascher urged adoption on the grounds that “[t]hese companies give away freebies to get our kids hooked.” Democrat William Witt from the college town of Cedar Falls became direct and personal when he urged his colleagues to “send a message to the ‘generalissimo’ of the Senate as well as to Iowans” that the ban was an opportunity to promote tobacco prevention and keep young people “‘from the poison that is tobacco.’” The House then adopted the amendment by a very large majority (83 to 15), all the Nays being cast by Republicans—one of whom argued that with children already protected by existing law, “[i]ndividuals have the right to choose whether they are going to smoke a cigarette or accept an offer from a company”—and all the prominent anti-smokers such as Doderer, Fallon, Foege, Mascher, and Wise voting Aye.

Adoption of the amendment intensely annoyed Iverson and the tobacco lobbyists, who personally resented the role of those who had pushed it. The Associated Press attributed the split between the House and Senate to representatives’ being “generally younger and less inclined to smoke than 323Telephone interview with Scott Raecker, driving near Ames, IA (May 6, 2008). Shoulitz later recalled no deal trading off the tobacco money for continuing legality of free distribution of cigarettes to adults. Telephone interview with Donald Shoulitz, Waterloo (May 6, 2008).

326House Journal 2000, at 2:1481-82 (Apr. 13) (H-8900). Rosemary Thomson, who professed to be a strong anti-smoking advocate who had suffered marginalization by the Republican leadership for sticking to her party-deviant stance, was the only member to have cosponsored Raecker’s who then voted Nay.

329Telephone interview with legislator who requested anonymity, Des Moines (May 5, 2008).
senators.” Republican House Majority Leader Rants, who voted for the ban, accurately added that “[t]raditionally this chamber has been far more anti-tobacco than the Senate.”\textsuperscript{330} (House Speaker Siegrist, who had voted against the ban, explained their differing votes by reference to Rants’s being more anti-smoking.)\textsuperscript{331} And his party colleague Bob Brunkhorst even made the leap from is to ought: “There is too much smoking in this chamber, too much smoking outside,... We need to do better. We are role models.”\textsuperscript{332} The House’s “surprise move,” the Register reported, might “throw a kink into how Iowa’s share” of the Master Settlement Agreement money would be spent because the Senate, whose leaders were “reluctant to pass a law that would not allow adults to accept tobacco handouts,” was expected to reject the House action. The cigarette companies’ chief voice in the Iowa legislature, Majority Leader Iverson, promptly weighed in with one of the industry’s beloved platitudes: “Whether we like it or not, tobacco is still a legal product.... We love to spend the tax money it brings in, but it’s still politically correct to pick on this product.”\textsuperscript{333} Moving on to a variant of the same cliché that smokers never tire of imagining as debate-ending rhetoric, he continued: “In the 10 years I’ve been here, I keep hearing about all this tobacco stuff, but I still haven’t seen a bill that outlaws the sale of tobacco in Iowa.”\textsuperscript{334} Expressing surprise that the House had undone what she thought had been a deal, Senator Tinsman supported the substance of the “ban on tobacco freebies,” but insisted that “the entire $9.3 million plan could be threatened by Senate Republican leaders upset by the House changes.” She opposed giving young people “free things with tobacco advertising on it,...[b]ut to hurt a major part of the bill for this small piece, I don’t think is worth it.”\textsuperscript{335} She was revealing no secret when she pointedly commented that the House action would cause a problem in the Senate “because the majority leader doesn’t like it.... We’ve had it as part of bills before and he saw that it was removed.”\textsuperscript{336} Nevertheless, in the end Tinsman agreed with Raecker—who doubted that the ban

\textsuperscript{330}AP, “IA Smoking Prevention” (Apr. 14, 2000), Bates No. 2075589242/3.
\textsuperscript{331}Telephone interview with Brent Siegrist, Council Bluffs (May 4, 2008).
\textsuperscript{332}AP, “IA Smoking Prevention” (Apr. 14, 2000), Bates No. 2075589242/3.
would fatally wound the bill because the Senate would simply “not walk away from this session without allocating $9.3 million for prevention”—that with or without the ban, the bill would be approved: “‘It’s that key.’”

Although the cigarette lobby was unable to undermine a majority for the sampling ban in the House, it knew that its most reliable agent for warding off such threats was Senate Majority Leader Iverson. Immediately after House passage, “[i]ndustry personnel,” Hurst Marshall, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company’s state government relations regional director in charge of Iowa, recorded in his weekly status report, “discussed the amendment with Senate leadership and they have agreed to delete the provisions in the Senate.” He seemed to be expressing annoyance rather than alarm in adding that “[t]his is the fourth time that the House has attempted to impose a sampling ban.”

Governor Vilsack was not so sanguine that the Senate would go along with the amendment. Four days after House passage of H.F. 2565, on the day the Senate first took up the House bill, Governor Vilsack, urging legislators to work out their differences over the House ban on handing out promotional cigarettes, made it clear that he did not want that controversy to derail the $9.3 million initiative. After he had spoken to Raecker about the need to get the bill through the legislature, the Republican representative “assured fellow legislators and Vilsack that the smoking prevention bill will reach the governor’s desk without delay.” And although Raecker stressed that “‘[c]ertainly I will not hold up the process based on that,’” he nevertheless added that Vilsack had not asked him to “‘step back’ from his amendment.” For his part, although the governor stated that he did “not necessarily oppose the sample ban,” his further comments sounded as though he might be counseling the cigarette oligopoly in contemplation of a suit challenging the ban. In distinguishing between marketing to adults and children, he “suggested the state might be treading on the tobacco companies’ rights if it further restricts its [sic; must be “their”] ability to advertise. ‘I think, given the nature of the law, it is somewhat difficult to walk the fine line between marketing and commercial speech, which we still value, and essentially prohibiting people from doing certain things.’” How physically distributing (addictive and lethal) commodities constituted protected speech, Vilsack did not explain, perhaps because he had “not researched the law so I am not sure whether there would be some legal complications or constitutional questions....” If he was not researching the issue, the cigarette oligopolists’ battalion of lawyers were.

---

During the first day of Senate debate Boettger, acting for Iverson and the cigarette oligopoly, filed an amendment to strike the new House provision, while Bolkcom filed one to retain it but shift its location within the bill. However, when debate on the bill resumed two days later, Boettger and then Bolkcom both asked and received unanimous consent to withdraw their amendments, and the Senate passed the bill (against Bolkcom’s lone Nay) with the House ban. (The difference in emphasis emerged in the comment by Boettger, chair of the Senate Human Resources Committee, which on the same day as the House action unanimously recommended passage of S.F. 2449, the Senate’s alternative Tobacco Use Prevention and Control bill—for which H.F. 2565 was substituted four days later—that “[a] lot of statistics have shown that if someone doesn’t start smoking by the time they’re 20, they probably aren’t going to, so we get the main bang for our buck by addressing mainly youth.”)

Given the opposition to the total ban on sampling from such divergent points on the political spectrum and the Senate’s previous success in removing it from a House bill, Brunkhorst and others in the House who had voted for it were more than a little “surprised” that the Senate passed it this time. From his perspective, the explanation for this turn of events was that the Senate leadership, which considered it wrong to prohibit the promotion of “a legal product,” had simply tired of fighting against it and given up.

Reynolds’ lobbying forces shared Brunkhorst and his colleagues’ surprise, but also appeared to be perplexed in their disappointment. The day after the Senate vote, Roger Mozingo, a company officer in his capacity as vice president

---

341 See below this ch.
348 Telephone interview with Bob Brunkhorst, Waverly, IA (Apr. 27, 2008).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

for state government relations, noted in his weekly status report to his boss, Tommy J. Payne, the executive president for external relations who reported directly to R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company’s chairman and CEO, that “Senate leadership had assured industry personnel that the House amendment would be removed in the Senate but unfortunately, they agreed with the amendment and the measure passed and has been sent to the governor.” In order, perhaps, self-protectively to allude to his team’s .750 batting average, Mozingo added that the “sampling provision had been defeated on three different occasions during the past month being adopted.”

The legislative setback did not mean that the tobacco companies accepted defeat. And whether directly activated by the oligopolists or resentful of the prospective loss of free cigarettes and cigarette company mugs, smoking senators did not give up either. A confluence of interest and self-interest led a tobacco lobbyist to ask Jack Rife, long one of the chamber’s most belligerent and heaviest smokers, to “run” the amendment that would undo the damage done by S.F. 2625, which would not be enrolled, signed by the House Speaker and Senate President, and sent to the governor until April 26. On April 20, the day after the Senate leadership had let the oligopoly down, the Senate took up debate of H.F. 2555, the bill making appropriations from the Master Settlement Agreement, which the House had passed by a vote of 100 to 0 on April 18 and passage of which the Senate Appropriations Committee (of which Rife was a member) had 350 R. L. Mozingo to T. J. Payne, Weekly Status Report—State Government Relations (Apr. 20, 2000), Bates No. 524116229/30. Mozingo apparently synthesized the reports that he received from his four regional directors; whether he (or even they) had first-hand knowledge is unclear. House Speaker Siegrist later speculated that Iverson may have lost control of his caucus regarding the ban, which the House leadership may have told him was “good policy,” even if it was a deal breaker, and have asked him to consider how bad the result would be if it passed. Telephone interview with Brent Siegrist, Council Bluffs (May 4, 2008).

351 Telephone interview with Jack Rife, Des Moines (Apr. 29, 2008). Rife, who by 2008 had for five years been a political appointee-representative of the U.S. Secretary of Labor monitoring labor legislative developments in Iowa and several other midwestern states, actually let slip that shortly before the events in 2000 he had received such free cigarettes at a fair. Rife recalled the amendment distinctly, but could not remember which tobacco lobbyist had approached him, though he thought it had been either Bill Wimmer or Susan Cameron (the daughter of former Senate Majority Leader Bill Hutchins).
recommended by a vote of 23 to 0 the next day.\textsuperscript{354} On April 20, Rife and his fellow heavy smoker, Richard Drake\textsuperscript{355} filed an amendment that struck the offending subsection of H.F. 2565, repealed the repeal of Iowa Code § 543A.39(6), and then reenacted the provision if H.F. 2565 was enacted before H.F. 2555.\textsuperscript{356} After they had offered their cigarette industry amendment from the floor, Senator Connolly raised the point of order that the amendment was not germane, but withdrew it; in turn Rife withdrew his own amendment and received unanimous consent that action on the bill be deferred.\textsuperscript{357} Later that evening, when the Senate resumed debate on H.F. 2555, Rife and Drake again filed and withdrew another amendment with the same text.\textsuperscript{358} Finally, they filed a third, slightly different amendment, which this time was ruled out of order after Connolly had once again raised the point of order that it was not germane. The bill then passed by a vote of 47 to 0, Rife and Drake voting Aye.\textsuperscript{359}

If in fact Iverson did develop sampling ban fatigue,\textsuperscript{360} his cigarette company principals definitely did not. They may have agreed, pursuant to the Master Settlement Agreement, not to lobby against certain kinds of youth-centered legislation,\textsuperscript{361} but bans on handing out free samples to adults was not one of them. Three days after Rife and Drake’s gambit had failed, David Remes, a lawyer at Covington & Burling who—on his way to receiving his firm’s “Senior Lawyer Pro Bono award in 2005 and the Human Rights Campaign’s Ally of Justice Award in 2006”\textsuperscript{362}—over much of his career had been devoting many of his billable hours to protecting the profits of the individual cigarette oligopolists and

\begin{itemize}
\item\textsuperscript{354}Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1271 (Apr. 19).
\item\textsuperscript{355}Former Senator Andy McKean confirmed that Drake also smoked heavily. Telephone interview with Andy McKean, Anamosa (Apr. 28, 2008).
\item\textsuperscript{356}Senate Journal 2000, at 2:2074-75 (S-5556) (Apr. 20).
\item\textsuperscript{357}Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1293 (Apr. 20). Unfortunately, eight years later Connolly had no recollection of these “maneuvers” or even of the issue of the ban. Telephone interview with Michael Connolly, Dubuque (Apr. 29, 2008).
\item\textsuperscript{358}Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1300, 2076-77 (S-5660) (Apr. 20).
\item\textsuperscript{359}Senate Journal 2000, at 2:1300-1301, 2077-78 (S-5661) (Apr. 20). The third version of the amendment differed from the first two by virtue of retaining a provision from Chiodo’s bill that exempted from the ban transactions among businesses not involving consumers and deleting the reenactment of § 543A.39(6).
\item\textsuperscript{360}Eight years later Iverson purported to recall nothing about the ban. Telephone interview with Stewart Iverson (Apr. 28, 2008).
\item\textsuperscript{361}See below this ch.
\end{itemize}

2948
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

their Tobacco Institute, wrote a memo, which was faxed to and from Wasker’s cigarette industry law and lobbying firm, 363 titled, “House File 2565 Will Hurt Iowa Tobacco Retailers.” Casting doubt on his own competence and the value that the tobacco firms received from their pricey corporate counsel, already in the second sentence Remes erroneously claimed that the provision prohibiting retailers and others from providing free articles in exchange for the purchase of cigarettes had been “added as an amendment (S-5445) at the last minute....” In fact, the provision was added neither by that amendment (which, as just seen, had been withdrawn) nor by the Senate at all: the House, as even semi-diligent lay readers of the legislative journals and press could have told Remes, had debated it intensively and included it in the bill, as tobacco-beholden and other senators who opposed it well knew before it ever arrived in the Senate. His sloppy research notwithstanding, Remes knew an actionable state interference with his clients’ sales to addicted smokers when he saw one: “This provision could be read to prohibit a retailer from selling cigarettes...using two-for-one promotions, which would involve the provision of a free package in exchange for the purchase of a package” as well as from “providing consumers with non-tobacco premium items in redemption of coupons or proof-of-purchase.” Especially since these prohibitions also “constrain manufacturers,” the punch line read: “new § 453A.39(2) [sic; should be § 142A.6(6)(b)] should be repealed.” In a new version of the memo two days later Remes added that: “As far as we know, no other state has enacted such restrictive retail legislation.”

363By this time, after the Tobacco Institute had been dissolved pursuant to the Master Settlement Agreement, Wasker was lobbying for Lorillard Tobacco and Brown & Williamson Tobacco. For example, for 1999 and 2000, Lorillard paid his firm $32,500 and $32,600, respectively, and budgeted $65,000 for 2001. [Lorillard Tobacco Co.,] 2001 Budget State Lobbyists (Oct. 29, 2001), Bates No. 99394130; Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board, Lobbyist Client Report - Executive Branch (Lorillard Tobacco Company, Jan. 29, 2001) (copy furnished by IECDB). For the first half of 1999, Brown & Williamson paid him $4,062.50 as a retainer; for 2000 his retainer was $8,125. Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board, Lobbyist Client Report - Executive Branch (Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., Jan. 16, 2001) (copy furnished by IECDB).

364David H. Remes (Covington & Burling), “House File 2565 Will Hurt Iowa Tobacco Retailers” (Apr. 23, 2000), Bates No. 86102282. The document was found in the files of Lorillard Co. § 453A.39 was repealed by H.F. 2565. Why Remes did not mention section (6)(b), which banned giving away free samples to adults, is unclear.

365David H. Remes (Covington & Burling), “House File 2565 Will Hurt Iowa Tobacco Retailers” (Apr. 25, 2000), Bates No. 518979288. In this version Remes excised the
During the final three or four days of the session (which adjourned on April 26), Hurst Marshall reported (and Mozingo repeated to Payne) that “industry personnel attempted to amend and or delete the provision but all efforts failed.” Philip Morris’ State Government Affairs Tobacco Executive Report also recounted that “[o]n 4/26, an amendment to nullify the damaging anti-sampling and promotion provisions of HF 2565 was inserted into an appropriations bill, but was removed by leadership and the legislature adjourned.” (For such intelligence and, presumably, more effective lobbying, Philip Morris in 2000 paid Cal Hultman and Kim Haus-Ludwig $15,166.66 and $10,333.34, respectively.) Lorillard Tobacco Company had also been trying to mobilize last-minute support for corrective action. At 5:55 p.m. on April 24, Kurt Leib, the firm’s Midwest regional government affairs manager, faxed from a hotel in Des Moines a message to the regional sales manager that the division manager in the Des Moines office had “offered to help out on this issue. The bottom line is we need help from the retail community to correct the situation. We’re late out of the gate, but I am hopeful we will prevail in the end.” The seriousness of the plea was underscored by the re-faxing of the message by the director of sales planning to two associate general counsel, one of whom was also the director of government affairs, asking them to “advise as to the specifics of what our field sales personnel erroneous reference to S-5445 without inserting the correct reference. Oddly, on the intervening day, the Wasker Wimmer law/lobbying firm had faxed to Covington & Burling a Senate clip sheet with S-5445, on which the subsection dealing with free articles had been underlined and marginally annotated “fix.” Senate Clip Sheet, Apr. 19, 2000 (Apr. 24, 2000), Bates No. 2075403601.

366Hurst Marshall to Lynn Hutchens, Weekly Report—Region II (Apr. 27), Bates No. 527843365; R. L. Mozingo to T. J. Payne, Weekly Status Report—State Government Relations (Apr. 28, 2000), Bates No. 524116228. These attempts to amend/delete have not been identified in the legislative journals.

367[Philip Morris] State Government Affairs Tobacco Executive Report (May 1, 2000), Bates No. 2078174017. No such insertion into an appropriations bill on Apr. 26, 2000 was identified in the legislative journals.

in Iowa can do to help.”369 Two days after the legislature adjourned, Leib thanked his Des Moines colleague and his staff for having offered assistance: “Your willingness to get involved and spread the word to your retail accounts about the potential impact of this issue certainly gave us a fighting chance at the state capital.”370 Unfortunately, none of these communications revealed why the cigarette oligopolists failed in their quest to repeal the ban on free samples.

Rather than second-guessing themselves over what they had done wrong or why Iverson had failed them, the companies, even while still lobbying, had already begun preparing plan B—litigation. Although their contents were, unfortunately, not disclosed in the course of discovery or pursuant to the MSA, a flurry of “privileged” “confidential” documents among lawyers during the last week in April make it clear that they were already shaping a lawsuit.371 Whether Iverson did not press his caucus as hard as he perhaps could have because cigarette industry lobbyists told him that the courts would take care of the matter is unknown.372 At the same time, taking no chances, Philip Morris was also preparing for the possibility that, at least until it prevailed in any litigation, it would have to stop running promotion programs in Iowa.373 Whereas R. J. Reynolds drafted a “script” by the end of April announcing that “[u]ntil the legislation can be clarified, we have chosen to stop all promotional activities” in Iowa,374 and Philip Morris in May drafted a letter to wholesalers in Iowa declaring that “[a]lthough PMUSA does not full [sic] agree with the scope of this law, we 369 Kurt Leib to Rick Redfield and Jim Williams to Haney Bell and Michael Shannon, Apr. 24, 2000, Bates No. 86102284. For the positions held by the officials, see Lorillard Tobacco Company, Table of Organizational Charts (July 2000), Bates No. 98915766.

371 E.g., D.H. Remes to P. Desel, Report from Joint Defense Counsel to Philip Morris In-House Counsel Reflecting Legal Analysis of Iowa Legislation Banning Promotion of Tobacco Products (Apr. 25, 2000), Bates No. 2074105247; B. Giles to H. Turner, Email from Philip Morris Employee to Philip Morris Employee Conveying Legal Analysis of Philip Morris Outside Counsel (Remes) Regarding Iowa Tobacco Control Bill and Its Impact on Philip Morris Promotional Activity (Apr. 27, 2000), Bates No. 2085090164B.
372 Iverson later stated that he had no recollection of the ban. Telephone interview with Stewart Iverson (Apr. 28, 2008).
373 E.g., email from Joe Murillo [Senior Assistant General Counsel] to Amy Rothstein [Senior Counsel Corporate Affairs], Subject: Re: Iowa Anti-Promotion Statute (Apr. 27, 2000), Bates No. 2080811674E; email from Thomas Garguilo [Marketing Manager] to Thomas Lauinger [Brand Manager], et al., Subject: Potential Iowa Legislation (May 1, 2000), Bates No. 2079168375.
374 [R. J. Reynolds], “Iowa Restrictions” (Apr. 28, 2008), Bates No. 525170354.
full [sic] intend to abide by the law,” and immediately discontinued its price promotions, Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation adopted a commercially and legally belligerent stance. On May 18, 2000, three days after Governor Vilsack signed the bill into law, it informed wholesalers and retailers in Iowa that it considered the “unacceptable” and “offending provisions to be unconstitutional and illegal” and was “confident” that it would “get them overturned” and prevail in a lawsuit that it and “other members of the tobacco industry” were filing in federal court on the grounds that the Iowa law violated federal cigarette laws. “Thus, we intend to continue in a ‘Business As Usual’ manner in Iowa to avoid any harm to our business or to our customers while we seek the injunction.” To be sure, Brown & Williamson cautiously added that “[w]e cannot give you legal advice as to whether you should choose to continue to participate in our programs,” observing that recipients might wish to contact their lawyer.

Philip Morris, R. J. Reynolds, Brown & Williamson, and Lorillard intended, shortly after Governor Vilsack had signed the bill into law on May 15, to file a lawsuit to overturn the ban on promotions to adults on the grounds that it was preempted by the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act, which provides that: “No requirement or prohibition based on smoking and health shall be imposed under State law with respect to the advertising or promotion of any cigarettes the packages of which are in conformity with the provisions of this act.” As late as May 24, Reynolds had drafted a “Statement regarding complaint filed against the State of Iowa,” which announced that the four companies had filed suit that day together with two retail store owners in Iowa. Reynolds specified that the law, “[u]nder the guise of youth-smoking prevention,” prohibited “programs that are developed for and limited to adult smokers,” including price discounts (“buy-one-get-one-free offers and coupons”), distribution of lighters with a product message, and “sampling to adult smokers in age-restricted facilities.” The economic nub of the oligopoly’s complaint was that: “Given the extremely restricted environment in which we operate, promotional programs play a vital role in Reynolds Tobacco’s ability to compete for adult smokers’ business. These programs are also an important means by which retailers generate in-store traffic and sales of tobacco and other items.” The company alleged that the ban would cause “severe...and irreparable harm to manufacturers and the state’s retailers without materially advancing the goal of youth-smoking prevention,” which could “far more directly and effectively be served by means that do not restrict commercial trade and free speech.”

---

375 PMUSA, “Draft letter to all Wholesalers in the State of Iowa” (May 2000), Bates No. 2082186454.

376 Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation to Our Direct Buying Customers Servicing Stores in Iowa and Retail Customers with Stores in Iowa, “Iowa ‘Youth Protection’ Legislation” (May 18, 2000), Bates No. 82572356 (addressed to Faeth Whlse, Ft. Madison).

In fact, the suit was not filed on May 24 and when it was a week later, the cigarette manufacturers were not plaintiffs. Why they instead chose to choreograph the litigation—as their progenitor, the Tobacco Trust, had done in Iowa and elsewhere since the nineteenth century—as brought by two straw-men-retailers is not clear because the emails and memoranda that their lawyers exchanged during the latter half of May and that presumably shed light on this and other tactics were deemed privileged and not made public. For example, a “Series of emails concerning retailer participation in the industry lawsuit against the State of Iowa for passing legislation that bans cigarette promotion” initiated by Patricia Barald, an attorney at Covington & Burling (whose website proudly declares that she “has represented the tobacco industry in such matters as protection of first amendment rights...[and] preservation of highly confidential and proprietary trade secret ingredient and product formula information”), translucently identified the instigators and the instigated.

The complaint that was filed in federal district court in Des Moines on June 1 by Davis, Brown, one of Iowa’s highest-profile corporate law firms, in the names of two store owners in Council Bluffs and Sioux City, Missouri River border towns, repeated Remes’s false claim that the ban had been “added as a last-minute amendment” and even “at the eleventh hour.” To this error the oligopoly attached the non sequitur that the ban “has no relation to the new commission on tobacco use prevention and control that is the focus of the new law.” The State went to some pains to refute the innuendo that the provision 378 R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Statement Regarding Complain Filed Against the State of Iowa (May 24, 2000), Bates No. 525170359/60.

379 See above Parts I-II.
382 Jones d/b/a The Filling Station v. Vilsack, Complaint, ¶¶ 2 and 12, at 1, 4 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, June 1, 2000), Bates No. 98091593/6. In their main appellate brief, the cigarette companies finally stated, marginally more accurately, that the provision was “a last-minute addition to House File 2565,” H-8900 passing “just under attack was a helter-skelter, ill-conceived afterthought. Cathy Callaway, the first director of the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division of the Iowa Public Health Department, who, in her previous position as director of tobacco control and advocacy at the American Lung Association of Iowa from 1995 to 2000, had monitored the Iowa legislature’s activities regarding “this type of legislation,” gave an affidavit stating that “similar legislation was considered each and every year from 1996 up until the year 2000, when” it was “given careful consideration and thought” and passed. \(^{383}\)
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

The cigarette manufacturers behind the suit argued that the prohibited promotions were “a significant means” of their communications with adult smokers especially because of the federal ban on broadcast media advertising. In particular, the promotions supplied information such as price and “other brand attributes” and reinforced brand loyalty, brand switching, marketing of new brands, thus leaving consumers “better informed...and financially better off...” \(^{384}\)

The companies’ central legal claim was that the Iowa ban on distributing free samples and promotional items was precisely the type of state law prohibition based on smoking and health “with respect to advertising or promotion of any cigarettes” whose packages had been labeled in conformity with the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act (FCLAA) that that congressional enactment preempted and was therefore invalid under the federal supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution. \(^{385}\) Considerably less facially plausible was the First Amendment commercial speech claim that “the government may not impose \(^{383}\) Jones d/b/a The Filling Station v. Vilsack, Affidavit of Cathy Callaway, ¶ 1 and 2, at 1-2 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, Sept. 27, 2000) Bates No. 98091419/20. The State referred to Callaway’s affidavit. Jones d/b/a The Filling Station v. Vilsack, Defendants’ Statement of Undisputed Material Facts in Support of Defendants’ Motion for Summary Judgment, ¶1, at 1-2 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, Oct. 3, 2000), Bates No. 98091413/4. To be sure, Callaway did not identify the previous bills nor explain exactly how similar they had been. But see Kathie Obradovich, “Ban on Tobacco Freebies OK’d in House, But Has Dim Future,” WC, Apr. 14, 2000 (A3:1) (“House members have debated and approved the measure several times in the past two years, only to have the Senate refuse to consider it”).

---

\(^{384}\) Jones d/b/a The Filling Station v. Vilsack, Complaint, ¶ 20, at 6-7 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, June 1, 2000), Bates No. 98091591/8/9.

\(^{385}\) Jones d/b/a The Filling Station v. Vilsack, Complaint, ¶¶ 27-34, at 8-10 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, June 1, 2000), Bates No. 98091591/600-602.
restrictions on speech in order to keep its adult citizens in ignorance of truthful information about lawful products, even products it considers to be ‘vices.’ To the extent that the State’s goal is to ‘foster a social and legal climate in which tobacco use becomes undesirable and unacceptable’...and Section 142A.6(6) attempts to further that goal by restricting truthful and protected speech, it clearly and directly violates the First Amendment.” (The state countered this claim with the argument that the Iowa law in no way prohibited communications or advertising or promoting the sale of cigarettes, but merely prohibited giving them away. However, since the trial court ruled that the Iowa law was preempted, it never reached the free speech claim.)

In April 2001, liberal federal judge Robert Platt, a Clinton appointee, sustained the cigarette companies’ federal preemption claim chiefly because he regarded the State’s narrow interpretation of the term “promotion” in FCLAA as referring merely to display racks as “untenable” and “unsupported,” especially since it would have required him to treat the word as “superfluous....” More fundamentally, however, Pratt was left “not entirely convinced” that FCLAA’s purpose did not conflict with Iowa’s ban on free distribution because Congress intended “to generally protect the tobacco industry; with the banned promotional activities thus “encompassed in the general scheme of the FCLAA...the Court sees no way around the conclusion that FCLAA preempts” the prohibition. (That numerous critical contemporaries viewed FCLAA as “a shocking piece of special interest legislation” designed “to protect the economic health of the tobacco industry by freeing it of proper regulation” would not justify ascribing

---

386 Jones d/b/a The Filling Station v. Vilsack, Complaint, ¶ 39, at 11-12 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, June 1, 2000), Bates No. 98091591/603-4.
387 The Filling Station v. Vilsack, Defendants’ Reply in Support of Motion for Summary Judgment, at 3-4 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, Nov. 9, 2000), Bates No. 98091341/3-4.
388 The Filling Station, Inc. v. Vilsack, Memorandum Opinion and Order, at A4-A5 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, Apr. 16, 2001), reprinted in Appellants’ Brief and Argument, Appendix, Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030 (8th Cir. 2001).
390 The Filling Station, Inc. v. Vilsack, Memorandum Opinion and Order, at A-11, A-12, A-13 (S.D. IA Central Div., C.A. No. 4-00CV-90271, Apr. 16, 2001), reprinted in Appellants’ Brief and Argument, Appendix, Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030 (8th Cir. 2001). The Attorney General had agreed not to enforce the ban until the court had ruled on its constitutionality. Id. at A-4.
391 “Cigarettes vs. F.T.C.,” NYT, July 9, 1965 (28) (edit.). See also “8 Congressmen Ask Cigarette Bill Veto,” NYT, July 17, 1965 (26); Elizabeth Drew, “The Quiet Victory such an intent to Congress four decades later in the wake of the revolution in public knowledge about the health consequences of smoking, about the cigarette oligopoly’s conduct in perpetrating and perpetuating the mass mortality and morbidity of its customers and secondhand smoke victims, and in regulation of and societal attitudes toward smoking and the cigarette industry.)

In his appellate brief the Iowa attorney general, quoting the 1994 Surgeon General’s Report, placed great emphasis on the strategic advantage that handing out free samples had as a marketing device over mere advertising in its ability to put an addictive commodity directly into consumers’ hands—along with the lighter to light it. For example, one company’s marketing test revealed that households receiving free samples by mail increased their consumption by more than four times as much as a control group receiving only discount coupons.

To be sure, the Surgeon General’s Report expressly analyzed sampling and specialty items as “promotional efforts.”  The State also reurged the argument it had unsuccessfully advanced in support of its motion for summary judgment that all that Congress had intended with FCLAA was to “control the dissemination of information to the public” in order to insure that warnings about cigarettes were given in a uniform and consistent manner; in contrast, nothing in that statute suggested that Congress wanted to relieve the cigarette industry of state regulation regarding free tobacco samples. In pleading for a narrow interpretation of “promotion,” the attorney general recognized that the statutory term could (as the cigarette companies argued) also be “interpreted broadly to include any type of marketing activity intended to increase cigarette sales,” thus preempting any state law that “thwarted efforts by the tobacco industry to increase tobacco sales....” But such an interpretation encountered the difficulty that “no one could seriously contend that the FCLAA preempts” state sales taxes or laws banning sales to minors. The key to understanding congressional intent regarding preemption was, as far as the Iowa attorney general was concerned, to be found in the explanation of legislative history contained in the 1969 Senate 392 Appellants’ Brief and Argument at 6, Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030 (8th Cir. 2001).

---

395 Appellants’ Brief and Argument at 14, Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030 (8th Cir. 2001).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

report on that year’s amendment, which inserted “promotion” into the preemption provision. The Senate Commerce Committee declared that this preemption “‘would in no way affect the power of any state...with respect to the taxation or the sale of cigarettes to minors, or the prohibition of smoking in public buildings, or similar police regulations. It is limited entirely to state or local requirements or prohibitions in the advertising of cigarettes.” The State then argued that handing out free cigarettes, as conduct rather than dissemination of information, fell “in the same category” of non-preempted state police regulations from which Congress did not intend to protect cigarette retailers.

The appellate court did not specifically deal with this argument, which the cigarette oligopolists in their brief dismissed on the grounds that “one unremarkable sentence in a single report cannot turn a statute designed to prohibit state restrictions on cigarette advertising and promotion into a statute designed to give states carte blanche to use their ‘police powers’ to ban tobacco advertising and promotion.”

Later that year the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirmed Pratt’s “essential holding” that the ban on free distribution was preempted by the FCLAA of 1969, which prohibited state laws from imposing any prohibition, based on smoking and health, with respect to the promotion of any cigarette packages labeled in conformity the federal law. Like Pratt, the appellate judges remained unpersuaded “by the State’s herculean efforts” to “carve out a meaning for ‘promotion’ that is less expansive than its apparent plain meaning, and yet conceptually different from ‘advertising.’” Moreover, they dismissed out of hand the State’s “dire prediction” that the court’s holding would entail imputing to Congress an intent to deprive the states of the “‘power to prohibit a cigarette company from handing out free cigarettes in an elementary school yard.’” The Eighth Circuit panel nevertheless refused to take up the challenge even in dictum, preferring—since the plaintiffs had not contested such a prohibition—not to decide whether such a prohibition would also be preempted; instead, it left the State with the meager consolation that “[f]or a variety of practical reasons, we 397 Appellants’ Reply Brief at 6, Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030 (8th Cir. 2001).

---

398 Appellees’ Brief and Argument at 20, Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030 (8th Cir. 2001).
399 Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030, 1039 (8th Cir. 2001). The appeals court did, however, reverse Pratt’s judgment that all of § 142A.6(6) was preempted rather than merely § 142A.6(6)(a)-(b). Id. at 1038-39.
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

tend to doubt that cigarette dealers would ever challenge” Iowa’s ban on giving children free cigarettes.400 Three years later the Iowa legislature essentially reinstated the restrictions on sampling from 1991.401

That the court rulings in the Iowa case were hardly the only possible interpretation was made clear in 2005 by the California Supreme Court, which held that a similar California law was not preempted because there was no clear Federal purpose to bar state regulation of the nonsale distribution of cigarettes to minors or adults. The vast distance between the California Supreme Court’s approach and the Eighth Circuit’s may be gauged by the following crucial analysis from the former opinion:

The problem with defendant’s contention that the “plain meaning” of section 1334 bars any state regulation of the free distribution of cigarettes is that, as defendant concedes, it is clear that Congress did not intend section 1334 to preempt state regulation of the distribution of cigarettes to minors. To the contrary, Congress has required states to ban tobacco distribution to minors as a condition of receiving federal funds for substance abuse treatment. ... There is no language in section 1334, however, that distinguishes between distribution to minors and distribution to adults. Hence, the state Attorney General here contends that the only way to effectuate Congress’s intent to bar distribution of cigarettes to minors is to draw a line distinguishing between “promotion” and “distribution.” Under this theory, states could not regulate actions intended to persuade persons to smoke a particular defendant’s brand of cigarettes, but it could regulate the actual transfer of the cigarettes not only to minors but also to adults. ...

State regulation of nonsale distribution of cigarettes would not conflict with the congressional purpose just described. Although national commerce in cigarettes would be substantially impeded if a tobacco company’s cigarette labeling and advertising had to be altered to comply with the laws of every state, that is not the case for state regulation of free distribution of cigarettes. Moreover, although Congress has enacted extensive legislation governing cigarette advertising, and has authorized the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) to impose further regulations, Congress has never enacted any comprehensive laws governing nonsale distributions nor authorized the FTC to do so. In view of the health hazards of smoking expressly recognized by Congress..., it would be unreasonable to conclude that Congress intended nonsale distribution of cigarettes to continue entirely without regulation. ...

First, in 1992 Congress enacted legislation requiring states to prohibit nonsale distribution of cigarettes to minors as a condition of receiving federal aid for state programs to treat substance abuse. ... This enactment shows that Congress did not regard the FCLAA as barring state regulation of nonsale distribution of cigarettes to minors.

400 Jones v. Vilsack, 272 F.3d 1030, 1037-38 (8th Cir. 2001) (quoting Fed’n of Adver. Indus. Representatives, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 189 F.3d 633, 638 (7th Cir. 1999)).

Second, in 1995 Congress enacted a law requiring all federal agencies to prohibit nonsale distribution of tobacco “in or around any federal building.” ... Defendant here points out that Congress has the power to require certain conduct by federal agencies while prohibiting such conduct by state agencies. ... But it is difficult to conceive of a coherent policy that would bar nonsale distributions in or around federal buildings yet preclude states from barring such distributions on state property.

Third, although the FCLAA does not describe what powers are retained by the states, the high court in Lorillard asserted that Congress intended that the “[s]tates remain free…to regulate conduct with respect to cigarette use and sales.” ... If the FCLAA’s bar on state regulation of the promotion of cigarettes extends to barring state regulation of distribution, that prohibition could not logically be confined to nonsale distribution. Discount sales of cigarettes, sales accompanied by rebate offers, and the distribution of coupons entitling a holder to receive free or discounted cigarettes could equally be considered a form of promotion of cigarette sales and use. Thus, such a broad definition would infringe on the state’s retained powers to regulate cigarette use and sales.

Indeed, in terms of smoking’s adverse effect on health, there is very little distinction between the sale of cigarettes at full retail price, the sale of cigarettes at discounted prices, and the free distribution of cigarettes—all place cigarettes in the hands of the public. The FCLAA itself does not draw a distinction between sales of cigarettes and free distributions; it requires labeling of any package in which cigarettes are offered for sale “or otherwise distributed to consumers”..., and it defines the term “ ‘sale or distribution’ ” as including “sampling or any other distribution not for sale.”

Youth Access to Tobacco and Possession, Use, and Purchase Penalty Laws: 2000

Another tactic aimed at reducing youth access is penalizing youth for possession, use, and purchase (PUP) of tobacco. While Synar-type policies focus on reducing the supply of cigarettes to youth, PUP policies aim to stunt demand for cigarettes by introducing negative consequences that affect young smokers directly. Most tobacco-control advocates do not favor emphasizing PUP policy because they feel it reinforces the tobacco-industry messages that tobacco is for adults and implies that the individual holds sole responsibility for choosing to smoke. Currently there is no strong evidence that PUP enforcement reduces youth smoking rates.

403 Jean Forster, Rachel Windome, and Debra Bernat, “Policy Interventions and Surveillance As Strategies to Prevent Tobacco Use in Adolescents and Young Adults,” American Journal of Preventive Medicine 33(6S):S335-39 at S336 (Dec. 2007). For more detailed analysis of the ineffectiveness and counter-productiveness of punitive PUP laws,
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

By the 1999-2000 legislative sessions, anti-smoking groups’ ability to secure enactment of their agenda was marginally strengthened by the Master Settlement Agreement, under which the cigarette manufacturers were prohibited from lobbying against eight kinds of potential legislation, including: limitations on youth access to vending machines; enhanced prosecution of violations of laws prohibiting retail sales to youths; enforcing access restrictions through penalties on youths for possession or use; limitations on tobacco advertising in or on school facilities; and limitations on non-tobacco products designed to look like tobacco products such as candy cigarettes.404 The types of measures that the legislature was in fact able to pass—amendments to the cigarette sales law—turned out to fall largely within the scope of this framework.

The primary example of such legislation was S.F. 2366, which the Senate Human Resources Committee introduced and unanimously approved on February 28, 2000, both anti-smoking stalwarts Hammond and Dvorsky and pro-tobacco Senators Boettger, Bartz, and Schuerer voting for it.405 The bill’s chief components included: (1) making the use of a driver’s license by anyone under 18 to obtain cigarettes or other tobacco products a simple misdemeanor punishable by a $100 fine; (2) making it lawful for cigarette permittees to employ persons under the age of 18 to sell cigarettes;406 (3) striking the provision in the existing law requiring the city or county enforcing the prohibition on use, possession, or purchase of cigarettes by anyone under 18 to use the civil penalty (or criminal fine) paid for such violations for enforcement of this section of the cigarette sales law; (4) authorizing cigarette sales permit holders or their employees, if they have a “reasonable belief based on factual evidence” that a driver’s license presented by a person wanting to buy cigarettes is altered, 404 Master Settlement Agreement, § III (m) at 23 and Exhibit F (Nov. 23, 1998), on http://www.naag.org.

405 Senate Journal 2000, at 1:444. The bill was identical to Senate Study Bill 3206; http://www.legis.state.ia.us/GA/78GA/Legislation/SSB/03200/SSB03206/Current.html.

406 This provision, which sailed through all debates without any effort to strike and was enacted, accommodated cigarette sellers’ demands for cheap labor in the context of a contemporaneous dispute with the Attorney General’s Office, which took the position that under-18-year-old clerks did “possess” tobacco in violation of the law, but at the same time (helpfully) conceded that stores would have a hard time selling without teenagers. Thomas O’Donnell, “Minors Often Sell Tobacco in Iowa,” DMR, Aug. 19, 1999 (1A) (NewsBank). Perhaps to create the illusion of parity, the provision in the bill was paired with one exempting minors in sting operations from liability.

2960
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

falsified, or belongs to someone else to retain the license and deliver it within 24 hours to the appropriate local law enforcement agency; (5) authorizing courts to impose as an alternative to the scheduled fine a penalty of performance of community service or attendance at tobacco education classes for first or second violations of the prohibition against minors’ using, possessing, buying or trying to buy cigarettes or other tobacco products; (6) increasing the scheduled fines for the aforementioned violations from $25 to $50 for a first offense, from $50 to $100 for a second offense, and from $100 to $250 for third and additional offenses; and (7) increasing the criminal penalty for failing to pay these fines or to perform the alternative service/attend tobacco education classes from and to the same amounts. 407

When the Senate took up the bill on March 10, an amendment embodying a new bill was filed from the floor by Human Resources Committee chair Boettger. That S-5114 was cosponsored by Majority Leader Iverson and Minority Leader Gronstal signaled that it was a bipartisan leadership initiative whose passage in the Senate was secure. It differed in two major respects from the committee bill. First, it specified that the alternative penalty would be 30 hours of community service or tobacco education for a second violation and, more importantly, imposed for a third or subsequent offense, in addition to the scheduled fine, performance of 40 hours of community service and a 30-day suspension of the violator’s driver’s license. And second, it marginally strengthened the penalty for a retailer’s violation of the prohibition of selling to minors by mandating a permit suspension for a third and revocation for a fourth violation within three (instead of five) years. 408

Before the Senate voted on this amendment, Republican Senator Jeffrey Lamberti filed an amendment to it from the floor that imposed a fine (of $100 for the first offense, $250 for a second offense, and $500 for a third and additional offenses) on retailers’ employees for selling to minors. 409 Since Lamberti’s father was the founder of Casey’s General Stores, one of the largest cigarette sellers in Iowa, it was hardly surprising that he sought to bring the state’s coercive powers to bear on his family’s company’s employees, whose law-breaking 407 S.F. 2366, §§ 1, 2, 3, 4, and 9 (Feb. 28, 2000, by Senate Human Resource Committee).

408 S-5114, §§ 3 and 6 (Mar. 9, 2000); http://www.legis.state.ia.us/GA/78GA/Legislation/S/05100/S05114/Current.html. The driver’s license suspension penalty was apparently modelled after a similar provision enacted in Florida in 1997 (which also included community service penalties). 1997 Fla. Laws ch. 162, § 5(1), at 3050, 3053.

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

proclivities—which management was purportedly unable to suppress—exposed owners to liability: “‘If you don’t have some penalty on that clerk you’re never going to solve the problem.... It gives clerks an excuse not to sell to their friends.’”410 (Unfortunately for employers under a vicarious liability regime, as Lamberti later lamented, low-wage convenience store clerks “don’t give a damn.”)411 After the Senate had adopted both Lamberti’s amendment and the main amendment by voice votes, it passed the bill unanimously.412 The strong support that Robert Cramer (“‘We’re just pulling our hair out’ to stop tobacco sales to minors”),413 the president of Fareway Stores, Inc., a privately owned midwestern grocery supermarket chain—whose founders’ “biblical beliefs” purportedly keep the stores closed Sundays, but apparently do not extend to banning cigarette sales414—lent to the drivers license suspension proposal415 underscored tobacco retailers’ interest in penalizing everyone except themselves for sales to minors. Focused as they were on minors, the new provisions in no way transcended the kinds of government intervention to which the cigarette oligopolists were willing to pay lip service. Boettger, who regularly supported measures in the same range, leaped from the significant and empirically verified fact that “[i]f kids don’t start to smoke by the time they are 19 or 20, they probably are not going to” to the assertion that S.F. 2366 as passed by the Senate would “go a long ways towards deterring underage kids from trying to buy tobacco.” In contrast, Joe Bolkcom, one of the Senate’s leading anti-smoking militants, worried that the proposed law he had just voted for was too harsh: “‘It’s rather punitive to take a person’s license away. Young persons have reason to get around in their automobiles.’”416

Two weeks after the House Judiciary Committee had recommended passage,417 the full House debated the bill on March 29 and 30. The first amendment debated was a bomb shell: 14-term Democrat John Connors, an assistant minority leader who had been chief of the Des Moines fire department and a lobbyist for the fire fighters union, proposed making it “unlawful for any person to ship or import into this state, or to manufacture, offer for sale, sell, distribute, transport, or possess within this state, cigarettes or tobacco products.” The amendment was actually voted on and lost on a non-record vote, but the Register’s report on the bill did not even mention the matter. (Some years later Connors recalled that the purpose of his amendment was to eliminate problems of enforcing the existing partial sales ban.) Soon after the vote the House postponed further debate until the next day because “lawmakers...wondered whether the bill could have unintended consequences” and in particular Representative Mary Mascher argued that “the offense of buying cigarettes could ultimately lead to jail time if a teen who has his license suspended decides to drive anyway and is caught behind the wheel. That type of...offense...could cause a criminal record. ‘I’m not sure what tobacco smoking has to do with driving....”

The next day debate focused on one amendment, filed by one Republican and three Democrats, which: (1) eliminated the driver’s license suspension; (2) made mandatory performance of eight hours of community work requirements for a first offense (unless waived by the court), and 12 and 16 hours for second and further offenses, respectively; and (3) eliminated the provision in the existing law imposing a schedule criminal fine for failure to pay the civil penalty. Some House members argued that the driver’s license suspension was a crucial tool, especially since, as Republican Daniel Boddicker self-ironically noted, otherwise all that “[t]hese kids see [is] a bunch of really uncool people like us saying that smoking is bad for them.” His Republican colleague, David Heaton, a restaurant owner and former president of the Iowa Restaurant Association, chimed in that the license suspension was an “innovative way to encourage minors to not start

---

418See above ch. 26.
419House Journal 2000, at 1:1129-31 (H-8524) (Mar. 29). Whatever debate took place on the amendment could not have been very long since it began after 5:00 p.m. and ended before 5:30 p.m. Id. at 1:1128, 1132.
420Other papers, including the Cedar Rapids Gazette, failed to report on the debate at all.
421Telephone interview with John Connors, Des Moines (Apr. 23, 2008). Connors was unable to remember how many votes his amendment had secured.
423Republican Steve Sukup was chair of the Judiciary subcommittee to which the bill had been assigned and floor managed it; the Democrats were Keith Kreiman, Keith Weigel, and Dick Myers. House Journal 2000, at 1:1161 (H-8670) (Mar. 30).
smoking” because teenagers did not pay attention to money. Stripped of this new threat, the bill would not reduce smoking because the only way to deter young people was “‘to turn our community around in the attitude they have toward smoking.’” However, the initial enchantment with the Senate’s driver’s license suspension provision as a “good threat to hold over young smokers” dissipated as some representatives worried whether minors would “wind up with criminal records for smoking,” especially since, as Mascher insisted, they did not have “‘problems getting cigarettes.’” Going further, she was skeptical of the “‘Big Brother’” role into which the legislature was slipping: “‘I’m tired of penalizing kids every time they turn around.’” In the event, after the amendment had been adopted on a non-recorded vote, the bill was overwhelmingly passed on a vote of 86 to 9, such anti-smoking advocates as Doderer, Ro Foege, Ed Fallon, and Mascher voting Nay.

Back in the Senate, the partially defanged bill, especially the removal of the driver’s license suspension provision, encountered resistance from some militant anti-smokers. Connolly, for example, concerned about children’s “‘lifetime of addiction’” that sustained growth of the tobacco market, declared that “‘[a]t some point we have to fight that tobacco lobby, because that’s who’s weakening these bills.’” At the other end of the spectrum, Republican Jack Rife, long one of the Senate’s most belligerent smokers, failed to rise above a clownish contribution

---

424 Jeff Zeleny, “Teen License Threat Rejected,” DMR, Mar. 31, 2000 (1M) (NewsBank). The information on Heaton’s occupational background is taken from Iowa Official Register: 1999-2000, at 67. Heaton’s commitment to transforming public attitudes toward smoking did not extend to banning smoking in his own Iris Restaurant in Mt. Pleasant, where he permitted smoking in the lounge. Telephone interview with Denise Daniels (who had recently bought the restaurant from Heaton), Mt. Pleasant (Apr. 23, 2008). Heaton’s commitment was also nowhere on display in 2007 when he opposed the dollar increase in the cigarette tax or in 2008 when he consistently voted against the bill to ban public smoking, in large part on the grounds that it would infringe on business owners’ rights. State Representative Dave Heaton, “Upfront” (Feb. 26, 2007); below ch. 35.

426 House Journal 2000, at 1:1161-63 (H-8670) (Mar. 30). Their failure to cite the legislative journals or newspaper accounts of the debates presumably caused Tiana Epps-Johnson, Richard Jones, and Stanton Glantz, The Stars Aligned over the Cornfields: Tobacco Industry Political Influence and Tobacco Policy Making in Iowa 1897-2009, at 67 (2009), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/IA2009/, to reach the false conclusion that the “bill as introduced did not contain any particularly controversial provisions....” to the public policy debate: “‘What do you suppose they did before they had cars? Take the horse away?’” And Boettger, the floor manager, seeking to diminish the number of defectors, presumably found favor with the state’s large-scale cigarette sellers by pointing out that the new fines for store clerks would “‘give the employer some clout to make sure (the law) is enforced.’” 427 The Senate, after having concurred in the House amendment on a 37 to 11 non-record roll call vote, again unanimously passed the bill. 428

Yet More Defeats of Anti-Tobacco Initiatives: 2000-2004

The National Cancer Institute is banning Iowa from its list of places where it will hold meetings because the Hawkeye State doesn’t have a statewide restriction on smoking. 429

One reform of the clean indoor air law against which the cigarette companies had not agreed to refrain from lobbying and which came nowhere near passage was an amendment to strengthen enforcement by authorizing law enforcement officers to enforce Code chapter 142B. Republican Senator Gene Maddox, a lawyer who disliked smoking, sponsored one such bill, which quickly met its demise in subcommittee in 1999. 430 Shortly thereafter the Senate State Government Committee introduced a similar bill, which would have limited enforcement to local law enforcement agencies. 431 The committee, of which Maddox was a member, approved the study bill by a vote of 8 to 3; Democrat Michael Connolly, the chamber’s most active anti-smoking advocate, voted for it, as did all his voting party colleagues, while Republicans split 3 to 3. 432 But once it became S.F. 420 and was referred to the same committee, the bill remained unacted on during the 1999 session and died in subcommittee in

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

After appropriating $9.3 million for tobacco prevention for fiscal year 2001 and $9.3 million for 2002, the legislature slashed funding to $5 million for 2003, 2004, and 2005, and increased it only marginally to $5.6 million for 2006 and $6.5 million for 2007; not until fiscal year 2008, when, with Democrats in control of both chambers of the legislature and a Democratic governor for the first time in 42 years, the cigarette tax was increased from 36 cents to $1.36 and the budget allocation for tobacco prevention was doubled to $12.3 million, did spending exceed the amount originally allocated eight years earlier. The low point of $5 million in 2003—which was largely achieved by retaining radically reduced funding for the Just Eliminate Lies anti-tobacco ads and prompted the director of the Division of Tobacco Use Prevention and Control to suspect that 434 For 2002, whereas anti-smoking organizations argued that the state should be allocating at least $20 million of Iowa’s $55 million annual Master Settlement Agreement funds to tobacco use prevention and control, Governor Vilsack proposed cutting 16 percent ($1.5 million) from the previous year’s appropriation in order to balance the budget. Ironically, Senate President Mary Kramer and other Republican legislative leaders decided to protect the previous year’s funding. Tony Leys, “Vilsack Would Cut $1.5 Million from Anti-Smoking Programs,” DMR, Mar. 31, 2001 (1A) (News Bank); Tony Leys, “GOP Aims to Restore Tobacco Money,” DMR, Apr. 25, 2001 (4B) (NewsBank). S.S.B. 1271 contained the full $9.345 million appropriation as did its successor bill, S.F. 537, § 1(5)(a), which was filed Apr. 25 and unanimously passed the Senate Appropriations Committee and both houses twice. Senate Journal 2001 at 1:1328, 2:1352, 1532 (Apr. 25 and 26, May 7); House Journal 2001, at 1:1826, 1945 (May 3 and 7).

---

435 Representative Mary Mascher’s amendment to restore the $9.3 million lost on a party-line vote of 44 to 53, prompting her to accuse the majority of abandoning Iowa’s commitment to “‘helping keep kids off tobacco’” and to denounce the cutback as a “‘victory...for big tobacco...in Iowa.’” Lynn Okamoto, “Teens Rally at Capitol to Fight Cuts in Anti-Tobacco Program,” DMR, Apr. 4, 2002 (1B) (NewsBank). Similarly, in the Senate, Hammond and Fiegen and Fiegen, Bolcom, Hammond, and Tinsman filed two amendments to the same effect, which lost 23 to 27 and 23 to 24. When the Senate version of the bill returned to the House, Mascher filed yet another amendment to restore the funds, but it lost again. House Journal 2002, at 1:1141-42, 1385 (Apr. 3 and Apr. 11) (H-8504, H-8689; Senate Journal 2002, at 1:1092-93 (Apr. 10) (S-5422 and S-5479).

“tobacco companies helped persuade legislators to gut her budget”—corresponded to only 26.3 percent of the minimum recommended by the Centers for Disease Control, putting Iowa in 35th place; the high point of $12.3 million in 2008 still corresponded to only 63.5 percent of the CDC’s recommended level, placing Iowa 18th. By 2005 Iowa was devoting only 4.2 percent of its Agreement payments to tobacco control compared to the national average of 4.7 percent, which resulted from some states’ spending nothing and several states’ allocating more than 30 percent.

Because the few seats that Democrats gained at the November 2000 election were exactly balanced by ones that they lost, Republicans retained their majorities of 30-20 in the Senate and 56-44 in the House. The highest-profile Republican smoker and cigarette company accomplice to lose his seat was Senator Jack Rife, who was defeated after five terms. For the future of Iowa’s anti-smoking regulation arguably the most important accession to the legislature was Democrat Janet Petersen, who, before she became a public relations executive, had worked for the American Heart Association of Iowa in the mid-90s, lobbying for tobacco control. Ironically, she prevailed in the primary for a seat in the House from Des Moines over Kevin McCarthy, an assistant attorney general, who worked in Washington, D.C., as counsel on behalf of the state governments settling under the Master Settlement Agreement. During the 2008 legislative session, as House Majority Leader, McCarthy would enable Petersen to push forward with 437 Tony Leys, “Bold Anti-Smoking Ads Face Extinction by State,” DMR, Apr. 22, 2002 (1B) (NewsBank). Even at its pre-cutback level of $3.3 million, the ad budget was a tiny fraction of the $86 spent by cigarette manufacturers to market their commodities in Iowa.

---

442 http://iowahouse.org/2008/03/31/member-profile-rep-janet-petersen/

443 “Petersen Defeats McCarthy,” DMR, June 7, 2000 (7A) (NewsBank).
a bill to bring Iowa’s anti-smoking legislation into the 21st century over the resistance of doubters who were unable to envision a majority for any measure stronger than repeal of local preemption.444

But such progress was eight years off. In the meantime, the solid Republican majority in both Houses insured further success to the cigarette oligopoly in killing off any and all serious threats. Undeterred, at the start of the 2001 legislative session Attorney General Miller once again announced a series of proposals to strengthen the state’s laws on the sale, advertising, and regulation of tobacco products toward the end of reducing the number of youth addicts and the toll of tobacco-caused mortality and morbidity. The catalog included: (1) maintaining the appropriation for tobacco use prevention and control programs at no less than $9.3 million; (2) banning non-face-to-face tobacco sales; (3) banning outdoor ads within 1000 feet of schools and playgrounds; (4) limiting point-of-sales ads to black on white; (5) removing any obstacles to local expansion of the clean indoor air law and cigarette sales law; (6) mandating that only fire-safe cigarettes be sold; (7) creating statewide licensing for tobacco sellers in order to relieve the administrative burden on cities and to produce more uniform enforcement; and (8) allowing local governments—if proposal (7) were not implemented—to collect adequate permit fees and fines to finance local enforcement.445

Unmistakably, in formulating his wish list Miller was not so politically naive as to imagine that a legislative majority was available for passage of a comprehensive statewide law protecting Iowans from secondhand smoke exposure. Yet, in spite of his non-utopian standards, he would not see any of his reforms enacted by the 79th General Assembly (and even the status quo of (1) was maintained for one year only). Significantly, in advocating local control under (5), the attorney general emphasized that he took “‘the position that localities have such authority and are not preempted by state statutes,’” but wanted that view clarified to “‘avoid unnecessary litigation and waste of resources.’” The reason for urging this point at this juncture was the emerging interest among various local governments in protecting the members of their communities from secondhand smoke. To be sure, Miller did not explain why local control was preferable for clean indoor air regulation, while it imposed a burden on localities with respect to administering the cigarette permit system. The attorney general’s neglect of the origins of local control in the great compromise of repeal of the general ban on cigarette sales in 1921, when the legislature conferred on cities and counties the discretion to continue that prohibition in effect, was astonishing since no state agency either had been or would be granted such authority; consequently, statewide administrative centralization would insure the preclusion of the balkanization of permit issuance that the cigarette oligopoly abhorred but that survived as a legal possibility under the existing law. Consistently with this self-contradictory bifurcation, even Miller’s call for raising permit fees “from their 1921 levels of $50 to $100 a year” did not serve the purpose of renewing the legislature’s objective in 1921 of setting them high enough to deter the proliferation of sales locations, but merely to generate revenues sufficient to support administration and enforcement (although he was well aware that in 1921 “these permit fees constituted a serious investment”).

444See below ch. 35.

Despite the cigarette companies’ obligation under the Master Settlement Agreement to refrain from lobbying over a variety of youth-focused matters, the tobacco industry alone in 2000-2001 spent at least $286,872 on lobbyists in Iowa. Petersen herself experienced the cigarette industry’s power when in 2001 she (together with a Republican) filed her own modest bill to moderate somewhat the preemptive effect of the anti-smoking and cigarette sales laws on local control, and the House took no action on it at all after referring it to the Human Resources Committee, whose chair, Republican Daniel Boddicker, an electrical engineer, did not even bother assigning it to a subcommittee. Petersen’s bill, without repealing any language in the existing preemption provisions, would merely have specified that enforcement was to be carried out in compliance with the (aforementioned) codification of the constitutional home rule article—a change that would still have considerably constrained local... action and might have created ambiguity and confusion for judges required, in litigation, to determine the effect of engrafting the general home rule provision onto the statute-specific preemption.

In 2002, Representative Shoultz filed the same bill that he had introduced in 2000 to constrict the definition of “bars” in which no no-smoking areas were required, but it was no more of a threat the second time than it had represented two years earlier. The strategy behind the behavior modification that H.F. 2128 sought to achieve was eminently reasonable: “In order to influence teen-agers and convince them not to smoke, you have to influence their parents and adults around them. And in order to make people stop smoking, you have to make it more inconvenient for them.” Nevertheless, Shoultz himself was almost fatalistically defeatist: “It’s gone to committee, but not a subcommittee, so I don’t imagine it will be discussed... I introduced a similar bill two years ago that didn’t go anywhere, either. Maybe sometime we’ll get a head of a committee who will want to do that. Some members of the (legislature) are afraid of offending people. I suppose they think their constituents won’t like it, so they don’t want to bring it up.” House Human Resources Committee chair Daniel Boddicker, unwilling to “move the bill,” confirmed Shoultz’s prediction: “I do not have enough committee time to do all the bills I have.” With passage of repeal of preemption of local control definitively precluded, Boddicker, conveniently enough, opined that “the issue should be handled on the local level.” Shoultz’s initiative did, however, take on a sharper profile because of its potential relationship to the mini-trend initiated in Ames and Iowa City to pass ordinances restricting smoking in ways that exceeded the mandates of the statewide law. Shoultz commented that his measure “might help prevent the scenario some Iowa City restaurant/bar owners are worried about, in which customers flock to Coralville to patronize restaurants that still allow smoking.” To be sure, he could have added that such a statewide ‘level playing field’ impact might have done away with the need for local control altogether.

Passage of the ordinance in Ames, which went into effect on August 1, 2001 and “augment[ed]” Iowa Code section 142.B by prohibiting smoking, inter alia and most importantly, in restaurants between 6:00 a.m. and 8:30 p.m., and of a similar ordinance in Iowa City, which went into effect on March 1, 2002, prohibiting smoking in restaurants more than 50 percent of whose sales revenues stemmed from food, sparked the formation in June of Tobacco Free Iowa with the assistance of a $1 million grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation secured at the behest of the Lung-Heart-Cancer organizations. The new group set as one of its goals a statewide campaign to ban smoking in restaurants by means of local ordinances; hoping to be propelled by the momentum of the national movement, Tobacco Free Iowa selected Cedar Falls, Cedar Rapids, Des Moines, Grinnell, and Waterloo as the first five cities for its drive. Unwilling to wait for the Iowa Supreme Court’s decision on the Ames ordinance, the organization vowed, in case the Court struck it down, to shift the focus to the state level. That the initiative immediately encountered opposition from the Iowa Hospitality Association, which represented 7,000 restaurants and bars, could hardly have surprised any observer. Equally self-explanatory was the stance adopted by Philip Morris, the threadbareness of whose PR four years after the Master Settlement Agreement and even after it had finally been compelled to admit that smoking kills, descended to a new level when it pretended to justify its financing of the Ames test suit on the grounds that: “‘Smoking is a matter of choice.... We’re not advocates of smoking. We’re advocates of choice.’”

---

452See below ch. 33.

The few anti-smoking bills that were filed during the Eightieth General Assembly (2003-2004) were substantively bolder than their counterparts of 2001-2002, but procedurally they, too, made no progress at all. Democratic Senators Dick Dearden, Herman Quirmbach, and Robert Dvorsky’s S.F. 87 most importantly dismantled the entire feckless designated smoking area system of Iowa Code § 142B.2—which entrusted vital public health decisions to those with custody or control of public places, who in the vast majority of cases had no professional understanding of the health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure and made their decision based on self-regarding considerations of profitability—and, instead, simply prohibited smoking outright in public places and meetings. In addition, the bill redefined the key statutory term “public place” by deleting several exemptions and expanding coverage to include several places. The bill struck exemptions for: public places with less than 250 square feet of floor space; restaurants with seating capacity for fifty or fewer persons; portions 454In addition, a study bill that would have doubled cigarette permit fees and authorized local governments to impose an application fee of up to $25 also saw no action beyond assignment to a subcommittee. House Journal 2003, at 1:385 (H.S.B. 174, Feb. 20, by Judiciary Committee, assigned to Boal, Kramer, and Greimann).

---

of retail stores where tobacco was sold; and private, enclosed offices occupied by smokers only even though non-smokers might visit them. S.F. 87 also added coverage of: outdoor bar or restaurant areas; public restrooms; childcare facilities; playgrounds; outdoor auditoriums, theaters, libraries, art museums, concert halls, arenas, and meeting rooms, as well as all corridors, hallways, and lobbies adjacent to these areas. 455 Unsurprisingly, the Senate took no action on this expansive measure beyond assigning it to a subcommittee, 456 while its House companion did not even make it to that stage. 457

At the 2004 session, House and Senate initiatives focused on local preemption repeal. At the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission meeting on June 20, 2003, six weeks after the Iowa Supreme Court had struck down the Ames ordinance, 458 Linn County Democratic Representative Ro Foege, a non-voting commission member and former smoker, 459 called the decision “very surprising and...a major upset for tobacco control in Iowa.” Mentioning that he and another Linn County legislator had been discussing introduction of a bill to provide for local control, he stressed that this effort needed to be bi-partisan. Agreeing, Senator Joe Bolkcom from Iowa City, the other Democratic legislator on the Commission—the Republican members were absent—“offered to help in any way he could.” 460 Carrying through in 2004, Foege and conservative Cedar Rapids Republican Kraig Paulsen 461 (who in 2008 would vote three times against the bill that finally brought a relatively rigorous no-smoking regime to Iowa) 462

---

455 S.F. 87 (Feb. 4, 2003, by Dearden, Quirmbach, and Dvorsky). Incongruously, instead of strengthening owners’ duty to enforce the ban on smoking, the bill struck the weak language requiring them to “make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking” by posting signs and arranging seating accordingly, and merely required them to post signs.

456 Senate Journal 2003, at 1:185 (Feb. 5).

458 See below ch. 33.

460 Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission Meeting, Minutes, June 20, 2003 at 1 (copy furnished by Bonnie Mapes, Director, Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division, IDPH).

462 See below ch. 35. Perhaps Paulsen supported this local control measure not because of its potential for prohibiting public smoking, but because of his belief that “[t]he most effective government is government closest to the people.” http://www.kraigpaulsen.com/positions.htm (visited May 5, 2008). In 2011, after Republicans had gained the majority, Paulsen became House speaker.
filed a bill in the House to create considerably more local control under § 142B.6. Without repealing the preemption provision, H.F. 2004 would have amended it so that the statute, instead of superseding local ordinances that were inconsistent or conflicted with it, would have superseded only those that were “less restrictive”; local governments were therefore authorized to adopt, implement, and enforce more restrictive laws and regulations. Assignment to a subcommittee two days after filing, however, was as far as this bill progressed. A month later, veteran anti-smoking Senate Democrats Dvorsky and Bolkcom filed a short bill that would have tacked on a new section to § 142B.6 that would have empowered local governments, “notwithstanding any conflicting provision of this chapter,” to adopt ordinances that “may establish more specific or stringent controls, additional prohibitions, or increased penalties relating to smoking in a public place”; their bill specifically authorized the adoption of ordinances that limited or eliminated the statute’s exemptions for bars. Like the House bill, S.F. 2130 never saw any action beyond assignment to a subcommittee. Hard lobbying for local control by anti-smoking activists at the statehouse in early March failed to revivify either measure.

The 2003 legislative session also witnessed several unsuccessful efforts to raise Iowa’s cigarette tax, which at 36 cents per pack had not been increased since 1991 and ranked 29th among all states. At the beginning of the year Attorney General Miller proposed a 25-cent increase to fund drug treatment and other programs. Unsurprisingly, the Republican legislative leadership immediately rejected the initiative especially after anti-tobacco organizations proposed a $1.00 increase. The chair of the House Ways and Means Committee, Republican Jamie Van Fossen, repeated pro-smokers’ all-purpose oppositional mantra: “What’s the goal? ... If we want people to quit smoking, let’s make it illegal.” Undeterred by the hopelessness of the undertaking, several legislators quickly filed bills, at least three of which, including Senator McCoy’s and Representative

466 Senate Journal 2004, at 1:261 (Feb. 17).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Foege’s, provided for the full $1.00 raise. Predictably, none of these measures made any progress, but on March 12, Senator Larry McKibben, the Republican Ways and Means Committee chairman, provocatively proposed raising the cigarette tax by 25 cents together with a half-cent increase in the state sales tax in order to institute a flat-rate income tax and overhaul the property tax. Even Iverson, the arch-enemy of tax increases, was willing to consider the cigarette tax because the other elements would promote jobs and growth. Senate Minority Leader Gronstal pilloried the proposal as raising poor people’s taxes in order to cut rich people’s. Nothing came of any of these proposals in 2003 or of Governor Vilsack’s in 2004 to raise the cigarette tax by 60 cents; and even when Republican Senator Tinsman and Representative Heaton observed in 2004 that it would have to be raised to help finance Medicaid in fiscal year 2006, and Democrats criticized them for delaying the inevitable, House Majority Leader Chuck Gipp squelched that discussion as premature. In the event, Democrats would remain unable to increase cigarette taxes until they gained control of both chambers in 2007.

After Years of Failing Stings, Iowa’s Biggest Cigarette Retailers Negotiate Wholesale-Rate Penalties for Selling to Minors: 1997-2003

Cigarettes are not just habit forming—the body builds up a requirement for them. Twenty million smokers cannot do without their weed.

Take the example of a man going to work in the morning.

It’s pouring with rain. There are six cars already parked outside the shop. So, there are at least 90 yards to walk back.

Would he stop for a newspaper? Would he get out for a Kit Kat?

Addicted

The answer is probably No, but he would stop for his fags, because he is addicted to cigarettes.

And while buying a pack, he takes a newspaper and a Kit Kat.

With 20 million regular smokers in this country, there is an enormous traffic opportunity built up exclusively on tobacco—and a lot of it could come your way.\footnote{George Mackin [Philip Morris U.K. sales director], “High Customer Traffic Built on Cigarettes,” \textit{CTN}, Dec. 4, 1981, at 25:1-6 at 1. A Philip Morris lawyer, who foresaw that “this sort of mistake could cause us a lot of problems,” quickly engaged in damage control by asserting that Mackin had permitted a journalist who attended a retailers meeting at which Mackin had spoken to use his name as a by-line although the journalist had written the article, whose contents Mackin had failed to check. J. Hartogh to Donald Hoel (Feb. 9, 1982), Bates No. 2024950723.}

Anti-tobacco advocates may have failed to achieve any legislative gains during the Eightieth General Assembly, but the cigarette industry’s lobbying enabled it at the very least to lighten the burden of violating the no-sales-to-minors law. The origin of what became a dual-track judicial and legislative campaign to undo the penalties imposed on cigarette retailers by prosecutions triggered by a rising volume of sting operations was the chorus of complaints from the relatively large number of businesses that, having reached their second violation, faced suspension of their cigarette sales permits for 30 days, which, they alleged, could cost them as much as $20,000, including the loss of ‘traffic’—that is, the loss of sales of other commodities that cigarette buyers no longer bought because they were buying them in some other store in which they could also get cigarettes.\footnote{Telephone interview with Donald Stanley, Assistant Attorney General, Des Moines (May 19, 2008). Stanley was chiefly responsible for prosecuting these cases.} Jim Henter, the lobbyist for (and president of) the Iowa Retail Federation, expressly mentioned this loss of “traffic” as affecting even mom-and-pop stores because people “with a habit” would go elsewhere to get their candy bars, etc.\footnote{Telephone interview with Jim Henter, Des Moines (May 23, 2008).} According to James West, the lobbyist for the Iowa Grocery Industry Association (whose membership included both the large convenience store chains, Casey’s and Kum and Go, and Hy-Vee and Wal-Mart),\footnote{http://www.iowagrocers.com/boardofdirectors.cfm (visited May 21, 2008).} retailers had been especially concerned about the “tremendous difference” in the size of the financial penalty resulting from a permit suspension depending on the volume of cigarette sales and total volume of business in individual stores: in particular, it was “unfair” that the penalty was so severe for convenience stores, a relatively large proportion of whose sales derived from cigarettes, whereas a permit suspension for stores with relatively small sales was not a problem.\textsuperscript{477}

Such frank self-pleading can be amusingly contrasted with the reaction of a Hy-Vee store manager in Cedar Rapids, who, when confronted with a 30-day permit suspension in December 2000—the first ever imposed in Iowa’s second largest city—“pleaded with the City Council to ease his customers’ pain.” Specifically, he requested permission to “serve the 30-day suspension after the holidays because it would be too much stress for regular customers to be unable to buy cigarettes during the most stressful time of the year.” Why customer-addicts, whom retailers otherwise regarded as unfaithful turn-coats who, at the slightest interruption of their drug supply, immediately and permanently ran off to the next best supplier, suddenly became ignorant of a mercantile universe outside of their one and only Hy-Vee store and would be forced to go cold turkey, the manager did not explain. (Nor did he need to: “The city granted the request, but that doesn’t mean city officials were buying in to the ‘cigarette stress’ excuse.”)\textsuperscript{478}

Compliance Check-Triggered Permit Suspensions Galvanize Retailers

Compliance checks of the type that cigarette sellers rejected owed their existence to the so-called Synar amendment to the 1992 Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Administration Reorganization Act, which required the states to enact laws making it unlawful to sell tobacco to persons under 18 and annually to conduct random unannounced inspections to insure compliance with these laws. A state’s incentive to comply with these requirements was the prospect of losing a significant proportion of its federal substance abuse prevention and treatment block grant funds for non-compliance.\textsuperscript{479} Because the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services did not publish regulations until 1996 setting a goal of lowering retailer failure rates of 20 percent within several years,\textsuperscript{480} inspections did not begin until that year.\textsuperscript{481} Through the end of the 1990s Iowa was not one of the few states that achieved that target rate, its retailers’ non-compliance rate reaching 50, 40, 27, 36, 33, and 29 percent in fiscal years 1996, 1997, 1998, 1999, 2000, and 2001, respectively.\textsuperscript{482} Indeed, by 1999, Iowa was due to lose $5 million of its block grant.\textsuperscript{483} Consequently, toward the end of October 1999, the Public Health Department, recognizing that “filing charges for selling tobacco to minors ‘is not being done locally,’” decided to charge merchants directly. In September IDPH began sending warning letters to retailers who had been caught in stings but not prosecuted locally, even though under the law the department should have prosecuted them for the $300 penalty for the first violation.\textsuperscript{484} By March 2000 IDPH had issued warning letters to 462 retailers, but subjected only eight to the money penalty, which otherwise would have entailed \textsuperscript{481}In August 1997, a newly formed anti-tobacco organization in Iowa City stated that “[e]nforcement hasn’t happened on a local level.” Jim Jacobson, “Anti-Smoking Group Wants Tougher Enforcement of Youth Tobacco Laws,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Aug. 12, 1997 (1B) (NewsBank).

\textsuperscript{477}Telephone interview with James West, Des Moines (May 21, 2008).

\textsuperscript{478}Pam Hinman, “C.R. Tough on Tobacco Sellers,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Dec. 9, 2000 (1B) (NewsBank). The council had not previously had a policy as to when the suspension had to go into effect; it then adopted a policy requiring the suspension to take effect one week after the council approved the resolution imposing the suspension. However, ever solicitous of haplessly victimized local merchants—the clerk handling cigarette permits “sympathize[d] with business owners who suffer the penalty for an employee’s actions”—the council did provide for requests for exceptions from the new rule, so long as they were made before the council vote. \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{482}“Buying Tobacco Gets Harder Every Year for Minors in Iowa,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Nov. 29, 1997 (5B) (NewsBank); Thomas O’Donnell, “Tobacco Checks Barely Under Goal,” DMR, Mar. 15, 2000 (5B) (NewsBank); CSAP: State Synar Non-Compliance Rate Table FY 1997-FY 2005, on http://prevention.samhsa.gov/tobacco/synartable_print.htm (visited May 21, 2008). See also J. DiFranza and G. Dussault, “The Federal Initiative to Halt the Sale of Tobacco to Children—the Synar Amendment, 1992-2000: Lessons Learned,” TC 14:93-98 (2005). In its 1998 grant application, Iowa stated its goal of lowering buy rates from 35 percent in fiscal year 1997 to 20 percent by 2000. In addition to reporting that IDPH and a tobacco control coalition had (unsuccessfully) tried to repeal the state cigarette sales law, the application noted that Cedar Rapids and Indianola were the only places in which law enforcement officers had taken the lead in independently conducting inspections. Highlights of 1998 Federal Substance Abuse Prevention & Treatment Application, Attachment 6: Tobacco Sales to Minors and Enforcement (Iowa) at 1, 2 (1998), Bates No 2064866298/9.

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

a 30-day suspension.485

One of the very few towns to make a strong record of prosecuting tobacco violations was Indianola, whose city council made it a priority. Unlike other city councils, Indianola’s—which, notably, had also been one of the last to prohibit the sale of cigarettes into the 1930s—was undeterred by the fact that strict enforcement was “‘not a popular thing to do for your business owners.’” The resulting decline in violations by two-thirds encouraged the city to persist.486

Indeed, by early 2001 Indianola had gone where no other town in Iowa (or perhaps in the United States) had gone in recent years by revoking for one year the permits of two stores (a Wal-Mart and a Phillips 66 gasoline service station) for having been caught selling tobacco to minors four times during the previous three years. To be sure, in the spirit of the city’s plan to generate a “‘learning experience’” rather than impose a punishment, the firms agreed not to contest the charges in exchange for the council’s possibly reinstating their permits in less than a year if they were able to insure that minors could no longer buy tobacco.487

Overlapping chronologically with the Synar checks was the nationally unique system of compliance checks created by the Food and Drug Administration in 1996 when it asserted jurisdiction over cigarettes and smokeless tobacco.488 In particular, the regulations, which went into effect on February 28, 1997, prohibited retailers from selling these commodities to anyone under 18 and required them to check the photographic identification of anyone under 27.489

From August 1997 until March 2000 (when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the FDA lacked jurisdiction over tobacco), the FDA, through contracts it entered into with state agencies, conducted 191,294 checks of more than 123,000 retailers, which uncovered a violation rate of 26 percent. Iowa, where the FDA paid IDPH to conduct 6,975 stings, witnessed an above-average 34 percent violation rate.

488 In the late 1990s Synar checks and compliance checks also merged in Iowa. Telephone interview with Janet Zwick, Des Moines (June 2, 2008). Zwick had for many years been the director of the Division of Substance Abuse and Health Promotion at the IDPH and in charge of tobacco use prevention and control.

489 Federal Register 61(168):44396, 44616 (Aug. 28, 1996) (21 CFR §§ 897.14(a) and (b)(1)).
In contrast to the financial sanctions under Iowa law, the FDA’s civil money penalties, which kicked in after a notice of violation was sent for a first violation, were hefty: $250, $1,500, $5,000, and $10,000, for second, third, fourth, and fifth violations, respectively. For the more than 5,600 penalties the FDA sought retailers paid more than $1,000,000.490

Just as the federal government had given the State of Iowa an incentive to restrict youth access to tobacco, the state legislature passed that incentive down the line to retailers of tobacco-caused morbidity and mortality. The compliance regime in Iowa did not begin to reduce this huge volume of violations until, in the wake of the Master Settlement Agreement, the legislature in 2000, in addition to creating the legal framework for compliance checks,491 appropriated the aforementioned $9.3 million to IDPH for tobacco use prevention and control and directed that agency to dedicate sufficient resources to promote and insure retailer compliance with tobacco laws relating to persons under 18.492 IDPH’s allocation of about $1.4 million of the appropriation to the Alcoholic Beverages Division for tobacco retailer enforcement,493 which was implemented by providing police and sheriff’s departments $50 for each of two annual compliance checks of the state’s 6,000 tobacco retailers, was largely driven, as Rants observed, “by the fact that Iowa hasn’t done too well as far as keeping tobacco out of juveniles’ hands.”494 The result was that the non-compliance rates began to decline, reaching 18

4922000 Iowa Laws ch. 1221, § 2(1), at 672, 674. This same language reappeared in appropriations bills in the following years. E.g., 2003 Iowa Laws ch. 783, § 1(5)(a), at 738, 739.

493IDPH Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division, FY 06 Projected Budget Allocations Compared with 2001 Budget Allocations (furnished by Bonnie Mapes, Division Director, May 21, 2008). Mapes believed that the amount budgeted to ABD was the same for 2000. Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (May 21, 2008).

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

percent in fiscal year 2002, 11 percent in 2003, and 5 percent in 2004.\textsuperscript{495} Although state officials denied any responsibility for the decline, some businesses ascribed the two-percent drop in the number of cigarettes sales permits in 2002 in part to more intensive enforcement. Ironically, ABD’s response unintentionally confirmed the basis of the complaint by the Iowa Attorney General’s Office that many local governments were not imposing the mandatory civil penalties under the cigarette tax provisions in Iowa Code section 453A.\textsuperscript{496}

“Our policy has never been to go out and write a lot of tickets... Our policy has been to have the retailers comply' voluntarily.”\textsuperscript{497}

The statewide sting program, according to ABD’s administrator, Lynn Walding, represented a “‘drastic public policy change’”\textsuperscript{498} that was not based on any change in the law: “‘There just wasn’t any actual enforcement.’”\textsuperscript{499} Indeed, so stillborn was the enforcement of the 1991 amendments to the cigarette sales law that when, in May 1998, the Johnson County Attorney Patrick White and County Health Department director Graham Dameron announced that they had “found a first-of-its-kind way to hold businesses accountable if their employees sell tobacco products to a minor’’\textsuperscript{500} the Cedar Rapids Gazette editorialized that it was “amazing how something so obvious can seem so enlightened.”\textsuperscript{501}

White pointed out that until then “generally only” underage buyers and the clerks who sold them tobacco were fined, while the cigarette sales permittee often escaped liability. By bringing such cases to the city councils to hold hearings and impose fines, suspensions, and revocations, White intended to “‘try to stimulate more license holder interest in stopping the sales.’” Declaring that he was “‘not aware that this has been attempted in other locations,’” White planned to carry out stings under “a little-used state law (Chapter 453a.22),” but would need city council

\textsuperscript{495}CSAP: State Synar Non-Compliance Rate Table FFY 1997-FFY 2005, on http://prevention.samhsa.gov/tobacco/synartable_print.htm (visited May 21, 2008). For 2005 and 2006 the rates were 11 and 8 percent, respectively.

\textsuperscript{496}See below.

\textsuperscript{498}Anti-Tobacco Program Pays,” DMR, Nov. 7, 2000 (5M) (NewsBank).

\textsuperscript{501}“Treat Tobacco Vendors More Like Liquor Dealers,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), June 16, 1998 (4A) (NewsBank) (edit.).
members’ cooperation. Whether such cooperation would be forthcoming was as yet unclear: when the Solon city attorney had broached the subject a few weeks earlier, the mayor even “questioned the validity of any ‘verdict’” by a council, whose members were not judges. And an official in neighboring Linn County seemed to believe that he was observing a dubious scientific experiment when he allowed as his county “might be interested in the procedure if it worked in Johnson County....” Ten weeks later, when White and Dameron informed the county’s almost 150 cigarette retailers that they would soon begin conducting compliance checks, at least one member of the Iowa City Council reflexively adopted merchants’ position that greater fines for underage buyers was a superior way to deal with teenage smoking: “I don’t know how much more responsible business can be when they’ve trained their employees.... (The business owners) can’t be there 24 hours a day.” In the event, even as Iowa City began conducting stings in the second half of September 1998—of the first six retailers checked one sold to the minor—it seemed more interested in targeting possession by minors than sales by merchants.

The goal of the new public policy was, according to ABD Administrator Walding, to “change the social consciousness of not only kids who are thinking 504 Brian Sharp, “Tobacco Enforcement Increases,” ICP-C, Sept. 21, 1998 (3A:2-7, 4A:3-5). The city attorney’s office recommended that the city council pass an ordinance adding a local possession charge to the state law so that the city could collect fines to be used for additional enforcement. During the first six months of 1998 the city police had cited underage smokers 107 times. To be sure, enforcement was undermined by the police’s lack of staff and equipment to be able to check for prior possession offenses at the time of issuing the tickets. Consequently, most citations were written as first offenses, thus eliminating the deterrent of the progressive fine. Ten years later, the Iowa City police still lacked such a capacity and were therefore still issuing first offense citations to minors with prior violations. Email from Sgt. Troy Kelsay, Iowa City Police Dept. to Marc Linder (Apr. 28, and May 8, 2008). Yet as early as 2000 a judge had had to suggest that police mark tickets as simple misdemeanors so that judges could exercise the option of sending teenagers to anti-smoking classes. The suggestion was prompted by the fact that only 50 of 128 underage smokers ticketed at the Iowa State Fair appeared before a judge; the others merely paid a fine because the police had written the tickets in such a way that a court appearance was not necessary. “Most Teen Smokers Cited at Fair Paid Fines,” Tribune (Ames), Oct. 13, 2000 (B5:3-5). of smoking, but the retailers so that they think twice before making a sale.\textsuperscript{505}

The biggest cigarette merchants, however, appeared to resist having their social consciousness raised. During fiscal year 2001, the number of violations discovered in the course of sting operations at four leading chains in Iowa—Casey’s (convenience store), Kum and Go (convenience store), Hy-Vee (supermarket), and Wal-Mart—amounted to 102, 49, 45, and 11, respectively (which may be an understatement since the database includes almost no checks for the latter half of 2000). In fiscal year 2002, the number of violations at these four sellers changed in different directions: 66, 60, 44, and 17, respectively; but by fiscal year 2003, when the number of checks had been halved, the number of violations also dropped sharply: 44, 23, 21, and 6, respectively. Even more relevantly, just within fiscal year 2001 (or, more accurately, the first half of 2001), the number of second violations, which, if the first violations had been promptly prosecuted, would have resulted in 30-day permit suspensions, amounted to eight for Casey’s, five for Kum and Go, two for Hy-Vee, and one for Wal-Mart. Similarly, within fiscal year 2002, second violations for these four chains numbered seven, five, four, and three, respectively, while in fiscal year 2003 the numbers dropped to two, one, one, and one.\textsuperscript{506} To be sure, these large chains’ liability was vastly diminished by the fact that violations were counted on a per permit (store), rather than a corporate-wide, basis.\textsuperscript{507} (Some sense of the \textsuperscript{506} http://www.iowaabd.com/search/results_comp.jsp (visited May 20, 2008). In tandem with the legislature’s reduction of IDPH’s tobacco use prevention and control appropriation from $9.3 million to $5 million from fiscal year 2002 to 2003, the allocation to ABD for enforcement was reduced from $1,514,644 to $1,000,000. As a result, ABD reduced annual checks from two to one, but did conduct a follow-up check of those sellers found non-compliant on the first check. This protocol continued until fiscal year 2008, when, with the increase of IDPH’s tobacco use prevention and control appropriation to $8,800,000, the enforcement budget was increased to $1,150,000 and the two-check a year system was reinstated. Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission Meeting, Meeting Briefing (June 6 and Aug. 16, 2002), on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/GA/79GA/Interim/2002/brf/toba.htm (visited May 22, 2008); email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 23, 2008); email from Lynn Walding, ABD director, to Marc Linder (May 23, 2008).

\textsuperscript{505} “Anti-Tobacco Program Pays,” DMR, Nov. 7, 2000 (5M) (NewsBank).

\textsuperscript{507} This conclusion implicitly underlay the decision in a case involving the question as to whether violations could be aggregated with regard to a chain that closed one of its stores and opened a replacement store 1,200 feet away, both of which stores sold cigarettes to minors. If corporation-wide aggregation were permissible, the Iowa Supreme Court would not have devoted the whole opinion to determining whether the two stores were one place of business. Nash Finch Co. v City Council of the City of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, 672 potential sensitivity of various types of stores to a permit suspension can be gleaned from the percentage of total sales accounted for by tobacco at the 2002 Retail Trade Census: convenience (25); gas station/convenience (12); grocery (3); general merchandise (3); supermarket and other grocery (2); pharmacy/drug (2).\textsuperscript{508}

Although until this time few 30-day suspensions had been imposed, retailers were very “upset” over the ones that had been, especially since the one-month loss for a large-volume seller such as Kum and Go could amount to $30,000.\textsuperscript{509} The Attorney General’s Office was deeply dissatisfied with enforcement at the local level because in many instances city councils and county boards of supervisors (before which, as the entities that issued the permits, local prosecutors or the Attorney General’s Office had to bring the cases) refused to impose the monetary penalties and permit suspensions that the law mandatorily required. Local governments exercised discretion that they lacked or knowingly ignored the statutory requirements in some instances because city officials themselves were on good or family terms with or were themselves the business owners in question or, especially in smaller towns, because they did not want to burden the only convenience or grocery store.\textsuperscript{510} Since at least the early 1990s officials at IDPH

\textsuperscript{508}U.S. Census Bureau, 2002 Economic Census: Retail Trade, Subject Series: Product Lines: 2002, at 61, 90, 57, 132, 58, 78 (Oct. 2005), on http://www.census.gov/prod/ec02/ec0244slls.pdf. These national data, which refer only to establishments that sold tobacco, are somewhat overstated because they include all tobacco products and not just cigarettes. At one national convenience store chain, QuikTrip, tobacco sales accounted for about 35 percent of non-fuel sales nationally. Patt Johnson, “Pull Out ID: Walgreen to Card All Smokers,” \textit{DMR}, May 12, 2001 (1A) (NewsBank).

\textsuperscript{509}Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 29, 2008). Meyer, who in 2008 was a Des Moines City Council member and legal counsel to House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, was an Iowa assistant attorney general from 2003 to 2006 after completing an internship at the Attorney General’s Office.

\textsuperscript{510}Telephone interview with Donald Stanley, Iowa assistant attorney general, Des Moines (May 19, 2008); telephone interview with Andrew Chappell, Johnson County assistant county prosecutor, Iowa City (May 20, 2008). Although, as Stanley repeatedly instructed city council members, the penalties were mandatory and could not be modified or waived, often they imposed none and/or engaged in “a form of plea bargaining” with violators. In at least one instance a city councillor, who had previously worked for one of the violators before the council, stated at a meeting dealing with five violators, including Casey’s and Kum and Go, that “she doesn’t like the State’s concentration on the stings” and that “employers do not sell liquor or cigarettes to minors,” adding that she “felt these were isolated incidents during a busy time of the evening.” Monticello, Iowa, City had also been acutely aware of—but ultimately unable to overcome—city councils’ refusal to enforce the law largely because members did not want to get on the wrong side of their local merchants.\(^511\)
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Kwik Shop, Inc.’s Frivolous Statewide Litigation Campaign

The test case by which cigarette retailers in Iowa launched their judicial challenge to penalties featured Kwik Shop, Inc., a Kansas corporation that operated 44 retail convenience stores/gas stations throughout Iowa.\(^512\) Significantly, Kwik Shop was a division of the Kroger Company, one of the largest food retailers in the United States, which, however, did not own supermarkets stores in Iowa.\(^513\) In 2001, three Kwik Shops with cigarette sales permits were located in Burlington, a Mississippi River town with a population of about 27,000. In May and June of that year the Burlington Police Department conducted a compliance check in each store: one passed both times, one failed once, and one failed both checks.\(^514\) Kwik Shop’s failure rate was high elsewhere in Iowa as well: in fiscal year 2001 it failed 24 of 77 compliance checks outside of Burlington. In Burlington, it was not until 2006 that all its stores passed all the annual checks; overall, from 2001 until 2007, Kwik Shop failed 12 of 34 stings in Burlington.\(^515\) A major in the Burlington police was unable to muster empathy \(^511\) Telephone interview with Janet Zwick, Des Moines (June 2, 2008) (former IDPH official in charge of tobacco use prevention and control). When asked why city councils had failed to enforce the no-sales-to-minors law in the 1990s, the head of ABD, which oversees enforcement of the cigarette sales law, replied: “The simple answer is that public support for the tobacco initiative did not exist at that point in time. That position galvanized when over 80 percent of the public identified themselves as non-smokers, and as funds became available from the master tobacco settlement for enforcement efforts.” Email from Lynn Walding to Marc Linder (June 3, 2008).

\(^512\) Kwik Shop, Inc. v City of Burlington, Iowa, slip op. at 1-2 (Des Moines Cty Dist Ct., Case No. CVEEQ004523, Sept. 27, 2002); Rick Smith, “Cigarette Penalties Called Unjust,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Feb. 3, 2002 (3B) (NewsBank).

\(^515\) http://www.iowaabd.com/search/results_comp.jsp (visited May 22, 2008). Because the stores in Burlington were sold recently to Gasland and the ABD compliance check database (apparently) retroactively converts a store’s name to that of the current owner, it is possible that the data in the text underestimate Kwik Shop’s violations. Kwik Shop’s for Kwik Shop or other stores committing violations, which were “obvious”: “They sell to kids without even looking!” at the ID’s, which in the case of the stings were valid. Clerks violating the law either did not check identification or overlooked “obvious cues like the red stripe on Iowa drivers licenses that state a person is a minor.”
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Beginning July 1, 2001, minors presenting identification stuck out even more like sore thumbs by virtue of the advent of special drivers licenses for them on which their photos were displayed on the vertical rather than horizontal plane.

In contrast, the lawyer who was representing Kwik Shop in its aggressive statewide campaign of resistance against the imposition of any legal-financial responsibility for selling to minors—merchants seemed to believe that only their employees and minor customers should be penalized— even years later heatedly rehearsed his client’s bathetic tale of regulators “on the rampage” who had “deceptively” used “very hirsute” (i.e. “bearded”) 17-year-old males to “entrap” employees.

An explanation as to how entrapment could possibly have entered into the picture when even a fleeting glance at an ID that conspicuously marked the would-be buyer as a minor was not part of the advocate’s narrative.

On December 17, 2001, half a year after an employee at each of the two stores had been cited for selling tobacco to someone under 18 and found guilty, and had paid the fine, Assistant Attorney General Donald Stanley appeared before the Burlington City Council to request assessment of a civil penalty of $300 against each store, which, he explained, was mandatory and could not be waived or modified. That Kroger/Kwik Shop was already acting in non-compliance with the law was highlighted during the checks conducted by the Burlington police at 19 businesses on Nov. 7, 2001, when a Kwik Shop was only one of three that sold cigarettes to minors. “Three Employees Cited for Selling Cigarettes to Minors,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Nov. 9, 2001 (11A:4-5).

Telephone interview with Bernard Spaeth, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 23, 2008).

Kwik Shop, Inc. v City of Burlington, Iowa, slip op. at 3-4 (Des Moines Cty Dist Ct., Case No. CVEQ004523, Sept. 27, 2002).

The prosecution did not also request a 30-day suspension of the permit of the store that had committed a second violation within a month of the first since “the violations had to be pursued one at a time because the ruling finding a 1st violation was necessary evidence to show a second violation and so on. That is one reason the backlog was so troubling.” Email from Donn Stanley to Marc Linder (May 23, 2008).
contemplation of litigation was obvious from its representation by a lawyer, the manager of the Burlington Kwik Shops, the company’s district advisor, and an official from its headquarters in Kansas; the presence of the firm’s own court reporter, who also swore in its witnesses, suggested that it aimed at more than merely contesting a relatively small fine. In spite of the presentation of seven exhibits (including a “We card under 18” warning sign, training video, and poster), the company’s lawyer’s explanation that Kwik Shop—which did not contest that its employees had sold tobacco products to minors—took the sale of tobacco to minors seriously by training its employees and sending reminders, and testimony by three managerial employees that the company did everything it could to prevent employees from selling cigarettes to minors, the council unanimously voted in favor of the civil penalty.521 This unanimity, however, was deceptive: although the Burlington city council did not go to the extremes of aldermanic nullification that some other cities witnessed, some members were “uneasy”522 at “being forced to vote in favor of the state,”523 and the mayor even expressed his feeling that the statute was not “just.”524

Remarkably, these arguments by retail purveyors of the most lethal consumer commodity ever manufactured resonated with the local newspaper, which editorially opined that stings’ “perceived unfairness” might be causing them to lose their “appeal.” In particular, the Burlington Hawk Eye was taken with the assertion by Kwik Shop’s Des Moines corporate lawyer, Steve Doohen, that his client was being deprived of its right of due process insofar as it was not afforded the opportunity to question the minors who had bought the cigarettes or otherwise to defend itself. The newspaper got carried away to the point that it prognosticated that the lawyer’s “argument ultimately may derail the practice” because as much as they “favored penalizing those who sell tobacco to minors,” Iowans also “believe in legal fairness.” But apparently Iowans did draw the line at one argument advocated by a Kwik Shop manager at the hearing—namely, “that only clerks, not the retailers themselves, should face fines for illegal sales.” Although the Hawk Eye regarded a financial penalty for the employee and the employer as proper because compliance was a “shared responsibility,”\(^{525}\) it drew no conclusions about the bona fides of an employer that greedily profited from the sale of a deadly commodity through a small army of employees for whose (purportedly negligently) unlawful acts performed in the course of employment it was unwilling to accept noncriminal economic-regulatory liability. If, contrary to the industry’s mantra, cigarettes are in fact only a very conditionally legal product, and complying with all the conditions imposed by federal, state, and local governments made selling cigarette less than optimally profitable, then like Target Stores, Kroger/Kwik Shop could, even if the sickness and death it facilitated did not faze it ethically, have made a “business decision” to drop them.\(^{526}\)

522“Sting Complaints—Cigarette Retailers Make One Strong, One Weak Argument,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Dec. 21, 2001 (edit.) (NewsBank).

Predictably, on January 16, 2002, Kwik Shop filed a petition for a writ of certiorari, a declaratory judgment, and a stay with a state district court to review the decision by the city council exercising judicial functions. In what the court later called “a laundry list of allegations,” Kwik Shop asserted that the Burlington City Council had, inter alia, failed to afford it sufficient due process, acted arbitrarily capriciously, illegally, in bad faith, and without impartiality, and denied its rights to constitutionally guaranteed procedural and substantive due process and equal protection.\(^{527}\) Although the company’s allegations appeared to verge on the claim that Iowa Code section 453A.22 was unconstitutional on its face because it made employers per se vicariously liable for their employees’ unlawful acts, Kwik Shop apparently limited itself to the claim that the law was unconstitutional as applied to it.\(^{528}\) The former argument would have been foreclosed by Iowa Supreme Court precedent involving the identically structured statute regulating the sale of alcohol to minors by permittees’ employees. In that \(^{525}\)“Sting Complaints—Cigarette Retailers Make One Strong, One Weak Argument,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Dec. 21, 2001 (edit.) (NewsBank).

\(^{526}\)Steve Karnowski, “Target Gives Up Cigarette Sales,” San Francisco Examiner, Aug. 29, 1996, Bates No. S000255. To be sure, cigarettes presumably accounted for far more of Kwik Shop’s total sales than the less than the 0.5 percent at Target.

\(^{527}\)Kwik Shop, Inc. v City of Burlington, Iowa, slip op. at 1-2 (Des Moines Cty Dist Ct., Case No. CVEQ004523, Sept. 27, 2002).

\(^{528}\)Telephone interview with Bernard Spaeth, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 23, 2008). Another partner in the same firm who represented Kwik Shop was confused as to whether the claim was based on the statute’s facial invalidity or only as applied. Telephone interview with Steve Doheen, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 28, 2008).
case, the court rejected the claim of a retail grocery store, whose license was suspended after an employee had been caught by the police in Ames selling beer to a minor, that Iowa Code section 123.50(3) “violates due process because it authorizes an administrative sanction against the license holder based entirely on the isolated act of a nonmangerial employee and without regard to whether the license holder itself was culpable in hiring, training, or supervising the offending party.”

The legal action, according to the chain’s lawyer, simply reflected the company’s having “had enough” and wanting “to fight back.” In particular, it regarded a one-month suspension of a cigarette permit as the equivalent of a “death sentence” since people came to the stores to buy cigarettes and then bought other items, all of which they would buy at some other store whose permit had not been suspended. Far from representing a concerted effort by tobacco retailers, the suit was purportedly prosecuted solely on the initiative of Kwik Shop, which unsuccessfully sought the involvement of other companies, which, however, declined because they feared that they would be targeted for enforcement.

On July 15, 2002, two weeks before the trial, Stanley again appeared before the Burlington City Council to request that it assess a $300 civil penalty against the third Kwik Shop store, an employee of which had pleaded guilty to selling cigarettes to a minor in November 2001. Without any basis in the law, the company’s district advisor argued that it was innocent because it diligently did everything it could—including providing a three-day training session, showing a video, giving a written test, and using cash registers that asked employees whether they had checked the would-be cigarette buyer’s age—to instruct employees not to sell tobacco to those under 18. This encore performance produced the same unanimous vote for imposing the $300 penalty.

---

529 Randall’s International, Inc. v Hearing Board of the Iowa Beer & Liquor Control
Dept., 429 NW2d 163, 164 (Iowa 1988).
530 Telephone interview with Bernard Spaeth, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 23, 2008). The claim that other retailers feared becoming enforcement targets appears to lack plausibility since all 6,000 permittees were already “targeted” twice a year with the same stings.
May 22, 2008); “Kwik Shop Fights Fines,” Convenience Store News (July 18, 2002), on http://www.allbusiness.com/retail-trade/food-stores/4475358-1.html (visited May 22, 2008). On the reason for the prosecution’s not having requested a 60-day permit suspension for the Kwik Shop’s third violation in 2001 in November, see above.
Burlington City Attorney, who allowed as “he would rather be sued by Kwik Shop for enforcing the law...than by the state for not upholding it,” expected the company to file yet another lawsuit as a result of the new penalty. The mayor’s reaction—that the law put the council “between a rock and hard place”—suggested the city’s merely superficial and compelled commitment to enforcement.

At the end of September 2002, district court judge John Linn issued his ruling, which found all of Kwik Shop’s claims to be “without merit” and denied all of its claims and its request for relief. Specifically, the judge underscored the undisputed evidence that the two employees had sold tobacco products to minors, in relation to which Kwik Shop’s arguments concerning its policies, training programs, and community involvement were irrelevant; consequently, the “City Council had no choice but to impose the civil penalty.” Because the company had received both proper notice and a meaningful opportunity to be heard, it had not been subjected to any violation of procedural due process. Because the $300 penalty was rationally related to the legitimate governmental interest in stopping underage purchase and use of tobacco, depriving the company of the $300 (which property interest did not rise to the level of a fundamental right) did not violate its substantive due process rights.

Initially, Kwik Shop sought review of the district court decision from the Iowa Supreme Court, but then dropped its appeal and paid the penalties later in 2002. The action in Burlington was by no means the only one that Kwik Shop filed: it also appealed to Iowa district courts adverse decisions by city councils in Ames, Cedar Rapids, Council Bluffs, and Davenport, and the adverse decision in Linn County district court (Cedar Rapids) to the Iowa Supreme Court. On February 18, 2003, two days before the scheduled trial in the Ames 532James Quirk, Jr., “Stings Lead to Lawsuit,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), July 12, 2002 (NewsBank).

533James Quirk, Jr., “Council, Kwik Shop Face Off on Citations,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), July 14, 2002 (NewsBank).

534Kwik Shop, Inc. v City of Burlington, Iowa, slip op. at 12 (Des Moines Cty Dist Ct., Case No. CVEQ004523, Sept. 27, 2002).

535Kwik Shop, Inc. v City of Burlington, Iowa, slip op. at 6-7, 9-11 (Des Moines Cty Dist Ct., Case No. CVEQ004523, Sept. 27, 2002).

536Telephone interview with Assistant Attorney General Donald Stanley, Des Moines (May 22, 2008).

537In 2002 Kwik Shop paid $600 plus $96 in costs. http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/TIndexFrm

538James Quirk, Jr., “Stings Lead to Lawsuit,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), July 12, 2002 case, Kwik Shop’s lawyers informed the Attorney General’s Office that the company had made a “business decision” to dismiss all of its suits and/or appeals and would “immediately pay its fines and submit to suspensions where appropriate.” Why Kwik Shop suddenly turned off its well-financed litigation machine—apart from the client’s having “lost its taste for fighting” once it developed the feeling that it was “not getting anywhere”—is as puzzling as why it had found it necessary to file multiple test cases in the first place. As to the latter, one of the company’s lawyers ascribed it merely to the “glut” of penalties that happened to surface at the same time. In contrast, Assistant Attorney General Donald Stanley speculated that the company may have been “forum shopping for a venue to get a favorable ruling” and/or “counting on catching a local prosecutor unprepared.”

Prior to 2000, Ames had "one of the worst [noncompliance] rates among Iowa 539 Email from Donn Stanley to Eric Tabor (chief of staff, Iowa Attorney General’s Office) (Feb. 18, 2003) (forwarded to Marc Linder May 27, 2008).

540 Telephone interview with Steve Doheen, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 28, 2008). Five years after the fact Kwik Shop’s lawyer was unable to articulate a reason other than a hazy recollection of some nebulous “resolution” of the dispute. Telephone interview with Bernard Spaeth, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 23, 2008). With certitude, Assistant Attorney General Donald Stanley commented that: “There was no compromise with Kwik Shop on penalties. It received absolutely nothing in consideration for its decision to drop its appeal and remaining district court actions.” Email from Donald Stanley to Marc Linder (May 27, 2003).

541 Telephone interview with Steve Doheen, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 28, 2008).

542 Email from Assistant Attorney General Donn Stanley, Des Moines, to Marc Linder (May 23, 2008).
cities”—in 1999, 41 percent compared to a statewide average of 25 percent. City officials had ignored the problem, according to an Ames drug treatment agency that was at risk of losing part of the state’s federal block grant on account of the high violation rate, “because they don’t want to confront business owners who pay $100 each year for a tobacco license,” although the Attorney General’s Office made it clear that the city councils that issued permits were, under longstanding laws, responsible for penalizing retailers. More specifically, the then city attorney later explained, the city council had not wanted to become involved in imposing penalties on cigarette retailers because it viscerally did not want to get on the wrong side of local merchants, especially in light of the bitter memories of the controversy over its revocation of an alcohol license some years earlier triggered by the actions of a “hapless” employee. The procedures that Kwik Shop deployed in Ames were virtually identical to those it had used in Burlington. After vainly presenting the same irrelevant materials at the city counsel hearing, on June 27, 2002, Kwik Shop filed in Story county district court the same kind of suit with the same allegations, culminating in the same claim that section 453A was unconstitutional. On February 17, 2003, three days before the nonjury trial was scheduled, Kwik Shop voluntarily dismissed its case and was assessed $215 in costs.

Sting operations in Cedar Rapids went back to 1994, when IDPH conducted test checks in five counties, including Linn, discovering that teens 16 and younger were able to buy tobacco about half the time. Preparatory to the initiation of real compliance checks in May 1996, the police in Cedar Rapids conducted trial stings in January, finding that 21 of 23 business sold to the minor. At a meeting in April organized by the police department and the federally funded COMMIT 545Telephone interview with John Klaus, Ames (May 23, 2008).

546Jason Kristufek, “Kwik Shop Sues City of Ames After Fine,” Tribune (Ames), July 5, 2002; Jason Kristufek, “Kwik Shop Sues Ames over Tobacco Citation,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 26, 2002 (visited May 23, 2008); http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/TIndexFrm; http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/TViewFinancials (visited May 23, 2008). Because the city council, unwilling to incur retailers’ wrath, had assigned the adjudication to the city attorney, it was inappropriate for him or his office to represent the city council in defending the suit, and therefore Assistant Attorney General Stanley intervened. Telephone interview with Judy Parks, city attorney, Ames (May 23, 2008).
547“Tobacco Accessible to Teens,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Nov. 18, 1994 (2B) (NewsBank).
(Community Intervention Trial for Smoking Cessation) retailers already began to complain that they would be penalized more for contributing to teenager smoking than the teenagers themselves.\(^{548}\) Despite all the publicity, stings soon found Kwik Shop and Hy-Vee selling to 16-year-olds.\(^{549}\) Apparently, however, only clerks were fined, and it was not until 1999, in the wake of state pressure, exerted in order to avoid loss of federal drug abuse block grants, that federal and state law finally began to “trickle down to the local level,” resulting, for the first time, in $300 penalties for 37 permittees.\(^{550}\) By the end of 2000 one of the Kwik Shop stores had racked up its second violation within two years and became, together with a Hy-Vee store and two other businesses, the first to have its cigarette permit suspended for 30 days.\(^{551}\) The owners and managers of the four all agreed that the penalty was “too stiff”—one, a gas station owner for whom cigarettes were only a “sideline business,” threatened to stop selling them “if it gets to be too much of a hassle”\(^{552}\)—but only Kwik Shop chose to litigate.

Before the Cedar Rapids City Council Kwik Shop staged a choreography virtually identical to that used in Burlington, down to hiring its own court reporter to “document” the statements of the company’s lawyer and representatives and of the council members “for possible use in a court proceeding down the road.” Kwik Shop decided to strike back at the beginning of 2002 when, based on a third violation in the same store, it faced a 60-day suspension (following ones for 14 and 30 days), which, its lawyer, Steve Doohen, told the city council, could cost it $80,000 in lost revenue. He depicted this sum as disproportional compared to the $100 fines meted out to each of the three stung clerks; more generally, he called the civil penalty “a stiff one in a work world where store clerks often are low-wage earners.” Apparently, however, these wages were adequate compensation for the abysmal skills of the clerks, who asked for identification and then nevertheless misread the birth date on the driver’s license. Echoing a complaint that capitalists, boasting of also being better at their lowly agents’ tasks than they are, have voiced through the ages, a Kwik Shop representative bemoaned that:

\(^{550}\)Pam Hinman, “City Adds $300 Fine for Cigarette Sales Violations,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Oct. 21, 1999 (3C) (NewsBank) (quoting city attorney).
\(^{552}\)Pam Hinman, “C.R. Tough on Tobacco Sellers,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Dec. 9, 2000 (1B) (NewsBank).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

“‘We have clerks who perhaps don’t care as much as Kwik Shop cares,’” but, alas, “Kwik Shop supervisors can’t be in the store at all times....”553 The problem, as far as the convenience store chains were concerned, was that, with decisions left to non-omnipresent local managers, corporate headquarters was unable effectively to deal with the de facto control exercised by 21-year-old clerks—“we don’t get Ph.D. candidates”—vis-à-vis friends who were minors.554 ABD administrator Walding, the state’s chief tobacco enforcement official, whose “‘overall goal [wa]s to partner with the retail community,’”555 reinforced retailers’ position by applauding Walgreen and other companies that “‘take initiative to keep tobacco out of minors’ hands’” and declaring that “[m]ajor responsibility remains with the clerks who sell tobacco....”556 The company’s concern about being dragged down by minimum-wage workers was especially hollow and ironic inasmuch as in 1999, when Deputy Attorney General Eric Tabor had stated that it was illegal for anyone under 18 to sell tobacco (because it was unlawful for minors to possess it), he himself acknowledged that “retailers would have a hard time staffing their counters if they couldn’t hire teenagers....” The president of the Iowa Grocery Industry Association could not have agreed more: “‘That would be a very big issue for us.... I don’t think it would be the intent of the Legislature to throw teen-agers out of work.’”557

Cutting a Legislative Deal Instead

Kwik Shop’s abandonment of the judicial track for eliminating penalties was coordinated with the industry’s decision to turn to the traditionally 554 Telephone interview with an Iowa convenience store chain lobbyist who demanded anonymity (June 13, 2008).

556 Patt Johnson, “Pull Out ID: Walgreen to Card All Smokers,” DMR, May 12, 2001 (1A) (NewsBank). At the same time Walding also accommodated another demand of retailers by introducing the cop-in-the-shop reverse sting in which police posed as clerks in order to ticket underage buyers because “[r]etailers tell us the entire burden shouldn’t fall on their shoulders.... Kids should be held accountable, too.” Madelaine Jerousek, “Sting to Smoke Out Underage Buyers,” DMR, May 4, 2001 (3B) (NewsBank).

accommodating Republican-led legislature for a remedy. What “we were looking for,” Dawn Carlson, the president of and lobbyist for the Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Stores of Iowa,\textsuperscript{558} frankly observed five years later, was an “affirmative defense to acknowledge our training.” The focus on this issue derived from the experience that “we struggle with training employees. No matter what we do to train them, human error is likely.” While ultimately falling short, this affirmative defense went as far toward achieving retailers’ real goal of severing the statute’s automatic link between employees’ sale of cigarettes to minors and employers’ liability as was politically feasible.\textsuperscript{559} And as Lamberti added with regard to the Kwik Shop litigation, most retailers had become resigned to the constitutionality of their vicarious civil liability for clerks’ illegal sales.\textsuperscript{560}

In a memorandum to higher-ups in the Attorney General’s Office, on February 18, 2003, the day on which Kwik Shop’s lawyer had informed him that it would drop all its judicial challenges and pay its penalties, Assistant Attorney General Donald Stanley presciently forecast Iowa cigarette sellers’ strategic reactions: “Other tobacco retailers were following this litigation and this action by Kwik Shop should help us in getting other retailers to pay their fines and serve their suspensions. However, this also probably means the retailers will be more desperate to succeed in amending the law this session. It may also mean the retailers are more confident about accomplishing this task at the legislature.”\textsuperscript{561} And in fact, as one of Kwik Shop’s lawyers later observed, an aspect of the strategy of dropping all the cases was to proceed instead by lobbying.\textsuperscript{562} In the event, the very next day the House Public Safety Committee received a study \textsuperscript{558}http://www.pmcofiowa.com/index.cfm?page=63 (visited May 24, 2008). The organization represented both smaller stores and all major chains except Casey’s, whose membership, after small-town gasoline retailers (and their Petroleum Marketers organization) had (unsuccessfully) sued it in the 1980s, charging that Casey’s had destroyed them by selling gasoline at below cost and then recouped the losses by charging monopoly prices, was deemed inappropriate. Telephone interview with Dawn Carlson, Des Moines (May 23, 2008); Bathke v Casey’s General Stores, Inc., 64 F3d 340 (8th Cir. 1995).

\textsuperscript{559}Telephone interview with Dawn Carlson, president and CEO, Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Stores of Iowa, Des Moines (May 23, 2008).

\textsuperscript{560}Telephone interview with Jeffrey Lamberti, Ankeny (May 30, 2008).

\textsuperscript{561}Email from Donald Stanley to E[ric] Tabor et al. (Feb. 18, 2003) (forwarded to Marc Linder).

\textsuperscript{562}Telephone interview with Steve Doheen, Whitfield & Eddy, Des Moines (May 28, 2008).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

bill—which on February 11 it had requested the Legislative Services Bureau to draft\textsuperscript{563}—that embodied a first draft of the industry’s desiderata.\textsuperscript{564} The timing was, as one of Kwik Shop’s lawyers later confirmed, “no coincidence,” especially since tobacco permittees had also been lobbying during the litigation phase as part of a large coordinated effort.\textsuperscript{565} Speaking specifically about this legislation but also more generally about study bills, Lamberti observed that “these things don’t just appear from nowhere.”\textsuperscript{566}

The fulcrum for the legislative initiative was the mandate in State Government Committee-proposed Senate Study Bill 1117 (which the industry regarded as a “vehicle” for correction of tobacco control issues)\textsuperscript{567} to ABD to develop minimum criteria for tobacco compliance employee training programs provided by retailers to inform their employees about federal and state regulation of tobacco sales to minors. Presumably to insure that no burden be imposed on cigarette sellers’ finances or their workers’ attention span or knowledge base, the study bill instructed the ABD not to require the program to exceed one hour.\textsuperscript{568} The actual training, however, as Carlson later noted, “we wanted to do...in-house.”\textsuperscript{569} The bill, as Johnson County Attorney J. Patrick White, whose office’s tobacco stings had been achieving compliance rates upwards of 90 percent, observed shortly after its enactment, responded to tobacco retailers by giving them a “‘get out of jail free card’” by conferring on them “essentially...one free violation if they have had their employees go through training sponsored by the State.”\textsuperscript{570} Specifically, S.S.B. 1117 provided that, “unless the retailer directs or \textsuperscript{563} Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2384HC (Feb. 11, 2003) (copy from State Archives, furnished by Rich Johnson, Legal Services Division Director, LSA).

\textsuperscript{564} On H.S.B. 170 (Feb. 19, 2003, by Public Safety Committee), see below.

\textsuperscript{565} Telephone interview with Theodore Simms, Washington, D.C. (May 28, 2008). Simms had also worked for Whitfield & Eddy.

\textsuperscript{566} Telephone interview with Jeffrey Lamberti, Ankeny (May 30, 2008).

\textsuperscript{567} Telephone interview with James West, Des Moines (May 21, 2008).

\textsuperscript{569} Telephone interview with Dawn Carlson, president and CEO, Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Stores of Iowa, Des Moines (May 23, 2008).

\textsuperscript{570} Minutes of the Informal Meeting of the Johnson County Board of Supervisors at 2 (May 7, 2003), on http://www.johnson-county.com/auditor/min2003/030507ws.htm (visited Oct. 23, 2008). Five years later an assistant attorney in the same office experienced in section 453A prosecutions used exactly the same “get out of jail free card”
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

knowingly permits the employee to violate” the no-sales-to-minors section, “the retailer shall not be assessed a penalty...for a first or second...violation...that takes place at the same place of business within a one-year period” and the “underlying violations shall be deemed not to be violations...for the purpose of determining the number of penalties” for the progressive enforcement penalty scheme if the retailers had the aforementioned prescribed training program in place and the employee acknowledged in writing that he or she had completed the program and understood the laws and regulations. 571 Significantly, key parts of these extraordinarily retailer-friendly provisions were drafted by the Iowa Grocery Industry Association. 572

Lamberti later stressed that retailers had liked the study bill, even though it ultimately did not embody one of their more intriguing suggestions—namely, getting their clerks’ attention by increasing the fine for selling to minors to $1,000. The inescapable self-contradiction inherent in this proposal, which was calibrated to motivate these low-wage workers to stop selling to minors and thus potentially causing their employers revenue losses in the tens of thousands of dollars resulting from a 30- or 60-day permit suspension, lay in its double-edged severity: the possibility of being forced to pay the equivalent of several weeks’ wages as a fine might deter a considerable proportion of potential employees from taking the job to begin with. 573

S.S.B. 1117 was received by the Senate State Government Committee on February 26, 2003, 574 a week after H.S.B. 170—a very similar measure, which lacked the provision under which violations would not count under the language. Email from Andrew Chappell (May 16, 2008).

572 The two free passes, the “knowingly” provision, and the 60-minute limit on training were contained in an amendment (included in the bill drafting files) that bore the computer print-out code: L:_Transitional\JBWest\Iowa_Grocery_Ind_Assoc_Legislative\453A.22. new.doc. The copy in the Senate file bore the committee chair’s initials (MZ) and the House file’s the chair’s signature (Clel Baudley). Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2384SC (Feb. 11, 2003); Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2384HC (Feb. 11, 2003).

573 Telephone interview with Jeffrey Lamberti, Ankeny (May 30, 2008). According to a convenience store chain lobbyist, companies believed that clerks, who were largely paid $9.00 to $9.50 an hour on a part-time basis, needed to be subjected to more severe fines amounting to three weeks of pay (and fired). Telephone interview with lobbyist who demanded anonymity (June 13, 2008).

574 Senate Journal 2003, at 1:325 (Feb. 26). The Senate State Government Committee had filed a bill drafting request form on Feb. 11. Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2384SC (Feb. 11, 2003) (copy from State Archives, furnished by Rich Johnson, Legal Services Division Director, LSA).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

progressive penalty scheme\textsuperscript{575}—had been received by the House Public Safety Committee but appears not to have been acted on.\textsuperscript{576} (At its meeting on February 21, the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission heard the program administrator of the IDPH Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division talk about proposed legislation on tobacco retailer fines and penalties, but unfortunately the minutes failed to preserve any of the substance.)\textsuperscript{577} S.S.B. 1117 was assigned to a three-member subcommittee chaired by Republican Bryan Sievers, the committee vice chair. The other Republican member was Doug Shull,\textsuperscript{578} the former chief financial officer of Casey’s,\textsuperscript{579} one of the state’s largest \textsuperscript{575}The House and Senate bill study files (whose “working title of request” was “Tobacco retailers”) in the State Archives contain identical versions that antedate and differ somewhat from those cited in the text, which are included in the comprehensive collection of study bill books at the University of Iowa Law Library. The working title of the bill drafting requests for the second versions of the House and Senate study bills, which were also identical, was “Cigarette retailer[s] compliance”; they contained identical handwritten insertions (perhaps by Mark Zieman, Senate State Government chair) of the provisions specifying that the first two violations were not to be deemed violations for the purpose of determining the number of violations for which penalties were to be assessed and the 60-minute limit on trainings. Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2779SC (Feb. 2\textsuperscript{[?]1}, 2003); Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2779HC (Feb. 2\textsuperscript{[?]1}, 2003).

\textsuperscript{576}H.S.B. 170 (Feb. 19, 2003, by Public Safety Committee), \textit{House Journal 2003}, at 1:379. This study bill appears, according to the \textit{House Journal}, not to have been assigned to a subcommittee. However, according to the \textit{Iowa Legislative News Service Bulletin,} #22 at B (Feb. 19, 2003), it was assigned on Feb. 19 to a subcommittee composed of Dwayne Alons (chair), Kevin McCarthy, and George Eichhorn. Five years later, Alons had only a hazy recollection of the study bill. Telephone interview with Dwayne Alons, Hull (May 28, 2008). Committee chair Clel Baudler, when asked about the study bill’s provenience, (incorrectly) recalled that the Attorney General’s Office had proposed it as “an education thing—to educate the retailers.” Telephone interview with Clel Baudler, Greenfield (May 28, 2008). Apparently H.S.B. 170 was superseded by H.S.B. 245, which was identical to S.S.B. 1117. H.S.B. 245 (Mar. 5, by Public Safety Committee); \textit{House Journal 2003}, at 1:519. The next day it was assigned to a subcommittee composed of Clel Baudler (chair), Kevin McCarthy, and Tom Sands. \textit{House Journal 2003}, at 1:532 (Mar. 6). For unknown reasons, on the same day that H.S.B. 245 emerged in the House, the Senate State Government received S.S.B. 1141, which was identical to the already superseded H.S.B. 170, and assigned it to a subcommittee composed of Sievers, Johnson, and Ragan. \textit{Senate Journal 2003}, at 1:390, 394 (Mar. 5).

\textsuperscript{577}Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission Meeting, Minutes, Feb. 21, 2003 at 1 (copy furnished by Bonnie Mapes, Director, Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division, IDPH) (Threase Harms-Hassoun was the administrator).

\textsuperscript{578}\textit{Senate Journal 2003}, at 1:327 (Feb. 26). Senator Jack Kibbie was the Democratic sellers of cigarettes. (Although Shull failed to mention this revealing dimension of his career in his rather detailed entry in the Iowa Official Register, anti-tobacco lobbyists and his Senate colleagues were well aware of his Casey’s connection and his favorable attitude toward bills advantaging his former source of a livelihood. Notably, in 2004, after the Republicans had lost their Senate majority, he supported ousting Iverson as Senate party leader and replacing him with Jeffrey Lamberti, the son of the founder of Casey’s.) Just a few months earlier both Sievers and Shull had received campaign contributions of $250 and $500, respectively, from the Hy-Vee, Inc. PAC, but they were only two of many Iowa legislators on whom the large supermarket/cigarette merchant had bestowed its largesse. However, Shull had also been the recipient of contributions from other cigarette sellers, including $200 from Fareway Stores PAC, $500 from the Iowa Grocery Industry Association/Grocers PAC, $1,000 from Donald Lamberti, the chairman of Casey’s, and—most intriguingly—$1,000 from W. A. Krause, the founder of Kum and Go, a convenience store/gas station chain competing against Shull’s former firm, Casey’s.

2997
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

Despite these cozy connections, an ABD tobacco control official explained the bias in the bill—which was being pushed by the retailers, grocers, and petroleum marketers and convenience store associations—as a result of the fact 581 Telephone interview with Jennifer Harbison, Des Moines (May 19, 2008) (lobbyist for American Cancer Society in 2003 who worked on this bill).

---

582 Telephone interview with Sen. Jack Hatch, Des Moines (May 19, 2008).

that “a certain group of legislators with a certain ideological perspective were given inaccurate information by lobbyists representing retailers. As sometimes happens in the process, the lobbyists had in turn been somewhat misinformed by their clients.” The backers’ “strategy” in moving the bill “was to keep the draft from being introduced until the same day the bill was scheduled to be considered by the senate state government committee.”588 This plan was thwarted when House Democrat Kevin McCarthy—who was on the three-member House Public Safety Committee subcommittees to which the companion House study bills were assigned589—“caught wind of the bill and...forewarned”590 the attorney general’s lobbyist and other tobacco control lobbyists that the study bill “had legs.”591 The tobacco control organizations, which found the original bill “offensive,” then intervened to provide the committee with information indicating that it had been misinformed by retailers as to the reality of the implementation of the new enforcement program. Until a compromise could be forged, the committee declined to move the bill as initially introduced.592 On March 6, the ABD’s 588 Email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 18, 2008).

589 H.S.B. 170 and 245.
590 Telephone interview with Nicole Gehl, ABD (May 16, 2008); email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 17 and 18, 2008). The existence of the study bills was presumably not unknown since the requesters of the House and Senate bills checked the “no” box on the LSB bill drafting request form as to whether they wanted the requests to be confidential (otherwise the LSB would not have listed the requests in the index of bill requests or released any information about them). Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2384HC (Feb. 11, 2003); Request for Bill Drafting, LSB #2384SC (Feb. 11, 2003).
591 Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 29, 2008).
592 Telephone interview with Nicole Gehl, ABD (May 16, 2008); email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 17 and 18, 2008). ABD was/is responsible for enforcement of tobacco use and sale laws. Among the inaccuracies fed to legislators was retail lobbyists’ assertion that “retailers were not notified of violations and therefore retailers, since [they] could not be expected to correct problems that they were not aware of, were being unfairly treated by the program. Although [sic] not entirely logical, the complaint resonated with a group that was looking for a reason to support the bill. The assertion was simply not true. I submitted copies of the form letter to the committee that was sent out within 48 hours of a local police officer submitting a check to ABD.” Email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 18, 2008). The notion that the anti-tobacco movement had had to be informed by McCarthy of the bill’s existence is contradicted by the fact that IDPH had been monitoring and was well aware of the content of the study bills. Iowa Department of Public Health, Legislative Update 9(6) (Feb. 24, 2003) and 9(7) (Mar. 3, 2003), on http://www.idph.state.ia.us/adper/common/pdf/legis/archive/2003/09-06.pdf and http://www.idph.state.ia.us/adper/common/pdf/legis/archive/2003/09-07.pdf.

2999
legislation monitor informed the Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Commission that the retailers and the ABD had reached a “tentative compromise” to modify the study bill, which had “attempted to eliminate penalties for tobacco sales to minors for the retailer by introducing an affirmative defense for training,” by “loosen[ing] the penalty structure for retailers” and permitting the use of such a defense only once every four years.\textsuperscript{593}

On March 12, after hearing a clarification from Eric Tabor of the Attorney General’s Office, the Senate State Government Committee adopted Senator Sievers’ amendment to S.S.B. 1117, which, manifestly the product of a grand compromise between sellers and state enforcement agencies, was a complete reworking of the bill.\textsuperscript{594} As unanimously approved—even the chamber’s veteran anti-smoker, Michael Connolly, voted Aye, while Lamberti voted “present” (i.e., abstained)—the bill then became committee bill S.F. 401.\textsuperscript{595} Amended S.S.B. 1117/S.F. 401 differed from S.S.B. 1117 as filed chiefly in four respects. First, if local authorities did not assess a penalty for selling to minors within 60 days of an adjudication of the violation, the matter had to be transferred to IDPH.\textsuperscript{596} The apparent reason for this change was that, as already noted, until then many local governments had declined to prosecute in compliance with the statute’s mandatory imposition of civil penalties because the violator might be the only convenience store or business in town\textsuperscript{597} or, even more perversely, the mayor or some other local official.\textsuperscript{598} With transfer to the IDPH, the Attorney General’s Office would proceed with the prosecution and the civil penalty would accrue to the state rather than the local governments.\textsuperscript{599}

This last feature in large part accounted for the attorney general’s lobbyist’s \textsuperscript{593}Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Commission, Minutes (Mar. 6, 2003), on http://www.iowaabd.com/about_office/commission_minutes/03062003.jsp (visited May 19, 2008) (report by Nicole Gehl).

\textsuperscript{594}S.S.B. 1117.301 (by Sievers) (copy furnished by LSA).

\textsuperscript{595}Committee Minutes for [Senate] State Government (Mar. 12, 2003) (copy furnished by Secretary of Senate); Senate Journal 2003, at 1:511, 523 (Mar. 17). Lamberti reportedly abstained from committee votes affecting his family’s business. Email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 17, 2008).

\textsuperscript{596}S.F. 401, § 1 (Mar. 17, 2003).

\textsuperscript{597}Email from Andrew Chappell, Johnson County assistant attorney, to Marc Linder (May 16, 2008).

\textsuperscript{598}Telephone interview with Nicole Gehl, ABD (May 16, 2008).

\textsuperscript{599}Email from Andrew Chappell, Johnson County assistant attorney, to Marc Linder (May 16, 2008).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

having declared for the bill. The attorney general’s intense interest in this change was easily understood: because many hundreds of violations were going unprosecuted as a result of local governments’ resistance or neglect, back-up prosecutions by the state had become very burdensome, especially since they required an assistant attorney general from Des Moines constantly to be traveling all over the state to appear before city councils. The proposed provision, which would enable the attorney general to prosecute these cases in a centralized fashion before an administrative law judge attached to ABD in Ankeny, promised to ease the burden and eliminate the considerable backlog. Although the Attorney General’s Office had considered proposing such an amendment on its own to the legislature, it had refrained from doing so lest an uncontrollable legislative process, under the influence of a tobacco lobby intensely interested in reducing, if not eliminating, the penalties, generate other changes that would leave the statute weaker than before. But once the cigarette sellers launched the study bill with its extraordinary affirmative defense, the Attorney General’s Office had no choice but to “counterpunch” and salvage the best it could from a process that it not only had not, but might never have, initiated.

Second, now ABD was required itself to develop the tobacco compliance employee training program (capped at two hours) and to make it conveniently, accessibly, and practicably available to retailers’ employees at no cost to them or their employers. Although ABD would have preferred no new law at all, it salvaged something of a compromise, in part through this provision, which, by entrusting the administration of training to the agency, enabled it to insure standardization and quality. Conversely, retailers, who had wanted to do the training in-house, regarded the provision as a partial setback.

600 http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=DspReport&ga=80&type=b&hbill=SF401 (Eric Tabor was the AG’s lobbyist).
601 Telephone interview with Donald Stanley, assistant attorney general, Des Moines (May 20 and 22, 2008). Unfortunately, the substance of Stanley’s post-enactment discussion of S.F. 401 at an important official tobacco control organization meeting was not preserved. Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission Meeting, Minutes, Apr. 18, 2003 at 2 (copy furnished by Bonnie Mapes, Director, Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division, IDPH).
603 Telephone interview with Nicole Gehl, IABD (May 16, 2008).
604 Email from Nicole Gehl, IABD, to Marc Linder (May 17, 2008). Although the training was free to retailers, it was funded by the civil penalties collected from state prosecutions of tobacco sales to minors. Id.
605 Telephone interview with Dawn Carlson, president and CEO, Petroleum Marketers
Third, S.F. 401 significantly relaxed the penalties for cigarette sellers in a way that even the study bill had not. Under the existing law (following a $300 civil penalty for a first violation plus an automatic 14-day permit suspension for failure to pay the penalty), a retailer’s cigarette sales permit was suspended for 30 days for a second violation within two years and for 60 days for a third violation within three years, and revoked for a fourth violation within three years.606 Under the bill, the penalties were now structured this way: for a second violation within two years the retailer was given a choice between a $1,500 civil penalty and 30-day suspension; for a third violation within three years the retailer was assessed a civil penalty of $1,500 and its permit was suspended for 30 days; for a fourth violation within three years the $1,500 penalty was paired with a 60-day suspension; and not until a fifth violation within four years was the permit revoked.607 In other words, the so-called compromise bill enabled retailers to pay their way out of a suspension,608 reduced the suspension periods, and increased the number of violations before revocation kicked in. Crucial to understanding the new penalty scheme is that, as one county prosecutor commented based on experience following enactment, “convenience stores always pay the $1,500 for a second violation because it is so much less than they would lose with a thirty-day suspension.” In contrast, for example, bars, which often did not sell many cigarettes, “choose to serve the suspension on a second violation.”609

Unsurprisingly, it was the convenience stores/gas stations and cigarette retailers generally that pushed for this legislation. In particular, it was, as one of the leading state tobacco enforcement administrators observed, Hy-Vee and Kum-and-Go that “drive this bus.” In other words, Hy-Vee—which lobbyists, Charles Wasker and William Wimmer, were for many years the Tobacco Institute’s Iowa lobbyists—and Kum and Go most aggressively fought against effective enforcement of cigarette sales regulation.610 Ironically, shortly before securing did declare for its companion bill, H.F. 637.  http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=DspReport&ga=80&type=b&hbill=HF637. In contrast, according to Gehl, Casey’s represented a different corporate culture, at least in the sense that it was more responsive in implementing no-sales-to-minors training for employees. Email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 18, 2008). A Johnson county prosecutor agreed that Casey’s quickly and cooperatively paid its civil penalties without objection. Email from Andrew Chappell, Johnson County assistant attorney, to Marc Linder (May 16, 2008). Nevertheless, Hy-Vee, Kum and Go, and Casey’s were all represented by the Iowa Grocery Industry Association, which supported the bill, while the Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Stores of Iowa primarily represented “independent ‘mom and pop’ operations that own and operate one or a very small chain of stores.” Email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 18, 2008).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

And fourth, S.F. 401, in what was perhaps the principal compromise that the big retailers made, reduced the scope of the study bill’s aforementioned free pass for illegal sales to minors effected by employees: now retailers were entitled to assert the bar to prosecution, based on the employee’s holding a certificate for having completed a training program, only once within four years.613 Substantively virtually unchanged, S.F. 401 passed the Senate by a vote of 41 to 6. Most of those Nays were cast by strong anti-smoking advocates614 for whom the blatant blunting of the financial deterrent to the sale of cigarettes to minors remained unacceptable even after modification.615 In the House, not a single tobacco control advocate rebelled against the compromise as the bill passed by this enfeeblement of the chief law designed to suppress sales to minors, Wasker, echoing his old paymasters’ implausible claims, had asserted: “‘My tobacco clients would be supportive of anything that would be effective in keeping cigarettes out of the hands of children.”611 And the senior vice president of Krause Gentle Corporation, which operated 185 Kum and Go stores in Iowa (which had racked up a 19 percent noncompliance rate during the most recent enforcement checks), sanctimoniously chimed in that “‘[w]e don’t think it is right to sell tobacco products to minors.’”612 614Senate Journal 2003, at 1:546-47 (Mar. 18) (Bolkcom, Dvorsky, Hatch, and Quirmbach).

615Email from Sen. Herman Quirmbach to Marc Linder (May 18, 2008), and email from Sen. Joe Bolkeem to Marc Linder (May 19, 2008); telephone interview with Sen. Jack Hatch, Des Moines (May 19, 2008).
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

a vote of 96 to 0. Perhaps the members understood no more of the bill’s substance than the other-worldly summary that IDPH had published in its Legislative Update two days before the vote: after mentioning the transfer of jurisdiction after 60 days and ABD’s responsibility for training, it alluded to rest of the bill (which undermined enforcement) as: “Mak[ing] changes on assessing violations.” The bill became law and its provisions remain in the Iowa Code with an attenuated financial deterrent—or, in ABD’s aseptic description, the “retail community,” the attorney general, IDPH, and ABD “worked together on a compromise to the tobacco retailers bill that creates another step in the civil penalty process on the way to revocation....

A somewhat more straightforward assessment came from the grocery stores’ lobbyist who, after genuflecting before the tobacco industry’s shibboleth that “obviously no one wanted to sell cigarettes to minors,” declared that he was unable to say whether the outcome was “win-win,” but that definitely retailers were not worse off after the bill’s passage. The claim by the president of the Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Stores of Iowa that S.F. 401 as enacted was less favorable to retailers than the original study bill was plausible insofar as it was rooted in the view that cigarette retailers’ highest priority had been to construct an affirmative defense by means of which they could escape liability for employees’ unlawful sales. But to the extent that sellers, driven by the perceived need to escape permit suspension—and the allegedly attendant permanent loss of 616 House Journal 2003, at 1:841-42 (Mar. 26). Before voting on the bill the House substituted it for H.F. 637, which had been its companion bill. One explanation as to the lack of opposition was that the governor’s lobbyist had “instructed all parties to negotiate a deal,” while a backlog of prosecutions from the Attorney General’s Office “created a desire on the part certain parties to settle the matter before the bill went to the floor for debate.” Consequently, some anti-tobacco legislators “may have gone along with the compromise that the anti-tobacco lobby had a part in negotiating.” Email from Nicole Gehl to Marc Linder (May 18, 2008). When asked whether the virtual unanimity was not puzzling, Senator Joe Bolkcom replied: “I didn’t understand it either at the time. Still don’t. Somebody must have made a deal.” Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (May 20, 2008).

619 Iowa Code § 453A.22(2) and (3) (2009).

621 Telephone interview with James West, Des Moines (May 21, 2008).
customers who would thenceforth also buy their sodas and newspapers at stores with intact permits—had succeeded in substituting a $1,500 penalty for it, they undermined enforcement almost as effectively as a twice yearly affirmative defense. Nevertheless, even though the monetary penalty was, as Lamberti later stressed, not significant to larger retailers such as Casey’s in comparison to the costs of a suspension, he concluded that retailers would clearly have been better off with the original study bill. Although Johnson County Attorney White acknowledged that the law “change was not huge,” he found it emblematic of the “tremendous power” of “the smoking lobby” that “for all of the focus...on smoking, the change slipped through very quietly.”

Unsuccessful Smoking Ban and Local Preemption Repeal Bills Even in the Wake of Republicans’ Loss of Control of the Senate: 2005-2006

“Iowa has one of the worst track records in the country.”

As Democrats in the November 2004 election gained joint (25-25) control of the Senate with Republicans and came within one seat of parity in the House (51-49), leaving Republicans “with no votes to spare,” even the presumptive Senate Democratic co-leader Michael Gronstal stressed that the voting stalemate “will force us to find common ground.” Without saying it went that more stringent public smoking bans would neither find that ground nor fit the “very limited agenda” of “centralist things” that Senate Republican leader Iverson predicted would be the watchword. In the same vein was Governor Vilsack’s admonition that the message of the election returns was that “the extremes are not what Iowans want.” None of these forecasts of a non-innovative biennium, however, deterred anti-smoking forces from at least introducing the by then traditional bills banning smoking in restaurants and bars and repealing local preemption or from finally daring to put forward a full-scale revision of Iowa Code section 142B to ban public smoking radically. Under adverse political circumstances, Representative Janet Petersen, the chief sponsor of H.F. 2110, the Smokefree Public Places and Workplace Safety Act, was in effect undergoing a trial run for passing such a statewide ban whenever Democrats gained control of both houses and an anti-tobacco governor would sign such a bill.

---

622 Telephone interview with Dawn Carlson, president and CEO, Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Stores of Iowa, Des Moines (May 23, 2008).

The first bill filed in 2005, S.F. 1, would have covered all restaurants and elevated them to the position, theretofore uniquely occupied by elevators, of being exempt from the power otherwise conferred on those with custody or control of public places to designate smoking areas. The short bill filed by Democrat Matt McCoy—whose anti-tobacco profile would become more sharply etched in 2007-2008—from Des Moines, where he was vice president of the Downtown Community Alliance, never progressed beyond the appointment of a State Government subcommittee, despite the fact that committee chair, Michael Connolly, perhaps the Senate’s most ardent anti-smoker, had appointed himself chair of the subcommittee. Four days later, Petersen went McCoy one better by filing a bill to ban smoking in all restaurants and bars, but H.F. 71 did not even get to the stage of being assigned to a subcommittee, though several lobbyists, including one representing the Iowa Retail Federation, declared against it.

The session also witnessed renewed interest in repealing local preemption. This focus was forged by the reaction to Iowa Supreme Court’s decision in 2003 invalidating, on the grounds that it was preempted by Iowa Code section 142B.6, an ordinance passed by the Ames city council in 2001 partially banning smoking in restaurants. In particular, CAFE Iowa CAN—the clumsy acronym for the Clean Air for Everyone Iowa Citizen Action Network—was formed in the wake of that ruling to “advocate for local control” with the “goal” of “educat[ing] the public about the dangers of secondhand smoke and prepar[ing] them to become better advocates.” This indirect, pedagogical approach to local control appealed 630 H.F. 71 (Jan. 14, by Petersen).

---

633 See below ch. 33.
Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

to CAFE because the process “allows a community to have a discussion about the health risks of secondhand smoke and develop a solution that fits their [sic] community,” and the increased understanding would result in “strong community support for a law protecting nonsmokers.”[634] Local control was also at the core of the group’s “[b]roader goal[]” of “changing attitudes and behavior of smokers in order to protect others from secondhand smoke. A powerful change process unfolds as a community debates the issue of secondhand smoke. Letters to the editor, town hall meetings, public debate, and media coverage all ensue.” But the overriding significance of local control was its ability to render “the usually influential tobacco companies”—which are “forced to work at the local level through fake front groups and allies,” thus generating a “credibility gap” that did not plague them “as much” at the state and federal levels—“suddenly powerless.”[635]

Senator Quirmbach, having spearheaded the Ames City Council’s adoption of the (judicially invalidated) ordinance,[636] acutely felt the urgent need to clear the way for communities to act. On January 26, 2005, Quirmbach filed S.F. 70, which repealed the existing preemption provision, substituting for it a section on local regulation of smoking, which authorized a city, county, or local health board to enforce the statewide law by adopting ordinances or rules containing standards or requirements “higher or more stringent” than the statute’s. Specifically, the bill mentioned that such local regulations could eliminate exemptions (including that for bars) and prohibit the designation of smoking areas.[637] Two weeks after the bill had been referred to the State Government Committee—the subcommittee to which it was assigned never having met[638]—Quirmbach, as co-chair of the Senate Local Government Committee, presented the textually identical Senate Study Bill 1137,[639] which CAFE called “CAFE’s bill to restore [634] CAFE Iowa CAN, History, on http://www.cafeiowacan.org/history.htm (visited May 13, 2008). Ironically, despite its communitarian, grass-roots democratic rhetoric, CAFE (or at least its all-important Iowa City branch, whose leaders were also statewide leaders), was run in a top-down, authoritarian manner. This conclusion is based on several years of interacting with them and attending and making a presentation at a CAFE meeting on Feb. 23, 2006.

[636] See below ch. 33.

[640] S.S.B. 1137 (Feb. 10, 2005, proposed Local Government Committee by co-chair local control.” Although it was assigned to a four-member subcommittee (chaired by Quirmbach and of which McCoy was also a member), which met, the study bill died too. Foege’s House companion bill also died in committee. Lobbyists for various tobacco-related entities, including the Iowa Retail Federation, declared against one or more of the preemption repeal bills. Despite the repeated defeat of repeal, Foege insisted that it continued to gain legislative adherents. Unlike the anti-tobacco coalition, whose advocacy of local control appeared to be largely opportunistic, Foege seemed to be animated by principle: “I’m not going to tell a business what they can or can’t do.... But I want true local control. If Ireland can ban smoking in their pubs, I don’t know why we can’t. But I think it’s up to those local governments to decide.”

To be sure, the principle at stake was, in the welter of myriad state and federal statutes and regulations telling businesses what they could or could not do, difficult to discern, but a major reason for the lack of success in passing such a measure was succinctly stated by the Central Iowa Tobacco-Free Partnership—the opposition of the large tobacco companies and their lobbyists by whom local non-profit organization were “outgunned and...outspent.”

Quirmbach.

641 CAFE, Action Alerts, on http://www.cafeiowacan.org/alerts.htm (visited May 13, 2008). CAFE’s lobbyists (Battles and Harms-Hassoun) declared for S.F. 70 without identifying their client; the Cancer and Heart organizations also declared for it as did Judie Hoffman, the former Ames City Council member. http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=BillInfo&Service=Billbook&ga=81&hbill=SF70 (visited May 18, 2009).

642 The meeting took place on Mar. 3, 2005. http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/ga/sclist.do?ga=81&start=60. Unfortunately, neither the Iowa State Archives nor the Senate President’s office has the minutes of this meeting, the latter stating that subcommittees do not produce minutes. Telephone interview with Kay, Senate President’s office (May 14, 2008).

643 H.F. 261 (Feb. 10, by Foege and Schickel); House Journal 2005, at 1:332 (Feb. 10).

645 Erin Morain, “Going Smoke-Free Can Be Profitable, Owners Say,” Business Record
At the end of 2005, CAFE issued a “Position Statement on Secondhand Smoke,” declaring that it “supports local communities’ efforts to pass local clean indoor air ordinances and other policies that prohibit the use of tobacco in all public places and workplaces. We support passage of legislation that restores local control for laws and regulations relating to smoking prohibitions. CAFE IOWA CAN would support a statewide law only if it protects the health of all workers, did not include exemptions including but not limited to ventilation, size of workplace, type of business, or age restrictions, AND it included a clause that restored local control over secondhand smoke to Iowa’s cities and counties.”

Around New Year Thrase Harms Hassoun, CAFE’s lobbyist, met with Senator Matt McCoy three times. As a result, a week later one of CAFE’s leaders confidently observed that McCoy “will be introducing a statewide bill and we worked with him to get everything we wanted in it.”

At the outset of the 2006 session, Petersen (and Dubuque Democrat Pam Jochum) filed H.F. 2110—Senator Matt McCoy introduced the companion bill S.F. 2136—which signaled its new approach to suppressing public smoking by repealing in toto the old law codified in chapter 142B, which had become as obsolescent as the initial medical-scientific understanding of the health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure had been in 1978, when the first version of the old law had been enacted. In contrast to the existing statute, which was bereft of any statement of legislative findings, public policy, or intent, the Smokefree Public Places and Workplace Safety Act, which was based on a model statute melding those passed in Delaware, Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island, and Washington, began with the finding that environmental tobacco smoke caused and exacerbated disease in nonsmoking adults and children, which sufficed to justify the regulation of smoking in public places and workplaces in order to reduce the level of exposure and protect public and employees’ health.\footnote{H.F. 2110, § 1(2) (Jan. 24, 2006).}

Breaking with the old law’s utterly feckless method of leaving it up to building owners to designate smoking areas, Petersen’s measure outright banned smoking in “public places” and “all enclosed locations within places of employment” as well as in two generic types of outdoor locations: “[o]utdoor sports arenas and other entertainment venues where members of the general public assemble to witness entertainment events” and “within fifty feet of any enclosed area where smoking is prohibited....” Interestingly, this latter no-smoking zone served not to protect nonsmokers from walking through a gauntlet of smoke on the way into and out of buildings, but “to insure that tobacco smoke does not enter that area through entrances, windows, ventilation systems, or other means.”\footnote{H.F. 2110, § 3(1) & (2).} In other words, at the beginning of 2006 Petersen had not yet focused on the risks of secondhand smoke exposure outdoors.

The comprehensive scope of the smoking ban in “public places” (“an enclosed area to which the public is invited or in which the public is permitted”) was suggested by the non-exhaustive list of 20 types, including restaurants, bars, retail stores, retail service establishments, government buildings, shopping malls, public transportation facilities, laundromats, banks, child care facilities, public and private educational facilities, places of public assembly in indoor locations, libraries and museums, entertainment venues such as theaters, auditoriums, concert halls, convention facilities, bingo facilities, indoor sports arenas, hotel lobbies, and health care provider locations.\footnote{H.F. 2110, § 2(11).} The exemptions from the smoking ban encompassed: private residences (if not used as a child care or health care facility); 20 percent of hotel/motel rooms (unless the smoke “infiltrated” into areas where smoking was banned); retail tobacco stores (subject to the same proviso); private/semi-private rooms in long-term care facilities if all the occupants request smoking-permitted rooms (and subject to the same proviso); private clubs having no employees (except when the general public was invited to a function); outdoor places of employment; private hire limousines; and workplaces where smoking was an integral part of a cessation or medical/scientific research program.

In addition to requiring employers to explain the prohibition to all employees and persons applying for employment and everyone with custody/control of covered public places and places of employment to post no-smoking signs and remove all ashtrays, Petersen’s bill prohibited retaliation against any employee, job applicant, or customer for exercising any right under the law and preserved the legal rights against the employer (or anyone else) of any employee working in a location where an employer permitted smoking. Enforcement was multi-pronged. Although it was administratively entrusted to local health boards, while judicial magistrates were to hear and determine violations, those with custody/control of smoking-prohibited places were also enforcement agents in the sense that they “shall inform persons violating” the law of its provisions. The use of the present participle was a crucial element of the enforcement process because it manifestly imposed on owners the duty to monitor, police, and intervene actively and directly vis-a-vis violators while they were in the act of violating, rather than merely posting signs or generally circulating information ahead of time. Employees and private citizens were also entitled to enforce the law by bringing legal actions, while complaints could be filed with local health boards or IDPH by any person. If anyone with custody or control of a public or workplace failed to comply with the law, both the local health board and any person aggrieved by that failure was entitled to seek injunctive relief to enforce the law.

H.F. 2110 imposed civil penalties of: (1) $50 for smoking in a prohibited area; (2) a maximum of $100 for a first violation by a person in custody/control, of $200 for a second within one year, and of $500 for any additional violation within one year; (3) a minimum of $2,000 to a maximum of $10,000 for discharging or in any way discriminating against an employee for filing a complaint, providing information, or bringing an action under the law. Each day on which any violation took place was considered a separate violation. In addition to these monetary penalties, persons in custody/control were also subject to suspension or revocation of any permit or license issued to them for the premises where the violation occurred. Finally, violations of the law constituted public nuisances, which local health boards or IDPH was empowered to abate by injunction or restraining order. Finally, Petersen and McCoy removed the barrier that the cigarette oligopoly and the Iowa Supreme Court had erected to additional local controls by eliminating the existing law’s preemption provision and, instead, inserting a section prohibiting the law from being interpreted or construed “to permit smoking where smoking is otherwise restricted or prohibited

654 H.F. 2110, §§ 6-7.
656 H.F. 2110, §§ 9, 16. For failure to pay in a timely manner the $50 scheduled fine for smoking in a prohibited place the magistrate was required to issue a citation, and, if the person failed to appear, to issue an arrest warrant, but no one under 18 could be detained in a secure facility for failure to pay. Id. § 16 (referring to Iowa Code § 804.1).
by other applicable laws” or “to prevent political subdivisions from adopting ordinances or regulations...more restrictive than the provisions” of the new law.657

Petersen admitted, before she had even filed the bill, that it faced an “uphill battle. ‘We need to get a debate going...I think the public is for it, but is the Legislature for it?”’658 She quickly got her answer: H.F. 2110 may have finally put Iowa in a position to debate state-of-the-art statewide anti-smoking legislation, but the Republican leadership was having none of it. House Speaker Christopher Rants made it clear that “he would block debate” of a cigarette tax increase and “other significant smoking restrictions.” Petersen’s other rhetorical question—“This has been an issue I’ve followed since the early ‘90s and we have not made a lot of progress. Do we want to wait for the market to determine when Iowans should go into a clean indoor air environment?”—also received an instantaneous answer from House Majority Leader Chuck Gipp, who indulged in the self-fulfilling prophecy that chances of passage were “‘bleak’;” though a nonsmoker who was “‘not defending smoking,’” he defended not passing the bill on the grounds that there were “‘tax-paying entities that have to compete.... A lot of them are establishing themselves whether to be smoke-free or not. They want that option.’”660 That view mirrored the stance adopted by the Iowa Restaurant Association, which insisted that its members “should be allowed to accommodate customers who still want to smoke.” The organization’s president, Doni DeNucci, who did not “‘believe the state should take away that part of their business,’” failed to explain how catering to smokers’ self- and other-destructive addiction could accommodate restaurant and bar owners’ employees’ desire to maintain their health intact. As McCoy described the inhospitable consequence of the hospitality industry’s profit-über-alles practice and policy: “‘Increasing your risk of dying from cancer should not be a condition of employment....’”661

At a meeting of the Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Commission on February 16 a staff member in charge of monitoring alcohol and tobacco legislation delivered the bill’s epitaph: “H.F.2110 is probably more about making a statement...than 657 H.F. 2110, § 11.

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

In spite, or perhaps precisely because of the bill’s vast curtailment of the universe of public places in which smoking would be permissible, the House took absolutely no action on it after it had been referred to the Human Resources Committee. Petersen herself blamed its premature death on “opposition from restaurant-industry lobbyists and legislative leaders such as Rants,” who counterintuitively claimed a preference for smoke-free restaurants but not for “‘dictat[ing] everything restaurants do’” because “‘[p]eople have a choice.’” Senate Democratic Leader Gronstal expressed the belief that McCoy’s companion bill would pass if Iverson let it come to a floor vote, but it failed to survive its referral to the Local Government Committee. Oddly, despite CAFE’s boast that it had secured inclusion in the bill of all of its desiderata, its lobbyist declared “undecided” on it, whereas the Heart, Lung, and Cancer organizations, in addition to such groups as the Iowa Medical Society, Iowa Nurses Association, and Iowa Health Systems all declared for it. Unsurprisingly, even before the bills had gone nowhere, the following companies, which either produced, sold, or promoted smoking, declared their opposition to H.F. 2110 and/or S.F. 2136 through their lobbyists: Harrah’s Operating Company, Iowa Grocery Industry Association, Cigar Association of America, Dubuque Greyhound Park & Casino, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Ameristar Casinos, and Iowa Restaurant Association.

Finally, the 2005-2006 General Assembly again witnessed an array of bills increasing the cigarette tax. Those proposing the highest increases (ranging from 666 S.F. 2136 (Feb. 1, 2006, by McCoy); Senate Journal 2006, at 1:164 (Feb. 1).

---

Democrats’ Decade in the Desert: 1997-2006

$1.00 to $1.64) made, as usual, no progress.\textsuperscript{668} However, a Senate Ways and Means Committee bill mandating a much more modest 36-cent raise specifically to fund educational programs actually passed the Senate toward the end of the 2005 session by a vote of 38 to 12, but then died in the House.\textsuperscript{669}

\textsuperscript{668}H.F. 215 (Feb. 4, 2005, by Schickel et al.) ($1.00); S.F. 130 (Feb. 8, 2005, by Dvorsky et al.) ($1.00); H.F. 237 (Feb. 9, 2005, by Mascher) ($1.64, all to be spent on medical assistance and tobacco control and prevention fund); H.F. 2022 (Jan. 9, 2006, by Tomenga and R. Olson) (64 cents, revenue for senior living trust fund).

\textsuperscript{669}S.F. 416 (May 5, 2005, by Ways and Means Committee); Senate Journal 2005, at 1152-53.
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

“I’m a goddamn smoker and fuck you.”

As in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, conflict over smoking in the building housing the Iowa legislature remained a microcosm of the larger societal struggles. And as in the 1970s, progress toward eliminating secondhand smoke exposure in the Senate in the 1980s and 1990s and into the twenty-first century was much slower than in the House. Democrat Beverly Hannon, a two-term senator from 1985 to 1992, looking back a few years after her departure, observed that: “We had some really emotional fights over smoking.” More than two decades after her arrival in the Senate she recalled that the air in the Senate chamber was oppressively smoke-filled, in no small part because all the smokers from the House who were no longer allowed to smoke there drifted over to the Senate to buy cigarettes from a vending machine and to smoke, causing the air in the chamber to turn into a blue haze. “Some of the non-smoking clerks,” as she recalled in 1997, were threatening to quit, they wouldn’t talk to smokers or hid the ashtrays at the computer stations. When I’d pick up a phone in the Senators’ lounge, it stunk [sic] from stale old tobacco. Guys like [Democrat] Al[vin] Miller would leave cigarettes smoldering in ashtrays while they walked away. P.U. the stench was awful! Several legislators had air purifiers on their desks. Finally, smoking was confined to back benches and certain parts of back of senate, but it was still awful. Rife used to stroll over in the corner near where I sat and puff away. He and Phil Brammer almost came to blows over smoking. Phil ended up having a lung replaced due to emphysema, so it was a life and death issue with him.

At the beginning of each session...I’d get a sinus infections, irritated eyes and throat.

---

1Telephone interview with former Iowa State Senator Al Sturgeon, Sioux City (Apr. 28, 2007) (describing the attitude of the Senate’s smoking leadership toward nonsmoking senators in the late 1980s and early 1990s).

2See above ch. 18.

3See above ch. 25.

4Untitled (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.

The Drs. said it could be from 2nd hand tobacco smoke....

Senate Democrat Beverly Hannon et al. v. Bill Hutchins, Democratic Majority Leader and Future R.J. Reynolds Iowa Lobbyist

No person, while sitting in authority in either chamber of the Iowa legislature, shall use, possess, or exhibit or enhance the use of any tobacco product as defined in section 98.42, subsection 1, when being observed by minors.

In 1985, with Democrats occupying 29 of the chamber’s 50 seats, a bipartisan group of eight Democrats and seven Republicans filed an amendment to Senate Resolution 3, amending the chamber’s permanent rules, to add language tracking the rule that the House had adopted in 1979: “Smoking is not permitted in the senate chamber while the senate is in session except in the perimeter seating area.” However, before the Senate could deal with this amendment, it had to vote on a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate Resolution 3 itself had been adopted. Although the Senate voted 25 to 24 to reconsider, the absence (or non-voting) of one Democrat meant that the vote lacked the constitutional majority of 26, and thus the motion lost; the procedural result was that the amendment was out of order.

---

6Beverly Hannon, [untitled notes] (Feb. 22, 1997), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (1), IWA.

8“Members of Iowa General Assemblies 1981-2002,” at iv, on http://www.legis.state. ia.us/Pubinfo/Library/Members19812002.pdf

9State of Iowa: 1985: Journal of the Senate: 1985: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 2:2079 (S-3109); S-3109 (Feb. 5) (taped into the bill book following Sen. Res. 3 in the University of Iowa Law Library).

10State of Iowa: 1985: Journal of the Senate: 1985: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 1:320-21 (Feb. 7). Leonard Boswell was the missing Democrat. Also ruled out of order was an amendment to the amendment filed by Democrat Don Gettings (who also supported the first amendment) including in the ban seats assigned for the press. State of Iowa: 1985: Journal of the Senate: 1985: Regular Session Seventy-First General Assembly 1:321; State of Iowa: 1985: Journal of the Senate: 1985: Regular Session 3016
Pointing to the “real health problem” of 3,000 non-smokers dying of lung cancer annually, the amendment’s chief sponsor, James Wells, a labor union Democrat from Cedar Rapids in his second Senate term after 12 years in the House where he had early on led the struggle for restricting smoking in public, declared: “This was just the first round.” The closeness of the vote prompted Wells to conclude that support was also growing for a smoking ban in all public buildings except bars. Senator Joseph Coleman, a two-pack a day smoker of unfiltered cigarettes for 40 years and the proposal’s “most vocal back-room critic,” groused: “These guys from the House think they can come over here and just change everything....” In turn, Wells voiced the suspicion that in case the reconsideration vote had succeeded, “a deal had been cut to allow Coleman or another senator to preside over the debate instead of Lt. Gov. Robert Anderson,” who did not smoke. Coleman admitted that it would not have surprised him had he wound up in the chair to resolve the issue of whether the ban proposal was germane to the resolution on the Senate rules, but Wells insisted that he was “not going to have a smoker decide on it....”

In 1987, at the outset of the next General Assembly, when, in spite of the publication the previous year of the Surgeon General’s first report on the health consequences of involuntary smoking, smoking was still permitted everywhere in the Senate—which “stood almost alone among state offices”—a group of ten senators, led by Republican Ray Taylor, but including Hannon and Democrat Jean Lloyd-Jones of Iowa City, filed a floor amendment to the resolution containing the Senate’s permanent rules that would have added to the decorum rule: “Smoking shall not be permitted in the senate chamber at any time.” The bare-bones account in the Senate Journal merely stated that the amendment lost on a 22 to 22 tie vote. But the detailed report in the Des Moines Register shed important light on the quality of the arguments advanced during the floor debate, which appears to have been dominated by the contributions of the heavy-smoking Coleman, a 30-year member of the Senate, who declared that he would “‘defy’” the rule, if it were passed, and “would have to be carried out bodily....” Trivializing smoking bans as a “‘fad’” and asserting that hair spray probably posed a greater danger than cigarette smoke, he insisted that despite his nicotine addiction, he would live as long as his non-smoking colleagues. When he asked rhetorically what smokers contributed to the state of Iowa each year, Taylor shot back: “‘A lot of cancer.’” Coleman, who had been thinking in terms of cigarette taxes, expressed doubt that any senator had died of lung cancer during his incumbency. Significantly, Majority Leader C. W. “Bill” Hutchins, who otherwise had not promoted anti-smoking legislation, but had recently quit smoking, “was observed voting in favor of the amendment” on the non-roll-call vote.¹⁶

---

13 Jane Norman, “Iowa Senate Clings to Smoke-Filled Room,” DMR, Jan. 16, 1987 (2A:2-4 at 2).

A month later, Lloyd-Jones filed this remarkable resolution:

WHEREAS, the surgeon general of the United States has determined that smoking is hazardous to the health; and
WHEREAS, it is [sic] been determined that passive smoke creates health risks to nonsmokers; and
WHEREAS, the Senate does permit smoking in its chambers; and
WHEREAS, the Senate is concerned about the health of its members; NOW THEREFORE,
BE IT RESOLVED BY THE SENATE, That the secretary of the Senate is directed to purchase individual desk top air cleaners to be placed on the desks of those Senators who smoke to eliminate smoke from the Senate chambers.¹⁷

Although Lloyd-Jones’s party controlled 30 of the Senate’s 50 seats,¹⁸ the chamber took no action on the resolution after having referred it to the Rules and Administration Committee,¹⁹ and as late as 1989—with the Democrats’ still ¹⁷Senate Resolution 6 (Feb. 19, 1987). Asked twenty years later whether her resolution was an act of desperation or meant as a provocation, Lloyd-Jones thought she recalled that one senator had already had such an air cleaner, but that in any event her proposal had not been meant cavalierly. Telephone interview with Jean Lloyd-Jones, Iowa City (Feb. 24, 2007).

¹⁸“Members of Iowa General Assemblies 1981-2002,” at iv, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Pubinfo/Library/Members19812002.pdf exercising the same three-fifths majority— the Iowa General Assembly’s Legislative Handbook disclosed that whereas the House did not permit smoking on the House floor, including the speaker’s station, in the press boxes, visitor’s galleries, members’ rest rooms, or committee rooms during meetings, “[t]here are no corresponding restrictions for the Senate.” In such an “unlimited smoking” environment, Lloyd-Jones pointed out, “there was nowhere to get away from the smoke. You just had to put up with choking and coughing.” Two decades later, Hannon still vividly recalled that she used to use a small, quiet, plug-in fan to blow back (in vain) the smoke that senators and their staff surrounding her seat in the chamber were constantly blowing her way.

Multiply frustrated, on March 30, 1987, Hannon requested an opinion from Attorney General Tom Miller for “legal clarification” of the state law on smoking prohibitions (Iowa Code ch. 98A.2, section 6), in particular as to the meaning of the term “public building.” Specifically Hannon wanted to know:

What or who is the “controlling governmental body, officer, or agency” in the Iowa Senate and the Senate Lounge? Who has the authority to declare smoking and non-smoking areas if the Senate rules do not speak to that issue? If there is no Senate rule regarding this, does above referenced code language require no smoking or does it permit smoking?

There are two microscopic signs by the press benches in the Senate which say smoking permitted. Who has the authority to have them there if Senate rules are silent?

The Governor recently ordered cigarette vending machines removed from the Capitol. Does the Capitol include the Senate Lounge and does the Governor’s order extend to the Senate Lounge?

... Also, what recourse does a person have who has to be present on the Senate floor to perform his or her job, to be protected from second-hand smoke which is irritable or harmful to the person, in a building which has no smoking signs at its entrance, and which is a public building?

---

20 Members of Iowa General Assemblies 1981-2002,” at iv, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Pubinfo/Library/Members19812002.pdf
21 Legislative Service Bureau, Legislative Handbook: Iowa General Assembly 29 (n.d. [1989]).
23 Telephone interview with Beverly Hannon, Anamosa, IA (Feb. 28, 2007); email from Beverly Hannon (Mar. 3, 2007). Hannon’s account was reminiscent of disputes over the use of air nozzles on airplanes to blow smoke out of no-smoking sections.
24 Letter from Beverly Hannon to Tom Miller (Mar. 30, 1987), Beverly Hannon
Initially, the Iowa Attorney General’s office gave Hannon’s staff oral advice that the Senate “determined its own rules and the manner in which those rules were implemented.” Then on May 1, 1989, Deputy Attorney General Elizabeth Osenbaugh sent Hannon an advice letter as written confirmation. Osenbaugh set forth, based on other statutes and attorney general opinions, that the law’s ban on smoking in a “public meeting” did not apply to legislative committee meetings because the former encompassed only meetings of members of a “governing body,” which neither the legislature nor its committees were. Without being able to offer similar statutory-interpretive certainty regarding the legislature as a “public place,” Osenbaugh argued that even if the law encompassed meetings of the legislature and its committees, the Iowa constitution “would give each house...the authority to determine whether and to what extent smoking would be permitted.” And “in order to avoid significant constitutional questions”—for example, Article III, section 9 of the Iowa Constitution empowered each house to “punish members for disorderly behavior”—she explained to Hannon, “we would construe the statute as not applying at all to areas under the control of the General Assembly.” She therefore concluded that the law did “not govern smoking in areas under the control of the General Assembly or to legislative meetings” because each house had the authority to adopt smoking rules applying to those places and meetings.

Hannon’s reference to the cigarette vending machine was yet another point... of contention between senatorial smokers and nonsmokers, whose numbers she estimated at the time as 12-13 and 37-38, respectively.\footnote{Letter from Senator Beverly Hannon to Dr. Wayne Witte (May 29, 1987), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.} During the summer of 1986, a number of public health officials, including the president of the Polk County Medical Society, the state public health commissioner, and the president of the Iowa State Board of Health, requested that Governor Terry Branstad ban cigarette vending machines in the State Capitol complex on the grounds that they illegally made cigarettes available to minors. The governor’s spokesman said that he would not object to the removal of the machines—which were under the authority of the Commission for the Blind and the operation of which provided jobs for blind people—if the legislature agreed.\footnote{Cigarette Sales in Capitol,” \textit{DMR}, Sept. 18, 1986 (16A:1-2) (edit.).} On December 31, 1986, Governor Branstad signed an executive order prohibiting the sale of tobacco products in areas of buildings under his control in the State Capitol Complex and all offices occupied by state government.\footnote{State of Iowa, Exec. Order No. 26 (Dec. 31, 1986).} In 1987, while the Senate was considering the clean indoor air act that the House had passed, the governor ordered the cigarette vending machine removed from the basement cafeteria of the Capitol because it was unsupervised and children used it. At that point, Majority Leader Bill Hutchins and Minority Leader Calvin Hultman, both heavy smokers and future cigarette company lobbyists, agreed to order the machine installed in the Senate lounge. But, as the press reported, the Senate’s anti-smoking forces “were not amused.”\footnote{Executive News Svc., “Cigarette Machine” (AP IA, Mar. 30 [1987]), Bates No. T12111618. See also Untitled (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.} On Friday March 27, when workers wheeled the machine up to the entrance to the Senate two hours after the Senate had adjourned for the week, Hannon and Lloyd-Jones, “alerted to the machine’s presence, rushed to the doors of the Senate and conferred with Senate staff members about what to do with the machine, which the workers had been instructed to deliver to the lounge. ... The group huddled for a few minutes and decided the machine should be placed in the men’s restroom instead. But that suggestion was turned down by [the] cafeteria manager..., who said it wouldn’t be permitted by sanitation inspectors.” The workers then delivered it to the Senate lounge.\footnote{Jane Norman, “More Cigarettes for Senators,” \textit{DMR}, Mar. 28, 1987 (A2:2).} As Hannon later described the episode: “We were outraged and talked to whomever [sic] would listen, but most just shrugged their shoulders. I so wanted to fill the slots with super glue or something, but didn’t.” Beverly Hannon and Lloyd-Jones “tried to block the damn thing from coming in. We got them not to put it in the lounge, because all the lobbyists would buy and smoke there. We lost that battle though. The cigarette machine ended up in the hall by the Secretary of State’s office, which is back of the Senate.”

On March 30, Hutchins ordered what had become the last cigarette machine in the Capitol to be moved into a hallway behind the Senate chambers. The majority leader tried justify its presence on the grounds that “some House members and senators that smoke thought that it was really kind of foolish not to have cigarettes available in the Capitol” because: “If they ran out, they’d have to run downtown.” Thus Hutchins rationalized retention of the machine as a means of avoiding public criticism of senators for exacerbating the energy crisis by “frequently” driving to buy cigarettes. The reason that the Register concluded that the “anti-smoking caucus of the Senate was mum” was later revealed by Hannon. That day she had circulated a petition requesting that “the cigarette vending machine be removed from the Senate Lounge and from the Senate,” which 17 other senators signed, “but some refused to sign for fear of retribution.” Hannon herself, who said she would be “happy” if she “could get half of the members to sign,” “never presented” the petition to Majority Leader Bill Hutchins, a smoker, because her Democratic colleague (and future Majority Leader) Michael Gronstal and others “advised cool it, it will only hurt me and not accomplish what I want.” More specifically, as she later recalled, Gronstal told her that “if you present this, you’d better be ready to run for Majority Leader” because leadership would regard it as “mutiny” against Hutchins, though “[t]he Republicans would love to have me do it.”41 Quickly deciding that she “was in enough trouble with leadership already,” she would “let someone else throw themselves on the sword as far as rules were concerned, I’d support whatever legislation we could get through instead.”42 Still, “it really ticked...off” Hannon, especially since there were “only 11 smokers of the 50 senators and many felt strongly against smoking in the senate area.”43

Hannon saw different personal leadership styles as in large part responsible for the different outcomes in the House and Senate: “[T]he house voted to make itself non-smoking, even though [House Speaker Don] Avenson was a smoker himself. That was the difference between him and Hutch[ins], he’d consider others, not just himself.”44

Soon after the legislature had adjourned for 1987, Hannon confided to a correspondent: “Some sessions and meetings are painful almost, they are so smoke-filled.” Referring as well to the successful efforts by some senators in 1986-87 to water down, if not kill, the clean indoor air act amendments, she indulged in this lament: “I tell you, this Senate is a place to behold. I get very discouraged at times. The smoking issue is quite typical of other issues also. I can’t understand how some obnoxious people have such inordinate power over a majority.”45

But despite these defeats, Hannon also managed to engineer at least one significant public health and symbolic victory in 1987 in the Human Resources Committee she chaired. As she described the incident in a letter to a constituent during the 1987 session:

[T]here are some real foes of any restrictions on smoking in the Senate, and they seem to account from 1995 (largely) of smoking battles in the Senate (the occasion for writing which she no longer recalled a dozen years later), Hannon observed that Gronstal had told her: “‘you’d better be prepared to become majority leader if you run that through, because Hutch[ins] will have your head for undercutting him.’” Untitled (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.

Beverly Hannon, [untitled notes] (Oct. 7, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (1), IWA.

Beverly Hannon, [untitled notes] (Feb. 22, 1997), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (1), IWA.

Beverly Hannon, [untitled notes] (Oct. 7, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (1), IWA.

Untitled (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.

Letter from Beverly Hannon to Dr. Wayne Witte (May 29, 1987), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

hold inordinate power. However, there are some hopeful signs. The most outspoken opponent, who killed the [clean indoor air amendments] bill on me last year, is Sen. Joe Coleman. He says he’ll have to be carried out of the chamber if we restrict smoking there. (We should be so lucky!) He serves on the Human Resources committee which I chair. We adopted no smoking during meetings rules. He didn’t attend the meeting when we adopted rules. First meeting after we came in, lit up and blew his cork when I reminded him of our rules. Wanted know whether I was going to call sargent [sic] at arms to have him removed. I said no, but we adopted the rules through a democratic process which he has always supported, and would appreciate it if he’d respect the wishes of the committee. He crushed his cigarette out with loud protest, but hasn’t smoked in my meeting since! How about that?

In 1987 the House, controlled by Democrats, extended the no-smoking areas to include visitors’ galleries and House members’ rest rooms. Democrat David Osterberg, a college economics professor, member of the American Friends Service Committee, and former Peace Corps volunteer, who proposed the rule change, supported by the Rules and Administration Committee, argued against smokers seeking to stymie additional restrictions: “I think we’re compelled by the health of colleagues to prohibit smoking in this chamber.” In contrast, Republican Kyle Hummel, outdoing his belligerence in 1985, irrelevantly asserted that it was “impossible to regulate every activity someone might consider offensive. ‘Maybe we should pass a law that everyone has to have his Right Guard on before coming in every morning so we don’t offend anybody,’ he said in defense of smokers’ rights.” Republican Mike Van Camp, an electrician and IBEW member from Davenport, tried to amend the rule by deleting the aforementioned two additional locations, but his amendment lost on a non-record vote. Then, on another non-record vote, the House adopted the amendment, offered by Osterberg and 11 others, to add “the west part of the lounge provided for telephone use.” Thus from 1987 to 1991, the House rule read: “Smoking shall not be permitted in the house committee rooms, the west part of the lounge provided for telephone use, or on the floor of the house, at the speaker’s station, in the press boxes, visitors’ galleries, or house members’ rest rooms.” For the first time, then, since the ascendancy of the cigarette, the House banned smoking in the chamber itself even while it was not in session.

House Resolution 2, at 23 (Rule 50) (filed Jan. 12, 1987).

Nonsmoking senatorial assaultees had not had their agency be drained from them by the repeated defeats inflicted by the autocratic leadership. In early December 1990, the Senate, “where smokers’ right prevail unfettered,” was on the brink of limiting smoking to designated areas. The Democratic Majority Leader, Bill Hutchins, “a smoker who has quit on several occasions and plans to do so again,” conceded that there was “considerable sentiment to do something about it this year.” The reason that “[t]he politics of a long-sought Senate smoking ban shifted” was not that the elections on November 6 had reduced the overall Democratic majority from 30-20 to 28-22, but that specifically Senator Coleman, who at 34 years held the Senate longevity record, had been defeated.

In 1986, Coleman, who “fervently fought any move to limit smoking,” had opposed a ban on smoking in public buildings and offices, “because I smoke, and I think other smokers should...too.... As a smoker, I’m getting tired of being the one who gets pushed around. I have rights too, you know.” Coleman, who had “smoked three packs of unfiltered cigarettes daily for almost 40 years,” had vociferously opposed all attempts to limit smoking. Lloyd-Jones, one of the Senate’s leading anti-smoking advocates, observed that “Joe was so adamant about it that people didn’t want to offend him”; consequently, his departure made regulation possible. By December Lloyd-Jones, who was part of the Democratic leadership, and Hutchins developed a proposal to limit smoking to benches along the chamber’s east and west sides; in addition, two lounges would be available for senatorial and staff smokers. Lloyd-Jones told the Register that the aforementioned cigarette vending machine—“the only still allowed to operate on state property”—over which Lloyd-Jones and Hannon had battled in 1987, would probably remain in the Senate as a part of a compromise with smokers. Coleman may have departed, but one of his fellow addicts, Republican Jack Rife, was having none of it: “I’m opposed to hard and fast rules’ limiting smoking.”

---

The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

But three days later, when the Senate Rules and Administration Committee met a few weeks before the opening of the newly elected General Assembly, “Senate leaders, half puffing on cigarettes, delayed action” on Hutchins and Lloyd-Jones’s proposal. The Senate’s smoking leaders appeared to have anticipated Philip Morris’s strategy of “aggressively maintaining and protecting the social and physical space in which adult smokers can enjoy our products” under the false banner of “accommodation” and “courtesy.” Critics said a discreet hint to smokers might be more appropriate.” Chief among them was Democrat Emil Husak, assistant majority leader, who, “while lighting his pipe, said: “I question why we need rules.... This is the Senate. I think you make suggestions.”” The resistance prompted Majority Leader Hutchins to agree to appoint a committee to draft another compromise limiting smoking.

By this time, observed the Des Moines Register in January 1991, the Senate had become “the renegade of state government, allowing smoking anywhere in violation of state law. Gov. Terry Branstad and the Iowa House long ago approved limits on the use of tobacco in the areas of the Statehouse under their control.” At the beginning of the new General Assembly in 1991, with Coleman

---

58 Rife, according to Hannon, “always attacked smoking regulations no matter who offered them, esp. when I did. He’d come up with some unlikely situation like a sale barn non-smoking area and ridicule non-smoking attempts. He viewed restrictions as taking away his rights, with no consideration of non-smokers’ right to breathe.” Untitled (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.

60 Without endorsing the claim that Coleman’s departure was a necessary, let alone a sufficient, condition of limiting smoking in the Senate, many years later Hannon stated that: “It undoubtedly helped that Coleman was no longer there.” Email from Beverly Hannon (Mar. 5, 2007).

64 Thomas Fogarty and Jonathan Roos, “Grim Legislature Faces Budget Deficit, War gone, the “anti-smoking coalition of clerks and legislators finally got the senators to designate a smoking area...” \textsuperscript{64} Lloyd-Jones, now the president pro tempore, as a Rules and Administration Committee member “helped lead the fight to establish smoking rules. She had sought a ban on smoking but settled for a compromise. Under the new policy, adopted unanimously by the rules committee last month [i.e., December 1990], smoking in the Senate Chamber is restricted to designated areas.” As a result, the Register reported, “[n]on-smokers in the Iowa Senate were breathing sighs of relief\textsuperscript{65}—exactly what else they would be breathing was as yet unknown. Even which areas had been so designated remained officially undisclosed. All the Legislative Handbook revealed, without any specification, was that: “The Senate policy restricts smoking to designated areas only,” adding just as obscurely that: “Copies of the policy are available from the Secretary of the Senate’s Office\textsuperscript{66}—a substantively and procedurally opaque mystery still being repeated by the Handbook in 1995.\textsuperscript{67}

This lack of transparency was rooted in the fact that the smoking rule was embodied not in the Senate Permanent Rules, but in the Access to Senate Chamber and Rules of Senate Decorum\textsuperscript{68}: whereas the full Senate votes on the

\footnotesize

\textsuperscript{64}Untitled, unaddressed (Apr. 17, 1995), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 27, Folder: Health-Smoking, IWA.

\textsuperscript{65}Thomas Fogarty and Jonathan Roos, “Grim Legislature Faces Budget Deficit, War Fears,” DMR, Jan. 15, 1991 (A1) (NewsBank). Unfortunately: “There are no minutes whatsoever for the senate rules committee for 1990-1991 in the archives. Seeing as other records of minutes for the senate rules committee have been sent prior and after that date, I can say that there would be little chance that anyone else would have the records. The agency that transfers/sends over the minutes of the senate rules committee is very good and prompt about getting documents out of their office and into the archives. There is a small chance that when the other records for 1990-1991 were being sent to the archives...somebody could have taken them or that they just happened to be misplaced.” Email from Meaghan McCarthy, Assistant State Archivist, SHSI, DM (Feb. 22, 2007).

\textsuperscript{66}Legislative Service Bureau, Legislative Handbook: Iowa General Assembly 30 (n.d. [1991]).

\textsuperscript{67}Legislative Service Bureau, Legislative Handbook: Iowa General Assembly 21 (n.d. [1995]) (“Copies of the Senate policy may be obtained from the Secretary of the Senate’s Office”). As late as 2007 Cynthia Clingan, the long-time assistant secretary of that office, stated that before there was a website such rules were distributed only to senators since no one else had a need for them. Telephone interview (Feb. 19, 2007). Since other people, for example the public in the gallery, visited the Senate, that justification carried little weight.

\textsuperscript{68}The bare policy was presumably embodied in the Access to Senate Chamber and Rules of Senate Decorum as it was from 1997 forward (see below). The Iowa State former, the Senate Rules and Administration Committee, which the Majority Leader chairs, unilaterally determines the latter. The system, according to Senator Michael Connolly, arguably the chamber’s most militant anti-smoker, “was structured that way so the leadership could control the smoking rules. The majority leader at that time [Bill Hutchins] supported smoking in the Senate which had been a long held tradition.”

Shortly after losing her seat to Rife, Beverly Hannon, who had fought so persistently for a smoke-free Senate, noted that it had taken “7 years to get the smokers to just smoke in the corners. Bill Hutchins and Jack Rife were two of the major opponents to [sic] smoking restrictions.” Interestingly, when redistricting pitted Rife, the Republican minority leader and “the main block of [sic] getting stricter public smoking laws” against Hannon, for the same Senate seat in 1992 in what at the time was the most expensive legislative election campaign in Iowa history (Hannon and Rife receiving about $45,000 and $64,000, respectively), the cigarette industry could plausibly have been expected to contribute heavily to insure the reelection of their advocate and the defeat of their enemy. Nevertheless, RJR-PAC and Philip Morris-PAC gave him only $200 and $100, respectively, in addition to $200 contributed by the Tobacco Institute’s lobbyist, Charles Wasker. Moreover, RJR-PAC and Philip Morris-PAC also contributed $500 and $100, respectively, in 1990.

Many years later, Hannon clearly recalled that the designated smoking areas in 1991 were the Senate lounge/coat-rack/telephone room, the coffee room/visitor

---

Archives has no copies of this separate body of Senate rules. Although it is unclear when the Senate began issuing such rules, the version that the Senate Rules and Administration Committee adopted on Jan. 21, 1988 and that is filed directly after Senate Resolution 1 (embodying the permanent rules) in the bill book at the University of Iowa Law Library includes no rule on smoking.

69 Email from Mike Connolly to Marc Linder (Apr. 24, 2008). In a version obscuring the substance of the disputed rule, a lawyer in the Senate Secretary’s office, who had worked in the Senate since 1974, insisted that the reason for this informality and the reason that the Rules and Administration Committee was entrusted with making the rule on behalf of the whole Senate was to avoid an interminable amendatory process. Telephone interview with Cindy, Jan. 2007.

70 Untitled note (Feb. 17, 1993), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 14, Folder: Legislative Service: Notes and Recollections (2), IWA.

71 [Beverly Hannon] to Phil Brammer (Mar. 24, 1993) (quote), and Beverly Hannon, [untitled note] (Feb. 27, 1997), in Beverly Hannon Papers, Box 8, Folder: Campaign, 1992: Rife, Jack (Opponent) General, IWA. This folder also contains a listing of Rife’s campaign contributions, which in the meantime have been unlawfully destroyed by the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board.
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

area, the interior perimeter of the Senate chamber, and the press boxes. The concentrated smoke from the interior perimeter so inundated the chamber that the air quality improved very little and the non-smoking senators and staff at their desks in the Senate chamber in fact benefited very little from the new rule. As Hannon’s tenure came to an end in 1992, the Register archly noted that Senators could go “do nicotine” in the corners of the chamber, the back corridors, and a nap room. The 1991 Senate Journal left no trace of the debate that had produced that body’s first regulation of smoking in 64 years. The only hint that smoking had even been discussed in committee emerged from a floor amendment to Senate Resolution 1 embodying the permanent rules by Democrat Michael Gronstal of Council Bluffs, a former assistant majority leader and future majority leader. On January 14 he offered and withdrew an amendment to the rule governing the powers of the Committee on Rules and Administration providing that it “shall not adopt an administrative policy on smoking in the chamber which unfairly discriminates against staff members who are required as a condition of their employment to occasionally work in the chamber.” This abortive amendment was designed not to protect staff members from exposure to secondhand smoke, but to permit them to smoke—just as Gronstal six years later thoughtfully...
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

fought to give parity to legislators’ secretaries with regard to having soft drink cans in the chamber.\footnote{See below.}

The reason that the Senate delegated resolution of the smoking issue to the Rules and Administration Committee may well have been that the leaderships of both parties were members and could therefore authoritatively resolve the matter.\footnote{In 1990 the six-member committee included the Democratic Majority Leader Hutchins, Assistant Majority Leader Lloyd-Jones, Republican Minority Leader Calvin Hultman (who became a Philip Morris lobbyist), and Assistant Minority Leader John Jensen. Iowa Official Register: 1989-1990, at 32. Unfortunately, by the time she was interviewed in 2007, Lloyd-Jones could not recall the committee meeting at which the compromise was reached. Telephone interview with Jean Lloyd-Jones, Iowa City (Feb. 24, 2007). Beginning in 1991 the Senate Rules required that the majority leader chair the Rules and Administration Committee. Sen. Res. 1, Rule 36 (1991). In 1991 Hutchins remained majority leader and chairman of the Rules Committee; the Republican minority leader and ranking committee member, Jack Rife, was also a smoker, who “resented the anti-smoking effort.” Iowa Official Register: 1991-1992, at 32; Phoebe Howard, “Sparks Fly As Debate Begins on Smoking in Senate Chamber,” DMR, Jan. 14, 1993 (4) (quote). According to Lloyd-Jones, since each party caucuses after the election and elects leadership, it is “entirely possible that it was the new [1991] committee that approved the rule [in December 1990].” Email from Jean Lloyd-Jones (Feb. 25, 2007).}

The fact that the committee reached a compromise that ceded very little to the anti-smoking camp may have been linked to the fact that Majority Leader Hutchins smoked and later became a cigarette company lobbyist in the Iowa legislature.\footnote{For example, in 1997 Hutchins lobbied for R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., while former Republican Majority Leader Calvin Hultman lobbied for Philip Morris USA. “Lobbyists Earn Big Bucks Influencing Others,” DMR, Aug. 3, 1997 (4). According to ex-Senator Hannon, former majority leaders can exercise special clout as lobbyists because they know so many secrets about so many legislators, though she was not intimating that they engage in blackmail. Telephone interview with Beverly Hannon (Feb. 28, 2007).}

Tamara Barrett’s Single-Handed Extra-Parliamentary Struggle for the “total emancipation” of the Capitol from Tobacco Smoke: 1992-93

In order to understand the battle over smoking in the legislature itself during the early 1990s\footnote{No internal tobacco industry documents were found suggesting that that the Tobacco Institute or individual firms ever became involved in struggles over smoking in the Iowa legislature or Capitol itself. In neighboring Minnesota, in contrast, the Tobacco Institute} it is necessary to incorporate the extra-parliamentary struggle in 1989 did discuss the possibility of rolling back, within the Comprehensive Public Smoking Program, a 1988 statute that had been interpreted by the stateEmployee Relations Commissioner to ban smoking in open areas of the state capitol. Because, according to TI’s Midwest regional head, Michael Brozek, private offices were exempt, and consequently “many legislators and capitol staff [were] upset by the privilege this afforded selective senior staff,” TI’s Minnesota lobbyists opined that the controversy generated by the action of Representative Phyllis Kahn (the chief advocate of the state’s breakthrough anti-smoking law in 1975) of “slipp[ing] smoking restriction language into a ‘catch-all’ bill during a Conference Committee in the closing days of the 1988 legislative session” could reduce her credibility in seeking to expand the applicability of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act to private workplaces. Michael Brozek to Paul Emrick, Re: Smoking Restrictions—Minnesota Government Buildings (Jan. 11, 1989), Bates No. TI00261037-40. Legislators’ offices, as Brozek knew, were not per se exempt, but (if at all) only by virtue of being ventilated sufficiently to meet the new law’s minimal requirements; the members’ “retiring rooms” were literally covered by the law, but because the legislature could overrule the commissioner, who as a practical matter would have been very loath to try to enforce the law against legislators, those rooms—as Kahn herself acknowledged—would remain available for smoking. Michael Brozek to Paul Emrick, Re: Smoking Restrictions—Minnesota State Buildings (Nov. 11, 1988), Bates No. TI28760163/4; Robert Whereatt, “Smoke-Filled Rooms at Capitol May Be a Thing of the Past,” Minneapolis Star-Tribune, Dec. 28, 1988 (1B), Bates No. TI00261042; “MinnesotaLegislator Disputes State Restrictions on Smoking,” Rapid City Journal, Jan. 8, 1989 (C5), Bates No. TI28760585; 1988 Minn Laws ch. 613, § 9, at 726, 730, Bates No. TI28760166 (on tobaccodocuments.org).
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

3031

that an Iowa Supreme Court secretary was, largely single-handedly, conducting to ban smoking at her workplace. In February 1992, Tamara Barrett self-ironically asked her state representative and senator: “What constituent do you know who has more questions and desires more action than myself?” She worked in the basement, where, although smoking was prohibited in individual offices, there was “literally a curtain of blue smoke hanging in the ‘stagnant air’ of the hallway. Stressing that she was “not asking for the moon,” she pointed out that if huge places like McDonnell-Douglas in St. Louis, the Mayo Clinic, and even the telephone company in Des Moines could ban smoking, surely they could get it out of the statehouse basement. Four months later, Barrett informed a state General Services official that another year had gone by with nothing having been done about smoking in state office buildings. Trying her hand at statutory interpretation and public policy analysis, she observed:

82Letter from [Tamara Barrett] to Representative Wayne McKinney, Jr. and Senator James Riordan (Feb. 13, 1992) (copy furnished by Tamara Barrett) (the letter lacks a sender’s name).
As one of the largest employers, if not the largest, the state has an obligation to keep its workers healthy by eliminating health hazards. It makes for a confused public when they are told that there is no smoking in public places (all state office buildings are public places) and then walk into one and see “Yes Smoking” signs everywhere you look. The state should have been the first, not last, employer to have a total ban on smoking on all state property.

It just makes me sick when I see all these school children who have come to tour this building sitting out here trying to eat their sack lunches with billows of blue smoke all around them. Why not just seat them in front of a car’s exhaust pipe? ... I have let teachers know at our school that visiting the capitol can be hazardous to their classes’ health.... I don’t recommend anyone coming here for a visit, especially when the legislature is here.\(^{83}\)

Having exhausted other avenues of recourse, in November Barrett circulated a petition among employees in the state capitol building and sent it to Governor Branstad together with a cover letter. Calling attention to “[t]he smoking crisis” in the Capitol, the 33 petitioners complained that after all the other state office buildings had been “emancipated,” smoke in the Capitol had tripled, as smokers from those places came to the Capitol for smoking breaks. They also bemoaned that “ground floor employees have to virtually hibernate during the winter because it is physically not safe to breath[e] the air during the legislative session.” Requesting that the governor “free us from the oppression of smoking,” Barrett and her comrades advised him that the only solution to this kind of health threat was “total emancipation.”\(^{84}\) Barrett’s accompanying letter explained that General Services had been giving her the runaround for the better part of two years, claiming that the legislature had barred it from banning smoking in the Capitol. She also informed Branstad that many people, especially in management and legislative offices, had failed to sign because they feared consequences.\(^{85}\) After the petition had landed on his desk for his signature as one more Capitol employee, the governor called Barrett.\(^{86}\)

The petition sparked Branstad’s announcement at the end of November that \(^{83}\)Letter from Tammie J. Barrett to Tim Ryburn (June 22, 1992) (copy furnished by Tamara Barrett).

\(^{84}\)Petition for the Prohibition of Smoking on Capitol Grounds (no date [Nov. 12, 1992]) (copy furnished by Tamara Barrett). Of the entire Supreme Court staff only three people smoked. Letter from Tammie J. Barrett to Tim Ryburn (June 22, 1992) (copy furnished by Tamara Barrett).

\(^{85}\)Letter from Tammie J. Barrett to Terry E. Branstad (Nov. 12, 1992) (copy furnished by Tamara Barrett).

\(^{86}\)Telephone interview with Tamara Barrett, Des Moines (Apr. 2, 2007).
he wanted to secure the agreement of legislative leaders and Iowa Supreme Court officers to make the Capitol smoke-free, a goal that had become more urgent since the ban on smoking in all other Capitol complex buildings had prompted smokers from them to gravitate to the poorly ventilated Capitol basement cafeteria to work, from which smoke drifted to Supreme Court offices. The rotunda, too, “serves as a chimney, quickly spreading second-hand smoke throughout the building” into nosmoking offices. Whereas in the past legislative leaders had opposed a smoke-free building on the grounds that many members “need to feed their addiction in order to function,” the governor’s spokesman, Richard Vohs, waxed optimistic over changes in leadership. Especially the replacement as Senate majority leader of Hutchins (“who was forever trying to quit smoking but could never get the job done, particularly in the stressful closing weeks of the session”) by nonsmoking Wally Horn, whose office bore a “please do not smoke” sign, was taken as a hopeful sign. Horn himself offered a glimpse of the regressive role he would play during the 1993-94 session when he understatedly observed that he was “not certain he wants to make the building a smoke-free area. ‘I’ve tried to be tolerant...but I’m not hard-core about it.’”

Taking an unconventional public health position, he allowed as “more restrictions might be the solution, particularly to protect the antiques in the building,” but even on this weak proposal he would require consensus. George Wilson, the pipe-smoking doyen of Iowa tobacco lobbyists, showed even less understanding of the purpose of Branstad’s cigarette tax increases in defending smokers’ “‘rights’” by alleging that it was “‘a little incongruous to balance the budget’ with them and “then tell people they don’t want them to smoke.’”

Three days later the Register editorialized that it was hard to believe that smoking was still permitted in the Capitol. On December 23, Branstad—whose re-election as far back as 1986 against Lowell Junkins, former Democratic Senate majority leader and future tobacco industry lobbyist, the Tobacco Institute did not consider “good news for the tobacco industry due to the influence of Mrs. Branstad in her very vocal anti-smoking campaign”—announced that, in 87 David Yepsen, “Smoke-Free Statehouse Considered,” DMR, Nov. 26, 1992, Bates No. T128922943. The article also contained similarly misplaced predictions about the positive consequences flowing from replacement of smoking Senate President Michael Gronstal by nonsmoking Leonard Boswell and smoking House Speaker Bob Arnould by nonsmoking Harold Van Maanen.

---

89 Michael Brozek to George Minshew, Memorandum: Monthly Summary - October, 1986, Regions IV and V (Nov. 13, 1986), Bates No. T122492737. Although the Tobacco Institute’s Iowa lobbyist, Charles Wasker, was “strongly identified with the Republican response to the employees’ requests, smoking would be banned on the first two floors beginning January 1, but that the third floor would remain unaffected because he could not persuade legislative leaders to agree to a ban in the areas they controlled. Barrett, whom Branstad publicly credited with having mobilized her co-workers to oppose smoking, praised the action, but regretted the failure to ban it throughout the building because “the lobbyists will just think it’s OK to smoke around here, too....” Familiar enough with law to know that a piece of paper was worth little without enforcement, on the eve of the new ban Barrett met with the Commissioner of Public Safety and summarized their conversation in a letter the same day. Taking as her point of departure the notion that “[e]mpathy does not get us what we have fought the better part of three years to attain,” she nevertheless emphasized that the anti-smokers did not expect the capitol police to “spend months on end writing citations,” but “merely...a week of policy enforcement to make it known that this is not a frivolous edict.” Finally, as the new legislature convened in January 1993, Barrett sent a letter to all its members, urging them to eliminate smoking in the rest of the Capitol. She drew their attention to the thousands of visiting school children who were forced to walk the halls “in a haze of smoke,” thus exposed to the message that “smoking is a drug that you don’t have to say no to—if my legislator allows it in our capitol, it must be okay.”

Representatives Philip Brammer and Rod Halvorson Finally Clear the Tobacco Haze in the Capitol Rotunda Despite the Opposition of Democratic Majority Leader Wall Horn and Republican Minority Leader Jack Rife: 1993

Cigarette smokers in the Iowa Senate have taken the offensive against those who would Party,” since he was, “ironically...very close to” Junkins, if the latter had been elected governor, the Institute’s “legislative profile” would have been “complimented [sic] by the retention of Mr. Wasker’s firm.” [Michael Brozek], Iowa Charles F. Wasker Background (June 30, 1986), Bates No. T122431036, on tobaccodocuments.org.

Letter from Tammie J. Barrett to Paul H. Wieck II (Dec. 30, 1992) (copy furnished by Tamara Barrett).

restrict public smoking.\textsuperscript{93}

Legislators at the 1993 session were focused on a ban on public smoking, but initially from a personal perspective. As the \textit{Des Moines Register} formulated the exceptional situation: “Many Iowans who smoke in recent years have been evicted from the workplace—unless they are state senators.” Leading the effort to protect senators from secondhand smoke exposure was Democrat Mike Connolly, an ex-smoker\textsuperscript{94} and long-time high school teacher in Dubuque.\textsuperscript{95} Sparking the session’s “first hot debate,” he declared: “‘Smokers’ rights end where non-smokers’ rights begin. We have a right to clean air.’”\textsuperscript{96} Connolly’s objective was to change the Senate rules to prohibit smoking in the chamber and all areas controlled by the Senate—which his party controlled 27 to 23\textsuperscript{97}—so that the ban on smoking that covered the House chamber and the ground and first floors of the Capitol would extend to the second-floor rotunda and a few rooms.\textsuperscript{98} Supported by the recent publication of an Environmental Protection Agency report on the health effects of passive smoking,\textsuperscript{99} Connolly predicted that many state legislatures would be banning smoking in all public places: “‘This is just the beginning.’” By refusing to intervene, the state “could expose itself to liability....” Connolly’s opponents adamantly rejected further restrictions. Republican Minority Leader Jack Rife, a farmer, resented forcing smokers onto the sidewalks in the winter and “subject[ing] them to pneumonia” as “‘callous, inhumane and certainly in violation of individual rights.’”\textsuperscript{100} One Iowa weekly, reporting that \begin{footnotes}

\footnote{\textsuperscript{93}“Senate Rejects Anti-Smoking Effort,” AP (Apr. 6, 1994), in Philip Morris Companies, Inc., Corporate Affairs, Apr. 13, 1994, at 47, Bates No. 2041128299/345.}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{94}Phoebe Howard, “Sparks Fly As Debate Begins on Smoking in Senate Chamber,” \textit{DMR}, Jan. 14, 1993 (4) (NewsBank).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{95}Iowa Official Register 1993-1994, at 39 (Vol. 65).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{96}Phoebe Howard, “Sparks Fly As Debate Begins on Smoking in Senate Chamber,” \textit{DMR}, Jan. 14, 1993 (4) (NewsBank).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{97}“Members of Iowa General Assemblies 1981-2002,” at iv, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Pubinfo/Library/Members19812002.pdf}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{98}Phoebe Howard, “Sparks Fly As Debate Begins on Smoking in Senate Chamber,” \textit{DMR}, Jan. 14, 1993 (4) (NewsBank).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{100}Phoebe Howard, “Sparks Fly As Debate Begins on Smoking in Senate Chamber,” \textit{DMR}, Jan. 14, 1993 (4) (NewsBank). In fact, whereas “evidence is sufficient to infer a causal relationship between smoking and...pneumonia,” exposure to cold weather is not known to be a cause. U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, \textit{The Health Consequences of Smoking: A Report of the Surgeon General} 5, 432 (2004).}
\end{footnotes}
Rife had even suggested that a basement room for nursing mothers be turned into a smoking lounge, wondered whether Rife preferred that they stand outside in the cold. 101 For Rife’s smoking colleague, Democrat Tony Bisignano 102—who knew that no compromise was possible with some people who would not be satisfied until tobacco was banned 103—nicotine addiction was “the bottom line” because a ban would make smokers “distracted and irritable”: so long as selling cigarettes was legal in Iowa, “people need a place to use them.” 104

In the House, too, anti-smoking advocates were pushing to expand the smoke-free legislative zones. By far the most zealous activist was Democrat Philip Brammer from Cedar Rapids, an ex-smoker suffering from chronic lung disease 105 and severe asthma, who had to use an inhaler to open his clogged lungs twice or three times as often in the Capitol as elsewhere. 106 His special target was the rotunda, which the Senate jointly controlled.

Although the legislature ultimately failed to enact any of the Tobacco Free Coalition’s measures for the rest of Iowa, 107 the narrowly Republican-controlled House (51 to 49) 108 took a decisive self-regarding step when, on January 25, 1993, the Rules Committee proposed a resolution amending the rule to prohibit smoking “in the house or in any area of the capitol building controlled by the house.” 109 During the debate on the Rules Committee Resolution on February 10, Democrat Rod Halvorson offered an amendment to broaden the no-smoking zone by adding “or controlled jointly by the house and senate,” 110 which the House adopted on a Republican Stewart Iverson, a smoker who later as Senate majority leader and chairman of the Senate Rules and Administration Committee conferred on himself a unique exemption so that he could smoke in his office, offered an amendment to create an exception “for members and employees of the house and their guests in the area behind the chamber at the top of the stairway leading to the first floor,” but it lost. Consequently, from 1993 to 2008 the House rule read: “Smoking shall not be permitted in the house or in any area of the capitol building controlled by the house or controlled jointly by the house and senate.”

But the problem of smoking in jointly controlled areas persisted because the Senate had not agreed to the ban in the rotunda, “one of the last refuges of smokers in the building,” thus, making it, according to opponents, unenforceable. Other House members were devising other legislative strategies to incorporate the rotunda into the smoke-free zone.

On January 26, the day after the Rules Committee resolution had been filed, Democrat Ed Fallon of Des Moines, one of the most leftwing members of the state legislature, filed a bill to amend the clean indoor air law to prohibit smoking at the Capitol complex and impose a $25 civil penalty for each 112Numerous people who personally experienced being in Iverson’s office while he was smoking confirmed this fact.

---

114Legislative Handbook: Iowa General Assembly 21 (1995); House Resolution No. 5, Rule 50, Proof: State of Iowa: House Journal 178-204 (Jan. 25, 2007), http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=billinfo&Service=Billbook&frame=1&GA=82&hbill=HR5 (visited Feb. 13, 2007). When asked how the House could impose a rule on the Senate, John Patchett replied: “I don’t think either house could impose its own rule on the other house in jointly controlled areas—however, that wouldn’t necessarily stop them from passing the rule or trying—unless the resolution was adopted by both houses. This would be more a matter of courtesy and deference. Jointly controlled areas would be ‘joint’ committee rooms that either chamber could utilize on a regular basis—plus the areas of the Legislative Research Bureau and Legislative Fiscal Bureau, and probably the rotunda area on the second floor where the chambers are located. There is only one cafeteria (dining room) in the Capitol—on the lower floor—open to everyone.” Email from John Patchett to Marc Linder (Feb. 18, 2007).

violation.\textsuperscript{117} It died in the State Government Committee to which it had been referred.\textsuperscript{118} During the debate at the beginning of March on House Concurrent Resolution 16 embodying the Joint Senate-House Rules, Democrats David Schrader, who had owned a cigarette vending machine business,\textsuperscript{119} and veteran anti-smoking militant Halvorson filed a floor amendment inserting a new rule: “Smoking shall not be permitted in any areas of the capitol building controlled jointly by the senate and the house. However, one house may designate smoking areas within areas of the capitol building controlled exclusively by that house.” After the House on a non-record roll call defeated by a vote of 33 to 54 the floor amendment filed by Democrats Dennis Renaud,\textsuperscript{120} who was in the barber business,\textsuperscript{121} and Daniel Fogarty, a livestock farmer,\textsuperscript{122} substituting the much narrower language “both houses shall” for “one house may,”\textsuperscript{123} the House adopted the new rule,\textsuperscript{124} which, however, died in the Senate.\textsuperscript{125}

On March 16, 1993, against the background of what he described as the mounting evidence that secondhand tobacco smoke exposure was inconsistent with employees’ right to a healthful work environment, Governor Branstad declared that, effective April 26, smoking would be prohibited in all Capitol complex buildings (thus eliminating designated smoking areas) except those parts of the Statehouse controlled by the legislature. The same day, Halvorson, who had been battling smoking in the House since the 1970s, announced that he had requested an attorney general’s opinion on whether smoking in the Capitol rotunda violated the state clean indoor air law,\textsuperscript{126} which limited smoking in public

\textsuperscript{117}H.F. No. 63 (Jan. 26, 1993) (By Fallon); State of Iowa: 1993: Journal of the House: 1993 Regular Session Seventy-Fifth General Assembly 99 (Jan. 26)
\textsuperscript{119}See above ch. 28.
\textsuperscript{120}State of Iowa: 1993: Journal of the House: 1993 Regular Session Seventy-Fifth General Assembly 462 (Mar. 2).
\textsuperscript{121}Iowa Official Register: 1993-1994, at 87 (n.d.).
\textsuperscript{122}Iowa Official Register: 1993-1994, at 69 (n.d.).
places to areas that had been so designated by those having custody or control of them, since there was apparently no such designation. House Majority Leader Brent Siegrist objectively put additional pressure on the Senate to agree to ban smoking in the rotunda by pointing out that the governor’s action had “the potential for turning the rotunda into a smoking lounge.”

The next day, Brammer, who was developing a far-flung anti-smoking agenda, filed a House Concurrent Resolution proposing that: “Smoking shall not be permitted in any areas of the capitol building jointly controlled by the Senate and the House of Representatives, including the rotunda and the legislative dining rooms.” The Rules Committee to which it was referred took no action on it.

Stymied but not resigned, Brammer, whose emphysema and asthma had at times “left him unconscious and fearing death,” announced a week later that he could not stand the smoke any longer and would file suit to prohibit smoking in the rotunda. Although Governor Terry Branstad pushed for making state buildings under his control smoke-free, he took the position that the rotunda was under the legislature’s control. The declaratory judgment action that Brammer planned to file would name the governor, the Democratic and Republican party leaders, the Department of General Services, and the Legislative Council as parties, in order to secure a judicial decision as to who had management responsibility of the rotunda. While admitting that it was “‘absurd it has to go this far,’” Brammer, whose need to take oxygen was exacerbated by smoking in the statehouse, blamed the Senate, which “‘holds up anything that has to do with smoking.’” In turn, Rife, the heavy smoking Senate minority leader, accused Democratic House minority members of “‘just trying to make a name for themselves. That’s all this is—an attempt to get a little press.’” Brammer, who in 1997, the year after he had left the legislature, became the named plaintiff in a class action against the cigarette companies, and died of emphysema at the age of 67 in 1999, knew whereof he spoke when he charged Rife with having “‘a bad habit of making offensive remarks about life-and-death matters.’”

---

130 House Concurrent Resolution No. 22 (Mar. 17, 1993).
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

Two days after his announcement but before he had even filed the declaratory action, Brammer devised a new vehicle for his crusade: on March 25 he filed an amendment to the Human Services appropriations bill titled: “Clean Air Act—Application to Capitol Building.” It provided that: “The capitol building shall be considered a public place pursuant to section 142B.1 and the rotunda area between the chambers of the house of representatives and the senate shall not be designated a smoking area pursuant to section 142B.2. A person who violates the provisions of this section is subject to the penalty provisions of section 142B.6.” The House, a majority of which had already demonstrated its support for this ban, adopted it immediately and passed the bill.

The next day, Brammer and Halvorson announced that Iowa Deputy Attorney General Elizabeth Osenbaugh had issued an opinion stating that “the rotunda is a place used by the general public and therefore subject to the smoking law,” which restricts smoking in public places to areas that have been designated for smoking. The opinion assumed that the rotunda (and the legislative dining room) were not under the exclusive control of either house and were not used for legislative offices, committees, or deliberations, and that the rotunda was open to the general public. Backtracking from the full interpretive breadth of her aforementioned 1989 advice letter to Senator Hannon, the AG’s office confessed that “it would be error to extend this rationale to all areas subject to legislative control, as was suggested in the 1989 letter.” Osenbaugh concluded that applying the smoking rule to the rotunda “would not infringe upon the authority of each house to determine its rules or procedures as legislative proceedings do not occur in the rotunda.” To be sure, she then added that the applicability of the law also meant that the person or entity that had control of the rotunda as a public place was empowered to designate a smoking area, and that “[u]ntil there is a direct conflict between action of either house and chapter 142B, there is no constitutional conflict.” Osenbaugh closed by declaring that “the Legislative Council should decide whether to designate the rotunda or the legislative dining room as a smoking area. If no designation is made, chapter 142B would prohibit smoking in those areas. 137

The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

Relying on the attorney general opinion, Brammer and Halvorson contended that unless the Legislative Council—which consists of the legislative leadership and of legislators selected by them and is empowered to assign uses of the areas in the capitol138—designated the rotunda a smoking area, smoking there violated the law. To ratchet up the level of pressure, Halvorson also requested that the Iowa Department of General Services begin enforcing the clean indoor air law in the rotunda the following week. 139

Brammer and Halvorson soon learned the perils of gaining an interpretive victory based on a substantively weak statute—unless their tactic was to manipulate an unwary Senate majority leader into making an autocratically unpopular decision. Three days later, taking his cue from Osenbaugh, Brammer, and Halvorson, the non-smoking Democratic Senate majority leader, Wally Horn, the chairman of the Legislative Council, promptly designated the rotunda a smoking area until the Council—which normally does not meet while the legislature is in session—took up the issue, but declined to reveal when he would call a meeting. Horn’s announcement provoked objections from Democratic House Minority Leader Bob Arnould, who accused Horn of abusing his authority as chairman, and Republican House Speaker Harold Van Maanen, who questioned his authority. Horn, while arguing that the legislature was not bound by an attorney general opinion, nevertheless asserted that he wanted to settle the 137 Iowa Atty Gen. Op. #93-3-3(L) (Mar. 26, 1993). Osenbaugh characterized the law’s applicability to the dining room as “a closer question,” but opined that the application of the law “would not abridge each house’s control of the legislative process...” While conceding that “a court would likely defer to a legislative decision governing its own dining room,” she insisted that the law could constitutionally be applied in the absence of a contrary legislative rule. Id. Since § 142B.2(3) prohibited designating any public place except a bar “as a smoking area in its entirety,” it is unclear what statutory basis underlay Osenbaugh’s argument that the Council was authorized to “designate the rotunda or the legislative dining room as a smoking area” (emphasis added). After all, even though the legislature exempted “factories, warehouses, and similar places of work not frequented by the general public” from the ban on smoking in a public place or public meeting “except in a designated smoking area,” it nevertheless provided “that an employee cafeteria in such a place of work shall have a designated nonsmoking area.” § 142B.2(1).

dispute.\textsuperscript{140}

The next day the \textit{Register}, disgusted that “[c]igarette smokers who gather in the heart of Iowa’s most important structure can continue to foul up the place, by virtue of a ruling from Wally Horn, a non-smoking glutton for punishment,” predicted that: “In time, the non-smokers are going to toss cigarettes out of the Statehouse for good. Smokers may go next if they keep fighting the trend.”\textsuperscript{141} It then proceeded to impart a lesson to Senate Minority Leader Rife, a smoker whose limited capacity to imagine the present as history caused him to dub Horn’s decision “fair”\textsuperscript{142}:

Jack Rife...backs Horn’s rule. “The idea of putting someone out on the street (because they smoke) is ridiculous, he said.”
No, it isn’t
“Some space has to be available to people who choose to smoke,” he said. “All the air can’t be a non-smoker’s air.”
Yes it can and yes it should, in a taxpayer-owned building.
...
Surely, if there is any place that should be off-limits to the polluters, it should be the most conspicuous and popular place at the seat of government. But to accommodate the 26 percent of Americans who smoke, Senator Horn wants to foul the air of all who gather there.

What disrespect for public health. What a poor example for youngsters who visit their Capitol to watch their elected lawmakers in action. What a rotten misuse of power for no better apparent purpose than to show rivals who’s in charge.\textsuperscript{143}

For good measure Halvorson wondered who had made Horn “king of the dome.”\textsuperscript{144}

On the same day, March 31, Brammer filed his lawsuit in Polk County District Court, charging that Horn had acted as a “dictator” in designating the rotunda a smoking place without authority, and requesting that the court compel Governor Branstad as well as the Public Safety Commissioner (who is in charge of the Capitol police) and the director of the Department of General Services (which is in charge of maintaining public buildings) to comply with the \textsuperscript{144}“Statehouse Notes,” \textit{DMR}, Mar. 31, 1993 (4) (Newsbank).

The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

Jonathan Roos, “Legislator Loses Smoking Suit,” DMR, Apr. 4, 1993 (5) (NewsBank). It is unclear under what authority violators could have been arrested since the penalty section of the smoking prohibition law provided only for civil fines. Iowa Code § 142B.6 (1993).

Jonathan Roos, “Legislator Loses Smoking Suit,” DMR, Apr. 4, 1993 (5) (NewsBank). It is unclear under what authority violators could have been arrested since the penalty section of the smoking prohibition law provided only for civil fines. Iowa Code § 142B.6 (1993).

The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

aforementioned attorney general’s opinion and prohibit smoking in the rotunda, Brammer complained that the officials’ refusal to ban smoking endangered the public’s, in particular legislators’ and lobbyists’, health. Brammer’s lawyer announced that the same day he would request a temporary restraining order to stop smoking in the rotunda.

Already the next day, April 1, District Judge Arthur Gamble held a two-hour evidentiary hearing at which Brammer testified that he avoided the rotunda “like the plague whenever possible” because breathing secondhand smoke aggravated his lung ailments. Indeed, if the situation continued to worsen, Brammer declared, he would be forced to resign his seat in the legislature. His colleague Halvorson added that lobbyists who spend much of their time in the rotunda had told him that the smoke build-up was making them sick: “It not only stinks, it’s irritating to breathe the smoke....” Ironically, Deputy Attorney General Osenbaugh, who had issued the opinion that formed the legal basis of Brammer’s complaint, appeared in court to represent the governor and the other state defendants, whom she described as “‘bystanders’” to a House-Senate dispute over which the court lacked jurisdiction.

On the day of the hearing both Branstad and Horn weighed in outside of the proceedings. The governor argued that Brammer’s suit took “‘the wrong approach. It should be worked out in normal legislative channels.’” Horn offered reporters a glimpse into the nature of those channels by asserting—in tune with Rife—that Brammer and Halvorson’s ability “‘to make headlines every day’” over a “tempest in a teapot” was “‘kind of disgusting.... They’ve finally found something that gets them on the front page, and a lot of people out there in the state think that all we’re doing is spending hours and hours discussing smoking.’”

The following day, April 2, Judge Gamble dismissed Brammer’s suit, ruling that the question of smoking in the rotunda was an internal legislative matter over which the court had no jurisdiction. Brammer, who was assessed court costs, immediately announced that his only other recourse during the legislative session was an action under the Americans with Disabilities Act, which he planned to file the following week.150
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

Brammer did, however, achieve a victory on April 8, when the full Senate, by a non-roll call vote of 32 to 15, rejected a “pro-smoking amendment”151 that would have struck Brammer’s amendment to the Human Services appropriations bill.152 In spite of Minority Leader Rife’s complaint that “‘[t]he bottom line is individual rights’” and that “‘I am entitled to some space in this Capitol’”—to which non-smoking Democrat William Dieleman responded by noting that Rife’s rights ended where he began violating someone else’s153—the bill became law154 and on July 1, 1993, the legal contest over the toxic and carcinogenic air pollution in the rotunda finally came to an end.155 The Tobacco Institute’s acknowledgment of this defeat did not come until the day after adjournment in a communication from a Region IV office employee, who was “tracking...the Iowa Capitol and other government buildings as a local issue,” to the State Activities director of legislative information conveying “the jist [sic] of the whole thing” from Wasker’s office—namely, “that the Capitol of Iowa and state office buildings are 151“Senate Agrees with House Bill, Moves to Ban Smoking in Rotunda,” DMR, Apr. 9, 1993 (4) (NewsBank).

1541993 Iowa Laws ch. 172, § 54, at 414, 438.
155“Statehouse Notes,” DMR, Apr. 27, 1993 (4) (NewsBank). The amendment’s legal effect was apparently not vitiated by the fact that it was never directly incorporated into the public smoking prohibition law and that, as part of an appropriations bill, its validity may have expired at the end of the fiscal year on June 30, 1994. A new dispute then arose when some members of the Legislative Council proposed designating a legislative dining room as a public smoking area. Minority Leader Rife was a chief proponent, insisting that smokers needed a place to smoke so that they were not forced to go outside, but other leaders objected. Jonathan Roos, “Statehouse Dining Room Smoking Area Gets Support,” DMR, May 27, 1993 (6) (NewsBank). When the Council reconvened in December to discuss, inter alia, “where to put the smoking room at the statehouse, the Register’s chief political reporter complained: “So far, legislative leaders have spent more time talking about where people can smoke than they have about health-care reform.” David Yepsen, “Primary Could Color Session,” DMR, Dec. 6, 1993 (15) (NewsBank).
Also defused was the “extraordinary” feud over smoking between two non-smoking Democrats from the same city (Cedar Rapids)—“Horn was Brammer’s state senator”—one of whom (Brammer) was an “outspoken” leader on the no-smoking issue and the other (Horn) “demonstrate[d] a stubborn streak from time to time.” Such confrontations doubtless contributed to Brammer’s charges that Horn and Rife were “‘in the tobacco lobby’s pocket’” and that the “‘tobacco lobby owns the management of these two houses.’” Rife—who, like Horn, received contributions from the tobacco industry—indignantly rejected claims that such payments in any way influenced his views on smoking, especially in restaurants: “‘You wouldn’t have to give me a dime and I’d feel the same. A private business belongs to the individual, not the government.’”

In June following the close of the session, “[v]irtually all the legislative leaders agreed that smoking eventually will be banned at the Statehouse but disagreed on how much money should be spent to provide a temporary [smoking] facility.” The Legislative Council “ balked at a potential cost of $56,000 to create a designated Statehouse smoking area,” but “conceded they probably would end up providing space for smokers” because “the consequences of making the building completely smoke-free could be ugly.” Democrat William Palmer, the Senate president pro tempore, said that smokers turned “‘surly’” if a ban was forced on them, but that it was “‘just a question of time’”; in the interim, however, they should be given time to adjust “before being tossed from the building.” Indicative of the smokers’ (and their facilitators’) priorities was the report that: “The most popular suggestion for a potential smoking area is a former first aid room at the Statehouse, currently being used as a lactation room for nursing mothers.”

In 1995 Johnie Hammond and another senator sought to dissolve the mystery as to what spaces the Senate no-smoking rule governed by filing the following amendment to Senate Resolution 1 embodying the Senate’s permanent rules: “Smoking shall not be permitted in the senate chamber or in any areas controlled

---

156Virginia Brown to Cathey Yoe (May 3, 1993), Bates No. TI28922947.
157Email from Mark Brandsgard (Feb. 28, 2007). Brandsgard, the Chief Clerk of the House, was the administrative assistant to the House Democratic Minority Leader in 1993.
158Email from John Patchett (Feb. 28, 2007).

3045
by the senate, but it was never debated or voted on. An anti-smoking bill (S.F. 2174) whose unanimous passage Hammond managed to secure from her Human Resources Committee in 1996 would not have applied to the Senate itself, but it never even reached the Senate floor.

With the Republicans’ Loss of Their Majority and the Fall of the Cigarette Manufacturers’ Friend, Majority Leader Stewart Iverson, Senator Michael Connolly’s “long battle to rid the Senate of smoking...finally come[s] to an end: 1997-2008

By 1997 the Senate, now controlled by the Republicans, mustered the civil courage and public health intelligence to expand its no-smoking zone. At a Rules and Administration Committee meeting on January 13, the new Republican Majority Leader, chain-smoking Stewart Iverson, who in that capacity was also the committee chair, distributed the Senate Rules for the 77th General Assembly and explained the changes; then the “Access to Senate Chambers and Rules of Senate Decorum” were discussed, but unfortunately the minutes reveal no discussion of the new smoking rule, which read:

5. SMOKING

\[164\] Email from Mike Connolly to Marc Linder (Apr. 24, 2008).

\[166\] Committee Rules and Administration, Jan. 13, 1997, 11:07-11:10 a.m., 3:15-4:15 p.m., in Access to Senate Chamber and Rules of Decorum, 1997-1998, Senate Rules and Administration Committee, RG 039. General Assembly, SHSI, DM. The only decorum rule discussed was a successful amendment by Senator Gronstal adding secretaries to legislators as the only other group permitted to have soft drink cans in the chamber.
a. Smoking is not permitted in the senate chamber at any time.

b. Smoking is not permitted in any other meeting rooms, office areas, or other space under Senate control, except for designated areas identified under subparagraph “c” of this section.

c. Room 206 is designated a smoking area for Senators members of the general assembly and legislative staff. Smoking may be permitted in Room 326A at the discretion of the majority leader. The south end of the 2nd floor hallway behind the Senate is a designated smoking area for Senators, Senate employees, registered Senate press persons, former members of the Senate who are not registered lobbyists, and guests of Senators (who must be continually accompanied by a Senator in order to use this area). The Secretary of the Senate will be responsible for clearly marking, maintaining, policing, and maximizing ventilation in these areas Room 206.

The same day the Senate’s two Republican leaders, Iverson and non-smoking President Mary Kramer, agreed finally to remove the cigarettes from the vending machine behind the Senate chamber. Kramer’s reason—that children could buy cigarettes from the unmonitored machine—was the same one that had prompted Governor Branstad to have it removed from the basement seven years earlier before Democratic Majority Leader Hutchins had ordered it delivered to the Senate against the physical resistance of Senators Hannon and Lloyd-Jones. The Kramer-Iverson accord eliminated smoking in an open area where it had been permitted, but designated as smoking areas Iverson’s office, a small room a few steps from the chamber, and a ground-floor area near the legislators’ dining room. Though the agreement (self-)conferred a super-privilege on Iverson, all legislators and staff members were privileged vis-a-vis lobbyists and visitors, who had to go outside to smoke. To be sure, the new rules still had to be approved by the full Senate.

That process proved to be nettlesome. The following day, during the consideration of Senate Resolution 1 embodying the chamber’s permanent rules, a group of 15 Democrats and three Republicans led by Democrat Michael Connolly filed a floor amendment to extinguish smoking altogether: “Smoking Prohibited: Smoking shall not be permitted in the senate or in any area of the capitol building controlled by the senate or controlled jointly by the senate and house.” Connolly argued that it “‘looks very bad—it looks elitist—when the 167 Access to Senate Chamber and Rules of Senate Decorum [1997-1998], Senate Rules and Administration Committee, RG 039, General Assembly, SHSI, DM.

169 State of Iowa: 1997: Journal of the Senate: 1997 Regular Session Seventy-Seventh General Assembly 1:55 (Jan. 14), 2:1600 (S-3007). The three Republicans were Andy McKean, John Jensen, and Maggie Tinsman. Directly before filing this amendment, Senators Connolly and Mary Neuhauser had requested and received consent to defer action on a much more tepid amendment: “Smoking Restricted: In addition to a written policy on smoking restrictions adopted by the committee on rules and administration, smoking is prohibited in room R15A when a committee or an appropriations subcommittee is meeting in room R15.” State of Iowa: 1997: Journal of the Senate: 1997 Regular Session Seventy-Seventh General Assembly 1:55 (Jan. 14), 2:1599 (S-3003). An even more relaxed version of this amendment was adopted by the Senate on January 28; see below.

Email from former Iowa State Senator Milo Colton (Mar. 15, 2007). Remarkably, 14 years earlier, Palmer voted against a bill that would have “put[ ] a guaranteed profit [to wholesalers and retailers] on a product [cigarettes] that is contributing more to the health cost increases than any substance other than alcohol.” Tom Witosky, “Iowa Senate Votes to Raise Minimum Price of Cigarettes,” DMR, May 7, 1983 (2A:2-3).

Two weeks later, one of the five Republicans who had voted for the ban, John Jensen, called up his motion to reconsider the vote on the grounds that the issue was so divisive that it was preventing the Senate from “adopting more important rules related directly to their main task of making laws.” Putting the fund of his public health knowledge at his colleagues’ disposal, Jensen, a veteran senator and nonsmoker, reminisced: “I’ve sat in here when you couldn’t see the ceiling half the time because of the smoke, and I haven’t died yet.” In contrast, Connolly and other senators argued for affirmation of the previous vote not only for the senators’ and staff’s health, but also because backtracking would send the wrong signal to the public about legislators’ special privileges. On a virtually perfect party-line procedural vote—only Palmer voted with the Republicans and no

---

3048
Republican deserted Iverson—the Senate voted 28 to 20 to reconsider its vote.\textsuperscript{176} Then on the substantive vote on adopting the amendment again, the ban lost on a 24 to 24 tie: all 21 Democrats voted in favor joined by three Republicans, two of whom (Dr. Redwine and Tinsman) had also voted for it two weeks earlier.\textsuperscript{177} Although only about one fifth of the senators used tobacco, “‘the old mossbacks,’” Connolly said, were “‘continuing to have their way. It’s a disgrace.’”\textsuperscript{178}

The following day, when the Senate resumed discussion of Senate Resolution 1, Assistant Minority Leader Gene Fraise, who in 1990, for example, had voted against smoking curbs, moved the adoption of his curiously narrow amendment: “Smoking shall not be permitted in any area under exclusive control of the senate by anyone other than senators, staff of the senate, and staff of central legislative staff agencies when assigned to work in the senate.”\textsuperscript{179} On yet another almost completely party-line vote, it was rejected 23 to 25 with only two Republicans joining all 21 Democrats.\textsuperscript{180} Connolly then offered a virtual replica of his failed S-3007, differing only in confining the smoking ban to “any area of the capitol building controlled by the senate.”\textsuperscript{181} All 21 Democrats voted for it (including Palmer), but they were joined by only two Republicans (Dr. Redwine and Tinsman), producing a 23 to 26 roll call vote.\textsuperscript{182}

Deviation by Republicans from Iverson’s position on the Senate’s internal regulation of smoking was fraught with disciplinary peril—at least for third-term Quad Cities Senator Maggie Tinsman, whose seat happened to be next to Iverson’s. During one of the votes the majority leader admonished her to toe the party line, but Tinsman (who had a master’s degree in social work and, for a decade, had been a Scott county supervisor and during half of that period Commissioner of the Iowa Department of Elder Affairs as well), explained that as a member of the board of directors of the American Lung Association of Iowa she could not possibly vote against a smoking ban. Not ten minutes had gone by since she had repeated her act of conscience and defiance on the next vote, when a Senate staffer came to inform her that she had been removed from the Legislative Council (the body that oversees the interim business of the legislature and sets the policies of various legislative agencies such as the Legislative Service Bureau). After having had to ask by whom and learning that it was Iverson himself, she asked the majority leader why he had removed her from the prestigious position. He bluntly told her that his action was the response to her having voted against his leadership. Asked many years later whether she regarded Iverson’s move as vindictive, Tinsman observed that she preferred to call it an exercise of “raw political power.”
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

More subtle means were also the more typical method for deterring senators from defying Iverson on the issue of smoking, which he took both as a personal affront and as a challenge to his leadership. Veteran legislator Andy McKean, who had a very strong personal feeling against smoking, found himself in a “very tough situation” as a Republican because those who voted against Iverson the “fervent smoker” on smoking issues sometimes had to face consequences. The knowledge that defying Iverson on smoking—on other matters his attitude was much more laissez faire—might make him less inclined to push a deviating senator’s bills made anti-smokers think through carefully whether “in the grand scheme of things” a battle with the majority leader was worth it. Without being able to quantify the phenomenon, McKean was quite confident that the number of anti-smoking Republicans who made the calculation and decided not to challenge Iverson would have sufficed to create a majority to ban smoking in the Senate. In that sense Iverson was singlehandedly responsible for its

---

The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

continuation.185

After having sustained his latest defeat, Connolly offered a compromise permitting smoking in only 2 rooms including the majority leader’s:

RULE 45A
SMOKING RESTRICTED
1. Smoking is not permitted in the senate chamber at any time.
2. Smoking is not permitted in any other meeting rooms, office areas, or in other space under senate control, except for areas identified under subsection 3.
3. Room 206 is designated a smoking room for members of the general assembly and legislative staff. Smoking may be permitted in room 326A at the discretion of the majority leader. The secretary of the senate will be responsible for clearly marking, maintaining, policing, and maximizing ventilation in room 206.186

At the same time, Connolly raised a “point of parliamentary inquiry that, pursuant to Senate Rule 36, the issue of smoking should be lifted from the rules of decorum and placed in the rules of the senate.” Following a five-minute consideration by Senate President Mary Kramer, the chair ruled that it was appropriate to transfer the smoking rules and that “the determination of this matter will be decided by the outcome of the vote” on Connolly’s amendment. However, on a completely party-line vote, S-3022 was rejected 28 to 21 (even the duly admonished and punished Tinsman having done obeisance to Iverson).187

As Connolly himself later interpreted this episode, Kramer, an anti-smoker who had worked in health care, ruled my motion germane and then allowed it to come to a vote. The majority leader at the time, Stewart Iverson, knew he had the power to get the necessary votes in the Republican caucus to defeat my amendment. If my amendment had passed,...it would have gone into the Permanent Senate Rules. Senator Kramer knew that my amendment was obviously germane. After conferring with Iverson, they could have it both ways, allow my amendment to be ruled germane and then kill it when it came to a vote of the full Senate. ...

At this point, leadership intervened directly, Iverson and Minority Leader

---

185 Telephone interview with Andy McKean, Anamosa, IA (Apr. 16, 2008).
188 Email from Mike Connolly to Marc Linder (Apr. 25, 2008).
Gronstal offering a floor amendment that was a weaker version of one that Neuhauser and Connolly had offered two weeks earlier and received consent that action on it be deferred:

Rule 45A
Smoking Restricted

In addition to a written policy on smoking restrictions adopted by the committee on rules and administration, smoking may be prohibited in room R15A by the committee or subcommittee chair when a committee or an appropriations subcommittee is meeting in room R15.\(^{189}\)

Senate leadership having already agreed to it, the amendment was adopted on a voice vote followed by adoption of Senate Resolution 1 by a roll call vote of 40 to 9, several Democratic anti-smoking activists (including Connolly, Dvorsky, Halvorson, Hammond, McCoy, and Neuhauser) opposing it.\(^{190}\) The result was thus a ratification of the tentative ruling to permit smoking in Iverson’s office and two back rooms.\(^{191}\) The Register mocked the senate for being “‘like a nervous addict, [who] chickened out at the prospect of going cold turkey.’” In the end it all boiled down to the fact that some of the small minority of smokers “apparently couldn’t face the indignity of having to huddle in doorways outside the Capitol to get their nicotine fix, like ordinary addicts. So they provided cozy space inside for themselves. The backsliders know no shame.”\(^{192}\) How one-fifth of the senators persuaded the non-smoking four-fifths not only to facilitate this addiction, but to do so at the expense of their own health, the newspaper did not explain.\(^{193}\) Two months later, when the Senate passed a watered-down bill

---

\(^{193}\) Although the Register adopted a very hard-line editorial position against smoking, some stones accurately targeted its own glass house. In response to an editorial attack on Iowa congressional Republicans who accepted money from cigarette company PACs, Senator Charles Grassley noted that the “Register accepts tobacco advertising, and has defended it ‘on the basis of free-speech protections. It should defend those same free-speech rights of employees of tobacco companies....’” The newspaper’s self-interested reply revealed a profound ignorance of omnipresent cigarette advertising’s massive penalizing underage smokers, Connolly admonished his colleagues that the measure’s deterrence was undercut by the chamber’s “refusal to ban smoking in its own rules. Young people will look at what lawmakers do rather than what they say....”

At the end of 1998, Governor Branstad issued an executive order prohibiting the “use of all tobacco products in the State Capitol Complex and all offices occupied by state government....” In 1999, with the Republicans controlling 30 of the Senate’s 50 seats, Connolly undertook yet another effort to ban smoking. He filed an amendment proposing the following language for Rule 45A: “Smoking Prohibited: Smoking shall not be permitted in the senate or in any area of the capitol building controlled by the senate or house.” Only one Democrat opposed it, while five Republicans (including John Redwine, an osteopathic physician) voted for it, leaving the final vote 23 to 26. Tinsman, who had long voted with anti-tobacco control forces, this time joined her pro-smoking Republican Majority Leader Iverson because, as she reconstructed her decision years later, she probably feared that he would mete out a punishment to her even more severe than the expulsion from the Legislative Council for having defied his leadership on the smoking rule in 1997. Having lost the vote, Connolly immediately asked and received consent to withdraw another amendment that would have prohibited smoking everywhere in the Senate except 197 State of Iowa: 1999: Journal of the Senate: 1999 Regular Session Seventy-Eighth General Assembly 1:150 (Jan. 27). Bill Fink, a nonsmoking high school teacher whose father had died of lung cancer, was the lone Democratic defector. He later explained his vote as flowing both from his perception that the smoking lounge was a reasonable compromise and from his streak of libertarianism. Telephone interview with Bill Fink, Carlisle, IA (Apr. 6, 2008).

---

198 Telephone interview with Maggie Tinsman, Davenport (Apr. 13, 2008).
in the majority leader’s office.\textsuperscript{199}

The committee rule for the General Assembly in 1999-2000 was the same as in 1997-98 with the aforementioned deletion of the struck out words and addition of those underlined,\textsuperscript{200} and the additional permanent Rule 45A also remained unchanged.\textsuperscript{201} The irony of the Senate’s simultaneously passing a bill imposing more severe fines on underage smokers in 2000 was not lost on the Register’s statehouse reporter, who observed that “when senators debate that anti-tobacco legislation, a place for them to take a few puffs between votes is only a few steps away—in a room behind the Senate chamber. Room 206 is the last smoking enclave in the Capitol and nearby state office buildings.” Iverson, one of only about a half dozen senators who still smoked, defended the smoking lounge on the grounds that his colleagues needed an indoor place close by. His “clout” alone was “instrumental in maintaining rules that allow a smoking room for legislators and members of their staff, as well as smoking privileges in his upstairs office.” Ever a true friend of the cigarette manufacturers, the quondam wannabe Tobacco Institute midwestern regional vice president who had been a smoker “most of his life” and resumed the “habit” after having quit a couple of times, reflected the company line in supporting a focus on children rather than adult smokers. To Connolly’s criticism that it was inappropriate for the state Capitol to be one of the few public places in Iowa with a smoking room, Iverson cavalierly replied that “government already sends mixed signals about tobacco, which he notes is legal for adults to use.” And the compliant Senator Jensen, who for years went along with secondhand smoke exposure to get along, was so delighted with the vastly improved air quality that he was “not too concerned about the few senators who still smoke, ‘as long as they’re not blowing it in my face.’”\textsuperscript{202}

Connolly, however, was not vanquished yet. A few days later, as the Senate was debating the tobacco use prevention and control plan, which would be financed by the state’s $1.7 billion share in the Master Settlement Agreement, Connolly let loose a torrent of amendments accompanied by the accusation that the body had never been “more hypocritical,” though he again failed to eliminate the smoking lounge. Connolly adroitly crafted his amendments to fit the context of the bill. His first amendment to an earlier version of the bill provided that:

\textsuperscript{200}Access to Senate Chamber and Rules of Senate Decorum [1999-2000], Senate Rules and Administration Committee, RG 039, General Assembly, SHSI, DM.

\textsuperscript{201}Sen. Res. 1, Rule 45A at 37 (as adopted Jan. 27, 1999).

\textsuperscript{202}Jonathan Roos, “Smoking Remains in Senate Lounge,” DMR, Apr. 9, 2000 (1A) (NewsBank). On the more severe fines for underage smokers, see above ch. 31.

In order to comply with section 142A.1 and to demonstrate a firm commitment to the tobacco use prevention and control partnership and to provide a positive model for youth, specifically, and the people of Iowa, in general, the general assembly and the executive branch shall declare the state capitol a smoke-free environment. The general assembly shall adopt any rules necessary to require that all areas controlled by the general assembly or either chamber are smoke-free upon the effective date of this Act.

When, four days later, S.F. 2565 was substituted for the first bill, Connolly withdrew his amendment and offered instead S-5438, the first part of which he placed at the beginning of the bill, where the latter expressed the purpose of establishing a “comprehensive partnership” among the legislative and executive branches, communities, and the people of Iowa in addressing the prevalence of tobacco use. After Connolly had withdrawn the second part (requiring the legislature to adopt rules), Republican Senator David Miller offered an amendment to the amendment to add all public elementary and secondary school buildings as smoke-free environments. After Connolly had secured a ruling from the chair that Miller’s amendment was not germane, pro-tobacco Republican Assistant Majority Leader Nancy Boettger succeeded in eliminating Connolly’s amendment with the same parliamentary maneuver. Two days later two more of his amendments—declaring the state capitol and the general assembly, respectively, smoke free—to the same bill met the same fate. Immediately thereafter, in his final effort to ban smoking in the building, Connolly offered an amendment that inserted the smoking ban in the General Assembly as a clause directly into the intent clause of the bill’s preamble after the term “General Assembly,” but on Boettger’s point of order the chair also ruled this amendment not germane. Stymied on this front, Connolly made his final gambit, seeking to impose the requirement that certain members of the new Commission on Tobacco Use Prevention and Control be “from organizations that prohibit the use of tobacco in buildings or portions of building under their control.” However, 204Senate Journal 2000, at 1:1142 (S-5399 to S.F. 2449) (Apr. 13).

205Senate Journal 2000, at 1:1187 (S-5438 to H.F. 2565 and S-5441 to S-5438) (Apr. 17). sensing, presumably, the hopelessness of this initiative, Connolly withdrew the amendment before Republicans could rule it not germane.\(^{208}\)

In anticipation of the next Senate rules battle a few weeks later, at the end of 2000, Democrats announced that they would again seek to “get rid of the smoking lounge.” Hammond, who was looking forward to a “‘fun fight,’” noted that their caucus wanted to be able to show that “‘we legislators can live by the same rules as we require of everyone else.’” With the number of smoking senators dwindling—for example, Republican Richard Drake had smoked up to three packs a day for 58 years before quitting a year earlier—Minority Leader Mike Gronstal believed that they had the votes this time. The “noncommittal” Iverson declined to say more than that: “‘I don’t know how important it is. I can also smoke in my office.’”\(^{209}\) Gronstal, an ex-two-pack-a-day smoker who was the last Senate Democrat to quit smoking, tried humor to shame Republicans into abolishing the exemption to which they persisted in clinging: “‘The Senate Democrats will take up a collection for any Republican Senator trying to quit smoking by using ‘the patch,’ acupuncture treatments, sessions with a hypnotist or whatever else works for them. ... I’d be happy to share my nicotine gum.’”

Turning serious, Gronstal explained that Democrats objected not only to the Republican majority’s refusal “‘to live under the same rules we set for everyone else’”—smoking was, after all, already banned everywhere else in the Capitol complex, including the House and the governor’s offices—but also to the “‘terrible example’” that young people would see in the Senate’s “‘Do as I say, not as I do’” approach.\(^{210}\)

However, in 2001, when Rule 45A had been removed from the permanent rules,\(^{211}\) the Register editorialized, a few senators were still smoking, “with many of the rest fed up with their colleagues’ holdover hideaway.” Except for the aforementioned second-floor Senate lounge, where legislators and staff could smoke, the entire Capitol and adjoining state office buildings had been smoke-free for several years. Iverson, “one of a handful of senators who smokes [sic], has used his position in maintaining Senate rules that allowed a smoking room. He doesn’t want fanfare for the end of this arrangement, but it does signal a realization, at last, that the Senate wasn’t setting a very good example. Now, smokers can use a balcony above the south entrance of the Capitol.\(^{212}\) When Senator Johnie Hammond and other Democrats announced that they would push for a smoking ban that would target Iverson’s smoking in his office and some dozen others who smoked in Room 206 (the designated smoking room) on the grounds that the Capitol building and legislative offices should operate under the rules banning smoking in all state buildings, Iverson insisted that he had “responded to concerns over time by moving smoking to one room other than in his own office. ‘I think that’s sufficient.’”\(^{213}\) Nor was the exemption for the Senate lounge merely a matter of self-aggrandizement or even of secondhand exposure to passers-by: because leaders such as Iverson frequented it, nonsmokers who wanted to participate in important talks felt compelled to enter it. One former Democratic legislator, who saw, for example, non-smoking Governor Vilsack there engaged in talks, later revealed that although previously he had not smoked, after attending meetings in the lounge he soon found himself “bumming cigarettes” to the extent that a decade later he was still trying to stop smoking.\(^{214}\)
The Battle Against Smoking in the Senate Itself: 1985-2008

The Iowa Senate’s no-smoking policy continued to lack the formality of the House rule. As late as 2004, smoking was permitted in a room for lobbyists in the Senate, which other smokers also used; smoking in this room finally came to an end in 2005 when Iverson, its chief facilitator, who also conferred on himself the unique privilege of smoking in his office, had to share power as a result of the 2004 elections, which produced an evenly divided Senate.\(^{215}\) And during the 2007-2008 General Assembly, the rule, embodied only in its rules of decorum and not in the Rules of the Senate (now controlled by Democrats 30 to 20), was available apparently only on the legislature’s website. Pursuant to this rule, finally: “Smoking is not permitted at any time in the Senate chamber or in any other area controlled by the Senate.”\(^{216}\) Even this statement was, until the last days of the 2008 session, untrue: smoking was still permitted on the balcony behind the Senate chamber. However, after Majority Leader Michael Gronstal had declared on the day that the governor signed into law the statewide ban on \(^{214}\)Telephone interview with legislator who requested anonymity, Des Moines (May 5, 2008).

---

\(^{215}\)Telephone interview with an unidentified male employee of the Legislative Information Office (Feb. 19, 2007).

smoking in public places that “[w]e’re going to stop the smoking on the balcony,” Senator Connolly, who had arguably fought longer and harder for a smoke-free Senate than anyone else in that body’s history, observed: “That will end in a few more days and the Senate, like most public places in Iowa, will finally be free of smoking. The long battle to rid the Senate of smoking will have finally come to an end.”

218Email from Mike Connolly to Marc Linder (Apr. 24, 2008).
The State’s Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances, But the Iowa Supreme Court Invalidates Them as Inconsistent with, and Thus Preempted by, the State Clean Indoor Air Law: 1999-2003

“[B]eing in business is all about making money, and if banning smoking is going to cut our business, then no, we’re not for that.... In this restaurant, I’ve got two servers who have asthmatic reactions being around smoke, and we don’t have them working in the smoking sections.... The other servers actually like working in the smoking section because smokers tip better.”

“I shouldn’t have to suffer because of other people’s choices,” said Brooke Beigly, a UI junior and a waitress and manager at the Brown Bottle. “It’s in my mind all of the time—how much secondhand smoke I swallowed.”

But Beigly said the decision to allow smoking should be left to each restaurant. “I don’t think it’s up to the City Council to stick its nose in it.”

Beigly, a nonsmoker, said the wait staff generally prefers serving the no-smoking section.

“It gets pretty bad sometimes.... But we don’t want to turn our regular smokers away, either.”

Ever since the cigarette oligopoly, which in the 1980s and 1990s had elevated enactment of statewide preemption of local anti-tobacco ordinances to one of its paramount nationwide legislative goals, concluded in 1990 that it had achieved this objective in Iowa by weakening that state’s already barely functional public smoking law in order to insure that no city or county could lawfully adopt an ordinance embodying a stronger ban, repeal of this preemption of local control—which nationally the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services had declared a public health priority—in turn became the state anti-smoking movement’s highest priority. That preemption had been passed while Democrats controlled both houses of the Iowa legislature and efforts at repeal had failed during that party’s remaining two years in power (1991-92) should have made it clear that, once the even more tobacco company-beholden Republicans gained control of the House in 1993 and the Senate as well in 1997, undoing preemption was doomed. 5

3See above ch. 27.

Consequently, the only path available to anti-tobacco groups was adoption by some city council of a stronger ordinance to be supported by a litigation strategy to persuade the Iowa Supreme Court to vindicate such a measure in spite of the tobacco firms’ best efforts at thwarting it. In the end, the outcome would depend on judicial judgment of the bill-drafting competence in 1990 of Covington & Burling, the Tobacco Institute, and the legislature’s former chief bill drafter, Serge Garrison, who by then had placed his skills at the disposal of R. J. Reynolds. 6 Although the two university cities, Ames and Iowa City, ultimately passed such weak ordinances in 2001 and 2002, respectively—the former not only without the help, but against the opposition, of part of the anti-smoking health movement—the key organization in each failed to coordinate mobilization or strategy with the other, 7 and the supporting litigation, which was not carefully planned, proved to be the weak link. 8 After a state district court judge, in a lengthy and analytically sophisticated opinion, in 2002 had upheld the Ames ordinance against a challenge financed by Philip Morris, the following year the Iowa Supreme Court’s extremely meager and poorly reasoned but unanimous opinion, which evaded the important jurisprudential, political, and socio-economic issues, put an end to the limited experiments in local control in Ames and Iowa City and insured that no other local government would take up the cause. 9 However, this judicial defeat of the local control gambit only prompted its supporters to revert to the legislative forum once Democrats regained control of both houses in 2007 in an effort to overturn the judges’ decision by legislative repeal of the preemption provision and passage of an express grant of local power

---

5 See above chs. 28-31.
6 See above ch. 27.
7 While the Iowa City group (in small part based on misinformation) was very critical of the Ames group, the latter largely ignored developments in Iowa City. Email from Linda Muston to Marc Linder (Oct. 23, 2008).
8 The Iowa Attorney General’s Office early on furnished a memorandum providing crucial support for local ordinances, but then failed even to file an amicus brief when the case came before the Supreme Court.
9 To be sure, in retrospect, the embarrassingly inferior quality of the Supreme Court’s opinion would presumably have made moot any coordinated litigation strategy.
that would sidestep the constitutional/codified limitations.

Origins

What right does the Council or any lobbying group have to dictate how these business-owners run their restaurants and whether or not they choose to allow people to perform a perfectly legal activity therein? Because neither the Council nor CAFE bears any risk, they have no moral authority to dictate business policy.

CAFE can march around banging pots and pans shouting all they like about the evils of smoking. Should they be able to force the imposition of an immoral law? No! Everyone can have a say in this by voting with their dollars.¹⁰

By mid-1998, in localities with an aggregate population of 88 million people, 846 anti-smoking ordinances had been adopted in the United States, 753 of which applied to restaurants.¹¹ Because grassroots campaigns at the local level promoted more focused public debate and education about the health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure, which in turn expanded support for the proposed legal changes and their underlying norms, anti-smoking groups had long viewed local ordinances as a high-priority desideratum. In the many states in which the cigarette companies had succeeded in securing enactment of statutes preempting ordinances stricter than or inconsistent with statewide laws,¹² localities would be able to adopt and implement such ordinances in the long run only if they successfully litigated legal challenges by demonstrating that the ordinances somehow did not run afoul of the preemption provisions (or mobilized legislative majorities to repeal them).

Ames

Although Iowa was precisely such a state and anti-smoking health groups

¹⁰Email from Stewart Wood [“Non-smoker, non-business owner, concerned, freedom-loving citizen!”] to Iowa City Council (Nov. 19, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Nov. 27, 2001 Special Meeting at 175, on http://www.iowacity.org/weblink/doview.aspx?id=8320 (visited Nov. 4, 2008).

¹¹National Cancer Institute, State and Local Legislative Action to Reduce Tobacco Use 32, summ. tab. 1 at 71 (Smoking and Tobacco Control Monograph No. 11, 2000).

¹²Of the 30 state preemption laws in effect in 1998, 14 applied to clean indoor air ordinances. National Cancer Institute, State and Local Legislative Action to Reduce Tobacco Use 54 (Smoking and Tobacco Control Monograph No. 11, 2000).
prioritized such local action, the advent of an anti-smoking ordinance in Ames was, ironically, serendipitous. To be sure, Ames was not a complete stranger to anti-smoking ordinances: as early as May 23, 1978, two weeks after the governor had signed into law the state’s first clean indoor air law but five weeks before it went into effect, the Ames city council unanimously adopted an ordinance to protect nonsmokers from tobacco smoke at its own meetings or those of other Ames governmental bodies: “No person shall smoke, or otherwise use, any cigarette, cigar, pipe or other smoking equipment, or other tobacco product, in any room in which a public meeting of the city council or any administrative agency, board, commission, committee or other governmental body of the City of Ames, Iowa is being held, during said public meeting.”

Despite this precedent, according to Herman Quirmbach, an economics professor at Iowa State University and the self-designated instigator of the 2000 ordinance, the latter originated in the late summer/early fall of 1999, while he was door-knocking during his re-election campaign for city council. Asked by a nurse why the City of Ames allowed smoking in restaurants, Quirmbach, who was a council member from 1995 to 2003 before being elected to the Iowa Senate, had to admit that he was unable to answer her question. He later proposed to the 14Ames, Iowa, Minutes of City Council Meeting at 50 (May 23, 1978) (copy furnished by City Clerk Diane Voss). From the fact that only one very brief mention of the ordinance’s adoption appeared in several lengthy front-page articles of the local newspaper devoted to the meeting suggests that the action was not controversial. “City-County Mixup Means 24th Street Work Delayed,” ADT, May 24, 1978 (1:4-6).

---

13See above ch. 25.

15Municipal Code City of Ames, Iowa, § 17.7(1) (Ordinance No. 2655, May 23, 1978) (1980). The provision is still in the code http://www.cityofames.org/AttorneyWeb/codeTOC.htm (July 1, 2008). From 1978 to 1990 the Iowa clean indoor air law contained no preemption provision; however, since the Ames ordinance banned smoking (presumably) only in city-owned buildings, it would not have run afoul of the state law even after the enactment of the preemption amendment, which did not restrict any public or private building owner’s power to ban smoking entirely on its/his property. Shortly before the preemption provision was passed in 1990, the Ames city council adopted another ordinance (which was amended in 1995), which, for the same reason, fell outside the scope of the preemption provision: “No person shall smoke, or otherwise use, any cigarette, cigar, pipe, or other smoking equipment, or other tobacco product, in any building under the use and control of the City or City administrative agency, or in any enclosed courtyard of any such building, or in any vehicles, including Cy-Ride, under the use and control of the City or City administrative agency, except in those areas, if any, that have been designated and conspicuously posted as smoking areas.” Municipal Code City of Ames, Iowa, § 17.7(2) (Ordinance No. 3074, Mar. 20, 1990, Ordinance No. 3358, Nov. 21, 1995), on http://www.cityofames.org/AttorneyWeb/codeTOC.htm (July 1, 2008).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

council that it consider the matter.\footnote{16}{Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Apr. 19, 2008). On Quirmbach’s biographical data, see http://www.iowasenatedemocrats.org/quirmbach/Default.htm (visited Sept. 16, 2008).}

To be sure, this chance encounter and Quirmbach’s seizing the opportunity hardly took place in a vacuum. They must be seen as facets of the convergence of several anti-tobacco program developments in Ames, including a tobacco cessation program operating under the auspices of the Mary Greeley Medical Center through the Mid-Iowa Community Health Committee (MICHC), efforts, especially by the Youth and Shelter Services of Ames (YSS), to reduce the prevalence of smoking and tobacco use among young people, and the pressure being exerted on the city council to lower some of the state’s highest rates of violation of the no-sales-to-minors law\footnote{17}{This “wide community based planning process,” according to Linda Muston, who was vice president for community service at Greeley, included “task forces that addressed teen pregnancy, dental needs, maternal child issues as well as Tobacco/Smoking Cessation. The latter task force had initiatives going with YSS in high schools (Few Do), middle school education, and smoking cessation for adults (in conjunction with ISU Student Health and the MGMC respiratory care department.) The MICHC was made up of lots of community leaders including a city council member, representative of the Ames Public Schools, a McFarland Clinic person, a county supervisor, the head of ISU Student Health, a nursing home administrator, a home health agency provider, a minister, an auxiliary member, etc. Some of the MICHC members were also on this task force. The tobacco use task force morphed into the ATTF [Ames Tobacco Task Force]. It became important for practical, political and social reasons to have the full committee adopt the stance that the ATTF was advancing.” Email from Linda Muston to Marc Linder (Oct. 6, 2008).} detected by compliance checks conducted under the authority of the Synar amendment, which were endangering federal funding of various drug rehabilitation programs.\footnote{18}{On the Synar amendment checks, see above ch. 31, and Thomas O’Donnell, “ Teens, Tobacco Imperil Grants,” \textit{DMR}, June 14, 1999 (1A) (NewsBank).} Among those groups whose funding was threatened—in 1999, Iowa had lost five million dollars in such funds because stings had caught dealers selling to 36 percent of the teenagers trying to buy\footnote{19}{Rebecca Anderson, “City Council Researches Smoking Ban,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), May 12, 2000 (B1:2-4). In 1998, teens trying to buy tobacco in the 12-county area around Ames had been successful 46 percent of the time; by the summer and fall of 2000 the figure had dropped to 19 percent, which was 10 percentage points below the state average. Colleen Rogers, “Story Co. Underage Tobacco Sales Drop,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), Jan. 8, 2001 (A1:2).}—was YSS itself, whose director, George Belitsos, was also co-chair of the Ames [Teen] Tobacco Task Force, which was formed in 1999 by the Mayor’s Youth Committee, YSS, and the American Cancer Society in order to try to secure passage of laws and ordinances to regulate public smoking. Belitsos argued for the ban because "[w]e know from prevention theory that the more young people see adults doing stuff they [young people] are banned from doing, the more they want to do it." Quirmbach, too, in an alternative narrative, stated in May 2000 that he had "c[o]me up with the idea to look into banning smoking in restaurants while the council was discussing teen smoking" in connection with this Synar amendment "dilemma." Although the link was "the power of the bad example" perceived by kids when they saw adults smoking in restaurants, Quirmbach noted that protecting employees and adult customers from secondhand smoke was nevertheless the chief justification for the ban.

Iowa City

The timing of a push for a smoking ban in Iowa City was also adventitious. In March 1999, on the occasion of a visit to the University of Iowa by former Surgeon General C. Everett Koop, the country’s most famous anti-smoking campaigner, the “acronymically challenged” Johnson County Citizens for Tobacco Free Youth prevailed on the Iowa City City Council and Johnson County Board of Supervisors to issue Breath of Fresh Air Days proclamations encouraging all citizens and businesses to recognize the days of Koop’s stay...
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

(March 12-14) by going smoke-free. At the council’s meeting on March 2, Dr. Kemp Kernstine, a cardiothoracic surgeon at the University of Iowa Hospital and JCCTFY member who impressed lay audiences with displays of the blackened remains of the lungs of some of his deceased smoking (and secondhand-smoking) patients, urged the council to “make decisions that you can’t smoke in a restaurant, you can’t smoke in a bar. Be like California, Arizona, New York City and Boston who are nonsmoking, you cannot go in a bar in Los Angeles and smoke and that’s what I’d like to see in this progressive community.”

In addition to addressing, at Kernstine’s invitation, a conference on thoracic cancer, Koop lectured on public health and the tobacco lobby (“Anatomy of a Scandal”), and spoke to hundreds of middle school students about the health risks of smoking and tobacco use. Thanks to Koop’s presence, three restaurants went smoke-free for the weekend; their owners found customers’ response so overwhelmingly positive that they maintained their no-smoking status. Later, JCCTFY specifically acknowledged that Koop’s visit had initiated the smoke-free discussion in Iowa City.

JCCTFY, a self-styled “grass-roots coalition of parents, educators, health professionals, and prevention specialists united by a common concern for the health and safety of our children,” had focused from its inception in 1996 on strict enforcement of laws regulating both cigarette sales to minors and possession, use, and purchase of tobacco products by minors. By the latter half of 1999 the group, which claimed 40 members, had branched out, aiming now to convince local restaurants (but not bars) voluntarily to go smoke-free—for the sake of their employees’ health—and compiling the “Smokefree Dining Guide for Johnson County” listing 60 such establishments. Dr. Richard Dobyns, a member of the Johnson County Board of Health, and Graham Dameron, director of the county’s Department of Public Health and affiliated with JCCTFY, agreed that persuasion of restaurant owners should take precedence before seeking to persuade local government to adopt an ordinance. If it proved necessary to move beyond voluntary to compulsory bans, Dobyns, who hoped that Iowa City, as “‘home to the academic health center in this state,’” would take the leadership, had not yet reckoned with the composition of the city council, three of whose seven members were smoking business owners. Ominously, one of them, Mayor Ernie Lehman, took a strict anti-government, market-knows-best position: “‘The public can dictate where they go to eat. I don’t know why the city would be interested in an ordinance. We should rely on the natural forces of the economy—it’s a natural thing that’s going to occur.’”

And even if such views did not prevail, already by mid-1999 worries had surfaced that local government lacked the power to adopt anti-smoking ordinances because the state clean indoor air law may have preempted such action. In any event, Johnson County Attorney J. Patrick White perceived the strong possibility of a problem for any local ordinance, which a University of Iowa law professor predicted would run into a court challenge. Contrary to the static view propagated by the Iowa City Press-Citizen, however, passage of an ordinance that was later invalidated would not “be simply a waste of time”: the community education, mobilization, and attitudinal transformation that such an effort would require could easily initiate impulses to create a much more capacious statewide anti-smoking movement.

Further progress in Iowa City was made on September 8, 1999, when, at JCCTFY’s request.\textsuperscript{35} Dameron raised the question of a county or city ordinance banning smoking in restaurants at the county Board of Health meeting, which several members of the group, including its chairperson, also attended. The ban was by no means the only tobacco-related matter on the agenda. Before moving on to the ban, Dameron first asked the Board to consider adopting a resolution regarding Iowa’s share of the Master Settlement Agreement funds from the cigarette industry and then requested approval of a comprehensive tobacco control program on the assumption that Johnson county would receive some Agreement funding. When he reached the issue of ordinances that “would eliminate smoking in restaurants,” Dameron, interestingly, also included “possibly bars.” Opening the discussion, Board member Kelley Donham, a veterinarian and University of Iowa professor in the Occupational and Environmental Health Department of the Public Health College, pointed out that “one can not smoke within 100’ of a public place” in Davis, California, but then immediately cast doubt on the achievement of that seeming anti-smoking nirvana in Iowa by adding that “[w]e may not be able to make those legislative changes at the local level.”\textsuperscript{36} Joe Bolkcom, a first-year state senator—who had just completed six years as a county supervisor following three years in the county Public Health Department working on youth access to tobacco\textsuperscript{37}—reinforced that doubt by declaring that local government was “generally pre-empted from making tobacco ordinances.” After an employee of the University of Iowa Pulmonary Cancer Clinic had mentioned that “Attorney General Miller would like to see the preemption challenged,” JCCTFY’s chair observed that when the group asked the Attorney General’s Office for an opinion on the issue: “They indicated that there appeared to be loopholes in Iowa’s law so a local community could pass a local smoking ordinance, but if they did, it would more than likely be challenged by the tobacco companies.”\textsuperscript{38}

Thus, already at this early stage leading anti-smoking campaigners in Iowa City were acutely aware of the possible legal impediments to and political repercussions of their legal strategy. And JCCTFY member and Johnson County Attorney White, who would be responsible for defending any challenge to a county smoking ordinance, was ambivalent about the statute’s ambiguous

\begin{itemize}
\item\textsuperscript{36}Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 1-2 (Sept. 8, 1999) (copy furnished by JCPHD).
\item\textsuperscript{37}http://www.joebolkcom.org/meet_joe.htm (visited Oct. 24, 2008).
\item\textsuperscript{38}Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 1-2 (Sept. 8, 1999) (copy furnished by JCPHD). On the blocked preemption repeal efforts, see above ch. 28, 30-31.
\end{itemize}
language: on the one hand, the legislature may have prohibited local smoking bans, but “[o]n the other hand, because the language is not completely clear, this may not be the case. Only the courts can decide for sure.” In any event, he was (unnecessarily) worried about what he perceived as “pretty expensive litigation” if the county found itself “fighting Goliath” in case the tobacco industry financially supported a challenge.

Just as clear to those attending the Board of Health meeting was the near-term hopelessness of legislative relief: though Bolkcom as a neophyte had no “sense on where the senate stands on votes on smoking,” an internal medicine professor specializing in pulmonary disease was able to report that a few key senate leaders who had blocked an attempt in 1997 to repeal preemption “need to be targeted.” Perhaps in contemplation of such obstacles, Dameron, in discussing city and county smoke-free restaurant and bar ordinances, pointed to JCCTFY’s smoke-free restaurant pamphlet and expressed his feeling that “they should seek other positive [i.e., non-governmental] initiatives as well.” Dameron’s hesitation about embarking on compulsory imposition of health norms in this area may well have been rooted in his judgment that any ordinance should be countywide in scope and “wouldn’t be effective unless 80 percent to 90 percent of the population supports it”—a level that the movement’s own polling data did not 39Julie Mickens, “Group Pushes to Ban Smoking in Restaurants,” Icon, Oct. 7, 1999 (5:1-2). The day the Iowa Supreme Court issued its decision invalidating the Ames ordinance, White sought to burnish his image by informing the Johnson County Board of Supervisors that “4 years ago, when the topic first came up at public sessions and with the Board of Health, [he] had said that local restrictions on smoking would be illegal in Iowa because the State had preempted that. ... He said that at a public meeting with the Assistant Attorney General, [he] had said he told them that the law was very clear.” Minutes of the Informal Meeting of the Johnson County Board of Supervisors at 2 (May 7, 2003), on http://www.johnson-county.com/auditor/min2003/030507ws.htm (visited Oct. 23, 2008).

---

40Julie Mickens, “Group Pushes to Ban Smoking in Restaurants,” Icon, Oct. 7, 1999 (5:1-2). A study of litigation over local nosmoking ordinances concluded that “[m]unicipalities should not fear the cost of lawsuits: preemption suits do not have high litigation costs, because discovery is not a major element.... These cases are resolved on the law and relatively quickly. In the case of Ames...one attorney working part time defended an implied preemption suit.” M. Nixon, L. Mahmoud, and S. Glantz, “Tobacco Industry Litigation to Deter Local Public Health Ordinances: The Industry Usually Loses in Court,” TC 13:65-73 at 71 (2004).

41Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 2 and audio tape (Sept. 8, 1999) (archived at JCPHD). On the blocked preemption repeal efforts, see above ch. 27.

42Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 4 (Sept. 8, 1999) (copy furnished by JCPHD).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

even attain a year later when the campaign was in full swing and without which he and some other activists believed a ban would not be followed.43

At its next meeting on October 13 the Johnson County Board of Health focused so fixedly on the Master Settlement Agreement funding and formulation of a comprehensive tobacco control program that the only attention it devoted to a smoking ordinance was the announcement that at the end of the month JCCTFY would sponsor a town hall meeting on the subject with a panel discussion on health, law, and local policy.44 That gathering on October 28, which attracted about 50 attendees, heard Assistant Attorney General Steve St. Clair explain that when the legislature did not make a local government’s right to pass a no-smoking ordinance “perfectly clear,” adoption of one might be challenged in court. And for those looking to the legislature to rectify the situation, state Senator Bob Dvorsky had bad news: tobacco lobbyists’ “strong influence” in the legislature made such a change “tough to do right now.”4445

This panel discussion appears to have been JCCTFY’s last highly visible public foray on behalf of an ordinance for Iowa City until the beginning of the academic year 2000-2001, when, in August and September, Clean Air for Everyone, a subsidiary of the Johnson County Tobacco Free Coalition,46 came forward with the results of a survey of local attitudes toward secondhand smoke exposure and submitted a draft ordinance to the Iowa City city council,47 which JCCTFY had prepared and could have brought forward a year earlier.48

44Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 7 (Oct. 13, 1999) (copy furnished by JCPHD).
46It is unclear when JCCTFY became Johnson County Tobacco Free Coalition. Why it spawned CAFE is clear: “Chris Squier, Stan Glantz, and others had convinced us that working on youth sales was one of the least effective things that we could be spending our time on, so we switched to working on education around secondhand smoke and passed the smokefree restaurant ordinance.” Email from Eileen Fisher to Marc Linder (Jan. 17, 2006).
47See below.
The Board of Health of the People’s Republic of Johnson County Rejects a Proposal Even to Request the County Attorney to Draft an Ordinance Banning Smoking in Restaurants

I feel that the logic is simple. If we were talking about some other health risk, such as AIDS, TB, or smallpox, diseases that we all agree and are used to thinking of as dangerous to our health, there would be no question. The public must be protected and would be prevented from exposure to the noxious, toxic, disease-causing organism or substance, and those with the disease would be quarantined away. There would be no or at least minimal concern. We would all agree that the greater good was more important than the potential rights of the individual.

So why is there any question when we are discussing smoking tobacco? Is it because we don’t believe the science? That can’t be correct. The data is overwhelming! It seems that the only group that disagrees is the tobacco industry. Should we trust them? Of course we should not trust them. So then again why? Tobacco smoke has been long associated with social activity[,] is ingrained in us and it is hard for us to see it otherwise. It seems safe because it does not cause immediate death or disease. But we must break that paradigm and regard tobacco smoke like radiation. The difference is that tobacco smoke is potentially far more dangerous.49

When the Johnson County Board of Health returned to the ordinance at the body’s meeting on December 8 1999, even its presence on the agenda was contentious. A week earlier Dameron had informed David Nordstrom, a member of the Board and of the Occupational and Environmental Health Department of the University of Iowa College of Public Health, that he had not accepted Nordstrom’s suggestion to put the ordinance on tobacco use in restaurants on the agenda, in part for reasons of time constraints unrelated to content, but in part because two new members would be joining the Board in January with whom they needed to discuss the issue so that they would be more supportive. Nevertheless, if Nordstrom still felt that they needed to put it on the agenda, Dameron said that he would do so.50 His position unchanged, Nordstrom suggested that the item be titled, “Request for County Attorney to Draft Ordinance to Prohibit Smoking in Indoor Areas of Restaurants.” He also asked Dameron to get him the figures on the number of restaurants in the county.51

50 Email from Graham Dameron to David Nordstrom (Dec. 1, 1999), in Folder: Tobacco: 1999-, JCPHD.
51 Email from David Nordstrom to Graham Dameron (Dec. 2, 1999), in Folder:
Those data revealed 376 licensed restaurants and bars in the county, of which 82 were in Coralville and 219 in Iowa City, of which latter category 76 or 35 percent were also liquor licensees. Overall, about 100 or 26 percent of the 376 restaurants claimed to be smoke-free. The day before the meeting an apparently displeased County Attorney White faxed Dameron: “I’d welcome knowing at who’s [sic] initiative the smoking ordinance item has been added to the agenda and why.”

At the meeting it turned out that Nordstrom—who was sufficiently attuned to the politics of cigarette company intervention against local smoking ordinances that the previous day, after reading an article in The New York Times about Philip Morris’s lobbying against ordinances in New York, he had emailed Dameron and JCCTFY asking whether such lobbying had ever taken place in Johnson County or whether such lobbying expenses had to be disclosed—had already drafted a resolution, which he distributed. The resolution consisted of a string of 12 medical-, health-, and legal-fact-laden “Whereas” clauses followed by a “Therefore” resolving that the BOH simply “direct the County Attorney to draft a county ordinance to prohibit smoking in all restaurants.” Despite Nordstrom’s statement that clean air was as important as clean water, member Diane Joslyn
(a geologist and co-owner of a water well drilling company)\textsuperscript{57} and chairperson Jim Martinek (a lawyer) did not agree with Nordstrom’s resolution because they felt that “smoking is a matter of choice.” Although he was against smoking, Martinek did not think that Nordstrom’s proposal was a good idea: “I would much prefer that the regulation of smoking in restaurants be a matter of the market place.”\textsuperscript{58} So resistant was Martinek to change regarding smoking that the only thing he “would like to see” was “‘this is not a smoke-free establishment’ posted in restaurants that allow smoking.”\textsuperscript{59} What information such signs would have provided in addition to the smoky sensory perceptions that customers would presumably have experienced before reading them is as unclear as the legal need for them since the statewide law already required owners to post “signs indicating no-smoking or smoking areas and arranging seating appropriately.”\textsuperscript{60}

Parrying Dr. Richard Dobyns’ remark that he “would like to consider a less stringent [extreme?] ordinance that would have a better chance of passing,”\textsuperscript{61} Nordstrom half-jokingly countered that “I could have written a much more \textsuperscript{57}http://freepages.genealogy.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~slindbloom/pafg38.htm (visited Nov. 1, 2008).

\textsuperscript{58}Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Dec. 8, 1999) (audio tape archived at JCPHD).

\textsuperscript{59}Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 2-3 (Dec. 8, 1999) (JCPHD). His fellow board member, Dr. Richard Dobyns, opined that Martinek was a conservative Democrat on the issue of free will. Telephone interview with Richard Dobyns, Iowa City (Nov. 4, 2008). Nine years later Martinek had absolutely no recollection of anything relating to the ordinance. He self-deprecatingly reflected on his competence to have been a member of the Board of Health by mentioning that previously he had not known that pertussis and whooping cough were the same. Telephone interview with Jim Martinek, Solon (Nov. 1, 2008).

\textsuperscript{60}Iowa Code sect. 142B.3 (1999).

\textsuperscript{61}Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 3 (Dec. 8, 1999) (JCPHD). Although the Minutes used “stringent,” on the tape Dobyns sounds as though he is saying “extreme.” Dobyns later agreed that his position entailed coverage only of the unincorporated areas of the county, which was tantamount to no coverage at all: his strategy was to make a statement that would encourage cities such as Iowa City and Coralville to adopt ordinances. Dobyns felt that a county ordinance would not pass, in large part because of County Attorney J. Patrick White’s evaluation of its legal untenability and the Board’s respect for his opinion. Finally, Dobyns did not want to waste the administrative staff’s time on an ordinance that would not pass anyway. Telephone interview with Richard Dobyns, Iowa City (Nov. 4, 2008). According to Dameron’s recollection, Dobyns had favored coverage only outside the cities. Email from Graham Dameron to Marc Linder (Nov. 2, 2008).
extreme resolution. ... I stopped at restaurants.” In response to Dobyns’ argument that depending on how extreme the resolution’s wording was, its proponents would get various kinds of audiences, Nordstrom—who conceded that “[s]moking is a right” even though it was prohibited in many places—insisted that he did not think of his resolution as “extreme” since it did not even cover bars.62

County Attorney White, who viewed Nordstrom’s resolution as “premature,”63 recommended discussion of the legal issues, particularly preemption, before drafting a new resolution. In apparent continuation of the skepticism voiced in his fax, White stated that he wanted to make a presentation to the Board “before spending a fair amount of county dollars on this request.”64 At this point the attacks on Nordstrom’s proposal turned increasingly hostile. After Martinek, whose lawyerly expertise appeared to be as deficient as his knowledge of public health, had warned Nordstrom that defending an ordinance through the court system would take four to six years, Nordstrom underscored that in reality the single sentence at the close of the resolution merely constituted a statement of the Board of Health’s political position on smoking in restaurants.

The worst that Dobyns was apparently able to imagine about the ordinance, which was simply in too high a gear from the get-go, was that, if passed, a lot of people would be “irritated.” The resolution’s factual and rather restrained tone notwithstanding, Joslyn joined in this chorus of attacks by asserting that the proposal—which, after all, merely requested that an ordinance be drafted—was “pretty in your face.” Growing increasingly impatient, Nordstrom let on that he was still awaiting a correction of any of his resolution’s factual claims (none would be forthcoming).65

Even JCCFY left Nordstrom’s resolution in the lurch. Eileen Fisher of that group, approving of Dobyns’ position, charged that discussion “brings a little maybe unwanted attention to the issue before we’re quite ready.”66 She recommended that the Board table the issue because her group was forming a committee to research the possibility of passing an ordinance and the legal issues.

Dr. Donham, who saw two issues—preemption and “the citizen’s right to 62Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Dec. 8, 1999) (audio tape archived at JCPHD).

63Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Dec. 8, 1999) (audio tape archived at JCPHD).
64Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 3 (Dec. 8, 1999) (JCPHD).
65Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Dec. 8, 1999) (audio tape archived at JCPHD).
66Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Dec. 8, 1999) (audio tape archived at JCPHD).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Dec. 8, 1999) (audio tape archived at JCPHD); Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 3 (Dec. 8, 1999) (JCPHD). Any countywide ordinance passed by the Board would also have to have been approved by the Johnson County Board of Commissioners.

Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 3 (Dec. 8, 1999) (JCPHD); Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 3 (Dec. 8, 1999) (JCPHD); Johnson County Board of Health, Resolution Requesting Johnson County Attorney to Draft County Ordinance to Ban Smoking in All Restaurants (Dec. 8, 1999), in Folder: Tobacco: 1999-, JCPHD (copy striking Nordstrom’s language and inserting handwritten amendment together with vote).

Telephone interview with J. Patrick White, Iowa City (Nov. 1, 2008). Dameron confirmed that the Board had rejected the proposal largely because of White’s opposition. Telephone interview with Graham Dameron, Iowa City (Oct. 25, 2008). White expressed surprise that the competent city attorneys of Ames and Iowa City had gone along with the ordinances. He speculatively attributed their conduct to their being at-will employees of the city councils, whereas a county attorney had independence as an elected official in his own right. To be sure, White, who charged that Ames and Iowa City had wasted a great deal of money on the cases, was unable to put a dollar figure on the cost of defending a challenge or even to specify the kinds of expenses that it entailed, especially since no discovery was involved. Telephone interview with J. Patrick White, Iowa City (Nov. 1, 2008). In fact, when Philip Morris challenged the ordinance that Ames had adopted in 2001, the Iowa Attorney General pointed out that the district court case “was resolved quickly on the basis of legal arguments, without a costly trial.” Iowa Attorney General’s Report on Secondhand Smoke 39 (2003). Moreover, the Iowa City ordinance was not litigated.

67Johnson County Board of Health Meeting (Dec. 8, 1999) (audio tape archived at JCPHD); Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 3 (Dec. 8, 1999) (JCPHD).
68Whereas several participants later ascribed the resolution’s defeat to White’s explanation to the Board that an ordinance could not withstand Supreme Court scrutiny and was therefore misguided because it would waste a lot of money for nothing, the inhosiptable reception that a majority (including a University of Iowa physician) even of the Board of Health of the so-called People’s Republic of Johnson County accorded Nordstrom’s exploratory proposal shed important light on the inertial power of smoking laissez-faire in Iowa.\footnote{Years later, Donham, who characterized the Board of Health discussion as not highly argumentative, regarded the proposed ordinance as a public health statement even if it did not hold up in court. Telephone interview with Kelley Donham, Iowa City (Nov. 1, 2008). Donham’s recollection of the tone of the discussion was not consistent with the hostility directed at Nordstrom’s proposal, which was overwhelming on the audio tape. Nordstrom himself later listed the following reasons among those adduced by some people around 1999/2000 for opposing smoking bans: “1) it is not gov’t’s business, 2) public health can be protected by physical separation and ventilation, 3) the evidence of harm from secondhand smoke is relatively new and weak, 4) the effect of a ban could be negative on the local economy if people eat out less or eat elsewhere, 5) public health education is a more effective approach than public health law, and 6) counties lack the power to restrict smoking because it is reserved by the state.” Email from David Nordstrom to Marc Linder (Nov. 5, 2008).}

At the Board of Health meeting on March 8, 2000, County Attorney White, after presenting some statutory material, distributed an analysis by Iowa Assistant Attorney General Steve St. Clair, whose views, White conceded, “[i]n legal context...appear to be more supportive of local regulation than White’s view” and in particular argued that “local governments would be able to regulate smoking in restaurants.” White’s “personal conclusion” was “that at the county level we are both expressly and implicitly prohibited from taking away the authority to designate smoking areas that the legislature gave to the custodians of public places.”\footnote{Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 2 (Mar. 8, 2000) (JCPHD).} To be sure, the county attorney depicted himself as very knowledgeable on the subject, but in fact his claim that “[a]s far as preemption goes, it’s fairly strong,”\footnote{Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting (Mar. 8, 2000) (audio tape archived at JCPHD).} considerably overstated the relative potency of Iowa Code section 142B.6, which in 1990 had disappointed even the tobacco industry in comparison to the version that it had promoted.\footnote{See above ch. 27.} Although White had already revealed that the Attorney General’s Office disagreed with him, Nordstrom nevertheless asked whether any other lawyers in Iowa had a different opinion, but White professed not to know.\footnote{Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 2 (Mar. 8, 2000) (JCPHD); Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting (Mar. 8, 2000) (audio tape archived at JCPHD). St. Clair’s paper, “Developments in Home Rule and Tobacco Regulation” (Nov. 1998), a copy of which is included in JCPHD’s Tobacco file, was a precursor of the formal the University of Iowa who was a new Board member and did not feel qualified to challenge White’s legal conclusions (although she would over the following years experience White as unsupportive of other important health initiatives), suggested that the county’s next step be lobbying the legislature to confer greater express rights on communities. Finally, the BOH discussed adoption of a regulation in Iowa City and Coralville based on the identification of a health issue and the impact of a smoking ban on business, and Donham suggested that the Board issue a statement of its position on smoking in public places, but, according to the minutes, it appeared not to take any action. Consequently, self-deprived of any regulatory authority, Board members were reduced to working with business owners “to voluntarily support the ordinance for smoke-free environments” and to writing letters to city councils in support of the ordinances proposed by JCCTFY.

The Ames City Council Takes Up the Ban

Rick Carmer, owner of Wallaby’s restaurant in west Ames, said the survey is skewed because it couches the ban as a public health issue, while restaurant and bar owners see it as local government legislating business activities.

“They’re trying to ram this through based on people’s health.”

By May 2000, the Ames city council—none of whose members

---

75 Telephone interview with Pamela Willard, Iowa City (Nov. 1, 2008).
76 Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 2 (Mar. 8, 2000) (JCPHD).
77 Christy Logan, “Board Eyes Smoke-Free Local Eateries,” DI, Mar. 9, 2000 (3A:4-6 at 4-5).
78 Johnson County Board of Health, Meeting Minutes at 2 (May 10, 2000) (JCPHD); Kelley Donham, Chairperson, Johnson County Board of Health, to Iowa City City Council (Dec. 18, 2000), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Jan. 9, 2001 Correspondence at 2, on http://www.iowa-city.org/weblink/DocView.aspx?id=7512 (visited Nov. 1, 2008); Kelley Donham, Chairperson, Johnson County Board of Health, to Coralville City Council (Dec. 18, 2000), in Folder: Tobacco 1999- (JCPHD).
smoked\textsuperscript{80}—was looking into whether it had the power to ban smoking in restaurants (but not bars) on the grounds of protecting customers and workers from the dangers linked to secondhand smoke exposure. The initiative was, in addition, designed to reduce teenage smoking. The elimination of smoking in restaurants, Quirnbach argued, “could keep minors from believing smoking is socially acceptable.” Because even the total interdiction of over-the-counter sales to teenagers would not cut off all access to cigarettes, he saw the need for a broad view to implement an effective smoking policy.\textsuperscript{81}

Initially, the matter had not yet reached the city council’s agenda, though a motion had been made to put it on the agenda in the future. That a ban would not sail through the council was clear from the outset when member Ann Campbell insisted that “a lot more research needs to be done before the council will consider enacting a city ordinance.” Even though she personally did not like smoking in restaurants, she had not examined “all sides of the issues.... It has health ramifications; it has economical ramifications, and we really need more information before we go further.”\textsuperscript{82} Remarkably, given its later skeptical (entrepreneurs-and-markets-know-best) editorial position, the Ames Tribune enthusiastically backed Quirmbach’s “progressive idea,” expressing the hope that the city council had “the courage to follow through on”\textsuperscript{83} it:

\begin{quote}
Emily from Linda Muston to Marc Linder (Nov. 18, 2008); email from George Belitsos to Marc Linder (Nov. 19, 2008). Some members may have smoked earlier; three members who had young children at home at the time “were privately very sympathetic to second hand smoke issues.” Email from Linda Muston to Marc Linder (Nov. 18, 2008).

Rebecca Anderson, “City Council Researches Smoking Ban,” Tribune (Ames), May 12, 2000 (B1:2-4). The local newspaper conjectured that the “smoking ban proposal appears to be an outgrowth of the council’s decision...to crack down on the sales of tobacco to minors.” Richard Lewis, “Chamber Opposes Restaurant Smoking Ban,” Tribune (Ames), Aug. 24, 2000 (A1:6, at A4:6). Nevertheless, a leading member of the Ames Tobacco Task Force later stated that there had been no connection between the Synar amendment stings and the push for the restaurant smoking ban. Telephone interview with Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008).

“Smoking Ban in Restaurants Is Good Policy,” Tribune (Ames), May 16, 2000 (A6:1). The shift in the Tribune’s editorial position might, according to one Ames anti-smoking activist, have been related to the role of Michael Gartner, a strong supporter of no-smoking initiatives, who sold the paper in the latter part of 1999, but whose influence may have carried over initially: “The new owners and editor moved closer to the Chamber/business side as they tried to establish an identity. To the best of my recollection, their editorial policy made the shift. Also, they were trying to make a go of it and could ill afford to alienate the advertising buyers.” Email from Linda Muston to It’s sure not to be a popular idea to many people, but it’s the right thing to do. There is no “right” to smoke in a public setting and the Ames City Council doesn’t need to provide one. ...

And although it seems absurd to have to counter an economic development argument—this is, after all, a public health issue—a smoking ban in restaurants won’t even hurt tourism, according to a 1999 study in the Journal of the American Medical Association. ...

While we’d like to see the council go even further and ban smoking in bars as well, we’ll settle for a ban in restaurants so that the entire restaurant—not just part of it—is a smoke-free section. We hope the Ames City Council joins dozens of other cities across the nation and embraces Quirmbach’s idea.

In the spring of 2000, the city council referred the proposal to the city attorney. Quirmbach argued that the state clean indoor air law appeared to allow cities to control smoking in restaurants seating more than 50 (by prohibiting owners from designating smoking areas): “‘What’s at issue still in my mind is whether we can regulate smoking in restaurants under 50, and in that area, the state law is silent.’” In June the council delayed consideration of the issue in order to study it further and solicit the Chamber of Commerce’s views. In July City Attorney John Klaus submitted a legal opinion to the council dealing with the central question as to whether the city had the power to curtail the discretion conferred by the state law on those in custody or control of public places to designate smoking areas. He “conclud[ed] that the City can place smoking restrictions on restaurants of any size to disallow the designation of smoking...”

Marc Linder (Oct. 9, 2008).

85Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Apr. 19, 2008).

86Jocelyn Marcus, “City Council Considers Banning Smoking in Restaurants,” ISD, May 18, 2000, on http://www.iowastatedaily.com (visited Sept. 27, 2008). A badly garbled newspaper account had city attorney John Klaus writing a letter to the city council stating that “Iowa law allows a city to mimic a state law that bans smoking in restaurants that have a seating capacity of more than 50. The law does not say banning smoking in all restaurants is a direct violation but is ‘inconsistent’ with the law’s intent.” Quirmbach was then cited as stating that a city ordinance could “supersede” the state law allowing smoking sections in restaurants. Rebecca Anderson, “City Council Researches Smoking Ban,” Tribune (Ames), May 12, 2000 (B1:2-4 at 4). The Ames city clerk was unable to find such a letter from Klaus in May. Email from Diane Voss to Marc Linder (Oct. 10, 2008). See below for a discussion of Klaus’s later letter.

The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

areas in those establishments." Klaus based his conclusion on section 142B.2(2) of the state clean indoor air law ("Smoking areas may be designated by persons having custody or control of public places, except in places in which smoking is prohibited by the fire marshal or by other law, ordinance, or regulation"), whose use of "ordinance" made it apparent that "the legislature did intend for cities to have the power to regulate smoking in restaurants, even to the point of prohibiting the designation of a smoking area for a restaurant."

Unimpressed by the support that the Teen Tobacco Use Task Force/MICHC had voiced for the "concept of smoke free dining in Ames," in mid-August, a month before the city council was scheduled to discuss a smoking ban in restaurants, some owners were already complaining that since Ames was hardly some trendy California city or Aspen, Colorado, such a municipal prohibition could hurt their businesses. The board of directors of the Ames Chamber of Commerce voted 12 to 2 against the proposal on the grounds that owners should make such decisions, even as health-care groups in the city adopted resolutions supporting the ban. The Chamber failed to explain why owners' alleged 88 John Klaus to Mayor Ted Tedesco and Members of the City Council of the City of Ames, Iowa (July 18, 2000) (copy furnished by Ames city clerk).

---

89 John Klaus to Mayor Ted Tedesco and Members of the City Council of the City of Ames, Iowa, Re: Ordinance to Ban Smoking in Restaurants (July 13, 2000) (copy furnished by Ames city clerk). Klaus also concluded that the city council was authorized to ban smoking in restaurants with a seating capacity of 50 or fewer because, if the sponsor of the amendment defining covered public places to include restaurants with a seating capacity of greater than 50 was attempting to apply the law's restrictions only to them, "it was a failed attempt": "If the legislature had intended to exclude restaurants of less than fifty seats, it could have added wording to the law's list of places not included." But since the legislature did not expressly exempt smaller restaurants, a local ordinance banning smoking in them "would not be inconsistent with or in conflict with the legislative intent of the state law."
90 Id.
91 This group was later renamed Ames Tobacco Task Force. Mid-Iowa Community Health Committee, Minutes (Oct. 9, 2000) (furnished by Mary Kitchell).
92 Resolution approved by the Mid-Iowa Community Health Committee (July 10, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston).
95 Susan Kreimer, “It’s Impossible to Clear the Air About Smoking,” DMR, Aug. 31, 2000 (1E) (NewsBank). Remarkably, State Senator Johnie Hammond from Ames, an anti-smoking militant, while not surprised by the chamber’s vote because it tended to oppose all regulation, agreed with it that “we have far too much burdensome regulation.”
knowledge of their customers and their preferences entitled them to make public health decisions for them and employees. The business group had no answer to Belitsos’s question as to why the air people breathe should not be regulated “‘[i]f we regulate that employees must wash their hands after using the restroom.’” As for the Chamber’s mail survey finding that 65 percent of 98 responding restaurants in Ames already had smoke-free environments, ban proponents insisted that it was misleading inasmuch as most of the establishments with smoke-free policies were parts of national chains governed by corporate policies, whereas most of the locally owned, sit-down restaurants were not smoke-free. Moreover, few people in Ames would have been shocked to learn that “[b]y and large” the owners who permitted smoking in their restaurants were also the ones opposed to the proposed ban.

The council may have decided in July to study the proposed ban while waiting for the Chamber of Commerce to form an opinion, but the latter’s negative view did not dissuade Quirmbach from advocating adoption of a ban without delay. Nevertheless, council member Ann Campbell later characterized Quirmbach’s move to bring the ban to the council before having prepared the ground and, in particular, without having engaged business owners in a dialog, as a tactical error. The Tobacco Task Force strove to shape public opinion by underscoring that the central issue was public health. It not only pointed out that “no credible studies demonstrate any loss of restaurant revenue when cities prohibit smoking in restaurants,” but also refuted owners’ red-herring complaints about regulations interfering with their freedom to run their businesses as they saw fit: “Restaurants are already regulated from door to dumpster. We don’t debate whether or not owners can serve old meat or wash dishes in cold water or forgo fire exits.” In preparation for the city council meeting on September 12 devoted to the issue of whether to request the city attorney to draft an ordinance banning smoking in restaurants the Tobacco Task Force of the MICHIC was working together with the American Cancer Society to develop support. In order to counter opponents, who had already become active, the Task Force was especially “looking to the medical community for strong support.”

What the cigarette industry was doing in preparation for the city council meeting or even whether it was doing anything is unclear, but it was monitoring the ordinance’s progress. For example, in the August 7 issue of its periodic and nationally comprehensive compilation, “Local Issues Activity,” R. J. Reynolds noted that in Ames no ordinance had been drafted yet and the city council was not expected to discuss the issue until September. It is possible (but not certain) that at this stage of the controversy in Ames, in contrast to the cigarette industry’s contemporaneous strategy of direct intervention in ongoing campaigns to ban smoking by means of ordinances in other localities, manufacturers were simply monitoring developments and planning active involvement in the form of a post-adoption judicial challenge. Some confirmation of the existence of such a strategy emerged 16 months later when an employee of a food service equipment company who worked with independent restaurant owners spoke up at city council meeting in Iowa City at which Iowa’s second local smoking ban was adopted. After urging the council to delay the decision for a year until the judicial system had ruled on the Ames ordinance, he explained that he had contacted the National Restaurant Association, pretty powerful lobbying group, to see why they hadn’t shown up in this argument a while back this fall. They referred my [sic] to the Iowa Hospitality Association which is the Iowa branch of that group. Their official position along with the Phillip [sic] Morris people and all those people that are going to come in and lobby you if you decide to try and pass this...after the courts say that it’s okay

---

100 Linda Muston, “Smoke Free Restaurants Ordinance” (Aug. 25, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston). The ACS, according to Muston, had wanted a total ban from the beginning and used the Task Force as a “launching pad” for achieving this goal. Telephone interview with Linda Muston (Oct. 8, 2008).

103 Purporting not to have any knowledge of such events, the lawyer who ultimately prosecuted such a court challenge for Philip Morris later stated that the account given in the text sounded plausible. Telephone interview with Fred Dorr, West Des Moines (Oct. 14, 2008). See below for further discussion of this point.
to go ahead and do that. Their official position is they’re staying away because they want to wait and see what the courts say and then they are going to move in. ... I think those people are going to come in and the pressure that the Café [sic; Clean Air for Everyone] people put on you that you’re so sick of I don’t think is going to look like anything....

A large majority of the almost two dozen people who spoke up at the Ames city council meeting on September 12 supported the ban on smoking in restaurants. Among the 16 supporters were representatives of the Iowa Department of Public Health, the American Cancer Society, and three local health care entities. Of the five who opposed adoption of an ordinance two owned businesses that would be affected and one represented the Ames Chamber of Commerce. Rick Carmer, a restaurant owner whom some on the Task Force regarded as the strongest opponent of the ban, felt that the ordinance would restrict his free trade; moreover, no customer had ever complained about his smoking policy, nor had anyone at the meeting ever approached him about drifting smoke in his restaurant. Bob James, a truck stop owner, disclosed that a survey revealed that 71 percent of his customers smoked and 95 percent of 596 customers who signed a “petition to ascertain the[ir] feelings” opposed the ordinance. David Maahs expressed the Chamber’s belief that many restaurant owners would go smoke-free even without a government mandate, but that in any case the decision should be made voluntarily by the proprietor (prompting Quirmbach to observe that “it is the chamber’s position that protecting the public health should be optional”). He also encouraged the council to urge the measure’s proponents to engage the restaurant owners in dialog, which the Chamber offered to facilitate (without explaining how an organization that

---

104 Iowa City City Council Meeting, Transcription at 51-52 (Jan. 8, 2002), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/80.pdf (Jon Meester).
105 Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5-6 (Sept. 12, 2000) (electronic copy furnished by Diane Voss, Ames City Clerk).
107 Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5-6 (Sept. 12, 2000) (electronic copy furnished by Diane Voss, Ames City Clerk).
109 Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5-6 (Sept. 12, 2000) (electronic copy furnished by Diane Voss, Ames City Clerk).
expressly sided with one of the parties could effectively act as a facilitator). More sensibly, the same offer was made by the Center for Creative Justice.

At the close of the public comment period, long-time council member Judie Hoffman (who later became campaign coordinator for the Story County Tobacco Task Force) moved and Quirmbach (the only two sure votes for a total ban) seconded the motion to direct the city attorney to draft an ordinance banning smoking in restaurants that was in compliance with the Iowa Code. Mayor Ted Tedesco then asked the council to give more direction to staff regarding items that needed clarification such as the definition of “restaurant,” the question of whether the smoker or the owner would be cited, the amount of fines, means of enforcement, and models of ordinances from other jurisdictions. Hoffman then urged the council to support the ordinance in the interest of public health. Members Russ Cross and Ann Campbell also spoke in favor of facilitating community dialog, while Quirmbach argued for a dual track, with the council drafting an ordinance in tandem with such dialog. Against the lone Nay of banker Steve Goodhue, the council voted 5 to 1 to set October 10 as the “date certain” for reporting back to the council with a proposed ordinance. Finally, the council unanimously voted to include the CCJ’s services for community dialog. The 111Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5-7 (Sept. 12, 2000) (electronic copy furnished by Diane Voss, Ames City Clerk). Ironically, the Center for Creative Justice, which provided probation supervision, was committed to a “philosophy of Restorative Justice [which] views crimes as offenses against the community, not simply as violations against the state. Consequently, having community members become active in accountability and peacemaking helps our community build a sense of safety and capacity for collective action. Restorative Justice practices provide the offender an avenue to work through their difficulties in the context of their own community.” http://www.creativejustice.org/ (visited Sept. 26, 2008).

---

113Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Apr. 19, 2008).

114Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 7-8 (Sept. 12, 2000) (electronic copy furnished by Diane Voss, Ames City Clerk). The “date certain” language did not guarantee that the council would vote on the ordinance on that date. “Daniel Lathrop, “Council Approves Writing Ban on Smoking,” Tribune (Ames), Sept. 13, 2000 (1A:6, at A4:4). Cross’s later statement that the council had encouraged mediation and compromise because the a stricter ban could not pass the council conflated various events. Telephone interview with Russ Cross, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008). At this time, since only a restaurant smoking ban was on the agenda, lack of votes was not yet the issue.
Iowa City government took notice that the Ames city council had unanimously voted to direct the city attorney to draft an restaurant smoking ban ordinance.\textsuperscript{115}

Restaurant owners and anti-smoking activists met on September 28 to debate a draft ordinance prepared by City Attorney Klaus, which proposed a ban on smoking in restaurants less than half of whose monthly gross revenues stemmed from alcohol\textsuperscript{116}—estimated to encompass largely locally owned sit-down establishments accounting for about 35 percent of the city’s restaurants\textsuperscript{117}—while exempting counter-top bars in restaurants from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m., so long as no diners were admitted after 9 p.m. An additional exemption for truck stops was, according to Klaus, justified on the grounds that their customers were not citizens of Ames. Remarkably, restaurant owners, who initially seemed to oppose any local regulation, now insisted that they welcomed the ordinance, “but only if it encompasses all public places,” including bars, bowling alleys, pool halls, and even possibly outdoor areas deemed public spaces. The reason for this conversion was owners’ sense that they were being arbitrarily singled out by anti-smokers as the low-hanging fruit in a campaign for an eventual universal indoor public ban. Their suspicion, however, was that the ban would, in the end, not extend beyond restaurants, leaving them as the only regulated businesses. The American Cancer Society’s representative on the Task Force, Nancy Battles, fed these fears by pointing out that advocates in Ames were simply replicating tactics applied elsewhere in the United States: “That means choose restaurants first, where anti-smoking advocates think the public pulse is for the smoking ban.” Couching her movement’s conceptualization of the formation of public opinion in the metastasizing language of commerce, she explained that “‘[w]hat we’ve seen as successful in other communities is there must be a community buy-in’...”

In Iowa City, for example, a recent survey (conducted by an anti-smoking group) had found much broader backing for a ban in restaurants than in bars or other public indoor places.\textsuperscript{118} In turn, anti-smoking advocates were skeptical of restaurant owners’ new-found support of a wider ban.\footnote{Richard Lewis, “Public Forum Calls for Smoking Ban,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), Oct. 3, 2000 (A1:4-6, A8:5-6).}

3084

About 70 people attended a public forum/panel discussion of the ban held at city hall on October 2.\footnote{Lenwood Monte, \textit{A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food} 16 (n.d.).} The Ames \textit{Tribune} characterized it as “largely a one-sided, and scripted affair” populated by eight anti-smoking panelists and an “almost exclusively anti-smoking audience....” A few businessmen were present, but one cafe owner who felt “outgunned” and left early was portrayed as representative in opining: “‘Us restaurants don’t have the time or the resources to compete.’”\footnote{Richard Lewis, “Public Forum Calls for Smoking Ban,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), Oct. 3, 2000 (A1:4-6). Anti-smokers regarded Lewis’s reporting as openly biased against the ban. E.g., Michelle Clark, “Coverage Shouldn’t Be Editorialized,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), Nov. 13, 2000 (A6:2-4) (letter to editor).} Despite this (alleged) preaching-to-the-choir format, “[i]t was about this time that the ATTF realized that we could not achieve all we wanted to achieve in one, [sic] fell swoop. We realized that we would have to approach the goal of becoming smoke free through a process that involved ‘incrementalism.’”\footnote{Lenwood Monte, \textit{A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food} 51 (n.d.).} Oddly, the reason for the Task Force’s new-found willingness to compromise lay not in its antagonists’ stiffened resistance, but, rather, in their willingness to compromise: “The restauranteurs [sic] were convinced that they could not forestall the enactment of an ordinance of some kind, so they came forward with a proposal that gave them some options. Their most urgent request was for giving all owners ‘a level playing field.’”\footnote{Email from Linda Muston (for the ATTF) to the members of the Ames City Council (Oct. 5, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston).} To underscore ATTF’s eagerness to expand the scope of the ban, it informed the city council on October 5 that: “With respect for concerns expressed by local restaurant owners, the Ames Tobacco Task Force supports the restaurants’ advocacy for the inclusion of bars in the smoke free ordinance being considered by the Ames City Council. We believe that this partnership will result in prompt resolution and implementation to ‘clear the air’ in Ames.”\footnote{Email from Linda Muston (for the ATTF) to the members of the Ames City Council (Oct. 5, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston).} The two groups met again on October 6, but reached no common ground. The city attorney’s announcement that he had, during the week since they had last met, changed the draft ordinance to move its effective date forward from July 1
The cigarette oligopoly continued monitoring events in Ames closely. As early as October 2, 2000, the general counsel of the National Smokers Alliance, a front group of the cigarette manufacturers in general and of Philip Morris in particular, wrote a letter to a banker-member of the city counsel (copy to the city attorney) instructing him that “[a]fter even a cursory review of the laws and attorneys general opinions in Iowa, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the Ames City Council is preempted by state law from banning smoking in certain establishments....” After admonishing the council to “remain mindful of the constitutional guarantees of equal protection and due process granted under federal and state law to the business owners in Ames,” the cigarette companies’ puppet delivered its masters’ ever-constant message, to which the NSA “adults” swore fealty—“the accommodation of smokers and non-smokers in public places and in the workplace” and opposition to “government-imposed smoking bans and excessive taxation and regulation of tobacco products.” (At exactly the same time the NSA also put in an appearance in Iowa City, offering to pay people to 125For example, cigarette manufacturers and one of their law firms and PR firms circulated by email newspaper articles about the progress of the Ames ordinance. E.g., Heather Sidwell (Covington & Burling) to W. J. Leavell (Oct. 11, 2000), Bates No. 525110126 (several recipients at British-American Tobacco).

---

organize opposition to an anti-smoking ordinance that would prevent restaurant owners from serving all customers as they, rather than the government, saw fit.\textsuperscript{128}

The first draft of the ordinance, which city attorney John Klaus presented to the council on October 3, 2000, was, pursuant to the council’s instruction, “prepared to prohibit designation of smoking areas in all food service establishments except those that have more than 50% of gross revenue from sale of alcoholic beverages.” In contemplation of (preempting) litigation, Klaus took pains to craft the ordinance “to demonstrate its connection to” chapter 142B of the Iowa Code, within the “parameters” of which the ordinance “operate[d]” and with which the ordinance was neither “in conflict” nor “inconsistent.” He emphasized that the ordinance’s “prohibit[ion of] the designation of a smoking area in a certain specified kind of public place” “relies on” the state law’s express provision that “a smoking area shall not be designated in places where smoking is prohibited by ordinance.”\textsuperscript{129} A good sense of the limitations and datedness of the draft ordinance was visible in one of the findings of its preamble to the effect that designating smoking areas in restaurants (as authorized by the state statute) “has curtailed the number of restaurants that can be enjoyed by persons who have an allergy or other heightened sensitivity to smoke”—as if, by the scientific-medical standards of 2000, people without those special vulnerabilities could “enjoy” the exposure to secondhand smoke. The ordinance frankly revealed its purpose as “augment[ing] the state law by prohibiting smoking in certain public places in order to “prevent the designation” in them “of any smoking area....”\textsuperscript{130} The chief public place to which this smoking designation ban applied was one in which “food is prepared or served for individual portion service intended for consumption on the premises of the establishment....”\textsuperscript{131} In such food

---

\textsuperscript{129} John Klaus, Letter to Ames City Council (Oct. 3, 2000), reprinted in Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food 30 (n.d.).

\textsuperscript{130} Ames Ordinances, sect. 21A.100 (first draft) (Oct. 3, 2000), reprinted in Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food (n.p.) (n.d.). On the breakthrough in scientific understanding the impact of secondhand smoke exposure in the 1980s, see above ch. 26.

\textsuperscript{131} Ames Ordinances, sect. 21A.120 (first draft) (Oct. 3, 2000), reprinted in Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City establishments smoking was prohibited. Exempt from this ban were: (1) interstate truck stops; (2) bars in which the monthly sales of alcoholic beverages for on-premises consumption amounted to more than 50 percent of the establishment’s monthly gross revenues averaged over a calendar year; and (3) restaurant bars with a counter for preparing and serving alcoholic beverages for on-premises consumption between 10:00 p.m. and 2:00 a.m., but only after the rest of this public place had been closed. The civil penalty for the municipal infraction of designating a smoking area in violation of the ordinance was $500 for a first offense and $750 for additional violations; that for smoking in a food preparation/service establishment was only $25.

The mediation meetings that the Center for Creative Justice had been holding between restaurant owners and ordinance backers had aided Klaus in developing some of the proposal’s provisions. But while support for a ban on smoking in restaurants was, according to Quirmbach, “overwhelming,” during the previous couple of weeks “a fairly large block of support had emerged” for a ban on smoking in all public places, including bars and bowling alleys. This more comprehensive approach would, however, have been fraught with important drawbacks. First, its consideration would potentially drag proceedings out for many months and even into 2001. In particular, coverage of bars would tend to slow down the whole process since their owners had not been involved in the process until then. And second, Quirmbach doubted that such a bar ban would be as popular as a restaurant ban: “Again, we’d fall into a pitfall where, by taking a popular measure and loading things onto it that are less popular, we’ll have the whole thing capsize.” If, he argued, most restaurant owners wanted a level playing field in the form of coverage of bars—and Quirmbach was of the opinion that this argument was “not without merit”—then they needed to

---

Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food (n.p.) (n.d.).

133 Ames Ordinances, sect. 21A.200, 201, and 203 (first draft) (Oct. 3, 2000), reprinted in Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food (n.p.) (n.d.).

136 Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Oct. 31, 2008).
submit a written proposal and “try to get the Chamber of Commerce to support it.”

At the council meeting on October 10, City Attorney Klaus distributed his revision of the proposed ordinance prohibiting designation of a “smoking area” in any “public place” defined by the state law as an enclosed area used by the public or as a work place with 250 or more square feet of floor space. The anti-smokers were much better prepared for this meeting than they had been a month earlier: whereas 13 of them spoke against the ordinance, only five backers voiced their support; Belitosos, on behalf of the Task Force, endorsed coverage of bars and all public places, but also flexibly expressed support for the ordinance “at any level the council pursues.” Despite a month of mediation by the Creative Justice Center, restaurant and bar owners appeared to be as unreconciled to smoking control as ever. Maahs, for example, reported that the Chamber of Commerce continued to feel that a ban was not needed. Conjuring up the specter of regulation-caused bankruptcy, he claimed that owners could lose their homes since many of their long-term leases and capital equipment and working capital loans were backed by personal guarantees. Carmer opposed the ban in restaurants on the grounds that it singled out that kind of business, but also felt strongly that legislation should not be enacted because it was the people’s right to decide. On behalf of a local bar a lawyer from Nyemaster Goode, the largest Iowa-based law firm, opining that the ordinance was unenforceable, recommended that the council delay its effective date to give opponents time to challenge it in court. Perhaps the most colorful among the “outraged” bar owners to speak up was Peter Sherman, an associate professor of statistics and aeronautical engineering at Iowa State University, who claimed that the ordinance would destroy his business, Boheme, 70 percent of which stemmed from international students, in whose countries of origin “smoking is far more acceptable than it is here.” He audaciously proposed “an exception in the ordinance that considers people from different countries whose culture has a different perception on smoking.” As far as he was concerned, the council had a “duty to insure the health of businesses” just as it did to protect that of residents. The latter protection apparently did not extend very far: the cigarette-smoking professor, who wanted the ordinance to identify the level at which secondhand smoke exposure was harmful, deemed claims of adverse health consequences from outdoor exposure to secondhand smoke an insult to his intelligence. In a bravura performance of empirically refuted ignorant dogmatism, he asserted that: “You’ll never find an academic who’ll allow his Ph.D. students to do a study on secondhand smoke outside.... And I know a lot of lu-lu academics.” In general he understood anti-smoking trends as driven by the perception that “people who smoke cigarettes are evil” and “we need to squelch that evil out.” Restaurant owner Bob Cummings, who played a crucial 144 Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 4 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).

---

149 “The Flyover Land Talk Show” (Nov. 8, 2006) (audio interview), on http://www.archive.org/details/The_Flyover_Land_Talk_Show_01 (visited Sept. 28, 2008). Smoking was not Sherman’s only beef with the city council; before, during, and after this meeting he experienced licensing problems for serving alcohol to minors, for which he was at one point arrested. Jessica Anderson, “Boheme Under Fire from City of Ames,” ISD, July 16, 2002, on http://www.iowastatedaily.com (visited Sept. 8, 2008). Though he does not appear to have brought up the issue at this time, in a letter to the council in 2001, ignoring that customers were protected by and he was subject to numerous health and safety statutes, regulations, and ordinances, he erroneously claimed that “[w]hen persons enter a private business, such as...the one I own in Ames, their rights are superceded [sic] by mine—so long as I do not violate state or federal discrimination laws.” Peter Sherman, “In the Hope of Objective Consideration,” Tribune (Ames), June 21, 2001 (A6:2-4 at 2). Sherman later claimed to have evaded the ordinance while it was in effect by charging a dollar a year membership fee and turning the bar into a private club. “The Flyover Land Talk Show” (Nov. 8, 2006) (audio interview), on http://www.archive.org/role in mobilizing owners’ support for an ordinance, urged the council to slow the process down so that both sides could reach a compromise.\footnote{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).}

In a move that pleasantly and unpleasantly surprised many, the council voted 6 to 0 to authorize the city attorney to expand the draft smoking ban to include all public places (excepting only interstate truck stops)\footnote{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 6 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).}—an expansion that Quirmbach, despite “pleas from a crowd of protesters who packed” the meeting, justified on the grounds that the “‘response from the community is growing to undertake a broader ban.’”\footnote{Staci Hupp, “Ames Moves Toward Smoking Ban,” \textit{DMR}, Oct. 11, 2000 (8B) (NewsBank).} (Council member Goodhue later contended that “[w]e did not know at that time whether there was support. The ordinance and several media stor[i]es generated interest and sides were drawn. The council listened patiently, but I believe the ordinance lacked support as details of the ordinance were outlined.”)\footnote{Email from Steve Goodhue to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2008).} After the aforementioned lawyer representing a bar had suggested that the mayor ask a legislator representing Ames to request an opinion from the attorney general on the proposed ordinance’s validity, the council unanimously adopted such a motion; state Senator Johnie Hammond, who happened to be present, acknowledged the request on the spot.\footnote{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 4, 6 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).} In addition to voting unanimously to set the ordinance’s effective date six months after its third reading, the city council scheduled the public hearing on it for November 14.\footnote{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 6 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).}

The council thus expanded the ban to include all enclosed public places of more than 250 square feet (but not the outdoor seating areas of restaurants or bars) “despite,” as the Ames \textit{Tribune} charged, “knowing there could be a significant public backlash.” Councilor Goodhue, who voted for it, called it the “‘better of two evils.’” Given the anti-smoking groups’ rather timid initial approach, little wonder that Belitsos exclaimed that the new version “exceeds even my wildest dreams.” Yet he was constrained to concede that significant

\footnotesize{details/The_Flyover_Land_Talk_Show_01 (visited Sept. 28, 2008). City Attorney Klaus stated that it was not lawful for a business to designate itself a private club solely for the purpose of evading the ordinance. “Business Failing to Due to Tobacco Ordinance,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), Jan. 5, 2002, Bates No. 2085741689A/90.}

\footnotetext[150]{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).}

\footnotetext[151]{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 6 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).}

\footnotetext[153]{Email from Steve Goodhue to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2008).}

\footnotetext[154]{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 4, 6 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).}

\footnotetext[155]{Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 6 (Oct. 10, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).}
compromise might be necessary: he agreed, for example, that the Ames Tobacco Task Force would be open to discussions with restaurant and bar owners even about setting hours at which those establishments would be smoke-free. The reason, according to one owner—who implausibly claimed that “[i]f the point is clear [sic] air, I think we can provide that”—that anti-smoking forces might find such an outcome appealing was the possibility that it would help avoid a long legal battle surrounding the adoption and enforcement of a full ban. That Belitsos and the ATTF—whose self-proclaimed “watchword” was the incrementalist “‘Half a loaf is better than none’”—were willing to consider a measure as minimalist as time- and residual smoke-sharing in restaurants suggested that they were not eagerly looking forward to an “explosive” and “polariz[ing]” community issue in which they would have to confront both smokers and “those who balk at government interference with private business practices....” If, however, as the anti-smoking health groups programmatically proclaimed, a prime virtue of local, as opposed to statewide, anti-smoking campaigns was the opportunity for much more intensive and extensive discussion, they should have been cheered by council member Judie Hoffman’s perception that controversy over the ordinance was “the most closely followed of any public debate in her 13 years on the council.” In any event, the ATTF did thank the council for having moved the city “a step closer to smoke-free dining despite the controversy you have encountered.”

Just three days after the Ames city council had authorized Klaus to draft a broader ordinance, a brief legal memo, titled, “Iowa Law Preempts Local Smoking Regulations,” was already circulating at R. J. Reynolds and Philip Morris. A handwritten annotation on the latter indicates that it was sent “FYI”

---

156 Richard Lewis, “Council Votes to Ban Smoking,” Tribune (Ames), Oct. 11, 2000 (A1:6, A4:1-3). The owner quoted as proposing time-shares for smoking and non-smoking was Rick Carmer, the owner of Wallaby’s, who became one of the plaintiffs challenging the validity of the ordinance to which they had agreed.

157 Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food 15 (n.d.).

159 Ames Tobacco Task Force, “Public Health Is Priority,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 16, 2000 (A6:2-4). It is unclear why it took the paper more than a month to publish this letter to the council.

161 “Iowa Law Preempts Local Smoking Regulations” (Oct. 13, 2000), Bates No. to Theodore Lattanazio, vice president for worldwide regulatory affairs at Philip Morris Management Corporation, one of a group of company officials being kept up to date on various local anti-smoking initiatives throughout the United States.\footnote{162} Pointing out that efforts were being made “in some Iowa localities to ban smoking in restaurants and other public places,” the memo immediately launched into the untenable bolded assertion that the “plain language” of the identical amendments to the clean indoor air law and cigarette sales law in 1990 and 1991, respectively—passage of which the cigarette industry had secured—“demonstrates the Legislature’s intent to preempt all local regulation of tobacco products. Local governments may not regulate with respect to matters that the state Legislature has reserved to itself. The Legislature has expressed its intention to have exclusive authority in the area of tobacco products.”\footnote{163}
All of these claims, as will be discussed below, were patently false.\footnote{164}

During the run-up to the council’s consideration of the ordinance on November 14, bar owners, notably lacking backing from the restaurateurs, who had provoked their coverage, slowly began to form a coalition among themselves to oppose the council’s “‘messing with our businesses’” by lobbying potentially sympathetic council members to drop or modify the ordinance and propagandizing customers and the public with newspaper ads predicting wholesale closure of bars if the ordinance passed.\footnote{165}

The Ames Chamber of Commerce weighed in with resounding rejections of the ban both by its board of directors and its members. On October 25, the board voted 16 to 2 against a smoking ban in public places as it received the results of a survey showing the 66 percent of the membership opposed it, many on the grounds of “local government’s intrusion into private business practices.” The Chamber’s initial resistance tactic took the form of asking the city council to defer any vote until the attorney general had issued his opinion on the ordinance’s validity. If a blanket ban was adopted, the Chamber planned to request insertion \footnote{162}The sender in the annotation “Ted. Lat. FYI RHG” can be deciphered as Rochelle H. Goldman, the company’s manager of public programs, who was one of those involved in keeping abreast of local anti-smoking activities.

\footnote{163}“Iowa Law Preempts Local Smoking Regulations” (Oct. 13, 2000), Bates No.
2081008741 (bearing a fax date of Oct. 23).

\footnote{164}They were even wider of the mark regarding the cigarette sales law, under which the authority to issue sales permits was entrusted to local governments. See above chs. 27-28.

(A1:3-5, A4:1-3).
of a hardship exemption for businesses that proved that the ban caused them substantial financial losses.\textsuperscript{166} The urgent task of persuading owners that restrictions on smoking would not cause their businesses to suffer prompted Harlan Dubansky, a Task Force member who was also a former owner of supermarkets and convenience stores, to argue that the “economic part of [the smoking ban debate] is what we have to win.”\textsuperscript{167} Ironically, at this very time the director of the anti-ban Citizens and Retailers for Fair Trade Practices in Ames was declaring that “[w]e see it not so much as an economic issue but as people’s rights....”\textsuperscript{167}

However, toward the end of October, at least according to the Ames Tribune, persuasion seemed out of the question since “the task force’s support for a wider ordinance puts the panel [i.e., city council] on a head-on collision with the restaurant and tavern owners, who met for the second time in a week on Tuesday [October 24] to harden their strategy to fight the ban.” These unilateral meetings provided, to the newspaper’s satisfaction, “increasing evidence that the gulf between the two sides is widening. Each side, firmly convinced its position is just, has jettisoned compromise....” Indeed, ominously, already at this time the owners were vowing, if they failed to scuttle or delay the ordinance in the council, “to battle a ban in the courts.” To be sure, the anti-ban alliance’s consensus was being undermined by the fact that the “bar owners distrust the restaurants for throwing them into the fray by supporting a wider ordinance.”\textsuperscript{168}

On October 26, Attorney General Tom Miller, in town to distribute money to social service agencies, had praised Ames for considering a smoking ban in public places. In announcing that he would issue his opinion in two weeks, he added—in reaction to the aforementioned report that restaurant and bar owners, if unable to thwart adoption of the ordinance, would resort to court action—that “threats from the business community to take” the proposed ordinance to court “would influence how he interprets the ordinance’s legality. ‘[A court battle] is something we will have to consider.... It will affect the way we communicate our opinion.’” Without specifying just how such a threat might color his interpretation, he expressed the hope that the movement of which Ames was now in the vanguard would pressure the state legislature to emulate California in enacting a statewide prohibition. At the same time, however, he also fully acknowledged that “‘[w]e can’t go there until we change the culture.’” How that cultural transformation would take place and how long that process would last he did not spell out, but the increasingly insistent demands for creation of a smoke-free society by grassroots groups such as those in Ames and the initially divisive debates they triggered were presumably viewed as making a crucial contribution to the spread and absorption of knowledge about the public health consequences of (exposure to) smoking, which would then provoke the requisite reflection to trigger action by a critical mass of militants and acceptance by a critical mass of fellow citizens and legislators to overcome the weight of the past in the form of the freedom to smoke virtually anywhere that addicted smokers had come to take for granted and that the cigarette oligopoly spent great sums on cultivating.

The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

The following day the restaurant and bar owners thought that they had latched onto a propagandistic coup when they complained that Quirmbach, the council’s most vociferous ban backer, had thrust himself into a conflict of interest by virtue of his membership in the Ames Tobacco Task Force. He forthrightly dismissed the allegation, preferring “‘leadership’” as the appropriate label for his having openly put the proposal on the table and worked for it. Even after City Attorney Klaus had expressed the opinion that Quirmbach had violated no legal duty, owners charged that Quirmbach’s dual role conferred on ATTF an unfair advantage in lobbying the council and drafting the ordinance insofar as it “‘virtually had his ear.’” Restaurant owner Rick Carmer instanced the third and final meeting between the owners and ATTF in their failed effort to reach a compromise: the former were “taken aback when Klaus explained he had eliminated a clause that would have allowed restaurant smoking after a certain hour after intense lobbying from Quirmbach.” To be sure, that owners’ outrage was opportunistic rather than principled emerged from their failure to charge conflict of interest after council member Steve Goodhue had voted against the ban in his capacity as representative of the First American Bank on the Ames Chamber of Commerce board of directors.

170Belitsos had argued that local governments “are usually able to enact more stringent laws.... Also, most locally written indoor-air ordinances are self-enforcing. By debating the issue locally, the public is informed and comes to expect compliance.” George Belitsos, “Smoking in Restaurants,” Tribune (Ames), Aug. 19, 2000 (A7:1-2).

The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

The anti-smoking forces also appeared to suffer a symbolic setback when in October the Iowa State University Government of the Student Body Senate expressed its opposition to the proposed broad ban by a vote of 23 to 10, while the central administration of the university, which already banned smoking in all of its buildings except students’ rooms in some dormitories, refused to take a stance on the ordinance. The student president explained that while representatives generally supported a smoking ban in restaurants on the grounds that eating was a necessity, they drew the line at bars, to which, as mere places of entertainment, people who did not like smoking did not have to go. With ISU’s 26,845 students comprising somewhat more than half of the city’s population of 50,731 in 2000, the student politician attitudes, if reflective of those of the larger student body, might have given pause to the local anti-smoking movement, which at this stage appeared to prefer to follow than lead public opinion, although, ironically, preventing 18-22-year-olds from ever starting to smoke was (and remains) one of the most important goals of any tobacco control program.

Clean Air for Everyone Comes Forward with a Draft Ordinance in Iowa City

“Smokers feel like they’re persecuted, but it’s not smokers versus nonsmokers. It’s the public versus the tobacco industry for luring these people into smoking, most when they were under 18.

“Smokers are not bad people or dumb people. They got addicted when they were young. It’s a difficult addiction to overcome.”

175For the argument that the student senators were “a very small (and non-random) sample of the overall ISU student population,” see Michelle Clark, “Coverage Shouldn’t Be Editorialized,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 13, 2000 (A6:2-4) (letter to editor). The students of the ISU Student Health Advisory Committee favored the ban. Chris Gleason, “Students and Smoking,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 11, 2000 (A6:1-2) (letter to editor).
176Belitos observed that “[o]ne especially good social reason to ban smoking in restaurants is that adults will begin setting a better example for our young people.” George Belitos, “Smoking in Restaurants,” Tribune (Ames), Aug. 19, 2000 (A7:1-2).
177Kathryn Ratliff, “Smoke Considered a Risk,” ICP-C, Aug. 23, 2000 (3A:2-7, at 3096
Champion/ I’m just wondering if we ought to be thinking about some way to do this and not affect people’s businesses...I think in 10 years everything will be non[-]smoking.
   Pfab/ So what are you waiting for? ...
   Champion/ You know because it may affect people’s incomes Irvin and that might not be important to you but you know what it is to me.
   Pfab/ No it is but at the same time if I go out and poison you I may be.

[R]estaurants are and bars are entertainment, they are not essential to living..., we don’t need to go out to eat to be healthy.

In the meantime in Iowa City, Clean Air for Everyone (CAFE), the “public-awareness branch” of the Johnson County Tobacco-Free Coalition, which was formed in 1999 to educate the public about the harms of secondhand smoke, was simultaneously laying the legitimational groundwork and discovering the breadth and depth of support for a smoking ban. In August 2000, it paid a market research company to conduct a telephone survey (which the American Cancer Society helped develop) of 400 Iowa City and Coralville residents, 20 percent of whom used tobacco. As presented by Dr. Beth Ballinger, a coalition member and University of Iowa Hospital vascular surgeon, at a news conference, the results revealed that: 68.5 percent believed secondhand smoke to be a health risk; 83.8 percent believed that separating smokers and nonsmokers did not solve the problem; 76.5 percent believed that there should be smoking restrictions in their workplaces; and 88.2 percent believed that there should be smoking restrictions in the businesses they visited. When asked, “When I go out, I would prefer it if the restaurant...,” 38.0 percent answered “Not allow any smoking,” while 29.5 percent answered “Limit smoking to a designated area outside.” In contrast, only 24.0 percent preferred what was in essence the power conferred on owners by the then existing law (“Limit smoking to a designated area indoors”) and only 7.0

---

5A:1-4 at 4) (quoting Eileen Fisher, Johnson County Tobacco-Free Coalition chairwoman).
178Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 68 (July 30, 2001) (colloquy between council members Connie Champion and Irvin Pfab).
179Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 46 (Jan. 7, 2002) (statement by council member Connie Champion).
181Transcription of Iowa City Council Regular Meeting at 7 (Sept. 19, 2000) (statement of Beth Ballinger).

3097
percent preferred no restrictions at all. Of considerable use in allaying owners’ fears of financial ruin was the result that whereas 51.8 percent of respondents stated that they would be “[v]ery much more likely” to go to a smoke-free restaurant (and 21.8 percent “[s]omewhat more likely”), only 2.3 percent were “[v]ery much less likely” (and 5.0 percent “[s]omewhat less likely”).

Despite these rather favorable responses, CAFE, concluding that it was “clear that people still do not know exactly what breathing it [secondhand smoke] can do,” felt that its educational process and the achievement of a restaurant ban had “a long ways to go.” By this time upwards of 70 to 100 of the 400 “eateries”—including coffee shops and fast-food places—in Johnson County were already smoke-free. Release of the survey results was timed to lead into the holding of another town hall meeting, this time in neighboring Coralville, with medical experts, an economist, and an owner who had prohibited smoking in her restaurant. The cultural and communicational space for which the anti-smoking movement was forced to compete was, ironically, reflected in the decision of the Iowa City Press-Citizen to place a large ad for cigarettes in the column immediately adjacent to the lengthy article about the secondhand smoke survey.

A month later CAFE, which for the time being was not planning to cover bars, was finally prepared to bring its proposed ordinance before the Iowa City council, four of whose seven members smoked. At the council meeting on September 19, Dr. Ballinger, alluding to the survey’s salient findings, concluded that “the people in our community are already interested in this issue.” After having informed the council that CAFE would submit a smoke-free ordinance in the next few days, she stressed that the elimination of smoking in restaurants was designed to protect customers, especially young people without a say in their exposure to secondhand smoke, and workers, who “don’t have a choice about

---

Fred Lucas, “Restaurants Split on Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, Sept. 25, 2000 (5A:2-6) (erroneously dating survey to 1999). To be sure, before the legislature acted owners had always had the power to ban smoking.

Connie Champion, Ernie Lehan, and Mike O’Donnell smoked; Dee Vanderhoef was a sometime smoker. Telephone interview with Karen Kubby, Iowa City (Nov. 17, 2008) (Kubby was a council member from 1989 to 2000).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

where they work.” Observing that “probably” four (of seven) council members “would like to see this become a work session item,” Mayor Ernie Lehman stated that when they got the ordinance, they would schedule discussion as time permitted.\textsuperscript{189} The mayor, who did not “sense any opposition”\textsuperscript{190} and mentioned that some restaurants in Iowa City that had already banned smoking had experienced “better business,” stated that the question might be discussed at the council’s work session on October 2.\textsuperscript{190} Failing to foresee the breadth and depth of resistance, the \textit{Press-Citizen} reported toward the end of September that council members—even the smokers—were just “waiting for” the draft and “seem likely to support” it. For example, Lehman, a smoker, did not “see it being a hassle for anybody.” Though “most government or public buildings,” were, according to the mayor, already smoke-free, one group that was not protected was “folks who work in the service industry.” And council member (and smoker) Mike O’Donnell also purportedly backed an ordinance, in part, apparently, based on his belief that “smokers don’t want to bother anyone.”\textsuperscript{191} Neither CAFE nor the council seemed fazed by the conclusion of the Attorney General’s office that, although a local restaurant smoking ban “probably” would not violate state law, the question was still “open.”\textsuperscript{192}

A \textit{Press-Citizen} editorial quickly made it clear that a ban would encounter some opposition. Despite fully agreeing that the health impact of secondhand smoke exposure was deleterious and that restaurant non-smoking sections were a “joke,” the paper nevertheless adamantly opposed ordinances proposed by CAFE for Iowa City and Coralville to ban smoking in all restaurants. Its Panglossian market-knows-best position was straightforward:

Iowa City Mayor Ernie Lehman points directly to the reason: Some restaurants already have banned smoking on their own, and their business has increased. More will follow.

We should not make laws to regulate what is being—and will be—regulated by consumers. ... We are concerned about health issues for employees. But...considering our terrific economy, no one is being forced to work in a restaurant that allows smoking. There are plenty of other jobs out there.\textsuperscript{195}

\textsuperscript{189}Transcription of Iowa City Council Regular Meeting at 7-8 (Sept. 19, 2000).

As finally presented to the council, CAFE’s ordinance was brief, straightforward, and modest in scope. Following preambular recitals of scientific evidence of the health hazards of secondhand smoke exposure and of results of the August opinion survey in support of intervention, the draft ordinance banned smoking in all restaurants (including those seating fewer than 50 although they were not covered by the state law), defined as indoor food service establishments whose business was the sale of food for on-premises consumption, but only if their alcohol sales accounted for less than 50 percent of their gross receipts. The only other prohibitive feature was worded so incompetently that it (counter-intentionally) appeared to mandate smoking outside smoking-prohibited restaurants: “Smoking shall occur at a reasonable distance outside any enclosed area where smoking is prohibited by this Ordinance to ensure that tobacco smoke does not enter the restaurant through entrances, windows, ventilation system or any other means.” This outdoor ban was, then, designed not to protect those entering/leaving such restaurants from being forced to walk through smoke gauntlets, but only to prevent the wafting of smoke back into the restaurant. Restaurant owners, managers, operators, and employees were required to inform anyone smoking in violation of the ordinance of its “appropriate provisions,” though employees who did not control the use of the premises were not subject to the maximum $100 fine for first violation, maximum $200 fine for second violation within one year, or maximum $500 fine for each additional violation within a year of the preceding one—the same schedule of fines that applied to unlawful smokers.\footnote{An Ordinance to Provide Smoke-Free Environments in Restaurants §§ 1-2, 4-6, in Iowa City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2000 (final), Oct. 3, 2000 Correspondence at 4-5, on http://www.iowa-city.org/weblink/docview.aspx?id=7355 (visited Oct. 20, 2008).} 194

At its October 2 work session, the city council briefly took up the draft after the City Attorney Eleanor Dilkes had informed the members that she had not reviewed it in sufficient detail to conclude “whether I think we can do it or not.” Shifting the onus onto the council members, she urged them to “establish a policy position as to whether this is something that you want to pursue”; only then could she deal with the “major preemption issue as to whether this is consistent with state law that I’m going to have to satisfy myself about before I can recommend that you can proceed.” Seeing that all seven councilors wished to proceed with the ordinance, Mayor Lehman (apparently in all seriousness) suggested that if the city attorney determined that an ordinance was impermissible, “then we can require you know a skull and cross bones on the front door, or a skeleton and a sign that prohibits people under 16 to be in the restaurant.” Having received her instructions, the city’s lawyer asked whether the council wanted to deal with (underage/excessive) “alcohol first or smoking in the restaurants [b]ecause...it’s going to be in terms of the resources in my office we need to do them not at the same time.” Lehman opined that alcohol was “a more immediate problem,” smoker Connie Champion adding her belief that “some of the nonsmoking is already being taken care of by restaurant owners....” Hearing no contradictory views, the mayor told Dilkes to “go for it” (i.e., alcohol first).195

Dr. Ballinger of CAFE was so heartened by the council’s “‘unanimous support to look into this’” that she did not expect much controversy. Conflating support for the ban with support for authorizing the city attorney to draft an ordinance (a confusion that marked contemporaneous proceedings in Ames as well), the Press-Citizen reported from the perspective of quasi-inevitability: “Eventually, every restaurant in Iowa City likely will become smoke-free—whether the owners like it or not—after the Iowa City Council indicated unanimous support for the ordinance at a council work session....”196

The Ames Tobacco Task Force, Pessimistic About Securing a City Council Majority for a Broad Ban, But in a Hurry for Some Progress, Acquiesces in Owners’ Proposal for a Part-Time Ban

Although the ordinance contains “red light/green light” time-of-day provisions not recommended by most clean indoor air advocates, Ames deserves great credit for being the first community in the state to achieve a wide-spread smoking ban in restaurants.197

Contradicting all the talk of a widening gulf that the Tribune had been propagating during the preceding weeks, on November 8 it reported that restaurant and bar owners had offered the Task Force a compromise ordinance, the central and most provocative provision of which banned smoking in bars and restaurants (including outdoor areas where food was served) only between 6:00 a.m. and 8:30 p.m.; during the remaining nine and a half hours smoking was to be allowed in designated areas; owners would be authorized to shorten the nonsmoking period even further and extend the smoking period by terminating

---

Owners set the resumption of smoking at 8:30 p.m. allegedly because they believed that most children would be gone by then.199 Other provisions included: a ban on smoking in bowling alleys only between 6 a.m. and 6 p.m.; a total exemption for all bars in which food accounted for less than 10 percent of total receipts as well as for pool halls that did not admit minors; an exemption for bowling alleys and truck stops that built a separate enclosed room with a ventilation system; and a total exemption for places with on-premises live music.200

The actual text of the proposal (“Non-Smoking Ordinance Guidelines”) expressed a number of these provisions with greater specificity and also included several others omitted by the Tribune. The central guideline concerning restaurants (which did not mention extending the smoking hours if food service was discontinued earlier) specified that at 8:30 p.m. restaurants without liquor licenses “may break out a proportional share of the restaurant as the State Law now reads for a smoking section. No customers under 18 years of age will be allowed in the smoking section.”201 The same guideline (except for the presence of minors) applied to restaurants, bars, and taverns with liquor licenses.202 The exemption for taverns 10 percent or less of whose gross sales were accounted for 199 Telephone interview with Bob Cummings, Ames (Oct. 2, 2008). Quirmbach reported that he had tried to persuade owners to push back the starting time for smoking until later in the evening, but they refused. Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Oct. 31, 2008).

---

201 “Non-Smoking Ordinance Guidelines” (n.d.) (bearing a fax date of Nov. 11, 2000 and Daily Tribune as the fax source) (copy furnished by Linda Muston). The state law did not prescribe any “proportional share of the restaurant”: it merely prohibited the designation of any public place (except a bar) in its entirety as a smoking area, although it did create a special rule for one-room public places: “the provisions of this law shall be considered met if one side of the room is reserved and posted as a no smoking area.” Iowa Code § 142B.2(3) (2000). To be sure, the drifting of smoke made this bifurcation virtually meaningless. Even in the much more stringent Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, from which this provision was adopted, “one side of the room” did not mean one half. See above ch. 24.

202 The incompetent drafting of the ordinance guidelines was visible in the use of “will” for restaurants without liquor licenses and “shall” for the other group with regard to the non-smoking hours.
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

by food was followed, on the copy faxed to the Tribune, by the forthright italicized parenthetical sentence: “We do have a loophole.” The pool hall exemption was conditioned on restricting admittance to those under 21. The exemptions for bowling alleys (which were also subject to the same nonsensical condition concerning a “proportional share” for smoking in which customers under 18 were not allowed) and truck stops specified that smoking areas had to be glass-enclosed and the ventilation systems had to be separate. Under the heading, “Guidelines Common to All,” the proposal provided that: “Common areas of hotels and motels shall be smoke-free. A Smoke-Free Zone of 15 feet at the entrance/exit of all public spaces shall be maintained, except in locations where adjacent establishments preclude such stipulations. Live Music Venues shall not be addressed at this time.” Finally, enforcement was not to begin earlier than six months after the ordinance’s third reading before the council, but the “Guidelines under Law shall be diligently enforced.” This last merely aspirational admonition, unsupported as it was by imposition of any penalty for violations, revealed how amateurish drafting could comfortably go hand in hand with self-regarding bias.

Rich Johansen, owner of several restaurants and one of the drafters, while calling the proposal a “‘workable solution’” for both sides, shed some light on why owners were giving it “‘broad-based’” backing: “‘It’s a situation where businesses have looked at the fact that there will be an ordinance and why not make the best of it?’” Since owners regarded a ban as inevitable and their proposal came much closer to what they purportedly perceived as their self-interest—as little government intervention as possible—their last-minute gambit to make their businesses less smoke-free appeared to be risk-free, at least for them. Indeed, Johansen’s preference would have been for leaving smoking decisions up to individual owners, more of whom, he insisted years later, would have voluntarily gone no-smoking.

Nevertheless, securing consensus had not been easy: the proposal had, according to Bob Cummings, owner of two restaurants, been “hatched after a weekend of frenetic meetings with various restaurants [sic] and bar owners, several of whom initially resisted the proposal but eventually relented after being lobbied.” In the end, some 50 restaurants and bars supported the compromise, one of whose underlying goals was to “eliminate unfair competition among 203“Non-Smoking Ordinance Guidelines” (n.d.) (bearing a fax date of Nov. 11, 2000 and Daily Tribune as the fax source) (copy furnished by Linda Muston).

204Richard Lewis, “Restaurant, Bar Owners Draft Compromise,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 8, 2001 (B1:2-5, B8:5-6).

restaurants and bars.” Cummings illustrated this goal by mentioning that he would make the outdoor patio area smokefree at his restaurant so that it would not have an advantage over restaurants without outdoor seating. (Indeed, Cummings was so focused on the dimension of equal competition—which he described as especially acute between restaurants and bars in the context of a partial ban—that he later asserted that the owners in Ames would not have had a problem with a statewide ban.)

