\textsuperscript{997}Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the Proposed State of Oklahoma...Nov. 20, 1906 to November 16, 1907, at 21 (Nov. 20, 1906).
\textsuperscript{998}Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the Proposed State of Oklahoma...Nov. 20, 1906 to November 16, 1907, at 222 (Feb. 12, 1907).
\textsuperscript{1000}Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the Proposed State of Oklahoma...Nov. 20, 1906 to November 16, 1907, at 251-52 (Mar. 1, 1907).
\textsuperscript{1001}Democratic Party Platform (June 8, 1907), in The Oklahoma Red Book, 2:355-57
Governor Haskell’s first message to the legislature included, under the heading, “The Races,” the recommendation of “the immediate passage, by emergency Act, of laws providing for separate railroad coaches and waiting rooms for persons of African descent....” The bills quickly passed both houses by overwhelming majorities—H.B. No. 1 passed the House 92 to 13 and S.B. No. 1 passed the Senate 37 to 2 and 91-14 in the House—and the governor’s approval followed just as quickly. Unsurprisingly, the vote exhibited very marked party differences. Against the background of a Republican Party platform that “upholds the principles of human rights and personal liberty...and of equal rights of all persons regardless of race, creed, color, or locality,” 10 of the 18 House Republicans voted Nay and 8 voted Yea on H.B. No. 1, while 12 voted Nay and only 5 voted Yea on S.B. No.1. In contrast, only three of the 92 Democrats voted Nay on the House bill and two on the Senate bill. Similarly, the only senators to vote against S.B. No. 1 were Republicans, while only one of the other three Republicans voted Yea. Significantly, the two House Democrats most responsible for passage of the bill to ban cigarette smoking did not align themselves with the anti-Jim Crow forces.

On December 20, 1907, two days after the governor had signed the railroad segregation bill, House Democrat Andrew J. Snelson, a 45-year-old physician, introduced House Bill No. 165, “An Act to prohibit the possession of or selling of cigarettes, cigarette papers, etc.” The House—which in formulating its Rules dropped the ban on smoking on the floor or in the galleries that had been in place since 1890—referred the bill to the Judiciary Committee, but transferred it a month later to the Prohibition Enforcement Committee (rather than, for example, Public Health). Initially the measure prohibited the possession of cigarettes or cigarette paper, subject to a fine of $100 to $200, and giving tobacco in any form to anyone under 16, subject to a fine of $25 to $50. On January 11, 1908, more than 50 Oklahomans presented a petition to the Senate “asking for the enactment of a law prohibiting the use of cigarettes.” Then during the House plenary session on January 30, 1908, 44-year Democrat and druggist George D. Hudson (who chaired the Pharmacy Committee) offered this radicalizing amendment as a new section 3: “Any person found smoking a tobacco cigarette in this State shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined in any sum not less than $5 and not more than $25.” After two Democrats’ motions to table the amendment and to postpone its 1012 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the First Legislature of Oklahoma: Convened...December 2, 1907 and Adjourned...May 26, 1908, at 71, 108 (Dec. 20, 1907, Jan. 20, 1908) (1908).

---

1011 See below Table. 6.

1014 Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate of the First Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1907...1908, at 102 (Jan. 11, 1908) (1909).

1015 On Hudson, see “House Committees Appointed,” New-State Tribune (Muskogee), Dec. 19, 1907 (1:1-2); First Administration in Oklahoma 141 (John Brooks comp. 1908); 1910 Census of Population (HeritageQuest) (47 years old).
consideration for one week lost, the House adopted Hudson’s amendment\textsuperscript{1016} and passed the bill to final passage.\textsuperscript{1017} Some “advocates of the original bill” (which had banned possession) “pleaded that the law be not made repulsively severe,” but, according to the \textit{Daily Oklahoman}, “the house had the bit between its teeth and stopped at nothing short of the Hudson ‘lid’.”\textsuperscript{1018} The amendment was opposed by Republican Dr. Abel Sands\textsuperscript{1019} (who ultimately voted for the bill) and others, who argued that “no law is valid which pretends to say that a man can not smoke, eat or drink with pleasure, and that the provisions of the bill should be confined to the selling or giving away of such articles.”\textsuperscript{1020} During consideration of the bill House Speaker Murray, who had delighted the Constitutional Convention with his white supremacist rallying cry, left the chair to participate in the floor discussion, but his motion to recommit the bill to committee with instructions was defeated by a vote of 40 to 51.\textsuperscript{1021}

H. B. No. 165 had been pending for almost two months on third reading until March 24, when Snelson offered a committee substitute.\textsuperscript{1022} After another Democrat’s motion to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out the provision referring to smoking cigarettes was tabled, the House passed the \textsuperscript{1016} \textit{Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the First Legislature of Oklahoma: Convened...December 2, 1907 and Adjourned...May 26, 1908, at 137 (Jan. 30, 1908) (1908) (quote); “Bill Goes to Senate,” \textit{Evening News} (Ada), Jan. 31, 1908 (1:3); “Anti-Cigarette Bill Favored,” \textit{MT-D}, Jan. 31, 1908 (2:4). Hudson’s original handwritten amendment on his legislative letterhead is preserved in the bill file (copy furnished by OSA/ODL).

\textsuperscript{1017} \textit{Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the First Legislature of Oklahoma: Convened...December 2, 1907 and Adjourned...May 26, 1908, at 138 (Jan. 30, 1908) (1908).

\textsuperscript{1018} “Bars Cigarettes; Smoke, Pay a Fine,” \textit{DO}, Jan. 31, 1908 (1:1-2 at 2:1).

\textsuperscript{1019} On Sands, see First Administration in Oklahoma 173 (John Brooks comp. 1908).

\textsuperscript{1020} “Must Stop Smoking,” \textit{New State-Tribune} (Muskogee), Feb. 6, 1908 (3:2); “To Prohibit Cigarettes,” \textit{Indian Journal} (Eufaula), Feb. 7, 1908 (4:4).

\textsuperscript{1021} \textit{Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the First Legislature of Oklahoma: Convened...December 2, 1907 and Adjourned...May 26, 1908, at 137 (Jan. 30, 1908) (1908).

\textsuperscript{1022} Several copies of the substitute are preserved in the bill file including a handwritten version signed by the House speaker after passage on March 31, common to all of which was the elimination of Hudson’s amendment outlawing smoking as a separate section 3; instead, the word “smoke” was simply inserted directly before the mention of “possession” in section 1 of Snelson’s original bill. House Bill No. 165 by A. J. Snelson substitute for House Bill No. 165 by A. J. Snelson (copy furnished by OSA/ODL).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

substitute and again passed the bill to third reading. Finally, a week later the House passed it by a crushing majority of 77 to 11. Eight of the Nays were cast by Democrats, including Speaker Murray, while 66 Democrats and 11 Republicans voted Yea. Thus overall, 89 percent of Democrats and 79 percent of Republicans supported one of the most extreme prohibitionist anti-cigarette bills ever passed by a state legislative chamber. Only one of the three representatives from the state’s largest city, Oklahoma City, opposed the bill.

If the bill could be interpreted as an intentional blow against the American Tobacco Company, both parties had inserted sufficient platitudes in their state platforms to warrant an inference that such a statutory objective was consistent with their economic justice planks. Thus, whereas the Republicans boasted that because their party was “the anti-trust party,” the Tobacco Trust, Standard Oil, and other trusts “have all been upon the rack and will be made to cease their extortions,” Democrats, while declaring their belief that it was “of the greatest importance to the development of our new state, to give perfect safety and assurance to invested capital,” hastened to add that they “draw a broad line of distinction between capital invested in honest enterprise and predatory capital engaged in conspiracy against the proceeds of labor of the American people. We oppose the crafty corporations which artfully contrive to destroy competition....”

A week after House passage the attempt by Democrat and lawyer A. F.

---

1026 Democratic Party Platform (June 8, 1907), in The Oklahoma Red Book, 2:355-57 at 356 (W. Richards comp. 1912). The Republican platform did not take a position on liquor prohibition, but Democrats evaded the issue as well by declaring that the question had been removed from “partisan politics” by leaving it to the people to decide by referendum. Id.
Vandeventer to reconsider it with a view to striking the ban on adult smoking was defeated by a vote of 27 to 41. The argument on which Vandeventer—who displayed ambivalence toward smoking—relied was that “when a law attempts to invade the privacy of a man’s home it is ‘going one step too far.’ He said the bill was more stringent than the liquor law [which did not ban consumption].” In defense of his bill Dr. Snelson remarked that “the strict section was aimed to protect the minors, while it inhibits the use of cigarettes by persons indiscriminately.” Presumably Snelson meant that the purpose of the universal ban on cigarette smoking was to prevent minors from smoking and adults from becoming sources of cigarettes and role models.

After the Senate Pharmacy, Drugs and Pure Foods Committee had taken a month to recommend passage of H.B. No. 165, the very next day the full Senate voted 20 to 18 in favor of the total prohibition of cigarette smoking in Oklahoma. Since a constitutional majority required at least 23 Yeas in the 44-member chamber, support fell short by three votes, and the bill was thus defeated. Not a single one of the five Republican senators voted for the ban bill: two cast Nays, while three others were absent or did not vote. (That same day Snelson spoke to the WCTU’s West Guthrie local union on “‘The Cigarette and His Bill.’”) Although there were no big cities in Oklahoma in 1907—the most populous was Oklahoma City with 32,452—some positive correlation obtained 1028“Capital News,” Evening Times (Ada), Apr. 7, 1908 (1:4-5). Oddly, the House Journal does not reflect this move to reconsider.

1029See below this ch.
1030“Billups Offers Prize,” Checotah Enquirer, Apr. 10, 1908 (9:2).
1031Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate of the First Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1907...1908, at 587 (May 4, 1908) (1909). The typed copy of the bill attached to the committee report preserved in the bill file was the same version that had passed the House (copy furnished by OSA/ODL).
1032Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate of the First Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1907...1908, at 594 (May 5, 1908) (1909). The following day’s motion to reconsider also lost. Id. at 600 (May 6).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

between senatorial Nays and city size: senators from the first, second, third, and sixth largest cities voted against the bill, while those from the fifth and eighth largest cast Yeas. To be sure, the seeming closeness of the vote was in part a function of the fact that before voting, senators struck out the ban on possession but resisted an effort to remove that on smoking as well, which “defeat killed the bill. Its opponents, while arguing that the present law was sufficient, would have been willing to accept the bill with that provision eliminated, but contended that any such law with the provision would be unconstitutional.”

Several senators who voted against the bill found an outlet for their libertarian contempt of sumptuary legislation in heavy-handed sarcastic motions. Lawyer R. E. Echols, for example, proposed that: “Any little boy who plays marbles for keeps is hereby declared to be a bad boy and excommunicated.” A motion offered by Senator Roy Stafford, the stereotypically racist-segregationist editor of the Democratic Daily Oklahoman of Oklahoma City, inserted into the penalty section for smoking/possession provided that any 1034 The eight largest were (in descending order): Oklahoma City, Muskogee, Enid, Guthrie, Shawnee, McAlester, Grady, and Tulsa. The Oklahoma Red Book, 2:619-25 (W. Richards comp. 1912) (data for 1907). For senators’ home cities, see id. at 134-35. The senator from the fourth largest did not vote and no senator was from the seventh largest.

---

1035 “The First Legislature,” Checotah Enquirer, May 8, 1908 (9:5-6 at 6). The Senate Journal does not reflect this amendment, but the committee of the whole had recommended shortly before the vote that “Senate Bills Nos. 130 and 165 do pass, as amended” (without stating the amendments). Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate of the First Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1907...1908, at 593 (May 5, 1908) (1909). (Since S.B. No. 165 had already previously passed on third reading, presumably the sentence contained a typo and in fact H.B. No. 165 was at issue.) However, the motions preserved in the archived bill file are not entirely consistent with the aforementioned press account: although a motion to strike out “smoke” was adopted, so were one offered by Senator Sorrells to strike the ban on possession and a bill-killing amendment by Senator Stafford to subject cigars and chewing tobacco to the same treatment as cigarettes. H.B. No. 165 bill file (copies furnished by OSA/ODL).

1037 Undated handwritten motion on letterhead of the Municipal Corporations Committee (which Echols chaired) in the bill file (copy furnished by OSA/ODL). Unlike most motions, this one bore no statement as to whether it had been adopted, lost, or withdrawn or served as notice.

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

violator “shall be spanked with a barrel stave until he cries enough.” Failing to attract enough votes of freedom-loving colleagues, it lost.\textsuperscript{1039} P. J. Goulding noticed up an amendatory motion under which “it shall be a felony [sic] punishable by imprisonment by [sic] for life at hard labor or by hanging by the neck until dead, for a person to kiss his [sic] wife or husband, swehart [sic] or lover at any time between sundown Saturday night and sunrise Monday morning.”\textsuperscript{1040} And, finally, Senator J. S. Morris got his kicks with a proposed amendatory proviso “that in case of chewing if they swallow the juice the penalty shall not apply.”\textsuperscript{1041}

The 1905 law remained in effect until 1915, when it was repealed and converted into a no-sales to minors law. During the interim, however, the WCTU of Oklahoma City not only sought to aid state enforcement officers in suppressing retail sales, but contended that it could prosecute both several cigarette manufacturers and tobacco wholesalers in Oklahoma City.\textsuperscript{1042}

That the anti-cigarette movement in Oklahoma would confront entrenched legislative opposition to any further restrictions on smoking became unoverlookable by 1911. The aforementioned Vandeventer, who in the meantime had become a state senator, on the second day of the session successfully “moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to stop all smoking in the Senate Chamber for the session.”\textsuperscript{1043} Nevertheless, after the Rules Committee, which he chaired, had reported a set of Rules, No. 31 of which provided that “nor shall smoking be allowed in the Senate chamber or gallery, during the session of the Senate,”\textsuperscript{1044} by a vote of 14 to 27, he unsuccessfully “moved to strike out the committee

\textsuperscript{1039}H.B. No. 165 bill file (copy furnished by OSA/ODL).
\textsuperscript{1040}H.B. No. 165 bill file (copy furnished by OSA/ODL).
\textsuperscript{1041}H.B. No. 165 bill file (copy furnished by OSA/ODL) (also bearing no annotation as to its disposition).
\textsuperscript{1042}“War on Cigarette Started in Oklahoma,” \textit{Evening News} (Ada), Apr. 29, 1910 (6:5). The superficial organizational/convention history of the Oklahoma WCTU compiled by Abbie Hillerman, who had been its president from 1903 to 1907 and 1911 to 1919, is almost completely devoid of any substantive information on the group’s activities. With regard to cigarettes, the book merely mentions that in 1901 its legislative committee reported that the anti-cigarette bill had been passed and that in 1917 Hillerman recommended legislative work covering an anti-cigarette bill. Abbie Hillerman (comp.), \textit{History of the Woman’s Christian Temperance Union of Indian Territory[,] Oklahoma Territory and State of Oklahoma: 1885-1925}, at 46, 77 (n.d. [1925]).
\textsuperscript{1043}Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate of the Regular Session of the Third Legislature of the State of Oklahoma 26 (Jan. 4) (1911).
\textsuperscript{1044}Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate of the Regular Session of the Third Legislature of the State of Oklahoma 227 (Jan. 19) (1911).
amendment to Rule No. 31 in regard to smoking in the Senate Chamber. (Astonishingly, every single one of the 13 Republican senators voted Nay, whereas Democrats split evenly 14 to 14.) Immediately thereafter another Democratic senator successfully moved to strike out the word "gallery," while a Republican succeeded with his motion to recommit the rules to the committee of the whole "with instructions to strike out Rule No. 31 with regard to smoking." The Senate Journal’s aseptically skeletal version did no justice to the earthy substance and intensity of the real battle over workplace smoking that the press captured:

That a legislator so womanish as to sicken at the smell or smoke of a good cigar should either bravely endeavor to eradicate this weakness from his system by experience, or else resign and go home, is the final determination of the majority of the Oklahoma senate, and this majority, all smokers, abolished in perpetuity its former rule against smoking. And for three hours thereafter, the helpless minority on this question sputtered and choked in the dreamy haze of tobacco smoke emanating from the perfectos, panetellas, pipes, and cigarettes of the celebrating majority.

The question of “to smoke or not to smoke” has been agitating [the] senate for three days now, and the smokers finally win all their points. The house still keeps in the ban on smoking, owing chiefly to the fact that its best-winded speakers are not smokers, and therefore easily smother in discussion any efforts of the “smokers” to lift the rule.

Shortly before the opening of the 1915 legislative session, the press hinted at the pressure building up for repealing the strict statewide sales ban by observing that the law had been written by “people more enthusiastic than practical....” Hyperbolic editorializing demoted it to a “useless” law under which “it was an offense to even wink at a cigarette paper. The law was so drastic and unreasonable that no attempt was made to enforce it; cigarettes were smoked at will by anyone who wished at any time they wished.”

---

1046Party affiliation is taken from The Oklahoma Red Book 73 (W. Richards comp. 1912).
1047Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate of the Regular Session of the Third Legislature of the State of Oklahoma 259, 260 (Jan. 24) (1911). Why Republican Senator Brownlee offered the motion to recommit with instructions to strike out the smoking rule and why the majority was reversed on that vote, which was not a roll call, are unclear.
1049MT-D, Dec. 1, 1914 (4:1) (untitled edit.).
1050"Howdy," Star Gazette (Sallisaw), Mar. 26, 1915 (2:1) (edit.).
prohibitionism was nevertheless not inevitable was signaled by the virtually simultaneous adoption by the city council in Norman of an ordinance that banned bringing into or sale in the seat of the University of Oklahoma of cigarettes or cigarette paper and the introduction in the House of a bill to repeal the general sales ban, for which was to be substituted a ban on selling or giving cigarettes or papers to minors, who would be prohibited from possessing either. Although the bill was suggested by the Federation of Women’s clubs, supported by church organizations, and had the state YMCA’s active backing, which was “anxious to protect minors from the evils of the cigarette habit,” securing that objective seemed dubious in light of that group’s odd coupling with “practically all of the leading dealers in tobacco,” which also backed the proposal because they preferred a “plain enforceable law.” After all, not only was the existing universal sales ban unsurpassably plain, but the chief impediment to enforcibility was dealers’ own failure to comply with the law. Moreover, if it was, as the press insisted, a “dead letter” that was hardly if ever attempted to be enforced, why were sellers wasting their political capital on its repeal?

Even if House passage was not inevitable, the massive 81 to 4 majority strongly suggested that acceptance of adult men’s freedom as in-state cigarette buyers was coming back into vogue. Nevertheless, a “vigorous fight” for its defeat in the Senate mobilized 13 Nays against 23 Yeas on a non-party-line vote.

---

1051 “Bar the Pills in Norman,” Muskogee County Democrat, Jan. 21, 1915 (7:4).
1056 “Tuesday at Noon to Mark Close of 5th Legislature,” DO, Mar. 23, 1915 (1:1).
1057 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1915, at 877-78 (Feb. 24, 1915). All four Socialists voted with the majority. Party affiliation is taken from id. at 7-9.
1058 “Tuesday at Noon to Mark Close of 5th Legislature,” DO, Mar. 23, 1915 (1:1).
In the end, then, the legislature repealed the absolute sales ban, replacing it with a prohibition to sell or give cigarettes or cigarette papers to minors subject to a fine of $10 to $200 and/or up to 30 days’ confinement in county jail. For minors it was a misdemeanor to be in possession of the cigarettes/papers if they refused to inform police, truant officers, or teachers from whom they obtained contraband. The press viewed the new no-sales to minors law as “an admission of that cold fact that you cannot legislate a bad habit out of a man, but a declaration of the plain truth that we can legislate the temptation away from the boy. If we protect the boys of today the men of the next generation will be better as a result of that protection.” Although there was no gainsaying the addictive hold of nicotine on adult as well as adolescent cigarette smokers, this perspective failed even to take notice of the political role played by the national manufacturing oligopoly’s and local wholesalers’ and retailers’ profit-driven search for unimpeded access to buyers.

Despite the robust legislative majorities that had been mobilized in 1915 for repeal of an allegedly unenforceable prohibitory regime, even before the 1917 session opened, “[t]he women,” a deeply irritated and misogynist Oklahoma City Times editorialized,

[we]re getting active again in the matter of anti-cigaret legislation. They want the present anti-cigaret law repealed. Spite [sic] of the fact that thousands of them, from all quarters of the state, petitioned the legislature of two years ago to give us the present law, they come trooping back to the present session, petitions in hand, asking a return to the old law.

The old law prohibited the sale of cigarettes...to any one, minor or adult. It was as pronounced a dead-letter as ever disgraced a statute. Under it cigarettes were sold everywhere, to both minor and adult. No effort was made in any quarter to enforce it because of its ridiculous restrictions.

Feeling that an adult has as much right to smoke a cigarette as a cigar or pipe, and that the only restriction upon the sale of cigarettes needed applied to the youth of the state, the last legislature supplanted the old law with the present statute, which prohibits the sale of cigarettes to minors only.... This law is being enforced wherever we have county attorneys who respect their oath of office. It is certainly being enforced in Oklahoma City.

A repeal of the present law will put us back to the conditions which existed prior to two years ago. Cigarettes will be sold indiscriminately. The youth will buy and use them the same as the adult, for the reason that it will amount to no more of a crime to sell to a minor than an adult.... The enforcement of such a law would require the entire time of the county attorney and his force of assistants to the exclusion of the enforcement of all other laws.

1060 1915 Oklahoma Session Laws, ch. 190, at 387.
1061 "Howdy," Star Gazette (Sallisaw), Mar. 26, 1915 (2:1) (edit.).
The existing law is both sane and practicable. It can be, and is, enforced. It should be let alone. If the women who are so anxious for its repeal would devote half the time to the discharge of maternal duties toward their cigaret-smoking sons as they do to the circulation of petitions asking legislative action thereon, we would be enabled to witness infinitely less cigaret smoking and not be held up as a "nut" state throughout the union.\textsuperscript{1062}

A major empirical problem with this widely held view was that in fact, according to the \textit{Muskogee Times-Democrat}, the prosecuting attorney of Oklahoma County (whose county seat was Oklahoma City) had just “started” prosecuting dealers for violations of the two-year-old no-sales-to-minors law, whose “theory” was that “if the restriction only applied to minors there would be no excuse for not prosecuting dealers who did sell cigarettes to boys.” In the event, however, “[t]his law has been violated not only in Oklahoma City but in Muskogee continuously.” As a result, the rival editorialist perspicaciously pointed out in November 1916, if the 1915 law remained unenforced, “there will be no good argument against going back to the old law which provided penalties for selling cigarettes to anyone.”\textsuperscript{1063}

At the outset of the 1917 session a strict general sales ban was introduced, which, in addition, banned smoking cigarettes altogether. This sudden reversal was embodied in the House member who introduced and was the driving force behind House Bill No. 3, J. O. McCollister, who had himself voted for repeal in the previous session. Born in Indiana in 1862 and a resident from 1873 to 1900 of Iowa, where he was, inter alia, a telegrapher and county auditor, McCollister then moved to Oklahoma, where he opened a farm loan business and later engaged in real estate, insurance, and abstracting businesses. That he was a steward and trustee of his local Methodist Episcopal Church, South, superintendent of its Sunday school for 14 years, a member of the Oklahoma executive committee of the International Sunday School Association, and “devoted to the cause of prohibition,”\textsuperscript{1064} suggests that his participation in the anti-cigarette struggle may have been largely religiously motivated. H.B. No. 3, which McCollister, a representative from Mangum (pop. about 3,500),\textsuperscript{1065} introduced on January 3, together with Democrat Daniel B. Collums, a newspaper editor/publisher and former State Text Book Commission member, and Republican Amos A. Ewing, the former State oil inspector, made it unlawful for any person to smoke a cigarette, or individual or corporation, to have in possession, sell, offer for sale, give away, barter or otherwise dispose of, upon any pretext or devise, or to bring into the State for the purpose of selling, offering for sale, giving away, bartering, or otherwise disposing of any cigarettes, cigarette paper, or substitute therefor; or to solicit the purchase or sale of any such cigarettes, cigarette paper or substitute therefor, either in person or by sign, circular, letter, card, price list, advertisement or otherwise, or to distribute, publish or display any advertisement, sign or notice where any such cigarettes, cigarette paper or substitute therefor, may be manufactured, sold, given away, bartered or otherwise disposed of.

The punishment for violating this unusually comprehensive anti-cigarette measure, which prohibited smoking, possessing, selling, or advertising cigarettes, was a fine ranging between $10 and $500.

A week later the House Judiciary Committee, to which it had been referred, recommended its passage and on January 13 the full House passed, unamended, H.B. No. 3—“one of the most radical measures ever passed by a legislative body in the history of the state”—by the large majority of 79 to 21: 63 Democrats and 16 Republicans voting Aye, and 17 Democrats and 4 Republicans Nay. Some constitutional lawyer House members (as well as

---

1066Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 22 (Jan. 3); “Twenty Bills Introduced at Second Session,” DO, Jan. 4, 1917 (1:1, at 2:3).
10671910 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); The Oklahoma Red Book 2:145 (W. Richards comp. 1912).
10681900 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); The Oklahoma Red Book 2:149 (W. Richards comp. 1912).
1072House Passes Anti-Cigaret Bill 79 to 21,” OCT, Jan. 13, 1917 (1:3).
1073Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 426-27 (Jan. 13). On the proceedings in the committee of the whole, see “Anti-Cigaret Bill to Third Reading,” DO, Jan. 13, 1917 (2:1).
some senators) expressed doubt as to the constitutionality of the smoking ban, but, in a radicalized prohibitionist trend, there appeared to be “some sentiment in the legislature in favor of making laws regarding the liquor traffic and the handling of cigarettes apply with equal force to both user and the seller.”\footnote{Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans}

The press all over the country took notice of House passage of a cigarette smoking ban,\footnote{“House Passes Bill Cutting Filing Fee,” \textit{DO}, Jan. 14, 1917 (4A:1-2).} though the wire service(s) doubtless heightened interest in this legal development by erroneously reporting that the proposed statute was criminal and subjected violators to arrest.\footnote{The non-Oklahoma press got its juxtapositional jollies by running a filler knocking the state’s atavistic legislators, headlined, “Oklahoma Against Birth Control and Cigarettes,” which pointed out that the Oklahoma House had “served notice on the world today that it opposes such new fangled things as birth control and cigarette smoking for women” by passing the ban on cigarette smoking and unanimously adopting a resolution congratulating an Oklahoma couple on giving birth to quadruplets.\footnote{“To Prohibit Cigarettes,” \textit{Muskogee Cimeter}, Mar. 3, 1917 (1:2) (reprinting editorial from \textit{Cincinnati Enquirer}).} The Democratic \textit{Cincinnati Enquirer} opined that the “fatuous” Oklahoma House members “must have known that their stuff and nonsense will not be heeded in the slightest by the adult citizens of their state.”\footnote{See above ch. 6.} In another sign of an attitudinal trend reversal, the \textit{Chicago Tribune}, which in the 1890s had adopted a very hard line against cigarettes,\footnote{\textit{1524}} seemed to anticipate the National Rifle Association’s rhetoric in blaming consumers and giving the commodity a clean bill of health. It now argued that it was the cigarette’s “relative harmlessness” that caused its “bad reputation in communities which still regard it as an instrument of deadly sin” despite the fact that the editor was fully aware of one basic reason for cigarettes’ heightened lethality: “Because of the mildness of the cigarette the smoke can be inhaled and the cigarette carries the medical reproach that belongs to the manner of smoking it.” The paper therefore pooh-poohed Oklahoma’s do-gooder-legislators’ intervention as driven by their desire to “protect people from the risk of selection in their own habits.”

Once the no-smoking ban bill had gone through the House and been sent on to the Senate, the Tobacco Merchants Association, the cigarette oligopoly’s legislative and propaganda arm, busy as it was monitoring sales ban bills in various states, went into red alert mode, “address[ing] a circular to the entire tobacco trade in...Oklahoma, urging them to put up a united opposition to the bill.” Inter alia, TMA insisted that:

“It is needless to say that such legislation is an interference with personal liberty and an unjust attack upon one of the biggest industries in this country.

“We believe that the Oklahoma tobacco people should protest against the passage of such measure in the most vigorous fashion and we would respectfully suggest that the tobacco trade in Oklahoma start at once a united movement to defeat the bill in the Senate. A letter addressed to every one of your legislators protesting against such legislation will undoubtedly bring forth the desired results.”

Whether the cigarette oligopolists were conspiring to defeat H.B. No. 3 in the Senate is unknown, but from the outset the bill’s progress was impeded in that chamber, where, unlike the situation in the House, smoking was “indulged in”: “Feet are appearing on desks, pipe and cigaret smoke has been added to the haze from ‘ten centers’ that were burned as first offerings.” The Senate Prohibition Enforcement Committee held a hearing on the bill on January 30, at which 14 women, most of them WCTU members, appeared in support of the bill on the unsurprising grounds that it would serve their goal of “sav[ing] the boys of the state from the evils of the cigaret habit.” Oscar Halsell, president of an Oklahoma City wholesale grocery firm purportedly appeared not in that

---

1080“Cigarets,” CT, Jan. 16, 1917 (6) (edit.)
1081See below ch. 17.
1083aSenators Adopt Regular Gait,” OCT, Jan. 11, 1917 (6:2). On smoking rules, see below Tab. 6.
1085a“Mrs. G. D. Kile for Cigaret Bill,” OCT, Jan. 31, 1917 (1:6). This article corrected one from the previous day that had erroneously characterized Kile as opposed to the measure. “‘Hippers’ Would Sell ‘Pills’ If Bill Is Passed,” OCT, Jan. 30, 1917 (1:5).
capacity—because “did not sell very many cigarets”—but as the father of two sons. His opposition to the 1901-1915 laws (and, by implication, H.B. No. 3) was rooted in their (allegedly) dysfunctional child-psychology underpinnings: it had tended to promote cigarette smoking by boys “because it was forbidden to them and securing of cigarets from ‘bootleggers’ was a kind of sport.” In contrast, prosecution under the 1915 law was “practicable” because it compelled boys to identify their sources. (Why practicing the manly art of not snitching could not be equally sporting Halsell failed to explain.) Whether any of this testimony had any impact on the committee members is unclear, but at some point, the press reported, “it seemed certain” that the committee would send H.B. No. 3 to the Senate floor with a do pass recommendation, but when members who had absented themselves from the hearing room returned, the majority flipped and Democrats Beauman, Johnson, Wilson, and Kerr, and Republican Ferguson outvoted Democrats Cordell (chairman) and Cline, forcing a continuation of the hearing on February 6, when representatives of jobbing houses and other interests were to appear. Remarkably, the press failed to report on any testimony that focused on the aspect of McCollister’s proposal that radically distinguished it from the earlier general sales ban—namely, the universal smoking ban—although it was precisely this feature that prompted both comparing it as a “joke” to the propaganda of “some elderly lady” to abolish coffee and the expectation that it would be “quickly killed” in the Senate Prohibition Enforcement Committee.

On February a three-member Democratic majority of the seven-member committee recommended that H.B. No. 3 not pass, instead recommending a substitute that simply amended the 1915 law to make jail time mandatory.

---

1088“Naturalist Pleads for Wild Animals,” DO, Jan. 31, 1917 (2:4-5). If this second hearing took place the press appears not to have reported on it. Republican Walter Ferguson, who introduced the session’s “bone-dry” liquor prohibition bill, was yet another newspaper editor. “‘Bone Dry’ Bill Becomes a Law,” OCT, Feb. 24, 1917 (1:5).
1090“The Sixth Oklahoma Legislature,” Sequoyah County Democrat, Feb. 2, 1917 (6:1) (edit.) (erroneously asserting that House opponents had “deftly injected the clause ‘or the smoking of same’ with the hopes that the senate would kill it on account of its drastic restrictions”).
1091For the committee membership, see “The Legislature,” Standard-Sentinel (Stilwell), Jan. 18, 1917 (2:3-4).
1092Senate Chamber, State of Oklahoma, Sixth Legislature, Committee Prohibition Enforcement (Feb. 7, 1917) (signed by Kerr, G. L. Wilson, and Beauman) (copy furnished by OSA/ODL).
(rather than discretionary) and authorize judges to impose between 10 and 90 days (rather than a maximum of 30 days). That McCollister’s most radical proposal was dead became clear when the next day a two-member minority report (signed by chairman Cordell and Cline) recommended in lieu of the majority report passage of H.B. No. 3 with the smoking ban eliminated. The Muskogee Times-Democrat, which was owned by Democratic State Senator Eugene Mortimer Kerr, characterized the committee majority and minority bills that the full Senate would consider as “practically the present law” and “that demanded by the W.C.T.U. and Anti-Saloon League...[as] prohibiting sale in or shipment in to the state.”

So sure must the Oklahoma City Times have been that (cigarette) smoking would persist that a week later it editorially urged the city’s Carnegie library to get beyond its then policy (“that the library was a library and not a place where men might smoke”) and set aside a room in which “men might sit in the big easy chairs, read instructive books and magazines and indulge in a smoke....” At a time when public places were still contested spaces as to the appropriateness of smoking, and the editorialist, fully recognizing that nonsmokers would “[o]f course...declare that a reader should be able to get along a few hours without blowing rings of smoke above his head,” tactically eschewed a “discussion of the ethics of smoking, or considering the fearful effect of tobacco on the human system,” he nevertheless purported to be solicitous of the intellectual needs of “working men,” many of whom “would patronize the library at night” and “make better citizens” if only “there were a place where they might have a quiet smoke.”

A week later—at the same time that the House was passing a Senate bone-dry liquor bill—acting as the bill’s floor manager, Harry B. Cordell, a farmer, long-time senator, and future president of the State Board of Agriculture, moved that his minority report be substituted for the majority report. Although the Senate adopted his motion by a vote of 20 to 15 and he succeeded in all his...
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

motions to table various weakening amendments, he was unable to block a motion by Senator William Milton Bickel, a lawyer and chair of the Democratic caucus, to refer the bill to a special committee (to which Bickel, Cordell, and Kerr were appointed) with instructions to return a bill merely prohibiting the sale of cigarettes to minors and creating a dealer licensure system.\textsuperscript{1097} The amendments had all been offered by Kerr (1869-1943), who later became a member and president of the Board of Regents of the Oklahoma State University.\textsuperscript{1098} He began with a maximalist position, amending the bill back to a mere no-sales-minors law; his second amendment proposed a licensure system; and his final proposal would have clarified McCollister’s ban on cigarette advertising to include newspapers and magazines\textsuperscript{1099}—an odd one for a publisher of precisely such ads, unless he intended it as a killer amendment.

Floor attacks on the bill were initiated by yet another newspaper editor-publisher, Austrian-born Democrat John Golobie of the Guthrie Register,\textsuperscript{1100} who, deploying a topos that was frequently aired in Oklahoma, denounced H.B. No. 3 as a “an attempt to make grown men suffer deprivation of luxuries they enjoyed just to take away from home the matter of training children and make it police regulation.” (Proponents’s apparent failure to justify the instrumental deprivation of men’s consumer freedom for the sake of the next generation of men was hardly unique to Oklahoma.) Moreover, he asked supporters, if they wanted to protect minors, “why don’t you enforce the present law?”\textsuperscript{1101} Democratic Senator Robert Keller delivered himself of the debate’s most explosive oratory. An ex-Texas cowboy, lawyer, and Helen Keller’s second cousin, professed to strive to make the Democratic Party “balance between the extremes of socialism and standpatism.”\textsuperscript{1102} Declaring that “he smoked cigarettes and that no law would \textsuperscript{1099}Journal of the Senate of the Regular Session: Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 708-9 (Feb. 15).

\textsuperscript{1100}N.W. Ayer & Son, American Newspaper Annual & Directory 788 (1917).

\textsuperscript{1101}“Bone-Dry Bill Is Passed by House After Hot Debate,” \textit{DO}, Feb. 16, 1917 (1:1, at 3:2-4 at 4).

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

forbid him using newspaper to roll them if he liked,” he thanked God that the state supreme court still protected people against such laws, which gave the legislature a “reputation for being a bunch of freaks.” Cordell’s response that “[a]ll the good people of the state are demanding this bill become a new law. It is for the uplift of the morals of the state,” prompted Keller to demand to know: “‘Where do you get that morals stuff.... What’s that got to do with keeping grown men from smoking cigarets if they want to?,’”1103 The question was not without justification since Cordell’s minority report had struck the smoking ban while retaining that on possession, but instead of explicating the logical links between statewide morality and enforced abstinence from cigarette smoking—indeed, instead of offering any verbal defense of outlawing sales to or possession of by adult males altogether—Cordell merely “waved a sheath of signed petitions in reply,”1104 as if sheer numbers demonstrated anything about the petitioners’ moral goodness. Having hardly shot his bolt, Keller then (literally) turned on several women observers sitting in the back of the Senate chamber: “‘Quit your lobbying and stay home and spank your own babies instead of trying to raise mine for me. Don’t make the senate raise your boys. Look after them yourselves,’ he shouted.”1105

The press did not explain why Cordell and his colleagues, who had “substituted a ‘bone-dry’ anti-cigaret bill for practical reenactment of the present law recommended by a majority of the prohibition reinforcement committee, were unable to hold their control of the situation” or why they were confronted with an exact reversal of the 20-15 vote on Bickel’s motion while a “bone-dry” liquor bill, on which the Cordell substitute was modelled, was passing through the legislature.1106

1103a “Bone-Dry Bill Is Passed by House After Hot Debate,” DO, Feb. 16, 1917 (1:1, at 3:2-4 at 4). When he was a county judge in 1911 a complaint was made to the governor that Keller had removed confiscated liquor from the courthouse and consumed it. James Klein, Grappling with Demon Rum: The Cultural Struggle over Liquor in Early Oklahoma 64 (2008).

1104a “Would Prohibit Cigarette Sales to All Minors,” MT-D, Feb. 16, 1917 (8:3).

1106a “Would Prohibit Cigarette Sales to All Minors,” MT-D, Feb. 16, 1917 (8:3). The liquor law as enacted made it unlawful both to receive directly or indirectly any liquors, whose sale was prohibited by Oklahoma law, from a common carrier and to possess any such liquor. The law applied to liquor intended for personal consumption and to interstate and intrastate shipments. 1917 Oklahoma Session Laws ch. 186 at 350. See also James
Two days after receiving its charge, the special committee reported its recommendations to: (1) retain the Prohibition Enforcement Committee majority report with the amendment that the minimum fine be increased from $10 to $25; (2) strike both the smoking and possession bans in McCollister’s bill; (3) exempt from the ban on advertising any seller who had received a sales license; (4) make the punishment for violations of the preceding ban a fine of not less than $100 and incarceration in county jail for up to one year; (5) pay one-fourth of fines recovered to the complaining witness, one-fourth to the prosecuting attorney, and the remainder to the county common school fund; (6) make it the county clerk’s duty to issue an annual cigarette sales license to “any responsible person” who paid the $25 license fee and executed a $1,000 bond; and (7) make it the county attorney’s duty to bring an action for forfeiture of the bond for violations of the no-sales-to-minors provision.1107

When the Senate debated the special committee’s proposed amendments at length on February 20, numerous other amendments were offered, but most were tabled, the only potentially consequential one among them being the conferral of discretion on county judges to “grant or refuse persons of good moral character” a cigarette sales license, which would have presumably enabled individual counties to ban all cigarette sales.1108 Also tabled was the absurdist amendment offered by lawyer Warren Snyder to add “rouge, face paint, powder or cosmetics” to the items which it was unlawful to furnish minors.1109 The only even arguably significant amendment of the special committee recommendations adopted by the 1107 The Special Committee report, dated Feb. 17, was printed in Journal of the Senate of the Regular Session: Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 752-54 (Feb. 19). The original typescript of this report, bearing the same date and the members’ handwritten signatures, and including numerous handwritten insertions is preserved in the H.B. No. 3 bill file (copy furnished by OSA/ODL). The file also includes an undated but presumably later version of the Special Committee Report, which is cast as a bill rather than committee recommendations and also includes handwritten insertions. The chief change embodied in the handwritten insertions is substitution of the county road fund for the county school fund as the destination of fines and the designation of the former as the destination of license fees (as Kerr had proposed in the aforementioned second amendment that he had offered on Feb. 15).

1108 Journal of the Senate of the Regular Session: Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 807-808 (Feb. 20). This and all other amendments are available in the bill file in OSA/ODL.

1109 Journal of the Senate of the Regular Session: Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 805-806 (Feb. 20).
Senate was the designation of county road funds as the destination of fines and license fees.\textsuperscript{1110}

The press expressed satisfaction with the Senate version of the bill, “which can no longer be classed as freak legislation.” This revamped status derived from the undocumented claim that: “Physicians tell us that there is no more injury in cigarette smoking on the part of adults than cigar or pipe smoking. That being true, no sensible reason can be given for tabooing their sale to men who have reached their majority.”\textsuperscript{1111} Unsurprisingly, publishers did not focus on their relief that the Senate amendments did away with the McCollister bill’s ban on cigarette advertising, which would have cut off a handy source of newspaper revenue. Senator Kerr’s \textit{Muskogee Times-Democrat}, for example, ran numerous large cigarettes while the legislature was considering the bill.\textsuperscript{1112}

Thus drastically watered down to the point of unrecognizability,\textsuperscript{1113} H.B. No. 3 passed the Senate three days later by the overwhelming majority of 38 to 2.\textsuperscript{1114} On its return to the House, McCollister of all people moved that the chamber agree to the Senate’s amendments to his bill. In opposition—despite having voted against McCollister’s bill a month earlier—Representative Rollin Gish, a Harvard College (‘07) and Harvard Law School (‘09) graduate,\textsuperscript{1115} arguing that the bill at this point was “no improvement over the old law,”\textsuperscript{1116} moved that the House refuse to agree to the amendments and ask, instead, for a conference, but his

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item Journal of the Senate of the Regular Session: Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 806, 809 (Feb. 20).
\item \textquote{The Cigaret Bill,” OCT, Feb. 22, 1917 (10:1) (edit). Later that year, when a controversy was raging over shipment of cigarettes to U.S. soldiers in France, one Christian minister, citing a Dr. Claude Thompson as authority, opined that cigarettes were “not so likely to be injurious to the membranes of the throat as is a cigar or a pipe, providing of course that the smoke is not inhaled.” “Ministers Don’t Back Hobson Up on Cigaret ‘Evil,’” MT-D, Nov. 17, 1917 (1-B:1, at 2-B:2-5 at 2). Since the vast majority of cigarette smokers did (and do) inhale, whereas the vast majority on pipe and cigar smokers did (and do) not, this claim, risible as it was to begin with, was vacuous.
\item E.g., \textit{MT-D}, Feb. 5, 1917 (6) (Fatima); \textit{MT-D}, Feb. 13, 1917 (3) (Fatima); \textit{MT-D}, Feb. 23, 1917 (2) (Chesterfield). Both of the cigarettes were manufactured by Liggett & Myers.
\item For the changes, see Engrossed Senate Amendments to House Bill No. 3 (n.d.) (copy furnished by OSA/ODL).
\item Journal of the Senate of the Regular Session: Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 896-97 (Feb. 23).
\item \textquote{Anti-Cigaret Measure Is Now Up to Governor,” OCT, Feb. 24, 1917 (1:1).}
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
motion was lost and McCollister’s carried. Nevertheless, on reconsideration several days later the House reversed itself, refused to agree to the Senate amendments, and asked the Senate for a conference. However, the House conferees, of whom McCollister was one, agreed to all the Senate amendments. After the House had defeated a motion to refuse to accept the conference committee report by a vote of 25 to 57, it passed the amended H.B. No. 3 by a vote of 59 to 27.

No matter how diluted the new law, some cigarette sellers purported to be rebelliously disgruntled. Under the headline, “Drastic Oklahoma Law,” the trade magazine Tobacco reported that—as had been argued, for example, in the 1890s about high license fees in Denver and Chicago—because the requirement of putting up a $1,000 bond would “run out of Oklahoma City all small tobacco dealers, and...turn the state over to the tobacco trust,” the Merchants Cigarette Referendum office was circulating petitions for a referendum. The result of the new law, such sellers claimed, would be a cigarette business “confined to the larger drug stores and chain stores....”

At the Oklahoma WCTU’s first annual convention following the legislative session longtime President Abbie Hillerman noted, in her report on legislative work—which also included establishing a permanent State Industrial School for Girls, raising the “age of protection for girls” to 16 from 12, and the bone-dry liquor prohibition bill—that she had “put forth special effort toward securing the passage of the McCollister Anti-Cigarette bill,” which was, however, “changed and amended till it was very unlike the original, when it was finally passed....” Nevertheless, the WCTU—not even tarrying to bemoan the failure of the smoking

---

1117 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 1099 (Feb. 24).

1118 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 1208 (Mar. 1).

1119 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Regular Session of the Sixth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma...1917, at 1389-91 (Mar. 10). The previous day after McCollister had unsuccessfully moved that the House concur in the conference report, the motion of another House conferee (Republican S. J. Bardsley) to re-refer the report to the committee carried. Id. at 1356-57 (Mar. 9). At least some of the resistance to the bill appears to have been procedural, based on the argument that the Senate amendments constituted a virtual rewriting. “Cigaret Bill Is Sent Back,” OCT, Mar. 9, 1917 (3:2).

1120 For the text, see 1917 Oklahoma Session Laws ch. 148 at 238.

1121 See above ch. 6.

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

ban—believed that, if properly enforced, it would be more effective than the 1915 law. 1124

Oregon (1917)

The pending bill really would make the state bone-dry against cigarettes. 1125

If some aspect of Oregon society needed reforming, chances were that the W.C.T.U. was doing something about it. 1126

The year 1917 also witnessed the traditionally overwhelmingly Republican Oregon legislature 1127 making a strong move toward adoption of a virtually all-encompassing ban on public cigarette smoking. House Bill No. 268 was introduced on January 25 1128 by one of only four House Democrats, Charles Thomas Sweeney (1869-1956), a physician and surgeon, 1129 who later became president of the Pacific Northwest Medical Association 1130 and the Oregon State

---

1124 Proceedings of the Tenth Annual Convention of the Woman’s Christian Temperance Union of Oklahoma...1917, at 45 (1917).
1125 “Smoking Bill Favored,” MO, Feb. 7, 1917 (7:3).
1126 David Peterson del Mar, Oregon’s Promise: An Interpretive History 146 (2003).
1127 In 1917 Republicans controlled 55 of 60 House and 24 of 30 Senate seats. The most recent session in which the Republican Party had not constituted the majority in the House and/or Senate was 1878. Michael Dubin, Party Affiliation in the State Legislatures: A year by Year Summary, 1796-2006, at 154 (2007). To be sure, “factions of the Republican Party sometimes supported the Democratic opposition” and once reformers had secured adoption of a constitutional amendment institutionalizing the initiative and referendum “the legislature’s monopoly on legislation was gone...” Earl Pomeroy, The Pacific Slope: A History of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Utah, and Nevada 197, 198 (1991 [1965]). On Progressivism’s having reached its limits in Oregon by 1912 and Progressives’ return to the Republican and Democratic parties by 1916, see Gordon Dodds, Oregon: A Bicentennial History 161-84 (1977).
1128 State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 337 (Jan. 25) (1917).
1130 JAMA 103(9):688 (Sept. 1, 1934).
Medical Society.\textsuperscript{1131} His progressive public health bona fides were unmistakably on display that session in his taking the lead in introducing a bill to combat the evil of questionable hospital fees that the Oregon State Federation of Labor just a few days earlier at its annual convention had articulated as one of its three legislative goals.\textsuperscript{1132}

Of specific interest here is that H.B. 268 made it a misdemeanor “for any person to smoke or use any cigarette in any public building, upon any public highway, street, alley, park or grounds, or in any public place of business, or in any railway car, in any street railway car, or in any other public conveyance, or any public place in this State.” Anyone convicted of violating this provision was guilty of a misdemeanor and “shall be punished” by a maximum fine of $5 for a first offense and $10 for each additional offense.\textsuperscript{1133} Sweeney’s bill, which, in contemplation of judicial challenges, foresightfully provided that in its entirety it “shall be deemed an exercise of police power of the State, for the protection of the economic welfare, health, peace and morals of the people of the State, and all of its provisions shall be liberally construed for the accomplishment of that purpose,”\textsuperscript{1134} represented a comprehensive regime of cigarette prohibition, including the manufacture, sale, or giving away of cigarettes. In order to preclude a common scam, it also made “[h]aving cigarettes in a place of business where others may take them or help themselves…\textit{prima facie} evidence of an intent to sell.”\textsuperscript{1135} Violations of these provisions were subject to a maximum $100 fine for the first offense, $25 to $500 and/or maximum imprisonment of 30 days for the second, and a mandatory jail sentence of up to 30 days and the aforementioned fine for the third or further offenses.\textsuperscript{1136} H.B. 268 also embodied an especially stringent ban on minors’ smoking, using, or being in possession of cigarettes: whereas some other states conferred discretion of judges to relieve minors of such \textsuperscript{1131}\textit{JAMA} 107(9):1572 (Nov. 7, 1936).

\textsuperscript{1133}House Bill No. 268, § 5 (Jan. 25, 1917, by Sweeney) (copy furnished by Oregon State Archives).
\textsuperscript{1134}House Bill No. 268, § 3 (Jan. 25, 1917, by Sweeney) (copy furnished by Oregon State Archives).
\textsuperscript{1135}House Bill No. 268, § 1 (Jan. 25, 1917, by Sweeney) (copy furnished by Oregon State Archives). Another common scam was dealt with by a provision making it unlawful to “solicit, take or receive within this State, any order for any any cigarette…” \textit{Id.}, § 8.
\textsuperscript{1136}House Bill No. 268, § 4 (Jan. 25, 1917, by Sweeney) (copy furnished by Oregon State Archives).
liability if they revealed the source of the cigarette, Sweeney’s proposal made refusal to reveal an independent misdemeanor; both misdemeanors were subject to maximum $5 fines. The bill also prohibited, subject to a $100 to $500 fine, cigarette advertisements “by signs, billboards, newspapers, periodicals or otherwise.” Finally, included in the bill was a mandate to district attorneys “to enforce and to diligently prosecute any and all persons violating any of the provisions”; the failure, neglect, or refusal to perform this duty carried with it, on conviction, both a $100 to $500 fine and mandatory immediate “forfeiture of his office.”

The cigarette oligopoly’s legislative and propaganda organization, the Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., was hardly asleep at the wheel in the face of this direct assault. On the contrary, it was “very busy these days detecting and exerting all possible efforts to defeat numerous pieces of adverse legislation now pending in State legislatures throughout the country.” Indeed, the United States Tobacco Journal placed the Oregon bill at the head of the list even though, curiously, it vastly understated the reach of Sweeney’s bill as merely “practically restricting the sale of cigarettes within state limits.” On February 6, a dozen days after Sweeney had introduced the bill—but Oregon’s short regular session ran only from January 8 to February 19—TMA Secretary Charles Dushkind sent this urgent appeal (“IMPORTANT NOTICE”) on TMA letterhead, which so profoundly failed to appreciate the measure’s breathtakingly radical character that it might be taken for a form letter:

ACT AT ONCE AND PROTECT YOUR BUSINESS!

TO THE TOBACCO TRADE IN THE STATE OF OREGON:

---

1137House Bill No. 268, § 6 (Jan. 25, 1917, by Sweeney) (copy furnished by Oregon State Archives). Law enforcement officials finding a minor smoking a cigarette or having one in his possession had a duty “to immediately inquire” of the minor where and from whom he received it and, if the minor failed to comply, to arrest him without warrant and take him before a judge; if the minor revealed the source, the officer was required to report the information immediately to the district attorney. Failure to perform any of these duties triggered a mandatory $50 to $100 fine. Id., § 7.

1140See below ch. 17.

1142See the almost simultaneous TMA statement on Oklahoma above this ch.
A bill has been recently introduced in the Legislature restricting or practically prohibiting the sale of cigarettes in your State. The cigarette trade undoubtedly forms a most substantial part of the tobacco business, and we feel that the Tobacco Trade in your State ought to resent any legislation that may tend to interfere with legitimate business and work a substantial injury to the merchants engaged in it.

A strong and vigorous protest on the part of the people engaged in the tobacco industry will undoubtedly have due effect, and we earnestly appeal to the tobacco trade in the State of Oregon to exercise their prerogatives as American Citizens and protest against such legislation.

We would respectfully suggest that a united movement be started at once to defeat such legislation. A letter addressed to the Representative in the House as well as in the Senate of your district will bring the desired results.

We will appreciate it very much if you would kindly let us hear from you as to your action in the matter.\textsuperscript{1143}

Despite Dushkind’s apparent ignorance of the astonishing scope of Sweeney’s bill—which the independent \textit{Evening Telegram} called “drastic in the extreme” and was backed by the WCTU, and some members of the Oregon Congress of Mothers, parent-teacher associations, and other groups\textsuperscript{1144}—and the possibility that some retail cigar and pipe tobacco dealers may not have mourned the demise of cigarette sales, and regardless of whether his circular actually galvanized protests, his cocksure optimism proved justified within four days.

TMA’s call to action came in the nick of time: on the evening of that same day, following the bill’s referral to the Health and Public Morals Committee,\textsuperscript{1145} the “House chamber was packed...with a crowd that came to hear the arguments pro and con on the Sweeney anti-cigarette bill....” More than 20 speakers representing various viewpoints engaged the issue, the WCTU, unsurprisingly, supporting passage of H.B. 268; more than one businessman opposed it on the grounds that experience in other states had demonstrated the unenforceability of such a law,\textsuperscript{1146} and a large Portland delegation attended to “voice its protest.”\textsuperscript{1147}
The intensity of the gallery’s sentiments could be gauged by its loud applause for attacks on cigarettes, which were mounted, inter alia, by school superintendents as well as by one speaker who pleaded for passage on the grounds that “women were fast becoming addicted to the habit.” Of particular interest was the Oregon newspaper business’s position presented by Elbert Greer, the owner/editor of the Ashland Tidings, who (literally) echoed the cigarette oligopoly line in stating: “The newspapers of the state will favor legislation that comes from the fathers and mothers and gives them an opportunity to keep tobacco away from their children, but you are going too far and depriving the old fellows, who have smoked cigarettes for 40 years, of their pleasure. This bill will affect the average smoker of the state and he will ignore the law. Do not enact a measure that will not have the moral support of the men of the country.” In addition to speaking through publishers protective of profits accruing from cigarette ads, the tobacco manufacturers dispatched their own direct representative, J. T. Williams of San Francisco, who, after repeating the industry’s decades-old claim that “medical science of late years had declared that cigarettes were not as injurious as other forms of tobacco usage,” shifted to the diversionary ploy that cigarette firms would be trotting out into the twenty-first century: “We want a bill that prohibits a merchant from selling cigarettes to minors...and we are willing to post a large sum of money for no other purpose than to secure convictions of men who violate the law in selling to children.”

In line with this strategy, opponents of Sweeney’s bill at the hearing expressed support for a no-sales-to-under-21-year-olds bill, which Portland business lawyer Plowden Stott had introduced and had been referred to the same committee. The next morning the Health and Public Morals Committee reported H.B. 268 favorably, “coupled with the recommendation that the Stott bill go on the calendar side by side with” Sweeney’s to be considered at the same time. Committee chairman William Elmore, a Democrat and bank

1148“Smoking Bill Favored,” MO, Feb. 7, 1917 (7:3).
1150“Smoking Bill Favored,” MO, Feb. 7, 1917 (7:3).
1151History of the Bench and Bar of Oregon 230 (1910); 1910 Census of Population.
1152Sub. H.B. 436 was Stott’s substitute for H.B. 436, which he had introduced with two other representatives. State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 61, 358, 389 (Feb. 2, 7) (1917).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

1910 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).

“Cigarette Is in Line for a Slap by House,” OJ, Feb. 7, 1917 (1:4). The only provision of H.B. 268 that could have been interpreted to conflict with the U.S. Supreme Court’s original package doctrine was section 8, which made it “unlawful for any person to solicit, take or receive within this State, any order for any cigarette, or to make any contract for the sale of any cigarette....”

State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 387 (Feb. 7) (1917). Stott had already signed his report on Feb. 2. Whereas H.B. 436 made it unlawful to sell cigarettes to persons under 21, Sub. H.B. 436 prohibited sale to minors. Id. at 61.

On February 8 the House gave lively third-reading consideration to both bills—“[n]early everybody took a hand in the running debate on both questions.” The gallery was so “packed” with women backing passage of H.B. 268 that it was jocularly referred to as the “‘committee on intimidation,’” with which members sought to “curry” favor or establish their “alibis.” The all-morning debate turned “personally bitter” when Representative Albert Burton, a Portland high school teacher, opined that “any man who used tobacco was filthy,” prompting 33-year-old lawyer Vernon Forbes—who would drown a year later—to retort that “when you wanted to find a simon pure ‘pin head’ president, explained the favorable report on both bills by reference to the committee’s having been “informed, on what appeared to it to be competent authority, that the Sweeney bill, if enacted, probably could not be enforced because of unconstitutionality.” The specific alleged defect was that “tobacco did not come within the terms of the Webb-Kenyon act giving states the power to regulate interstate commerce in the case of intoxicating liquor, while the Sweeney bill made that attempt.” That same day the full House adopted the committee majority report, which was signed by Elmore and recommended passage of Sweeney’s bill as amended only by an effective date of January 1, 1918. Although it rejected Stott’s minority report, recommending against passage on the grounds that his own bill, Sub. H.B. 436, “covers fully and fairly all the objections to the present law pertaining to the regulation of the sale of tobacco to minors,” the House did adopt the committee report recommending that the latter be substituted for the original H.B. 436.

1151 1910 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).

1153 State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 387 (Feb. 7) (1917). Stott had already signed his report on Feb. 2. Whereas H.B. 436 made it unlawful to sell cigarettes to persons under 21, Sub. H.B. 436 prohibited sale to minors. Id. at 61.

and ‘boob’ you wanted to go hunt up a ‘man school ma’rm.’”161 (In contrast, Sylvia Thompson, the chamber’s only woman and a supporter of H.B. 268, declared: “I have liberal views about smoking.... And I do not think that every man who smokes is filthy.”)162 More substantively, Forbes, a casual cigar smoker who was unable to recall ever having bought a package of cigarettes, “did not like to have anyone tell him he could not smoke when he wanted to.”163

Discussion began with Stott’s bill, which was “mild and inoffensive alongside of the Sweeney bill,” in regard to which it was offered as a compromise; touted as “mak[ing] the law a whole lot tighter than it is now,” Sub. H.B. 436 increased the fine for selling to minors (under 21) from $50 to $250 and imposed “heavy jail sentences.” Stott urged passage of his bill on the grounds “that it would accomplish the professed objects of the anti-cigarette crusaders—that is, to prevent boys and young men from smoking them.”164 On final passage the House voted 35 to 21 in favor of Stott’s bill, nine of Portland’s 13-member delegation voting Aye and three of the four Democrats voting Nay (only Elmore supported it). The hard core of the anti-cigarette militants were presumably the 19 (including Sweeney himself) of the 21 Nay-voters who then voted for H.B. 268.165 Of these 19 militants 11 demonstrated their progressive bona fides by

---

161 Anti-Cigarette Bills Pass in Oregon House,” OJ, Feb. 8, 1917 (1:8, 14:3).
163 Anti-Cigarette Bills Pass in Oregon House,” OJ, Feb. 8, 1917 (1:8, 14:3).
164 “House Vote Favors Ban on Cigarettes,” MO, Feb. 9, 1917 (6:4). The 1893 law prohibiting the sale of any tobacco to persons under 18 imposed a fine of $5 to $50. Lord’s Oregon Laws § 2148 (1910). The same 1893 law made it unlawful for anyone under 18 to smoke any tobacco in any public highway, street, place, square, or resort, subject to a $1-$10 fine and, at the court’s option, two days in jail. Id. § 2149.
165 State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 4-5, 394-95 (Feb. 8) (1917). One of the two defectors was Norwegian-born Olaf Laurgaard, a prominent civil engineer, who on July 1, 1917, became the Portland city engineer. History of the Columbia River Valley from the Dalles to the Sea 3:292-97 (1928), on http://files.usgwarchives.org/or/multnomah/bios/laurgaard1056gbs.txt (visited Apr. 20, 2011). He explained his votes on the basis that H.B. 436 did not go far enough to deal with the “greatest evil effects of cigarettes” on boys under 18, while H.B. 268 went “a little too far and [wa]s too drastic in its regulation at this time.” Without explaining what kind of amendment he had in mind, Laurgaard, who did not use tobacco and was “heartily in favor of the regulation, control or elimination of the cigarette evil at this time,” was “sorry to say” that he could not support either bill without amendment. State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 395 (Feb. 8) (1917).
voting the next day against a high-profile anti-picketing bill.\textsuperscript{1166} Opponents of the prohibitory measure planned to table or otherwise prevent a vote on H.B. 268 by passing Sub. H.B. 436 first, but Sweeney nevertheless succeeded in securing consideration and a vote after the opposition had attacked its unenforcibility.\textsuperscript{1167} One member, drawing on his experience of having lived in Washington State when its anti-cigarette bill was in effect, recounted that “they got all the cigarettes they wanted.” While ultimately voting in accord with his committee report for H.B. 268, Chairman Elmore declared that “he had asked the attorney general’s office for an opinion regarding the constitutionality and that the bill was unconstitutional.” More relevant to the public cigarette smoking prohibition, which could hardly run afoul of the interstate commerce clause, was Elmore’s charge that the “speaker [of the House] could not enforce the house rule against smoking during sessions..., and it would be much more difficult to enforce the provisions of the Sweeney bill.” From there he went off on a riff claiming that the police “would not enforce the existing law” and doubting whether “they would enforce any law.” Finally, twitting “those who had appealed for the passage of the Sweeney bill,” Elmore expressed further doubt that any of them “would aid in its enforcement”\textsuperscript{1168}—a rebuke that, at least as directed at the WCTU, was risible. Although Dr. Sweeney’s bill, which was backed by the WCTU and other women’s organizations, and “ma[de] the state ‘bone dry’ against the whole cigarette business—manufacture, sale, use and all”—was (accurately) “said to be one of the most drastic anti-cigarette measures ever passed by any legislative body,”\textsuperscript{1169} the House handily passed it by a vote of 35 to 24, all four Democrats supporting and eight of 13 Portland representatives \textsuperscript{1166}Anderson, Belland, Brownell, Burton, Childs, Crandall, Lunger, Small, Sweeney, Thompson, and Tichenor. \textit{State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917}, at 402 (Feb. 9) (1917). The bill (H.B. 227) passed by a vote of 33 to 25 but did not become law. “Kubli Anti-Picket Bill Goes to Quick Death in the Senate,” \textit{OJ}, Feb. 17, 1917 (1:7). An additional eight members who had voted for H.B. 436 and H.B. 268 also opposed the anti-picketing bill. The bill’s author—K. K. Kubli—justified it on the grounds of the at that time prevalent shibboleth that “[t]here was no such thing as peaceful picketing,” adding that the bill was “intended to strike...at the lawless element, the I.W.W. hordes, who flocked to places of industrial strife.” “‘Picketing’ by Unions Loses House Support,” \textit{OJ}, Feb. 9, 1917 (1:8, at 14:4).

\textsuperscript{1167}“House Vote Favors Ban on Cigarettes,” \textit{MO}, Feb. 9, 1917 (6:4).

\textsuperscript{1168}“Anti-Cigarette Bills Pass in Oregon House,” \textit{OJ}, Feb. 8, 1917 (1:8, at 14:3-4).

\textsuperscript{1169}“House Vote Favors Ban on Cigarettes,” \textit{MO}, Feb. 9, 1917 (6:4). On the threat by Democrat Sylvia Thompson that, if the legislature rejected the bill, 30,000 women would put it on the ballot at the next election and pass it, see below ch. 18.
opposing it. Unsurprisingly, all seven representatives who 10 days earlier had voted against the bone-dry liquor prohibition bill—six of whom lived in Portland—also opposed the bone-dry cigarette bill.

Portland’s Independent Republican Morning Oregonian was not impressed. On the contrary, it editorially admonished the legislature to “retrieve its prestige” and rehabilitate representative government in the state by ceasing to “fritter[ ] away hours in the heated discussion of such trivialities as cigarette prohibition for grown men.” The next day the paper reinforced the lecture by publishing a lengthy letter to the editor, sounding suspiciously like a cigarette oligopoly ad, attacking “freak laws” and praises cigarettes as the mildest and least toxic form of tobacco smoking.

That same day, as the Oregonian must have delighted in reporting, the House, “[a]fter two days of reflection on its conduct in passing the Sweeney bone-dry cigarette bill,” voted to recall both bills from the Senate “for the purpose of effecting a compromise. It is possible that the radical Sweeney bill will be toned down so that adults will not be prohibited from buying or smoking cigarettes.” In turn, Stott’s bill would be bolstered with “[s]trict inhibitions” against youth smoking. Significantly, Dr. Sweeney was “agreeable to the change” making the bill merely “bone-dry against boys under 21....” That Sweeney and “[f]riends of anti-cigarette legislation...so readily consented to its recall from the Senate” was rooted in their fear that “the Senate would kill the bill in its original form....” The lack of a general commitment to enact even a “‘bone dry’ cigarette bill for minors” was witnessed by multiple cross-snipings over “passing the buck” and letting the Senate kill the bill or fixing it in the House. The 33-21 House vote for recall is difficult to interpret: presumably those who voted Aye with Sweeney preferred part of a loaf to none at all, but the Nays may have 1170 State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 4-5, 394-95 (Feb. 8) (1917).

1171 State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 343 (Jan. 29) (1917).
1172 “The Anti-Cigarette Furore,” MO, Feb. 9, 1917 (10:2) (edit.).
1173 Vic Hammer, “Cigarette Is Least Harmful,” MO, Feb. 10, 1917 (8:6) (ltr to editor). No person by that name was returned as living in Oregon at the 1910 or 1920 population census.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

encompassed both those who, opposed to prohibition, hoped to give the Senate an opportunity to kill the bill, and those who either were more principled or radical than Sweeney and insisted on prohibition or nothing or judged the chance of success in the Senate more optimistically. Of the aforementioned 19 militants 11 voted against and 7 for recall. The composition of the Nays was strikingly heterogeneous: of the 21 opposing recall: 11 had voted against H.B. 436 and for H.B. 268; six for both bills; three for H.B. 436 and against H.B. 268; and one against both. Later that same day, after both bills had been returned from the Senate, H.B. 268’s most militant advocate, Dr. James E. Anderson, an osteopathic physician known as the father of (liquor) prohibition in Oregon, unambiguously declared that the “people who had introduced the bill would rather have it killed than to have it emasculated, which was what was going to happen to it.” Seeking to implement this purist position, he moved to take Sweeney’s bill from the table in order to postpone it indefinitely, but the compromisers foiled his motion.

In the event, the very next day’s proceedings revealed that a bloc of legislators, reflecting the position of the WCTU and its allies, did in fact “Want Absolute Curb on All or Nothing.” And those in the know divulged to the press that word had gone out “asking that an avalanche of women descend on the State House” on February 12 in order to influence House members during consideration of the dueling bills; the “plan” of the supporters of the “Sweeney absolute cigarette prohibition bill in its original form,” who met on February 11 and decided “to stand on the original bill, attempt to pass it to the Senate, or kill all anti-cigarette legislation suggested, was “to pack the rear end of the House with a showing of all of the women possible to gather here.” Conservative farmer Charles Brand—“the reverse of the demagogue, for he tries to cure class hatred instead of stimulating it”—who was the driving force behind the recall move, had voted for H.B. 268, but had second thoughts, not because he feared that it

---

1178 State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 413 (Feb. 10) (1917).
1179 Census of Population 1910 and 1920 (HeritageQuest); Western Osteopath 15(12):16 (May 1921). In 1917 Anderson introduced H.B. 100, the “bone-dry prohibition bill,” which became law. State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 50 (Feb. 10) (1917).
1180 “No-Cigarette Bills Slated to Worry House During Week,” OJ, Feb. 11, 1917 (8:1-2) (quote); State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 415 (Feb. 10) (1917).
1181 “Women May Lobby,” MO, Feb. 12, 1917 (6:3-4).
could not pass the Senate, but because he almost immediately “discovered that such a bill is unworkable, that it is legislation that would be ineffective and not accomplish the purpose for which it is intended.”1183 (For his “prompt action in discovering” that he had voted for an “unconstitutional and unworkable” bill and his equally “prompt action in acknowledging this” he harvested “numerous complimentary references on his attitude....”)1184 He was nevertheless purportedly motivated by his strong support for a law that would “completely cure the possibility of minors securing or smoking cigarettes,” in aid of which he had drafted amendments to Sweeney’s bill to make it “absolutely prohibitive” for and applicable only to minors, an outcome that the Oregonian certified as “unquestionably...the desire of a large majority of the...House” and opposed only by “some” or “a few” of the die-hard, all-or-nothing prohibitionists.1185

The amended bill that the House passed on February 12 was the work product of a five-member special committee that the House speaker had appointed that day and included Brand and Sweeney.1186 The committee’s gutting amendments, which the House and Senate adopted in full, were of two kinds: (1) the selling bans were all recast to apply only to minors; and (2) the bans on manufacturing, public smoking, and ads were struck altogether.1187 The advertising ban was dropped at the suggestion of Representative K(aspar). K. Kubli,1188 owner of a printing company, who was the driving force behind the session’s contentious anti-picketing bill, later—nomen est omen: his “initials earned him free membership in Klan No. 1”1189—was affiliated with and supported by the Ku Klux Klan, and became House speaker in 1923.1190

---

1186“Cigarette Ban Now for Minors Only,” MO, Feb. 13, 1917 (1:7). Two of the remaining three members, Bean and Lafferty, had voted for the original H.B. 268, the latter voting as well for H.B. 436, while the former was absent. The fifth member, Burdick, had voted for H.B. 436 and against H.B. 268.
1187State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917, at 424-25 (Feb. 12) (1917). For the statute, see 1917 Oregon Laws ch. 244 at 466. For a copy of the law as enacted from the TMA files, see Bates No. 501994504.
1190On Kubli (1869-1943), who attended Harvard Law School but never practiced law, see 1910 and 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); Harvard University Directory
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Sweeney spoke on behalf of the watered-down bill that he had made possible and helped draft, although he did not wholeheartedly support it:

He said that while it does not represent the higher ideals of anti-cigarette legislation that he hopes eventually to obtain, he believes it to be a good bill and a step in the right direction. "When members who had voted for my bill said that they believed they had used poor judgment...I consented to have it come back. I think I have shown my good faith by agreeing to the amendments that have been made, and I hope now that the other members will keep their faith with me and vote for the bill as it stands."[1191]

His apologia, which was designed to refute charges that he was not acting consistently, also included the claim that the amended bill was “the best that could have been brought out of such a chaos as had been raging about it.” Finally, he urged appreciation of the great educational benefit that the “agitation” had conferred on the state.[1192]

In fact, Sweeney forfeited the faith of his closest allies in the struggle for cigarette prohibition. One of them, Dr. Anderson, declared on the House floor that the compromise was not the kind of measure that the sponsors of the original bill—the members of the WCTU and other women’s organizations—had wanted in offering “the bone-dry bill.” He hardly seemed to be exaggerating when he observed that the bill “probably had fallen into the hands of its enemies.”[1193] (Anderson’s intimacy with the Oregon WCTU’s intentions was suggested by his appearance later that year as one of the “distinguished guests” at its annual convention.)[1194] The enemy uppermost in Dr. Anderson was the American Tobacco Company, whose representatives “had been gumshoeing among the solons and exercising pernicious influences.”[1195] In the event, only a minority of the hard-core prohibitionists joined Sweeney in compromising and defecting: of the 19 representatives who four days earlier had voted both against Stott’s bill and for Sweeney’s 12 opposed the diluted Sweeney-Brand bill. Eight of the 12 had also voted against the anti-picketing bill and against recall of the anti-cigarette bills.\footnote{1196}

Once the House had passed “‘safe and sane’” and “constructive” anti-cigarette legislation\footnote{1197} by defanging and mainstreaming the Sweeney bill and thus had “demonstrated that it was not trying to ‘pass the buck’ to the Senate,” in turn “the Senators,” by whom the original measure was “frankly regarded...as a bit of freak legislation to be classed with such measures as the anti-snuff bill,” “demonstrated [their] desire to co-operate in the fullest extent with the House in the passage of sane legislation, as opposed to laws of the freak type” by voting (against only one Nay) to suspend the rules to expedite consideration of the Sweeney-Brand bill. The Judiciary Committee then quickly, unanimously, and favorably reported out the bill without any amendments, thus enabling it to avoid what would soon become a clogged Senate calendar.\footnote{1198} On the anti-climactic third reading the Judiciary Committee chairman (hyperbolically) praised the measure as one of the best laws ever presented to the legislature, which the Senate proceeded to pass unanimously.\footnote{1199}

Two years after having been killed, Sweeney’s original radical bill experienced a quasihemidemisemi-resurrection when, availing himself of the very extensively used initiative and referendum system that Oregon had adopted in 1902 and became a hallmark institution of the state’s progressivism until the mid-

\footnote{1196}{The 12 were Anderson, Belland, Burton, Childs, Crandall, Goode, Gordon, W. B. Jones, Lunger, Meek, Small, and Thompson. In addition, five (Eaton, Porter, Sheldon, Stephens, and Thomas) who had voted for both bills opposed the watered-down compromise. Only three of these 18 representatives (Burton, Goode, and Gordon) represented Portland. Anderson, Belland, Burton, Childs, Crandall, Lunger, Small, and Thompson as well as Eaton, Sheldon, and Thomas voted against the anti-picketing bill; Anderson, Belland, Burton, Crandall, Goode, Meek, Small, and Thompson as well as Eaton, Porter, and Stephens voted against recall.}

\footnote{1197}{“Cigarette Ban Now for Minors Only,” \textit{MO}, Feb. 13, 1917 (1:7).}

\footnote{1198}{“Senate Hurries Act,” \textit{MO}, Feb. 14, 1917 (6:3); \textit{State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917}, at 232 (Feb. 14) (1917).}

\footnote{1199}{“Cigarette Bill Is Before Governor,” \textit{MO}, Feb. 17, 1917 (7:1); \textit{State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: Regular Session...1917}, at 253 (Feb. 16) (1917).}
1910s, one David E. Frost of Oregon City began circulating a proposed initiative bill petition whose purpose was “Abolishing cigarettes by prohibiting the sale, use or possession thereof,” and which, inter alia, made it a misdemeanor “for any person to smoke, use or be in possession of any cigarette in this State after January 1st, 1921.” This capacious proposal was, in large part, a verbatim reproduction of H.B. 268, and also banned advertising and required every mayor, sheriff, police officer, and other officer to ask all persons he found smoking or having in their possession a cigarette where and from whom they had obtained it; failure to comply with the request would have resulted in a subpoena, and refusal to reveal the information under subpoena would have been a misdemeanor. To be sure, the real organizer of this petition drive was—according to press reports promoted by the newly formed Allied Tobacco League of America, an offshoot of the Association Opposed to National Prohibition—the WCTU. The ever vigilant tobacco industry was carefully monitoring the proposal’s progress. For example, the United States Tobacco Journal almost immediately reported that: “They are getting busy in Oregon again and an initiative petition has been filed with the authorities calling for a law prohibiting” the sale of cigarettes, thus understating the proposal’s scope.

---

1201At the 1910 Census of Population he was returned as a 46-year-old carpenter; at the 1920 census the 52-year-old’s occupation was unfortunately illegible, but his address was the same as on the petition.

1202Ballot Title: Initiative Bill-Proposed by Initiative Petition (n.d.), Bates No. 501994485.

1204Initiative Petition Relation to Cigarettes, Initiated by D. E. Frost, 304 High st., Oregon City, Oregon, §§ 7 and 5 (n.d.), Bates No. 501994468. This version was even more radical than Sweeney’s bill in that the stop-and-interrogate provision in the latter applied only to minors.

1206“Oregon to Hold Referendum upon Cigarette Question,” USTJ 92(15):16 (Oct. 11, Although in October 1919 the petition was reportedly being circulated for the requisite 9,940 verified petition signatures for the November 1920 election, by early 1920 the Tobacco Merchants Association, having become curious if not anxious about the status of the petition, received on February 10 from the Oregon Secretary of State, which was required to all petition forms before they were circulated for signatures, in response to an inquiry the information that: “The Anti-cigarette petition has not yet been presented to us for formal approval. We understand, however, that it is now in the hands of the printer and will likely reach us within the next few days.” The official went on to explain that following approval the initiators were required to secure the certified signatures of 9,940 legal voters and file the completed petition not later than July 1 in order for it to be voted on at the November 2 biennial election. The TMA Legislative Bulletin then appended its “own advices” contained in a dispatch from “disinterested sources: ‘Sufficient signatures no doubt will be obtained. Final results impossible to predict at this time. Little comment or publicity thus far.  Nevertheless, the initiative failed even to appear on the ballot for the November 2, 1920 election, apparently because, contrary to the TMA’s earlier intelligence, it lacked sufficient signatures.

Although the Sweeney-WCTU bill also never appeared on the initiative ballot later in the 1920s, at the general election in November 1930, three years after Kansas had repealed the last statewide cigarette sales ban, Oregon voters faced a proposed constitutional amendment to ban the importation, manufacture, sale, purchase, possession, giving away, or advertising on billboards or in newspapers or other periodicals of cigarettes, cigarette papers, or materials for the manufacture of cigarettes, backed by fines ranging from $25 to $250 or confinement in county jail between 30 and 90 days or, in the judge’s discretion, both. More voters cast ballots on the cigarette amendment than any of the other dozen measures, but at 25.8 percent it received the second lowest proportion of Yes votes. This share may appear to be strikingly small, but that more than one-fourth of the active electorate still supported an extraordinarily radical constitutional prohibition 13 years after House passage of the similar Sweeney bill, despite the fact that, in the interim, total annual national cigarette consumption had risen 3.3-fold to 119 billion and per capita annual consumption had increased 2.7-fold to 1,485 should give pause about the extent of acquiescence in hegemony well into the era of cigarette smoking laissez-faire.

Kansas (1917/1919)

“What can we do?” asked a Wichita man recently. “We have the law and those who are opposed to it haven’t the time to give to fight to rid themselves of it. I am a business man. The people who got behind this statute didn’t have much else to do. They were set out for reform and they got it. I haven’t the time to spare from my business to organize an army of cigarette smokers to undo what has been done. We’ll just have to grin and bear it.”

In Kansas, which was the last state to repeal its cigarette sales ban, government officials early on advocated prohibition of smoking in various public places, but none of their initiatives came to fruition. As early as 1915, Governor (and later U.S. Senator) Arthur Capper—“who refused to advertise the cigarette

---

1212 Proposed Constitutional Amendments and Measures (With Arguments) to Be Submitted to the Voters of Oregon at the General Election Tuesday, November 3, 1930, at 39 (Hal Hoss comp.).

1213 http://bluebook.state.or.us/state/elections/elections15.htm. See also “Oregon Keeps Cigarettes,” NYT, Nov. 7, 1930 (3). The proportion of Yes votes on a county basis ranged from 16.4 to 38.8 percent; in Multnomah, of which Portland is the county seat, a below-average 21.8 percent was recorded. These county-level figures were highly positively correlated with the vote three years later to retain the constitutional ban on alcohol. John Dinan and Jac Heckelman, “The Anti-Tobacco Movement in the Progressive Era: A Case Study of Direct Democracy in Oregon,” Explorations in Economic History 42:529-46, fig 1 at 533, tab. 5 at 539, fig 2 at 540 (2005).

1214 Calculated based on http://www.cdc.gov/tobacco/research_data/economics/consump1.htm (the per capita data are based on persons over 18).

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

in any of his publications" including the *Topeka Daily Capital*¹²¹⁶—declared in his first message to the legislature that: “Smoking in polling places should be prohibited.”¹²¹⁷

That an exceptionally militant antagonism toward public smoking had developed in segments of the population as well as among legislators spectacularly burst into popular awareness at the 1917 legislative session, when two ultra-radical anti-smoking bills were introduced in the House (before the Senate passed an anti-cigarette use amendment to the search and confiscation and anti-advertising bill that did become law).¹²¹⁸

The first measure, House Bill No. 257, perhaps the most radical anti-cigarette bill ever passed by a single chamber of any state legislature,¹²¹⁹ went much further that several bills passed by a single chamber in other states in the 1890s that had prohibited cigarette smoking only in public places.¹²²⁰ The core of the bill, which was designed to supplement and not to derogate from the state’s existing cigarette laws,¹²²¹ provided:

That it shall be unlawful for any person to smoke or use, or have in his possession for the purpose of using, cigarettes or cigarette papers in the state of Kansas. Every person who shall smoke or use, or have in his possession for the purpose of smoking or using, cigarettes or cigarette papers in any form in the state of Kansas shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than five dollars nor more than twenty-five dollars, and every person who shall furnish cigarettes or cigarette papers in any form to any other person or who shall permit any person to frequent any premises owned, held, leased or managed by him for the purpose of indulging in the use of cigarettes in any form shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than twenty dollars and nor more than one hundred dollars.¹²²²

¹²¹⁶“Kansas Off on Another Crusade,,” Survey 37:494 (Jan. 27, 1917).
¹²¹⁸See above this ch.
¹²¹⁹The assertion by Rev. A. P. Wilson (Central Christian Church), “Smoking, Box and Blue Laws,” IDR, Feb. 8, 1921 (8:1-5 at 1), that “Kansas at one time had a...law” that made it “illegal to smoke cigarettes” that “was TOO effective evidently for the lover of the ‘pill’ and so the law was changed to make it illegal to sell, etc. cigarettes or the ‘makin’s’” was incorrect.
¹²²⁰See above Part I.
¹²²¹House Bill No. 257, § 2, By Mr Collins (n.d.) (copy furnished by Library & Archives Div., KHS).
¹²²²House Bill No. 257, § 1, By Mr Collins (n.d.) (copy furnished by Library &
Within hours of its introduction the Topeka State Journal reveled in mocking the bill in above-the-fold, front-page bolded headline and subheads: “‘Pill Puffing May Be Made a Crime in Kan.  House Members Has Plan to Abolish ‘Coffin Nail’ Smoke. ...  It Provides a Fine for Everything Except the Desire.” Beyond the bombast, the article did correctly point out that the bill would strengthen the cigarette sales prohibition law.

Introduced by Republican merchant R. A. Collins, the chairman of the Temperance Committee, H.B. No. 257 was recommended for passage by the Judiciary Committee before being stripped by the committee of the whole of the penalization of furnishing cigarettes or permitting premises to be frequented for using cigarettes. Then by a vote of 67 (including the chamber’s two Socialist Party members) to 20 the chamber breathtakingly banned the use of cigarettes.

While Governor Capper’s Republican Topeka Daily Capital merely matter-of-factly noted that the “Collins anti-cigaret bill, providing a penalty for cigarette smoking...came up for final vote and was passed,” the somewhat smaller-circulation Independent Republican Topeka State Journal of “editor, publisher, banker, capitalist” Frank MacLennan devoted a front-page article exclusively to the bill, laying the scorn extra-thick on the measure (“It Even Prohibits Smoking Before one’s Own Fireside”) and especially on its author:

Collins came from the town of Penokee, Graham county.  Penokee is located in the Graham county sand hills, and before coming to the legislature, Collins polled the Penokee social set and learned that simon pure reform was needed in Kansas.  So the gentleman

---

1229“MacLennan Takes Off His Coat to Work for Soldier Boys,” Editor & Publisher, July 27, 1911 (22).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

from Graham has been quite active with his task of making the state better.

After coming to the legislature, Collins landed at the top of the temperance committee. This committee drew the bone dry bill and jammed it thru the house. Then came a bill which made it a misdemeanor to own, sell or keep for sale any cigarettes, paper or tobacco used in cigarette making.

But Collins was not satisfied. He recalled the good old days of corn silk, catalpa leaves and grape vine cigarettes and cigars. So he drafted a bill to reach from the after dinner parties right on down to youngsters who gather behind the barn Sunday afternoons. Then in the names of the mothers and sisters and sweethearts and all the things that are nice and good and pure, Collins rallied the house members to his measure. All of which means Kansans must do their cigarette smoking before the statute books are printed. ... Collins must be horrified, shocked, humiliated and chagrined by cigarette smokers for the two or three months required to publish the new session laws.1230

Following House passage, out-of-state newspaper coverage focused on the bill’s “making it an offense punishable by a fine to smoke a cigarette even in one’s own home,”1231 while the Kansas press accurately stressed the measure’s limitless breadth, noting that it “does not exempt class, district or place, making it just as unlawful to smoke at home or a dinner party as in public.” Oddly, the most relevant category of “persons caught smoking cigarettes” was omitted by the Emporia Gazette1232—namely, adults, whose curtailed consumer freedom had always been at the heart of the controversies over statewide universal cigarette sales bans.1233 In the event, non-minors were spared this fate when the bill died in the Senate, where the Temperance and Hygiene Committee to which it was referred never acted on it.1234

Three days after Collins had introduced his measure, the Topeka State Journal wondered editorially “[w]hy the war on the meek and lowly cigarette, while the big black cigar and the clay pipe are allowed to go free?” The paper speculated that legislators, having learned from the liquor prohibitionists who at first “declared they merely wanted to banish the saloon,” “[p]erhaps...want to try out on the ‘coffin nail’ and if they get by will attack the weed in other forms 1231“Can Be Fined for Smoking Cigarettes in Dry Kansas,” National Democrat (Des Moines), Mar. 1, 1917 (1:3-4). This same article under the same title ran in numerous papers; e.g., Muskogee Cimeter, Mar. 3, 1917 (2:2-3).

1233See above Part I.
1234Senate Journal: Proceedings of the Senate of the State of Kansas: Twentieth Biennial Session...1917, at 275 (Feb. 14) (1917).
later.”

Despite the press’s then common practice of massively infusing reportage with editorial bloviation, the editor apparently forgot that “later” was today: that very day’s front page bore the headline, “Cigar and Pipe Now Are on the Run in Kansas!”

This second bill, introduced by House Democrat Oliver P. Jewett—a farmer and grain dealer who as chairman of the House Temperance Committee in 1915 had pushed liquor prohibition—made it unlawful for any person to smoke on any passenger train or on any car used to transport the public, or on any other train, or on any interurban car, street car, omnibus, taxicab, automobile, or any other vehicle used for the transportation of the public, or on any street in any city or town, or in any room or building used by the public, and any rooms or buildings where children are kept: Provided, That smoking may be allowed in public rooms fitted up and used exclusively for smoking and designated as such by proper marking either on or above the door.

In addition to imposing a $10 to $25 penalty for such unlawful smoking, Jewett’s measure also made it unlawful for any person having care or custody of any such vehicle, street, room, or building to allow smoking there.

Decrying Jewett as a “Purist” and his bill as “even more drastic” than Collins’ ban on smoking, using, or possessing cigarettes because it applied to all kinds of tobacco, the Topeka State Journal on its front page mocked the author for “[h]is sensitive feeling against smoking,” which had “found several outbursts during former legislative sessions when he called up the anti-smoking rule in the house”; and just the previous week “he retained his former record by calling up the anti-smoking rule for the benefit of men working at the press table. Now Jewett 1236Cigar and Pipe Are Now on the Run in Kansas!” TSJ, Jan. 22, 1917 (1:4).

---

1235TSJ, Jan. 22, 1917 (4:2) (untitled edit.).
12391917 House Bill No. 287, § 1 (by Mr. Jewett) (bill text provided by KHS). The text was also published in “Cigar and Pipe Are Now on the Run in Kansas!” TSJ, Jan. 22, 1917 (1:4).
12401917 House Bill No. 287, §§ 2-3 (by Mr. Jewett) (bill text provided by KHS); “Cigar and Pipe Are Now on the Run in Kansas!” TSJ, Jan. 22, 1917 (1:4) (printing text of H.B. No. 287).
would put King Nicotine put of business in Kansas...."\textsuperscript{1241} The out-of-state press also exclaimed that pursuant to the bill “a man cannot smoke in his own home if he has a child”\textsuperscript{1242} (presumably at any time, even when the child was not there).

That Jewett had long taken the issue of adults’ (including his own) exposure to tobacco smoke seriously and personally was obvious from the motion that he had offered during his first term in the House in 1909 that the House no-smoking rule be “rigidly enforced”: not only did it prevail, but “the chair instructed the sergeant-at-arms to enforce the rule.”\textsuperscript{1243} In 1917, too, the press explained his “proposed law for protection” by reference to his having been “rowing for ten days over the fact that some house members and other persons smoke in the Representative hall while he is in the room,” adding that the bill “extends that protection against tobacco to every place in the state, except in private homes and in the wide open stretches of country.”\textsuperscript{1244}

When, a week after his introduction of H.B. No. 287, the Public Welfare Committee recommended that it not be passed,\textsuperscript{1245} Jewett displayed a sense of humor in offering this resolution:

\begin{quote}
Inasmuch as the Committee on Public Welfare has seen fit to report House bill No. 287 back to the House with the recommendation that it be not passed; a bill designed to benefit our boys growing to manhood, and to make them cleaner and more desirable for positions of trust;

Further, that this House has indorsed a bill compelling our county commissioners to offer a bounty on gophers, so that our farmers who are raising alfalfa can be protected against the ravage of the abovementioned gophers, and for fear that the alfalfa crop will be so increased that the over-production will have to be provided in some way; and inasmuch as this House has indorsed smoking: therefore be it

Resolved, That hereafter in all the cigars sold or smoked in this state, the filling shall be composed of three-fourths alfalfa instead of cabbage, and in the interests of economy the wrappers be made of gopher skins.\textsuperscript{1246}
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{1241}“Cigar and Pipe Are Now on the Run in Kansas!” \textit{TSJ}, Jan. 22, 1917 (1:4).
\textsuperscript{1244}“In the House Hopper,” \textit{TDC}, Jan. 23, 1917 (5:3).
\textsuperscript{1245}\textit{House Journal: Proceedings of House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twentieth Biennial Session...1917}, at 191 (Jan. 30) (1917). The text of the committee report in the bill file archived at KHS is merely a pre-printed form recommendation with “not passed” typed in.
\textsuperscript{1246}\textit{House Journal: Proceedings of House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twentieth Biennial Session...1917}, at 225 (Feb. 1) (H. Res. No. 20) (1917). It is unclear
One more effort to enact a partial public smoking ban was undertaken in Kansas in 1919, when the first woman elected to the Kansas legislature, Mrs. Minnie Grinstead, introduced her first measure.\textsuperscript{1247} House Bill No. 208 to prohibit smoking in public dining places.\textsuperscript{1248} Grinstead (1869-1925), a Republican, was a lecturer and Baptist minister who had joined the WCTU as far back as 1896, becoming an organizer for the state and national organizations.\textsuperscript{1249} On the same day (February 1) that the House Public Welfare Committee, to which Grinstead’s bill had been referred\textsuperscript{1250} and of which she, in her first term, was the chairman,\textsuperscript{1251} introduced its own bill to “prohibit smoking in public dining places, where women or children are served,”\textsuperscript{1252} it also recommended that her bill not be passed because the committee was offering a bill (H.B. No. 324) covering the same subject matter.\textsuperscript{1253} (Because Grinstead’s H.B. No. 208 is not extant in the Kansas State Archives or the State Library of Kansas, it cannot be compared with the

\textsuperscript{1247}“Woman’s Bill Passed,” \textit{Emporia Gazette}, Feb. 13, 1919 (1:3).

\textsuperscript{1250}\textit{House Journal: Proceedings of House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-First Biennial Session...1919}, at 65 (Jan. 27) (1919).

\textsuperscript{1251}\textit{House Journal: Proceedings of House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-First Biennial Session...1919}, at xvi (Feb. 11) (1919).

\textsuperscript{1252}\textit{House Journal: Proceedings of House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-First Biennial Session...1919}, at 118 (Feb. 1) (H.B. No. 324) (1919). A week later a bill was introduced in the West Virginia House of Delegates making it “unlawful for any person...to smoke tobacco, cigarettes or cigars in any public eating place, dining room, restaurant, cafe, or other like place where food is furnished, and where such places...are visited or patronized by females.” House Bill No. 268 (Feb. 8, 1919, by Mr. Vaughn), in Legislature of West Virginia, \textit{Bills of the House of Delegates of Regular and Extra: Sessions 1919}, at 202 (1919). The Judiciary Committee recommended passage (Feb. 12) and the bill was read a first time and ordered to a second reading (Feb. 15). \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{1253}\textit{House Journal: Proceedings of House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-First Biennial Session...1919}, at 120 (Feb. 1) (1919).
committee bill, which has survived.\textsuperscript{1254} The committee bill, “An Act to prohibit smoking in public dining places, where women or children are served,” provided:

\textit{SECTION 1.} That after the taking effect of this act all persons engaged in conducting, within the state of Kansas, a place where food is served to women or children, shall prohibit smoking within said place during the hours when such food is being served.

Provided however, that this act shall not be construed to prohibit the smoking in a room adjacent to said public eating place and partitioned off therefrom.

\textit{SEC. 2.} That upon conviction of any person for violation of section 1 of this act, they [sic] shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $25 for each such offense.

\textit{SEC. 3.} Each calendar day this act is violated, shall be and constitute a separate offense.

\textit{SEC. 4.} This act shall take effect and be enforced from and after its publication in the statute books.\textsuperscript{1255}

The measure’s protection was, then, not only confined to the times when women (and/) or children were present, thus subjecting them to the lingering stench of tobacco constantly replenished by smoking in their absence, but may have offered little or no protection against exposure to secondhand smoke emanating from the exempt adjacent rooms depending on how “partitioned off” was defined.\textsuperscript{1256}

Ten days later the House, acting as the committee of the whole, rendered the bill a virtual nullity by amending section 1 by: (1) substituting for “That after the taking effect of this act all persons engaged in conducting, within the state of Kansas, a” the language “It shall be unlawful for any person to smoke tobacco in any form or manner in any public”; and (2) adding at the end of section 1 (that is, at the end of the proviso paragraph exempting partitioned-off adjacent rooms) the

\textsuperscript{1254}Telephone interview with Susan Forbes, Reference Section, Library & Archives Division, Kansas State Historical Society, Topeka (Feb. 17, 2011); email from Cindy Roupe, State Library of Kansas (Feb. 21, 2011).

\textsuperscript{1255}House Bill No. 324 By Committee on Public Welfare (n.d.) (copy furnished by Library & Archives Div., Kansas State Historical Society).

\textsuperscript{1256}It is unclear what exactly a person conducting food service was required to do to comply with his duty to “prohibit smoking.” This gendered approach to secondhand smoke exposure was the mirror image of the purely moralistic discriminatory Sullivan Law, passed by a vote of 73 to 0 by the New York City Board of Aldermen in 1908, making it unlawful for the owner or manager of any hotel, restaurant, place of public entertainment, or other place of public resort to “allow any female to smoke” in any of those places “Women Mustn’t Smoke,” \textit{NYT}, Jan. 22, 1908 (4). The punishment meted out by the law, which did not make it unlawful for women to smoke, was a $5 to $25 fine and/or imprisonment up to 10 days.
language “nor in any room in which merchandise or drugs are sold at retail.” The bill’s supporters called the amendment, offered by Representative (and Judiciary Committee Chairman) Benjamin Hegler, a Republican lawyer, a “‘joker’” because, while ostensibly exempting drug stores that served lunch, it in fact provided that “‘smoking in public eating houses shall be unlawful except where cigars, merchandise and stocks of merchandise are kept for sale.’” Though no one objected to the amendment when it was offered, by the following day the “anti-smokers...discovered that it would exempt practically all restaurants for they all carry cigars and gum for sale.” Learning the intricacies and traps of bill drafting, “Mrs Grinstead sa[id] she will try to defeat the amendment when it comes up for passage.” (Rather than objecting at the time that the House adopted the committee of the whole’s report embodying the amendment, “Mrs. Grinstead” immediately thereafter was selected by the chamber to “attend the banquet of the Antisaloon League in celebration of the ratification of the prohibitory amendment.”) On third reading, the full House, which Republicans dominated with 110 seats to Democrats’ mere 15, then proceeded to pass H.B. No. 324 by a vote of 64 to 37. Whereas two-thirds of voting Republicans supported it, of the nine Democrats who voted, five opposed it. Grinstead tried to “re-refer the bill in the effort to get rid of the amendment, but without success.” Hegler himself, the mastermind of the emasculation of 1257 House Journal: Proceedings of House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-First Biennial Session...1919, at 196 (Feb. 11) (1919). A gross drafting error in the amendment made nonsense of the first paragraph of section 1, which now read: “It shall be unlawful for any person to smoke tobacco in any form or manner in any public place where food is being served to women or children shall prohibit smoking within said place during the hours when such food is being served.” Presumably the words “shall prohibit smoking within said place” were meant to be struck. In any event, the amendment shifted legal liability from food service owners to smokers.

---

Grinstead’s bill, explained his vote on the grounds that the “amendment excepting drug stores does not make the law unconstitutional, because it makes a classification between public dining rooms and stores, a classification which the Legislature clearly has a right to make. I do not think the owners of public dining rooms will generally be disposed to take an unfair advantage of the law in order to evade the law.” Interestingly, Grinstead, unlike Hegler and two other members, failed to avail herself of the opportunity to have her comment on Hegler’s machinations printed in the House Journal under the “Explanation of Votes” rubric. (The same day the Senate bill to prohibit smoking in public dining places expired when the Judiciary Committee recommended that it not be passed.)

The day the bill passed the House Progressive William Allen White’s Emporia Gazette reported that “it is generally conceded that the bill is ‘perfectly harmless,’” because “the Hegler amendment...exempted from the penalties of the bill all public eating houses carrying stocks of drugs or other merchandise.” The Hutchinson News chimed in by observing that Grinstead’s bill had “met with the ‘victory of defeat’...” Not only did the out-of-state press take note of House passage, but the International Journal of Surgery in its February issue injected into the debate this (doubtless embroidered) account in its advertising supplement:

Some horrid man smoked a cigar not long ago in the room where Mrs. Minnie Grinstead was dining, little suspecting she would have her revenge in a way given to few women. He did not know, of course, that she was the first woman legislator in the state of Kansas.

Mrs. Grinstead promptly introduced a bill prohibiting smoking in public dining-rooms. Her masculine colleagues passed the bill—but not until an artful masculine colleague had tacked on an amendment which provided that “smoking in public places shall be unlawful except where cigars, merchandise and stocks of merchandise are kept for sale.” Mrs. Grinstead, unused to legislative tactics, voted for the joker, and now discovers there are few lunchrooms which cannot boast a stock of merchandise consisting at least of a package 1267a Woman’s Bill Passed,” Emporia Gazette, Feb. 13, 1919 (1:3).

---

1267t The Results Not Large,” HN, Feb. 17, 1919 (7:3-4 at 4).
1269 E.g., “First Woman Lawmaker’s Anti-Smoking Bill Passes,” CREG, Feb. 14, 1919 (1:3).
of gum.

Women legislators are going to have a hard time taking tobacco away from smoking lawmakers.\(^{1270}\)

Despite the fatal dilution that H.B. No. 324 had suffered in the House, the Senate swiftly euthanized even that now innocuous bill when its Judiciary Committee recommended that it not be passed.\(^{1271}\) Consequently, Hegler’s speculation that owners’ opportunism would not lead to smoking as usual was never tested. Perhaps as partial compensation for having allowed herself to be snookered by her procedurally more agile colleagues, at the end of the session the House adopted a “resolution by way of testimonial to Hon. Minnie J. Grinstead,” lauding her, inter alia, for having, “[w]ith unfailing good nature and generosity...accepted victory and defeat alike....” Calling her “the fearless champion of every question she believed involved the progress of this state in intellectual and moral advancement,” “we, the brotherhood of this body, standing at attention, salute our sister and coworker....”\(^{1272}\)

Nebraska (1917/1919)

In 1917, with Democrats in firm control of both Nebraska legislative chambers for the last time during the Progressive ascendancy (1909-17)\(^{1273}\) and until the Depression election of 1932\(^{1274}\) and liquor prohibition very much in the forefront of the legislative agenda,\(^{1275}\) Republican Representative and lawyer John Fults\(^{1276}\) introduced a bill prohibiting cigarette smoking in public places of such comprehensive scope that it must have been almost as discontinuous with \(^{1276}\)The Nebraska Blue Book and Historical Register: 1918, at 273 (Addison Sheldon ed. 1918).

contemporaries’ experience\textsuperscript{1277} as it would be unimaginable to historical amnesiacs a century later. House Roll No. 248 declared it to be a public nuisance, for any person to smoke cigarettes of any description whatsoever in any public place in this state: In any passenger, coach, street car, automobile, run and operated for the conveyance of passengers; any church, court house, school house, or outbuildings or grounds belonging and used in connection with any school building; any hotel, restaurant, butcher shop, store-room, barber shop, picture and theatre, bank building, public offices, public and private stairways and halls leading to any of the above described places; in any depot, box car while standing on any railroad right-of-way; in any livery stable, blacksmith shop, garage (sic) or in any cellar, basement, outbuildings, workrooms belonging to, or used in connection with any of the foregoing places or buildings.\textsuperscript{1278}

The fine for any person over 16 violating any provision of the law ranged between one dollar and $25; alternatively, violators faced a maximum of 10 days in county jail.\textsuperscript{1279} (In 1911, the legislature had already prohibited smoking cigarettes or cigars or using tobacco in any form by minors under 18.)\textsuperscript{1280} Misdemeanor liability was also incurred by any person in possession or control of any public place who knowingly permitted anyone to smoke a cigarette there, subject to a fine ranging from $1 to $10.\textsuperscript{1281} Finally, in order to insure prosecution—considerable dissatisfaction had developed over the failure to enforce the sales ban as the press reported that the 1905 law had “stopped the anti-cigarette agitation, but it has not stopped the sale of cigarettes”\textsuperscript{1282}—the bill required all police to arrest all found violating the law, take them before a magistrate, and file a complaint against them; any officer who “knowingly [sic] and willfully neglect[ed] or refuse[d] to perform the duties” was guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $5 to $25; on a second conviction such

\textsuperscript{1277} In its sparse coverage of the bill, the state’s leading newspaper twice misreported that it prohibited smoking only among minors, getting the facts right only on final passage. “Legislative Notes,” \textit{MW-H}, Jan. 24, 1917 (2:2); “Legislative Notes,” \textit{MW-H}, Feb. 7, 1917 (3:2); “Third Reading,” \textit{MW-H}, Feb. 17, 1917 (2:3).

\textsuperscript{1278} Legislature of Nebraska: Thirty-Fifth Session, House Roll No. 248, § 1 (Jan. 23, 1917 by J. F. Fults) (copy furnished by NSHS).

\textsuperscript{1279} Legislature of Nebraska: Thirty-Fifth Session, House Roll No. 248, § 1 (Jan. 23, 1917 by J. F. Fults) (copy furnished by NSHS).

\textsuperscript{1280} Revised Statutes of the State of Nebraska: 1913, § 8846 at 2372 (1914).

\textsuperscript{1281} Legislature of Nebraska: Thirty-Fifth Session, House Roll No. 248, § 1 (Jan. 23, 1917 by J. F. Fults) (copy furnished by NSHS).

\textsuperscript{1282} \textit{Nebraska State Journal} (Lincoln), Aug. 10, 1910 (4:5) (untitled).
violating officers were subject to impeachment.\textsuperscript{1283} Though also drawn into this mandatory enforcement regime, county attorneys retained some discretion: it was their duty, when they had “reason to believe” that any of the law’s provisions had been violated, to investigate reports of such violations; if in a county attorney’s “judgment” a violation had taken place and “the proof obtainable w[ould] sustain a conviction,” it was his duty to file a complaint, cause the alleged violator to be arrested, and prosecute all such cases.\textsuperscript{1284}

Editorially the press, which would profit from the advertising that would accompany legalization, favored legislation that proceeded in the opposite direction, but clothed its preference in laments about unenforcibility:

The cigaret law which has been on the statute books for a number of years, has not been enforced. There were spasmodic bursts of enforcement when the law was new, but for several years there have been no prosecutions and the law has been wholly disregarded. Some places the cigarettes are kept out of sight in the stores, but even that dodge is not practiced in most places. ... The use of cigarettes by men has greatly increased in recent years, and there is less prejudice against the practice today than formerly. Public sentiment does not demand the strict enforcement of the present law.\textsuperscript{1285}

After the bill’s introduction,\textsuperscript{1286} it was referred to the Miscellaneous Subjects Committee,\textsuperscript{1287} which recommended its passage with two amendments: the addition of post offices as covered public places and an increase in the age of liable smokers to over 18.\textsuperscript{1288} (It is unclear why the committee would have believed that the U.S. Constitution permitted a state legislature to regulate activity inside a U.S. Government building.) Following adoption by the committee of the whole house of the committee amendments,\textsuperscript{1289} the full House on February 16

\textsuperscript{1283}Legislature of Nebraska: Thirty-Fifth Session, House Roll No. 248, § 3 (Jan. 23, 1917 by J. F. Fults) (copy furnished by NSHS).
\textsuperscript{1286}Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of Representatives 137 (Jan. 23) (n.d. [1917]).
\textsuperscript{1287}Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of Representatives 151 (Jan. 23) (n.d. [1917]).
\textsuperscript{1288}Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of Representatives 311 (Feb. 6) (n.d. [1917]).
\textsuperscript{1289}Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of passed the comprehensive public cigarette smoking ban by the overwhelming majority of 79 to 9. In a chamber composed of 62 Democrats and 38 Republicans, the Nays were cast by six Republicans and three Democrats, while 28 Republicans and 51 Democrats supported the ban. Of the notoriously anti-prohibitionist 12-member (all-Democratic) Omaha delegation, six voted Yes and only two No.\textsuperscript{1290} (Oddly, a month after House passage the Judiciary Committee recommended passage of a much less restrictive measure that would have prohibited smoking in the dining rooms of hotels, restaurants, and boarding houses.)\textsuperscript{1291} Despite this broad base of support, H.R. No. 248 died in the Senate, which, following the recommendation of its Miscellaneous Subjects Committee,\textsuperscript{1292} voted 17 to 16 to postpone it indefinitely.\textsuperscript{1293} The press made contextually clear the limits on the Senate’s progressive agenda:

The state senate faced the inevitable...and put the finishing touches upon the work of granting partial suffrage to women. The day before it discarded its beer and whisky and went into the dry column. It was but a short step in the march of reformation to grant the ballot to women, but the senate be goldarned if it would give up its cigarettes. It proposes to continue to blow cigarette smoke in public wherever it pleases. It was asking too much of the senate to quit the tobacco habit, so it indefinitely postponed H. R. 248, a bill to prevent the smoking of cigarettes in public places.\textsuperscript{1294}

\textsuperscript{1290}Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of Representatives 404 (Feb. 14) (n.d. [1917]).
\textsuperscript{1291}Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of Representatives 441 (Feb. 16) (n.d. [1917]). Party affiliation is taken from \textit{id.} at iv-vii. On Omaha, see above ch. 4. The largest circulation daily in the state capital gave only perfunctory coverage to the bill’s passage in a long front-page article on the day’s legislative proceedings. “Logrolling Charge Made Before House,” \textit{NSJ}, Feb. 17, 1917 (1:3-4 at 4).
\textsuperscript{1292}Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of Representatives 202 (Jan. 30) (H.R. No. 247 introduced by P. B. Neff), 778 (Mar. 15) (n.d. [1917]). Neff, a Democrat and Methodist, was an implement dealer. \textit{The Nebraska Blue Book and Historical Register: 1918}, at 277 (Addison Sheldon ed. 1918). Two weeks later the bill (together with many others still in the Sifting Committee) was indefinitely postponed. Daily Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Nebraska House of Representatives 1008 (Mar. 30) (n.d. [1917]).
\textsuperscript{1293}Senate Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Thirty-Fifth Session...1917, at 531 (Mar. 13).
\textsuperscript{1294}Senate Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Thirty-Fifth Session...1917, at 1001 (Apr. 19).
\textsuperscript{1294}“Capitol Bill Gets New Lease on Life,” \textit{NSJ}, Apr. 20, 1917 (1:3-4 at 4).
Unlike the House vote, the Senate’s manifested a greater role of party affiliation: only two Republicans voted to kill the bill, while eight opposed indefinite postponement; in contrast, Democrats split 8 to 15 with the entire five-member all-Democrat Omaha contingent voting to kill. One of those Omaha Democrats, lawyer John Moriarty, may have offered some insight into his anti-sumptuary colleagues’ mindset with his sarcastic observation on the Senate floor that “some people lost no time right after the [liquor] prohibitory amendment carried last fall in framing up a program to stop the use of everything not approved of by this class.”

A watered-down cigarette smoking ban confined to public eating places was enacted in 1919 as one of the concessions that the anti-cigarette forces were able to extract in exchange for passage of repeal of the cigarette sales ban and introduction of licensure. It remained on the books until 1937.

South Carolina (1920)

I respectfully recommend that you pass an Act prohibiting the smoking of cigarettes by boys under the age of sixteen years, and prohibiting the sale of cigarettes and cigarette papers in this State.

A straw showing the direction of the wind!

In January 1920, the Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States was

---

1295 Senate Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Thirty-Fifth Session...1917, at 1001 (Apr. 19). Party affiliation is taken from id. at 4-5. To be sure, the significance of the vote may have been somewhat diluted by the fact that it was simultaneously on three other recommendations of the committee of the whole that bills be engrossed for third reading.

1296 Capitol Bill Gets New Lease on Life,” NSJ, Apr. 20, 1917 (1:3-4, at 5:1-2 at 2). He also “wanted to know why cigarettes were any worse than pipes or cigars.”

1297 See above this ch.

1298 Journal of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of South Carolina, Being the Regular Session...1911, at 95 (Jan. 17) (1911) (Governor Cole Blease’s inaugural address). Cole “stood without peer as the classic example of the political mountebank,” who “won...the rural plebeians” while “[o]pposing labor legislation” and “openly advocating lynching....” Georg Tindall, The Emergence of the New South 1913-1945, at 21 (1967).

1299 Passing Events,” JE 23(5):463 (Mar. 1920) (about South Carolina Senate passage of dining room smoking ban).
tracking the progress of a bill introduced in the South Carolina legislature to prohibit the smoking of tobacco during meal hours in any public eating room. S. 367 had been introduced by James Padgett (1869-1939), a state senator from 1914 to 1926, who was a lawyer, presidential elector in 1912, and delegate to the Democratic national convention in 1920; he was also an 1892 graduate and a member of the Board of Visitors from 1912 until his death of the Citadel Military College, at which a barracks still bears his name. Indeed, his attentiveness to the Citadel’s needs in the legislature was so intense that he was known as “‘The Senator from The Citadel.”

If the bill were enacted, such statewide interference with at-will smoking in a southern tobacco state might have had serious national implications—more so than Nebraska’s imposition of a ban on cigarette smoking in public eating places in 1919 in the same statute that repealed the state’s cigarette sales ban. Indeed, an editorial in the New York Commercial that the trade journal Tobacco reprinted

---

1300 Journal of the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina 50 (S. 367, by James Graham Padgett) (1920); TMA, Legislative Bulletin No. 5 (Jan. 27, 1920), Bates No. 502425067. To be sure, the TMA’s intelligence was not flawless: it mistakenly placed Padgett in the House rather than the Senate.

1302 Resolutions, Board of Visitors of the Citadel, Charleston, S.C., Death of Colonel James G. Padgett (n.d. [1939]), in Minutes of The Citadel Board of Visitors, Folder 16 (Citadel Archives). (This resolution is in large part identical with the Bar Association obituary, but, since the former is undated, it is unclear which source plagiarized the other.) An editorial in his local newspaper after his death stressed that he “‘had strong likes and strong dislikes. ... There was no middle ground with Colonel Padgett.’’’ “In Memoriam: Colonel James Graham Padgett: 1869-1939,” South Carolina Bar Association, Transactions of the Forty-Sixth Annual Meeting 121-22 at 122 (Mar. 23-24, 1939) (reprinting editorial from unidentified issue of the Walterboro Press and Standard). According to the director of the Citadel Archives, Padgett’s papers there do not shed light on his position regarding smoking. Email from Jane Yates to Marc Linder (June 7, 2010). The fact that Padgett was a Methodist, the mainstream Christian denomination that opposed tobacco most strictly, may account for his advocacy of the smoking ban. Biographical Directory of the Senate of the State of South Carolina, 1776-1964, at 285 (Emily Reynolds and Joan Faunt comp. 1964).

1303 See above this ch.
expressly stated that it was “[s]trange” that “the anti-smoke fiend has invaded the South.” But even though he had “not yet been able to go the entire length of his journey...he has got a fine foothold from which he will be able to widen his powers.” For both publications the South Carolina Senate’s action amounted to “intolerance with a vengeance prohibition run mad.” And if the antis wanted to justify this bill by reference to deference to women’s refinement, the editors let them know in no uncertain terms that “[m]ost women like to see a man enjoy his smoke,” and “[i]f they have the slightest revulsion to the practice in their impressionistic days, the antipathy quickly passes away.”

On January 22, the South Carolina Senate, after defeating a motion to kill the bill by a vote of 25 to 11, adopted an amendment subjecting hotel or other eating house managers to penalties (of fines of $10 to $20 or terms of 10 to 30 days on public work) for failing to post conspicuous notices prohibiting smoking as well as for knowingly allowing a violation of the law. The next day, however, the Senate weakened the bill by passing it with an amendment authorizing the management to provide separate dining rooms where smoking was permitted, and sent it to the House of Representatives.

South Carolina’s leading newspaper took little interest in the bill. On its second reading The State mockingly reported: “At first it looked as if the bill would be laughed off the calendar, but the egis of good manners and chivalry and every other good attribute of the people of the state was evoked and senators discussed the bill seriously for an hour or more.” In contrast, the press in the rest of the country took editorial note of this alarming development. One paper in Cincinnati—which had apparently slept through the past three decades of anti-cigarette legislation—intoning that the “crusade against the use of tobacco has won its first victory” and reminding readers of how alcohol prohibition had begun, warned against complacency, “as if distance lent you and your favorite habit immunity.”

A Wisconsin daily, sounding very much like cigarette

1308 First Step Toward Tobacco Prohibition,” Cincinnati Times Star (reprinted in Bridgeport Telegram, Jan. 29, 1920 (10:6)). For an unpersuasive attempt to interpret the South Carolina bill (which applied to men and women) as one of the “sweeping efforts of this sort” possibly resulting from “the prejudice against smoking by women” and aimed at preventing “first of all the open indulgence of a widely claimed feminine privilege,” see companies’ restaurant-owners-know-best free-market propaganda directed at the burgeoning anti-secondhand smoke movement in the late twentieth century, rebuked the legislature for “magnifying what is at worst a petty annoyance into a crime.” Instead, it declared that if smoking in public dining rooms were really “such a nuisance,” the proprietors had the power to stop it, and if the public really favored bans, the owners would be “quick enough to yield to it without having to be forced by a statute into taking action.” Interestingly, the only example that occurred to the editor of the need for a new criminal statute was the then “unprecedented situation” of the “plotting of radical agitators against the government.” On the other hand, a small-town Iowa paper, echoing a commonly held view, commented that even if the bill were not enacted, it showed that “the smokers have some one [sic] after them, and they have no one to blame but themselves” because “[t]hey insist on smoking any and every place and have been known to light their cigarettes in church.” Tentatively detecting a coalescing resistance to secondhand smoke exposure, the Palo Alto Reporter observed that: “It begins to look as though the non-smokers were going to assert that they have some rights.”

In the end, however, the senate bill was, as someone (perhaps Harry H. Shelton) at R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company handwrote on the copy of TMA’s Legislative Bulletin made public decades later by litigation, “killed” without a dissenting vote five days later in the House, which adopted an unfavorable judiciary committee report.

---

1309 See below Part VI.

1312 TMA, Legislative Bulletin No. 5 (Jan. 27, 1920), Bates No. 502425067/9. Since Shelton’s name is handwritten at the top of this page in a similar handwriting, perhaps the company’s general counsel was personally keeping track of the bill’s progress.

North Dakota (1921)

At the same time that it was strengthening the state’s 1913 anti-cigarette legislation in other respects, the North Dakota legislature in 1921 also enacted a partial public smoking ban, making it punishable by a fine of between $5 and $25 to smoke any form of tobacco “in the dining room of any hotel, or in any cafe, restaurant or eating room in which both men and women are being served, or in any street car, or railway coach, except in rooms, coaches and compartments specially provided for that purpose”; proprietors of such establishments and conductors of such means of transportation who knowingly permitted such smoking were subject to the same fine. Despite numerous efforts to eliminate this significant government intervention, like the less capacious Nebraska anti-public smoking law, North Dakota’s was also not repealed until 1937.

The North Dakota WCTU energetically advocated for the partial ban on public smoking, which was introduced in the House by a member of the Nonpartisan League, A. J. McLarty, a farmer. The fact that when, at the legislators’ invitation, 12 to 15 women appeared on February 1 before the House State Affairs Committee, to which House Bill No. 51 had been referred, some lawmakers were smoking prompted the Bismarck Tribune to question whether the 13151921 N.D. Laws ch. 127, at 211. Thus, unlike the smoking ban in eating establishments, which applied only when women were present, that in means of transportation applied all the time.

1314See above this ch.
13171921 N.D. Laws ch. 127, at 211.
1318See, e.g., the numerous petitions that its various local groups submitted to the Senate. State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 156, 179-80, 198-99, 209, 220, 248 (1921).
1319State of North Dakota: Journal of the House of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 119 (Jan. 26) (1921); State of North Dakota: 1919 Legislative Manual 594. The bill was introduced one week after the similarly worded but more comprehensive Utah measure; see below this ch.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

indication that the committee gave that it would recommend passage stemmed from its desire to “be courteous to the women” or from its real support for the ban. Women’s self-protective motivation underlying the bill was clearly set forth by the WCTU’s spokeswoman, who remarked that H.B. No. 51 “would not prevent anyone from smoking, who wants to smoke...but would prevent women from being subjected to its noxious fumes” in covered public places. After the committee majority had diluted the ban by recommending that it be amended to limit coverage to eateries “in which both men and women are being served”—thus reflecting the WCTU’s female-centric position—the House defeated the committee’s minority report recommendation to kill the bill by postponing it indefinitely.

Three days later the House, sitting as the committee of the whole, debated the bill at length, “fiery oratory” being hurled “[t]hrough clouds of smoke...from one side of the hall to the other....” Norwegian-born farmer and IVA member Christian Ness, who was especially active in seeking to kill the bill, persisted in urging extension of the smoking ban to haymows and barns “under present laws if the hired help on your farm want to smoke you can’t help yourself. ‘I found two men smoking in my haymow last summer...and I asked them to stop and they said they didn’t have to. I had to take one by the neck and throw him out.’” A majority of representatives disagreed with him, and the amendment offered by his fellow IVA member Dayton Shipley (a railroad brakeman who consistently voted against all anti-tobacco measures) “making it illegal for any man to use tobacco in any form east of the Missouri river” was ruled out of order. At least one IVA member who consistently voted for all anti-cigarette/smoking bills that session, declared to the House that “he couldn’t see why women should be required to submit to men smoking in dining rooms.” Asked whether he opposed smoking, ex-smoker William Bauer replied: “‘No, I don’t care how much they smoke. They can go to h--- and smoke there if they want to.’” One NPL member devised an idiosyncratic self-defensive basis for supporting the bill.

---

1320 “Solons Smoking as Anti-Smoking Bill Comes Up,” BT, Feb. 1, 1921 (1:5). The House no-smoking rule did not cover committee rooms. See below Table 6.

1323 State of North Dakota: Journal of the House of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 272 (Feb. 5) (1921).
Farmer Charles Reichert, “holding a half-used cigar in his hand,” announced that: “I’ve been smoking, not because I want to, but to keep from getting sick, because these men around me are smoking. And you can’t be around where men are smoking without smoking yourself.” Ultimately, the House, rejecting Ness’s motion to re-refer the bill to committee, adopted the majority report, and the following day, after first defeating yet another motion to postpone indefinitely by a decisive vote of 32 to 76, passed the ban 78 to 30. Although votes were not cast along strict factional lines, only eight (or 15 percent of) voting Nonpartisan League members opposed H.B. No. 51 on each vote, while 43 percent and 39 percent, respectively, of the voting Independent Voters Association members supported the bill.

In the immediate wake of the strong anti-smoking vote in the House, similar action was forecast in the Senate. After its Temperance Committee had recommended passage, the Senate debated the “Smoke Outside” bill on February 26. Opponents “made an effort to laugh it out” by amendments to extend the ban to cover tobacco chewing, the Senate, and the House and Senate chamber, the first being adopted and the last two failing. The Senate also adopted a motion to halve the bill’s minimum and maximum penalties. The 1326 “House Pushes Anti-Smoking Bill Onward,” BT, Feb. 5, 1921 (1:1). The occupational information is taken from the 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest). If House members were smoking they were violating a House rule. See below Table 6.

---

1327 State of North Dakota: Journal of the House of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 252 (Feb. 4) (1921).

1328 State of North Dakota: Journal of the House of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 272-73 (Feb. 5) (1921). The tallies were calculated according to the factional affiliation in “Names of Legislators Who Will Come to Bismarck in January,” BT, Nov. 5, 1920 (2 [sic; should be 4]:5).

1330 State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 392 (Feb. 17) (1921).

1332 State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 583 (Feb. 26) (1921). An IVA member moved the first amendment, while two NPL members moved the last two. The ban on smoking in the Senate was proposed by NPL member John Nathan, an Odessa-born farmer, while the ban in the House and Senate chambers was offered by NPL member Eric Bowman, a Swedish-born farmer, who was also the chamber’s president pro tempore. State of North Dakota: 1919 Legislative Manual 594, 579. The Senate appears not to have regulated smoking. See below Table 6.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Nonpartisan League then mobilized to reconsider the two successful amendments: 22 of its members joined by only four IVA members prevailed over 20 IVA affiliates joined by only two NPL defectors. The Senate then struck out the ban on public tobacco chewing, but retained the reduced fines. On third reading 22 NPL members voted for and only two against the partial public smoking ban, while 11 IVA affiliates joined the majority and 13 opposed the bill. On its return to the House, H.B. No 51 was passed by the overwhelming majority of 87 to 20, only four NPL members joining 16 IVA members in opposition.

Unsurprisingly, then, as was also the case with the 1921 session’s legislation strengthening the 1913 anti-cigarette law, the statist, anti-corporate Nonpartisan League supported the curb on laissez-faire smoking much more intensely than the conservative, business-oriented IVA.

When the law went into effect on July 1, headlines all over the United States trumpeted the message that: “N.D. Law Forbids Smoking with Meals”,” “Men of North Dakota Can’t Smoke If Women Around”, “Smoking in Cafes, Hotels, Cars Banned.” More prosaically, numerous newspapers in Iowa informed readers that “[s]mokers of North Dakota can’t enjoy their cigars, cigarettes or pipes in public eating houses....”

Utah (1913-1923)

Insofar as the bill affects smoking in public places, it is only a question of those to whom the use of tobacco in their presence is offensive trying to obtain their rights which their smoking neighbors seem unwilling to concede them without compulsion. If a number

\[133\] State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 583 (Feb. 26) (1921).
\[134\] State of North Dakota: Journal of the House of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 668 (Feb. 26) (1921). The four had also voted against the bill earlier.
\[135\] See above this ch.
\[136\] “Anti-Smoking Bill Becomes Law of State,” BT, July 1, 1921 (1:3).
\[137\] WEC, July 1, 1921 (2:1).
\[138\] Woodland Daily Democrat (Cal.), July 2, 1921 (5:3).
\[139\] Oakland Tribune, July 1, 1921 (1:6). See also “It’s Illegal Now to Smoke in Cafes in North Dakota,” Evening Republican (Mitchell, S.D.), July 11, 1921 (1:2). of citizens, instead of using tobacco saw fit to amuse themselves by shaking flour bags in a crowd, for instance (and when one comes to examine the habit of burning a weed between one’s lips it does not seem any more sane than would the shaking of a flour bag for pastime!), every smoker would object. His “liberty,” the rights granted by his citizenship, would be in danger! Yet, he thinks nothing of blowing smoke in the face of those around him.... The fact is that tobacco is a drug, and the tobacco habit is a drug habit.\footnote{Louis Ward, “‘Freak Tobacco Legislation,’” \textit{DN}, Jan. 20, 1921 (sect. 2, 3:6-7) (letter to editor). Louis Ward was the pen-name of Fredrick Louis Ward Bennett, the first president of the No-Tobacco League of Utah and a Mormon. Louis Ward, “The Anti-Cigarette Law Has Not Failed,” \textit{IE} 26(3):265-67 (Jan. 1923); see also below this ch.}

Utah politics during the Progressive era underwent a transformation as anti-Mormons left the dominant Republican Party in 1904 in protest against church influence and formed the American Party, which then controlled Salt Lake City’s municipal administration until 1911, although it never gained statewide traction and disappeared by World War I. Moreover, by 1912 the Republican Party was losing support as a result of equivocating on the initiative, referendum, and recall, blocking ratification of the 17th Amendment (instituting popular election of senators), skirting enactment of a workers compensation system, and refusing to regulate railroads or public utilities. Two years later, Progressives and Democrats fused, virtually neutralizing Republicans’ control of the House; Republican Governor William Spry’s pocket-veto of the statewide liquor prohibition bill passed in 1915 together with the legislature’s failure to pass progressive measures such as workers compensation and railroad and public utilities regulation alienated the electorate sufficiently to eliminate Republicans altogether from the House (which was composed of 44 Democrats and 1 Socialist in 1917), produce a 14 to 4 Democratic majority in the Senate, and elect a Democratic Jewish governor, Simon Bamberger, who completed enactment of the Progressive legislative agenda, including liquor prohibition. Republicans were also totally excluded from the Senate at the 1918 elections, though they managed to recapture eight House seats, and not until the nationwide Republican restoration of 1920 did they regain their legislative majorities, expelling all but a single Democrat from the House and taking 11 of 18 Senate seats. At the following three sessions, Democrats retained only one Senate seat, while their House representation was reduced from 10 to 9 to 6.\footnote{Jan Shipps, “Utah Comes of Age Politically: A Study of the State’s Politics in the Early Years of the Twentieth Century,” \textit{UHQ} 35(2):91-111 at 108-11 (Spr. 1967); Thomas Alexander, “Political Patterns of Early Statehood, 1896-1919,” in \textit{Utah’s History} 409-28 at 421-24 (Richard Poll ed. 1978); Michael Dubin, \textit{Party Affiliations in the State} 1570}
Near-Successes Without Organized Mormon Church Support (1913-1919)

We [the Utah WCTU] are working for the prohibition of the liquor traffic, the opium and tobacco traffic, the gambling house and haunts of shame.

We believe in a living wage, an eight-hour day, in courts of conciliation and arbitration, in justice as opposed to greed of gain, in peace on earth, good will to men. ... We aim...to secure laws prohibiting the sale of all narcotics, including tobacco in all its forms.\(^{1343}\)

The Mormon church, as detailed below, did not organizationally support legislation to bar adults from buying cigarettes or smoking tobacco in various public places until after World War I, but its Deseret Evening News editorialized on behalf of such measures much earlier. For example, in 1907, sparked by a discussion of public smoking in the Portland Oregon press, the paper opined: “The question is not whether smokers have a right to smoke, but whether they have a right to compel everybody else, in the streets, in elevators, in public buildings, to inhale the smoke they have discarded. No refined gentleman will claim such a prerogative. The ordinance against soiling the sidewalks could profitably be augmented by a clause relating to smoking.”\(^{1344}\) Under the identically same editorial title seven years later, the paper, prompted by a debate going on in larger eastern cities concerning street cars, revisited the issue. This time, while conceding the “personal liberty” argument to the extent of agreeing that smokers had “the right to ruin their bodies and souls,” the News countered that they had “no right to make other people sick while they are exercising that privilege.”\(^{1345}\)

As far back as 1913 the Utah Senate considered a bill to “prohibit and punish the nuisance of smoking tobacco, cigars, or cigarettes in or upon street cars or railway passenger cars.”\(^{1346}\) The measure specifically made it unlawful “to smoke

---

1343Mrs. C. A. Walker [State President Utah WCTU], “W.C.T.U. Will Work After Utah Goes Dry,” Salt Lake Telegram, Oct. 23, 1916 (sect. 2, 1:6-7). There is no evidence that the Utah WCTU ever concretely pushed for enactment of a statewide ban on the sale of all tobacco, which, however, from time to time opponents of anti-cigarette legislation offered as a bill-killing amendment.

1344“Smoking in Public,” DEN, Apr. 1, 1907 (edit.), clipping in Selected Collections from the Archives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 2 (DVD 2002).

1346S.B. No. 205 (Feb. 18, 1913, by Republican Charles Cottrell, Jr., Salt Lake), on tobacco, whether by pipes, cigars, or cigarettes, within that compartment or portion of any street car or railway passenger car which women or children are permitted to occupy as passengers, or upon the platform or entrance to such car which women or children are permitted to use for purposes of ingress or egress.”

To be sure, smoking compartments were permitted, but only if they were “so separated that the tobacco smoke therein is not permitted to enter that portion of the car which may be occupied by women or children.”\(^\text{1347}\) However, even this rather modest and gendered anti-smoking initiative was weighed down with fatal amendments “to make the bill ridiculous”—one extending the ban on smoking to “any substance” was interpreted to “prohibit the locomotive from smoking”—so that on the final roll call it fell one vote short of a constitutional majority.\(^\text{1348}\)

In 1917 a much more radical bill was introduced by Representative Edward Southwick.\(^\text{1349}\) In addition to instituting a rather capacious ban on manufacturing, selling, exchanging, or keeping for sale any cigarettes, cigarette papers, or wrappers, subject to a maximum fine of $300 or imprisonment of six months for a second offense, Southwick’s House Bill No. 180 made it a misdemeanor, subject to a maximum $100 fine, for any person to “buy, accept or have in his possession any cigarette, cigarette paper or other wrapper intended for the wrapping of tobacco in the form of a cigarette, for the purpose of smoking....”\(^\text{1350}\)

http://images.utah.gov/cdm4/document.php?CISOROOT=/428&CISOPTR=12892&REC=20. It is unclear whether some organization(s) had proposed the bill. At its annual convention in October 1912 the WCTU of Utah did not mention any tobacco-related legislation. Minutes of the Twenty-Second Annual Convention of the Women’s Christian Temperance Union of Utah...Oct. 8, 9, 10, 1912.

\(^\text{1347}\)S.B. No. 205 (Feb. 18, 1913, by Cottrell), on http://images.utah.gov/cdm4/document.php?CISOROOT=/428&CISOPTR=12892&REC=20. An owner, conductor, brakeman, or porter having charge of or operating such a car who permitted prohibited smoking was subject to a fine up to $100 and/or imprisonment up to 30 days. This provision, too, was amended to make only the conductor criminally liable. Id.; “Antismoking Bill Meets Death with Its Amendments,” Salt Lake Herald-Republican, Mar. 1, 1913 (9:3).

\(^\text{1348}\)In 1917 a much more radical bill was introduced by Representative Edward Southwick. In addition to instituting a rather capacious ban on manufacturing, selling, exchanging, or keeping for sale any cigarettes, cigarette papers, or wrappers, subject to a maximum fine of $300 or imprisonment of six months for a second offense, Southwick’s House Bill No. 180 made it a misdemeanor, subject to a maximum $100 fine, for any person to “buy, accept or have in his possession any cigarette, cigarette paper or other wrapper intended for the wrapping of tobacco in the form of a cigarette, for the purpose of smoking....”\(^\text{1350}\)

\(^\text{1349}\)On Southwick, see above this ch.

\(^\text{1350}\)In 1917 a much more radical bill was introduced by Representative Edward Southwick. In addition to instituting a rather capacious ban on manufacturing, selling, exchanging, or keeping for sale any cigarettes, cigarette papers, or wrappers, subject to a maximum fine of $300 or imprisonment of six months for a second offense, Southwick’s House Bill No. 180 made it a misdemeanor, subject to a maximum $100 fine, for any person to “buy, accept or have in his possession any cigarette, cigarette paper or other wrapper intended for the wrapping of tobacco in the form of a cigarette, for the purpose of smoking....”\(^\text{1350}\)
Although the bill, the introduction of which was “somewhat belated” and had been “expected by tobacco dealers,” would have outlawed not only smoking, but being in possession of, a cigarette, the press did not always realize how expansively prohibitionist the measure was. Unsurprisingly, more than 550 students at Southwick’s alma mater (Latter-day Saints’ University) and more than 350 at Ogden Senior High School petitioned the legislature to pass his bill. Aware beforehand that high school petitions would soon reach the legislature, the Mormon church-owned Deseret Evening News hailed them on the grounds that they “dispose of the time-worn argument of the tobacco advocate, manufacturer and dealer that such legislation appeals only to ‘a lot of narrow-minded old mossbacks who come in from the country and try to run the cities.’” Instead of explaining why these hundreds of “bright young men and women...who ha[d] taken up arms against the deadly coffin nail” were not merely young fogeys who had imbibed the same Mormon dogma as their elders, the News assured its readers that the “maker of cigarettes, the dealer who sells them and the smokers themselves know that they belong in the same category with the drugs and liquors which the laws of enlightened peoples have placed under the ban.” The paper also preemptively defended itself against the charge that the anti-cigarette movement was a “proposal to legislate morals into a people” by distinguishing its program as “a simple proposal to prevent them from destroying themselves and 1351“Anti-Cigarette Bill Appears in House,” SLT, Feb. 20, 1917 (9:6). Two days later a local option tobacco bill was introduced that empowered town trustees to “license and regulate or prohibit the selling, giving away or disposition in any manner, or [sic; must be of] tobacco.” H.B. No. 204 (by Paxson) on http://images.archives.utah.gov/cdm4/document.php?CISOROOT=/432&CISOPTR=193&REC=3; House Journal: Twelfth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah...1917, at 379 (Feb. 21). It was killed in committee. “Consolidation Bill Is Killed in House,” SLT, Mar. 6, 1917 (8:2).

---

1352Since the bill did not specify that the “purpose of smoking” had to be the possessor’s, even giving away a cigarette to someone 21 or over, which was not expressly made unlawful, would presumably have been unlawful if the donee’s purpose was to smoke it.

1353For example, “Proceedings of the Legislature,” Ogden Standard, Feb. 20, 1917 (3:6-7) (“designed to absolutely prohibit the sale of cigarettes”). In contrast, “Saunterings,” Goodwin’s Weekly, Feb. 24, 1917 (8:4), not only reported the possession ban, but, ironically, foreseeing cotinine tests, proposed appointment of “an inspector with authority to puncture the skin of anyone under suspicion for a blood test to be made to see if My Lady Nicotine or any of her offspring are hovering about in the smoker’s system.”

1354House Journal: Twelfth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah...1917, at 459-60 (Feb. 27).
generations yet unborn.”

Three days after the Judiciary Committee had favorably reported the bill, it was considered by the full House, which just a few days earlier had—despite its two-decade-old standing rule prohibiting smoking—adopted a motion that smoking be prohibited in the House chamber at all times because it was “impolite to the women members.” The principal speech among the many given was Southwick’s, which, to judge by press excerpts, was well-stocked with venerable platitudes about “dull and degenerate” boys and Thomas Edison’s claim that burning the paper wrapper produced a poison that destroyed the nervous system, but nevertheless predictably sparked a round of applause from the gallery prompting the speaker of the House to declare ironically that “any further demonstrations would occasion an election.” Unclear was whether Speaker John Tolton—the Mormon church functionary who had led the opposition to anti-cigarette legislation at the 1907 session and now, once again, opined that the legislature lacked the right to “control the habits of mature men”—was still joking when he advised the bill’s advocates that if they sought passage, they should amend H.B. No. 180 to cover only minors (a superfluous task since the existing law already accomplished that objective). In the meantime, Southwick was busy taking umbrage at the levity of a motion to make the sale of tea, coffee, and tea- and coffee-pots a misdemeanor. The measure proved to be far too radical to secure majority approval, which was produced only by means of striking out two vital provisions, including and especially the ban on adults’ possession of cigarettes (the other being the penalty for selling cigarettes). Following this evisceration the House voted 25 to 11 for passage.

Without mentioning, let alone bemoaning, the deradicalization of Southwick’s bill, the Deseret News took heart editorially that enough “common-sense” legislators sat in the assembly to pass the bill “[i]n spite of the frivolous 1355“A Plea that Should Count,” DEN, Feb. 24, 1917 (4:3) (edit.).

---

1356House Journal: Twelfth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah...1917, at 443 (Feb. 26).
1357“Dry' Amendment to Be Recalled,” DEN, Feb. 21, 1917 (2:3).
1358“Anti-Cigarette Bill Passes House,” OE, Mar. 2, 1917 (3:1-2). On the law making it unlawful for anyone under 21 to buy, accept, or possess cigars, cigarettes, or tobacco, see 1903 Utah Laws ch. 135 at 186; 1911 Utah Laws ch. 51 at 68; Compiled Laws of the State of Utah §8443 at 1625 (1917). On Tolton in 1907, see above this ch.
amendments which some of the legislators with an embryotic sense of humor are trying to tack on to the anti-cigarette bill to make it ridiculous.” Its hopes were buoyed by its sense that the cigarette question was not only the last one still pending that was not a “‘party issue,’” but also no longer subject to controversy, there being “only one side to the question, political, medical, moral, or any other way; and that is that the miserable, filthy, deadly little coffin-nail should go.”

The next day the bill reached the Senate, where it was referred to the Public Health and Labor Committee, among whose members, the News reported, “the cigarette as such meets with but little sympathy....” In particular Chairman John Wootton, although he could not comment on the bill because he had not yet seen it, entertained a pronounced antipathy toward the use of cigarettes (but not at all toward tobacco): “‘As having employed in my time thousands of men...I may say I have noted the effects of the cigarette rather carefully. I have frequently noticed that it was impairing the usefulness of the men physically, and at times I have been able to persuade workmen to give up the cigarette and smoke pipes for a while. In as short a time as two weeks the physical change in the men for the better would be quite marked.”

Considerably less promising as an agent of change was committee member Archibald Bevan (who as a pharmacist and drugstore owner presumably sold cigarettes), who “intimated that he did not believe the legislature could ‘bring about the millennium’ all at once. He did not see any particular objection to letting a man of adult age having [sic] a cigarette if he insisted on smoking them [sic].”

In the event, the Mormon newspaper’s headline (“Anti-Cigarette Bill Reaches Senate; May Become Law”) was overtaken by reality the day that it appeared, when Representative Daisy Allen of Salt Lake City announced that she would move reconsideration of S.B. No. 180. The genesis of the misunderstanding is difficult to reconstruct, but many representatives, according to the press, failing to grasp the amendments’ “exact significance,” “voted under the impression that

---

1361“Ban and Banish the Cigarette,” DEN, Mar. 2, 1917 (4:1) (edit.)
13631920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).
1364“Anti-Cigarette Bills Reaches Senate; May Become Law,” DEN, Mar. 2, 1917 (10:5).
1365House Journal: Twelfth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah...1917, at 521 (Mar. 2). A suffragist, Allen ran and was elected as a member of the Progressive Party (which was a coalition of Democrats and Republicans), though she considered herself a Democrat. Women Legislators of Utah, 1896-1993, at 61 (Delila Abbott and Beverly White comp. 1993 [1976]).
they were legislating only against the use and sale of cigarettes as far as minors were concerned.” On learning after adjournment from one of the Nay-voters what the chamber in fact had just done to the bill, “[s]everal members showed great astonishment and could not be convinced for some time.” (Since the bill text underlined the new provisions proposed to be added to the existing no-tobacco-sales-to-under-21-year-olds law and the motion to strike out the ban on possession was expressly phrased in terms of “all new matter in Section 4469x,” members’ confusion is puzzling. Unknown is whether these members understood that they had banned all sale of cigarettes but deleted the penalty for it.) Two days later, on reconsideration the House, coming to its collective senses, voted to strike out the enacting clause, thus killing what was left of Southwick’s initiative.

A deeply disappointed Deseret News editorialist sought to turn his post mortem into resuscitation by expressing the belief that, no matter how late in the session, “the legislative champions of public health, intellect and morals” might reconstruct the bill into an “unobjectionable” measure and pass it. His failure to reveal exactly what had been objectionable to whom was unsurprising since he assumed that “there could have been no honest or intelligent objection” to S.B. No. 180’s purposes and “the disgusting and deadly cigarette was hardly less [than liquor], in the minds of the people, an evil that demanded early removal and eradication.”

After his election to the state Senate in 1918, Southwick introduced a bill (S.B. No. 105) at the 1919 session that was virtually identical to H.B. No. 180 except that it omitted the phrase “for the purpose of smoking,” thus expanding the scope of the ban on adults’ possession of cigarettes. Even more enthusiastically than in 1917, the student body of Brigham Young University, speaking through its three-member presidency, submitted a petition urging the legislature to make “Utah the first State of our Union to take this progressive step” of banning the manufacture, possession, sale, and use of cigarettes and cigarette papers. Residents of Lehi, Southwick’s hometown, also urged their county’s legislators to support Southwick’s bill.

That the Mormon hierarchy, as explained below, did not concertedly and organizationally engage on behalf of Southwick’s measure in 1919 (as it would in 1921) did not mean that it failed to lend it any support. In particular, the church’s Deseret Evening News, one of the state’s largest-circulation dailies, editorialized twice in favor of S.B. No. 105. Indeed, just a week before the bill’s introduction, under the title, “Coffin for the ‘Coffin-Nail,’” it used the occasion of a recent Colorado Presbyterian synod resolution advocating the prohibition of manufacture and sales in the entire United States to express the optimistic opinion—which stood the tobacco industry’s apprehension on its head—that “it becomes more and more evident that a great concerted move will be made against the cigarette by the present Anti-Saloon League, as soon as the changed conditions due to the demise and somewhat turbulent burial of John Barleycorn have been readjusted to the new order of things….” Despite the scorn and ridicule to which promoters of such a movement had been subjected, the Mormon editorialist assured his readers, “the same measure of success against the desplicable and deadly cigarette will be eventually chronicled.”

The day after devoting an entire article (including the full bill text) to the introduction of Southwick’s bill, the News, under the title, “The Deadly Cigarette,” editorially emphasized that “[t]he great majority of this state are strongly opposed to the use of tobacco,” adding that all reputable doctors, joined by educators, agreed that it was “injurious.” Consequently, it asked, “why should it be tolerated, as a costly, filthy, indulgence? Why especially should the use of the cigarette—probably the most insidious and destructive form in which the addict can enjoy his poison—be allowed, nay even encouraged as has been the case since the war’s outbreak…to grow to the fabulous figures of 39,000,000,000 produced in 1918 or 400 per capita?\footnote{1376} Focusing then on the course of the state’s legislation on the subject, the paper criticized previous efforts and proffered its advice on how to avoid repeating past mistakes:

Utah legislators have more than once been given an opportunity to place their state in the front rank of reform by enacting an anti-cigarette law. Measures of this kind have been presented, supported by strong public sentiment, but an insufficient number of the lawmakers have found themselves able to take the matter seriously. By some frivolous parliamentary trick, or by ridiculous amendments which the real friends of the original measures were not keen enough to detect and prevent, such legislation has thus far failed to reach the statute book except as applicable to minors. The present legislature will also have an opportunity to place itself on record; and friends of the bill introduced by Senator Southwick should see to it that no member be allowed to escape voting on the bill on its merits—in other words that it be not killed by a technicality.\footnote{1377}

A month later, after the bill had passed the Senate and was pending in the House with only two days left in the session, the News, in a blunt message to the lower chamber ("Pass the Anti-Cigarette Bill"), insisted that "if the sentiment of the people shall be truly reflected by their representatives," S.B. No.105 could be "adopted with practical unanimity." Warning against forcing Utah to wind up in the rearguard rather than in the leadership of a movement that was "already strongly under way in other states"—though the editorialist would have been hard-pressed to name them—the Mormon newspaper made transparent the chronological context for its engagement: "now that [liquor] prohibition is out of the way...the next great logical reform measure" was "decreeing that tobacco also must go."\footnote{1378}

S.B. No. 105 encountered its first sign of resistance in the five-member Senate Public Health Committee, a three-member majority of which reported on it unfavorably "in its present form." Chairman Daniel Stevens, a merchant, submitted a comment to the full Senate explaining in effect that he would support only an even more radical measure (that he knew stood no chance of passage). Since "[l]ittle or no attempt" was being made to enforce the existing no-sales-to-under-21-year-olds law:

If public sentiment against the cigarette is not sufficiently crystallized to secure an attempt at enforcement of the present law, a more drastic law would meet with popular disfavor and fail utterly of enforcement. ... It is his [Stevens'] opinion that S.B. No. 105 is

\footnotesize
\begin{itemize}
\item \footnote{1376}"The Deadly Cigarette," DEN, Feb. 13, 1919 (4:1) (edit.).
\item \footnote{1377}"The Deadly Cigarette," DEN, Feb. 13, 1919 (4:1-2) (edit.).
\item \footnote{1378}"Pass the Anti-Cigarette Bill," DEN, Mar. 11, 1919 (4:2) (edit.).
\end{itemize}
considerably in advance of public sentiment at this time. But if the Legislature is going to force this sort of legislation upon one class of smokers, regardless of public sentiment, it should do a good, thorough job of it and treat all classes alike.

If S.B. No. 105 were so amended to prohibit the sale and use of tobacco in any form for human use, and apply it to all ages, he would willingly and gladly support such a measure.\(^{1379}\)

Reinforcing this initial set-back, the bill’s consideration on second reading was accompanied by “considerable merriment and the general impression seemed to be that it would soon be killed,”\(^{1380}\) but in fact it passed by a vote of 12 to 5 (one of the committee majority defecting to the Ayes)\(^{1381}\) and made it through final passage by a vote of 11 to 6 (the defector reverting to the Nays).\(^{1382}\) The anti-prohibitionist Salt Lake Telegram called this outcome “one of the biggest surprises of the session....”\(^{1383}\) Despite these solid majorities a potential obstacle emerged when one of the senatorial Ayes intimated that he might offer an amendment to place the issue before the people of Utah for a popular vote, and even if he did not, the press conjectured that opponents might—if the House did not asphyxiate it first. But underlying approval for the general prohibitory approach was audible in the thunderous Aye accorded another Yes-voting senator’s proposal to raise the minimum age for sale/purchase from 21 to 91 on the grounds of the infeasibility of enforcement of a no-smoking law against a boy whose parents were free to smoke.\(^{1384}\) Southwick pointed out that raising the age to 91 would render the rest of his bill dealing with sales to adults unnecessary. At least one senator opposed the bill on the grounds that, while tobacco use was harmful, so was chewing gum, but that sumptuary legislation was useless “until the people demand it,” and he saw no such public demand. Senator (and future

---

\(^{1382}\) Senate Journal: Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1919, at 516 (Mar. 7); “Committee Ignored; Cigaret Bill Passed,” SLT, Mar. 8, 1919 (13:3).

\(^{1383}\) Senate Passes Anti-Cigarette Bill,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 7, 1919 (sect 2, 1:7). Even the Telegram conceded that, despite the tendency to treat the bill as “adding to the gaiety of nations...the final vote indicates that the senators eventually gave it thoughtful consideration.” “Anti-Cigaret Bill Passes Senate; Goes to House,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 8, 1919 (8:3).

\(^{1384}\) Utah May Have Cigarette Ban by State Laws,” OE, Mar. 7, 1919 (2:2-4).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Governor) George Dern confessed that he no longer believed that “all cigarette smokers were no good” because most of the U.S. soldiers who had gone to France smoked cigarettes, and they were “pretty good fellows,” although he personally found cigarette smoking offensive and “did not want to see his boys get the cigarette habit.” Moreover, if Utahns wanted such a law, they now had the initiative law to enable them to secure it.1385

A month before S.B. No. 105 reached the House that chamber had received identical worded petitions from the student presidents and substantial numbers of students of two high schools urging elimination of “Utah’s greatest present menace—the cigarette.”1386 Although even the News noted that few legislators had initially expected what they deemed a “‘freak’” measure to become law, after Senate passage, “the odds against the enactment of this particular bit of moral legislation were reduced until” a few days before House consideration “its passage was assured.”1387 Nevertheless, on the last day of the session, weaker House backing for the bill became unoverlookable on a kind of test vote to table the measure in lieu of a third reading: the narrow 20-22 defeat nevertheless indicated that the constitutionally required 24-vote majority might not be available after all.1388

Before the chamber proceeded to the final vote, opponents sought to amend the bill to death by making it “so blamed ridiculous everybody will vote against it.” 1389 The most significant such amendment stemmed from Democrat Robert Hinckley—son of a well-known and influential Brigham Young University geology professor1390—who, in response to doubts expressed about his 1385“Cigarette Measure Progressing in Senate,” DEN, Mar. 7, 1919 (8:4). Using a common tactic of ridicule that opponents of anti-tobacco legislation had been enamored of since the 1890s, one senator tried to introduce a “companion bill prohibiting the use of hat-pins, rouge, powder, peek-a-boo waists and open-work stockings by women, but the senate would not let him present it.”

1387House Journal: Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1919, at 739-40 (Mar. 13). The last legislative “day” extended beyond March 13 as the clock was stopped to simulate compliance with legal limit on the length of the session.

“sincerity,” denied that his proposal to extend the bill’s ban to all tobacco was a “joker.” Hinckley appears to have been motivated by his view that Southwick’s bill did not give the returning “soldier boys a fair deal.” Instead of responding to a question as to how his amendment would help those veterans, Hinckley launched into a fascinating riff suggesting that implementation of such a ban would incite proletarian class war: he declared that his amendment was “totally discriminatory and in view of the labor unrest, adverse economic conditions and other misfortunes which the laboring man encounters under the present social conditions, to pass such drastic legislation was ‘like shaking a red flag in a bull’s face.’” Other opponents also stressed S.B. No. 105’s discriminatory aspect, while proponents focused on the “evils of the cigarette habit” without justifying the curtailment of adults’ freedom for the sake of adolescents. As had been the case in many other state legislatures going back to the 1890s, the sales ban was also attacked on the grounds that it would merely result in turning over the business to out-of-state mail-order houses. “The House rejected the killer amendment to extend the ban on possession of cigarettes to ‘tobacco in any form.’”

The vehemently anti-prohibitionist Salt Lake Tribune, the state’s largest-circulation daily, conveniently cataloged the anti-tobacco arguments as “perhaps, the most sweeping, unsupported and unproved statements that have yet been made by proponents of any measure in the present session.” They included the claims that “the people of Utah...resented the fact that the smoking habit was encouraged during the war” and that 75 percent of them “were against the use of tobacco.” After another representative had brought to light the “astounding and new bit of information...that every great criminal was a cigaret smoker, and that the beginning of these criminal careers could be directly laid at the door of the terrible ‘pill,’” the paper poured even more editorial sarcasm into the news columns: “Prominent Utah business and professional leaders who indulge occasionally in cigarets will be shocked to learn that the minds of grown men who use the deadly things are benumbed thereby.”

By this juncture, since “nobody seemed to know what they were voting for,” one representative requested and received permission from the speaker of the House to ask the assistant attorney general, who happened to be present, to lay out the measure’s “exact provisions.” As odd as this procedure was the official’s woefully inaccurate “decision” that “the bill as printed provided for the prohibition of the sale of tobacco in any form to minors, and made it a misdemeanor to sell cigarettes to both minors and adults” (thus omitting mention of the bans on public smoking and advertising).

---

The 25 to 18 vote on third reading—which one newspaper described as “Utah Legislators Go on Record Favoring Freak Cigarette Legislation”—would, as the Tribune reported, have placed the legislature’s imprimatur on “regulat[ing] the smoking habits of Utah adults, an advanced step in the line of radical legislation that heretofore has not been put into effect.” Passage would also have sent “one of the most drastic bills passed at this session” on to Utah’s first non-Mormon Governor, Democrat Simon Bamberger, a non-smoking and non-drinking German-born businessman as well as a progressive who strongly supported liquor prohibition, but adoption of a minor amendment required a concurring vote in the Senate.

On the bill’s return to the Senate Southwick’s motion to concur in the House amendment carried, but Senator Allen Sanford urged jettisoning the bill altogether on the grounds that it was unwise to try to “force this sort of sumptuary legislation upon the people who were not in a mood for it” lest the resulting “antagonism” carry over to compliance with the liquor law as well. Then a conflict arose as to the law’s effective date on the grounds that dealers had a stock

---

1397 “‘Fag’ Measure Passes After Warm Confab,” Salt Lake Herald, Mar. 15, 1919 (14:1).
1398 “Cigarettes to be Barred from Utah in Future,” OE, Mar. 15, 1919 (7:1).
1399 The Utah State Legislature: Centennial History, 1896-1996, at 325 (J. Hammond et al. comp. 1996). Whether he would have signed the bill was deemed “problematical” at the time: on the morning of the last day of the session he declined to reveal his position before the legislature acted, though its opponents claimed that he would return it for additional consideration. “Cigarette Bill Is Put to Death in Last Day Rush,” DEN, Mar. 15, 1919 (sect. 2, 1:6-7 at 7).
1400 “Cigarettes to be Barred from Utah in Future,” OE, Mar. 15, 1919 (7:1), incorrectly reported that the bill “now goes to the governor.” The amendment corrected what appears to have been an error and restored language from Southwick’s 1917 bill by declaring that anyone violating any of the provisions of the section was guilty of “a misdemeanor” (rather than of “violating any of the provisions of this section”).
of hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of tobacco in the absence of a provision for them to dispose of it. Southwick strenuously opposed the proposed date of March 1, 1921 (that is, in the midst of the next session) as meaning the bill’s defeat; its proponent, Mormon anti-prohibitionist Uriah Jones, in effect conceded this decoding when he observed that the date “would give opportunity to get expression from the people on the subject and the next legislature would be guided by such opinion in either killing the act or letting it go into force.”

When, instead, a January 1, 1920 effective date prevailed, S.B. No.105 failed to pass on a 9 to 9 vote. Sentiment in favor of enactment, however, prompted reconsideration of that tie vote, rejection of the alternative later effective date, retention of the earlier date, and final passage by a still comfortable vote of 11 to 7.

Adoption of this amendment required House concurrence, the motion in favor of which carried, but opponents sought to block the vote on final passage with a tabling motion, which lost by a vote of 14 to 22. On passage of the amended bill, which would have prohibited possession of cigarettes by anyone in Utah, proponents were able to mobilize 23 Ayes against 14 Nays, but they fell one vote short of a constitutional majority on the final day of the session, thus killing S.B. No. 105 and ending a legislative process that had been “as exciting as a horse race.”

The fact that the measure was extinguished on the basis of such a minor issue, especially when 10 members were absent, half of whom had voted on 1402“Anticigaret Bill Fails of Passage,” SLT, Mar. 16, 1919 (11:1). On Jones, see above this ch.

---

1404House Journal: Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1919, at 745-46 (Mar. 13); “Kill Anti-Cigaret Measure in Utah,” Sunday World-Herald (Omaha), Mar. 16, 1921 (1:7); “Vote That Killed Anti-Cigarette Bill in the Lower House,” DEN, Mar. 17, 1919 (2:2). The 10-member Salt Lake County delegation split evenly on all votes on the bill that day. Democrats for the first and last time until the New Deal overwhelmingly dominated both chambers in 1917 and 1919; no Republicans were elected to the House in 1917 and only nine in 1919; of the five who voted on final passage of S.B. No. 105 four cast Ayes. Party affiliation was determined on the basis of the vote for House speaker. House Journal: Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1919, at 3 (Jan. 13). “Thirteenth Session State Legislature Begins Its Labor,” DEN, Jan. 13, 1919 (1:1-2, 2:7), provided a list of members by party, which differed slightly from that used in the text.

1405“Smoke Pill Saved to Users,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 15, 1919 (1:2).

1406Some legislators opined that if the bill had included an effective date when it was introduced it would have passed. “Cigarette Bill Is Put to Death in Last Day Rush,” DEN,
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

the bill earlier that day, suggests that a more substantial and substantive opposition to passage of the radical prohibition underlay the failure to muster that one additional vote.\footnote{The Salt Lake Mormon daily noted that the “absence of advocates of the cigarette bill” was responsible for the bill’s defeat, adding in the session’s closing hours that “unless these members are present...and vote for a suspension of the rules to reconsider the measure, the Southwick anti-cigarette bill is an item of history.” “Cigarette Bill Is Put to Death in Last Day Rush,” \textit{DEN}, Mar. 15, 1919 (sect. 2, 1:6-7 at 7). According to “Cigarette Bill Is Killed by Amendment,” \textit{SLH}, Mar. 15, 1919 (9:4).} (Some House opponents had, after all, expressed the hope that some senators would reconsider the vote on the bill’s passage and “table it for the present session.”)\footnote{Although a segment of the out-of-state press erroneously reported that “Utah is the first state to follow up [liquor prohibition] with an anti-cigarette law,” it added that: “It is the enactment of such laws that the wets are depending on for a revulsion of sentiment.” This editorializing was especially ironic because the newspaper did not even mention (if it knew about) the advertising and partial public smoking bans.\footnote{“Anticigaret Bill Is Passed by House,” \textit{SLT}, Mar. 15, 1919 (9:4).} The near-passage was also, at least propagandistically, qualified by merchants’ threat, if the bill had become law, to challenge its constitutionality on the (novel if not bizarre) “grounds that since the United States government sells cigarettes to soldiers and includes the article in its allowances of overseas units, any act prohibiting its sale to soldiers at least is unconstitutional.”\footnote{“Notes and Comments,” \textit{Oakland Tribune}, Mar. 16, 1919 (28:3). For another mistaken report about passage, see “Utah Cigaret Law Bars Even Makings in State,” \textit{CT}, Mar. 15, 1919 (3).}}

Although a segment of the out-of-state press erroneously reported that “Utah is the first state to follow up [liquor prohibition] with an anti-cigarette law,” it added that: “It is the enactment of such laws that the wets are depending on for a revulsion of sentiment.” This editorializing was especially ironic because the newspaper did not even mention (if it knew about) the advertising and partial public smoking bans.\footnote{“Cigarette Bill Is Put to Death in Last Day Rush,” \textit{DEN}, Mar. 15, 1919 (sect. 2, 1:6-7 at 7).} The near-passage was also, at least propagandistically, qualified by merchants’ threat, if the bill had become law, to challenge its constitutionality on the (novel if not bizarre) “grounds that since the United States government sells cigarettes to soldiers and includes the article in its allowances of overseas units, any act prohibiting its sale to soldiers at least is unconstitutional.”\footnote{“Cigarette Bill Is Put to Death in Last Day Rush,” \textit{DEN}, Mar. 15, 1919 (sect. 2, 1:6-7 at 7). The article did not make it clear whether merchants had made this threat before or after the bill’s defeat.}

\begin{flushleft}
\textit{Enactment Based on Mormon Church Mobilization (1919-1921)} \end{flushleft}

[T]he rights of men and women who do not smoke are being offensively interfered with by tobacco smokers who either thoughtlessly or selfishly smoke in public places and thus pollute the pure air to which everyone is entitled.\footnote{Resolutions Authorized by the Convention of Y.M.M.I.A. Stake and Ward}
Although the Mormon church did not openly intervene in the anti-cigarette legislative process until after the failed attempt to pass a general sales ban during the 1919 session, in 1918 it had published a book on tobacco by Frederick Pack, a geology professor at the University of Utah, who devoted a whole chapter to the subject of the poisonous effects of “second-handed” tobacco smoke under the playful but far-seeing title, “The Smoker and the Smoked.” Based on several studies Pack concluded that it was “already a scientifically demonstrated fact that individuals associated with smokers are adversely affected by their habits.”

Although “the injury is not so great as that produced by direct smoking,” nevertheless “[t]obacco smoke should be looked upon as a marked poison, whether used first—or second-handed.” Pack’s interest was especially focused on children, a “considerable percentage” of whom in the United States were “reared in an atmosphere vitiated and poisoned by such fumes” generated by their fathers. Unfortunately, however, “the opinion is almost universally held by smokers that if any injury is being done they alone are the sufferers.” Yet despite the inarguably serious injury that a “delicate infant” would sustain “in an atmosphere laden with tobacco smoke,...parents on every hand may be seen thus abusing their children.” Moreover, there was no doubt that “many of the ailments appearing in later life are the result of being subjected to tobacco smoke in childhood.”

In leaping from is and ought to ‘shall soon be’ Pack was, perhaps,
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

overstimulated by Kansas state legislator Oliver Jewett’s aforementioned (expeditiously killed) bill that was interpreted to prohibit smoking even in a home with children1415 to make the hopelessly overoptimistic assertion that a prophet’s foresight was not needed to “declare that the time was not far distant when civil law will make it impossible for fathers to smoke in the presence of their children.”1416 Nevertheless, Pack’s insight into the requisite scientific underpinnings of the articulation of public policy was deep enough to prompt him to formulate a research desideratum that almost a century later is still in its infancy—namely, whether, apart from social-psychological parental learning/imitative processes, addiction can be acquired biochemically and/or physiologically as a result of growing up in a smoking household: “It would be interesting...to investigate the effect of early exposure in producing a craving for tobacco a few years later. Do boys reared in smoke-saturated homes acquire the tobacco habit more readily than other boys? In other words does second-hand smoking lead to first-hand smoking? If we are not mistaken the future will answer these questions in a most positive affirmation.”1417

Though not a Mormon organization, the branch of the No-Tobacco League that began to be organized in Utah in April 1919, a month after the defeat of Southwick’s bill, enabled Mormons to secure prominent positions in this independent movement from the outset. Mormon church President Heber Grant also subsidized the group by advertising in its periodical his insurance business,1418 which also housed the insurance business of the Utah No-Tobacco League’s Mormon first president,1419 and the organization held its first annual meeting in the Mormon Granite Stake Tabernacle.1420 As city organizer for the state the Indiana-based group, whose objectives encompassed the dissemination of information on and passage of legislation to prohibit tobacco use, appointed Fred L. W. Bennett\textsuperscript{121} (1888-1944),\textsuperscript{122} who had converted to Mormonism and emigrated from England to Utah in 1916.\textsuperscript{123} A notice that Bennett requested the Mormon \textit{Improvement Era} to publish the month after his appointment as “organizing or field secretary for Utah” stressed that the “movement is non-sectarian and several non-‘Mormons’ as well as ‘Mormons’ have already joined the league in Salt Lake City...”\textsuperscript{124} (To be sure, a year later the League admitted that it had “received more support from the officers and members of the dominant church than from others, for the obvious reason that this church alone regards abstinence from the use of tobacco as a Divine commandment.”)\textsuperscript{125}

1415See above this ch.
1416Frederick Pack, Tobacco and Human Efficiency 37-38 (1918).

By the end of August 1919, 17 people formed a temporary organization of the No-Tobacco League of Utah,\textsuperscript{126} which a few days later was formally established\textsuperscript{127} and by its first anniversary boasted of having 800 members who had paid the 50-cent membership fee.\textsuperscript{128} The League’s reason for existing was seemingly straightforward, highly political, and grounded in typical progressive-era anti-corporatism:

---

\textsuperscript{121}“No-Tobacco League Organizes in S. L.,” \textit{SLH}, Apr. 14, 1919 (12:2). For the tobacco industry’s account of the No-Tobacco League, which was organized in Indiana in 1915 and by 1921 had branches in California, Kansas, and Utah, see Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “Summary of Anti-Tobacco Educational Activities” at 12 (June 1, 1921), Bates No. 502359512/24.

\textsuperscript{124}“Passing Events,” \textit{IE} 22(7):645 (May 1919).

\textsuperscript{125}“Non-Sectarian,” \textit{No-Tobacco News} 1(2):5 (Oct. 1920). \textit{Improvement Era} advertised in the League’s periodical, soliciting subscriptions for “a magazine that is clean and wholesome” and that had “consistently opposed the tobacco habit since its first issue.” \textit{Id.} at 2; \textit{No-Tobacco News} 1(1):3 (Apr. 1920).

\textsuperscript{126}“No-Tobacco League Is Organized by 17,” \textit{SLH}, Aug. 29, 1919 (16:6). Despite the general reference to the Utah entity as a branch of the national organization, it insisted that it was “not a branch or part of any other organization. It was founded by Utah people to whom it is alone responsible. A separate organization was considered desirable for Utah owing to the great distance from the headquarters of the national organization.” “In Brief,” \textit{No-Tobacco News} 1(2):9 (Oct. 1920).

The tobacco trusts are today threatening to enslave the manhood and womanhood of our entire nation. In view of this fact it becomes absolutely imperative on the part of the non-smokers of our country to league against this pernicious propaganda.

More than two years have now passed since that most dastardly surprise attack was swiftly and secretly launched against an unsuspecting public. Simultaneously in more than five hundred of our leading newspapers and magazines of our fair land came the plea for “well filled” pipes and “abundant cigarettes” for our boys “over there.” These tobacco advertisements, for such they really were, caught the sympathy of thousands of well meaning men and women who, by their response, flooded our armies with untold quantities of the self-destroying evil.

We are finally awakening to the duplicity of the measures that were then employed, but in the meantime the tobacco trusts are flattering themselves that smoking has been popularized to the extent that their sales have nearly doubled.

It is to stem the tide of this evil and the salvation of our boys and girls and the race that the No-Tobacco League of Utah was organized.1429

The suspicion raised by this indictment that the Nicotine Trust had given the No-Tobacco League of Utah no reason to be called into being before U.S. entry into the world war in 1917 was borne out by the group’s peculiar reified conception of its real yet agencyless adversary:

We have no hatred against the tobacco manufacturer, or dealer or the smoker. In most cases the former entered the business in good faith, we have no doubt, little thinking that it would be regarded before long as a public menace whilst the smokers as a rule acquired the habit from others and would give anything if they could overcome it.

All our hate is for tobacco, and we are going to wage war on it. ...

The aim of the No-Tobacco movement in Utah is...to arouse and crystallize the strong anti-tobacco sentiment which as always existed here.1430

Exactly how the No-Tobacco League of Utah intended to exterminate a commodity without attacking its capitalist monopolizer it did not make clear, but its publicly articulated aspirations were lofty: “We are prompted by a single desire: the uplift of humanity, and the destruction of tobacco will, we are convinced, do much in this direction.” And to this end during its first year it was industrious both internally and externally, holding 30 business and 125 public meetings.1431

The first public inking that the Mormon hierarchy had finally resolved to place its considerable influence behind anti-tobacco legislation emerged in October 1919, seven months after the defeat of that year’s anti-cigarette bill, when, pursuant to a resolution passed on June 2, by a Convention of Social Welfare Workers held in Salt Lake City, the church Social Advisory Committee (which represented all of the church’s auxiliary organizations) issued a brief bulletin on “The Cigarette Evil.” Prompted by the “alarming rate” of increase of cigarette consumption both nationally and among Mormon youth, the Committee decided to call the attention of the “Saints” to “this growing menace...in order to arouse and crystallize a public sentiment that shall effectually stem this tide of evil.” Against the background of the non-enforcement of no-sales-to- and no-use-by-minors laws even in Mormon-populated states, the church identified three causes of the increase in the use of cigarettes: (1) their having been lavished on soldiers during the war; (2) an increased demand for narcotics prompted by the advent of alcohol prohibition; and (3) “and probably the main cause...the extensive advertising campaigns that the tobacco interests have carried on in recent years,” taking advantage of the war- and patriotism-inspired minimization of tobacco’s harmful effects. The ubiquitization of advertising went hand in hand with that of smoking itself: “In the street-car ads, on the billboards, in the pages of the magazine and the newspaper, and on the motion picture film—wherever, in short, your eyes may rest—you will see alluring invitations, sometimes open, sometimes covert, to indulge in smoking. And always these advertisements are associated with what attracts the youth—beauty, ease, leisure, wealth. Lately special efforts are being made in advertisements to induce women to take up the habit of smoking cigarettes.”

---

1432 The Social Advisory Committee was founded in 1916 by church leaders as an attempt to “coordinate efforts to promote both social reform and moral retrenchment....” The initial targets were young women’s attire, censorship of movies, and prohibition of dancing based on jazz and popular music. The auxiliary organizations included Sunday School, Young Men’s Mutual Improvement Association, Young Ladies’ Mutual Improvement Association, Relief Society, and Religion Classes. The Committee had promoted attendance at a national social work conference in Atlantic City during the first week in June 1919; when three members returned, the Committee held a meeting emphasizing a Saturday half-holiday and an anti-cigarette campaign to discourage tobacco use, but also juvenile delinquency, sexual immorality, venereal disease, dancing, and censoring commercial amusements. Later in 1919, Arthur Beeley, a professor of criminal sociology at the University of Utah and later founder of its school of social work, was hired as the Committee’s executive secretary. Thomas Alexander, “Between Revivalism and the Social Gospel: The Latter-day Saints Social Advisory Committee, 1916-1922,” BYU Studies 23(1):19-39 at 24-26, 29, 30 (1983).

1433 The Cigarette Evil,” YWJ 30(10):548-50 at 548 (Oct. 1919). Under the same title the bulletin also appeared in IE 22(12):1033-37 (Oct. 1919). During the war the Mormon the crucial role of advertising in priming children to become lifelong addicted customers went so far that by the 1921 legislative session the anti-cigarette bill’s Mormon introducer appeared to advocate a sales ban for the purpose of making an advertising ban possible: “we cannot prevent advertising of any article of which we permit the sale.”)

The Social Advisory Committee declared that the church had to aid anti-tobacco organizations “to drive the cigarette from our communities. It is a struggle for the boy and the girl. The men and women of the future will not be so likely to use tobacco if the boys and the girls of the present do not form the habit. But the shrewd nicotine trust levels its guns at the growing generation, knowing that a youth who learns to smoke means from a thousand to fifteen hundred dollars more in its pockets than one who picks up the habit later in life.”

Paying close attention to the capitalist profit/addicted young consumer link, Mormons understood that: “If they [i.e., young people] can keep from forming the tobacco habit till they are past the habit-forming period in life, they will be saved from the money-grubbing tobacco interests,” which “would coin the nation’s manhood and womanhood into filthy lucre.”

To be sure, a sustained systematic attack on wealth would, in light of the church leaders’ own generally sympathetic attitude toward business interests, have been unlikely.

In addition to urging local social advisory committees to forge organizational links with community “uplift forces” and against the background of the overarching goal of securing enactment of “a State law banishing the cigarette forever,” the Committee formulated as its first objective the enforcement of the existing no-sales-to-minors law, without which enactment of other anti-tobacco laws would not be possible. Bolder and more radical was the second objective: “we should seek to destroy the power of tobacco agencies working through church had opposed sending tobacco to soldiers in Europe. “Tobacco Habit Condemned by Church Speaker,” OE, Mar. 8, 1920 (2:3).

Anti-Cigarette Bill Debated,” OS-E, Feb. 3, 1921 (4:4). Edward Southwick made this statement during Senate floor debate in opposing an amendment that would have licensed the sale of cigarette. See also below this ch.

The Cigarette Evil,” YWJ 30(10):548-50 at 549, 550 (Oct. 1919). Since the Mormons presumably knew that adults too could become addicted, they must have meant that relatively few people began smoking cigarettes later in life—a fact a century later, but not the case among women at that time. David Burns et al., “Cigarette Smoking Behavior in the United States,” in National Cancer Institute, Changes in Cigarette-Related Disease and Their Implication for Prevention and Control 13-112 at 22 (1997).

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

advertisements to entangle the youth. Public sentiment should be roused against tobacco; local authorities should be induced, as in Murray, Utah, to put a ban on the use and sale of cigarettes, and if possible to pass ordinances forbidding billboard advertising of tobacco in any form.” Persuading store owners not to sell tobacco, “or at the least, cigarettes,” was another vital tactic, which, the Committee imagined, “ought not to be difficult” to implement, at any rate with Mormon shopkeepers; regardless of their religion, civil complaints should be filed against persistent violators because: “No one who breaks this law deserves any sympathy.” Coordinated with persuasion and law were community-wide pledges to boycott stores that sold tobacco and newspapers and magazines that advertised tobacco. 1437 The capstone of the Mormons’ totalizing attack was, ironically, both continuous with its (aforementioned) censorious moralistic approach to movies and anticipatory of an avantgarde strategy developed by the science-based tobacco control movement at the turn of the next century1438; “[W]ork with those who operate motion pictures so as to secure the elimination of all plays that show the characters using tobacco in any form. The film is one of the most impressive means of instilling into the minds of the young any ideals.... Inasmuch...as so many of the pictures on the film nowadays show the characters in the act of smoking, this becomes one of the most insidious ways of advertising tobacco....”

An editorial in early 1920 in the church’s periodical, which was edited by the Mormon church’s new President Heber J. Grant (1856-1945), underscored its new, aspirationally prohibitory position: “It would be a good thing if tobacco 1437“The Cigarette Evil,” YWJ 30(10):548-50 at 549 (Oct. 1919). Located near Salt Lake City, Murray was a smelter town of about 4,600 in 1920. A license law (under which four dealers were licensed) was in effect in Murray, but the city attorney and marshal stated that boys were still getting cigarettes, and that prohibition would be better. “Cigarette Bill on Calendar for Passage,” DN, Feb. 17, 1921 (sect. 2, 8:6-7); “Amendments to Anticigaret Measure Rejected in Lower House,” SLT, Feb. 17, 1921 (10:1). With regard to “Mormon shopkeepers”: during House debate on the 1921 Southwick bill, Rep. O. F. McShane, one of its leading opponents, admitted the truth of the accusation that he sold tobacco in his store, but added that he bought it all from the (Mormon church-owned) Zion’s Cooperative Mercantile Institution. “House Battles over Committee’s Amendments to Anticigaret Bill,” SLT, Feb. 15, 1921 (10:1 at 2).

1438Stanton Glantz’s “smoke free movies” proposal includes the U.S. movie industry’s voluntarily giving an R rating to any film showing or implying tobacco, subject to two exceptions: presentations of tobacco that clearly and unambiguously reflect tobacco use’s dangers and consequences or that are necessary to representing a real historical figure’s smoking. http://smokefreemovies.ucsf.edu/solution/index.html

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

were cleared out of every grocery and other place of sale, in all the land, particularly where Latter-day Saints control. Why? Because it is not good to make profit out of that which is seriously detrimental to the human race, physically, morally and mentally.\footnote{1440}

In this respect Grant differed from his predecessor Joseph F. Smith (whom he had succeeded in November 1918), who had cooperated with Senator Reed Smoot, head of the Utah Republican Party and a member of the church governing body, the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, in staving off enactment of statewide liquor prohibition (in contradistinction to a local option regime) lest it reignite the kind of anti-Mormon political formation previously embodied in the American Party, which threatened cooperation with the Republican Party’s non-Mormon business faction. During the decade preceding his presidency, Grant—who had also been one of the Twelve Apostles (since 1882)—had been both liquor prohibition’s leading advocate among the latter and the foremost Mormon Democrat, who inserted the issue into every election in contrast to Smith, who, at least in public, argued that compliance with Mormon doctrine regarding liquor should be left to individual church members.\footnote{1441}

Not having been sheltered from secondhand tobacco smoke exposure, Grant knew firsthand of its detriments, particularly because as a boy he had worked in a non-Mormon office where everyone had smoked: “I had to stand by a desk with my boss smoking all day long. It made me sick and I would go out in the backyard and ‘cast up Jonah’ regularly until I got used to it.”\footnote{1442}

That some Mormons were, however, continuing to use tobacco underlay the talk that one of the Utah No-Tobacco League’s traveling speakers gave in a \footnote{1440}Editors Table: Practical Religion,” \textit{IE} 23(5):451-53 at 451 (Mar. 1920).

\footnote{1441}Jan Shipps, “Utah Comes of Age Politically: A Study of the State’s Politics in the Early Years of the Twentieth Century,” \textit{UHQ} 35(2):91-111 at 103-107, 111 (Spr. 1967). Despite his Democratic activism before becoming head of the Mormon church, Grant was only nominally a Democrat, his program being limited to effectuating liquor prohibition; once this goal had been achieved, he resolved his differences with Smoot, and the two parties operated without his advice let alone consent. \textit{Id}. at 111. In 1932 he supported Hoover and in 1936 Landon against Roosevelt; he vociferously opposed the New Deal for “breeding idlers.” “Mormon Church Head Feted,” \textit{LAT}, Nov. 23, 1932 (A5); “Utah Republicans See Landon Gains,” \textit{NYT}, Aug. 7, 1936 (9); Arthur Henning, “Prosperity in Utah Traced to New Deal Cash,” \textit{CT}, Sept. 26, 1936 (6) (quote).

\footnote{1442}President Heber Grant, “On the Use of Tobacco,” \textit{YWJ} 33(9):471-76 at 472 (Sept. 1922) (address at Mutual Improvement Association Conference, June 10, 1922). Even after his elevation in the Mormon hierarchy, he went on to relate, his wife once had to leave a banquet because the man seated next to her “smoked continually in her face.” \textit{Id}. at 473.
Mormon ward in Ogden in March 1920 under the auspices of the Mutual Improvement Associations marking the opening of an educational campaign against tobacco use in any form. Observing that “it ought not to be necessary to address the subject before a congregation of Latter-day Saints because in the early days of the church a revelation was received from heaven declaring that tobacco was not for the use of man,” W. D. Livingston nevertheless informed his Mormon audience that the League “intends to work up a sentiment of ‘herd spirit’ that will cause our young men who are addicted to the habit of smoking [to] understand they cannot pay attention to our daughters. We intend to make these young men so ashamed of themselves that they will either quit the habit or leave the community.”1443

The church’s comprehensive approach to the legislative campaign was encapsulated in the slogan adopted by its Mutual Improvement Associations’ conference in June 19201444: “‘We stand for the non-use and non-sale of tobacco.’”1444 At that same conference, a member of the Council of the Twelve (Apostles), Melvin Ballard, in seeking to contextualize this “slogan” theologically, reveled in revealing just how literally dogmatic it was. It derived from the Word of Wisdom, Joseph Smith’s (alleged) revelation in Kirtland, Ohio, on Feb. 27, 1833: “‘Tobacco is not for the body, neither for the belly, and is not good for man, but is an herb for bruises and all sick cattle, to be used with judgment and skill.’”1445 Ballard emphasized that there is in this revelation no particular argument of a scientific character to show why these things that are forbidden are not good for man. Quite like the teachings of the prophets in all ages is this revelation through the Prophet Joseph Smith. Not by way of argument nor 1443“Tobacco Habit Condemned by Church Speaker,” OE, Mar. 8, 1920 (2:3). W.D. Livingston was presumably the William Livingston who had been on the three-member committee that drafted the League’s constitution and by-laws. “No-Tobacco League Is Organized by 17,” SLH, Aug. 29, 1919 (16:6).

1444Katie Blakesley, “‘Sin Is Creeping in Among Us: [sic] The Fight to Save the Youth and the 1921 Anti-Cigarette Campaign” at 1 (M.A. thesis, History Dept., University of Utah, 2004), unaware of the preceding years of Mormon anti-cigarette action, regarded the slogan announced on June 13, 1920 as an innovation, if not a deus ex machina: “No sooner had the war to make the world safe for democracy ended, than young men and women of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints...in Utah opened a new front against a deadly enemy.”

scientific reasoning giving forth evidences of the correctness of the doctrine have the prophets taught, but by positive, clear-cut statements, principles of truth afterwards demonstrated to be true. The prophet himself never engaged in any fine theories as to why tobacco was not good for man. The Lord Jesus taught this same way: “Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God.” That was sufficient. This ought to be sufficient for Latter-day Saints. It is on this basis that we shall conduct our campaign. I am glad, however, that those who have given the subject attention have brought forth abundant evidence to prove that the revelation is true and the doctrine correct, and that there is no good in those things which the Lord has commanded we should not use, and the command came when men did not know that tobacco was injurious.¹⁴⁴⁷

Shortly after the June 1920 conference the Social Advisory Committee published in its newsletter the recommendations of a small “Committee on Tobacco” that had been amended and adopted by a larger SAC group and then submitted to SAC for its consideration, after which they were to be submitted to the General Boards of the church auxiliary organizations (including the Mutual Improvement Associations).¹⁴⁴⁸ These recommendations are of especial interest because they were much more comprehensive and radical than any proposals that the Mormon church ever publicly pursued or that the Utah legislature ever considered.

Significantly, although the Committee on Tobacco formulated its charge as considering and making recommendations “on the problem of controlling the tobacco habit among the Latter Day Saints,” it in fact set forth proposals with “the purpose of stamping out the use and sale of tobacco” for entire populations and ¹⁴⁴⁸Social Advisory Committee, “News Letter,” No. 3 (July 12, 1920), at 1 (copy furnished by LDS Church History Library, Salt Lake City). The “News Letter” did not identify the members of the committee, but they may have been the members of the “sub-committee acting for the Social Advisory Committee” that “prepared and approved” the material in a pamphlet (used in 1921 to support the campaign for passage of Southwick’s anti-cigarette” bill) “[i]n order to guard against extravagant statements about tobacco and to secure the most authentic data.” The pamphlet presented “a digest of the most approved facts, figures and arguments for use during the campaign.” The members were largely stellar Mormon figures in higher education and medicine: Dean Thomas A. Beal, University of Utah Commerce School; Psychology and Education Assistant Prof. Arthur L. Beeley, University of Utah; Dean Milton Bennion, University of Utah Education School; Dr. George W. Middleton, former president of the Utah State Medical Association; Geology Prof. Frederick Pack, University of Utah; and Stephen L. Richards, member of the Council of Twelve (Apostles). The Case Against Tobacco 1 (Social Advisory Committee of LDS Church, Pamphlet No. 8, Jan. 1921). not merely among Mormons. The committee divided these proposed measures into the “coercive” and the “persuasive” [sic]. Beginning with the former, the committee first dealt with the traditional no-sales-to or use-by minors laws before proceeding to more controversial intervention:

[W]e as social workers favor using every legitimate means to promote the passage in our respective states of the following: (a) a law prohibiting the sale, distribution, and use of manufactured cigarettes or of cigarette papers; (b) a law providing for the adequate licensing of all stores and other agencies that handle tobacco in any form; (c) a law prohibiting the advertising of tobacco by means of any periodical, newspaper or circular published in the state or on any billboards or display window, or by any means whatever, that is subject to the control of the state, [sic] and (d) a law prohibiting the smoking of tobacco in any cafe, store, or other enclosed public place, except those especially designated for the purpose.\footnote{Social Advisory Committee, “News Letter,” No. 3 (July 12, 1920), at 1-2.}

Every one of these proposals was more radical than the bill that Mormon Senator Southwick would introduce six months later: (a) prohibited the use and not merely the sale of cigarettes; (b) provided for licensing of the sale of non-cigarette tobacco; (c) prohibited advertising non-cigarette tobacco; and (d) prohibited tobacco smoking in any store or other enclosed public place (whereas Southwick did not cover stores or numerous other enclosed public places), although the exception, since it did not identify who would designate public places for smoking, left open the possibility that it would swallow the rule. (To be sure, the ban on the use of cigarettes in (a) meant that the exception could apply only to non-cigarette tobacco.\footnote{The phrase “our respective states” indicated both that some of the Mormon social workers came from states other than Utah and that the Mormon church aspired to influence public policy in such states. Numbers alone suggest that the only other state in which organized Mormons might have been able to secure passage of anti-cigarette legislation was Idaho. Whether in fact the anti-cigarette sales law that the Idaho legislature passed in 1921 was inspired by the SAC proposals is unknown, but it is any event noteworthy that, in keeping with Mormons’ much lower profile there, the bill and law did not encompass the further-reaching bans on advertising and public smoking. Also unknown is whether SAC influenced the introduction in Arizona in 1921 of a radical local option bill that would have empowered voters in counties and cities to determine whether to prohibit the sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes. On the bill, which died on a 9 to 9 vote in the Senate, see above ch. 15. The introducer was Mormon Joseph G. Lines, superintendent of his stake Sunday schools and a member of its high council. List of Stake Officers and Bishops of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints n.p. (1907); James McClintock, Arizona: The Youngest State 771-72 (1913), on http://files.wsgarchives.org/az/pima/}
The Committee on Tobacco’s proposed “coercive measures” also included a plan for every (local) stake and ward Social Committee to choose counterpart tobacco committees to help enforce existing laws dealing with minors and—on the apparent assumption that tobacco addicts could not be trusted to enforce anti-tobacco laws strictly—to “work for the election and appointment of [sic; should be “to”] all county and local office, of men who[,] other qualifications being equal, are themselves exemplary in regard to the use of tobacco.”

With regard to the “Pursuasive [sic] Measures” the Tobacco Committee proposed an impressive networked panoply of means of enlightenment about and denormalization of tobacco use: (1) wide dissemination of “knowledge of the detrimental effects of tobacco on old and young and of the destructive designs of the American Tobacco Trust against the nation in general and our people [i.e., Mormons] in particular”; (2) encouragement by social workers of all Mormons to use their influence to elect and support “officers who are sympathetic with our views and desires in regard to tobacco laws and their enforcement”; (3) encouragement of all Mormons “to work constantly for the creation of such public sentiment as shall ultimately insure nation wide [sic] prohibition of the culture, manufacture, and sale of tobacco in any form”; (4) “minimiz[ing] so far as possible...suggestions tending to encourage the tobacco habit” by insuring that Mormons “endeavor to exclude from their homes the cheaper grade of magazines and newspapers, which feature tobacco advertising” and, where the presence of such publications was unavoidable, protest to and urge the publishers to discontinue such ads; and (5) carrying on by the Mormon church “if possible [of] an aggressive campaign of counter-advertising, showing the evil effects of the use of tobacco”; and “condemn[ation] without reservation” by the committee itself of “plays or other entertainments, presented for the amusement of our young people, in which the characters use tobacco.” Finally, the Committee on Tobacco also recommended the closest possible cooperation among the church’s general, stake, and ward officers, in particular with regard to requiring stakes, wards, and priesthood quorum officers to report at regular intervals on the sale and use of tobacco.

Like the Mormon church Social Advisory Committee, the No-Tobacco
League of Utah was also probing the acceptability of and support for expansively prohibitory legislation far more stringent than any that the legislature would consider. In August it sent out questionnaires to the state’s “[l]eading men and women,” inquiring whether they would help, hinder, or be neutral if bills were introduced in Utah: (1) forbidding the use and sale of cigarettes; (2) prohibiting tobacco use in public places such as hotel lobbies, on the street, and elsewhere; and (3) completely abolishing tobacco.1455 Noteworthily, not only did the bill that Southwick would introduce five months later not propose banning the use of cigarettes generally, let alone tobacco, but Southwick himself expressly pointed out that it did not include hotel lobbies or streets in its partial public smoking ban.1454

In October 1920, the No-Tobacco News did not know whether a bill similar to Southwick’s 1919 measure would be introduced in 1921, but it did know that if one were, its opponents would no longer have the excuse that they had used two years earlier that they were unaware of “any demand for the destruction of the cigarette....”1455 During the weeks before the 1920 state legislative elections, the officers, teachers, and students of the Weber County (Mormon) stake Sunday school adopted a resolution to use all their influence to secure prompt enactment of a law prohibiting cigarette sales and to ask all nominees to declare their position. All 11 who responded stated that they were very definitely willing to support such a measure.1456 By the end of 1920, more than a year after Nebraska had inhibited advertising and public smoking,1457 the church’s Young Men’s Mutual Improvement Association and Social Advisory Committee initiated discussion and drafting of legislative bills to ban cigarette sales, smoking in 1453“No-Tobacco Crusade,” OS-E, Aug. 31, 1920 (4:1) (edit.). A month later the No-Tobacco League’s periodical published a piece by a member of the group’s executive committee complaining about a “tobacco fiend[s]” blowing smoke in non-smokers’ faces in public parks and demanding a law under which “the person who must smoke will be compelled to do so in such seclusion as will not endanger the health and happiness of a great majority of the people.” Prof. J. M. Anderson, “A Menace,” No-Tobacco News 1(2):4 (Oct. 1920).

1454“Bill Presented in Senate Deals with Evils of Cigarette,” DN, Jan. 20, 1921 (6:3); “Cigarette Measure Is Discussed in Senate,” DN, Feb. 3, 1921 (sect. 2, 6:1-4 at 2). Finding the results of the No-Tobacco League survey and determining whether negative responses deterred Southwick from including such radical prohibitions in his bill are research desiderata.

1457See above this ch.
As early as January 3, 1921, before the legislature had even been organized, the press, against the background intelligence that “36 States to Consider Bills Against Fags,” made it front-page news that: “Utah Legislature One Body Before Which Strong Fight Will Be Waged.” Three days later, Senator Edward Southwick, who had also introduced the anti-cigarette bills in 1917 and 1919, announced that shortly after the legislature convened he would introduce what the Deseret News called a “drastic” bill that was “designed to abolish the manufacture, sale and use of cigarettes in Utah and would also “prohibit the smoking of pipe [sic] or cigars in any public place, with the exception of the street....” He included non-cigarette tobacco “because he felt that smokers should be compelled to show consideration for non-smokers. His attitude respecting cigarettes has been made public before, and he would legislate them out of existence.” Southwick denied reports that he would also file a bill to prevent the sale or use of tea or coffee, which he viewed as rumors intended to ridicule his anti-cigarette bill, which he knew had majority support in the Senate and felt that it would also secure in the House. No doubt as an admonition to pro-tobacco forces about the not yet introduced measure, within days an Ogden paper published a long piece about the Kansas anti-cigarette law, the point of which was to underscore that it had been enacted because single-issue reformers had nothing else to do, while businessmen lacked the time to “organize an army of cigarette smokers....”

The political significance that the Mormon hierarchy assigned to enactment of general anti-tobacco legislation was signaled by President Heber Grant’s 1921 New Year message, which called “attention to the necessity of observing what is known among us as the Word of Wisdom, in all particulars, but especially that part relating to the non-use of tobacco, which is now prominent before the people, various public places, and tobacco advertising.”

---

1459 “36 States to Consider Bills Against Fags,” OS-E, Jan. 3, 1921 (1:2).
and in which appeals are also made to those of our Latter-day Saint merchants who are selling this weed, to abandon the sale thereof, as an example of their willingness to avoid setting the wrong example before the youth of Israel.” If the fact that even Mormon merchants’ profit-driven business practices suggested that forging public support for passage of a bill prohibiting the sale, advertising, and use of cigarettes might face considerable obstacles, Grant revealed that religious dogma might be no match for the power of addiction either: “The Lord has pronounced tobacco not good for man, and that should be sufficient reason for the Latter-day Saints to abandon it. But instead, many of our people are becoming careless in the observance of this law, and consider it a very slight matter to use tobacco in various ways. I cannot believe...that it is a slight affair for any man, woman or child, to do that which God...has commanded us not to do.” If blind faith did not suffice to guide his co-religionists’ behavior, Grant reverted to the monetary incentive: “I believe, beyond a doubt, that the financial saving to this community, by a strict observance of the Word of Wisdom...especially in the use of tobacco, tea and coffee, would amount to enough to build two sugar factories annually.” Only after underscoring that “[t]his money saved, instead of absolutely lost as it is now, could be used for many noble purposes...in furtherance of the cause of righteousness in the earth,” did Grant deviate from cost accounting that was “only financial” to ask briefly about “the moral, the mental, and the physical costs to the youth” before mentioning the “spiritual blessings” accruing to those who kept God’s commandments but “irretrievably lost to all who disobey this particular commandment of the Lord.” Indeed, as far as the Mormon president was concerned, “the financial, moral, physical, and spiritual deterioration that is correlated with this evil...appears to be a certain consequence of the breaking of the word of the Lord on this subject.”

In the same January issue of the Mormon church magazine Improvement Era, Professor Pack objectively nudged the debate in the direction of a universal ban by arguing that no-tobacco-use-by-minors laws were doomed to be unenforceable because their administrators had “been unable to see the justice in punishing a boy for an offense when his father or some other adult, guilty of the same thing, is permitted to go uncensured and even unnoticed.” Then shifting the perspective to “the average American boy,” who idealized his father and was “constantly striving to be like him,” Pack insisted that the boy who saw “adults smoke...very naturally turns to the habit himself.”

---

1464 Frederick Pack, “How the Impending Tobacco Crusade Can Be Avoided,” IE 24:218-28 at 226 (Jan. 1921). Pack was unable to pursue the logic of his argument to the
During the run-up to Southwick’s introduction on January 19, 1921, of the bill prohibiting cigarette sales and ads and tobacco smoking in specified public places, the Mormon church announced that: “An intense campaign against the use and sale of tobacco will be carried on in all wards and stakes of the Church during the week of January 16 to 23. This campaign has been inaugurated by the Correlation-Social Advisory Committee, with the approval of the First Presidency and General Authority, and the General Boards of the Church.” The hierarchy conferred such great importance on this effort to shape public opinion against smoking that during that week “the regular work of all priesthood quorums and auxiliary associations will be set aside in order that programs and other exercises devoted to the tobacco campaign may be carried out.” To be sure, the basis on which Mormons sought to propagandize may have been less than optimally designed to persuade outsiders of the need for state intervention. For example, almost all the reasons that the campaign adduced for women to oppose tobacco use by men were moralistic or religious, such as “The Spirit of God can not dwell in an unclean body.”

Nevertheless, the Committee’s executive secretary, Arthur Beeley, a sociology professor at the University of Utah (who later became the founding dean of its School of Social Work), urged members to counteract pressure that was already being brought to bear by business interests against the bill. In the context of the Southwick campaign the Mormon church distinguished between its “ultimate purpose...to promote health, citizenship and spiritual welfare amongst its own membership and in society generally” and its “immediate purpose...to create a strong public sentiment in favor of the ‘non-sale and the non-use of tobacco’ by the Latter-day Saints in their communities.” In order to secure non-sale the church asked each ward social committee to “[i]nduce all merchants not to handle tobacco” and to report and help prosecute violations (of the existing end: after asserting that the United States was “not yet ready to demand the complete prohibition of tobacco,” though the handwriting was already on the wall, he unmediatedly concluded that: “Nothing could be more desirable than to have the tobacco interests conduct extensive investigations looking toward the correction of existing evils. The elimination of these deterring factors is the only possible way in which the impending tobacco crusade can be avoided.” ‘Id. at 228.

---

1465“‘We Stand for Non-Use and Non-Sale of Tobacco,’” YWJ 32(1):28-29 (Jan. 1921).

The strategy with regard to achieving non-use focused on making “an individual canvass of all persons of smoking age in their homes and with their families” urging them not to use tobacco and, instead, to “become vigorously active in some form of Church work.”

The 50,000-member-strong Young Men’s (and like-sized Young Ladies’) Mutual Improvement Associations also mobilized on behalf of Southwick’s bill. Ironically, five local social advisory committees were so radical that they presented petitions to the House disfavoring Southwick’s bill on the grounds that it was “not sufficiently drastic.”

In the days immediately preceding the bill’s introduction, the Mormon church-owned Deseret News orchestrated an elaborate support campaign, beginning with seven columns of extracts from the Social Advisory Committee’s (newly published 16-page) pamphlet, The Case Against Tobacco, a compilation of “strictly scientific evidence,” itself excerpted from various prominent medical-scientific authorities such as Dr. William Osler and Dr. William Mayo. To be sure, this “new scientific approach” contrasted oddly with the closing paragraphs asserting that: “The most competent authority on the human body is God who created it” and in 1833 told Prophet Joseph Smith that “tobacco is not good for man,” so that its use was an “affront” and an “insult to the Creator.”

Ironically, the paper’s claim that the fire in Washington, D.C., a few days earlier that burned census records would cost the government millions of dollars to replace overlooked the fact that the virtually total and irreplaceable destruction of the 1890 census manuscripts would leave an enormous gap in the Mormons’ obsessive genealogical activity. The fire also prompted Mormon Senator Reed Smoot to introduce a bill to prohibit smoking in federal executive buildings in Washington, D.C. “Would End Smoking in Capitol Offices,” NYT, Jan. 16, 1921 (14); “United States Senate Rejects Ban on Smoking,” SLT, Feb. 6, 1921 (1:4, 3:1).

---

1470The Case Against Tobacco (Social Advisory Committee of LDS Church, Pamphlet No. 8, Jan. 1921).
1472“Single Cigarette Cost Government $3,000,000,” DN, Jan. 17, 1921 (7:3-4).
which the tobacco trade ha[d] been plunged by the spread of the anti-nicotine activity.” Having divined the industry’s “semi-panic,” the newspaper for good measure published a lengthy “symposium” of condemnation of cigarettes “born of scientific tests and observation” by such luminaries as Thomas Edison and Hudson Maxim (the inventor of smokeless gunpowder). The day of the introduction (on January 19, 1921) of the cigarette sales ban bill that also prohibited smoking any kind of tobacco in specified enclosed public places, the Deseret News published a lengthy article on the huge cost of tobacco use. The following day it furnished specifically tailored support for this legislative effort to reduce secondhand tobacco smoke exposure by printing pertinent excerpts from Pack’s book (which it had published for the church) and elaborating his “intimation...that the boy who is daily ‘fumigated’ with tobacco smoke acquires the habit not alone by power of example, but...he actually and literally gets the poison in his system and is one day easily lured into taking his first cigarette. If this be true, every smoker is burdened with responsibility for forming, perchance, the habit in others—as it were by proxy.” Without expressly drawing the conclusion, the newspaper also implied that, in the wake of smoking’s ubiquitization, which had emboldened smokers to “acquire a strange indifference to the sensibilities of others,” a compulsory law was needed to counteract non-smokers’ spreading timidity: “It has come to the point where it requires almost heroic courage to venture a word of protest.”

Initial Enforcement (1921-1922)

Professor Newell K. Young of the L.D.S. university...said that the law would also 1473“The War Against Nicotine,” DN, Jan. 18, 1921 (4:1).

---

1474“Prominent Men Condemn Cigarettes,” DN, Jan. 18, 1921 (5:2-4). Bizarrely, Edison stated that: “The injurious agent in cigarettes comes principally from the burning paper wrapper,” which produced acrolein. Not only is acrolein, which is a harmful substance, not the principal injurious agent in cigarettes, it results from burning tobacco. Zhauwei Feng et al., “Acrolein Is a Major Cigarette-Related Lung Cancer Agent: Preferential Binding at p53 Mutational Hotspots and Inhibition of DNA Repair,” PNAS 103(42):15404-409 (Oct. 17, 2006); ch. 6 above.
1475On passage of the Southwick bill, see above this ch.
1477“Tobacco Injurious Alike to Smoker and Smoked,” DN, Jan. 20, 1921 (sect. 2, 3:5-6).
One loophole that surfaced shortly before the Southwick law was to go into effect was its lack of jurisdiction over federal reservations, in particular Fort Douglas, which was located in Salt Lake City. (A similar anomaly had arisen under the Kansas law with respect to Fort Riley, which, however, was not located in the state’s largest city.) At the post exchange anyone would have been free to buy cigarettes with impunity, but, since the federal government was inclined to help observe state law, it appeared unlikely that any wholesale dealing would take place there.\footnote{\textit{Fort Douglas to Continue Cigaret Sale After June 7}, \textit{SLT}, June 3, 1921 (20:2-3).}

Right up until the eve of the law’s effective date a “bitter controversy ha[d] been raging between the merchants and business interests generally on the one side and...the anti-cigarette people on the other side concerning administration and interpretation of the state’s new law.” With regard to two major issues Republican Attorney General Harvey Cluff favored the tobacco industry. The first involved cans, packages, and cartons of smoking tobacco whose labels indicated that it was suitable for pipes or cigarettes. Though sale of the tobacco itself was permissible, the question was whether the word “cigarette” on the label constituted unlawful advertising. In order to avoid as much loss as possible to tobacco retailers and trouble to manufacturers, the Utah-Idaho Wholesale Grocers’ Association requested a ruling from Cluff soon after the governor had signed the bill and almost three months before it was to go into effect. Cluff opined that the courts would interpret the lettering as cigarette advertising and thus in violation of the law if a merchant had such containers “[i]n his store window, shelves or any other place within the state of Utah.” Consequently, “the only safe thing to do would be for the merchants to either have the lettering on these cans, packages and cartons changed, removing entirely any reference to cigarettes, or not to carry them at all in their merchandise.”\footnote{\textit{Carton Must Not Carry Word Cigaret}, \textit{OS-E}, Mar. 23, 1921 (3:3-4).} Unwilling to acquiesce in this outcome, the manager of Kahn Brothers Wholesale Grocers wrote Cluff on April 21 presenting a somewhat different form of tobacco labeling, which prompted the attorney general both to uphold his original opinion with regard to exhibiting cans and cartons of tobacco\footnote{\textit{Biennial Report of the Attorney General to the Governor of the State of Utah for the Period Ending November 30, 1922}, at 88-90, at 88-89.} and to backtrack, “to the satisfaction of the merchants,” to the position that dealers could lawfully have cans of tobacco (to be used to make cigarettes) on their shelves for sale so long as they were without any special exhibit or display. Cluff sought to justify these seemingly discordant opinions by rooting them in legislative intent. If advertising something meant calling attention to it, the tobacco cans or cartons “could, perhaps, even create the desire for a cigarette, which is the prime object of advertising. I believe it was the intent of the legislature to absolutely do away with and prevent the exhibition of all signs, pictures, lettering or anything that would suggest to the mind cigarettes....” So focused had he been on this aspect, he confessed, that he did not consider any other thought, let alone his first opinion’s effect on interstate commerce. On reconsideration, he felt that “I, perhaps, went a little too far” in finding a violation in merchants’ having cans on shelves or elsewhere. His thinking now evolved toward the insight that, since the Southwick law did not prohibit the sale or advertising of (smoking) tobacco, and the shipment of cartons into Utah and the sale and distribution of cans constituted interstate commerce, “therefore, even though the lettering on the cartons and cans might be objectionable, especially if the cartons and cans were used as a special display and exhibit in the show windows, still the mere possession of the same, in connection with a stock of goods for sale and distribution” would not be prohibited by the anti-cigarette law.

\textit{SLT}, Jan. 28, 1921 (10:7 at 17:2).

Attorney General Cluff’s other pro-tobacco opinion restrictively interpreted the law’s ban on smoking in public buildings not to apply at all to privately owned public places such as office buildings or grocery, dry goods, or department stores, or to offices of public officials, but only in halls, corridors, waiting rooms, and other offices of government buildings to which the public had access.

---

1482 “San Francisco News Notes,” Tobacco 72(7):36 (June 16, 1921).
1483 Biennial Report of the Attorney General to the Governor of the State of Utah for the Period Ending November 30, 1922, at 89-90. Cluff purported to have been enlightened in his rethinking by Post Printing & Publishing Co. v Brewster, 246 F. 321 (D. Kansas 1917), which, however, dealt with the different issue of the (interstate commerce) constitutionality of the Kansas anti-cigarette law in the context of prohibiting a Missouri publisher from sending into Kansas newspapers containing inserted advertisements for cigarettes that could be (lawfully) sold and bought in Missouri.
While enforcement officials optimistically anticipated little in the way of bootlegging, in Ogden, the state’s second largest city, anticipatory compliance was signaled by workers’ preparing to install small signs in public buildings indicating certain rooms as “smoking rooms.” Nevertheless, the day after the law went into effect on June 7, the Ogden press reported smoking as usual in cafes and other places. In Salt Lake City, too: “Right in the very citadel of truth and justice and sane legislation, the state capitol itself, people were strolling non-chalantly about office and corridor, smoking as usual. In the city and county building they were doing the same thing.” At a meeting with Salt Lake City and County law enforcement officials in mid-August President Milton Bennion of the Social Welfare League, a staunch Southwick supporter, both called attention to continued cigarette sales by some tobacco dealers and “declared that smoking is permitted in inclosed public places contrary to the statute.” Against the background of this paired lack of compliance and enforcement, a month later the No-Tobacco League of Utah asked the Salt Lake City Commission whether it had passed an ordinance in conformity with the Southwick law and if so, whether it was enforcing the ordinance, and if not, whether it intended to adopt one and if not, why not. After that squeaky wheel had failed to get any grease, in mid-October five officers and directors of the League—headed by Michael Mauss, who, 16 months later, would lawfully take the law into his own deputy sheriff hands—petitioned the commission to begin enforcing the anti-cigarette law while questioning the police department’s ability to enforce this or indeed any state law properly without the backing of a city ordinance. And from the commissioners’ failure to adopt such an ordinance the League, unsurprisingly, drew the conclusion that they were averse to enforcing the Southwick law.

Despite the initial setback, in September Ogden recorded Utah’s first raid and seizure, which netted cigarettes valued at $1,500 and the arrests of five dealers, the biggest being the national chain United Cigar Store. Although initially it was understood that the defendants would combine to test the law’s legality,\textsuperscript{1493} eventually United Cigar, which—as the local press reported under a front-page, six-column banner headline—claimed that it had originally sent all of its stock of cigarettes out of state, but then resumed selling after its competitors had because it had lost sales of other merchandise to them as well, pleaded guilty and was fined $150.\textsuperscript{1494} (Other sellers did as well.)\textsuperscript{1495} More significantly, after the Salt Lake City police had finally notified cigar stores that cigarettes sales had to be discontinued immediately, the chain not only complied, but stated that it would not attack any law of Utah or of any other state so long as it was uniformly enforced. In the wake of the high-profile raid and seizure in Ogden, the county attorney in Weber County (of which Ogden was county seat) announced that: ‘‘No more cigarettes will be sold in Weber County. The law will be vigilantly enforced. ... The law relative to smoking in public places enumerated in the law will also be rigidly enforced.”\textsuperscript{1496}

By the end of 1921 a phenomenon—jury nullification—had emerged that opponents of the law would adduce as evidence that it was unenforceable because it was not rooted in popular approval. The first case in which a seller was tried in Salt Lake City involved a pharmacy clerk who had sold a package of cigarettes to an anti-vice squad policeman, who provided the only trial testimony. After the four jurors—two of whom stated during voir dire that they used tobacco but not cigarettes, and one of whom had smoked for 30 years but had quit six years earlier—had (surprisingly) acquitted the defendant, the judge cautioned them about their oath and told them to base their conclusions on the evidence, admonishing them that their verdict indicated that they believed that the officer had been guilty of the very serious offense of perjury. In response they justified their verdict on the grounds that because the package shown them in court had been unopened they did not know whether it contained cigarettes. This threadbare excuse, which was prefigured by the jury’s having interrupted its 30-

\textsuperscript{1493}“Cigarets Seized in Raid; Five Dealers Under Arrest; Value of Haul Set at $1,500,” \textit{OS-E}, Sept. 27, 1921 (6:1-2).
\textsuperscript{1494}“Cigaret Sellers Fined Here,” \textit{OS-E}, Dec. 1, 1921 (1:7).
\textsuperscript{1496}“Cigaret Sellers Fined Here,” \textit{OS-E}, Dec. 1, 1921 (1:7). Nevertheless, on the last day of 1921 raids on five United Cigar Stores outlets in Salt Lake City netted 339 cartons of cigarettes, which company officials risibly claimed were “privately owned and were merely being held at the stores until called for.” “Cigarets Seized in Salt Lake Raid,” \textit{OS-E}, Jan. 1, 1922 (8:3).
minute deliberations to ask the judge several questions circling around the issue of entrapment, insinuated itself into the verdict despite both the excusal of one juror on the basis of his opposition to enforcement of the Southwick law and the prosecution’s having taken the precaution of peremptorily challenging three members of the jury pool.\textsuperscript{1497}

Yet despite these prosecutions, Fred Bennett, the head of the 1,200-member strong No-Tobacco League of Utah,\textsuperscript{1498} wrote in the November issue of the Mormon magazine, \textit{Improvement Era}, that the law, “except insofar as it relates to the advertising of cigarettes, is more or less a dead letter...”\textsuperscript{1499} And by the end of 1921 President Grant was becoming increasingly disgruntled with the level of noncompliance with the new law. At a quarterly conference of the Ogden stake he bluntly denounced (unnamed) transgressors:

“High toned, highly educated, first class men of the state,” were scored by President Grant...for their violation of the anti-cigaret law. He said he had visited the best hotels in Salt Lake and had seen men of high standing in the community smoking in places where the habit was prohibited and these men, he said, would feel insulted if they were told they were law breakers. “Men are disobeying this law because they don’t like it. Men don’t like laws that hit them. They are in the same class as the thief who objects to laws against thievery.”\textsuperscript{1500}

Though only obliquely, Grant hinted that some of these delinquents might be found in the upper echelons of his own Saints: “In referring to the Word of Wisdom he did not wish to cast any reflections but desired to remind bishops that ‘as with the priest, so with the people.’ He said the conduct of the people depends absolutely on the example and energy of those standing at the head of the organizations.” (More transparent was Presiding Patriarch Hyrum G. Smith, who at the same conference “deplored the fact that members of the priesthood were users of tobacco....”) Only vis-a-vis Mormons could Grant have imagined that his call for blind \textit{Kadavergehorsam} would enhance the commitment to compliance with Caesar’s laws: those who disobeyed the Word of Wisdom “are decaying in wisdom and power because they had cut themselves off from the life

\textsuperscript{1497}“Clerk Acquitted in Cigaret Trial,” \textit{SLT}, Dec. 8, 1921 (24:3); “Cigaret Clerk Freed by Jury,” \textit{OS-E}, Dec. 8, 1921 (4:3).
\textsuperscript{1498}“Anticigaret Bill Put Under Fire,” \textit{SLT}, Feb. 10, 1921 (14:5).
\textsuperscript{1499}Fred Bennett, “The Utah Anti-Tobacco Law of 1920 [sic],” \textit{IE} 25(1):74-76 at 75 (Nov. 1921).
\textsuperscript{1500}Heber J. Grant Raps Cigaret Law Breakers,” \textit{OS-E}, Nov. 14, 1921 (1:2, and 2:2). For a briefer account, see “Tobacco Law Violators Are Likened to Thieves,” \textit{SLT}, Nov. 15, 1921 (1:1).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

giving stream. Obedience is the thing which counts most in the battle of life....

Violations of the cigarette sales ban and police failure to enforce it prompted an editorial in Improvement Era urging each Mormon stake and ward to appoint a committee to lobby local government officials in an effort to interest them in and help them with law enforcement. The authoritative Mormon editorialist also admonished businessmen both for violating Southwick’s prohibition of public smoking and for their self-regarding and quasi-anarchistic neglect of the second-order effects of their transgressions on the maintenance of law and order:

There are a great many men, we should judge from casual observance in mingling with the community, who have not yet learned to obey the law against smoking in public places. ... They seem to think that a law which interferes with their actions is not as valid as any other law which interferes with the illegal actions of other men. They scarcely stop to consider how very dangerous such an attitude becomes for the welfare of the community. All others who break any law take the same liberty, from their example, and argue that if a business man can break the law without being punished for it, all may do so. The result is...a great contempt for law and order which is a menace to the stability and well-being of the community. If it is illegal to smoke in public places, no man having at heart the welfare of the youth of the land and community in general will smoke there, for if he does, he will show publicly that he has a contempt for the law—a very dangerous example! ... If men were at liberty to break any law they did not like there would be chaos, disorder and anarchy as a result.

Ironically, the Mormon hierarchy was, rather late in the process, lending credence to the warnings that Southwick’s legislative opponents had voiced all along that the consequences of mass non-compliance with the cigarette-selling and public tobacco-smoking bans in terms of undermining the social-psychological micro-foundations of civic cohesion were graver than the dangers posed by tobacco use itself.

As 1922, the law’s first full calendar year of being in force, got underway, contradictory indicia of its effectiveness came to light. In Logan, Utah’s fourth largest city (pop. 9,439), the city commissioners decided that it “must be strictly enforced...in the future”; in particular, officers would be “instructed to eliminate smoking in public places.” As a result, the police chief “placed placards in all public places such as cafes, restaurants, lobbies, railroad station waiting rooms and other places where smoking has been indulged in, bearing a warning from

---

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

At the same time the Ogden Standard-Examiner published a lengthy, (unusually) bylined article on the first half-year’s experience with the Southwick law, which purported to offer an overview of the whole state, though most of its factual details came from Ogden. In order to find a gauge of public sentiment concerning the law, reporter Floyd A. Timmerman focused on jurors (whose nullifying stance has already been alluded to), insisting that it had become difficult even to impanel a jury because in response to voir dire questioning by prosecutors prospective jurors stated that they were unable to deal fairly with a case on the grounds that they were not in favor of the law. He noted that the several trials thus far had not resulted in a single conviction despite the (aforementioned) water-tight evidence. As an example he instanced two recent Ogden cases in which juries refused to convict on the basis of dealers’ (ludicrous) defense that the cigarettes found in their store were not there for sale, but were owned by people who kept them there for private use. Summarizing the conclusion of public officials charged with enforcement of a law they deemed ineffective and lacking the support of public opinion, Timmerman wrote that they “feel that it is only a matter of time until it is thoroughly determined that convictions cannot be obtained and the wide-open sale will return.” In addition, Ogden Mayor Frank Francis—a former owner and associate editor of the newspaper—while agreeing that cigarettes were “a very bad habit,” believed that the (liquor) bootlegger and gambler represented bigger tasks of reformation. More pointedly, Ogden Public Safety Commissioner J. Ray Ward opined that the Southwick law’s prohibition should have been limited to the sale of cigarettes inasmuch as its smoking ban was “superfluous” and turned public opinion against the statute. Interestingly, however, the law that he deemed a “failure” had nevertheless made it more difficult for smaller boys to obtain cigarettes and form the “habit.”

This last point was one that Timmerman himself was constrained to book as a success for Southwick; in particular, he observed that the law had reduced boys’ access to cigarettes because the boy was handicapped in ordering from out-of-state dealers (under the shelter of interstate commerce): “He may not have the price to pay for a carton and he would also experience difficulty in having the package sent to his home if he did.” The reporter also focused on addiction as a motivator: “The desire of a cigarette to a boy who has not yet formed the habit is in the majority of cases only momentary and if a steep barrier is to be overcome, he generally forgets and goes about his way without them.”

---

1505 Born in 1892 in New York, Timmerman was returned as a newspaper reported at the 1920 census and as living in Brooklyn, New York in 1910. He was killed in an airplane crash in Idaho in 1928.

Finally, Timmerman also conceded that although the law had thus far failed to prohibit smoking in public places, “it may have brought about a decrease of the practice. Most proprietors of restaurants and stores who allow their patrons to smoke have set aside a portion of the place and designated it a ‘smoking room’ and have had no trouble.” Such a separate-room regime—which should have offered greater protection from secondhand smoke than the within-room designated smoking/non-smoking areas that became a legal norm in numerous states during the last quarter of the twentieth century—notwithstanding, Timmerman was unaware of any case in Utah in which “a man was arrested and prosecuted for smoking in places where the new law prohibits.”

In an address to the Mutual Improvement Associations conference on June 10, 1922, shortly before reports began circulating that pro-tobacco forces would push for repeal in 1923, President Grant first preemptively urged the attendees: “Vote for no candidate who will not declare his willingness to retain the anti-cigarette law on the statutes,” and then issued this campaign slogan: “The Anti-Cigarette Law Ought to be Enforced—not Repealed.”

That the one provision in the Southwick law that was being obeyed was the prohibition of cigarette advertising meant both that newspaper publishers were losing $100,000 to $200,000 in revenues annually and that they were animated by a powerful self-regarding financial incentive to advocate restoration of that cash flow. It did not take Utah country newspapers long to “discover that newspapers” were the new law’s “chief victims.” A copy of the October 7, 1921

---

1508 Floyd Timmerman, “Anti-Cigaret Law Failure in Matter of Convictions,” OS-E, Jan. 8, 1922 (7:1-3). In late 1921, a deputy sheriff in the small silver mining (and skiing) town of Park City near Salt Lake City “notified all restaurants and dance halls that smoking must cease, and that the ‘fool’ Southwick law will be enforced in that particular...because some women...complained to the deputy sheriff that smoke have [sic] been blown in their faces while at meals in some of the local eating places by male patrons.” “No Smoking in the Dining Room,” Park Record, Nov. 4, 1921 (1:2). On the designated smoking/non-smoking area laws, see below Parts V-VI.

1510 D.J.G., “About This, That and T’Other,” OS-E, Aug. 13, 1922 (4:3).
Iron County Record sent to capitol officials noted that the previous week the paper had received a contract for several hundred inches of advertising from a well-known tobacco company together with copy for a cigarette ad, which, however, the Southwick law prevented the publisher from accepting. The paper claimed that it would not have objected if only the law had had a noticeable impact on cigarette sales or smoking, but, since it could detect none, “‘the newspapers are the only firms or individuals affected by this freak legislation.’” The publisher may have been merely a frustrated profit seeker, but the paper closed with a question as to why a law officer pursued it when it was engaged in the pursuit of happiness in “‘the form of a cigarette.’”

The annual meeting of the Utah Press Association was, unsurprisingly, the site, about a year after the law had gone into effect, of what was “probably the first public attempt to inaugurate a campaign to repeal the anti-cigaret law. . . . [T]he assault was made by A. L. Fish, general manager of the Salt Lake Tribune,” the state’s largest-circulation daily, who, according to the Association’s report, “‘brought out the fallacy of the cigaret law in that it was hurting the newspaper advertising to the extent of $150,000 annually and really doing no good for us. He suggested that efforts be made to take this up in the next legislature.’” (The Provo Daily Herald, which reported this initiative, editorially boasted that it was “willing to continue WITHOUT cigaret advertising money from now until the end of its existence if by so doing it can help in making this a better city and county and state in which to live.”)

To be sure, Grant had pointed to a vitally significant link between smoking and advertising that the Southwick law had only partially severed: “Every full grown man who uses the cigarette, places an object lesson before the boy, which he ought not to do.” To the extent that compliance with and enforcement of the statutory ban on public smoking was actually appreciably reducing the volume of smoking visible to boys, this form of gratis advertising was becoming less effective. However, since the act did not prohibit adults from smoking tobacco in various enclosed public places or any unenclosed public places, let alone in any non-public places, as long as adult smoking remained lawful, it would constitute the cheapest effective advertisement.

Shortly before the state and county convention primaries were held in 1922, the Mormon First Presidency (that is, Grant and his first and second counselor), issued a special notice underscoring the church’s “positive stand in favor of the laws in support of peace and good order, whether national or local.” Having heard of efforts in Utah to prevent their enforcement and secure repeal of some of them, the troika requested lower echelons of the hierarchy to impress on Utahns the importance of attending those primaries and on “all persons of influence” to help elect state legislators and county officers who would execute those laws and defeat obstruction. Just in case the reference was unclear, Improvement Era specified the subtext:

It is well known that certain declarations have been made here and there owing to an indifferent enforcement of the tobacco law and other health laws, that efforts are brewing to have the Legislature repeal the anti-cigarette law. ... The experience of the past two years has proved that there are officers who are not in favor of the enforcement of the anti-cigarette law, but who are rather in favor of annulling it. Some of these people are in high positions in the state, in the counties and in the cities. ... Flagrant violations in the way of sale of tobacco and smoking in public places are numerous and it has been difficult to get officers, including judges, officers of courts, mayors, policemen, and others in charge of the execution of the law, to take any interest at all in its enforcement. These men should be remembered in the election to come, and be set aside to give place to men or women chosen and publicly pledged to put forth their efforts to see that the law is properly enforced.

As the fall 1922 state legislative elections approached, the Mormon hierarchy, repeating Grant’s aforementioned declaration, made clear that it was imperative that all Utahns, regardless of party affiliation, who supported the principles of the non-sale and non-use of tobacco and the strict enforcement of the Southwick law—and the church believed that “the great majority” of the state did—“should see to it that every individual candidate is publicly pledged to allow the anti-cigarette law to remain on the statute books, and to stand firmly for its enforcement.” In Utah County (whose county seat Provo, the state’s third largest city, had recently been the site of a large cigarette raid and seizure), all legislative and judicial candidates did in fact endorse the law.\textsuperscript{1518}

---

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

In the interim between the elections and the opening of the new legislative session, the anti-prohibitionist Republican \textit{Salt Lake Tribune} revealed that among the major tasks awaiting the legislature was a decision on the Southwick law, concerning which three policy lines had emerged: (1) providing for strict enforcement, to which newly elected Salt Lake City Republicans appeared to be pledged (“rigid enforcement of all laws”); (2) letting the anti-cigarette law preserve its “'[i]nnocuous desuetude'”; and (3) repeal in order to inculcate proper respect for the law.\textsuperscript{1519}

In the context of proliferating repeal talk shortly before the legislature convened in January 1923, Louis Ward—the pen name sometimes used by Fredrick Louis Ward Bennett (aka Fred L. W. Bennett), the first president of the No-Tobacco League of Utah\textsuperscript{1520}—a leading Mormon anti-tobacco writer, suggested that the bans on cigarette sales and public smoking had not so much failed as never been tried. The latter, Ward confirmed, had been “a dead letter from the start. It was even ignored in the City and County Building itself.” Under the former, to be sure, several cases were tried in early 1922, but “most of them failed through the unwillingness of juries to convict....” This outcome he in part explained as a function of their having been initiated by complaints sworn to by a No-Tobacco League representative rather than by law officers; as a consequence, the public, that is, the jury pool, got the “impression that the enforcement of this particular law was only desired by a ‘few cranks’....” This impression was mightily and ironically reinforced by the fact that “violation of the law was even allowed in the court room during the trials, for no effort was made to stop smoking although the law expressly states it is forbidden in the City and County Building, particularly in the public sections.” In contrast, Ward emphasized that “one section of the law...has been obeyed to the letter, and that is the one forbidding the advertising of cigarettes in any form.” So highly did he value this third prohibition that he opined that it “alone stamps the act as a worth while measure” even if the other two never became enforcible. Ward adhered to this view despite his knowledge that the total withdrawal of cigarette ads in \textsuperscript{1518}“All Endorse Cigaret Law,” \textit{Daily Herald} (Provo), Nov. 2, 1922 (1:3-5).

\textsuperscript{1519}“Big Tasks Wait for Legislators,” \textit{SLT}, Dec. 12, 1922 (20:1). President Grover Cleveland had used the phrase in internal quotation marks to refer to a law with which he refused to comply.

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Utah (in the amount of $150,000) had “not made much difference, so far, to the popularity of this form of tobacco”—because, as every advertising and businessman understood, the disappearance of the country’s “great tobacco manufacturers["...educational campaign on behalf of cigarette smoking in the state” would eventually “have its effect....” Indeed, Ward was unwilling to abandon this position “even if the advertising stopped by the state law could have no effect on the demand for cigarettes owing to the advertisements appearing in national publications sold here.” The reason that he would “still be proud of the law” was that someone had to be “first in these matters.” His strategic model was supporters of liquor prohibition who had succeeded in imposing it in scattered small towns prior to the Eighteenth Amendment and had not despaired when unfettered availability of liquor in neighboring towns turned “dry” islands “wet” because they were “idealists” who “looked ahead to a time when prohibition would be general, and that time came.”

Ward’s elevation of the advertising ban above all other anti-tobacco measures may seem counterintuitive, but in fact it was consistent with the explanation that Southwick himself had presented on the Senate floor in 1921 as to why he wanted his bill passed. Dwelling at length on its advertising ban, he had stated that the Utah Billposting Company had unexpired contracts worth $40,000 for cigarette advertising, and “spoke of what that means per capita to the citizen.” Southwick then launched into a decidedly modern diatribe that dismissed out of hand the cigarette industry’s never-ending, transparently false claim that its ads target(ed) only existing smokers: “It is not...those who have acquired the cigaret habit, but new material and victims, that this advertising seeks to find. Therefore, it is necessary to prohibit the sale of cigarettes in order to prevent this advertising of them.”

1522u Senator Southwick Tells Why He Desires Passage of Anticigaret Measure,” SLT, Feb. 3, 1921 (10:1). Shortly after Southwick had introduced his bill the Brigham Young University student body submitted a supporting petition to the legislature stating, inter alia, that tobacco advertising, which “takes undue advantage of the immature mind...can not consistently be prohibited unless the sale of tobacco is prevented.” “B.Y.U. Faculty and Student Body Ask for Anti-Tobacco Law,” DN, Jan. 29, 1921 (6:2). Compare also the statement made in 1923 by Prof. Milton Bennion, Mormon chairman of the Social Welfare League and long-time dean of the University of Utah Education School, that the promoters of the Southwick law “‘had the sale of cigarettes forbidden because they were advised by lawyers that in case they forbid the advertising without forbidding the sale the courts would declare the law unconstitutional.’” Moreover, in the interim between passage of the Senate and House amendments to the Southwick law in 1923, Bennion, because he took the Finally, Southwick had affirmed the same logic from a different perspective during the same floor debate in response to a killer amendment that would have prohibited advertising all tobacco products. He averred that the bill’s backers would pledge their support for such a measure, but insisted that a universal tobacco sales ban simply could not be anchored in S.B. No. 12 because the latter did not prohibit the sale of non-cigarette tobacco products. (To be sure, when non-smoking Mormon Senator Harrison Jenkins—who was ultimately one of only three senators to vote against the bill on final passage—called Southwick’s bluff by slyly offering to rectify this situation by proposing to treat cigarettes and all other tobacco products equally throughout the bill, Southwick quickly backtracked: “I...think that would be going too deep. We should tackle the matter one step at a time....” In fact, only Jenkins voted for his own amendment.)

Almost nine decades later the time has still not come for cigarette sales to be banned in order to ban cigarette ads, but the question here is not whether anti-smoking Mormons were able to see a century into the future, but whether, in the very short run of the 1923 Utah legislative session, idealists or realists were able to articulate and implement the more effective strategy for retaining as much of the 1921 law as possible against the tobacco industry’s onslaught on restrictions on selling, advertising, and smoking cigarettes. The outcome of the 1923 proceedings revealed that Southwick, who was no longer a legislator and played no visible role in public debate, had spoken prematurely in 1921 when he “celebrated the first anti-cigarette day by asserting that ‘in a short time the last cigaret will have been smoked in Utah.’” (Even more wildly overoptimistic position that “[t]he aim of the whole measure was to prevent the sale of tobacco to minors and the advertising of cigarettes” and that the extension of the ad ban to tobacco would “prevent minors from buying tobacco,” did not appear to regret repeal of the ban on sales to adults. “Would Enforce Cigaret Law,” SLT, Mar. 5, 1923 (14:5).

When challenged to “cite any law that would prohibit a legislative body from enacting a law denying the right to advertise an article that is permitted to be sold, Senator Southwick said he could not cite the exact statute, but he was sure it would come under the common law, at least.” Id. In arguing against Senator Jenkins’ licensure amendment, Southwick had similarly asserted that: “You cannot ask a licensed dealer not to advertise what you permit him to sell.” “Cigarette Measure Is Discussed in Senate,” DN, Feb. 3, 1921 (sect. 2, 6:1).

Judiciary Committee Has Public Hearing on Cigarette Measure,” DN, Jan. 27, 1921 (sect. 2, 8:6).

Anti-Cigarette Bill Is Passed in Senate,” DN, Feb. 4, 1921 (sect. 2, 10:1-3 at 2).

Anti-Cigarette Bill Is Passed in Senate,” DN, Feb. 4, 1921 (sect. 2, 10:1-3 at 2-3).

E. C. Rodgers, “Smokers of Cigarettes in Utah Have Odd Law to Obey,” WT-T, was the No-Tobacco News, which as a result of the bill’s passage had suspended publication indefinitely. Instead, in 1923 the legislature did away with the general sales prohibition, turning it into a local control licensure law cum sales tax adopted in large part verbatim from the 1921 Iowa law, while at the same time both severely diluting the public smoking ban and expanding the scope of the advertising ban.

The Tobacco Merchants Association Abandons Hope of Repeal in Utah (1922)

“[W]e are of the opinion that the Citizens of Utah generally have not become disgusted enough with the existing Cigarette Prohibition Statute...to secure its repeal. [W]e are of the opinion that it would be advisable to let the thing rest for this session of the Legislature, at least, or until such time as the Citizenship generally is converted to the fact that it is a farce and public opinion created by this thought, to such an extent, that its repeal could be made easy.”

Evaluating this statutory outcome, which will be undertaken below, requires familiarity with the campaign for repeal of the Southwick law in Utah in 1923 that the Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S. (the cigarette manufacturing oligopoly’s propaganda and legislative organ) sought to initiate in late 1922 after the November elections had determined the composition of state legislatures. Despite the fact that the letters that Charles Dushkind, TMA’s managing director, had received from the Utah tobacco trade held out “no encouragement” “that a movement looking to the repeal of the existing statutes be inaugurated,” “[s]hould it be determined [by the cigarette manufacturers] to inaugurate such movements” in Utah (as well as in Kansas and North Dakota), he “respectfully” enumerated... several suggestions for what in reality was the staging of the semblance of such a movement.

In first place, Dushkind recommended as a “forceful presentation against prohibition statutes” a recently compiled, transparently biased booklet, “What Is the Duty of the State in Regard to Cigarettes?,” one of whose virtues was that it contained “but brief references to the merits of the cigarette....” He was certain that both editorialists and lawyers would find abundant material in it for editorials and briefs. If the sheer persuasiveness of this pathetically primitive compilation did not do the trick, next he urged the cigarette manufacturing companies (that is, his paymasters), to pay advertising companies “with a view to securing the cooperation of the press.” Dushkind also advised the manufacturers to “instruct their retail sales forces or missionary men to endeavor to get retailers to write their...legislators, urging the passage of repeal....” In addition to TMA’s own various propagandizing activities, Dushkind stressed proposing, in connection with repeal bills, “[s]ubstitute restrictive legislation” with regard to minors and license fees, cautioning, however, against following Iowa in enacting a cigarette tax.

The ultimate point of manufacturing public opinion was, then, to draw it to state legislators’ attention and convince them that it was real because, as Dushkind assured his oligopolist bosses:

[I]t is my firm conviction that insofar as the legislators are concerned the majority in all cases would unhesitatingly vote for the repeal of such statutes, and that it is only because of their erroneous impression that public opinion and their constituencies are in favor of prohibitory laws that they may be prompted to vote against repeal.

Hence, it would seem that it is essential that the legislators be brought to a realization that public opinion is really against such obnoxious statutes.

To be sure, there was one little pesky boomerang problem that had to be weighed: “It is true that too much publicity may arouse and stir the fanatics into more intensive activity than otherwise, but can these statutes be repealed without the North Dakota, and Utah” at 1 (Dec. 4, 1922), Bates No. 501870676.

1533Charles Dushkind, “Memorandum in re-Existing Anti-Cigarette Statutes in Kansas, North Dakota, and Utah” at 1 (Dec. 4, 1922), Bates No. 501870676.

1534For an analysis, see below ch. 17

1535Charles Dushkind, “Memorandum in re-Existing Anti-Cigarette Statutes in Kansas, North Dakota, and Utah” at 1-2 (Dec. 4, 1922), Bates No. 501870676.

1536Charles Dushkind, “Memorandum in re-Existing Anti-Cigarette Statutes in Kansas, North Dakota, and Utah” at 2 (Dec. 4, 1922), Bates No. 501870676/7.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans force of public opinion and, at any rate, is it possible to make any effort in that direction without attracting attention of the intolerants?\footnote{Charles Dushkind, “Memorandum in re:-Existing Anti-Cigarette Statutes in Kansas, North Dakota, and Utah” at 2 (Dec. 4, 1922), Bates No. 501870676/7.}

Common to the responses from tobacco businesses in Utah that Dushkind received after soliciting their views on November 23, 1922, on the need for repealing the 1921 Southwick law was, interestingly, whether they favored it or not, that they emphasized the Mormon church’s outsized influence as the decisive factor. For example, one company desiring repeal nevertheless had “some doubt as to whether or not this could be accomplished” because “the cigarette law was a measure fostered by the L.D.S. Church, introduced by a prominent member of the Church and passed a [sic] L.D.S. Legislature.”\footnote{Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “Excerpts from Letters Received from the Trade” at 7 (n.d. [ca. Dec. 1922]), Bates No. 501870678/84. Unfortunately, the poor quality of the “best copy” made the company’s name and that part of the excerpt illegible which speculated about the church heads’ response to any efforts to repeal in 1923.} Categorized among the “Contrary Opinions” was the reply by Hemenway & Moser, tobacco distributors and retail merchants,\footnote{Hemenway & Moser was one of the tobacco stores raided in Ogden in 1921 for violating the Southwick law that initially threatened to litigate its validity. “Anticigaret Law to Be Tested in Ogden Cases,” SLT, Oct. 30, 1921 (17:4). It continued to maintain a high political profile: 16 years later it was still corresponding with Dushkind about the Southwick law’s remaining advertising restrictions related to window displays; specifically, it complained about R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.’s salesmen’s posting “obnoxious advertising material,” which might attract the Church’s attention and undermine the chance to repeal the “foolish law” altogether in 1939. Hemenway & Moser Co. to Charles Dushkind, Aug. 30, 1938, Bates No. 501996404. Two weeks later it expressed the belief that all major tobacco companies “should be reasonable in their placement of advertising materials” in order to avoid “agit[ing] the situation and prompting enactment of additional anti-tobacco legislation. Hemenway & Moser Co. to Charles Dushkind, Sept. 12, 1938, Bates No. 501996402.} which purported to express also the concensus [sic] of opinion of others, including “a number of our prominent political, financial and publicity men,” that a repeal effort “would be useless” during the 1923 legislative session.\footnote{Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “Excerpts from Letters Received from the Trade” at 7 (n.d. [ca. Dec. 1922]), Bates No. 501870678/84.} The reason was straightforward:

“Both political parties were pronounced in their expression of no freak legislation this year. They are also committed to certain remedial laws on state finances. To put these over they feel that they must have the support of the dominant element in our politics, which is the Mormon Church. The head of this institution is decidedly strong against the smoking of cigarettes and tobacco in all forms and recent expressions would lead us to believe that his efforts would be lent towards a stronger enforcement of the law rather than to submit to any change or repeal and our politicians feel that any effort at this time on this bill would avail nothing and would probably detract from other matters which they wish to put across."\footnote{1541}

To be sure, the company recognized that ""the political situation is never stable,"" so that if a movement developed to pass a license and regulatory bill, it would turn to TMA for assistance, but otherwise it ""would not approve of an effort being made on this thing in this winter’s session.""\footnote{1542} Hemenway & Moser’s pessimistic evaluation of the constellation of political forces for 1923 may have been influenced by its experience in 1921 when it (together with United Cigar Stores), provoked by declarations by Southwick supporters in the legislature that 90 percent of Utahns supported the bill, initiated an “eleventh-hour endeavor to get some evidence as to what percentage” of voters opposed the bill. After three days—during which Senate passage intervened—a total of 12,000 signatures, 8,000 of which were obtained in Salt Lake and Ogden, had purportedly been collected.\footnote{1543} That the tobacco industry, despite this undertaking, which presumably rested on mobilizing smokers, nevertheless suffered a sharp defeat with respect to every aspect of the Southwick bill, may well have made Hemenway & Moser at the end of 1922 very wary of confronting the Mormon church and its allies so soon again.

The upshot of TMA’s inquiries and deliberations was that it was very unlikely that pro-tobacco forces could overcome the Mormon-backed legislative status quo in 1923. Ironically, contrary to Dushkind’s prognosis, not only did the legislature pass a partial repeal of the Southwick law, but it came freighted, as had been the case two years earlier in Iowa, with the cigarette tax that the oligopoly was determined to avoid. Whether the cigarette manufacturers were instrumental in destabilizing the political situation and whether the tax—these government revenues represented a crucially important talking point on behalf of licensure—was the price they were forced to pay for repeal of the sales ban and partial repeal of the partial smoking ban are questions on which the as yet available internal tobacco industry documents shed no light.

\footnote{1541}{Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “Excerpts from Letters Received from the ‘Trade’” at 7 (n.d. [ca. Dec. 1922]), Bates No. 501870678/84.}
\footnote{1542}{Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “Excerpts from Letters Received from the ‘Trade’” at 7 (n.d. [ca. Dec. 1922]), Bates No. 501870678/84.}
\footnote{1543}{“Public Argues on Cigaret Bill,” \textit{SLT}, Feb. 5, 1921 (22:5).}
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Sheriff Harries Harries Capitalist Public Smokers (1923)

“The Senate bill is prohibitory. We have had too much of this ‘verboten stuff.’ One would think he was living in Prussia.”

One of the difficulties in the way of reform in the matter of the use of tobacco is the many men who are addicted to the habit, and who therefore stand as advocates of the evil. ... This, with the amount of money that is at the command of workers for nicotine, stands largely in the way of any effort that people who are not in favor of tobacco may exercise, to drive the stuff out of existence, or to compel the observance of law and decency in regard to smoking and other uses of tobacco in public places.

A crucial step that shaped the course of legislation took place at the outset of 1923 when the 51-year-old new Salt Lake County Sheriff Benjamin R. Harries (who had taken his oath of office on January 1) announced that he would begin enforcing the prohibition of smoking in public places. On January 6 he announced a policy statement pointing out that his office had received complaints concerning enforcement of state laws: “Most particular among these are ones pertaining to the enforcement of the cigaret law, which is apparently ignored by the public generally.” And in response to inquiries as to whether the sheriff intended to enforce it he noted that it was his purpose “to enforce all laws, whether they be popular or unpopular with the public.” Harries went on to administer a lesson in the interaction between the amendatory and enforcement processes: “If there are laws on the statute books that are bad laws the enforcement should bring about the proper remedy. The offenders and violators of any of the laws, including the cigaret law, will be prosecuted. If any of the 1545“Tobacco and the Public Schools,” IE 25(5):455 (Mar. 1922) (edit.).

---

1547a“Sheriff Harries Promises Strict Enforcement of All Laws Including Anti-Cigarette Statute,” DN, Jan. 6, 1923 (sect. 2, 1:5-6).
laws are bad laws the proper place to adjust them is in the legislature and not in various law-enforcing bodies of the state.

Indeed, as long as the anti-cigarette law remained on the statute books, it “would be especially enforced.” Little wonder that by the end of February conjecture arose that the “sheriff...may be working for the repeal of the law. The Lord and Harries only know.”

Although he had not yet had an opportunity to organize his forces completely and instruct his deputies regarding the Southwick law, on January 11, in an apparently chance encounter, a “deputy sheriff informed a violator of the law that smoking was forbidden in the corridors of the City & County building.” This incident prompted Harries’ announcement that evening of a smoking ban in the corridors and outer offices of the city and county building, which would also be enforced in all other Southwick law-covered enclosed public places. In the meantime his deputy sheriffs began warning, but not arresting, violators. As to his construction of the law, Harries specified that a man could lawfully smoke in his own private office, but he had already prohibited smoking in the outer room of the sheriff’s office; moreover, bailiffs had been instructed not to smoke and not to permit jurors to smoke in the courtrooms or corridors of the county and city building during court adjournment, though they would be allowed to smoke in jury rooms, which, for reasons he did not explicate, he did not consider to be covered by the law.

Harries’ vigorous enforcement policy was especially impressive in light of the fact that at the time he was the target of a court action to oust him from his office on the grounds that his election had been invalid. This judicial complaint is highly pertinent in the present context because it was based on the claim that the Mormon church had violated the Utah constitution’s prohibition of church-state union and church domination or interference with state functions by virtue of its unduly influencing, intimidating, and compelling its members to vote for

---

Harries.\textsuperscript{1553}

Mormon President Heber Grant had in fact at a church body meeting at the end of October “invited people to vote for” Harries for sheriff, explaining that representatives of the Salt Lake Ministerial Association and Social Welfare League (including Milton Bennion, dean of the University of Utah School of Education), which had endorsed Harries, had recently visited him; Grant then convened the presidencies of the seven Salt Lake County stakes, which unanimously approved his candidacy. Church officials characterized the filling of the sheriff’s office as a moral rather than a political issue and Harries’ election as “of distinct moral value to the community.” Grant stressed that since becoming Mormon president (in 1918) he had never announced his preference for anyone’s candidacy (thus contradicting charges that he had “more political control than any other man in this country’’), but also apparently sought to justify his departure from that course by arguing that the administration of the sheriff’s office had been “unsatisfactory for a number of years,” which condition he hoped would also prompt “the people...to ignore political preferences....” The president of the Salt Lake Ministerial Association also urged Harries’ election for the reason that none of the other candidates had enforced the law.\textsuperscript{1554} Ultimately, the Ministerial Association’s and Grant’s backing rested on vetting done by the Social Welfare League, which had reported that “as a deputy sheriff Harries had been a sincere advocate of law enforcement.”\textsuperscript{1555}

Bennion’s and the League’s energetic efforts on Harries’ behalf beginning in October 1921 may have been linked to a disappointing reply that they had received from the Salt Lake City police chief and city attorney and the Salt Lake County sheriff and county attorney in response to an oral inquiry concerning violations of the cigarette sales ban by certain merchants. Following several appearances before the League during the previous few weeks, these officials wrote a letter that, despite admitting that they had a sworn duty to uphold and enforce the law without questioning its wisdom, elaborated an excuse for failure: “We appreciate that in Salt Lake City and in some other communities in the county there is no pronounced public sentiment in favor of the enforcement of this law. [W]e realize fully the difficulty of enforcing a law of the character

\textsuperscript{1553}“Courts Asked to Declare Harries Election Invalid,” \textit{SLT}, Dec. 24, 1922 (24:5-6) (publishing full text of complaint).

\textsuperscript{1554}“Churchmen Seek Aid in Electing Harries Sheriff,” \textit{SLT}, Oct. 30, 1922 (1:7, 2:3). Interestingly, Milton Bennion stated in 1923 that, as a result of divided views among the organization’s officers, the Social Welfare League had had nothing to do with passage of the Southwick law in 1921. “Would Enforce Cigaret Law,” \textit{SLT}, Mar. 5, 1923 (14:5).

\textsuperscript{1555}“Ministerial Association for Independent Candidate,” \textit{SLT}, Oct. 31, 1922 (22:4).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

which is not supported by a strong public sentiment....” (The League knew how to put the issue of “enforcing rigidly all laws” to good anti-communist propagandistic effect: a few months later it sponsored a law enforcement week—focusing on the laws most frequently violated in Salt Lake County with the anti-cigarette law one of the top four—on the grounds that it rendered “a great service to the United State [sic] government by curbing “the threatening menace of bolshevism by showing respect for law and order....”)

A Mormon active in church work, Harries made a career in law enforcement from 1900 into the 1930s, having been a deputy sheriff, chief probation officer, and superintendent of a boys’ home before serving as Salt Lake County sheriff from 1923 to 1927. That Harries, a “staunch Democrat” (who had been defeated in the Democratic county convention), was running as an independent strongly supported by the Mormon church and the Ministerial Association, largely composed of Protestant Republicans, signaled to political forecasters on the eve of the election that the chief collateral damage of Harries’ campaign and victory might be inflicted on the head of the Republican ticket, its candidate for U.S. senator, Ernest Bamberger: not only would churches explain to their congregations why they should vote for Harries, but a thousand church workers would canvass virtually every voter in the county on his behalf, supplanting Republican efforts on Bamberger’s behalf.

Grant welcomed Bamberger’s defeat because, although as a Jew he satisfied the church president’s desideratum of a non-Mormon senator, Grant “detested” Bamberger, whom he viewed as an “unsavory machine politician” in the group in control of the state Republican Party. In the event, Bamberger (1877-1958), a mining engineer with degrees from Williams College and Columbia University, who was general manager of mining companies, president of utility companies, 1556 “Ban on Cigaret to Be Enforced,” SLT, Oct. 5, 1921, clipping in Selected Collections from the Archives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 2 (DVD 2002).

---

1558 “Death Claims Former S. L. County Sheriff,” SLT, Jan. 20, 1941 (11:3). Harries was a member of the high priests’ forum of Wells stake. In the 1930s he worked as an enforcement agent for the Utah liquor control commission. Id. See also “Harries Files in Race for Commissioner,” SLT, Oct. 3, 1939 (20:2); “Former Salt Lake County Sheriff Dies,” OS-E, Jan. 20, 1941 (8:3). At the outset of his career he was involved in trying to apprehend Butch Cassidy. “Butch Cassidy to Surrender,” DEN, June 29, 1900 (1:1-2).
1559 “Split Hurtful to Bamberger,” OS-E, Nov. 5, 1922 (10:3).
and regent of the University of Utah,\textsuperscript{1561} lost to the Mormon Democratic incumbent by 561 votes,\textsuperscript{1562} while Harries won a plurality (39.4 percent) over the Republican and Democratic candidates.\textsuperscript{1563}

About a week before he was due to be sworn in, 92 complainants—reportedly including Republicans, Democrats, Mormons, and non-Mormons—brought an action in state district court to enjoin Harries from taking office and for a temporary injunction to the same effect pending a hearing. The complaint alleged that a majority of Salt Lake County electors were members of the Mormon church, who “are taught to believe and do believe that the directions, orders and advice emanating from the head officer of said church...known as the president [i.e., Heber J. Grant]...is [sic] and shall be controlling, not only in spiritual matters, but with respect to temporal affairs, and that the requests and advice received from such authority is [sic] inspired and the word of God, and the members of said church have ever been, in the majority of instances, in the habit of obeying such requests and advice.” The pith of plaintiffs’ case was that the Mormon church through Grant, combining with and acting in concert with the Ministerial Association, had violated the Utah constitution (“There shall be no union of church and state, nor shall any church dominate the state or interfere with its functions”) by virtue of having “resolved and determined to procure the election of...Harries, and to do so by exercising the ecclesiastical authority” of the Mormon church and other religious bodies, to which end Grant “in writing and by speech directed and instructed the members of the...church (the...instructions being authoritative and purporting to be the inspired word of God) to cast their ballots for...Harries, regardless of their personal opinions because they were so advised by” Grant. Since the other ministers heading the other churches in the “combination” advised and directed their members to vote for Harries, “by reason of the undue influence...and against the will and personal opinion of the...electors..., a large number, to wit, a number sufficient to change the result of said election, were induced and compelled to vote for...Harries, which...votes would have been otherwise cast and would have prevented the election of...Harries had they been permitted to cast a free and untrammeled ballot in accordance with their own conscience and opinion.” The complainants therefore \textsuperscript{1561}Men of Affairs in the State of Utah: A Newspaper Reference Work (n.p.) (Press Club of Salt Lake 1914).

\textsuperscript{1563}Calculated according to data in “Sheriff Must Stand Trial in Ouster Action,” SLT, Mar. 25, 1923 (1:1 at 17:4).
concluded that on account of this “intimidation” the “election was not free and equal,” but rather the “result of undue influence and coercion and...wholly invalid.”

During January and February 1923, Harries’ aggressive enforcement of the cigarette sales ban—the complaint filed on January 16 was the first prosecution in more than a year—and hearings and submissions in the suit against him proceeded in tandem. (Two weeks after passage of the Southwick repeal bill in March the district court denied Harries’ demurrer to the amended complaint and ruled that he would have to stand trial, but he remained in office. Later that year the Utah Supreme Court denied Harries’ request for a writ prohibiting the judge from proceeding on the grounds that as an equity court it lacked jurisdiction to inquire into the validity of his election; although the court ruled that the judge did lack such jurisdiction, it held that the action could proceed as an election contest. In November 1926, less than two months before the end of Harries’ term, the Utah Supreme Court ruled that the lower court had erred in refusing to permit plaintiffs to amend their complaint and in dismissing their case, and remanded the case to district court, but also 1567Inter alia, the complainants were required to file an amended complaint offering greater specificity of charges, which alleged that Harries was a co-conspirator. “Sheriff Will Deny Charges,” SLT, Jan. 5, 1923 (22:2); “Demurrer Filed in Sheriff Case,” SLT, Jan. 6, 1923 (20:4); “Court Study in Harries Case,” SLT, Jan. 16, 1923 (16:3); “Court Rules for Sheriff Harries,” SLT, Jan. 21, 1923 (24:3); “Efforts Renewed to Oust Harries,” SLT, Jan. 24, 1923 (18:1-2); “Church Influence Denied by Harries,” OS-E, Feb. 4, 1923 (8:4); “Harries Counsel Moves to Strike Out Ouster Action,” SLT, Feb. 6, 1923 (7:3).

1568Sheriff Must Stand Trial in Ouster Action,” SLT, Mar. 25, 1923 (1:1).
1569Harries v McCrea, 62 Utah 348 (1923).
1570Ewing v Harries, 68 Utah 452 (1926). Without deciding the ultimate point in the case, the Utah Supreme Court made it clear that church officials had the same rights and privileges as other citizens and electors to reason with fellow citizens. Moreover, it asked how a court could prevent any number of electors, whether affiliated with a church or not, “from combining and uniting their efforts to bring about the election of a particular expressed great skepticism about its underpinnings. The case became moot both because Harries’ term was expiring and, running as a Democrat, he was overwhelmingly defeated by a Republican in his bid for reelection.1571

In the midst of this increasingly active implementation of, at least, the Southwick law’s central (sales) provision, the legislative landscape changed on Valentine’s Day, when a bill was introduced in the Senate, whose impact a two-column, front-page headline in the Deseret News judged to be: “Anti-Cigaret Law Threatened.”1572 Senate Bill No. 108 was introduced by 69-year-old Republican Henry N. Standish,1573 one of only three senators to have voted against Southwick’s bill in 1921, at which time he went on record on the Senate floor as “opposed now and forever to any such legislation. He said he had used tobacco all his life and he failed to see the harmful effects of it.”1574 Speaking immediately after and in response to Southwick’s lengthy recitation of the deleterious health effects of smoking, which he himself had invited Southwick to give for his enlightenment as a smoker, Standish, “not among the ‘kindergarten’ class” of the legislature, “wondered what kind of an old man he would be if he had not” been a lifelong tobacco user, “seeing that it must have had such an injurious effect on his system.” Having drunk heavily mineral-impregnated water from the hills of Bingham for 45 years, he conjectured that his by now “‘copper-lined’” stomach might be untouchable by the poisonous carbon monoxide that Southwick had mentioned. Doubtless more serious and relevant was that “‘most of the men’” in the locality he came from were smokers, which would have made him derelict in his duty if he failed to “‘recognize the fact that they do not want this bill. I am everlastingly and all the time opposed to any kind of a measure of this sort.’”1575
Although the Southwick law repealer had been anticipated for several days, a “visible flurry” nevertheless “passed through” the Senate chamber at the reading of the title of S.B. No. 108, which gave all prospect of reopening the intense debates of 1921 and becoming “the most animated battle of the session.” Standish’s bill repealed the 1921 law almost in its entirety, leaving, oddly, only the ban on smoking in enclosed public places intact (which may have been retained as a way of attracting the votes of legislators who would otherwise have opposed licensure). Otherwise quite similar to the 1921 Iowa repealer, the bill subjected cigarette sales to a licensure regime, the permits, costing $25 to $50 a year depending on city size, to be issued by city councils and county commissions on an optional basis, though these local governments were required to revoke the permit of any holder who violated any provision. Each cigarette was also to be taxed one mill (or two cents per package of 20), which Standish guesstimated would yield annual revenues of about $150,000 based on annual consumption of 150,000,000 cigarettes under the existing law, which outlawed their sale altogether. Places where cigarettes were sold illegally could be declared nuisances, which could be abated pursuant to the laws governing the sale of intoxicating liquor. Finally, the penalty for selling cigarettes to minors was set at $25 to $100 or a maximum 30-day jail sentence for a first offense and $100 to $500 and/or a one- to six-month sentence for additional convictions.

1576 Anti-Cigaret Law Threatened,” DN, Feb. 14, 1923 (1:1). The bill’s provisions are cited according to press reports because S.B. No. 108 is the session’s only Senate bill missing from the Utah State Archives collection.

1577 See above ch. 15.

1578 Anti-Cigaret Law Threatened,” DN, Feb. 14, 1923 (1:1); “Local Option on Cigaretts Urged,” SLT, Feb. 15, 1923 (8:7, 14:2); “Stormy Scenes Expected in Closing Rush of Legislature,” OS-E, Feb. 15, 1923 (2:1-2). According to another account, unnamed “proponents” of the bill believed that it would generate $300,000 in revenue, while reducing the price of a 10-cigarette package, which cost 11 cents “in any city on the coast,” but 20 cents in Utah. “Proposed New Cigaret Law Provides Special Stamp Tax and License Fees; $300,000 Annual Revenue Estimated,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 14, 1923 (Local page 1:5, 6:1). Standish’s estimate—the basis of which he did not disclose—sheds light on some important consumption phenomena. In 1923, national per capita annual consumption of manufactured cigarettes by all persons 18 and over amounted to 911. http://www.cdc.gov/tobacco/research_data/economics/consump1.htm (visited Nov. 22, 2006). The corresponding figure for Utah, based on Standish’s 150,000,000, was 561 or 61.6 percent of the national rate. U.S. Bureau of the Census, Historical Statistics of the United States, Colonial Times to 1970, Pt. 1, tab. A195-209, at 35 (Bicentennial ed. 1975) (Utah population data). Although Utah’s substantially lower level is thoroughly plausible, the situation becomes murkier when it is taken into account that 60 percent of the
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Despite indorsement by the Salt Lake Chamber of Commerce’s legislative committee and board of governors,1579 initial prospects for passage were poor. Three days after S.B. No. 108’s introduction, the Senate Public Affairs Committee, to which it had been referred, went into executive session after having granted a hearing to Standish, who agreed that a public hearing would be unnecessary. He sought to stress the bill’s merits, including retention of the public smoking ban and the optional nature of licensure, meaning that localities desiring to retain the existing sales prohibition could retain it. He also cited the experience of forerunner Iowa, where in the previous year $593,279.74 in cigarette tax revenue had been generated. After Standish had left the committee session, its chairman announced that its five members had unanimously decided to report it unfavorably. On reaching the full Senate, it was then referred to the bottom of the second reading calendar.1580

The bill’s negative treatment may not have expressed a substantive judgment: some senators, the Tribune reported, believed that the Southwick law would be repealed “sooner or later,” but did “not consider it an opportune time so late in the session, to permit the legislative machinery to become clogged with the discussion that will inevitably follow the serious consideration of such legislation.”1581 A very different take on the all-sidedly satisfactory stasis was offered by committee members, who wryly opined: “People who want cigarettes population was Mormon in 1920. Deseret News 1983 Church Almanac 272 (1983). Had no Mormons smoked (cigarettes), Utah adult non-Mormons’ per capita annual consumption would have been 1,403 or 54 percent higher than the national average. (To be sure, this figure is probably too high because Mormon families were larger and therefore non-Mormon adults presumably accounted for more than 40 percent of the adult population.) In the event, Standish’s estimate was itself too high: during the first full year that the cigarette tax was in effect (1923-24) 112,314,000 cigarettes were sold, which worked out to an average of 420 for the entire 18 and older population and 1,051 for the non-Mormon adults. “$112,313 Paid in Cigaret Taxes,” Daily Herald (Provo), May 13, 1924 (sect. 2, 1:5-8). (This figure may be too low since it did not reflect bootlegged cigarettes or cigarettes that consumers mail ordered from other states.) The non-Mormon figure was very close to the national average and would have been even closer if the presumably relatively small number of Mormon cigarette smokers were added to the denominator. In 1923-24 the cigarette tax revenue in Iowa amounted to $700,079 or about 6.2 times more than Utah’s, while Iowa’s population was about 5.2 times greater. See below ch. 19, tab. 7; U.S. Bureau of the Census, Historical Statistics of the United States, Colonial Times to 1970, Pt. 1, tab. A195-209, at 27, 35 (Bicentennial ed. 1975).

---

1579“So The People May Know,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 20, 1923 (1:3).
have them and people who want the anti-cigaret law have it.” How long that make-believe equilibrium would last was put into question a few days later, when the committee’s executive session rejection of the bill was bandied about as having “given rise to much of the agitation over the existing anticigaret law.”

In Provo, a center of Mormon anti-tobaccoism, the prevailing reaction to Standish’s initiative was that the Southwick law should be strengthened rather than weakened and that “a local option law would be worse of a joker than anything tried thus far.” The stake president of the Young Men’s Mutual Improvement Association argued that local control would be worse than the current unenforced law because boys would simply buy cigarettes in nearby towns that did not choose to retain prohibition—a conclusion that, to be sure, seemed overdrawn since that option was apparently available to them even under the Southwick regime.

Two-thirds of the way through February the repeal bill thus appeared to be virtually dead. Enter Sheriff Benjamin Harries: on February 20 he set in motion a train of events that swiftly put an end to Utah’s radical prohibitory experiment, contrary to the aforementioned expectations of the cigarette oligopoly, whose local tobacco trade informants had formed the judgment that the Mormon church’s control of the legislature rendered repeal efforts inopportune during the 1923 session.

That Tuesday, “[a]t the height of the daily noon-time rush, when every seat at every table was occupied by men of high standing in the community,” two of Harries’ deputies “pushed open the swinging doors” and entered the downtown Salt Lake City Vienna Cafe—“favorite eating place of men of wealth and prominence in the community. Bankers, merchants, publishers, mine operators, financiers and professional men crowded the restaurant—and walked about two-thirds of the length of the long room until they reached a table at which was seated none other than Ernest Bamberger, who was lunching with his 53-year-old...

---

1583 “Protest of Cigaret Law to Be Shown by Blowing of Whistles Today Noon,” SLT, Feb. 24, 1923 (1:6-7 at 7). In turn, rumors that committee members had been reminded of their (belowmentioned) alleged pledge not to repeal the Southwick law “proved to be the spark which finally burst into flame” after Sheriff Harries began enforcing it. Id.
1585 See above this ch.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

companion John C. Lynch, “capitalist,” general manager of the Salt Lake Ice Company, “wealthy mining man, banker and leading Republican politician of Salt Lake City,” both of whom were finishing off their meal by smoking cigars. 1587
The dragnet that was about to descend was deprived by just moments of considerable piquancy: Nebraska federal District Court Judge Joseph Woodrough “‘had scarcely passed through the door onto the street with a cigar in his mouth when the officers entered...’”1588 Displaying their badges, the deputies informed the two businessmen that they were under arrest (for violation of the statutory ban on smoking in an enclosed public place). While Deputy John Harris was left in charge of them, Deputy Michael (Mike) Mauss walked on toward the back of the cafe, where he discovered the 32-year-old department manager of the American Smelting and Mining Company, Edgar Newhouse, smoking a cigarette. Initially, Mauss believed that the latter’s lunch-mate, Le Roy Eccles of Ogden (scion of Utah’s richest family and one-time vice-president and general manager of the family-owned Amalgamated Sugar Company), was also smoking, but Eccles showed an unlighted cigarette, prompting Mauss to apologize for having suspected him, before informing Newhouse that he was under arrest but free to finish his meal if he had not yet done so. In the welter of the ensuing commotion a customer pointed out Ambrose N. McKay, the general manager of the anti-prohibitionist Salt Lake Tribune, who was about to leave after having paid the bill at the cigar counter, to Deputy Harris, asserting that he too was smoking, but the latter was too concerned about guarding Bamberger and Lynch to arrest McKay at that time. Because the deputies had neither driven a car to the cafe nor requested one after making the arrests, they “marched” the three in their custody in a kind of extended perp walk down Main Street to the county jail for booking, but because of an argument over the demand for $10 bail for their court appearance, they were then taken to the county attorney, who issued formal complaints (also against McKay to be served later that day). The three appeared before a judge, who released them on their own recognizance to appear in court the following morning. Amusingly, the arrestees insisted that McKay had also violated the law and that “the officers dare not take the newspaperman into 1588 Protest of Cigaret Law to Be Shown by Blowing of Whistles Today Noon,” SLT, Feb. 24, 1923 (1:6-7 at 7:2). This statement was made by Minnesota federal District Court Judge Page Morris three days later at a luncheon at the Exchange Club of Salt Lake City in the presence of Judge Woodrough (who died at age 104). Morris confessed that until recently he himself had violated the law every day since arriving in Salt Lake except when he smoked in his hotel room or in his court chambers at the federal building.

Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans custody”; they were to be summoned the next day as witnesses against him.\textsuperscript{1589}

Despite their admission that they had been smoking in the restaurant, Bamberger, Lynch, and Newhouse were nevertheless “indignant” at having been subjected by the law officers “to arrest and detention as they would [treat] any other criminal”—an indignation manifestly shared by the Los Angeles Times, whose front-page, top-of-the-fold subhead read: “Wealthy Smokers Are Arrested.”\textsuperscript{1590} Mauss and Harris denied not only trying to frame the four as “outstanding examples of flagrant anticigaret law violation,” but even knowing their prisoners’ identities until they arrived at the jail. Moreover, Mauss insisted that if they had identified themselves in the cafe and said that they would appear in court the next day, “we would have never taken them into custody.”\textsuperscript{1591} Thus, although the deputy purported to acknowledge the privileged criminal process status to which capitalists were entitled, it is unclear why their mere presence in the lofty Vienna Cafe would not have sufficed to convey the requisite socio-economic and political signifier to him.

Deputy Mauss (1871-1937), a Mormon who served as a ward bishop and high priest and stake high councilman,\textsuperscript{1592} may have been one of those few lucky mortals whose vocation and avocation coincided: in 1919 he had been on the three-member committee that drafted the constitution and by-laws of the No-Tobacco League of Utah,\textsuperscript{1593} whose vice-president and treasurer he then became\textsuperscript{1594} and whose short-lived periodical, The No-Tobacco News, he \textsuperscript{1589}“Deputies Arrest Citizens Smoking in Public Places,” SLT, Feb. 21, 1923 (22:6). The ages are taken from the 1920 population census. The 55-year-old McKay, a Canadian with a B.A. from the University of Toronto who had worked for other newspapers as a reporter, was a Presbyterian. Utah Since Statehood: Historical and Biographical 3:729 (1919).

\textsuperscript{1590}“Halt Crime in Utah!” LAT, Feb. 21, 1923 (1:8). While Bamberger and Lynch denied that they had intentionally violated the law, Newhouse “protested that [since] he was seated in a private booth he was under the impression that he was within the law by reason of the provision which legalizes smoking in rooms set aside for such purposes.”

\textsuperscript{1592}“Deputies Arrest Citizens Smoking in Public Places,” SLT, Feb. 21, 1923 (22:6-7).

\textsuperscript{1593}“Marshall Mauss Is Now a Bishop,” Salt Lake Telegram, Jan. 25, 1909 (1:5); http://www.findagrave.com/cgi-bin/fg-cgi?page=gr&GRid=127125 (visited July 18, 2011). Although his obituary stated that he had been in law enforcement his whole life and the 1910 census returned him as city marshal of Murray, the 1920 census returned him as a field man in a canning factory.

\textsuperscript{1594}“No-Tobacco League Is Organized by 17,” SLH, Aug. 29, 1919 (16:6).

published. In his capacity as a League officer he also traveled around the state as a speaker. Then in February 1921 he submitted a petition to the Utah House “favoring the Southwick bill, but claiming it is not a church measure.” (At the time of the arrests in 1923, the press referred to him indiscriminately as the League’s president and former president.)

The press was hardly alone in taking ersatz-umbrage at the dignitaries’ treatment: Assistant County Attorney George Cannon, Jr. not only “protested against alleged indignities” to which Mauss and Harris had subjected them, but told Chief Deputy Edward Doherty that the two deputies “should be reprimanded for taking the prisoners to the county jail to book them when, because of their prominence, it would have been more fitting and courteous to have conducted them to the committing magistrate, swore [sic] to the complaints there and fixed bail.” Doherty—without explaining how and why they had selected the where-the-elite-meet-to-eat Vienna Cafe—defended his deputies, who had merely “picked up the first three men we saw when we entered the cafe. ... Our deputies didn’t know Bamberger, Lynch and Newhouse from Jones, Smith or Brown. Any person who smokes in a cafe violates the law. All violators will be treated alike. This office will play no favorites. We shall continue arrests relentlessly.”

Sheriff Harries, too, indignantly rejected all claims that he was trying to make an example of these prominent Utahns:

“Any charges that this was a frame-up to bring this law more prominently before the public is bosh.... I have instructed my deputies to enforce this law while they are engaged in their other duties and it just happened that they dropped into the Vienna cafe and found these men smoking. Had there been other men in there smoking they would have arrested them too.

“This law is on the statute books and as long it remains there we are going to enforce 1596a No Tobacco’ Meeting at Sixth Ward Sunday,” OS-E, June 26, 1920 (8:3); “No-Tobacco League Speakers Here Sunday,” OS-E, July 16, 1920 (7:3).

---

1597 House Journal: Fourteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1921, at 223 (Feb. 9). Unfortunately, the petition is not preserved in the Utah State Archives.
1598“Harries’ Deputies Arrest Prominent Business Men,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 20, 1923 (1:4); “Smokers Arrested in Grill Room; Capitol Also Scene of Raid,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 21, 1923 (1:2, at 5:5); “More Utah Smokers Taken,” NYT, Feb. 22, 1923 (7). By mid-1922, Fred Bennett was the former president. “Passing Events,” IE 25(9): 854-58 at 858 (July 1922).
1599a Smokers Arrested in Grill Room; Capitol Also Scene of Raid,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 21, 1923 (1:2, at 5:5); “No Tobacco Is Slogan,” LAT, Feb. 22, 1923 (1:8).
Bizarrely, then, Harries, the hand-picked Mormon choice of the Mormon president, appeared to be virtually inviting anti-prohibitionists to avail themselves of his smoking busts to break the legislative log-jam over the Standish bill in order to secure repeal of the unpopular Southwick law. At the time, too, even though no plausible political logic for them was offered, “[s]tories persisted that the crusade was the result of a carefully laid plan to discredit the anticigarette law and force action on a repealer by the Legislature..., but these reports were vigorously denied by the County Attorney and Sheriff.” Admittedly, Grant and the Mormon hierarchy had a difficult decision to make—either acquiesce in the status quo with a much flouted law or seek to ratchet up enforcement with high-profile arrests at the risk of triggering a repeal backlash.

To be sure, Newhouse had not yet come to that realization; instead, as McKay’s newspaper reported, he denounced the “outrage” that the deputies had picked out one cafe for invasion without visiting the (Mormon church-owned) Hotel Utah and other dining places: “it is another attempt of Sheriff Harries to make a record for his office by sending his assinine [sic] deputies around to arrest smokers.” In fact, several hours after the Vienna raid Mauss and Harris arrested non-prominent bridge-builder Nels Carlson as he was lighting a cigarette in another cafe.

When they were arraigned the following day—The New York Times reported the arrests on page 2—before City Judge Noel Pratt the threesome waived a preliminary hearing and availed themselves of the prescribed period to plead two days later, while the separately represented McKay pleaded not guilty as did Carlson. In the meantime, Harries’ deputies were showing themselves to be 1600. “Deputies Arrest Citizens Smoking in Public Place,” SLT, Feb. 21, 1923 (22:6-7). The aforementioned visiting federal Judge Morris took the same stance: “‘rigid enforcement’ would work out best whether the law was repealed or not, but if the law was bad, such enforcement would lead to its repeal. “Protest of Cigaret Law to Be Shown by Blowing of Whistles Today Noon,” SLT, Feb. 24, 1923 (1:6-7 at 7:2).

---

1604. “Accused Violators of Public Smoking Statute Deny Guilt,” DN, Feb. 21, 1923 (1:3). When the accused appeared they declined to plead and the judge ordered pleas of equal opportunity enforcers as their raid of the Hotel Utah’s grill room that same day netted four more violators, paper company officers entertaining an out-of-state manager, while the State Capitol itself yielded five arrests. At the conclusion of their two-day campaign, Mauss and Harris estimated that their visits to almost a dozen restaurants and cafes had resulted in 11 arrests, though apparently none had been able to compensate Mauss for his let-down at the state house: “Commenting on his desire to catch one of the legislators in the act of violating the antismoking law, Deputy Mauss said he had even invaded the cafeteria at the state capitol in the hope of sighting some lawmaker indulging in a smoke. In this quest he was disappointed, and was forced to change his scene of operations to other parts of the building before making an arrest. To be sure, despite the fact that the latter raid was “spectacular,” involving a prominent American Legion member and “Utah’s worst-wounded World War veteran,” the “outcry against the forcible handling of Bamberger” and consorts prompted a change in tactics: the sheriff’s office had instructed the deputies not to “drag[ ] the offenders to a committing magistrate,” but merely to notify the violators that they were under arrest and to order them to make an appearance.

Neither the press nor owners explained either the basis of their indignation or why enforcement of a duly enacted state statute to protect non-smokers amounted to a “crusade against...smokers,” who needed “protect[ion]” so that they might “enjoy an after-dinner cigar or cigaret.” As a puzzled Milton Bennion of the Social Welfare League observed:
“It is a custom of long standing throughout the country to forbid smoking in certain inclosed places—dining cars, for instance. If public service corporations can make and enforce such rules in the interests of the non-smoking public, why such a commotion over a similar provision in the Utah law? Does not the person who is nauseated by inhaling second-hand tobacco smoke have any rights? If the smoker is to be so insistent on his inalienable rights to smoke where and when he pleases, may he not with equal force contend for like liberty to spit on the sidewalk in defiance of the law?”

Ironically, the very same day that Mauss nabbed the capitalist smokers, across the country in distinctly non-Mormon New York City Harlem Court Magistrate Charles E. Simms fined 16 men $5 each for having smoked in the 125th Street Station of the Lexington Avenue subway. The aroused judge’s firmness by far exceeded the Salt Lake sheriff’s: “‘Conditions at this subway station have grown simply terrible.... They have become so bad in the last few months that men even light their cigars, cigarettes and pipes in the vestibules of the cars. I am going to do everything I can to stamp out this nuisance, and any subway smoker who comes before me may expect to get the limit.’”

The day after the initial Salt Lake arrests owners of Southwick-covered enclosed public places, in response to “the two days’ crusade of deputy sheriffs against Salt Lake smokers,” began trying to subvert enforcement by posting signs such as, “‘This is a public smoking room, so far as Sheriff Harries is concerned.’” Chief among these proprietors was George Morgan of the Vienna Cafe itself, whose sign read: “Vienna Cafe: Public Smoking Room.” Even he was dubious about the law-conformity of his own ploy: “Although not certain that he could include so much territory in his pronouncement, Mr. Morgan virtually included his entire establishment within the protected [i.e. for smokers] area by erecting a notice which announces in very black block letters, ‘Vienna Cafe Public Smoking Room.’ The restaurant man said he was accepting the advice of City Attorney William H. Folland that such was the best course to pursue in view of the hectic occurrence Tuesday.” In relation to a statute that clearly stated that it “shall be a misdemeanor for any person to smoke cigars, cigarettes or tobacco in any enclosed public place [including “dining rooms in hotels, restaurants, cafes and cafeterias”] within the state of Utah, except in extra rooms...specially provided for smoking purposes” Morgan’s assertion that simply by posting a sign that the cafe was “open to the public for smoking purposes” he had “changed the status of his restaurant” was on its face so preposterous that it is difficult to imagine the legal reasoning that might have prompted a city attorney to express approval of such a manifestly non-conforming practice as a “bona fide attempt to circumvent the provisions of the two-year-old anti-smoking law by placing the room or store in the category of a place set apart where smokers may be immune from the clutches of the law”—when in fact they were not being “set apart” from non-smokers in “extra rooms.” To be sure, with breathtaking celerity this interpretive overreaching would become self-fulfilling: just two weeks later the legislature would gut this section of the Southwick law by adding the exception that “the owner or proprietor of any hotel dining room, restaurant, cafe or cafeteria may designate the same as a public smoking room by a conspicuous sign at or near the entrance.”

---

1610 Subway Smokers Fined; Violations Arouse Court,” NYT, Feb. 20, 1923 (20).

1612 1921 Utah Laws ch. 145 § 4, at 390, 391 (italics added).

Sheriff Harries appeared not in the least perturbed by these verbal shenanigans: again intimating that his enforcement policy might be aimed at ridding Utah of the law altogether, he stressed that “the war on those who violate the state law has scarcely started. If it fails to bring about a repeal or amendment of the law at the present session of the legislature the fight will go right on until the next session is held, and then go on another two years if smoking in public is a crime at that time....” His chief deputy, Edward H. Doherty, was even blunter. Charging that dealers who were “reaping a harvest of anywhere from 50 to 80 per cent from the [illegal] sale of cigarettes...do not want this law repealed. They accused us of picking on foreigners for the enforcement of this law, so now we will show them that we can also pick up some of those who can, or would if they cared to help to bring about the repeal of this law if it is an unpopular one. This fight is going to go right on for the next four years if the present law remains on the statute books that long.” Doherty, who did not explain why the sheriff’s office was permitting this lucrative illegal trade to continue, was apparently referring to the Greek, Italian, Croatian, Mexican, and other sellers born outside the United States who had been arrested in February in the aforementioned raids, although why their U.S.-born competitors would have complained about their arrests is unclear, especially since some of the latter were also arrested. In

---

1613["Smokers’ Raids Called Small Town Practice," OS-E, Feb. 22, 1923 (1:4).]
1614["Signs Warn Salt Lake’s Smokers,” SLT, Feb. 22, 1923 (20:1-2).]
1615[1923 Utah Laws ch. 52 § 4, at 110, 114.]
1616["Signs Warn Salt Lake’s Smokers,” SLT, Feb. 22, 1923 (20:1-2).]
1617[The nationalities of several arrestees’ listed in the aforementioned newspaper articles were identified in 1920 Census of Population; several others with names suggesting Latin or eastern European origins were absent from that census.]
any event, the chief deputy’s hardly veiled reference to the prominent Utahns arrested for smoking—The New York Times, which was following events closely and pouring generous doses of editorial sarcasm on Utah’s entry on to “the path of perfection,” noted that the law, whose “terrors are falling on its violators,” was being enforced “partially”—suggested, once again, the possibility that Harries’ strategy was, oddly, contrary to his Mormon benefactors’ prohibitionist goal, geared toward repeal.

At this juncture in the coalescing of business opposition to the Southwick act the chief Mormon daily took stock of its tenability and concluded not only that in principle it “should be as sacred” to Utahns and thus as “strictly obeyed” as any other state statute, but that in fact there could be “little, if any, doubt that a majority” of Utahns “favor regulation by law of certain phases of smoking.” Indeed, the newspaper’s overoptimism pushed it into making the non-self-fulfilling prophecy that it was doubtful, if given the chance “freely and sincerely to express themselves,” that Utahns “will ever permit the law to be repealed.” And while the editorialist paid lip service to opponents’ right to make their views known, especially during the legislative session, it urged that “[a]ny effort at compulsion or duress should be strongly resisted by the people themselves” and by legislators without in any way identifying that objectionable politicking.

The defense of the Southwick law by the Deseret News focused on public health to the total exclusion of moral considerations while minimizing (the impact on) male smokers’ rights:

Men who want to smoke may do so. Men and women who wish to avoid the contamination of the smoke should be permitted, and have the right to be able to do so. Under the law restaurant keepers can arrange to permit smoking in their places of business if they so desire. Those who wish to keep away from tobacco smoke need not and doubtless will not patronize their places of business.

To many people tobacco smoke is not only offensive but absolutely injurious; particularly it is distasteful to them when it contaminates their food. Smokers have no more right to infringe upon the rights of others in this regard than they would have of disturbing the peace or molesting the property of their neighbors in other directions. Men who smoke are accustomed to regulation, in railroad cars and theatres, for example. In such places they do not hesitate to comply with the requirement that if they want to smoke they must go to the special compartment designed for this purpose. ... The smoker’s personal rights are not taken from him. He may smoke in his home, on the street, in his office—almost any place, in fact, except those enclosed places into which the public comes 1618*Utah Lawbreakers,* NYT, Feb. 23, 1923 (12) (edit.).

---

1619*Smoking and the Law,* DN, Feb. 23, 1923 (4:1) (edit.). and where health, sanitation and the general welfare demand that the air be not defiled.\footnote{1620}

Astonishingly, after the smoking ban had been in force for almost two years and despite the intense and roiling public debate over it, the Mormon editorialist appeared confused about its scope. In stating that restaurant owners retained the right to permit smoking and that secondhand smoke non-enthusiasts could simply (continue to) avoid such places, the newspaper implied that the law had changed nothing, whereas in reality smoking was permissible only in special extra rooms. (The innovation by the Hotel Utah—owned by the Mormon church\footnote{1621} and the intermountain region’s leading hotel\footnote{1622}—initiated within three days of the first arrests, of maintaining two dining rooms, a smoking room on the main floor and a no-smoking room on the mezzanine, would have been compliant if the former rather than the latter had been the extra room,\footnote{1623} but in fact, as the Telegram precisely expressed it, “Hotel Offers Non-Smokers Private Room.”\footnote{1624} If, in contrast, the Deseret News was subtly intimating that the law was feckless because smoke drifted from those extra smoking-dedicated rooms into the main, non-smoking dining areas, which would thus not be smokefree, then the ban was a hoax and smokers would have had little reason to protest. However, this second interpretation appears implausible because the paper had already made the analogy to railroad smoking compartments without hinting that secondhand smoke foes had reacted defeatistically and simply stopped traveling by railroad.

If a top-down repeal movement was the sheriff’s objective, then Salt Lake City’s businessmen were rushing toward its achievement. By the second day after the initial wave of public smoking arrests—“all Republicans, by some curious coincidence”\footnote{1625}—about a hundred local businessmen (including Newhouse) met at the Chamber of Commerce and appointed a 15-member committee to appear before the legislature the next day “to provide other means of interesting the public in opposition to the anti-cigaret law and what was designated as ‘other freak legislation.’”\footnote{1626} The Chamber’s interest derived at least in part from its and

\footnotesize{\begin{itemize}
\item 1620 “Smoking and the Law,” DN, Feb. 23, 1923 (4:1) (edit.).
\item 1621 John Gunther, Inside U.S.A. 190 (1947).
\item 1622 “Salt Lake Fights Anti-Cigarette Law,” NYT, Mar. 4, 1923 (XX2).
\item 1623 “Crime Lull in Utah?” LAT, Feb. 24, 1923 (1:1, at 2:4). That profit trumped religious dogma was not unprecedented: the Hotel Utah had also served alcohol before Prohibition. Email from Prof. Thomas Alexander to Marc Linder (Aug. 21, 2011).
\item 1624 “Hotel Offers Non-Smokers Private Room,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 23, 1923 (Local page, 1:6).
\item 1625 “Salt Lake Almost Pure,” LAT, Feb. 28, 1923 (sect. 2, at 10).
\item 1626 “Business Men Urge Repeal Cigaret Law,” DN, Feb. 22, 1923 (1:5). The chairman allied groups’ recent expenditure of $50,000 on advertising in eastern states designed to attract more summer tourist business, the achievement of which, the Chamber was concerned, might be jeopardized by news of the antismoking raids. This concern was heightened the next day when the Transcontinental Freight Bureau and the International Rate Association made it clear that they would refuse to hold their scheduled convention in Salt Lake on April 1 “unless assured that the delegates will not be subjected to arrest.” (In contrast, the Lions Club’s animus purported to be more straightforwardly ideological as it debated a resolution to “oppose all legislation intended to ‘reform humanity’...”).
\end{itemize}}

After meeting with Senator Standish, the committee (including Newhouse) also “held informal conferences” with other House and Senate members in order to obtain a “census” of those who might favor or oppose the Southwick law. What that count revealed is unknown, but S.B. No. 108 was in enough trouble that its adherents, fearing its defeat in the Senate, tried to secure its introduction in the House, where, however, unanimous consent to do so was denied by two Nays and a motion to suspend the rules (to permit its introduction without unanimous consent) was easily defeated. Despite this further setback, what the press now dubbed the “nonpartisan and nonsectarian” “Antifreak Law League” was revving up its businessmen’s propaganda machine—insisting that the anti-1627 “No Tobacco Is Slogan,” LAT, Feb. 22, 1923 (1:8). Without any evidence, “So the People May Know,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 20, 1923 (1:3), asserted that “our broad minded people,” in contributing to this fund, “expected that new legislators, representatives of the broader thought of Utah, would repeal this disgraceful lie” (i.e., the Southwick law).

---

1630 “Business Men Call on State Solons to Kill Cigaret Law,” DN, Feb. 23, 1923 (sect. 2, 1:4). The aforementioned Freed was assigned to sound out the governor on the Standish bill. According to “Protest of Cigaret Law to Be Shown by Blowing of Whistles Today Noon,” SLT, Feb. 24, 1923 (1:6-7), the committee was unable to meet with Standish.

1631 “Attempt to Kill Cigaret Law Blocked,” DN, Feb. 23, 1923 (1:7). These proceedings are not reflected in the House Journal.
cigarette law was “making Utah a joke to the rest of the country”—on behalf of a mass meeting on Saturday afternoon, February 24 at the Orpheum theater.\footnote{Antifreak Law League Launched; Legislators Deny Smoke Pledge,” \textit{SLT}, Feb. 23, 1923 (22:2-3).}

The holding of this meeting left Frederick Loofbourrow, who, as chairman of the Salt Lake County Republican committee and campaign manager during the recent election, was alleged to have made a secret pledge that the county “delegation would not tamper with the anti-cigarette law if elected,”\footnote{Antifreak Law League Launched; Legislators Deny Smoke Pledge,” \textit{SLT}, Feb. 23, 1923 (22:2-3).} in disbelief and resenting the businessmen’s lack of gratitude for the “‘proper spirit and purpose’” demonstrated by the “‘safe and sane’” legislators who thus far during the session had taken such pro-business action as defeating monopolistic insurance and added taxation and not proposing any sumptuary or income tax laws. The 1896 U.C. Berkeley law graduate, former state district judge, and future congressman lost his patience: “‘What more do the business interests of this state demand? Why hire a theater in order to blacken the reputation and standing of your fellow townspeople...?’”\footnote{“Protest of Cigaret Law to Be Shown by Blowing of Whistles Today Noon,” \textit{SLT}, Feb. 24, 1923 (1:6-7 at 9:3). For the biographical information, see http://bioguide.congress.gov/scripts/biodisplay.pl?index=L000435.}

The more than half-page paid advertisement that appeared in the \textit{Salt Lake Tribune}—which was both reporting in great detail on and cheerleading the repeal campaign—on the morning of the meeting left no doubt that businessmen were in control: “We are all stockholders in the Commonwealth of Utah and we all expect dividends from our investments and our efforts. We are entitled to legislative action that will not only protect our interests, but enhance their value, and when a legislature enacts a law like our Cigaret Law, that will provoke, however facetiously, an assumption that Utah is without the pale of the United States and itself a stench in the nostrils of the free peoples of America, it is time the free people of Utah act together in an effort to remove this impression.” Bizarrely, in unoverlookable contradiction of the movement’s underlying animus, the anti-freak law executive committee’s concluding line claimed: “We do not oppose the enforcement of any law on the Statute Books of the State of Utah.”\footnote{“Why Don’t You Move to America?” \textit{SLT}, Feb. 24, 1923 (7:4-7).}
The Tribune also editorially set the tone for the meeting by conjuring up a nightmarish Zion—that legislators “surrounded...with barb-wire entanglements of freak legislation”—in which “peace officers patrol the lobbies of our hotels for unsuspecting tourists and reckless business men” and from which Utahns “exclude fumigating desperadoes of commerce and travel who insist upon spending their smoke-tainted money in our stores, hotels and restaurants...”

At the meeting, whose more than standing-room-only attendance of more than 4,000 made for front-page headlines, speakers assailed the law for having “made criminals out of our most splendid citizens” and took issue with the claim (of the Deseret News) that tobacco smoke contaminated food or that “smoking in dining rooms was objectionable to many people.” Availing himself of a rhetorical tactic of which pro-tobacco forces are still enamored, Herbert R. MacMillan (a well-known lawyer and former president of the Utah State Bar Association) irrelevantly pontificated that: “Corn beef and cabbage...is obnoxious to some people, and they do not like to have it served at an adjoining table, but their objection would be a weak basis upon which to construct a law prohibiting the serving of such food.” In the end, the meeting decided to change the organization’s name from Liberty League of Utah to Party of Freedom, whose purposes were to “promote...the highest ideals of American citizenship, fair play, personal liberty, unrestrained [sic] government, to combat all freak legislation,” of which, according to the supporting resolution, the Southwick law, “deemed by a large and respectable portion of the citizens of...Utah to be an unjust and unwarranted curtailment of the rights and liberties of the people,” was the prime example, because: “Large sums of money have been raised and efforts expended to advertise to the entire nation the state of Utah, its scenery, its resources and its attractive possibilities, endeavoring to create a favorable impression abroad and to attract new people and new capital[, whereas, the effects of such advertising are nullified by the continuance of and enforcement of such legislation as the Southwick anti-tobacco law making the state of Utah an object of ridicule among the people of our sister states.”
The day after the mass meeting the Salt Lake Tribune seamlessly picked up editorially where its biased reporting had left off. In concentrated form its position expressed the either ignorant or make-believe view that behind Southwick-type state intervention stood nothing but moralistic “superannuated puritanism” bereft of even the slightest whiff of public health logic and intruding into harmonious social life in a nation in which no sane adult male had ever contested the monopolization of public breathing space by smokers:

Deputies have invaded restaurants and hotels where...customers have smoked from time immemorial; inoffensive, upright citizens have been apparently singled out for the obvious purpose of making examples of them in order to intimidate others and cause the iron hand of intolerance to be felt in the community.

These smokers were annoying no one, nor had anyone present made complaint; the cigars had not made them sick, nor hilarious, nor belligerent in conduct nor in speech; there were no ladies present and no known reason for laws or officers to interfere with the harmless enjoyment of an after-dinner smoke in a peaceful gathering of mutual friends and acquaintances.

After disregarding the facts that Utah legislators had debated the public health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure at length in 1921, that the law did not place the burden of enforcement on private complainants, and that, although at least the public smoking ban may not have been enforced in 1921 or 1922, Sheriff Harries had put Salt Lakers on notice seven weeks earlier that he would enforce it, the Tribune went on to castigate both owners who dignified the law by simulating compliance with it and anti-smoking customers who insisted on foisting cleaner indoor air on smokers despite the existence of pre-Southwick smoke-free restaurants thanks to market demand or owners’ proprietary preferences:

Placards are being displayed notifying smokers that they may continue to smoke in rooms where they always have smoked, at tables where they have been arrested for smoking, provided some separate nook, corner, room or alcove is indicated where smoking is not Meeting,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 25, 1923 (1:1, 4:2), reported the speech by the meeting chairman, which was overtaken by events, denying reports that the committee calling the meeting intended to form a new political party; rather, stated Lester Freed, “it was purely a meeting of liberal minds...looking to the correction of a condition that had become unbearable.” On MacMillan, see History of the Bench and Bar of Utah 171 (1913).

---

permitted.

This is nothing but a subterfuge. It has always been possible for diners to whom smoking was objectionable to patronize places where signs forbade indulgence in the weed. They did not have to go to restaurants where practically everybody enjoyed smoking after meals.

In contrast, the Telegram, which was, arguably, even more hostile to regulation, focused its attack on the moral dimension. Because Standish had retained Southwick’s partial public smoking ban, the newspaper’s prominent front-page editorial (bearing the page’s only headline in large, thick, upper-case, bolded letters) concluded that both act and bill “protect[ ] the nonsmoker against what he may deem an infringement of his rights. The nonsmoker is not injured by the sale of cigarettes when they are not smoked in his presence.” To be sure, since most (even enclosed) public places were not covered, this latter claim was hardly robust, but since it applied to both Southwick and Standish equally, it could withstand scrutiny. Where it broke down was in its neglect of the impact that the lawful sale of cigarettes had both on their perceived normality and on their attractiveness to children. The Telegram sought to minimize this difference by asserting that the Southwick law (like Standish’s bill) imposed “no legal restraint over the purchase of cigarettes” because it “casts no reflection on the man who buys his smoking materials in another state.” But this argument overlooked three important differences: (1) the diminished spontaneity associated with being forced to place mail orders—rather than being intrusively reminded of cigarettes’ availability on every commercial district street—presumptively reduced consumers’ purchases and use; (2) the prohibition of in-state sales and the compulsion to order from other states, again, interfered with children’s perception of cigarettes as a normal commodity; and (3) but for the constitutional constraints of the interstate commerce clause, anti-cigarette militants would have banned imports for personal consumption as well. The editorial then unjustifiably concluded that: “In a moral way the Southwick law has no advantage over” the Standish bill because “[n]either one prohibits or discourages smoking; neither one encourages it.” Rather, in deciding whether to amend the existing law, legislators “face two identical propositions, with the one exception that the one provides a revenue of $300,000 a year while the other does not.” This claim was irrevocably undermined both by the Telegram’s suppression of the crucial fact that the Southwick law prohibited cigarette advertising and by the pretense that those liberty-loving smokers who were allegedly driven by respect for the law would have welcomed strict enforcement of the law because it was the ‘hypocrisy’ of unenforced prohibition that disturbed them beyond the substance of the sales and public smoking bans themselves. Yet their reaction to Harries’ raids demonstrated beyond doubt that it was that pretense that was hypocritical.

---

1642SLT, Feb. 25, 1923 (edit. sect. 2, 2:1).

1644SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:2-3 at 3).

The real point of contention between the anti-cigarette sales movement and cigarette smokers emerged in a comment made a few days later by Milton Bennion of the Social Welfare League explaining his allies’ support for the Southwick law as rooted in their thinking, “‘whether correctly or not, that with the local sale of cigarettes forbidden it would be easier to prevent sale [sic] to minors.’” This sales focus was even more derivative because advocates, who had acted on legal advice that prohibiting cigarette advertising while permitting cigarette sales would have been unconstitutional, regarded “‘alluring cigaret billboard advertisements...as a menace to youth and a hindrance to the enforcement of the law which forbids the use of tobacco to minors. ... This was at least one reason why they adhered to the clause prohibiting sale.’” In light of the several logical and socio-psychological steps separating the total ban on in-state cigarette sales and the basis for it that Bennion conceded, he and his comrades would have had a difficult argument to fashion to persuade adults that they should sacrifice their freedom to buy cigarettes whenever and wherever they pleased solely in order to shore up the constitutional basis for prohibiting billboard ads that might tempt children to start smoking. But since they never undertook to construct and debate such reasoning with adult smokers in 1923 (or 1921 for that matter), it is easier to understand why they may have been willing to accept a compromise amended law that jettisoned the sales prohibition but retained (and expanded) the advertising ban in the hopes that somehow the latter would be judicially upheld even in the absence of the former (as in fact it was). To be sure, the reverse hope may well have motivated some pro-tobacco forces to acquiesce in the compromise.

---

1646“So the People May Know,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 25, 1923 (1:3-5).
1648In 1921, for example, the editor of the B.Y.U. student newspaper stated at the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the Southwick bill that “[p]ersonal rights...ought to be sacrificed to protect the young people of Utah”; a ban on cigarette ads would, moreover, put an end to the growth of smoking. “Fistic Encounter over Cigaret Measure Marks Bitter Capitol Dispute,” SLT, Feb. 2, 1921 (10:2-3).

John Lynch, Bamberger’s Vienna Cafe lunch-mate, did not attend the Orpheum meeting, but did hold strong capitalist-class opinions about what had led up to and should flow from it, which he shared with the L.A. Times a few days later on his arrival in Los Angeles for his annual winter vacation (and not, he insisted, as a refugee from the due process of law):

“The trouble with Utah is one man holds too much power there. Heber J. Grant of the Mormon Church is heeded in his command by too many people. ... It was his influence that defeated the Republican party last fall, even against the best efforts of Senator Smoot to elect Ernest Bamberger to the Senate.

But there are a lot of good people in Utah and many young Mormons are quite as zealous for an anti-church party as the so-called Gentiles. They were calling me up repeatedly on the telephone urging such an organization, and many appeared at the preliminary non-church meeting at Salt Lake City, recently. ... The initial meeting was all that could be asked as a protest against freak legislation for the State.

While a third party may be the only solution, many of my class deplore this constant turmoil that an anti-church fight creates. It does not help the business of the State. At the same time, we recognize how ridiculous it is for strangers to be arrested, as they may be while standing in the pavilion at Saltair, innocently smoking while looking over the scenic beauty of America’s dead sea. The anti-smoking law is not right and should be repealed.”

Despite the mass meeting in Salt Lake City, “no concerted opposition” was reported in Utah’s smaller cities. In fact, in the provinces “[a]ntitobacco crusades promising a temporary rigid enforcement” of the Southwick law had sprung up. For example, city commissioners in Logan decided to enforce all of its provisions, preliminarily ordering the police to notify all dealers that cigarette 1649 “Grant Is Wavering,” LAT, Mar. 1, 1923 (1:5, 2:4). Prof. Thomas Alexander, a leading Mormon historian, when asked about Lynch’s criticism of Grant, expressed the belief that most businessmen in Utah did not feel that way about Grant—who was a businessman himself before and during his presidency—whose attitudes generally coincided with the business community’s. Email from Tom Alexander to Marc Linder (July 21, 2011). Lynch’s remarks may in part have been dictated by the needs of the aforementioned legal action to unseat Sheriff Harries on the grounds of the Mormon church’s and Grant’s undue influence over Mormon voters, which, as Lynch mentioned in the interview, would form one of the bases of his defense against prosecution for smoking.

---

sales had to stop; once they, in turn, passed this word on to their customers, their stocks were quickly depleted.\textsuperscript{1650} The intense focus of public controversy surrounding the Southwick law may have turned to its smoking ban—after a two-day hiatus in arrests in Salt Lake City the slack was taken up in Provo, where an 18 year-old in a restaurant became that city’s first\textsuperscript{1651}—but purchasing cigarettes in the state capital had also become “increasingly difficult.”\textsuperscript{1652}

By the last days of February, the “fight between pro and anti tobacco forces in the Utah...ha[d] developed into the bitterest political controversy of the decade...”\textsuperscript{1653} As the end of the legislative session loomed, the executive committee of the newly organized Party of Freedom—which “rose like the fabled Phoenix from the ashes of forbidden cigarettes smoked in Salt Lake City” and was “accepted by some as an indication of a renewal of the bitter controversy

\textsuperscript{1650}“Utah Smokers Feel Pinch of Southwick Law,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 27, 1923
(Local page 1:7).

\textsuperscript{1651}“First Cigaret Smoker Arrested in Provo,” Daily Herald (Provo), Feb. 25, 1923
(1:6-7).

\textsuperscript{1652}“To Protest Cigarette Law,” NYT, Feb. 24, 1923 (6). Despite the nationally decline vitality of statewide tobacco-related bans, at exactly the same time such measures were introduced in several legislatures. A bill prohibiting the manufacture and sale of cigarettes in the Texas House of Representatives was almost immediately killed in committee before ever reaching the floor. “Fine for Manufacture or Sale of Cigarettes Proposed in House Bill,” GDN, Feb. 25, 1923 (6:2); “Where Texas Should Not Imitate,” San Antonio Evening News, Feb. 28, 1923 (4:1) (edit.). Four bills to prohibit advertising cigarettes or tobacco for smoking or chewing, sale or smoking of cigarettes, and smoking in public eating places were indefinitely postponed when the Indiana House adopted committee reports to that effect. Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Indiana During the Seventy-Third Session of the General Assembly...1923: Regular Session, 41, 44, 70, 124, 318, 441, 532 (Jan. 11, 17, 24, Feb. 9, 16, 21) (1923) (H.B. No.
48, 62, 208, 469, by Peterson, Shall, Peterson, and Brown); “State Senate Now Finished with Budget,” Kokomo Daily Tribune, Feb. 21, 1923 (1:2). A bill to prohibit selling or smoking of cigarettes or possession of the makings was killed in the Washington House.
Chehalis Bee-Nugget, Feb. 23, 1923 (4:2) (untitled edit.); “Anti-Tobacco Bills Fail in Washington,” USTJ 99(10):7 (Mar. 10, 1923). The Vermont Senate killed a bill to prohibit cigarette sales. Id. Ohio House Bill 257 to protect the children by prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and use of cigarettes and cigarette papers (and imposing a $10-$20 fine) did not make it out of committee. Journal of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-Fifth General Assembly of the State of Ohio: Regular Session...1923, at 195, 215 (Feb. 6, 7) (by John T. Brown) (vol. 110, 1923); “Cuyahoga-Co to Force Minimum Wage Bill

\textsuperscript{1653}“Cigaret Bill Fight to Shift to Legislature,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 26, 1923
(Local page 1:6).
waged for years between the old American party and the [Mormon] church"—urgently convened in order to press for passage of the Standish repeal bill, which the new group had indorsed. And the Salt Lake Tribune was doing its utmost to enhance the chance for last-minute action in the legislature by publishing long articles detailing the humiliating ridicule that was being lavishly heaped upon the anti-cigarette and anti-smoking law and, therefore, upon Utah as well, throughout the United States. In addition to reprinting a potpourri of editorials from big-city dailies, it devoted a front-page article to a remarkable meeting at the Boston Forum, where “eminent clergymen, prominent physicians and attorneys scathingly flayed the attempts to send Lady Nicotine across the river Styx” and denounced “the war being waged against tobacco users” in Utah (and other states) as “undemocratic, unconstitutional and ridiculous....” A certain Dr. J. R. McCarthy produced the high point of the Sunday afternoon’s apologia for laissez-faire smoking by asserting that “90 per cent of the skilled surgeons of the country are heavy smokers, in some cases even during delicate operations....” Smoking “considerably” himself, McCarthy so strongly felt and knew that he had that right—just as Utahns did to bathe in the Atlantic Ocean—that he transcontinentally declared his intention to violate the law should he ever travel to Utah.

Curiously, four days later, as the Southwick repeal bill was finally proceeding through the legislature, when the Tribune resumed its review of the out-of-state press reaction to the Utah anti-smoking law, it included editorials from New York City newspapers demonstrating that public places had been and continued to be contested space between smokers and nonsmokers. While the Tribune was 1654 “Salt Lake Fights Anti-Cigarette Law,” NYT, Mar. 4, 1923 (XX2). Inasmuch as the organization began to succeed within several days of its founding, it is difficult to credit the report that “despairing of positive action by the present Legislature, [it] was perfecting plans for a State-wide organization to obtain the election two years hence of members of the Legislature pledged to repeal the Southwick anti-cigarette law....” “Ask Lighter Tobacco Ban,” LAT, Mar. 2, 1923 (1:3-4). Party formation pursued larger objectives: Ernest Bamberger and the group controlling the Utah Republican Party promoted the Party of Freedom, which was eventually given the name of the old anti-Mormon American Party, but it was killed after its decisive defeat in the Salt Lake City Commission elections later in the year. Thomas Alexander, Mormonism in Transition: A History of the Latter-Day Saints, 1890-1930, at 56 (1996).

---

constrained to concede that the “arrest of smokers in public places is not a new undertaking,” the Ogden Standard-Examiner added that some editorial writers had “discover[ed] some small degree of merit in the effort to curb smokers.” For example, the New York Sun pointed out that while many in the East might find the Salt Lake City arrests “a strange invasion of personal liberty,” just the previous day

a dozen men were fined for smoking in a New York subway station and might have been likewise punished for smoking in an elevated train or street car. The Utah law is an extension of these regulations to other public places.... It apparently is based on similar grounds—the discomfort caused to non-smokers when forced to go about in public rooms filled with tobacco fumes.

Smoking in public places, indoors or out, has not always been considered proper. In former days fastidious gentlemen did not smoke in the streets or even in their own dining rooms.

To be sure, the Sun observed that it would no longer be easy to find a tobacco smoke-free restaurant in central parts of New York City or any other large U.S. or European city, but understood that it was “[p]robably...the tendency to smoke everywhere and at any time, a comparatively recent one, that brought about Utah’s strict legislation.” Nevertheless, the newspaper objected to Utah’s “opposite extreme” of protecting non-smokers from discomfort as “unfair to the smoker” in places like restaurants, whereas elsewhere the practice had “safely been left to custom”—without explaining how indiscriminate smoking was safe for the discomforted.

The New York Mail modified and corrected the Sun’s account to the extent of mentioning that in fact some restaurants in New York allowed smoking in their public rooms, while other restaurants and hotels did not allow smoking in some dining rooms and in others did: “There have been arrests in New York for...a breach of the peace which followed in restaurants when the waiters tried to make the smoker desist.” Nevertheless, this paper, too, saw no need for a law: sounding 1658a “Arrests of Smokers Awaken Press Comment of Eastern Papers on Utah,” SLT, Mar. 2, 1923 (14:3-5 at 3).

---

like cigarette manufacturers later in the century, it deemed “[o]rdinary courtesy” and regard for others’ claims adequate to confine smoking to places especially set apart for it.1662

Evisceration with Mormon Church Connivance (1923)

If there is any one rule of the [California] assembly that...is “cussed and discussed” more than any other, it is Rule 71, forbidding smoking while sessions are on. When the afternoon session started yesterday somebody moved to suspend the rule, and it was so ordered. Pretty soon it appeared that Governor Mabey of Utah was to be the guest of the assembly.

“Mr. Speaker,” said Miss Broughton, “inasmuch as they have a law against smoking in Utah, it seems to me it would be courteous to Governor Mabey if we suspended the suspension of Rule 71, while he is in the chamber.”

“But Mr. Speaker,” said Frank Eksward, “that law has been repealed, at least in part, so I don’t believe we need stop smoking for the Governor.”

“Mr. Eksward,” rejoined Speaker Merriam, “the repeal of the Utah law is not effective until May, so I think we might dispense with the smoking while the Governor is with us.”

It was so ordered, the windows were opened, and the atmosphere was clear when the Governor arrived.1663

Despite these multifarious nationwide expressions of solidarity with Utah’s smokers, S.B. No. 108 “appeared to be in danger” during the morning of February 27, when Senator LeRoy Dixon, a member of the Public Affairs Committee who was not viewed as the bill’s friend1664—indeed, pro-Southwick senators were already “mustering” under his leadership1665—moved for taking it up immediately as a special order, prompting suspicion that his purpose was “murderous.”1666 (A Mormon, Dixon, like Southwick, had attended Brigham Young Academy.)1667 He also performed magnificently as a turn-the-other-cheeker during a “Fistic Encounter” with President Church P. Castle of the Utah Manufacturers’ Association in the capitol following a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Southwick’s bill, at which Dixon, as mayor of Provo, spoke in favor and Castle against the measure.1668 Because, fortuitously, his motion was procedurally out of order, before he had time to offer a motion to strike the measure’s enacting clause (and kill it), Standish moved to make his own bill a special order for the afternoon. When he explained that “a committee representing various sides on the tobacco question was at work...to frame a compromise” and would probably decide the issue by that time, no senator opposed his motion.1669

1664a. To Consider Cigaret Bill Today,” SLT, Feb. 28, 1923 (8:1).

The lobbying efforts of the businessmen’s Party of Freedom (to smoke wherever smokers wanted) bore first fruit on February 28 in the Senate, which, on the motion of Senator Jenkins, who had voted against Southwick’s bill in 1921, recommitted S.B. No. 108 to the Public Affairs Committee.1670 The chamber took this step after Standish had stated that the so-called citizens’ committee had requested recommittal so that certain amendments might be 1668The assault occurred after Castle had persisted in claiming that no efforts had been made to enforce the no-tobacco-sales-to-minors law despite Dixon’s statement that he had tried to enforce it during his 10 years as head of Provo’s public safety department. Dixon’s charge that Church was a liar prompted the latter to invite the former to take off his glasses; when Dixon did so, holding them in both hands with his arms extended downward, “Castle struck the Mayor a stinging blow on the head”; acceding to Castle’s invitation to “‘come over here,’” Dixon “invited the Salt Laker to go ahead and hit him again. ‘I will not strike you.’” “Fistic Encounter over Cigaret Measure Marks Bitter Capitol Measure,” SLT, Feb. 2, 1921 (10:1). See also “Come to Blows at Utah Hearing on Measure to Ban Cigarettes,” NYT, Feb. 2, 1921 (13); “Manufacturers of State in Meeting,” OE, Jan. 15, 1920 (4:3). Aggressive appears to have been Castle’s general approach to public policy disputes. In the course of his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee he tried to kill two birds with one stone in alluding to calls for increased taxation: “‘Are you going to raise taxes from the W.C.T.U., or from the Brigham Young college, or from business men?’” “Fistic Encounter over Cigaret Measure Marks Bitter Capitol Measure,” SLT, Feb. 2, 1921 (10:1-3 at 3).

---

1:2). In 1921, as mayor of the Mormon center of Provo, Dixon had actively participated in committee hearings on the Southwick bill. “Compromise Cigaret Bill Is Introduced in Senate,” SLT, Mar. 2, 1923 (22:5).

1669To Consider Cigaret Bill Today,” SLT, Feb. 28, 1923 (8:1). According to Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 433 (Feb. 27), on Standish’s motion his bill was made a special order for the following afternoon (Feb. 28).

offered; his own belief that the section in his bill retaining Southwick’s public smoking ban—which had “met with some objection”—would be the one targeted for amendment was both accurate and by this point an almost risibly vast understatement. The private group from which Standish was taking direction had met the night before at the exclusive Alta Club—which from its founding in 1883 had “attracted the financial, industrial and social leaders of the west”—at which “representatives of all parties interested in the anti-cigaret bill, for and against the amendment,” as well as legislators discussed whether anything could be done so late in the session to pass a “more workable law.”

In fact, the marathon meeting, at which “lay leaders” of both the pro- and anti-tobacco forces were said to have achieved sufficient common ground to persuade optimistic observers that enough House and Senate members could be mustered to pass a compromise bill, had lasted from 9 a.m. until 11 p.m. Hope for breaking the legislative deadlock was rooted in the presence of conservatives “aligned on both sides” who favored “some adjustment” between the “extremists on both sides,” to “a considerable following” of whom Standish’s bill had proved “unacceptable in some points”: whereas “[a]nti-tobacco radicals had previously” insisted that the Southwick law be retained intact and their counterparts demanded repeal, the compromisers sought to insure the prevention of juvenile use and protection of “the rights of nonsmokers” while granting a “full measure of personal liberty to adult users of tobacco.”

1671 “Senate Blocks Judgeship Cut,” DN, Feb. 28, 1923 (1:1).
1673 “Restaurant Smoke Room Designations to Be Questioned,” DN, Feb. 28, 1923 (1:3). The next day the L.A. Times published a front-page canard, which without attribution was clearly derived from the foregoing article, but in headline and subheads shouted: “Grant Is Wavering. Recedes on Utah Smoking Law. Mormon Church Head calls Conference to Discuss Changes in Act.” It claimed that the prospects for amendment had improved “as a result, it is intimated, of the quiet influence of President Grant of the Mormon Church in the direction of adjusting the matter.” The paper admitted the lack of any confirmation of Grant’s reported personal interest, but asserted that “men prominent in church councils were present” at the “secret meeting at the Alta Club....” “Grant Is Wavering,” LAT, Mar. 1, 1923 (1:7). The introduction the very next day of the substitute for Standish’s bill prompted the newspaper to concede that the day’s events had “disposed of reports that at a secret meeting at the Alta Club, representatives of the dominant church expressed sympathy with the movement” to modify the Southwick law: “it is known that leaders of the church are opposed to touching the present law.” “Ask Lighter Tobacco Ban,” LAT, Mar. 2, 1923 (1:3-4, 2:6).
1674 “Modification of Southwick Cigaret Bill Seems Likely as Compromise Is Proposed,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 28, 1923 (Local page 1:1). Because the first five or
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Seemingly unfazed by this amendatory process, Sheriff Harries initiated an innovative phase of prosecution against another downtown cafe owner, Nelson Van Dyke—the ubiquitous Deputy Mauss was the complaining witness—to test restaurant operators’ right to designate “the major part of their places of business as smoking rooms or compartments.” When Mauss and another deputy entered the Van Dyke Cafe the owner was standing near the cash register smoking a cigar; they told him that he was under arrest despite his statement that he had displayed a “‘This is a smoking room’” sign in the cafe proper and posted “‘No smoking allowed’” signs in three booths or compartments. While confirming the existence of the signs, the deputies explained to the press that all were printed in small type and that the object of the arrest was to “test what constitutes a smoking room or compartment in cafes.” Harries intervened to deal with owners’ swiftly proliferating practice of posting signs, in response to his first wave of arrests, permitting smoking in the “main portions of their dining rooms as smoking rooms,” while “reserving but the smaller compartments or private booths” as smoking prohibited, which the sheriff (correctly) viewed as “contrary to the spirit and meaning of the law....” The aforementioned Hotel Utah would, the irrepressible Harries announced, be the next test case. Shifting his focus to another section of the Southwick law, on March 2, accompanied by Mauss, Sheriff Harries personally raided three cigar stores (including one owned by the United Cigar chain), confiscating cigarettes at two of them.

In its March 1 morning edition the Tribune disclosed that so letters of each line of the left-hand column disappeared into the gutter of the tightly bound volume from which the newspaper was microfilmed/digitized, some of the words had to be guessed at; although “nonsmokers” makes more contextual sense than “smokers,” it is not entirely certain that there is sufficient space for the former.

1675* “Restaurant Smoke Room Designations to Be Questioned,” DN, Feb. 28, 1923 (1:3).
1677* “Restaurant Smoke Room Designations to Be Questioned,” DN, Feb. 28, 1923 (1:3). A cafe owner succinctly stated his self-interestedly false interpretation of the law: “‘It is only necessary...to set aside a single room of [sic; probably should be “or”] compartment for nonsmokers and the rest of the cafe can be designated as a smoking room.’” “Hotel Offers Non-Smokers Private Room,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 23, 1923 (Local page, 1:6). a committee of representative men...are seeking a sane solution of what has become a most troublesome problem in the state. The committee includes some legislators from both houses. It includes some of the most prominent business men of Salt Lake, of whose whole hearted interest in the temporal welfare of the state there cannot be the slightest doubt. And it includes some representatives of the leading religious thought in the city and state—men recognized as church leaders.

The committee, in other words, is composed of men from both the anti-cigaret and the personal liberty side of the present argument. ... Whether it would be possible to adopt a middle ground on a question and problem upon which views are frequently so radically different has been a matter of some doubt. If present hopes are fulfilled...a bill which conservative churchmen approve, as well as conservative business men and leaders of thought on both sides of the cigaret question, can be evolved.\textsuperscript{1679}

The committee was considering four features of a possible bill, three of which—the Iowa-borrowed licensure and tax regime and the public smoking ban—were already incorporated into the Standish bill; the fourth—the ban on cigarette advertising—was already in force under the Southwick law, though Standish had excluded it from his bill. With regard to the smoking issue, whereas S.B. No. 108 simply retained the existing law, the committee was discussing permitting restaurant and barber shop owners to reserve a part of their premises “as compartments, separated from the main eating room or shop by partition,” provided that a sign indicated the smoking-designated area.\textsuperscript{1680} Compared with the Standish bill, this iteration offered the anti-tobacco forces potentially stronger smoking regulation and retention of the advertising ban without giving the pro-tobacco movement anything that was not already in S.B. No. 108, which, to be sure, already proposed the overriding goal of abolishing Southwick’s cigarette sales ban.

At the Senate’s afternoon session that same day the Public Affairs Committee reported its unanimous recommendation that S.B. No. 184, its substitute for Standish’s bill, be passed; by virtue of being a committee substitute its course was streamlined and upon its introduction the bill was immediately placed on the second reading calendar.\textsuperscript{1681}

Like the 1921 Iowa law\textsuperscript{1682} and S.B. No. 108, the committee substitute repealed the cigarette sales ban, replacing it with a local option licensure system;

\textsuperscript{1679}“Licensing and Sales Tax on Cigarets Are Advocated,” \textit{SLT}, Mar. 1, 1923 (24:3-4).
\textsuperscript{1680}“Licensing and Sales Tax on Cigarets Are Advocated,” \textit{SLT}, Mar. 1, 1923 (24:3-4).
\textsuperscript{1682}See above ch. 15.
although it doubled the annual license fee for sellers in first-class cities, $1001683 was by no means “heavy.”1684 Similarly, the new bill imposed a one mill per cigarette tax,1685 which was now guesstimated to generate $300,000 in state revenue.1686 S.B. No. 184 also exceeded Standish’s bill in stringency in extending the ban on furnishing, giving, or selling cigarettes to minors under 21 to include “any tobacco of any kind whatever.”1687 The most expansive feature of the committee substitute was its incorporation of cigars, chewing tobacco, and smoking tobacco into the existing law’s broad prohibition of cigarette advertising,1688 which prompted the Tribune to comment that the bill “out-Southwicks Southwick....”1689 Finally, the Senate Public Affairs Committee sought to deal with the “furore”1690 over the arrests of violators of the smoking ban in public enclosed eating places by adding (on to the existing provision concerning “extra rooms”) an exception that the owner or proprietor of any hotel dining room, restaurant, cafe or cafeteria may designate by a conspicuous sign a part or portion of the same as a public smoking room provided that such part or portion shall be separated by a partition so constructed as to prevent the passage of smoke from one of such parts or portions of such rooms to the 1686“New Cigaret Bill Introduced,” DN, Mar. 1, 1923 (1:1). Why the amount was doubled in relation to S.B. No. 108 is unclear.

---

1687S.B. No. 184, § 1 (Substitute for S.B. #108, by Public Affairs Committee, 1923), on http://images.archives.utah.gov/cdm4/document?php=CISOROOT=/428&CISOPTR&23769&REC=4. The new bill also restructured the penalties without clearly making them more severe. Standish would have imposed a $25 to $100 fine or a 30-day jailing for first offenses and $100-$500 or one to six months for additional offenses; S.B. No. 184 imposed a uniform fine of $25-299 for all offenses and/or a maximum six-month imprisonment.
Although this language might at first blush appear to have diluted the “extra rooms” regime and therefore constituted a “concession[ ],” the requirement that partitions render the non-smoking section “tobacco smokeproof”—“[i]f a whisp [sic] of smoke gets into that room from the adjoining section, the proprietor is a law violator”—that is, totally protect people in the non-smoking parts from exposure to smoke produced in the designated smoking rooms would, as the Tribune pointed out, often make such physical reconfigurations financially unaffordable: “in many instances the restaurateur will be unable to comply with this provision without going to lengths which will make him hesitate before he undertakes to alter his premises so as to permit smoking....” To be sure, where owners could afford to undertake such renovations, S.B. No. 184’s lack of a provision guaranteeing non-smokers a certain minimum proportion of the establishment’s floor space would have made it possible for them practically to be squeezed out of the use of such eateries. As the Telegram put it: “there

---

1691 S.B. No. 184, § 4 (Substitute for S.B. #108, by Public Affairs Committee, 1923), on http://images.archives.utah.gov/cdm4/document.php=CISOROOT=/428&CISOPTR=23769&REC=4. Less controversially, the bill also essentially codified existing enforcement by a proviso that “in any state, county or city building, any public officer who has a private office separate and apart from his public office, he [sic] may if he so desires, designate such private office as a place where smoking may be permitted, and so long as such private office is so designated, smoking therein shall not be considered a violation of this act.” Id.

1693 “Cigaret Measure Contains Startling Clauses,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 2, 1923 (Local page 1:3, at 3:3). Letting its sarcastic imagination run wild, the Telegram added: “The proprietor of any restaurant or barber shop...must have an inclosed section for the nonsmoker. One or two barber chairs may be glass inclosed for the nonsmoker or so sealed that there is no chance of smoke getting in. In the same way one or two stools or tables in a restaurant may be similarly inclosed.”

1694 As a result, these partitions differed qualitatively from the feckless ones provided for under the Minnesota Clear Indoor Air Act of 1975. See below ch. 24.

1695 “Compromise Cigaret Bill Is Introduced in Senate,” SLT, Mar. 2, 1923 (22:5-6). This financial burden presumably underlay cafe, restaurant, and downtown hotel managers’ belief that the new bill “would prove more onerous than the law it would displace.” “New Smoking Ban Decreed,” LAT, Mar. 4, 1923 (1:4-5, at 2:1).

1696 Perhaps such a consideration prompted Senator Dixon’s judgment that the public smoking provision was the bill’s “only weakness.” “Advertising of Tobacco Would Be Prohibited,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 1, 1923 (1:7).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

must be room for at least one nonsmoker in the place of business.1697

Although Standish opined that certain amendments might be offered, he stated that he accepted the bill, and he and Public Affairs Committee Chairman John W. Peters agreed that S.B. No. 184 “would meet with less objection than” Standish’s proposal.1698

Abstracting from S.B. No. 184’s proposed repeal of the cigarette sales ban, the Tribune’s judgment was plausible that: “Boosted as a compromise measure, arranged between friends and foes of the Standish measure, the bill bears every indication that the foes of that bill were at least very much in evidence, if not the controlling factor at the conference of the committee...in reaching this solution of the problem presented to the state in the attempted literal enforcement of the Southwick act.” Much less plausible, however, was the claim that the measure “would throw more stringent regulations around both the use and sale of tobacco than anything that has been accomplished under the Southwick act....”1699

The Telegram, an even more radical opponent of regulation, also saw the substitute as a vehicle of reconciliation by virtue of its merging and embracing “essential features” of the Southwick law and Standish’s bill, which “represented extremist views of the pro and anti tobacco forces,” leaders of which endorsed the committee bill. “Antitobacco chiefs” rationalized their support on the grounds that it strengthened the existing law by focusing on the main objective of preventing the spread of cigarette and tobacco use to minors, whereas “[p]rotagonists of personal liberty in matters of habit” argued that “tobacco users can have no objection” to enactment of the substitute since “it takes full cognizance of the personal rights of of adult users of tobacco.”1700

Very quickly the latter would be disabused of their premature enthusiasm for the original text of S.B. No. 184. The next day the Liberty League’s 15-member committee branded the bill as “‘far worse’” than the Southwick law and declared

1697

“Cigaret Measure Contains Startling Clauses,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 2, 1923 (Local page 1:3, at 3:3).

1698

“New Cigaret Bill Introduced,” DN, Mar. 1, 1923 (1:1). A Mormon, Peters had a B.S. from Utah State Agricultural College, did one year of post-graduate study at the University of California, and taught high school social science before becoming mayor of Brigham City, where he owned a jewelry business and fruit orchards. At the 1921 session he had been Republican floor leader. J. Cecil Alter, History of Utah, the Storied Domain: A Documentary History of Utah’s Eventful Career, vol. 2 (1932), on http://files.usgwarchives.net/ut/state/bios/alter/p/peters-johnw.txt (visited July 25, 2011).

1699

1700

their “unqualified opposition” to it. Instead, they urged the straightforward repeal of the existing law “as the only consistent stand for liberal thinkers to take.”

During the recess between the morning and afternoon sessions on March 2, Chairman Peters, based on soundings he had taken, predicted that the bill would pass the Senate unanimously. Yet in spite of that confidence, he was still undecided as to whether he would move to suspend the rules that afternoon in order to consider the bill on second and third readings so that it could immediately go to the House. Bizarrely, Peters denied that his committee’s bill was a “‘compromise’”: “‘It is not a new measure in any sense but a strengthening of the Southwick act’” by virtue of the expanded tobacco advertising ban. Moreover, he appeared to be motivated by moral rather than public health concerns: “‘The measure has the support of the best people of Salt Lake. It is the result of the combined efforts of those standing for high morality, and is enforceable.’”

Just before the afternoon session and the bill’s second reading got underway, the Deseret News went to press with an editorial that revealed that the Mormon church had abandoned its defense of the Southwick law and the two-year-old ban on cigarette sales. Once the law’s principal supporter had signaled that it was seeking to salvage as much as possible of the bans on public smoking and advertising in exchange for local-option licensure, repeal of the one and passage of the other became a foregone conclusion. The capitulatory editorial was based on the claim that the purpose of anti-tobacco legislation was to discourage use among youth on the grounds that if tomorrow’s men can get through childhood “without having acquired a taste for tobacco” (and especially for cigarettes), “most of them will go through life without the habit.” As far as the Southwick law was concerned, the newspaper could not deny it had not been enforced, especially in the larger cities and towns; but rather than asserting that it was unenforceable, the editorialist merely stated that its enforcement had not been “insisted upon,” adding that if law enforcement officials had acted “vigorously” from the very beginning, it was “quite likely” that by March 1923 compliance would have been “general.” Without explaining why the Mormon church had not insisted on enforcement, he expressed understanding that when, suddenly, an effort was made to enforce, the resulting “furore...quite naturally assumed large proportions and did considerable damage to the state.” In what can only be viewed as an admission that the anti-tobacco movement had committed an historically irreversible strategic error that doomed the stringent Southwick law’s viability and required enactment of an at best amended compromise law, the Deseret News wrote: “The intensity of feeling aroused and the enmity created on the part of some gave rise to the necessity of seeking to formulate a plan by which the chief differences might be composed and the welfare of the state in all its phases protected.” (Ironically, the outcry had erupted over enforcement of the public smoking ban, not the cigarette sales ban, and yet the former, which benefited non-smoking adults much more than children, was, arguably, being strengthened, not weakened by S.B. No. 184.) Putting the best possible face on the Public Affairs Committee measure, the paper incorrectly characterized its proposed license fee as “high,” while accurately portraying the expanded ad ban as “a most important feature” that would insure that “the boy of Utah will not be jeopardized by the alluring advertisements of chewing and smoking tobacco which have enticed him in the past.” Plausible, too, was the editorial’s assessment of the revised public smoking ban as “aim[ing] to protect the rights and privileges of the non-smoker.” In the end, the Mormon newspaper offered the same justification for accepting the compromise that opponents of cigarette sales prohibitory bills and laws had been touting for many years: conditions under a regime that “bids fair to be enforced” would be “much better” than under “a more severe measure which remains unenforced.” Profound political astuteness was not required to predict, as did one representative hostile to any tobacco regulation, that the editorial practically insured the bill’s passage “‘unless the unexpected happens.’”

---

1702. “Cigarette Bill to Be Expedited,” DN, Mar. 2, 1923 (1:1). Peters also stated that he would oppose any amendments to the tobacco advertising ban on the grounds that it was “entirely constitutional to the best of his belief.”

Whether the bill as it stood before its second reading would be as substantively acceptable at the end of the legislative process remained to be seen. While the L.A. Times—which was covering the anti-smoking arrests and legislative proceedings systematically and in depth, but from a blatantly biased perspective—that may have underlain the gross factual errors that permeated its articles—with some exaggeration observed that the Deseret News editorial “practically demanded passage of the measure which has been denounced as far more restrictive and freakish than the present law and the Senators belonging to the Mormon church acted accordingly,” its insistence on treating (unidentified) 1703“The Cigaret Situation,” DN, Mar. 2, 1923 (4:1) (edit.). On much higher cigarette sales license fees in various states and cities, see above Parts I-II.

1705The articles largely derived from the Salt Lake Telegram without attribution.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

Mormon senators as church automatons was made possible only by its suppressing the Yeas and Nays, which would have revealed only two of the latter, at least one of which was cast by a Mormon.1706

By the middle of the March 2 afternoon session, when word reached the lobbies that the debate was starting on the second reading of S.B. No. 184, a “sort of sigh of expectancy went over” the chamber and galleries began to fill with spectators. After the adoption of a series of “technical amendments” correcting, inter alia, typographical errors,1707 farmer William Candland moved to amend the bill by striking barber shops from the covered universe of enclosed public places because he was unable to see why a man should not smoke there since usually none but men went there. The proposal provoked Senator Dixon, a well-known smoking opponent, to complain that it was “annoying when a man is ‘helpless’ in a barber chair, to have someone in the next chair puffing at a cigarette.” The defeat inflicted on the amendment suggested to the Tribune that if the motion was designed as a test to determine which senators favored the bill as it was and which wanted to liberalize it, the outcome offered little encouragement to the latter.1708

Regardless of its resolution, this conflict illustrated that at least Southwick’s ban on public smoking was primarily designed to protect adult non-smokers rather than children.

After this “preliminary skirmish” had cleared the field for further action, Chairman Peters gave an overview of his committee’s bill, beginning with the “‘purposely high’” license fees designed to limit cigarette traffic “as much as possible by a law that will not be easy to circumvent.”1709 More realistic was 1706“New Smoking Ban Decreed,” LAT, Mar. 4, 1923 (1:4-5). The statement that “[t]here was no opposition vote,” could only have referred to the third reading, with which the article hopelessly confused the second reading. See below. The paper’s claim that “the proceedings were in keeping with the machine-like working of the radical majority in the Chamber to which tobacco in any form is anathema” was, since the bill repealed the ban on cigarette sales, absurd with respect to both readings, but especially regarding the debate on final passage, when several of the bill’s more radical provisions were struck.

1708“Senate Advances Tobacco Measure to Third Reading,” SLT, Mar. 3, 1923 (20:4) (quotes); Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 502 (Mar. 2). One amendment, offered by Salt Lake lawyer Alonzo Irvine, was adopted, permitting advertising on “the package containing the merchandise licensed to be sold in this act.” Id.

1709“Senate Advances Tobacco Measure to Third Reading,” SLT, Mar. 3, 1923 (20:4) (quotes). With an annual license fee of $100/$75/$50/$25 (depending on city size), a
Peters’ assessment of the expanded ban on tobacco ads designed to rid Utah of “‘the alluring pictures spread over the country depicting the use of smoking or chewing tobacco as a desirable thing. I think I have been more mortified, embarrassed and chagrined by these than anything else. In my opinion, in that particular alone the bill is worth the amendment to the present law.’” The amendment to the public smoking ban also came in for praise inasmuch as it “‘require[d] no mere sign nor [sic] sham, but a solid partition to prevent the fumes of tobacco reaching into the nonsmoking compartments in hotel dining rooms and restaurants.’” The committee was able to draft such provisions, Peters explained to the Senate, by “‘consult[ing] those who have large interests, not only in the welfare of the community materially, but also educationally, morally and spiritually.’”

Perhaps because this description suggested that the tobacco industry was not among the consultees, Senator H. C. Tebbs, a member of the Mormon high priests’ quorum, who regarded the bill as a compromise between Senator Standish and some of S.B. No. 108’s opponents, asked Peters who was behind the new bill. Instead of giving a straight answer, Peters denied Tebbs’s premise (that the bill was a compromise), and in the end Tebbs, apparently failing to insist that his question was not contingent on whether a compromise existed, did not challenge another committee member’s evasive statement that the committee itself was behind the bill. Senator William Smart, whose controversial
An emperor-wears-no-clothes moment finally intruded into the debate with the intervention of Wilford Woodberry Warnick, a Mormon farmer and superintendent of the Alpine Stake Mutual Improvement Association, representing the Mormon heartland of Utah County, which in 1921 had submitted an above-average volume of petitions supporting the Southwick bill. Warnick (who would vote against S.B. No. 184 on second reading before switching sides on final passage) charged that: “It is said that this bill strengthens the law.... It is a question if our constituents will feel that we have strengthened a law which prohibited the sale of cigarettes when we repeal that prohibition.” He elicited a response from Public Affairs Committee member and Southwick advocate in 1921, Dixon, his Utah County colleague, who “defend[ed] himself from the criticism implied” by Warnick: “If we were prohibiting by the present law...I would agree with Senator Warnick. If we could prohibit, I would not be for this bill, but I would rather have a regulated traffic than an indiscriminate traffic. This bill will curtail the sale of cigarettes to the minimum. I do not regret that the Southwick bill was passed. It was an achievement, an accomplishment. I do not know that it has failed in the law, but it has failed in the enforcement.”

There was no evidence that the rather low license fees would reduce sales, at least to adults, at all—let alone to “the minimum,” whatever that meant—though refusals

---

Telegram, Mar. 3, 1923 (local page 1:5), may have gone too far in reporting that “Senator Peters refused to state who is behind the bill....” The L.A. Times, whose reporting was so confused that it mistook second reading for final passage, nevertheless did grasp that Peters had “declined...to answer a direct inquiry as to the authors of the bill.” “New Smoking Ban Decreed,” LAT, Mar. 4, 1923 (1:4-5, 2:1).

\(^{1713}\) Senate Advances Tobacco Measure to Third Reading, SLT, Mar. 3, 1923 (20:4-5).

\(^{1714}\) 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); “Joint Conference Held,” SLT, Dec. 8, 1923 (8:6).

\(^{1715}\) Senate Advances Tobacco Measure to Third Reading,” SLT, Mar. 3, 1923 (20:4-5).
At the time the new law went into effect it was reported that: “So far no community in Utah has undertook [sic] to resist issuance of permits to dealers in tobacco who qualify to handle cigarettes, as far as is known at the state capitol.” “Nearly 200 Permits to Sell Cigaretts Issued,” SLT, May 9, 1923 (22:5). Even the city commission of Provo, the home of Brigham Young University, passed an ordinance requiring a $75 license to sell cigarettes. “Cigaret Ordinance Passed by Provo,” Salt Lake Telegram, May 3, 1923 (8:4).

However, later in May, the city council of the small town of Midvale, in which important lead, zinc, and silver smelter operations were located, adopted an ordinance prohibiting the sale of cigarettes; the city recorder also announced that anyone offering cigarettes for sale would be prosecuted. “Cigaret Sale in Midvale Forbidden,” Salt Lake Telegram, May 23, 1923 (9:3). It remains a research desideratum to identify local governments that passed such ordinances or denied cigarette sales permits on a broad scale. In 1921, Rep. McShane argued that under his (rejected) licensure amendment the $100 license fee was adequate because “‘the local authorities, if they really wish to prohibit cigarets, can tack on local licenses and absolutely prevent their sale. I have taken this position on this amendment for the particular purpose of giving the towns in my county an opportunity if they actually want to prohibit cigarets to fix a local license which would force prohibition if they want it.’” “Anticigaret Measure Passes Utah Legislature,” SLT, Feb. 25, 1921 (1:7).

In fact, the amendment, unlike the 1923 law, neither provided for local issuance of licenses nor conferred discretion on local governments to deny licenses; rather, under it the “Secretary of State shall issue” the license upon payment of the fee, affidavits of three property owners within a mile’s radius of the applicant’s place of business testifying to his “moral fitness to engage in the handling and selling of tobacco,” and written approval of the district juvenile judge. House Journal: Fourteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1921, at 378-79 (Feb. 24).

Senate Advances Tobacco Measure to Third Reading,” SLT, Mar. 3, 1923 (20:4-5).

Standish’s amendments, to which considerable objection was raised, especially by Public Affairs Committee members, included: reinstating the lower permit fees in his bill; permitting tobacco advertising in newspapers and magazines; and permitting smoking in barber shops, railway station waiting rooms, and similar places. “House Favors New Judeship,” DN, Mar. 3, 1923 (sect. 2, 1:1).
Senate then ordered the bill to its third reading.\textsuperscript{1719}

Significantly, that evening after the Senate’s action the 15-member executive committee of the Party of Freedom met at the Alta Club—present were also a number of non-member Salt Lake businessmen—and decided unanimously not to endorse the bill before the legislature. The group was “unalterably opposed” to the substitute for Standish’s bill on the grounds that it was “equally as [sic] objectionable as” the current anti-cigarette law.\textsuperscript{1720} The Freedom Party’s leaders did not explain their objections, but presumably as Utah’s bulwark of anti-legislative freakishness—Mormon-Republican Governor Charles Mabey had concluded his condition of the state message to the legislature with the admonition that the law-giver exercise restraint because “[f]reakish enactments are as perilous as the disdain with which they are met”\textsuperscript{1721}—they were repulsed by precisely what Peters had lauded in the substitute: the retention and strengthening of Southwick’s advertising and public smoking bans. However, the fact that S.B. No. 184 also repealed the existing cigarette sales ban made it difficult to credit the assertion that the bill was literally just as objectionable to Newhouse and his comrades as the Southwick law—unless the new organization was a stalking horse for the cigarette manufacturers’ oligopoly, which was, as noted earlier, reflexively hostile to any cigarette tax. It is unclear whether the Party of Freedom controlled or influenced any votes in the Senate or House, but it may simply have been signaling its displeasure with respect to the extent to which the Public Affairs Committee in revising the Standish bill had gone in accommodating the Mormon and other anti-tobacco militants and in departing from whatever provisions the executive committee had proposed. Whether this public expression of dissatisfaction with the Senate’s action carried with it any clout to shape the debate in the House during the final few days of the session or was, rather, designed to put legislators on notice that the Freedom Party, which “expect[ed] to win sufficient votes [at the 1924 state legislative elections] in the populous counties, Salt Lake, Weber and others, to force repeal of existing legislation directed at public smoking,” still planned to “make the freak laws...a political issue in the next campaign,”\textsuperscript{1722} remained to be seen.

At the same time, City Judge Pratt indefinitely continued the trial of Tribune general manager McKay and those of five other public smokers on the grounds

\textsuperscript{1719}Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 502 (Mar. 2).

\textsuperscript{1720}“Freedom Party Opposed to Substitute Measure,” SLT, Mar. 3, 1923 (20:5).

\textsuperscript{1721}House Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 28 (Jan. 10).

\textsuperscript{1722}“New Smoking Ban Decreed,” LAT, Mar. 4, 1923 (1:4-5, at 2:1).
that there were “too many serious cases on the calendar at present” to hear public smoking cases.\textsuperscript{1723} The Telegram chimed in with the headline: “Court Too Busy to Waste Time in Cigaret Cases,” noting that the assistant county attorney agreed.\textsuperscript{1724} Despite this disposition, the same day Sheriff Harries’s deputies raided more than a score of business district cigar stands and tobacco stores, including four or five United Cigar stores, confiscating more than 700 cigarette packages.\textsuperscript{1725}

As the Senate was poised to vote on the committee measure, the Telegram editorially unleashed a full dose of its (overwrought) sarcastic venom against a bill that it denounced as even worse than the existing law:

If the tobacco bill brought into the senate as a substitute to the Standish bill...is a compromise with the Southwick law...may the shades of our forefathers save us from a complete surrender of the Southwick forces. Perhaps we are bound to admit that this is a compromise bill since it compromises even the liberties enjoyed under the Southwick act, which were not compromises at all, but compromises with decency and respect for the law, permitting the smoker to have his cigarettes and intolerance to have its law.

Under the Southwick act it was a crime to smoke in an inclosed public place. Under the new law it’s almost an impossibility. The trade negotiated between the advocates of the new bill and the supporters of Southwickism makes the requirements on the owner of a public place so strict that there would seem to be no course open. [T]he proposed law puts the man in the position of the minor.\textsuperscript{1726}

The next day, Saturday, March 3—the same day that a 75-member American Legion post, joining the chorus of businessmen purportedly concerned that “freak legislation,” having made Utah a nationwide “laughing stock,” would keep away tourists and conventions, petitioned its legislators to use their influence to secure the Southwick law’s repeal\textsuperscript{1727}—the Senate took up S.B. No. 184 on third reading.\textsuperscript{1728} As announced, Standish opened the amendatory process with a \textsuperscript{1723}“Hearing of Smokers’ Cases Indefinitely Continued,” SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:4). For a less freighted account, see “Trials of Alleged Smoking Law Violators Delayed,” DN, Mar. 3, 1923 (1:3).

\textsuperscript{1726}“One Freak and Then Another!” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 3, 1923 (6:1) (edit.).
\textsuperscript{1727}“Legionnaires Ask Cigaret Law Repeal,” SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:3).
\textsuperscript{1728}Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at motion to reinstate the lower permit fees contained in his S.B. No. 108 in lieu of the committee substitute’s somewhat higher fees—$50/$100 in first-class cities, $35/$75 in second-class, $25/$50 in third-class, with smaller locations unchanged at $25—on the grounds that the higher amounts would defeat the bill’s purpose, which could hardly have been captured by his argument that “frequently persons who would otherwise be indigents eke out a livelihood by conducting stands at which tobacco, candies and newspapers are sold. He thought such persons would be deprived of a part of their livelihood by the terms of the bill.” Senator Dixon, one of the substitute’s co-authors, disagreed, insisting that “the spirit of high license is to place the tobacco business in the hands of reputable and responsible persons” (who were deemed less likely to sell to minors). Chairman Peters informed the chamber of the experience of Brigham City—whose mayor he had been—which had imposed a $50 license even before the Southwick law had gone into effect, which helped stop illegal trafficking without prompting dealer protest. The first of Standish’s pro-tobacco initiatives went down to defeat.

Senator Peters then succeeded with one of his own, designed to meet “criticism” that had arisen since the bill’s introduction, which created an exception to the advertising ban so that “a dealer in tobacco and cigars [but not in cigarettes] may have a sign on the front of his place of business stating that he is dealing in such articles.” Peters sought to justify this relaxation of “stringent regulations around the advertising of the cigarette or tobacco generally” on the grounds that there was “something to the fear felt by some dealers that if a cigar merchant placed the words ‘cigars and tobaccos’ on the sign in front of his business, he would be violating the law.” Perhaps emboldened by this inroad into the strict anti-advertising regime, Standish immediately reacted with a “counter-proposal” that proposed striking the bill’s entire ad ban section and replacing it with a severely diluted version that merely prohibited “display[ing] on any street sign, placard, bill board or street car any advertisement of cigarettes or cigarette papers or tobacco in any form,” thus totally jettisoning S.B. No. 184’s ban both on all in-state newspaper, magazine, and circular ads and on all displays of cigarettes/papers or ads for them in any store, store window, or elsewhere. Asked to explain the need for the amendment, Standish declared that “he stood for justice” and (hearkening back to an argument akin to Southwick’s in 1921 that a cigarette sales ban was a constitutional predicate for an ad ban) that it was “not just to charge a man $100 for the privilege of selling a commodity and then not permit him to advertise the sale.” And Senator Jenkins, who had opposed regulation in 1921, sought to justify Standish’s deregulation of newspaper and magazine ads on the grounds that “in this effort to fight the tobacco evil the cooperation rather than the hostility of the press is required, if advances are to be made.”

513 (Mar. 3).

1734 “Tobacco Bill Amended and Passed by Senate,” SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:2). Though the Tribune termed it an amendment to Peters’ amendment, the Senate Journal made it clear that Standish offered his amendment after Peters’ had already been adopted. Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 519 (Mar. 3).

This claim’s perverse and implausible logic imputed the same meretricious editorial policy to an allegedly free press that undergirded the cigarette manufacturing oligopoly’s successfully implemented plan, in Iowa and elsewhere, to buy newspapers’ editorial favor with respect to securing and retaining deregulation by pumping considerable ad revenues into their coffers. Senator Warnick, the Mormon tobacco antagonist, preferring economic reality, replied that: “He would expect no better cooperation from the press if advertisements of tobacco were permitted. The press would support the advertiser rather than the public.” After Senator Dixon had, once again, inveighed against “alluring advertisements that entice children to use cigarettes,” Senator Winder—who, as a representative in 1921, had, from a libertarian position, attacked his own Mormon church’s advocacy of the Southwick bill—called for realism: “[t]he real menace” was “attractive billboard displays” and colored magazine spreads manufactured by a process unavailable in Utah newspapers and imported by the hundreds of thousands; in that sense Standish’s amendment would not weaken the bill. Winder’s illogic was immediately uncovered by Senator Tebbs, who, by pointing out that the legislation’s “fundamental purpose” was “to do away with the use of

\[1735\] Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 519 (Mar. 3).

\[1736\] “Tobacco Bill Amended and Passed by Senate,” SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:2).

\[1737\] Also Senator Charles Cottrell, Jr., who in 1913 had introduced a partial smoking ban bill and was now once again in the Senate, took the position during floor debate that “any person should have a right to advertise what he had a right to sell.” “Tobacco Bill Amended and Passed by Senate,” SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:2-3 at 3).

\[1738\] “Tobacco Bill Amended and Passed by Senate,” SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:2).

\[1739\] See below chs 17 and 19.
tobacco as far as possible, had no trouble concluding that Standish’s amendment was at odds with it. Senator Candland, the friend of barber shop smoking, was certainly getting at a vitally important social-psychological fact when he provocatively observed that “the most attractive” cigarette ads for the young were not printed ones, “but seeing the big fellow smoking.” However, since not even the Southwick law banned smoking—only “[b]ack east” were Sheriff Harries’ recent interventions interpreted “‘to mean that any man smoking a cigarette in Utah will be arrested”’—“we are going to permit the big fellow to smoke.” Consequently, Candland concluded, if the law was going to be enforced, “‘we must not overdo this thing.” Without articulating the issue expressly, he was essentially advising his more radical colleagues not to sweat the small stuff since they had already either acquiesced in eliminating the big stuff (such as a sales ban) or never proposed it (a statewide smoking ban). Nevertheless, why retention of the stricter version of the ad ban would have been excessive he failed to explain.

In the end, only seven senators voted for Standish’s amendment. But where Standish had failed, Peters once again succeeded in whittling away the breadth of the advertising ban: the Senate adopted his amendment to confine the ban on displays of cigarettes/papers and ads for them to store widows by striking that on “stores” and “elsewhere.” Building on this dilution, Senator Irvine tried out a further liberalization of advertising by proposing a proviso that nothing in the section “shall be construed so as to prohibit the display of tobacco and the advertisements thereof other than cigarettes and the advertisements thereof in store windows.” On the grounds that the amendment failed to conform to the spirit of “compromise” that characterized the committee substitute, the Senate at first defeated it, but on reconsideration adopted it. By this point, the advertising section of the Southwick law was so weighed down with committee and floor amendments that “it was generally admitted” that it had become “rather incomprehensible not to say cumbersome and almost ungrammatical.”

Unsuccessful as his amendatory mission had been so far, Standish had hardly given up. Now he turned his attention to relaxing the public smoking ban. His first effort, to strike “motor and other passenger vehicles employed as common carriers,” failed, but he finally restored smoking laissez-faire to Utah’s barber shops.

The last amendment adopted by the Senate was also the most consequential in terms of gutting the Southwick law, though the Tribune’s account left opaque its importance both for protecting non-smokers from secondhand smoke exposure and for accommodating the business groups that had protested against the ridicule to which the sheriff’s arrests had exposed Utah elsewhere. The identity of the author of the amendment was almost as surprising as the virtual unanimity with which senators adopted it. Republican Senator David Jenson, a 45-year-old lawyer and former three-term Weber County county attorney, had, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1921, faithfully voted with Southwick on the latter’s bill. Moreover, as a senatorial candidate in October 1920, he had, in response to a formal written request from the Weber stake Sunday school, “very definitely” expressed himself as willing to support a bill to prohibit cigarette sales. During the final passage debate on March 3, 1923, Jenson moved to amend the exception for enclosed public eating places that conferred discretion on their owners to designate a portion of them as a “public smoking room” by constructing smoke-impervious partitions. The provision now read: “excepting that the owner or proprietor of any hotel dining room, restaurant, cafe or cafeteria may designate the same as a public smoking room by a conspicuous sign at or 1748Republican Nominees in Weber County,” OS-E, Nov. 6, 1922 (7) (advertisement); 1910 and 1920 Population Census (HeritageQuest). Jenson was elected to a two-year term in 1920 and re-elected to a four-year term in 1922. The official retrospective list of all Utah legislators misspelled his name and erroneously listed him as a different person (“David Jensen”) for his first term. The Utah State Legislature: Centennial History, 1896-1996, at 273-74 (J. Brent Haymon et al. comp. 1996); http://le.utah.gov/asp/roster/roster.asp?year=1921.

---

near the entrance.”

Simply by posting a sign owners would be able to convert their restaurants in their entirety back into smoking-permitted areas and thus both to restore Utah to membership in good standing in the laissez-faire smoking world so beloved by the tobacco oligopoly, the chamber of commerce, nicotine-addicted tourists and conventioneers, and skew-viewed libertarians and to free up Sheriff Harries and Deputy Mauss for other law enforcement duties. Jenson’s amendment, which eliminated the mandatory partitions, apparently without any fundamental debate, “met with the approval of all but Senator Dixon,” and even he was reduced to merely quibbling over the location and size of the sign, and fecklessly at that: not being “ready with an amendment worded as he wanted it,” he “lost out.” Dixon was actuated by not wanting to be “humiliated by going into a restaurant and having to leave when he found that it was a “smokehouse.”” He therefore proposed amending Jenson’s amendment to require “the sign to be at the entrance, at least seven feet high and with lettering six inches high.”

Perhaps disoriented by the untoward consequences of his unpreparedness, Dixon later tried to insert a similar signage requirement in barber shops, but desisted when its illogic was pointed out in the wake of the chamber’s just having struck barber shops from the list of covered enclosed public places.

After all the amendments had been defeated or adopted, the Senate, astonishingly—in light of the far-reaching character of the changes to a radical and polarizing piece of legislation—passed the bill unanimously (18 to 0), even Warnick voting Aye. What the Tribune termed “[t]he nearest approach to

\[\text{References}\]

1751 Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 520 (Mar. 3); S.B. No. 184, Substitute for S.B. No. 108 (1923, by Public Affairs Committee) at 7, on http://images.archives.utah.gov/cdm4/document.php?CISOROOT=/428&CISOPTR=23769&REC=4 (handwritten insertions in bill text). Jenson’s initiative was consistent with his Senate floor statement in 1921 that he had “nothing to gain personally” from Southwick’s bill because “he can go where smokers are or can stay away, as he chooses, but it is to guard the young people that he will vote for the measure....”

1752 The influential Literary Digest, which focused on synthesizing press accounts ridiculing the Southwick law, erroneously stated that the enactment contained the partitions provision. “Utah’s ‘No Smoking’ Signs,” LD 76(12):14-15 at 14 (Mar. 24, 1923).

1754 “Tobacco Bill Amended and Passed by Senate,” SLT, Mar. 4, 1923 (24:2-3 at 3).

1755 Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 520 (Mar. 3).
opposition...against the bill” arose in the explanation that Salt Lake Republican Antoinette Brown Kinney\(^{1757}\) offered in support of her (successful) request to be excused from voting:

The senator...said that the present bill places no more safeguards around traffic in tobacco, to prevent the sale of such to minors, than does the Southwick act. And the Southwick act, she added, is no improvement in this respect on former statutes. As a woman and a representative of women, she felt that she was not much interested in the measure. “The woman of the home...does not smoke. Therefore I am perfectly willing to permit the men to legislate for and impose penalties on themselves as may best suit them, since neither women nor minors are particularly interested in the outcome of this measure.”\(^{1758}\)

The claim by Kinney—the only senator not to vote on the Southwick bill in 1921\(^{1759}\)—that the Southwick law was no more efficacious than its no-sales-to-minors predecessor was dubious enough, but the assertion that women as non-smokers had no stake in a law that prohibited public smoking and advertising that could lure their children into smoking was unfathomably preposterous.

The press reported that “the vote was a complete change from that of two years ago when the Southwick bill was passed, the opponents of the measure then being the friends of the measure now,” but absent from that circle of friends was (a section of) the press itself: “From various parts of the state newspapers are wiring the representatives to vote against the bill because it prohibits the advertising of tobacco in the papers, which means to most of the smaller country papers a direct loss of from five hundred to one thousand dollars a year.” Whether that telegram campaign bore fruit immediately or not, House passage was already deemed “questionable” because at least some members’ sentiment was that the bill should not pass.\(^{1760}\) That opposition encompassed both anti-tobacco representatives who regarded the whole 1923 amendatory initiative as anathema and House members who excoriated even the profoundly diluted bill \(^{1757}\)An 1887 graduate of the University of Michigan, Kinney, a women’s suffrage advocate and organizer of the Utah State Federation of Women’s Clubs, was the first librarian of the Utah State Historical Society before becoming a University of Utah regent in the first decade of the twentieth century; her husband was a Salt Lake City lawyer. Gary Topping, “One Hundred Years at the Utah State Historical Society,” \textit{UHQ} 65(3):200-302 at 213 (Summer 1997); \textit{Catalogue of the University of Utah: Announcements for 1908-1909}, at 6 (1908).

\(^{1760}\)“Senate Passes Cigaret Bill; Fate in Doubt,” \textit{OS-E}, Mar. 4, 1923 (1:2).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

exiting the Senate as quintessentially evil. The exceptionally lush rhetoric of Republican George J. Constantine, who had extensive economic interests in development projects in southeastern Utah and was one of the few lawyers in the House,1761 may have been situated in this ideology’s upper price range, but it nevertheless encapsulated the spirit. One of the House members “flooded... with telegrams from the country newspapers protesting against the passage of the cigaret bill because it cut out all advertising of tobacco or its products,” Constantine telegraphed back:

“[E]ach reading of that freak of freaks substituted for the Standish cigaret bill brings to realization its un-American, unjust discrimination. I will work against it, talk against it and vote against it.... This freak disregards and tramples down American liberties and will breed contempt, ridicule and disrespect. The blood of the Revolution, Civil and World wars cries out against such confiscatory, discriminatory and un-American legislation. Thank God the Federal Constitution guarantees my freedom of speech and as a member of this Legislature I denounce the substitute as a worse freak than the Southwick law.”1762

The same day (March 5)1763 that S.B. No. 184 had its first reading in the House—which continued to prohibit smoking “within the House, or gallery, while the House is in session”1764—Party of Freedom officials announced that they would “make a vigorous effort to have the bill killed by a filibuster.” Sparing no vitriol, former Democratic Attorney General Dan Shields inflationarily developed hyperbole far beyond even Constantine’s imagination in declaring that “it was not a far cry from the burning of witches to the regulation of the every-day conduct of citizens such as is proposed by this and other freak legislation.” Individual House members’ attitudes toward devoting legislative resources to repeal or amendment of the Southwick law may also have been shaped by the “belief” that even if the Southwick amendments were passed, the revised law would “prove a dead letter” in the two largest cities, Salt Lake and Ogden, whereas in “the smaller communities where the Mormon church influence is complete, however, the new law will probably be rigidly enforced as the Southwick law has been

1672
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

On the bill’s arrival in the House there was “some talk” of amending the advertising provisions, but some members believed that too little time remained before the end of the session to do so. That belief was prevented from turning into a majority view when the House that same day received a communication—which was read aloud to the members—from Salt Lake Chamber of Commerce President L. B. Hampton concerning the result of a special meeting of the organization’s governors the night before, at which the board unanimously adopted a motion recommending to the House that it strike the law’s prohibition of cigar and chewing and smoking tobacco advertising. Implicitly lauding their own toleration and moderation, the board members noted that although their proposal would not make the bill perfect, it would become more acceptable. To some House members this initiative was welcome because they themselves argued that it would be unconstitutional for the state to prohibit the advertising of a product that it licensed. However, such a constricted view was hardly compelling: at the very same time, Attorney General Cluff, responding to a request submitted by Salt Lake Republican Representative Amy Brown Lyman, who was both the head of the Mormon Relief Society Social Welfare Department and married to one of the church’s 12 apostles, opined that a law 1765. Utah’s Smoke Law Is Given to House,” LAT, Mar. 6, 1923 (2). The dead letter claim was exaggerated in the sense that, as noted above, even if for no other reason, the advertising ban was generally complied with. Shields, who had been attorney general from 1917 to 1921 and later became a state senator, in 1933 was appointed by President Roosevelt U.S. district attorney for Utah, which he remained until 1949. http://www.justice.gov/usa/ut/history.html.

---

---

1673
prohibiting the advertisement of any form of tobacco while exacting a fee licensing their sale violated neither the state nor the federal constitution.\footnote{1771}{Opinion Rendered on Tobacco Ad Ban," SLT, Mar. 7, 1923 (9:3). This opinion is not included in the official collection of attorney general opinions for the biennium including 1923, which includes numerous opinions on the Southwick law.}

The following day, when the calendar (or sifting) committee,\footnote{1772}{On Feb. 26 the House speaker had appointed the committee, whose duty was to "consider all bills with respect to their importance in the following order: State, County, Municipal Government, Miscellaneous, and provide a Calendar for each session of the House." House Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 391 (Feb. 26).} by a four to three vote—the minority being composed of Salt Lake Republicans\footnote{1773}{Party affiliation is taken from “Utah Senate Is Republican,” OS-E, Nov. 9, 1922 (7:1).}—adopted a motion to let the bill die in committee rather than return it to the house with a favorable report (“amended to strike the adverse advertising feature”),\footnote{1774}{Deseret News} jumped to the conclusion that that outcome was “practically certain to result in the death of the cigaret bill....”\footnote{1775}{Cigaret Bill Made Special Order of House Business,” SLT, Mar. 8, 1923 (Mar. 8, 1923) (20:5).} In the event, the process of raising the bill from the undead was initiated by Salt Lake Republican William C. Stark, a former secretary of the Salt Lake Commercial Club,\footnote{1776}{Men of Affairs in the State of Utah: A Newspaper Reference Work (n.p.) (1914).} retail coal company manager,\footnote{1777}{1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).} and president of the Utah-Idaho Retail Coal Merchants Association,\footnote{1778}{Outlook Slight for Lower Coal,” SLT, Apr. 8, 1921 (22:3).} who “started the fireworks”\footnote{1779}{Cigaret Bill Made Special Order of House Business,” SLT, Mar. 8, 1923 (Mar. 8, 1923) (20:5).} by moving that the sifting committee be discharged from considering S.B. No. 184 so that the House could consider the bill\footnote{1780}{House Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 508 (Mar. 7).} that “had excited more interest than any other before the legislature.” During the ensuing extended and sharp debate Representative counselor in the General Relief Society Presidency and one of the leaders of the Church’s Social Advisory Committee which was pushing for both alcohol and tobacco reform." Email from Tom Alexander to Marc Linder (Aug. 2, 2011).
Constantine honed his hortatory hyperbole by charging that “gag[ging] the house” would be

“the greatest mistake that this body has yet made... Utah is now the laughing stock of the nation because of the freak Southwick law and this substitute in its present shape is a worse freak: legislating against the business of Utah’s own citizens in favor of those who pay no taxes and do not even have a place of business in the state. The bill in its present form so regulates dealers in the state as to say to the small man, ‘Get out of business and let the big man have it all,’ because the confiscatory licenses will legislate out of business the small dealer. Then again if the Utah tobacco dealer wishes to advertise his wares it forces him to send his advertising to concerns outside of the state to the detriment of the state’s own tax-paying newspapers and printing houses. Why hit the home business solar plexus blows and say to the man who pays no taxes in our state you may have the business that rightfully belongs to the dealers of this state.”

Constantine’s oratory was to no (immediate) avail: following a motion to amend and to amend the amendment to make the bill a special order for the following afternoon, the House on a voice vote tabled all the motions and amendments. A few minutes later, however, those wanting to repeal as much of Southwick as possible countered with a motion to take the bill together with its amendments from the table, which prevailed on a 31 to 21 roll-call vote. Before the vote on scheduling the special order Stark concluded the debate by letting the rest of the cat out of the bag: “He said that he might be prejudiced as he had been smoking cigarets for more than thirty years, but that he would rather see his boy smoke a cigaret than telling such stories as he had heard in the house from some of the members.” Perhaps the fact that Stark was only 38 years old impressed some of his colleagues, who now voted 34 to 18 to take up S.B. No. 184 the following afternoon.

1786House Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 509-10 (Mar. 7). This vote was close to that on final passage (34 to 20) though eight
As the House took up the bill on March 8 “every seat in the house and all of the standing room in the galleries was occupied.” Debate opened with a motion by Republican Randall Lunt Jones (1881-1946), southern Utah’s greatest tourism booster, an architect who worked for the Union Pacific Railroad and was a Mormon leader. His amendment, which was regarded as a “big point in the bill and was warmly contested,” proposed adding this exception and proviso to the advertising ban: “and excepting further that cigars, chewing tobacco and smoking tobacco may be advertised in any newspaper published within the State of Utah, provided however that nothing herein shall be so construed as to permit advertising [sic] of cigarettes in any manner.” Jones argued for this change on the grounds that the many small manufacturers of tobacco products in Utah—a later speaker put the number at 27—would otherwise not be permitted to advertise in the state’s newspapers; looking at the situation from the other end of the transaction, Jones also justified his amendment by reference to the unfairness to Utah newspapers, which were disadvantaged vis-a-vis out-of-state papers regarding the revenue from tobacco ads.

A principal rebuttal came from Republican Alonzo Stookey, a 62-year-old Mormon rancher, civil engineer, and surveyor, who after studying mathematics at the University of Utah was a teacher, principal, and county superintendent for 14 years (in addition to being state superintendent of Sunday schools). Mincing no words, the acid-tongued cattle-raiser insisted on the necessity of doing everything to stop tobacco advertising: “he never had advertised on his ranch and hadn’t gone out of business. He predicted that the tobacco manufacturers would not go out of business if deprived of the privilege and representatives switched sides and two absentees voted. The sifting committee did eventually report S.B. No. 184 favorably, which was then read a second time and placed on third reading calendar. _Id._ at 527 (Mar. 8).

1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); “Randall Jones, Utah Scenic Booster, Dies,” _SLT_, July 11, 1946 (9:7); “Passing of Randall Jones, Beloved Son of Utah,” _SLT_, July 13, 1946 (6:1).

_Utah from Statehood: Historical and Biographical_ 3:928-29 (1919).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

intimated that it would be no great damage to anyone in particular if they did. He declared that he did not want tobacco advertising before his boys."1793

Other representatives—including Constantine—pushed Jones’s points further, adding that, since tobacco users were the majority in Utah as elsewhere, law could not be used to prevent that use. Jones himself then concluded debate on his amendment by urging his colleagues to “consider the rights of those who might think just a little differently from them”1794—a topos to which he would return during the general debate.

By the large majority of 41 to 13 the House then adopted this further evisceration of the Southwick law, the entire 16-member Salt Lake delegation voting Yea (including all three female House members) along with six of 11 Democrats. All 13 representatives casting Nays would also vote against the bill on final passage.1795

The WCTU’s constant refrain echoed in the House chamber when Republican N. Enoch Iverson—who at the 1921 session was the author of a memorial petitioning Congress to pass legislation prohibiting “Oriental aliens,” whose “presence in large numbers in our midst will always be a source of trouble,” from immigrating to the United States1796—opened the debate on passage of the bill, 1794“New Tobacco Bill Passes Legislature, Signed by Governor,” SLT, Mar. 9, 1923 (1:7, at 10:2-3). Constantine illogically argued that he had seen young people receive cigarettes from out of state by the carton at the post office because non-Utah dealers filled orders with no way of knowing their customers’ age. Not only would the amendments not have suppressed this source, but, if advocates were correct in asserting that the revised law would make it more difficult for minors to buy cigarettes in Utah, it would have encouraged the young to place even more mail orders.

1795House Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 541-42 (Mar. 8). There is some confusion in the sources as to whether 10 or 11 (or even 12) Democrats sat in the House. “New Legislature Includes 75 Members: Lone Democrat Holds Senate Place,” Salt Lake Telegram, Jan. 7, 1923 (2:5-6) (11); “Democrats Help 20 Republicans in First Fight,” Salt Lake Telegram, Jan. 8, 1923 (1:1) (10); The Utah Legislature: Centennial History, 1896-1996, at 251-301 (1996) (12); Michael Dubin, Party Affiliations in the State Legislatures: A Year by Year Summary, 1796-2006, at 184 (2007) (10); The most reliable seems to be 11. They were Atwood, Bailey, Brewer, Browning, Hollenbeck, Jacobs, Judd, Naylor, Nix, White, and Wilkins.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

which he charged had been “placed before us in a sort of state of hysteria” by asking: “Do we want the income from tobacco sales? I think we cannot conscientiously license that which we believe to be wrong.”

Democrat T. Samuel Browning, the former mayor of Ogden and president of the Mormon high priest quorum of Weber stake, pithily objected to the bill on the grounds that “a thing was either right or wrong and this was a case of the dollar against his boy.”

Another pro-tobacco celebrant of diversity and moral relativity was Democrat and lawyer Leroy Adelbert Hollenbeck (1856-1950), a most unusual figure, who had previously been elected county judge in Colorado and to two terms in the Colorado House as a Democrat/Progressive; while he was in the Utah legislature he conveniently also edited his hometown newspaper and was an amateur(ish) critic of socialism and Marxism. Hollenbeck unmistakably displayed his deviance on the day the Utah legislature convened by self-publishing a pamphlet—which he dedicated to his fellow legislators without the slightest hint as to how it might in any way be relevant to their work—containing a risibly confused attack on Karl Marx’s theory of Surplus Value and the Law of the Falling Rate of Profit. Exactly two months later, having seemingly made his organization, the corner stone in whose foundation was “one hundred per cent Americanism,” petitioned the legislature to prevent “Oriental aliens,” who could not be assimilated, from acquiring title to land in Utah. House Journal: Fourteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1921, at 63 (Jan. 17).

Leroy A. Hollenbeck, Capitalism versus Socialism and Communism: A Refutation of Socialism and Communism (1939), was an elaboration of the pamphlet mentioned below.

Leroy A. Hollenbeck, Surplus Value and the Law of the Falling Rate of Profit: Or way back to planet Earth, he criticized Iverson from a moral perspective inasmuch as “each man was entitled to his own moral code...and the codes of one could not be called wrong because these differed from another. Every man must judge for himself and it is not the prerogative of this legislature or any other body to say what is right or wrong...”

Although in this absoluteness such a vision was otherworldly—since all societies prohibited certain behaviors—his claim that the smoking debate implicated a moral issue connected back to a fellow representative’s rhetorical effort to turn Browning’s position against him by insisting that “it was not a question of income but a moral question.”

Jones then concluded the debate by returning to his aforementioned rhetorical ploy of re-imagining the controversy as one of state-enforced intolerance of others who thought differently: “‘I don’t smoke and smoke is annoying to me, but that does not give me the right to tell the men who do not think as I do what they shall do.’” Turning to his vocation/avocation, southern Utah tourism, he continued: “‘We are expecting many visitors here in the near future, thousands of them in fact. I have been with many of our visitors during the last few years who have an Adverse Criticism of an Essential Tenet of Socialism (Jan. 8, 1923). Apparently the only library owning a copy is Weber State University in Ogden.

1804In fact, not even Hollenbeck himself believed in such absolute relativity. A few months after the session he published an editorial on moral questions in which he stated outright that: “We all agree on some things as being moral or immoral.” From there he slipped into discussion of a man’s “habits,” which it would be “intolerant” to try to make him give up, because they were “his real rights” and “his life” and “[h]e will violate the law—any old law—prohibition of whisky or tobacco... It matters not to him. [I]n striking at his habits, you may have gone too far and infringed on his real rights. If you have, then, beware, for you will have trouble. Didn’t we see it in the drastic cigarette law. Didn’t both sides later agree to a compromise? Of course the compromise is probably worse than the original law, and if so you will hear from it again.” L. S. Hollenbeck, “Moral Questions,” Duchesne Courier, Sept. 28, 1923 (8:2) (edit.). With regard to smoking in public places and exposing non-smokers to tobacco smoke Hollenbeck was blind to the harm inflicted on others, which he would never have regarded as acceptable collateral damage of the exercise of a right if that activity were, for example, recklessly exposing others to poison gas. On the other hand, the anti-cigarette movement in Utah, as elsewhere, typically failed to justify the prohibition of in-state cigarette sales to adults insofar as they smoked them in private without physically harming others (though when wives and children at home were taken into account, such harmless smoking may have been less commonplace than pro-tobacco forces or libertarians imagined).

come here to see the wonders of the southern part of this state. Most of the men with whom I have mingled, and they are most estimable men, smoke and think nothing of it. We must not expect everybody to see things as we see them, but to be considerate of the rights of others." Jones’s persistent, self-serving conflation of thinking and smoking and of the right to have differing views about smoking and to expose non-smokers to tobacco smoke was grotesquely ironic in light of his admission that male tourists thought “nothing” of smoking (in non-smokers’ presence), whereas Jones pleaded with non-smokers to be considerate of smokers’ right to smoke wherever they felt like it.

In a final effort to take back some of the voluminous clean indoor air space that had been ceded to smokers in the amendment granting public eating place owners the power to permit smoking provided that they posted signs to that effect, Democrat Lawrence Atwood—like his anti-smoking brother-in-law, Senator Warnick, a Mormon farmer from Utah County—offered an amendment to divide restaurants “so that there would be dining rooms for those who smoke and for those who do not.” Following an objection based on a single instance in Salt Lake City, where a hotel’s main dining room was reserved for smokers and another room set aside “as a private dining room where no smoking was allowed,” in which purportedly no meal had been served yet, the chamber defeated the proposal—which essentially would have restored the original Southwick provision—by a vote of 20 to 33,

On final passage 34 House members approved the evisceration of the Southwick law against 20 who cast Nays. Significantly, 15 of 16 Salt Lake representatives (including all three women, one of whom, Lyman, was a high-profile Mormon welfare functionary) voted Yea. Of the nine representatives 1808."New Tobacco Bill Passes Legislature, Signed by Governor,” SLT, Mar. 9, 1923 (1:7, 10:3). Noteworthily the non-smoking room violated the still effective Southwick law because the statutory “extra room” was set aside not for smoking, but non-smoking. This room may also have deterred diners precisely because it was the main dining room.

---

1809House Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 541-42 (Mar. 8). Almon T. Butterfield, the only Salt Laker to vote No, was a Mormon. http://www.humpherys.org/paf/humpherys/aqwn85.htm#2047. In 1921, only five of the 10 Salt Lake representatives had voted for the Southwick bill on final passage, but even three of those had voted for licensure and switched when it became clear that the alternative was Southwick or no law at all. House Journal: Fourteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1921, at 379-80 (Feb. 24).
who had voted on Southwick’s bill in 1921 and on the gutting amendments in 1923, seven voted consistently—that is, for the former and against the latter (or, in one case, against the former and for the latter). Of the two who had voted for Southwick and two years later to weaken the law, one, Mormon Republican and livestock raiser H. H. Crouch, explained that in 1921 it had been estimated that 80 percent of his constituents wanted the anti-cigarette law: “But now those people have reelected me, knowing just how I stand on this subject and I have not received one protest. Evidently the people at home approve of the stand I have taken on this question.” His position was that high license would prevent minors from obtaining cigarettes. Of 11 Democrats six also voted against passage.

House passage of the bill was signaled by the gathering in the Senate gallery of a “considerable crowd” and on the Senate floor of “certain prominent citizens who ha[d] been watching the progress of the cigaret bill....” Because, according to Senator Peters, its “essential fundamentals” had been retained despite the House amendments, he urged the Senate to concur. The only senator to vote Nay (against 15 of her colleagues) was Kinney, who, this time, did not explain her action.

TMA’s lawyer, Charles Dushkind, termed the Utah legislature’s about-face the result of a “strategic error” committed by “reformers...attempting to enforce the law while the legislature was in session. In most instances our opponents show better judgment than that.”

The rather similar editorial reactions of the Mormon Deseret News and the anti-prohibitionist Tribune—both of which celebrated diversity and coexistence—were emblematic of the acquiescence in smoking that would characterize the following four to five decades of laissez-faire even in the only

---

1815 Charles Cushing, “Prohibition as ‘Big Brother’ Fails to Win for Blue Laws,” NYT, May 20, 1923 (sect. XX at 5).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

state with a majority religion that bound its adherents to eschew tobacco altogether and despite the survival there into the 1970s of the fragile remnants of the Southwick law. Without in the slightest conceding that the bill that it had editorially supported a week earlier had been significantly diluted before final passage, the News chose to view the amendments to the Southwick law as an example of the “universal rule” that every community is characterized by divergent views and habits: “Those who enjoy smoking are entitled to smoke as much as they please, provided in doing so they are not offensive to those who do not smoke, many of whom become positively ill when compelled to breathe smoke-laden air. On the other hand the non-smoker is equally entitled when he goes out in public to be able to enjoy a good meal, a theatre or whatever other diversion or pleasure he seeks, free from the, to him, offensive fumes of tobacco smoke.” Despite the unoverlookable fact that, as now amended, the Southwick law no longer protected non-smokers in public eating places and that even in some of the small number of kinds of enclosed public places in which smoking was permissible in extra rooms there was no statutory requirement to prevent the wafting of smoke, the Mormon editorialist, in effect, anticipated the cigarette oligopoly’s late-twentieth-century propaganda to stave off government regulation with a we-can-work-it-out-with-common-courtesy campaign: “The new cigaret bill...is an expression on the part of both sides to outline the ordinary rules of gentlemanly consideration obtained among men of good intentions. Non-smokers who are fair minded will concur in the decision of the legislature to allow the smoker to enjoy his cigar, cigaret or pipe, and on the other hand, the honest smoker...will concede to the non-smoker the consideration which is his due.”

Ironically, when asked why the Mormon hierarchy had caved into business’s demands and abandoned its own religious tenet and public health, a leading Mormon historian sought to dissolve the alleged inconsistency by observing that “Mormon leaders had always been in business.” Moreover, since neither the Word of Wisdom nor any other “revelation” stated that cigarettes (let alone tobacco) should be prohibited in society at large, the church leadership’s attitude toward the issue became a mere “matter of policy,” from which prohibitory position it could therefore “back away...on the basis of public opinion.” Here Professor Thomas Alexander meant that: “You can only go so far in opposing public opinion. The leaders of the LDS Church were realistic in understanding that the public would not support tobacco prohibition, so they backed off.”

---

1816 “The Tobacco Law,” DN, Mar. 9, 1923 (4:1) (edit.).
1817 Email from Prof. Thomas Alexander to Marc Linder (Aug. 3, 2011). In published work Alexander had also erroneously asserted that Southwick’s initiative entailed the empirical scrutiny: in addition to being factually wrong that the prohibition of tobacco was on the Utah legislative agenda during the early 1920s, Alexander cannot sustain his assertion with regard to “the public,” which, on this matter, did not even exist as such a monolithic entity. On the contrary, Utahns and public opinion were fractured, and although the fissure did not run strictly along religious lines, pitting (majority) Mormons against (minority) non-Mormons, the division appears to have reflected a sharp conflict between smokers and non-smokers, which, to a large extent but by no means univocally, overlapped with that sectarian divide.\textsuperscript{1818}

Alexander invoked the experience of liquor prohibition, which “did not work in Utah either, even though the church leadership supported it,” to buttress his argument that when “[t]he people pushed back...the state leaders would back down, whether they were Mormons or not.”\textsuperscript{1819} While superficially pregnant with analogy, the appeal to alcohol prohibition was misleading. First of all, the ban on liquor was much more comprehensive and stringent than Southwick’s ban on cigarette sales and public smoking. Adults were free not only to continue to buy all forms of non-cigarette tobacco, but also to mail order cigarettes from other states in any quantities for their own personal consumption. Second, cigarettes were still a distinctly minority form of tobacco use.\textsuperscript{1820} And, finally, smoking could take place in numerous enclosed public places (such as stores) unconditionally, and even in some Southwick-covered places (such as restaurants) smoking was permitted under rather easily satisfied conditions only marginally inconvenient to smokers. Since alcohol drinkers benefited from no such alternative forms or venues of consumption, resistance to and violation of the relatively permissive Southwick law should have been expected to be much less pervasive and intense than was the case with regard to alcohol drinkers lacking comparable alternative forms and venues of consumption. Consequently, the Mormon hierarchy’s policy choices were considerably less constrained by public opinion than Alexander (whose grasp of the main components of the Southwick prohibition of all tobacco. See above this ch.

\textsuperscript{1818}As explained above, some Mormons smoked and some Mormon legislators opposed Southwick’s bill, while some non-Mormons did not smoke and some non-Mormon legislators voted for Southwick’s bill.

\textsuperscript{1819}Email from Prof. Thomas Alexander to Marc Linder (Aug. 4, 2011).

\textsuperscript{1820}In 1921 and 1923 manufactured cigarettes accounted for only 25.9 and 29.1 percent, respectively, of all tobacco leaf used in the manufacture of cigars, cigarettes, tobacco, and snuff in the United States. Calculated according to data in U.S. Department of Agriculture, \textit{Agricultural Statistics: 1937}, tab. 158 at 130 (1937). Not until 1935 did cigarettes exceed 50 percent.
law was deficient) imagined; in particular, once the church leadership had acquiesced in the overridingly important repeal of the cigarette sales ban in favor of licensure, it would and should at the very least have pushed more strenuously and openly for something akin to designated smoking/nonsmoking areas in order to keep alive the struggle against secondhand smoke exposure.\textsuperscript{1821}

The \textit{Tribune}, which regarded “modification of the obnoxious tobacco law of 1921” as “[t]he best advertised and in some respects the most important issue before the legislature,” also stressed that the amended law “embodies recognition of the rights of smokers as well as nonsmokers. Both classes are far too numerous to be ignored by any body selected to represent the entire state.”\textsuperscript{1822} To be sure, beyond this nod to an undefined set of rights for each, the newspaper, far from being conciliatory, overtly postulated smokers’ chronological and quasi-natural precedence:

The amendment of the law tends to legalize certain practices which experience proved could not be suppressed by legislation and which, indeed, are not sufficiently iniquitous to be suppressed. Liberalization of the provisions with respect to smoking in “enclosed public places” is proper recognition of a practice which is and has been recognized throughout the civilized world ever since tobacco smoking commenced. It is well known that smokers enjoy their relaxation, or “vice”...especially at or immediately following meals, and it has been demonstrated here that they will smoke at such times, law or no law. When those who object to such indulgence are fully advised, as required by the amended law, where smoking is and is not permitted, the predilections and sensibilities of both smokers and nonsmokers are protected.\textsuperscript{1823}

In other words, since there was nothing the law could or should do to stop smokers from smoking wherever and whenever they wanted to smoke, the amendments created the best of all possible worlds by requiring owners of enclosed public eating places to post signs putting non-smokers on notice that smokers held sway there, thus enabling them to about-face and look elsewhere for a (voluntarily) smoking-prohibited restaurant (if any existed) without ever exposing themselves to tobacco smoke-polluted indoor air.

Oddly, although the amendments adopted by the Senate on final passage gutted the bill, especially with regard to ban on public smoking, neither the \textit{Tribune} nor the \textit{Deseret News} reported or evaluated them that way. The former merely observed that the changes were “apparently intended to make more workable the terms of the bill to license the sale of cigarettes,” when in fact, ironically, the strengthened provisions that they displaced had been designed to secure the support of anti-tobacco militants for a bill that repealed Southwick’s ban on cigarette sales. Consequently, Mormons and other smoking opponents received so much less in exchange for acquiescing in that fundamental repeal than the grand compromise for which they had bargained in S.B. No. 184 that the question arises as to whether they would have settled for such an outcome as an original matter and, if not, why they backed the bill in the end.

\textsuperscript{1821}See below this ch.

\textsuperscript{1822}“The Legislature,” \textit{SLT}, Mar. 10, 1923 (6:1) (edit.).

\textsuperscript{1823}“The Legislature,” \textit{SLT}, Mar. 10, 1923 (6:1) (edit.).

In a class by itself was the party-independent Salt Lake Telegram, by this time the smallest of the three papers, which fiercely denounced tobacco regulation and referred to a merchant convicted of selling cigarettes as a “violator of Southwickism.” Back in January, as soon as Sheriff Harries had announced that he would enforce the law’s no-smoking provision in the city and county building, the Telegram editorialized that in “all the history of the state of Utah there is no piece of legislation more asinine than the antismoking law....” A few days later, with no evidence of enforcement in the meantime, the editorialist charged that the law’s “chief evil” was the “hypocrisy attending it, which is infinitely worse than the evils of tobacco.” And the day the new law went into force the paper lovingly wrote of “innumerable cigarettes...burned on the altar of freedom. Today the Southwick anticigaret law is a fading memory of hateful history.” Insisting that “removal of the Southwick law from the statute books of Utah,” of its own sponsoring of which it was “proud,” was “not a victory for tobacco and cigarettes, but a triumph for law and order in Utah,” the Telegram purported to be concerned with eliminating the “hypocrisy at home and stinging ridicule abroad.” Without explaining, for example, why it would not have been possible to enforce the smoking ban in certain indoor public places, the editorialist asserted both that “the example of strict observance of the law is more essential to the welfare of our children than tobacco prohibitions which merely 1825 The Tribune’s weekday and Sunday circulation in 1922 was 42,000 and 71,000, respectively; the weekday figure for the Deseret News, which did not publish Sundays, was 26,000. N. W. Ayer & Son’s American Newspaper Annual and Director 999-1000 (1922).

---

1826 “Chamber Asks for Change in Cigaret Bill,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 6, 1923 (Local page 1:4).
make a farce of the law” and that “the good people who are opposed to the use of tobacco and the children as well will be better off without the Southwick law.”

The press’s global claim that the “new bill nullifies the Southwick act” was blatantly exaggerated and in no respect more so than regarding the retention of the ban on smoking “tobacco in any form in any enclosed public place within the state of Utah, except in extra rooms, compartments or coaches specially provided for smoking purposes,” whose crucial term, “enclosed public place,” was now “construed to mean...theatres, passenger elevators, street cars, interurban and railway passenger coaches, motor and other passenger vehicles employed as common carriers, railway station waiting rooms, [and] State, county and city buildings, excepting that...in any State, county or city building, any public officer who has a private office separate and apart from his public office, may if he so desires, designate such private office as a place where smoking may be permitted....” (The ban on advertising—which meant, for example, as the attorney general opined several weeks before the amended law went into effect, that pictures of “Uncle Ephraim taking a generous-sized corner off a plug of chewing” tobacco displayed on automobiles would be unlawful—has remained in effect ever since.) Clearly, then, although owners of eating places now had discretion to convert them into uninhibited smoking locations, several types of “enclosed public place,” such as elevators and wide swaths of government buildings, did not lend themselves to dual use by means of the construction of “extra rooms,” and would continue to be legally off limits to tobacco smoking.

Although the sheriff’s office had announced shortly before the new bill’s passage that it would make no further arrests for smoking in public places until the aforementioned test cases had been disposed of, on May 16 (eight days after the amended law had gone into effect) Harries dissolved any suspicion that his wave of enforcement in February had been designed to provoke repeal. He 1830a. “Back to the Law,” Salt Lake Telegram, Mar. 10, 1923 (6:1) (edit.). To be sure, contrary to the paper’s claim, the Southwick law’s bans on smoking in various public places and cigarette advertising remained in force.

1832. 1923 Utah Laws ch. 52, § 4, at 110, 114.

1833a. Cluff Reads Cigaret Bill and Says All Tobacco Ads Must Stop May 8,” SLT, Apr. 18, 1923, clipping in Selected Collections from the Archives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 2 (DVD 2002).

now issued a warning to offenders against the law, especially with respect to smoking in public buildings, calling special attention to the state capitol, in whose corridors, according to complaints he had received, people had frequently been seen smoking; reports had identified state employees as smoking in various offices’ public sections: “The practice must stop in all public buildings, Harries said, and promise[d] to arrest offenders.”\footnote{1835} And, despite the virtual fiat that the legislature has conferred on owners to permit smoking, the sheriff was not giving up on enforcement in restaurants and cafes either: he warned them, too, that if they failed to comply with the formality of posting a card declaring a public smoking place, his enforcement campaign would be extended to those locations as well.\footnote{1836}

\textit{Sketch of Utah’s Surviving Unique Partial Indoor Smoking Ban During the Heyday of Smoking Laissez Faire (1923-1976)}

Utah...cannot demand or even expect serious consideration in Washington when the state acts as official jester to the assembly of states.\footnote{1837}

A half-century after the events, one local historian opined that the “whole affair of cigarette prohibition in Utah can be dismissed as part of the season of excess that all America experienced in the twenties.” He went on to assert, self-contradictorily, on the one hand, that “[n]o one will deny that non-smokers have a right to protection from the tyranny imposed by smokers in enclosed public places”—Harries’ enforcement of which right was, after all, the trigger and fulcrum for the national mobilization against the Southwick law—and, on the other hand, that “[w]here the prohibition erred was in promoting an unrealistic law that went far beyond those goals the prohibitionists considered most \footnote{1835}”Smoking in Public Buildings Is Complaint,” \textit{Salt Lake Telegram}, May 16, 1923 (Local Page 1:8).

\footnote{1836}”Sheriff Is Again After Smokers in Public Places,” \textit{SLT}, May 23, 1923 (22:7). On the other hand, two days before the amended law was to go into effect, the prosecutor announced that he would move to dismiss the charges against the 21 defendants (including the original four) arrested in February. “Charges Pending Against 14 Salt Lake Citizens for Alleged Violation of Former Law to Quashed by Prosecutor,” \textit{SLT}, May 6, 1923, clipping in \textit{Selected Collections from the Archives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints}, vol. 2 (DVD 2002).
desirable—protecting minors and controlling the sale of tobacco."\textsuperscript{1838} Not only is this latter assertion factually incorrect—protecting adults from secondhand smoke exposure and prohibiting tobacco advertising ranked among their highest priorities, whereas controlling the sale of non-cigarette tobacco did not—but these alleged excesses long outlived the 1920s.\textsuperscript{1839}

Utah’s statewide ban on smoking in certain enclosed public places did not—contrary to the \textit{U.S. Tobacco Journal}’s Schadenfreude-drenched headline: “Mormons Can Smoke Anywhere, Any Place, Any Time in Utah”\textsuperscript{1840}—expire in 1923: until the modern anti-smoking movement prompted the legislature to enact the Utah Clean Indoor Air Act in 1976, it remained in the Utah Code and was not an entirely dead letter. It was enforced, though with what frequency is unknown.\textsuperscript{1841} For example, in a dance hall in Salt Lake City in 1927, a 22-year-old man was “[a]rrested because he was smoking a cigaret in a public place, and charged with being a disorderly person” when he refused to obey an order to “douse the ‘fag.’”\textsuperscript{1842}

More interesting and consequential is that in 1929—when, according to the Brown and Williamson Tobacco Company, “per capita consumption of tobacco in Utah [was] lower than in any other place in the entire world with [sic] exception of India, where nicotine is taboo”\textsuperscript{1843}—an initiative in the House, whose internal rules continued to prohibit smoking,\textsuperscript{1844} to repeal the amended Southwick

\textsuperscript{1838}John H. S. Smith, “Cigarette Prohibition in Utah, 1921-23,” \textit{UHQ} 41(4):358-72 at 372 (Aut. 1973). Although Smith was aware that many other states had prohibited the sale of cigarettes before 1921, he mistakenly asserted that “the difficulties of enforcing anticigarette laws brought about their repeal within one or two legislative sessions of their enactment.” \textit{Id.} at 359.

\textsuperscript{1839}On the partial advertising ban, which remains in effect, see above this ch.

\textsuperscript{1841}The following survey of the succeeding half-century’s enforcement merely underscores that a detailed study of Utah’s experience of local anti-smoking activity remains a research desideratum.

\textsuperscript{1842}“Cigaret Smoker Lands in Hoose-Gow: Jailed for Refusal to Douse ‘Fag,’” \textit{Salt Lake Telegram}, Feb. 14, 1927 (Local page 1:6-7). A city judge sentenced him to one day in jail. To be sure, it is unclear why a dance hall qualified as a covered “enclosed public place.”

\textsuperscript{1843}“News Notes: It’s a Privilege to Live in Utah,” \textit{Garfield County News} (Panguitch), Mar. 29, 1929 (2:4). This same column, which recounted the statement that company vice president Gregory Graham had recently made in Salt Lake City, ran in numerous Utah newspapers.

\textsuperscript{1844}House Journal: Eighteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1929, law’s surviving public smoking ban, was summarily rejected. Jacob Thompson, a farmer, livestock raiser, and wool grower “deep-rooted in Republicanism,” introduced such a bill in February 1929. Thompson seemed to be as confused about the law as the press. The Telegram, by way of background, mentioned Sheriff Harries’ arrest of “three prominent Salt Lake citizens,” and then, as if struck by amnesia, speculated: “The result, presumably, was the repeal of the rule, but Thompson insists that section 4 of the cigaret law is a ‘joker’ and really did not effect a repeal.” The less forgetful Tribune seemed to mock Thompson more than the law:

> Scanning the voluminous statutes of Utah, Representative Jacob Thompson... discovered one that offended him.
> It prohibits smoking in inclosed public places. ...
> It might mean that it would be unlawful to smoke in the cloak rooms of the house or senate, to smoke in the capitol rotunda or in the elevators.
> The law might also be construed to mean that smoking was taboo in any public place, and, in the last analysis, that smoking would be lawful only in the great open spaces where the wind blows out the matches and lighters never work.

Thompson’s bill garnered a modicum of attention from the Judiciary Committee, which reported it favorably; the full House then adopted the Sifting Committee’s recommendation that it be placed on the House calendar for third reading, but after the Sifting Committee had recommended that it be placed back on the calendar and the House agreed, in the end-of-session rush the Sifting Committee ultimately recommended that the bill’s enacting clause be stricken, and the House accordingly “killed” H.B. No. 74. That the unrepealed ban lived on was unmistakably on display in Ogden in 1847 “‘Joker’ Claimed in Utah Cigaret Law,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 6, 1929 (5:2).

---

1944, where the law had been ignored “for a number of years.” On February 4 a joint board meeting of city and Weber County commissioners was called at the request of the police chief and sheriff to clarify a motion adopted by the same body the day before to prohibit smoking in the city-county building. In the course of discussion the statewide smoking ban in certain enclosed public places was both “upheld and ridiculed,” one “faction” urging literal enforcement and the other insisting that it could not be. Belonging to the latter group were the mayor, who opined that morals could not be legislated, and the police chief, who, in addition to reciting the (legally irrelevant) “fact that smokers and non-smokers had helped build the city-county building,” shared his belief that the habit was one of “personal preference,” although he was personally opposed to smoking. A legal justification for overriding an unambiguously clear and valid state statute the city’s chief law enforcement officer did not offer. Despite having just characterized the dispute as moral, the mayor, joined by all the commissioners, “admitted that persons not addicted to the use of tobacco were unable to find any retreat in the building not permeated by the ‘obnoxious fumes.’” A non-smoking city commissioner announced that, if a resolution were passed banning smoking, he would propose directing city and county law enforcement agencies to assign officers to patrol the building and arrest violators—an admittedly “‘absurd’” proposal, but, he noted, “‘certainly no more absurd than the law on the question.’” The local officials’ utter confusion as to the act’s substance or even words was highlighted by their voting to kill a city commissioner’s proposal to permit all office holders to post “‘no smoking’” or “‘smoking permitted’” signs in their individual offices— in spite of the 1923 law’s proviso that “in any State, county or city building, any public officer who has a private office separate and apart from his public office, may, if he so desires, designate such private office as a place where smoking may be permitted, and so long as such private office is so designated, smoking therein shall not be considered in violation of this Act.” But the joint body also killed the mayor’s proposal to prohibit smoking in all elevators, halls, and meeting rooms during commission sessions, while permitting those in charge of individual offices to designate their preferences. At least one attendee, a justice of the peace, pointed out to the commissioners that they were wearing no clothes: he demonstrated his charge that they were “‘making [them]selves ridiculous’” by requesting permission to include in a published article the announcement that a joint board meeting would soon be called “to consider whether some other law should be enforced.” Having reached

---

1852 “Officials Wrangle over Smoking in Joint Building,” OS-E, Feb. 4, 1944 (B1:1).
1853 1923 Utah Laws ch. 52, § 4, at 110, 114 (codified at Utah Code Annotated § 93-3-2 (1943)).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

an impasse, the joint board voted to postpone final disposition by referring the matter to the chairman (the county chairman) and vice chairman (the mayor) for study and recommendation.\footnote{Officials Wrangle over Smoking in Joint Building,” \textit{OS-E}, Feb. 4, 1944 (B1:1-3). The press appears not to have reported further on resolution of the issue. A few days later the police chief reiterated to the Kiwanis Club that the law was “highly desirable, but impractical” because “[w]e must have the active support of the people.” “Chief Requests Kiwanians’ Aid,” \textit{OS-E}, Feb. 10, 1944 (1:3). At the same time, officials at Weber College in Ogden, which until recently had banned smoking anywhere on campus, relaxed that rule because they had found it “impossible to enforce”; smoking remained prohibited in school buildings, but was now permitted outside. “Officials Clarify Smoking Rule,” \textit{OS-E}, Feb. 9, 1944 (7:4). Though originally and for decades a Mormon school, more than a decade earlier it had been taken over by the state.}

In 1944, the Mormon church also pressed for enforcement of Utah’s partial public smoking ban, focusing attention especially on public transportation. By the middle of the last full year of World War II, which was characterized by a shortage of cigarettes for civilians\footnote{Cigarettes to Be Scarce,” \textit{NYT}, Oct. 8, 1944 (11); “Cigarette Shortage to Continue,” \textit{NYT}, Oct. 18, 1944 (6).} driven by the huge military consumption, the \textit{Deseret News} devoted a lengthy editorial (“Newcomers May Not Know It—But It’s Illegal”) to the increasing number of violations on street cars and buses in Salt Lake City and its suburbs. Often the vehicles were so crowded that operators were unable to see passengers smoking, and sometimes they simply ignored violations. Preferring (without explanation) not to believe that “anyone would willfully violate this law,” the editorialist felt that violators—especially the new arrivals from states and cities lacking such bans—were unaware of the law’s existence; to be sure, signs on street cars and buses notified the public of the prohibition, but they were easily overlooked or liable to be regarded as obsolete. The newspaper pleaded on behalf of thousands who found tobacco smoke “offensive” and did not want to be “forced to inhale it against their will,” especially since they had “watched the increase of smoking in cafes and dining rooms and cafeterias without raising their voices in protest”—presumably because the gutting of the Southwick law in 1923 enabled all owners of enclosed public eating places to turn them lawfully into entirely smoking-permitted areas just by posting signs—“but they feel that they, at least, should be permitted to ride buses and street cars without having to submit to breathing second-hand tobacco smoke.”\footnote{By 1944 the armed forces accounted for 39 percent of cigarette consumption. “Worse Days Ahead, Say Cigarette Men,” \textit{NYT}, Dec. 14, 1944 (18).}
A month later the Mormon church made its move when a 10-member delegation, led by one of the 12 apostles, appeared before the Utah Public Service Commission urging immediate strict action to enforce the ban in public conveyances. The commission chairman quickly agreed that it was a misdemeanor to smoke tobacco in such places “unless special compartments or sections” were provided, adding that since 1937 smoking had been allowed on interstate and state buses “on certain seat sections, usually the back row”; he also admitted that smoking on trains was not always confined to smoking compartments, even when they were furnished. But the chairman stated that steps would be taken in “the very near future” to enforce the ban.1858

Support for protection from secondhand smoke exposure in public transport had apparently spread such extensive roots by the end of World War II that in 1946 even the Salt Lake Tribune, which in 1921 and 1923 had strenuously opposed Southwick’s approach, found its heart for beleaguered nonsmokers. Complaining of “flagrant violations” of the no-smoking law he had experienced during a bus ride from Ogden to California, Army Chaplain John W. Fitzgerald wrote Utah Attorney General Grover Giles1859 stating that “‘[n]on-smokers...object to breathing poisonous and obnoxious tobacco fumes in public vehicles’”1860 and suggesting that “the state post a plain clothes officer on each bus to enforce the law”1861 and “remove smokers from buses.”1862 The attorney general acknowledged that the law should be enforced, but observed that the state had failed to appropriate funds for enforcement and dismissed hiring plain clothes

---

1858“Smoking Ban to Be Enforced,” DN, Aug. 30, 1944 (9:4-5). The Public Service Commission rules permitted motor carriers to designate car rear seats as smoking-permitted. “LDS Urges State Ban Bus Smoking,” Salt Lake Telegram, Aug. 30, 1944 (10:2). Such a rule did not conform to the law, which permitted smoking only in “extra rooms, compartments or coachs,” but not in “sections.” 1923 Utah Laws ch. 52, § 4, at 110, 114 (codified at Utah Code Ann. § 93-3-2 (1943)). Despite the great communitarian fervor inspired by World War II, some smokers ignored and defied no-smoking rules voluntarily implemented by privately owned railroads. For example, the Boston and Maine Railroad placed a large ad in a New Hampshire newspaper in 1943 describing how five of nine passengers violating the company’s clearly posted “‘smoking in smoking cars ONLY’” rule protested even after the conductor had pointed out the signs to them. “Let’s Smother Mother—This Is a Free Country,” Portsmouth Herald, Mar. 29, 1943 (3:1-5) (advertisement).

1860“Spotlighting Utah,” San Juan Record (Monticello, UT), Jan. 17, 1946 (5:1). This column ran in numerous Utah papers.

1862“Spotlighting Utah,” San Juan Record (Monticello, UT), Jan. 17, 1946 (5:1).
officers as prohibitively expensive.\textsuperscript{1863} The chaplain, the \textit{Tribune} editorialized, was merely express[ing] sentiments often entertained by many who have suffered the imposition in silence. [P]eople who flaunt [sic; should be flout] the law, ignore the regulations and behave like hoodlums ought to be ejected from all public places and vehicles where “no smoking” signs are displayed.

\begin{quote}

They forfeit any claim to leniency they may assert...; they are boorishly indifferent to the comfort and enjoyment of nonsmokers....

If...the legislature cannot appropriate funds enough to put plain clothes officers on the many buses to take these offenders in custody, the citizens who travel over the various lines should be deputized to serve without pay and authorized to report violations to the bus drivers and to the police....\textsuperscript{1864}
\end{quote}

Within days Giles discussed means of enforcing the bus smoking ban with a statewide conference of county officials.\textsuperscript{1865} The attorney general’s engagement with the issue was impressive considering that five years earlier he had written an opinion in which he mistakenly claimed that the legislature had repealed the public smoking prohibition (while at the same time opining that the legislature had the power to prohibit the sale of tobacco and cigarettes entirely).\textsuperscript{1866}

An extended debate in the \textit{Tribune} in 1947-48 revealed that even during the absolute heyday of smoking laissez-faire, at least in Utah, non-smokers fought back, in part because an awareness of the existence of a semi-dormant ban on public smoking survived. A few days before Christmas 1947 the newspaper published a letter to the editor by war veteran Arthur Jensen, who ironically remarked on the “Utah, the friendly state” license plate motto and the “No Smoking” sign in the employment office where he was looking for a job, which he otherwise encountered only in the state tax office, which issued license plates. Because, in contrast, no such signs were to be seen at Okinawa or elsewhere out...

\textsuperscript{1863}\textsuperscript{a} Enforcement Asked on Smoking Law,” \textit{OS-E}, Jan. 10, 1946 (4:6).

\textsuperscript{1864}\textsuperscript{a} Smoking Where Forbidden Should Be Stopped,” \textit{SLT}, Jan. 12, 1946 (6:2) (edit.).

The attorney general’s reply to Fitzgerald did not appear among his opinions in his \textit{Biennial Report}.

\textsuperscript{1865}\textsuperscript{a} Giles Will Speak,” \textit{OS-E}, Jan. 16, 1946 (3:2).

\textsuperscript{1866}\textsuperscript{a} Biennial Report of the Attorney General to the Governor of the State of Utah for the Biennial Period Ending June 30, 1942, at 312-13 (No. 72, Feb. 15, 1941). In response to a question concerning the advertising ban, Giles opined that the 1921 law, “because of the widespread use of tobacco, was impractical, its enforcement impossible, and the Legislature in 1923 repealed the act, with the exception of one section” dealing with advertising.
in the Pacific, the vet wondered whether “these ‘state parasites’” were “so delicate they can’t stand a little cigaret smoke.” Without understanding that he had identified a quarter-century-old exemption from the statute, Jensen related that the “fellow in his private office had a cigaret in his hand, a privileged man, I suppose, not a citizen.”

This broadside provoked a visceral controversy that lasted for two months. The first responder saw Jensen as a typical smoker in that he regarded as unfriendly anyone or anything that interfered with his “‘rights’ (contaminating the air and blowing smoke in the faces of any and all who may be around)....” Turning the screw further, the response attacked smokers in general for lacking any “consideration for that other portion of humanity that doesn’t need a drug to get a little enjoyment out of life” and called for even more no smoking signs.

The debate took an unexpected turn with the intervention of Frank W. Joesten, who during the New Deal had been a Utah lieutenant of Democratic National Committee Chairman James Farley. Joesten, who sympathized with Jensen, related that he had taken up the issue six months earlier with the governor—Democrat Herbert Maw was a Mormon who opposed relaxing enforcement of Utah’s liquor law—at the protest of some returned vet and the governor assured me in a letter that the tax commission would have the sign removed.” Joesten, who was apparently unaware of the law, conceded that it was “possible that these ‘bureaucrats’ have found some loophole to crawl through and put the signs back up but the vengeful voters won’t forget this on election day.” While purporting not to smoke, Joesten was manifestly gladdened that “[t]he banks, post office, federal income tax and all public offices have long ago put the ‘No Smoking’ signs in the ash barrel where they belong,” because they were “offensive to a big percentage of our people, notably to the returned vets.”

---

1871 Frank W. Joesten, “No Smoking, Please?” SLT, Jan. 25, 1948 (18A:5) (ltr to editor). If these federal offices had in fact at one time posted such signs, they would not have been required to do so by a Utah state law, which would have had no jurisdiction over them.
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

turn, another Utahn who confirmed that all of those offices lacked signage complained that “I am forced to breathe second-hand smoke which is blown into my face by the cigarette, cigar and pipe smokers who lack the decency to respect the rights of others to breathe pure air.”1872 The letters to the editor debate concluded with a contribution by a Mrs. R. J. from Ogden, who, stressing that she became “quite ill... when forced to breathe smoke-filled air,” wondered whether, if she worked in a public office, she would simply have to give up her livelihood “just for a few smokers who come in for a few minutes and yet have to befoul the air the rest of the day....” Shifting the terms of the controversy away from the moral sphere by bringing to bear the crucial point some years ahead of her time, she insisted that: “it isn’t the idea that smoking stinks! It’s the fact that smoking is deleterious to health.” Her final (ironic) word also underscored that even anti-smoking militants who had not lost track of the existence of the Southwick law’s ban on public smoking did not entertain inflated expectations of its enforcement to achieve smoke-free indoor public space: “We can control smoking in public places.... Let us not even mention that it is against the law to smoke in public buildings and vehicles.”1875

In the meantime, the upshot of the dispute in Ogden continued unresolved. Even as late as 1955, a resident who was outraged over her exposure to tobacco smoke in restaurants (though willing to accept accommodation in the form of separate sections at counters and booths) observed in the local newspaper that “one notices that there is no smoking allowed in public buildings” in Utah,1874 but she succeeded only in provoking contradiction from another reader, who asked why the city did not start enforcing the law by posting no-smoking signs at every entrance to the Municipal Building as well as on every floor.1875 But the amnesia that had descended over both the law itself and the Ogden city government’s quondam interest in compliance with it was brightly illuminated three years later during city council discussion of a new pool hall law: “Goaded by statements that the new measure was severe in its non-smoking requirements,” City Attorney Paul Thatcher “left the Council chambers for a few moments and returned with a heavy volume from which he read a section making it a misdemeanor to smoke

---

1873 Mrs. R. J., “Control Smoking,” SLT, Feb. 20, 1948 (14:1-3) (ltr to editor). As an example of health impacts, she mentioned that “[i]nhaling smoke is distressing inasmuch as it often starts a coughing spasm and choking.”
in public place....” From the perspective of the Ogden Standard-Examiner, “[o]ne saving grace in the law” was the discretion accorded owners to post eating places smoking-allowed or to provide special smoking rooms in railway stations and hotels. The salient upshot of the council members’ deliberations was their “agree[ment] that it is a law a little out of date in many ways.”

By 1961 sufficient momentum, presumably driven by the proliferation of smoking even in Mormon Utah, had built up to coordinate the state with national trends that its House of Representatives unanimously passed a bill that stripped away additional elements of the Southwick law’s ban on public smoking. Guided by the notion that the prohibition “should be enforced where it can, removed where it cannot,” the House articulated as its philosophy: “‘Smokers have a right to smoke; I have a right to breath [sic] clean air.’” Yet the “test” for implementing that philosophy was blatantly incompatible with it—namely, “allow[ing] smokers the right to smoke ‘in places I can walk out of.’ Where people are held in captive air...the ban should be enforced.” Why smokers should receive absolute and, in effect, exclusive priority in restaurants and cafes, legislators failed to explain, but House Bill No. 137 proposed to strike, after forty years, coverage of eating places and railway station waiting rooms altogether. What the press characterized as “[t]ighten[ing] the clamps on smoking” in buses turned out to be somewhat less unalloyed. On the one hand, the bill required passenger-carrying common carriers to cooperate in enforcing the law and to post no-smoking signs and drivers to advise passengers of the ban and of the penalty for its violation and promptly to report violators to law enforcement officers. On the other hand, H.B. No. 137 conferred on owners the discretion to declare any enclosed rest or wash room a smoking room merely by posting a sign. Despite a unanimous vote in the lower chamber, three weeks later the Senate voted to kill the bill.

Southwick’s long amputated public smoking ban survived that threat, but its prominent mention three years later in a Tribune article on little known and largely ignored laws as “[o]ne of the most often violated laws”\textsuperscript{1882} suggested that presence in or removal from the Utah Code might be a mere formality. However, events at the beginning of the 1970s suggested otherwise. When the state fire marshal proposed a bill to the legislature in 1971 prohibiting smoking in various places for purposes of fire prevention, he made it clear that he did not quarrel with the existing law’s ban for medical or comfort purposes.\textsuperscript{1883} The bill, however, repealed the surviving provisions of Southwick’s ban on public smoking, substituting for it the fire chief’s empowerment to order owners of a broad array of places in which conditions were such as to make smoking a hazard to post No Smoking signs and declaring those who smoked in such places guilty of a misdemeanor.\textsuperscript{1884} The bill as introduced had lacked such a provision, but as amended in committee and passed by the House, the measure provided that owners “may post No Smoking signs and designate areas where smoking is permitted, subject to approval of the Fire Chief.”\textsuperscript{1885} In other words, the House dropped Southwick’s statutorily imposed prohibition of smoking in a limited number of public places in favor of a merely permissive ban within owners’ discretion.\textsuperscript{1886} Although the House—whose own more expansive no-smoking rule now read: “No person shall be permitted to smoke within the House or gallery, in and out of session, and it shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to enforce this rule”\textsuperscript{1887}—passed the bill by a vote of 38 to 26,\textsuperscript{1888} the Senate killed it,\textsuperscript{1889} thus \textsuperscript{1883}“Old Law on No Smoking Also Labeled No Safety,” SLT, Mar. 15, 1972 (17:4-5).

1876–Old Law Bans Public Puffing,” OS-E, Aug. 8, 1958 (1B:3).

\textsuperscript{1885}Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Utah: Thirty-Ninth Session of the Legislature...1971, at 510-11, 681 (Feb. 19, Mar. 3).

\textsuperscript{1886}A provision in a substitute version of the bill that apparently was not adopted provided that owners “may post conspicuous No Smoking signs in all areas within these premises where smoking shall be prohibited for reasons other than” the aforementioned (fire) hazard-related reasons and that those smoking where such signs were posted were also guilty of a misdemeanor. http://images.archives.utah.gov (Substitute H.B. No. 66, § 3, bill text). A fire-hazard bill with this language was introduced in 1973, but it was killed. Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Utah: Fortieth Session of the Legislature...1973, at 313, 1047-48 (Feb. 1, Mar. 8) (H.B. No. 201, by Gardner and Orton).

\textsuperscript{1887}Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Utah: Thirty-Ninth Session of the Legislature...1971, at XII (Rule 18).

\textsuperscript{1888}Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Utah: Thirty-Ninth Session of the Legislature...1971, at 18 (Rule 18).
leaving the half-century-old Southwick law still alive.

The Salt Lake County commissioners were also directly confronted with the issue in 1972 by German immigrant Hermann Neumann, who complained that he had attended a meeting at a county multi-purpose center at which “‘the whole place’” was “‘filled with smoke.’” When he told a security guard about the 51-year-old state law and asked him to enforce it, the latter’s refusal triggered this revealing dialog: “Guard: ‘Are you Mormon?’ Mr. Neumann: ‘Yes.’ Guard: ‘That explains it!’” The county commissioners, whose chambers were posted with no-smoking signs, lamely replied that “they would ‘follow the law as far as possible,’” before passing the buck for study to the county attorney, whose deputy later (incorrectly) expressed his feeling that the state law “would ban smoking except where officials would permit it.” As soon as the Southwick law and its real prohibitory bite had once again re-emerged in public consciousness, the conflict between smokers and non-smokers immediately loomed: “concerned [county] employees began making their ‘smoking allowed’ signs. Some even substituted ‘preferred’ or ‘encouraged’ for ‘allowed.’”

By 1973, with Arizona having crossed a threshold by enacting the first so-called modern (but very limited) designated-smoking area law, the Utah legislature, in connection with undertaking a sweeping revision of its penal code, repealed and then re-enacted Southwick’s ban on public smoking, this time converting the misdemeanor/jail punishment to an infraction/fine penalty. The press described this change as “[outer]law[ing] smoking where signs are posted not to smoke, reversing present law allowing smoking only where permission is designated.” As a sign of legislators’ intensifying and coalescing personal anti-smoking militancy, at the outset of the session both chambers, which had banned smoking since statehood, finally extended the prohibition to committee rooms as well. The Senate, which adopted the amended rule without debate and unanimously, limited the ban to “committee meetings while committees are in session.” The more radical House rule amendment, which prohibited smoking in committee rooms both in and out of session, prompted lengthy debate, during which several members “said smoking was extremely offensive to them and one said he couldn’t ‘concentrate on the important matters before us if I have to sit in smoke-filled committee rooms.’” Ultimately, the House voted 49 to 16 for smoke freedom.

---

1891See below ch. 23.

At the 1975 session, coinciding with the enactment of Minnesota’s landmark but still merely designated smoking area law, the Utah legislature took a step that objectively imparted a dynamic to the anti-smoking law (and movement) that would soon catapult it into the modern transitional period. Proceeding from the “widely-accepted and medically proven fact” that tobacco smoking substantially increased smokers’ likelihood of falling victim to cancer and heart disease, House Joint Resolution No. 15 found (with less certitude) that “it also appears that the inhalation of smoke by non-smokers of tobacco from tobacco being smoked by a smoker may have much the same results [sic] on the non-smoker as if he or she actually smoked.” The legislature characterized its aforementioned 1973 revision of the penal code as having “made provisions to make unlawful smoking of tobacco in public places,” but then declared that despite that step and various ordinances adopted by local governments in its wake, “the law enforcement agencies and officers charged with the same being enforced have almost without exception failed to effectuate such enforcement for one reason or another.” Consequently, the legislature resolved that “all law enforcement agencies and officers charged with enforcement of the statutes of Utah are directed to enforce the restrictions and prohibitions against smoking in public places contained in these statutes in the manner contemplated thereby.”

---

1898See below ch. 24.
1899One of the resolution’s House sponsors may not have shared or foreseen this development in characterizing it as “mostly meant to remind smokers of the discourtesy of smoking in the presence of nonsmokers.” “Utility Bill Rates Doomed, Weber Legislator Says,” OS-E, Feb. 7, 1975 (1A:1, at 2A:1) (Rep. Glade Sowards).
Repeal, Reinforcement, Last New Laws, and First Public Smoking Bans

In order to preclude pretextual claims of lack of knowledge, the legislature also directed the secretary of state to send copies of the resolution to all of Utah’s county attorneys, county commissioners, city attorneys, city commissioners, mayors, sheriffs, and police chiefs.\(^{1900}\) The action was not uncontroversial: unlike the Senate, which adopted the resolution unanimously,\(^{1901}\) the House saw 20 members vote Nay.\(^{1902}\)

Quickly local governments all over the state did in fact begin implementing enforcement,\(^{1903}\) although, despite the American Cancer Society’s complaint about Utah’s “long-standing but generally unenforced law,”\(^{1904}\) prior municipal observance of the law had not been unheard of.\(^{1905}\) All this interactive statewide-local momentum\(^{1906}\) set the scene for enactment in 1976 by huge majorities\(^{1907}\) of \(^{1904}\) Signs to Emphasize ‘No-Smoking’ Law,” OS-E, Nov. 28, 1974 (1B:7-8).

\(^{1900}\) 1975 Utah Laws H.J.R. No. 15 at 1115-1116

\(^{1905}\) For example, the mayor of South Ogden (a town of about 10,000) stated in connection with the commitment by all the city council members to enforce the law within the framework of their various official responsibilities that “the city actually has been ‘observing the law since 1969.’” “Unlawful to Smoke at South Ogden City Hall, Council Says,” OS-E, Apr. 16, 1975 (18B:3-8).

\(^{1906}\) To be sure: “Pledges of support from local officers immediately followed the legislative action, but many officers said actual enforcement was difficult to impossible.” “Utah Legislators Agitate for Cut in Income Taxes,” OS-E, Jan. 21, 1976 (1:1-2 at 2:4-5). By inadequate enforcement was apparently meant that violators were asked to put out their cigarettes, but no arrests were made. “House Votes to Consider Stronger Antismoking Enforcement,” SLT, Jan. 21, 1976 (4:1-6). City and county attorneys’ refusal to file charges prompted introduction of an “innocuous bill” in 1976 that merely transferred enforcement powers from them to state and local health boards, for which however the clean indoor air act was then substituted. “Far-Reaching Anti-Smoking Bill Passed by Both Houses,” Sunday Herald (Provo), Feb. 1, 1976 (16:4-7).

\(^{1907}\) H.B. No. 25 passed the House and Senate a vote of 51 to 16, 59 to 5, and 54 to 5, and 21 to 1 and 23 to 3, respectively. Journal of the House of Representatives of the State the Minnesota (MCIAA)-like Utah Clean Indoor Air Act, which enormously expanded the scope of covered places, but, ironically, unlike the Southwick law, absolutely prohibited smoking nowhere, replacing that approach with the feckless designated smoking area regime, which became the hallmark of late-twentieth-century regulation. This transitional character was underscored by its chief sponsor, Mormon Democrat Gerald Woodmansee, in explaining to his House colleagues why he regarded the bill as “fair”: “It is not an anti-smoking bill; in fact, it will give provisions for smoking so that you could call it either way if you would want to—a smoking bill or a non-smoking bill.”

In 1921 anti-smoking activists were operating under a decided disadvantage in Utah because they acted at the tail end of the era of anti-cigarette/smoking legislation when the few states that still had such laws on the books were repealing them. With the half-century era of national smoking laissez-faire looming, a single state would have had to overcome exceedingly powerful economic forces and social-psychological trends in order to sustain even a partial public no-smoking regime. What is remarkable about the legislative process in Utah is that when the Standish bill was introduced in early 1923 to repeal the Southwick law, it initially had very little support; only after Sheriff Harries had undertaken a series of high-profile arrests did stronger backing arise, but even then the compromise bill that was devised in certain respects actually strengthened the Southwick regime. Only during the last few days of the session was it watered down, though, again, even then it retained certain prohibitory elements that no other state law embodied until the end of the century (absolute smoking bans in various public places in contradistinction to designated smoking areas) or ever (e.g. with regard to advertisements).

The crucially explosive issue in 1923, once Harries entered the scene, was restaurant smoking, but this confrontation could have been handled differently in order to defuse it. First of all, the anti-smoking movement should have combated... the widespread misunderstanding (especially outside of Utah) that smoking was per se prohibited in eating places by widely publicizing the fact that so long as owners created separate rooms, smoking remained lawful. Harries could and should have approached the matter from that perspective. His motivation is unclear: he repeatedly stated that he would enforce the law until it was repealed, but he apparently did not want repeal because after Southwick’s dilution in 1923 he continued to enforce whatever shreds of the law were left (such as signage).

One possible (legislative) compromise would have been designated smoking/nonsmoking sections. To be sure, this regime may be virtually without value as a public health matter, but in fact many states adopted this regime in the last quarter of the twentieth century (for example, Iowa relied on it exclusively from 1978 to 2008). If Utah had enacted such a system in the 1920s, it would at least have legislatively acknowledged, kept alive, and reinforced the notion that secondhand tobacco smoke was a public health problem and that people who objected to exposure were not (exclusively) religiously-motivated ideological extremists, thus making a small but enduring dent in laissez-faire.

---

1911 See below Part VI.
1912 When the Utah legislature in 1976 was considering the bill that became the Utah Clean Indoor Air Act, Ogden Democratic Senator Darrell Renstrom remarked that “many Utahns are hesitant to take action on the matter for fear of ‘being criticized’ or linked with the ‘dominant’ church in the State. He was referring to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints’ avowed stance against smoking.” “Utah Legislature Vote Gives Strength to Statute Curbing Smoking Areas,” SLT, Jan. 31, 1976 (1:3-5).
The Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States: The New Cigarette Oligopoly’s Legislative and Propaganda Arm—A Proto-Tobacco Institute (1915-1922)

Scarcely does a legislative season begin when interests inimical to tobacco loosen a veritable flood of anti-tobacco measures of every description. On some occasions the tobacco industry seemed to be facing a perfect epidemic of hostile legislation. ...

Undoubtedly the tobacco trade in every State, supported by the great army of consumers, constitutes a force sufficiently powerful to combat hostile legislation. But to set that force in motion, to render it effective, and to secure concerted and quick action, it is necessary to supply direction and leadership. This is a task of no ordinary difficulty, especially in cases, as is frequently true, where legislative measures are introduced and advanced to a point of passage before the trade or the public at large is at all aware of their pendency. It is here that the services of a national bureau with its eyes wide open, and with adequate connections in every State...becomes [sic] indispensable.¹

In the wake of the resolution of the anti-trust action in 1911 by which the American Tobacco Company’s “Trust monopoly was replaced by oligopoly” ² and especially by the time the United States entered World War I in 1917, an understanding of the industry’s nationwide efforts to repeal or defeat state-level legislation to control or prohibit cigarette sales can be considerably enhanced by paying attention to the often behind-the-scenes, subterranean, and secret activities of the industry’s new public trade organization. This perspective also embeds the analysis of developments in Iowa in a national context.

The Tobacco Merchants Association was formed in 1915 in response to the consequences of the U.S. Supreme Court’s decree that ATC was an attempt to monopolize and a monopolization.³ To be sure, James McReynolds, the special assistant to the attorney general prosecuting the case (who was later appointed by President Wilson attorney general and then associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court), characterized the plan for disintegration of the Tobacco Trust as a “‘plain subterfuge which deserves an expeditious commitment to the scrap-heap’” because “it was merely a scheme to create three big holding companies in place of one, and...these three companies would be practically under the same control as the one.” The circuit court upheld ATC’s proposal under which ATC retained assets giving it 33 percent of the value of cigarette production and two entities to be organized (Liggett & Myers Tobacco Company and P. Lorillard Company) were apportioned 21 and 26 percent, respectively, for a grand total of 80 percent. Moreover, the 29 individual defendants retained 35 percent of ATC’s voting stock and received 40.76 percent of each of the two new cigarette producers. Little wonder that the independent tobacco companies complained that these entities would still dominate and “could crush” the independents.

---

¹ President Bloch’s Address a Thorough Survey of Industry’s Progress,” USTJ 99(20):12, at 53 (May 19, 1923) (Pres. Jesse Bloch speech at TMA convention).

Nevertheless, largely as a result of the so-called Camel Revolution, launched by R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company in 1913 (which within five years secured a 40-percent market share) and soon countered by Ligget & Myers and ATC with Chesterfield and Lucky Strike, respectively, a new oligopolistic competitive regime emerged that by 1915 prompted TMA’s president to explain that: “Since the disintegration of the former tobacco combination into a number of rival concerns competition has been so keen and so violent that the industry has become very much demoralized.” Even at the organization’s first exploratory meeting on September 25, 1915—called by “the nicotine press,” which purportedly believed that it could not prosper unless the industry was at peace—its counsel described its main object as a union of all industry interests, elements, and branches (including leaf dealers, larger manufacturers, cigar store chains, and smaller independent dealers) in order to effect changes in business methods designed to remedy trade evils. The American Tobacco Company’s chief counsel, Junius Parker, declared that it was “high time” for an industry with an annual product totaling $700,000,000 to form a trade organization. During the weeks before TMA’s formal founding on November 8, the group stressed that one dimension of its activity would be “to keep a watchful eye on legislation affecting the tobacco trade.” In the past, a spokesman argued, “‘tobacco people’”

---

9“Tobacco Men Form $1,500,000,000 Union,” NYT, Nov. 9, 1915 (18) (Jacob Wertheim).
10“Tobacco War Ends; Cigarettes to Rise,” NYT, Sept. 26, 1915 (11).
11“Meet Today to End Tobacco Trade War,” NYT, Nov. 8, 1915 (14).
had been so busy fighting one another that the government found the business “easy prey” for tax increases. “All” that TMA was aiming at was the “square deal” that the industry’s disorganization had prevented it from achieving. Whatever kernel of truth this claim may have embodied made a mockery of the very effective lobbying and bribery in which the Tobacco Trust, as the de facto trade organization for two decades, had engaged to defeat anti-cigarette legislation. In any event, the industry’s very size required “some power, some substantial organization to speak for it with influence and authority,” and there was no reason to doubt the president’s expectation that TMA would soon be one of the country’s biggest trade organizations.

TMA’s Intertwined Lobbying and Propaganda Functions

Outright tobacco bans were passed in twelve states. In response, the Tobacco Merchants Association was formed in 1915, with the central task of squelching hostile legislation.

TMA’s articles of association set out that one of the principal objects for which the organization was formed was “to protect the tobacco industry from unfair and hurtful movements and agitations” as well as “to oppose the passage and procure the repeal of unjust and detrimental legislation affecting the tobacco industry....” Already by the time of the 1918 annual meeting of the board of directors, the president praised TMA for having defeated state-level anti-tobacco legislation. In addition, as part of its mission to counteract anti-tobacco...
propaganda, it had not only “distributed thousands of pamphlets demonstrating the harmlessness of the use of tobacco products,” but had also “persuaded the Industrial Commission of the State of New York to promulgate rules and regulations permitting smoking in factories, whereas previously it was a misdemeanor even to sample a cigar or cigarette in a factory,” thus making a vitally important contribution to the normalization of smoking in the workplace, where “arrests for smoking” had been “reported almost daily,” but many employers supported the change because “employees would work more enthusiastically if permitted to smoke.”

A report of the new organization’s ways and means committee stressed that no national tobacco organization was “known to have extended its activities to State or local matters, nor is it possible for them to keep in touch with the various movements that spring up from time to time in different parts of the country that are intended to injure the tobacco industry, such as high licenses, prohibitive statutes, anti-tobacco agitation, elimination of smoking car facilities or overstringent regulation in regard to smoking in various buildings, all of which not only intend to undermine the tobacco industry and diminish its income, but every successful move against the industry brings renewed vigor, strength and encouragement to the anti-tobacco forces.” Of overriding importance in the present context is the committee’s insight that such local measures “are even more injurious to the tobacco industry than excessive Federal taxation, for taxation simply diminishes the net income, while prohibitive and restrictive measures reduce the volume of business and cut out the income altogether.”

---

19 Jacob Wertheim First President of Tobacco Merchants’ Association,” WTJ 42(46):2 (Oct. 15, 1915). Even before the tobacco trust was dissolved, an organization, the National Allied Tobacco Trades Association, had been formed to oppose all sumptuary legislation and especially to monitor the Anti-Saloon League and the WCTU in order to insure that the tobacco industry not sink in the same boat with liquor. The NATTA’s secretary, Phil Grau, argued that: “The constant repetition of anti-cigarette laws and the ever menacing and threatening attitude of prohibitionists and Anti-Saloon League agitators regarding tobacco forced the conclusion upon them that sooner or later their business would be looked upon as the next unpopular commodity in the market, and it would be as viciously attacked as the liquor industry is today.” “To Fight Prohibition,” USTJ, vol. 72, July 24, 1909 (1:4). The U.S. Tobacco Journal was skeptical of NATTA’s approach because liquor prohibition had not revealed itself to be an enemy of the tobacco trade and
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

The kind of state legislative presence that the new organization would mobilize was bluntly limned by the ways and means committee report (Congressional action would be launched on a far grander scale encompassing a delegation of 50 to 100 representatives and mass meetings in large cities):

Let us suppose a case where a bill has been introduced in a certain State legislature imposing prohibitory license fees for the sale of tobacco products. Such cases occur not infrequently...and we also know that such bills have been passed and that no organized opposition has ever been presented. A live trade organization would not only appear by its committee and perhaps also by special counsel to oppose such measures, but it would send one or more of its representatives to the State in question to organize the trade and to march down to the legislative halls with a big body of men. The Association would also circularize the tobacco trade in that State and move them into action.20

On November 18, 1922, Charles Dushkind, from its founding until his death in 1945 TMA’s managing director and general counsel,21 which performed some of the legislative monitoring, lobbying, and propaganda functions later conducted on a much larger, lavishly funded, and more sophisticated scale by the Tobacco Institute, sent a special bulletin to cigarette manufacturers pointing out that prior to the 1921 state legislative session Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, North Dakota, and Tennessee had cigarette (sales) prohibition laws, but that after Arkansas, Iowa, and Tennessee had repealed their laws and Utah enacted one that year, Kansas, North Dakota, and Utah were still left “in the prohibition column.” Dushkind expressed the opinion that the three repeals “after repeated efforts, especially at a time when anti-cigarette agitation was most intensive, should operate as a stimulant to renewed activities looking to the repeal of the obnoxious statutes” in the three remaining states. He then suggested TMA propaganda literature be “freely distributed...among legislators, newspapers, bank presidents, and other leading citizens” in those states, arguing that: “It is altogether probable that most of the papers in these States will warmly support any movement for the repeal of these statutes and for the enactment of laws providing for reasonable license fees and proper restrictions as to sales to minors under 18, instead.” Dushkind reminded his bosses that since the state legislative sessions were “rapidly approaching early attention is essential.”

The literature that Dushkind had in mind was, in addition to or in conjunction with the booklet About Cigarettes (which had been published in 1920 and is discussed below), excerpts from William W. Young’s book The Story of the Cigarette and Dushkind’s/TMA’s Tobacco Manual. In fact, three days earlier the TMA had put out precisely such an excerpts booklet titled, “What Is the Duty of the State in Regard to Cigarettes?”—the title having been taken almost verbatim from Young’s book—consisting of the chapter in the latter book dealing with cigarette legislation and that in Dushkind’s on a poll of newspaper editors’ opinions as to their communities “general sentiment” on prohibiting the use of cigarettes by adults.

William Wesley Young was a 48-year-old journalist in 1916 when he published The Story of the Cigarette, which fairly reeked of abject apologetics on behalf of the American Tobacco Company, which would have been impossible to overlook even had he not expressly acknowledged the firm’s “courtesy” of “permitting me to go freely through its warehouses and factories” and making its experts available to him.

For example, in the teeth of the decades-long... widespread outrage at cigarette manufacturers’ insertion of “lascivious” pictures to entice purchases by children, Young not only omitted mention of this practice, but praised the firms for including “in many cases...pictures of real educational value.” By these he meant color pictures of national flags, cities, buildings, battleships, military uniforms, and war scenes constituting “a complete running pictorial history” of the world war then in progress.28 Young pretended to be just as blind to the lures that such paraphernalia represented to children as to “the real truth,” delightedly propagated by him, that, far from being “a caprice of the small boy and the dissipation of the dude,” the cigarette since the war’s start had “fairly leaped into its legitimate position as the smoke of manly men”29—a truth exemplified by the “well-known fact that no men age more slowly or sturdily than the cigarette smokers in our fighting forces.”30 Luckily for the shareholders, there was, “[i]t would seem...in every male human being an inborn desire to smoke something, a desire that in most of us manifests itself at a very tender age”; and luckily for smokers, there was “not an authentic case on record where rational smoking injured anyone....”31

When he arrived at his chapter on legislation—the chapter that TMA included in whole in “What Is the Duty of the State in Regard to Cigarettes?”—Young outdid himself in sycophancy and mock-surprise at the Tobacco Trust’s state of enlightenment. Certain that he would disagree with the “invective” a manufacturer would heap on anti-cigarette laws, he decided to speak to a manager in order to collect information to refute. Young interviewed one of the highest officials of the largest corporate cigarette manufacturer and was surprised to hear that:

“No intelligent manufacturer objects to sweeping prohibitive laws that deny grown men the right to smoke what they please. Such laws never are enforced.... A law passed without the force of general public opinion back of it, one that encroaches upon the thoroughly American principle of personal liberty, always is a dead letter. A few states have been wise enough to enact good laws prohibiting the sale of cigarettes to minors. They could be and are being enforced.”

For the time I was dumfounded. Here was one of the heads of a vast cigarette manufacturing concern taking a sane, temperate and aloof view of a question that vitally affected his business. It was the view...that, I am convinced, must be held by any individual who is neither profiting by the cigarette industry nor taking part in one of the crusades against it.

29William W. Young, The Story of the Cigarette 228 (1916).
The further I sought...the more I came to see that cigarette manufacturers as a class agree with that opinion.... Perhaps this is because only men of a broad mind can successfully manage a great business.32

Why, if cigarette producers did not object to unenforced and unenforceable cigarette sales bans, the Tobacco Trust had, for two decades, intensively and extensively devoted considerable resources to trying to defeat, repeal, and invalidate them33 it did not occur to Young to ask.

The reader is left with the conclusion that Young had originally imagined that the president of ATC would have told him flat out that his shareholders were clamoring for the unimpeded right to addict six-year-olds in order to take advantage of the fact that “the tobacco habit is easily formed, and the fragrant ‘smoke’ is more apt to be indulged in to excess by the youth....”34 But, on the contrary, cigarette manufacturing executives, like “all fair-minded people,”35 agreed with Young that “lads” should “should refrain from the use of tobacco during their tender years...for the same reason” that they should “refrain from too much meat, and from the use of strong spices, cocoa, tea and coffee,”36 which “are harmless, or even beneficial, for the adult.”37 Indeed, although Young, like his successors decades later at the Tobacco Institute, never disclosed what about cigarette smoking was harmful to children that was harmless to adults— it was, after all, “slander” to assert that nicotine or carbon monoxide was harmful to them—he would “just as enthusiastically advocate legislation prohibiting children, during their years of bodily and mental development, from using a good many foods and beverages that parents unthinkingly permit them to eat and 33See above Pt. I-II and vol. 2.

38“If smoking is not injurious to one’s health, why should the decision to smoke or not be postponed to adulthood? Why do you regard smoking as an exclusively ‘adult custom?’ [sic] Given that few people over the age of 21 begin smoking, how can your industry expect to survive without encouraging young people to smoke?” Letter from Elizabeth Whelan to Horace Kornegay, Tobacco Institute (12/18/1984), Bates No. 521043898. “No purpose would be served by engaging in a dialog with you.... These important issues can only be resolved within the framework of our democratic system.” Horace Kornegay to Elizabeth Whelan (undated), Bates No. 521054452.
drink....” It was this kind of “compelling argument” that Dushkind commended to TMA’s membership when he reprinted the chapter on anti-cigarette legislation as “What Is the Duty of the State in Regard to Cigarettes?”

TMA apparently regarded The Story of the Cigarette as its most powerful propaganda tool, still stockpiling, four years after its publication, enough copies to send them out to doubters. For example, in late 1920 a very small-town school superintendent in Kansas (which would be the last state to repeal its cigarette sales ban in 1927) had written to R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company requesting literature on cigarettes. The latter’s general counsel sent the letter on to Dushkind, who, in turn, sent the superintendent a copy of Young’s book by special delivery together with the excerpted version and two articles, assuring the educator that reading them would bring him to the realization that “there is no justification for attack against the use of cigarettes or tobacco in any form.”

TMA carefully scrutinized the preparation of About Cigarettes, which borrowed heavily from Young’s book. In mid-1920, Frederick Galbraith, Jr., charged with supervising the organization’s anti-anti-tobacco propaganda, sent the galley proofs of the booklet to the cigarette firms’ general counsel who formed the membership of the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee—corporate counsel control or oversight of campaigns to defeat anti-tobacco legislation appears to have continued for some time—requesting their approval of several changes he had suggested (which, presumably, they gave, since the published version reflected Galbraith’s changes). The booklet—authorship of which Galbraith ascribed to Richard Strobridge, one of the founders of Newell-Emmett, TMA’s advertising/public relations firm—had originally borne the subtitle, “The Smoker’s side of the story,” which Galbraith 40TMA, Memorandum in re “What is the Duty of the State in Regard to Cigarettes?” (Dec. 29, 1922), Bates No. 501870638.

41Chas. Dushkind to R. C. Kantz (Nov. 26, 1920), Bates No. 501870731.
42In 1924, for example, corporate counsel of ATC, Reynolds, and Lorillard met with TMA president Jesse Bloch and Dushkind to discuss the latter’s proposals for the 1925 legislative sessions. A memorandum written by Reynolds lawyer (and future president and board chairman) S. Clay Williams closed by noting that Dushkind, who was himself the TMA general counsel, “is to work as closely as possible with and under the advice of all of us.” Since the ATC, Liggett, and Lorillard lawyers were “easily available at practically all times in New York,” Dushkind was “to take no important action without consultation with them” and—since Williams and Reynolds were located in North Carolina—“when possible, [wa]s also to confer with us.” S. Clay Williams, Memorandum (Nov. 5, 1924), reprinted in American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 US 781 (1946), Transcript of Trial, 5:*2611-13 at 2613 (Exhibit No. 771) (1945).
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

demed undesirable because this booklet and others were “educational pamphlets giving the truth as scientists and other eminent people see it, about tobacco.” In the same vein, he proposed striking “A word with you Mr. Smoker,” from the heading to the foreword because it gave “the Anti an opening.”

The text of About Cigarettes, 40-some large-print pages, purported to be “a composite of common sense and medical opinion by eminent experts,” offering “the real truth” about tobacco use. The medical statements, for none of which was a bibliographically verifiable source provided, all went to proving that physicians and chemists were “in substantial agreement, not merely that tobacco is harmless, but that in several respects it is actually beneficial.” Among the high points was a “notable investigation” that “effectively spikes the ‘‘bad for the lungs’ argument’: it “appears to demonstrate conclusively that smoking is often a protection to the lungs against tuberculosis bacilli....” Doubtless in conformity with the claim that “[n]owhere have we distorted the evidence,” the booklet cited a “famous experiment” that “clearly showed that nicotine cannot get into the blood by means of smoke inhaled into the lungs”; indeed, it was “doubtful whether any nicotine ever” reached the smoker’s mouth—and even if nicotine did, it would presumably be irrelevant since tobacco’s smoke products contained no “important quantity of nicotine.” TMA deemed it unnecessary to cite any medical authority at all in support of the more far-reaching claim that “even in excessive smoking, there is no reliable scientific proof that any real ailment is produced in the smoker.” It generously conceded that “if a man is going to smoke hundreds of cigarettes a day, he will undoubtedly tax his health—but the same would be true (only more so), if he drank coffee by the quart, or ate several pounds of candy a day. But even the universally valid maxim that “[e]xcess in anything is harmful” was put out of action by this particular commodity: “[W]hen cigarettes no longer ‘taste good’ to the smoker, he stops. And that’s all.”

---

43 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al (June 29, 1920), Bates No. 502359617.
44 About Tobacco n.p. [Foreword] (1920).
45 About Tobacco 7 (1920).
46 About Tobacco 14 (1920).
47 About Tobacco 8-9 (1920).
48 About Tobacco 19 (1920).
49 About Tobacco 27 (1920). One difference between these claims and the infamously obfuscatory filmed assertion more than half a century later by Helmut Wakeham, Philip Morris’s vice president for science and technology, that “apple sauce is harmful if you get too much of it” is that Wakeham (who had a doctorate in chemistry from U.C. Berkeley) demonstrably knew a great deal about and was trying to deceive his interviewer and the audience about cigarettes’ lethality. Death in the West (1976).
the still skeptical reader, the clincher was four pages devoted to a parade of cigarette-smoking athletic champions—from quarter-milers to marathoners—some of whom smoked "right up to the very hour of their contest."50 Not only did these men smoke during training, one of them "won the hammer throw—and actually laid down a cigarette to do it!"51 No one "open to reason"52 could disagree with the conclusion: "Not bad for men who had ‘ruined their physical health by the deadly cigarette habit.'"53 TMA was well aware of the existence of readers who would learn such "facts about tobacco with a shock of surprise amounting at first almost to disbelief." But they were facts "nevertheless...even though we tobacco merchants have a natural bias in favor of tobacco...."54

At the end of 1922, TMA sent out a memorandum on “What Is the Duty of the State in Regard to Cigarettes?,” which, purporting to point out the impracticability and unpopularity of anti-cigarette laws, argued against enactment of new ones and for repeal of the three remaining ones, and was designed to be distributed during the 1923 state legislative sessions “through such channels and among such people as may be proper and advisable.”55

This tantalizing memorandum is, unfortunately, one of only a few TMA documents from this period that were extant in the R. J. Reynolds files and required to be disgorged by litigation in the late-twentieth century. Although no such document dealt with Iowa, it is plausible that TMA had been behind similar repeal campaigns in Iowa, which began in 1917 shortly after TMA’s formation in 191556; in 1917, its Legislative Bureau and Legislative Bulletin were, for

---

50 About Tobacco 32 (1920).

51 About Tobacco 33 (1920).

52 About Tobacco 7 (1920).

53 About Tobacco 34 (1920).

54 About Tobacco 8-9 (1920).

55 Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., Memorandum in re “What Is the Duty of the State in Regard to Cigarettes?” (Dec. 29, 1922), Bates No. 501870638.

56 To be sure, this possibility is not strengthened by the fact that in October 1920, when F. W. Galbraith, a TMA vice president, raised the question as to whether the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee of the TMA—whose members were the general counsel of the largest tobacco companies—“should contribute to an effort to repeal the Anti-Cigarette Law of Kansas,” the committee, after a “thorough discussion...unanimously determined” that its policy was “not to contribute to efforts of this character.” [TMA], Minutes of the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee (Oct. 15, 1920), Bates No. 502359454. Unfortunately, the minutes did not disclose the reasons underlying this decision. Since the committee also decided that it would be contrary to its policy to take example, tracking Findlay’s cigarette sales nuisance bills. After all, in February 1917 Dushkind, acting on TMA’s behalf, urged the Oregon tobacco trade to mount a protest against a universal cigarette sales ban bill, and within six days the cigarette industry prevailed against the WCTU.

As TMA’s first president, Jacob Wertheim, formerly president of the United Cigar Manufacturing Company (the largest independent cigar producer) and a General Motors director, who came out of philanthropic retirement to assume the post, already underscored at its first convention in January 1916, its Legislative Bureau was “perhaps the most vital feature of the active service” it provided, since a “single step” in any legislature “may cost the tobacco trade—not of a town, or of a city, but of a State, or of the Nation—very dearly.” Consequently, it was “absolutely essential” for the members to be informed of all part in congressional deliberations on a bill permitting price regulation by manufacturers, the policy presumably had nothing to do with prohibitory laws per se, especially since Galbraith reported to the committee on the satisfactory outcome of his discussion with a bus company on prohibiting smoking except in the rear seats. The four committee members present were Frank L. Fuller (Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co.), Harry H. Shelton (R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.), William A. Ferguson (Philip Morris or United Cigar Stores), and William B. Bell (P. Lorillard). Junius Parker (American Tobacco Co.) did not enter the meeting until after the decision on Kansas had been made. One possible reason for non-involvement was raised by Fuller, Parker, and other general counsel four years later—“the danger of resentment of outside influence thrown into a state....” S. Clay Williams, Memorandum (Nov. 5, 1924), reprinted in American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 US 781 (1946), Transcript of Trial, 5:*2611-13 at *2611 (Exhibit No. 771) (1945). This possibility is strengthened by a letter from the Reynolds law department to a lawyer in Oregon in 1930 who had apparently suggested some company involvement in opposition to a referendum banning cigarettes in that state. Reynolds stated that it had “consistently refused to take any active part either for or against legislation in the various states... feeling that it would not be proper for it,” but forwarded the letter to the TMA. It also added that: “We refuse to believe that the people of the State of Oregon will cast their vote for the anti-tobacco measure.” R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. to R.W. Hagood (July 22, 1930), Bates No. 501994447. Its belief was vindicated as Oregonians voted three to one against the constitutional amendment. http://bluebook.state.or.us/state/elections/elections15.htm (visited Feb. 15, 2006); John Dinan and Jac Heckelman, “The Anti-Tobacco Movement in the Progressive Era: A Case Study of Direct Democracy in Oregon,” Explorations in Economic History 42:529-46 (2005).

Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

58See above ch. 16.

59J. Wertheim Dies in His 62d Year,” NYT, Nov.5, 1920 (14).
relevant legislation. To that end, Wertheim boasted, we have already perfected our legislative-reporting facilities to so great an extent that, in ordinary cases, never more than a day elapses between the introduction of a bill and our notification of the fact. In all cases of primary importance our correspondents are rigorously instructed to wire the facts immediately. This service has been brought to a point where copies of bills introduced in the National Congress reach our offices in less than twenty-four hours after they are printed, while from more distant capitals our advices are as rapid as the United States mail.

Wertheim then illustrated TMA’s legislative intelligence system by reference to examples awaiting the membership’s recommendation: an “excellent opportunity to secure a repeal of the anti-cigarette law in Tennessee at the next session of the legislature”; a cigarette law rejected by the Nebraska legislature would probably be put to a popular vote, “and now is the logical time to take preventive steps, if possible”; and finally, TMA “should hold itself in readiness to inaugurate a lively campaign against” a prohibitory bill pending in Massachusetts.

By 1920, the Atlantic Monthly—in an article by a journalist who later became president of an advertising agency working for the American Tobacco Company—was celebrating TMA as the “powerfully financed” tobacco industry agent for scrutinizing the WCTU’s “newly energized” anti-tobacco movement: “It has selected trained investigators to study the situation and to guide its policy, and has raised ample funds for such counter-propaganda as may be decided upon.”

The results of this scrutiny, which was by no means confined to the WCTU, appeared (and were presumably circulated to TMA’s membership) in the form of a hefty “Resume of Anti-Tobacco Activities,” the first of which included month-by-month reports for 1919 and 1920 on the activities of numerous organizations ranging from Lucy Page Gaston’s Anti-Cigarette League of America (“A smokeless America by 1925 is to be the slogan of the League”), the Non Smokers

---

Protective League of America, the WCTU (which had branches in more than 20,000 cities, whose papers in 45 states supplied thousands of columns to other newspapers, and which boasts doing more petition work than any other organization in the world), and the No-Tobacco League (whose Indiana branch favored abolishing smoking in public places), to the Methodist Quadrennial Conference (“Many of those who use tobacco in this form [cigarettes] are regardless of the comfort of those who do not use tobacco and impose this nuisance upon them in various public places’’), the Mormon church, and even the Boy Scouts (whose National Council recommended that “all leaders refrain from using the weed while in uniform and in the presence of their boys”).

In mid-1921 TMA issued a “Summary of Anti-Tobacco Educational Activities,” bemoaning that “anti-tobacco propaganda...gets its start in the very first grade of school and is carried through to the high school....” The extent to which TMA’s investigators kept tabs on even the most localized anti-smoking developments was illustrated by its sweeping into its intelligence maw information that may have had nothing to do with the anti-tobacco movement, but that did reveal what an impressively thick network of informants TMA apparently had at its disposal: “Prof. Basset of Reed College (Portland, Ore.) in a lecture delivered before his psychology class called attention to the danger of misinterpreting statistics quoting some he collected in study of children in Pittsburgh slums which proved that smoking children were brighter than others—‘a manifestly absurd conclusion.’”

That the only features of a repeal bill that TMA was willing to countenance were a legal age of 18 and “reasonable license fees” is crucial to an evaluation of the industry’s attitude toward the 1921 Iowa law. Additional light is shed on this question by a supplement that Dushkind issued two weeks later suggesting various activities in which the cigarette companies could engage in order to hasten repeal such as hiring advertising agencies to gain the cooperation of the press and instructing “their retail sales forces or missionary men to endeavor to get retailers to write their respective legislators, urging the passage of repeal acts....” Both the cigarette manufacturers and TMA would activate jobbers on whose behalf lawyers might make public appearances. Dushkind’s proposals arose out of his “firm conviction” that the majority of legislators “in all cases would unhesitatingly vote for the repeal of such statutes, and that it is only because of their erroneous impression that public opinion and their constituencies are in favor of prohibitory laws that they may be prompted to vote against repeal.” The “essential” task of bringing legislators to “a realization that public opinion is really against such obnoxious statutes” was manifestly subserved by the manufacture of such opinion by the press and advertising. Dushkind was aware of the risk that “too much publicity may arouse and stir the fanatics into more intensive activity than otherwise,” but he questioned whether it was possible to make the requisite impact on public opinion “without attracting attention of the intolerants.” Of greatest relevance in the present context is Dushkind’s seemingly non-optional suggestion that, with regard to post-repeal substitute restrictive legislation, although no opposition to restrictions on sales to minors should be interposed, “the Iowa Cigarette Tax Law should not be followed in other States.” It is this strong and unambiguous opposition to the cigarette tax—which was a component of the Dodd bill as filed and perhaps even as a trial balloon ten days earlier—that raises doubt as to whether the tobacco trust could plausibly have been the author of H.F. 678.

66Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “Summary of Anti-Tobacco Educational Activities” at 6 (June 1, 1921), Bates No. 503259512/8.

67Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., “Summary of Anti-Tobacco Educational Activities” at 7 (June 1, 1921), Bates No. 503259512/9.

Fragmentary Information on the Cigarette Oligopolists’ and TMA’s Tactical Differences Concerning Their War on Anti-Tobacco Propaganda (1919-20)

Tobacco legislation is falling of its own weight as a reflex of a more liberal prohibition sentiment. [T]obacco is still on top because of the industry’s opposition to bills that would curb its sales or make its use illegal, but more particularly because of an aroused public sentiment against these measures. ... It need not stand it. The public is rapidly becoming cognizant of the injustice being done the industry and if the industry will appreciate this fact and utilize its value to the fullest extent legislators will find other lines of business better able to provide needed revenue.

---

68Charles Dushkind, Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., Memorandum in re: Existing Anti-Cigarette Statutes in Kansas, North Dakota, and Utah (Dec. 4, 1922), Bates No. 501870676-7. The self-doubting fear of the danger of “stirring up such legislation at points where but for such activity on our part it might not be stirred up” continued to beset the TMA. The cigarette manufacturers’ general counsel all specifically raised this objection to Dushkind’s proposal to circularize the whole trade on state taxation of tobacco products. S. Clay Williams, Memorandum (Nov. 5, 1924), reprinted in American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 US 781 (1946), Transcript of Trial, 5:*2611-13 at *2611 (quote), *2612 (Exhibit No. 771) (1945).

The WCTU’s protestations that it was not preparing a “Tobacco Next” movement to prohibit tobacco nationally by constitutional amendment must be situated in the context of a tobacco propaganda campaign that the cigarette manufacturing companies were preparing through their instrument, TMA, in the fall of 1919. On October 6, the American Tobacco Company’s general counsel, Junius Parker, wrote to his counterpart at the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Harry H. Shelton, that he was sending him a pamphlet dealing with the need for tobacco propaganda. Issued by The Erickson Company over the signature of Francis Bellamy, it was titled, “A New Policy of Propaganda for Tobacco.” Unfortunately, the text of the letter does not, because of a successfully asserted claim of attorney-client privilege by the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company in the Minnesota cigarette litigation, appear on the Legacy website, and the pamphlet appears to be no longer extant. The aforementioned information from the letter stems from Shelton’s response; the brief summary of the unavailable document reveals that the letter concerned a “tobacco trade association meeting prepared by tobacco company in-house legal counsel requesting legal advice from and transmitted to RJR in-house legal counsel.” A few days after the Parker-Shelton exchange, TMA’s counsel, Dushkind, sent Shelton a copy of his own “proposed program” that he had prepared some time earlier “on the same proposition” as Bellamy’s, asking Shelton to consider both at the same time. Although Shelton, who regarded tobacco as a “harmless luxury,” soon replied that he found Bellamy’s “proposed propaganda to be fathered by some of the larger tobacco manufacturers...in a sense, unique and presented the case interestingly,” he was unable to bring himself to believe it either “wise or practicable” to adopt Bellamy’s suggestion. He referred to an apparently no longer extant letter to 70 See above chs. 14-15.

---

71 HHS to Junius Parker (Oct. 10, 1919), Bates No. 502359509.
72 When asked on what grounds a letter involving people all of whom died decades ago and firms that no longer existed could still be privileged, one of the plaintiffs’ lawyers un informatively and nonresponsively stated that “the court found that it fell among the categories protected by the attorney-client privilege.” Email from Gary Wilson (Robins, Kaplan, Miller & Ceresi) to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2007). Another lawyer in the same firm who was even more centrally involved in the Minnesota litigation (which resulted in the disgorgement of a huge volume of internal tobacco company documents) could not recall that plaintiffs had sought any documents prior to the 1950s. Telephone interview with Roberta Walburn, Minneapolis (Nov. 5, 2007).
73 Junius Parker to H. H. Shelton (Oct. 6, 1919), Bates No. 502359510.
74 CD to H. H. Shelton (Oct. 16, 1919), Bates No. 502359504.
75 HHS to Junius Parker (Feb. 19, 1918), Bates No. 502404267.
Parker, to whom he had explained that his “current opinion” had been “well expressed” in an editorial in The New York Times just a few days earlier. Under the title, “Preparing to Save Tobacco,” the Times observed that having become “alarmed” over reports of the WCTU’s coming campaign for constitutional prohibition, growers, manufacturers, and dealers were “organizing for defensive action.” The newspaper was not bashful about offering its unambiguous counsel to the tobacco industry’s leaders, whom it doubtless knew to be careful readers of its columns:

[T]he people for whom tobacco is a means of making money, not a gentle joy and a soother of strained nerves, will refrain, if they are wise or well advised, from making themselves too prominent in the “movement” they hope to start. If they trust more to the fact that against tobacco would-be prohibitionists have a case not a hundredth part as good as they had against alcohol. Indeed, while the possibility of injury from excessive use of tobacco exists, there is the same possibility with regard to a thousand other things that nobody dreams—as yet—of abolishing, and the assumption is fairly safe that the general population will take care that intemperance and fanaticism do not imperil a blessing that has innumerable appreciators and only a handful of depreciators.

To call tobacco a “demon” would be such an obvious and wild exaggeration it simply would be laughed at. ... But it is safest when least is said and done about it, and its mercenary friends, as distinguished from the vastly greater number with no pecuniary interest in it, will only excite needless antagonism if they make themselves too prominent and too audible.

Although R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company’s general counsel agreed with the Times’s advice that the industry’s owners would be far better off using consumer proxies to fight the former’s battles for them—indeed, Shelton had “not been an advocate of any kind of publicity”—TMA did not ultimately adopt that course. Shelton went on to appraise Dushkind’s approach, which contemplated cooperation by all of the industry’s branches, as superior to Bellamy’s, suggesting that “a matter of this magnitude should be passed upon” by TMA’s membership.

That R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company’s asserted privileged confidences have thwarted the attempt to discover what exactly Parker told Shelton and what Bellamy and Erickson suggested to the industry more than 90 years ago, is 77“Preparing to Save Tobacco,” NYT, Oct. 11, 1919 (8).

---

78“Preparing to Save Tobacco,” NYT, Oct. 11, 1919 (8).
79HHS to Paul Bagley (Oct. 20, 1919), Bates No. 502359499. Bagley was a TMA director.
especially frustrating since, ironically, Francis Bellamy (1855-1931), cousin of Edward Bellamy, author of the socialist-utopian best-selling Looking Backward, had himself been a leading Christian socialist in the late nineteenth century, albeit a racist and xenophobic one. During this period he also gained fame as the author of the Pledge of Allegiance. From 1904 to 1915, as the advertising manager of the muckraking Everybody’s Magazine, he solicited national advertisers and worked with their advertising agencies. It was therefore not a discontinuous career leap for Bellamy in 1915 to join a leading New York ad agency, Erickson Advertising Agency, where, until he retired in 1921, he was an account executive and copy writer, dealing with such large national corporate advertisers as Westinghouse and Allied Chemical. What someone with Bellamy’s unique political experience devised in order to guide the tobacco industry’s counterattack against an allegedly burgeoning prohibition movement and why TMA rejected it would be fascinating to learn.

Gaps in the available documents—in particular, correspondence and minutes of the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee—make it impossible to reconstruct the evolution of TMA and of the cigarette manufacturers’ propaganda plans between October 1919 and about April 1920. It is known that at its meeting on February 6, 1920, the Executive Committee had an “extended discussion of anti-tobacco activities” followed by “detailed information” from Frederick William Galbraith, Jr., the TMA’s point man on such matters, whom the committee had invited to attend. The four company lawyers present then requested Galbraith to have “suitable persons” prepare a statement of the tobacco manufacturers’ attitude toward minors’ use of cigarettes—a Potemkin village of a subject for the cigarette companies from nineteenth into the twenty-first century.

---

82 [TMA], Minutes of the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee (Feb. 6, 1920), Bates No. 502359456. It is not clear exactly when Galbraith became a TMA vice president. TMA letterhead that Dushkind used for correspondence did not list Galbraith as a vice president on May 24, 1920 but did by Nov. 26, 1920. CD to H. H. Shelton (May, 24, 1920), Bates No. 501870737; CD to E. Eiche (Nov. 26, 1920), Bates No. 501870726. At the TMA annual convention in May 1920 Galbraith was appointed to the board of directors. “New Board of Directors of the Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States,” Tobacco 70(3):4 (May 20, 1920).
Unlike the Times, the cigarette manufacturers took accusations of health problems caused by their commodity deadly seriously. For example, in 1922 R. J. Reynolds Tobacco’s lawyers circuitously requested Dushkind to take a small cigarette manufacturer to the woodshed for stating in an advertisement that some other firm’s cigarette was “too strong for your throat.” S. Clay Williams (later president and chairman of R. J. Reynolds) told Shelton (whom he had replaced and who in private practice in Washington continued to represent cigarette companies and act as a TMA vice president) that the statement was “detrimental to the industry generally.” Shelton, in turn, reminded Dushkind that such a “dangerous” idea could be very easily capitalized by anti-cigarette organizations.

All of TMA’s feverish and centrally coordinated legislative repeal activity during the 1920s stood in startling contrast to the industry’s braggadocio in 1918 in the wake of the War Department’s adoption of the tobacco firms’ suggestion that the government furnish soldiers with tobacco free as a war necessity like food and clothing. The United States Tobacco Journal, for example, boasted that this “official inclusion of tobacco products as an obligatory army ration...must convince even those reactionary minds and prejudiced fanatics who ranked tobacco as one of the poisonous substances like spirituous liquors that they should be ostracised for their stupendous misjudgment and should be condemned to humiliating retraction.” Tobacco’s new status became “one of the most cheering benefits that could ever fall due to” the manufacturing companies—“not only a tremendous expansion” of production, but “an assurance of stability of their business such as they never before could have hoped to obtain.” The industry’s swaggering self-confidence culminated in the declaration that: “Once placed as a necessity for the consumption of our manhood, no attacks on its destruction [?] by any individuals or set of fanatics, whether inside or outside of legislative halls can prevail again.”

---

83 SCW to H. H. Shelton (July 28, 1922), Bates No. 507875514. Shelton (1874-1937) was still listed as practicing in Winston-Salem in 1921; by 1922 he was listed as having a general practice in Washington, D.C. Martindale’s American Law Directory 596 (Jan. 1921); Martindale’s American Law Directory 1213 (Jan. 1922).

84 H. H. Shelton to Charles Dushkind (July 31, 1922), Bates No. 507875512.

85 “Tobacco Now a Military Ration,” USTJ 89(21):4 (May 25, 1918) (edit.). The word “destruction” appears to make no sense in this sentence.
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

Frederick W. Galbraith, Jr.: A Tobacco Trust Undercover Propaganda Organizer in an American Legion Uniform

In 1941, two decades after the events in question, Dushkind, still TMA’s general counsel and managing director, testified at the trial of the federal government’s prosecution of the four major successors to the Tobacco Trust on charges of conspiracy and monopolization. One of the numerous dimensions of these firms’ conspiracy was the operation of TMA as a nodal point of communication among them. In questioning Dushkind about those present at the board of directors’ annual meeting on June 3, 1920, the prosecutor asked about Galbraith’s business connections at that time. Whether time had dimmed his memory or he was less than forthcoming, Dushkind replied that Galbraith had been “employed...by a tobacco committee to look particularly after tobacco prohibition agitation that was then going on.” Asked what the tobacco committee was, Dushkind was unable to recall its members, but did still know that “Col. Galbraith cooperated with the Tobacco Merchants Association in the activities to counteract anti-tobacco agitation” and that the committee had functioned until 1922.

Dushkind omitted mention of Galbraith’s “business connections” that had brought him into the TMA before he began directing its propaganda activities. Ironically, Galbraith (1874-1921), who played a key role in TMA’s anti-anti-tobacco campaign in 1920, was more famous—a ship was even named for him during World War II—than any of the well-heeled cigarette company general counsel on the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee to whom he was unmistakably subordinate. His obituary in The New York Times and a brief biography that appeared a year earlier in a state historical journal were both sketchy for important periods of his life. After grammar school in Massachusetts, he went with his father to San Diego where at age 10 he became a track walker, returning to Massachusetts at 13. Already at age 16 he became a factory foreman before spending six years as an ocean-going sailor. On his return to Springfield, Massachusetts, he worked at a meat packing plant, of which he became superintendent and which he saved from receivership. At this point (which must have been about 1900, a year in which he does not appear in the Census of Population) the aforementioned gap emerges: according to the brief biography, in 1908 he settled in Cincinnati, becoming treasurer of the Western Paper Goods Company, which had been incorporated in 1905. According to the sanitized account in the Times in 1921, he had gone to Cincinnati about 11 years earlier “to take charge of a tobacco plant, but gave that up to enter the paper bag business,” eventually becoming president. A much longer but even hazier article in Tobacco in 1920 had him “[f]or awhile identified with the old Commonwealth Tobacco Co., he stepped up later to a responsible position with the American Tobacco Co. From the big company he went to the Western Paper Goods Co. and now is the president of that prosperous, progressive and important corporation.”

---

87 American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 147 F.2d 93, 119 (6th Cir. 1944).

In fact, however, Galbraith had gotten an earlier start in the tobacco industry—one that would prove relevant to his TMA mission. In 1902 he became the secretary-treasurer of Universal Tobacco Company (incorporated in New Jersey and headquartered in New York), which was caught up in a very convoluted financial and legal struggle over control involving an antagonistic and/or friendly relationship to the Tobacco Trust. By the end of 1903 Galbraith, who lived in East Orange, New Jersey, testified at a receivership hearing that he was also a company director, but had never bought or paid for the ten shares that 90. "Col. F. W. Galbraith Dies in Auto Crash,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (4); “Colonel Frederick W. Galbraith, Jr.,” Ohio History 29:469-72 at 469 (1920). Galbraith’s entry in a standard national biography omitted mention of track walking, added that he had worked as a bank clerk, and identified the meat packing plant as John P. Squire & Co. The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography 19:170 (1967 [1926]).

---

91. "Colonel Frederick W. Galbraith, Jr.,” Ohio History 29:469-72 at 469 (1920).

92. Articles of Incorporation of the Western Paper Goods Company (July 26, 1905) (registration no. 21357) (copy furnished by Ohio Secretary of State).

94. "The New Commander of the American Legion: Col. Fred W. Galbraith, Vice President of the T. M. A.,” in Tobacco 70(23):5 (Oct. 7, 1920). In fact, Galbraith was, according to two corporate documents from 1920 that he signed, the secretary of the company. Western Paper Goods Company, Amendment (May 26, 1920); Western Paper Goods Company, Reduction of Capital Stock (Apr. 30, 1920) (copies furnished by Ohio Secretary of State). The president was Fred H. Berold, who held that position from the time of incorporation in 1905 until long after Galbraith’s death. The 1920 Census of Population also returned Berold as president of a paper manufacturing company.

the president had placed in his name only long enough for him to endorse.\textsuperscript{97} The following year saw the American Tobacco Company take over the Universal Tobacco Company\textsuperscript{98} and Galbraith incorporate the Queen City Tobacco Company in New Jersey.\textsuperscript{99} In fact, however, ATC “sent” him to Cincinnati “to organize the Queen City Tobacco Co., a supposedly independent concern but in control of the American.” When the Trust openly took over Queen City Tobacco, Galbraith “returned to the New York office of the American Tobacco Co.” In 1906, according to the entry for Galbraith in the \textit{National Cyclopaedia of American Biography}, he moved to Cincinnati, where he became treasurer and vice president of the Western Paper Goods Company, which manufactured paper bags, and some of whose stock he had bought during his first stay in that city.\textsuperscript{100}

Several of these biographical facts are contradicted by other, more credible sources. For example, at the federal antitrust suit proceedings against the Tobacco Trust in December 1907, special government attorney and future Supreme Court Justice James McReynolds, in questioning ATC Vice President Caleb Dula, brought out that at that time Galbraith was a salesman for ATC.\textsuperscript{101} Moreover, his will, drafted at the end of January 1908, indicated that he was residing in New York City at the time.\textsuperscript{102}

More importantly, McReynolds’ direct examination of Dula revealed that ATC had secretly furnished the money for organizing the Queen City Tobacco Company of Cincinnati—one of many firms that the Trust acquired in this manner. Many labor union-minded consumers shunned trusts in general and the Tobacco Trust in particular because of its decidedly anti-union practices.\textsuperscript{103} In order to undermine the market share that independent companies had been able to gain through the use of the union label, ATC secretly bought up and controlled numerous businesses that catered to such union-label consumers as a “powerful engine of warfare.”\textsuperscript{104} Dula testified that Galbraith had been connected with the \textsuperscript{97}“Universal Tobacco Hearing,” \textit{NYT}, Dec. 8, 1903 (3).

\textsuperscript{98}\textit{The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography} 19:170 (1967 [1926]).
\textsuperscript{99}“Incorporated in New Jersey,” \textit{NYT}, May 1, 1904 (FS4:2).
\textsuperscript{101}United States v American Tobacco Company, 211 US 106 (1911), Record: 2: Testimony of Witnesses at 603 (Dec. 9, 1907).
\textsuperscript{102}“Will of F. W. Galbraith, Jr. Leaves Income to Widow,” \textit{Cincinnati Commercial}, July 12, 1921 (10:3).
\textsuperscript{103}Meyer Jacobstein, \textit{The Tobacco Industry in the United States} 144-45 (1907).
\textsuperscript{104}\textit{Report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the Tobacco Industry, Part I:}
sales department of the Universal Tobacco Company, which had used a Union label, in the efficacy of which Galbraith had been a “great believer....” Dula, regarding him as a “bright, smart fellow capable of running and building up a business,” decided to start up a scrap tobacco business in Cincinnati “with Mr. Galbraith in charge” and having a stock option, but the Tobacco Trust secretly furnishing all the money for the business.105 McReynolds then introduced a letter that Galbraith had written to Dula on June 22, 1904, stating that: “‘There is only one fear I have and that is that in some way the connection may leak out.’” Galbraith then requested that he and Dula conduct future correspondence—including telegrams—under assumed names so that “‘I can feel safe should anyone pump the telegraph people.’”106

Galbraith’s fear was rooted in the fact that, as he had informed Dula in a letter of July 11, 1904, he had lied to the local union, which had suspected that the company was connected with the trust, by telling its officers that there was “‘absolutely no connection....’”107 Galbraith confessed to Dula that the “‘strain has been heavy’” because “‘[t]he union is out for blood and they are getting wise’”108 since “‘they suspect they are being used by the trust. ... We will have to be very careful or the connection will be exposed.’”109 The stress that Galbraith felt was compounded by his regarding this business opportunity as the foundation of his future economic prosperity. He therefore begged Dula to appreciate his situation: “‘I am not weakhearted and never will be, but I am so anxious to make this go that I do not want to take any chance, at least none that are not necessary. This venture means as much to me as to you and more, for it is my future against your money; I have so much at stake that there can be no failure from any fault of mine.’”110 The reason that Galbraith saw the deal as his big chance was clear: not being a “m[a]n of means,” he did not pay, as Dula explained to Junius Parker,
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

ATC’s associate counsel, the next day on cross-examination, for the “substantial interest” in the form of a stock option that ATC had given him. Galbraith had in part earned his elevation into the longed-for circle of unearned income recipients by having shared with Dula his conviction, as Parker put it interrogatorily to Dula, “that the Union label might be of particular value in that particular product he was about to manufacture?” And Dula confirmed that: “There was a good big part of the scrap tobacco business that was put out under the Union label; of course, the various manufacturers had worked up considerable sentiment on that line in various ways, particularly by condemning us.”

The kind of duplicity and deception in which Galbraith engaged both for his own and the Tobacco Trust’s economic benefit would stand Galbraith in good stead as TMA’s behind-the-scenes manipulator of tobacco propaganda. And the fact that Junius Parker—who represented ATC in the antitrust case, and would be one of the cigarette firm general counsel members of the TMA Executive Committee 13 years later giving him directives—had heard ATC vice president Dula testify that “Galbraith was a smart fellow” who had helped pull the wool over the eyes of the public regarding the Trust’s ownership of Queen City Tobacco presumably contributed to his having been selected for his new confidential role in 1920.

Until his death Galbraith remained at the head of the Western Paper Goods Company in Cincinnati, making a “handsome fortune,” but he never left the tobacco trade inasmuch as his firm, which specialized in the manufacture of single and paraffin-lined tobacco bags and pouches, sold paper bags to the 111United States v American Tobacco Company, 211 US 106 (1911), Record: 2: Testimony of Witnesses at 683 (Dec. 10, 1907).

112United States v American Tobacco Co., 164 F. 700 (CC SDNY 1908).
113United States v American Tobacco Company, 211 US 106 (1911), Record: 2: Testimony of Witnesses at 682-83 (Dec. 10, 1907).
114Harold Littledale, “Legion’s Leader Has Record as Hard Fighter,” Syracuse Herald, Oct. 24, 1920 (11:1-4 at 1). At the 1920 census he was returned as a proprietor of a paper bag company, employing a cook and a nurse at his residence. Fourteenth Census of Population (1920) (Heritage Quest). Ten years earlier he had been returned as a paper manufacturer-employer. Thirteenth Census of Population (1910) (HeritageQuest). The filing of his will in 1921 shed no light on the size of his wealth because it was “merely a formality, as Colonel Galbraith turned all his property over to his wife when he entered the army.” “Will of F. W. Galbraith, Jr. Leaves Income to Widow,” Cincinnati Commercial, July 12, 1921 (10:3).
115Moody’s Manual of Investments and Securities Rating Service: Industrial Securities 1913 (1926). It is not clear why, but Moody’s did not begin to report on the company until 1926, 21 years after its incorporation. In 1920 Western Paper Goods Co. reported net profits after federal tax of $69,747 on net sales of $1,033,395. In the mid-1920s, Galbraith’s wife, Esther G. Galbraith, was a director.
Tobacco Manufacturers Association of the United States

E.g., Western Paper Goods Co. had contracts with P. Lorillard Co. beginning at the latest in 1915; one was signed four days before Armistice Day and ran through and beyond Galbraith’s activity as the TMA’s special tobacco propagandist. P. Lorillard Co., Board of Directors Meeting at 261 (June 14, 1916), Bates No. 88111672; P. Lorillard Co., Board of Directors Meeting at 278, 280 (Dec. 4, 1918), Bates No. 88111371/3. For dealings with the American Tobacco Company, see “The American Tobacco Co. Fiscal Statement Dec. 31, 1921, Bates No. ATX010250527.

“Col. F. W. Galbraith Dies in Auto Crash,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (4); “Colonel Frederick W. Galbraith, Jr.,” Ohio History 29:469-72 at 469 (1920); The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography 19:170 (1967 [1926]).

“Galbraith of the Legion,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (8) (edit.).

One subject that Galbraith was much less reticent about making public was the Legion’s alleged political abstentionism captured by his claim at the time of his election that he “felt no fear of any conscious violation by the various posts of the pledges of the Legion to...be neutral in disputes between capital and 116E.g., Western Paper Goods Co. had contracts with P. Lorillard Co. beginning at the latest in 1915; one was signed four days before Armistice Day and ran through and beyond Galbraith’s activity as the TMA’s special tobacco propagandist. P. Lorillard Co., Board of Directors Meeting at 261 (June 14, 1916), Bates No. 88111672; P. Lorillard Co., Board of Directors Meeting at 278, 280 (Dec. 4, 1918), Bates No. 88111371/3. For dealings with the American Tobacco Company, see “The American Tobacco Co. Fiscal Statement Dec. 31, 1921, Bates No. ATX010250527.

---

117“Col. F. W. Galbraith Dies in Auto Crash,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (4); “Colonel Frederick W. Galbraith, Jr.,” Ohio History 29:469-72 at 469 (1920); The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography 19:170 (1967 [1926]).

120“Galbraith of the Legion,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (8) (edit.).
He apparently saw no contradiction between this position and the Legion’s support for a pending anti-sedition law that “will enable us to get rid of the enemy within. ‘It is the boast...of Lenin and Trotsky that their agents are high in the councils of the legion and it is the advice of Mr. Haywood of the I.W.W. that his men should join the legion and become borers from within, but we will find them out and then they will bore no more.’” Galbraith apparently also made an exception to the Legion’s alleged neutrality for “the extremely radical”—the only one of “all classes” that it did not embrace within its membership.

His fame reached its highest point just nine months later when at age 47 he was killed in an automobile crash, prompting sympathy messages from the likes of President Harding and Marshal Foch. Newspaper obituaries faithfully noted that he had been active in Cincinnati “civic affairs,” mentioning the Business Men’s Club and Rotary Club, and Cincinnati mourned, in the words of its mayor, “one of the greatest men our city has produced for many years,” who since the war had “devoted his time and his energies to the soldiers and the whole country as well as our city,” but just as his earlier, less glorious employment for the Tobacco Trust was conveniently forgotten or suppressed, so, too, neither his publicly known vice presidency of TMA nor his invisible position as the cigarette companies’ director of propaganda sullied his posthumous reputation. (A special meeting of the TMA Executive Committee commemorating Galbraith mentioned his vice presidency, but not his confidential activities.) To be sure, if for the Times an “American to be proud of was FREDERICK W. GALBRAITH,” who “despised the slacker” and “had contempt for 123 Col. F. W. Galbraith, Jr., “Galbraith’s Last Message a Plea to Prevent War,” Muscatine Journal, July 4, 1921 (1-4-5) (Galbraith’s last, posthumous message).

---

124 “American Legion Leader Dead in Auto Smashup,” WEC, June 9, 1921 (1:8).
125 “Col. F. W. Galbraith Dies in Auto Crash,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (4).
126 “Galbraith Funeral Plans,” NYT, June 11, 1921 (13); “Thousands Mourn at Galbraith Bier,” NYT, June 12, 1921 (26).
127 “Col. F. W. Galbraith Dies in Auto Crash,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (4).
128 “Cincinnati in Mourning Today for Galbraith,” CFDR, June 9, 1921 (1-5).
129 “Col. Fred’k W. Galbraith,” Tobacco 72(6):1 (June 9, 1921), did mention his TMA vice presidency.
130 “Col. Fred W. Galbraith, Jr.,” Tobacco 72(7):3 (June 16, 1921) (Executive Committee of the whole TMA, not the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee).
the hyphenated,”¹³¹ then perhaps more than conventional de mortuis nil nisi bonum was operating, and the paper would have perceived his dirty tricks on behalf of the cigarette oligopolists as yet further noble service for the relief of ex-soldiers, who needed unimpeded access to their nicotine. After all, just a few months before Galbraith’s death, the Times had editorially embraced the attack by the Topeka post of the Legion on Kansas’s cigarette sales ban. The newspaper mocked the law’s drafter, University of Kansas Professor William McKeever, accusing him of practicing “applied altruism...the simplest of sciences,” defined as “[f]ind[ing] out something that you don’t like and millions of people do, and tak[ing] it away from them.”¹³²

Though undocumented, the speculation seems plausible that Galbraith would have been seeking to coordinate the many local American Legion posts’ influential opposition to anti-cigarette legislation during the 1921 state legislative sessions in Iowa and elsewhere.

The Surgeon General’s Earliest Counter-Blaste to Cigarettes

“[Health Commissioner] Dr. Robertson says he is against restoring smoking on the elevated, because he desires to promote the health conditions of the city of Chicago. ... Let me ask the Doctor and his supporters this question: who are the predominant nations of the world, is it the non-tobacco using Chinaman or Hindu, who controls the destinies of mankind, or is it the tobacco using nations, such as ours, the English, the French and the Italians.”¹³³

One supervening event that occupied the attention of those at TMA centrally concerned with anti-cigarette propaganda in the early part of 1920¹³⁴ was a statement made on April 3, just days after he had assumed his new post, by the Surgeon General, Dr. Hugh S. Cumming, proposing an “intensive campaign to knock ‘the deadly cigarette’ out.” Reacting, according to one United Press account, to government reports of a 47-percent increase in tuberculosis the previous year, which he attributed to increased smoking, Cumming declared the number of women who had become “slaves to the cigarette smoking ¹³¹“Galbraith of the Legion,” NYT, June 10, 1921 (8) (edit.).

¹³²“Professor and Legion,” NYT, Jan. 5, 1921 (11) (edit.). See also above ch. 16.
¹³³“Order May Be Rescinded,” Tobacco 68(9):5 (June 12, 1919) (remarks of attorney Henry S. Blum).
¹³⁴Another was a South Carolina Senate bill to prohibit tobacco smoking during meal hours in public eating rooms. See above ch. 16.
habit...amazing...” He saw the nation’s “physical tone” as “seriously threatened” by the insomnia and nervousness, which he deemed the chief ill effects of this smoking.\textsuperscript{135} Reacting, according to a different version, instead to a 47-percent increase in cigarette consumption, Cumming appealed to women, whose complexion was ruined by the habit, not to smoke lest “the entire American nation...suffer.” Calling women’s increased smoking “one of the most evil influences in American life today,” he explained that smoking harmed women more than men because the former’s nervous system was more highly organized and thus more easily exposed to such negative impacts.\textsuperscript{136} On cue, two well-known New York physicians advised women “to go ahead and light another one.” A drug specialist and the head of the psychopathic ward at Bellevue Hospital opined that drinking tea and coffee was as bad as cigarette smoking.\textsuperscript{137} The New York World wondered whether, if women were “compelled by law to stop smoking,” men could “expect exemption at the hands of a feminine electorate....”\textsuperscript{138}

Although later medical historians of the anti-smoking movement pooh-

\textsuperscript{135}“U.S. Surgeon General Declares War upon Smoking of ‘Deadly Cigarette,’” Clearfield Progress (Pennsylvania), Apr. 4, 1920 (1:1-2). A few days later the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church issued a statement very similar to Cumming’s. It differed chiefly by arguing that regardless “what strict justice may declare their right and privilege to be,” it was necessary to appeal to women to refrain from using tobacco “in the name of the country’s welfare....” “Against Women Who Smoke,” Tobacco 69(15):22, 23 (Feb. 12, 1920). Oddly, neither The New York Times nor the Chicago Tribune reported Cumming’s statement. Both the Public Health Service’s official historian and a medical historian seemed to be unaware of his earlier intervention; instead they dealt only with similar comments that Cumming made in 1929. Office of the Public Health Service Historian, “The Surgeons General and Smoking,” on http://lhncbc.nlm.nih.gov/apdb/phsHistory/resources/smoking/smoking.html; John Burnham, “American Physicians and Tobacco Use: Two Surgeons General, 1929 and 1964,” Bulletin of the History of Medicine 63(1):1-31 at 2-4 (Spr. 1989).

\textsuperscript{136}“The Smoking Habit Is Spreading Among Women,” Daily Northwestern, Apr. 3, 1920 (1:7). Ironically, Cumming’s reference to complexion may be the only accurate aspect of his diagnosis in the sense that recent “[l]imited but consistent data suggest that women smokers have more facial wrinkling than do nonsmokers.” U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Women and Smoking: A Report of the Surgeon General 332 (2001).

\textsuperscript{138}“More Moral Regulation Coming,” World (New York) (reprinted in Helena Independent, Apr. 11, 1920 (14:5).
pooched Cumming’s condemnation of smoking as weak because it applied only to women, he himself smoked, and his intervention appeared to generate no practical consequences. TMA at the time—with the huge gap in smoking prevalence rates between men and women making the latter a market-expanding factor of enormous import—did not regard it as inconsequential. In mid-April, Frederick Galbraith suggested to Shelton that TMA write Cumming asking whether the statement reported in the press was “a correct statement as issued by him.” If it turned out that the newspapers had reported the surgeon general’s remarks accurately, then—in keeping with the systematic tendentiousness and distortion that would become a hallmark of the industry’s public relations—the matter could be “referred to a list of eminent specialists whom we can select for their opinion.”

Such shenanigans were kept sufficiently invisible to the non-investigative press that The New York Times instinctively “turned to the Tobacco Merchants’ [sic] Association” “as the most reliable commercial source of information on the subject” of anti-cigarette legislation. (TMA’s manufacture of pseudo-opinion should be contrasted with the TMA’s current self-description as having been “founded in 1915 to manage information of vital interest to the worldwide tobacco industry. ... Today the TMA remains dedicated to supplying factual information to a variety of companies, associations, and other organizations, whose livelihoods depend upon timely, comprehensive and accurate data about the global tobacco business.”) Manifestly, the important functions that Galbraith was performing for the tobacco industry were not paired with equivalent autonomy: R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company’s general counsel

141 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to H. H. Shelton (Apr. 15, 1920), Bates No. 502359664. The TMA’s vigilance was reflected in Galbraith’s also informing Shelton that he was investigating the Chicago Board of Education’s permitting Lucy Page Gaston “to start a campaign in the schools against cigarettes to help her campaign.”

142 Charles Cushing, “Prohibition as ‘Big Brother’ Fails to Win for Blue Laws,” NYT, May 20, 1923 (sect. XX at 5).

kept him on a short enough leash that all he could do was suggest that TMA write such an innocuous letter to Cumming. A few days later Shelton, who was about to meet with N. W. Ayer & Co., Reynolds’ longtime advertising agency, for a general survey of the editorial positions of papers throughout the United States, informed Galbraith that he saw no objection to TMA’s asking Cumming for verification of the story.\textsuperscript{144}

\textbf{Bribing and Intimidating the Press}

Anti-tobacco is a thing of the past.\textsuperscript{145}

Galbraith reported to Shelton that during the two weeks following the April 7, 1920 meeting of the TMA Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee (the minutes of which are lacking in the released cigarette company documents) there had been a “decided increase in newspaper articles concerning the attack being made upon tobacco,—most of them friendly to tobacco, which articles tend to create in the mind of the reader a sentiment unfavorable to the Anti....” The downside was that, with these pieces’ appearing only in “metropolitan dailies...the education of the rural communities is not being accomplished largely because,” as Galbraith saw it, “the editors do not realize the situation.” In a related vein, he mentioned that 10 weeks earlier he had submitted a recommendation that TMA appropriate a sum of money to be spent on trade papers that Dushkind deemed “necessary if he is to receive the whole-hearted cooperation of the trade press....” Finally, recurring to the tactic of cherry-picking medical collaborators, Galbraith expressed his conviction to Shelton that “as a foundation upon which many things can be built in the future, articles in medical journals of the same commonsense type—not too technical—will be of the greatest value, and...if the matter is judiciously handled, many articles favorable to tobacco will be published.”\textsuperscript{146}

\textsuperscript{144}HHS to F. W. Galbraith, Jr. (Apr. 19, 1920), Bates No. 502359663 (much of the letter is unreadable). Whether the TMA then wrote to Cumming is unknown.

\textsuperscript{146}F. W. Galbraith Jr. to H. H. Shelton (Apr. 22, 1920), Bates No. 502359661-2. Unfortunately, the sum of money requested is unreadable but might be $1,000 or some other four-figure sum ending in 000. In a letter to the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee 10 weeks later Galbraith again urged it to approve the proposal. This time he added that at some point Dushkind would meet with the trade journal editors to
In a long letter a week later to the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee—which appears to have functioned analogously to the infamous Tobacco Institute Committee of Counsel in “‘circl[ing] the wagons’” and was composed of five lawyers representing the four major cigarette manufacturers, ATC, Lorillard, Reynolds, and Liggett, and James M. Dixon, president of the multi-product Tobacco Products Corporation and a longtime protégé of James B. Duke—Galbraith returned to the issue of bribing the trade press because he had failed to make the matter “entirely clear” earlier. The bombshell that he dropped belied TMA’s rhetoric of a tobacco industry unified in its branches by the common struggle against the threat of universal prohibition:

Mr Dushkind, Secretary of the TMA is of the firm belief that there is a decided division of opinion within the trade itself; that a substantial number of retailers throughout the nation see no objection to cigarettes being put out of business, due to the fact that the margin on cigarettes has, in their opinion, been consistently low; that many cigar and tobacco manufacturers feel the same way because of the belief that if cigarettes were put out of business it would largely add to the use of their products; that these groups do not understand that this is not a fight against cigarettes, but a fight to prohibit tobacco in all its forms. Consequently Mr Dushkind is of the belief that it is necessary to subsidize the trade press to get their unanimous support to impress the trade with this idea. It seems unbelievable, though it may be true, and if it is, the appropriation is certainly desirable.

On May 11, the Newell-Emmett Company, a newly founded advertising agency, sent Galbraith a 10-page memorandum on “Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda,” which it regarded as so “widespread” that “prompt and whole-hearted action” by the entire industry was called for; if the latter were forthcoming, then, since the situation was neither “desperate” nor even “immediately alarming,” it would be “possible to swing public opinion to our side in a relatively short time.” Although Newell-Emmett deemed it unnecessary to discuss the underlying causes of the objections to cigarettes, remarkably it conceded that: “We know that the objection is deep-rooted—that at least nine out of ten men ‘half-believe’ cigarettes to be harmful and that the prejudice is strongest in country districts....” The entering wedge for industry counter-propaganda was furnished by the alleged fact that this prejudice was “largely based on ignorance” inasmuch as “according to the best medical opinion cigarette smoking by adults is not harmful—that there is no justification for objection on moral grounds—that the industry is a very large factor in the economic well-being of the country.” The advertising agency failed to raise the question of how the quasi-universal personal physical experience of millions of users over decades could be based on ignorance, but it seemed supremely confident that advertising could dispel this arguably unique mass perception of the harmfulness of a lawful consumer product by the addicted consumers themselves. Newell-Emmett’s plan was to secure and educate an audience in order to change popular sentiment “to avoid any likelihood of unfavorable legislative action, even if the old prejudice is not stamped out.” Increased consumption of cigarettes, Emmett-Newell assured its client, would be a merely incidental by-product of the successful implementation of this educational program. With almost all state legislatures meeting already by the beginning of 1921 and the introduction of anti-cigarette measures reasonably to be expected in a number of them, time and speed were of the essence. A focus exclusively on legislatures would, however, not suffice since most legislators either sought to represent their constituents’ sentiments or (absent “certain knowledge” of the latter) “to play safe by voting on what they believe to be the side of morality.” Given this view of legislative voting as purely derivative, the tobacco industry’s story had to be taken directly to the people and especially to country districts where anti-tobacco sentiment was strongest.
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

The advertising agency broke its proposals down into defensive and offensive activities. Among the former were four of special interest. First, systematizing a tactic in which cigarette companies had engaged for decades and would Record, 5:*2554 (Exhibit No. 709) (1945).

Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 1-2 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/5.

Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 2 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/5. continue to push into the twenty-first century, Newell-Emmett urged the industry to initiate and support movements to enforce laws prohibiting minors from smoking chiefly through editorials in newspapers, personal work in the trade itself, and circulars to legislators. Since the cigarette firms knew then, as they do now, that a successful program would decimate the replacement market for adults who died from or stopped smoking, such ploys have always been shams. Second, the industry should appeal to newspaper publishers for “fair play in the editorial handling of news items reflecting on cigarettes—in other words, seek to secure, without any hint of pressure, such cooperation between the advertising and editorial departments of the newspapers, as will effectively close many columns against misleading ‘anti’ propaganda.” It may be difficult to discern how this proposal boiled down to anything other than bribery or threats to withdraw bribery, but Newell-Emmett presumably looked with special favor on it because the firm recommended that it be carried out by tobacco advertising agencies, thus insuring additional business for itself. The same advantage accrued to it from the third proposal, which involved writing to all newspapers that at the time were refusing to print cigarette advertisements. In Iowa, to be sure, such an approach would be senseless until the cigarette companies succeeded in securing repeal of the sales ban, which had brought in its wake a ban on advertising as well. Finally, the industry was to keep tabs on all the anti-cigarette organizations’ activities with the ultimate objective of being in a position to “anticipate their moves....”

The offensive activities were, in turn, subdivided into direct and indirect ones, both of which were subject to the same caveat: wherever possible avoid being forced into a controversial attitude, which would boomerang by stimulating still more activities by the antis. About the direct approach by the manufacturers themselves Newell-Emmett had little to say other than that it would “lay all cards on the table” to special groups such as legislators, editors, and doctors. In contrast, the indirect approach, which was preferable for addressing the general public, would not be operated by the “allied manufacturers,” but nevertheless “in an entirely honorable and legitimate manner....” The principal issue here was “whether or not we can safely keep away from open, aggressive work against the attack.”

Oddly, the “indirect offensive” also included the very groups such as editors that were to be approached directly and openly, apparently because the “personal

---

153 Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 3 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/6. On the Iowa cigarette ad ban, see above ch. 14 and below ch. 19.

154 Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 4 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/7. work” of one man talking or writing to another or a group on behalf of an individual manufacturer rather than an association left “no published indication...of a concerted offensive.” Here Newell-Emmett placed special emphasis on work with organizations because the “‘antis’ have the benefit of one of the most influential of all organizations, the church.” Abandoning all hope of invading these precincts on behalf of cigarettes, the agency proposed outflanking them through “at least a partial offset”: hedging, it opined that “it would seem reasonable to believe that the tobacco industry, by using sufficient effort, can secure the influence of most of the secular organizations of the country which are composed of men, most of them being smokers.” Prime examples were the American Legion, fraternal orders, and labor unions, one of whose great virtues was their many thousands of local organizations in virtually every town and country village from which the influence that the cigarette manufacturers desired could “radiate.” Conveniently, their support could be obtained “‘indirectly’” by means of “competitive cigarette advertising” in their membership publications, “thus enlisting the active editorial cooperation of these papers against the ‘antis.’” In addition, Newell-Emmett claimed that resolutions from such organizational locals “would have great weight with legislators.” Revealing its peculiar conception of the “honorable and legitimate,” the advertising agency did not even shrink from proposing—though it surmised that it was too late for 1921—that nationally prominent lecturers be secured to enter the Chautauqua circuits. And although even Newell-Emmett was forced to recognize “that it would obviously be impossible to talk directly” about cigarettes in an adult education forum associated with churches and populism, it prefigured the cigarette companies’ late-twentieth-century techniques of rhetorical displacement by conceiving of an “effective speech on the evils of provincial intolerance, the limits of personal liberty...” Similarly indirect—that is, “[n]eeding no signature” but subject to the caveat of avoiding “evident attempts to make converts”—was the proposed “industrial educational film” showing the whole process of cigarette manufacture from the southern tobacco plantation to the cleanliness of factories to the “genuine enjoyment men find in smoking them.” As far as literature was concerned, Newell-Emmett suggested that a de luxe edition of the booklet “About Cigarettes” (which TMA was about to print) be distributed to legislators with a very large cheaper edition for nationwide distribution. It also envisioned this booklet as a vehicle for educating thousands of dealers and clerks who, having become aware of “their own importance in the chain,” could “exert a powerful influence” by understanding how to “advance a defense for cigarettes...” As the catalysts of a kind of elite chain-letter adult education program, the “better class of dealers can be...entrusted [sic] to place copies of this booklet in the hands of their more intelligent customers.”

If taken up “whole-heartedly” by the cigarette manufacturers, a step that Newell-Emmet predicted “would be even more powerful than any effort which the opposition can hope to use” was lining up “the hearty support of almost the entire American press, both magazines and newspapers.” To be sure, it might be imagined that this proposal would run into the insuperable problem that the “typical request for free publicity is today exceedingly unpopular with every type of publisher” because of the large number of requests and shortage of paper. Newell-Emmett, however, sought to persuade its client that this aversion would not “apply to a request relative to the welfare of the tobacco industry.” The alleged reason was commercially straightforward: “in volume of advertising given to publishers, the tobacco industry stands very near, if not at, the top of the list. This means, first, that tobacco interests have a right to, and can be sure of, favorable consideration and, second, that this request for editorial support can be based, not alone on the welfare of the tobacco industry, but on the welfare of the publishers themselves.”

Making this pitch to newspaper owners, at least in Iowa, would have been a carrying-coals-to-Newcastle deal: many of them could hardly wait for the state ban on cigarette sales to be repealed so that the linked ban on advertising would fall with it; indeed, some even admitted (privately to Governor Kendall) that they were disinterested in the former per se, but supported it only for the revenue that would derive from the resumption of national cigarette advertising in Iowa.

Relevant in this connection was Newell-Emmett’s view—based on the aforementioned observation that opposition to cigarettes was even more widespread in the rural areas—that the country newspapers were even more important than the city papers and would “fall in line...if given a reasonable amount of competitive advertising from the different manufacturers.” With regard to the efficacy of bribing publishers with advertising, the agency was able to console its client with its belief that “most of the country editors who now refuse cigarette advertising do so, not on moral grounds, but, being ignorant of the real defense of the cigarette, they are afraid of the bad will of their fellow townsmen.” If company men in the field could visit such editors personally and give them “a clean, honest defense” (as, for example, presented in the aforementioned “About Cigarettes”), “nearly all of them will be glad to accept the

---

155Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 4-6 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/7-9.

156Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 6 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/9.

157See above ch. 15.
advertising and support the movement against ‘anti’ legislation.”¹⁵⁸

Newell-Emmett, in any event, once again perceived an opportunity for an additional stream of revenue to itself: it confided to Galbraith that the key to securing press support lay with the advertising agencies handling the competitive tobacco ad campaigns, which “individually enjoy the marked respect of publishers,” a feeling that would “automatically multiply” when the agencies were associated on this project. This self-touting reached a new high point when Newell-Emmett proposed that to insure success the ad agencies approach the press “by speaking, not primarily for the tobacco interests, but in behalf of the business welfare of the publishers and agents themselves.” If that tactic were deployed, “it would seem strange if the editorial and press support of almost the whole American press could not be definitely lined up to expose the weakness and falsity of the ‘antis’ [sic] position and oppose ‘anti’ legislation.”¹⁵⁹

Following up on Newell-Emmett’s proposal, on July 2, 1920, Galbraith submitted to the same five lawyers and Dixon of the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee the specific suggestion to form an advertising agencies committee; Newell-Emmett would then be asked to prepare a plan for approval by the Committee; then the main agencies handling tobacco advertising would confer and decide whether to cooperate actively.¹⁶⁰

Galbraith then presented for adoption a plan submitted by N. W. Ayer & Son, which boasted that thirty years earlier it had “induced the leading tobacco men of that day...to advertise their products in the newspapers,”¹⁶¹ and which had handled Reynolds’ Camel advertising; by 1921, 22.5 percent of Ayer’s advertising involved tobacco.¹⁶² The company proposed a survey questionnaire of the editors of all newspapers in all towns with a population of fewer than 100,000, where “the anti-tobacco propaganda is especially rife.” It commended the survey as giving “as clear an indication of the extent of the feeling against tobacco as it would be possible to secure”—provided that the questionnaire was geared toward capturing not the editors’ views, but their views of their communities.\(^{163}\) (Ayer purported to know that the editors had “intimate knowledge of the feeling” in their communities, but it did not disclose how it knew that the editors’ “opinion of the opinion prevalent” in the communities on anything, let alone tobacco, was expert.)\(^{164}\) Remarkably, the agency recommended that the tobacco question not be posed in isolation, but, rather, be included among other then-prevailing movements of public opinion, “such as Bolshevism, explained as the rule of the majority, trade unions, the right to strike, and other similar items.”\(^{165}\) The reason that Ayer deemed it “impolitic” to ask only about tobacco was the risk of giving great publicity to tobacco, to which all public attention would be directed. Without stopping to reflect on how the WCTU might react to seeing the anti-cigarette movement classified as similar to Bolshevism or whether informants’ views might be biased by fear of association,\(^{166}\) Ayer proposed distributing the questionnaire through an “important review magazine.”\(^{167}\) The point of the exercise was to determine whether the publicity received by the anti-tobacco movement was “out of all proportion to the extent of its activity, and therefore could be dismissed from further consideration” or, alternatively, whether anti-tobacco propaganda and feeling were spreading; in the latter case, the publicity that the magazine carrying out the survey “might give to this important social movement undoubtedly [would] arouse the editorial opinions of newspapers

¹⁵⁸Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 7 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/50. Since the passages quoted in this paragraph are largely unreadable in the original, they are cited according to their reproduction in F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. at 2 (July 2, 1920), Bates No. 502359605/6.

¹⁵⁹Newell-Emmett Company to Col. F. W. Galbraith: Re: Counteracting the Anti-Tobacco Propaganda at 6-7 (May 11, 1920), Bates No. 502359644/49-50. Much of the entire (apparently carbon copy) document is unfortunately difficult if not impossible to read.

¹⁶⁰F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. at 1-3 (July 2, 1920), Bates No. 502359605-7.

\(^{163}\)F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. at 3 (July 2, 1920), Bates No. 502359605/7.

\(^{164}\)Recommendations of N W Ayer & Son: N. W. Ayer & Son to Col. Galbraith Jr. at 1 (July 28, 1920), Bates No. 502359590/1.

\(^{165}\)F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. at 3 (July 2, 1920), Bates No. 502359605/7.

\(^{166}\)Recommendations of N W Ayer & Son: N. W. Ayer & Son to Col. Galbraith Jr. at 1 (July 28, 1920), Bates No. 502359590/1. This new outline of recommendations dropped the reference to Bolshevism from the questionnaire, substituting for it one about effecting moral reform through legislation, and adding another about government ownership of industries.

\(^{167}\)F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. at 3 (July 2, 1920), Bates No. 502359605/7. Ayer preferred using the Literary Digest as the distributor, inter alia, because it was widely known that it had been conducting a questionnaire about presidential possibilities and an additional questionnaire “would not strike the average editor as unusual.” The TMA would defray the cost incurred by the Digest. Recommendations of N W Ayer & Son: N. W. Ayer & Son to Col. Galbraith Jr. at 1-2 (July 28, 1920), Bates No. 502359590/1-2.
generally and so counteract its further appeal.” In the event, the survey results turned out just as Ayer and its client desired.

At the end of August, Richard Strobridge, one of the co-founders of Newell-Emmett and the author of the aforementioned TMA booklet “About Cigarettes,” submitted a further plan to Galbraith, which revealed that the editorial survey had objectives beyond indirectly ascertaining the opinions on tobacco of the population in nonmetropolitan areas. Now the survey was also designed to uncover the “[e]ditorial and advertising policies of newspapers toward cigarettes [and] other tobacco products....” This information, in turn, “will enable us to immediately classify newspapers as (1) friendly, (2) neutral, and (3) hostile—hence will enable us to estimate the immediate cooperation we can expect from them...and the amount of personal work which may be required.” The plan was then for an executive committee of tobacco advertising agents to send letters to the papers that accepted tobacco but refused cigarette advertising as well as to those that refused all tobacco advertising in order to determine which editors were candidates for personal talks with the object of “swing[ing]” as many as possible from the “hostile” to the “neutral” or even “friendly” camp by means of presenting “the business side—mutual interests, etc.” (Shelton and Galbraith ultimately rejected separating out, especially in the questionnaire, the various forms of tobacco.)

Newell-Emmett’s proposal for the neutral papers was to “ask for fair play in editorial treatment of tobacco and cigarettes” and to try to “counteract ‘press agent' methods of antis.” Imparting a Pickwickian meaning to “ethics,”

---

168 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. at 3 (July 2, 1920), Bates No. 502359605/7.
171 Strobridge’s plan provided for the creation of an organization of tobacco advertising agents from whom money contributions for the project might later be solicited; Galbraith was to send them a letter expressing his belief that their proposed work would not only be “good insurance” for them, but, “by improving tobacco sentiment,” might “actually increase business....” Nevertheless, Strobridge opined that this “scheme....will give them no cause to feel ‘steam-rollered’....” Bizarrely, they were to be asked to treat the letter “as highly confidential even vis-a-vis the agents’ own organizations (whose clients the TMA members were), even though ultimately “most of the [work] burden will fall on them.” Suggested Plan of Newell-Emmett Company at 1-3 (August 30, 1920), Bates No. 502359585/6-8.
Strobridge then urged this procedure for bringing the neutral editors round: “Put this on basis of straight business ethics—volume of tobacco advertising, etc.” His suggested approach for the “friendly” press was unvarnished economic pressure: “ask for support in view of volume of advertising, as insurance for its continuance. Ask if they will give occasional space for material we can supply....” Galbraith later confided to Shelton that it would be very desirable for this committee of advertising agents to be sending to the newspapers “correct information” about the tobacco industry such as news items, interviews, and editorials that, “because of the standing of the members of the Committee would receive the consideration they deserve,—which if sent out by the TMA or other organizations would not receive the slightest consideration.” Why Galbraith found it self-explanatory that tobacco ad agents would have any more credibility with publishers or editors than their cigarette company-customers is difficult to discern.

Despite the obvious efforts to make publishers an offer they dared not refuse, TMA put on a charade with the publishers themselves. Although the correspondence itself appears no longer to be extant (or at least available), it is known that TMA on July 26, 1920, made a mailing to publishers, a number of whom replied that they regarded the offer “as another attempt to get free space....” To dispel this insight, TMA did a second mailing to the disbelievers admitting that it had apparently failed to get across its intention in offering to send “‘from time to time authoritative data upon the tobacco industry.’” TMA manifestly assumed that even a rural editor would believe the tale that it was “‘not seeking free publicity in your newspaper. We were not and are not trying to get something for nothing. We were merely anxious to have you personally know the real truth about the tobacco industry.’” TMA apparently found nothing incongruous or self-contradictory in immediately thereafter slipping in that there were “‘few industries in America today that spend as many dollars for country newspaper space as the tobacco industry (and unless all signs fail, tobacco advertising in country newspapers will continue steadily to increase). We have no desire to secure undue advantage as an industry because we are advertisers.’” Instead, its purpose in “‘acquainting you, as one of the leaders of thought in your community,...has no relation to advertising.’” Rather than space, free or paid, all it wanted—“‘[t]o be perfectly frank’”—was “‘your intelligent understanding of the facts in relation to an important industry.’”

175F. W. Galbraith Jr. to H. H. Shelton (Sept. 20, 1920), Bates No. 502359577.
Galbraith informed the TMA Executive Committee of the Tobacco Committee that a “substantial number of country newspapers” had, based on a misunderstanding of what TMA was trying to accomplish, “resented the attempt to use their publications for tobacco propaganda (as they called it).”

Interestingly, the American Press Association—an advertising representative that specialized in placing national advertising in country weeklies and small dailies—had fallen victim to the same misunderstanding, prompting its vice president to seek an interview with Galbraith in order to present a plan. The American Press Association, which published the aforementioned passages from the TMA mailings in an article on the first page of its members-only “Confidential Bulletin” sent to 6,000 country newspapers in August, was obviously carrying water for TMA in repeating TMA’s disingenuous claim that it did not intend to spread propaganda or obtain free publicity. Its manifest purpose was to reinforce the message that lucrative advertising hung in the balance. Noting that it had been bringing the “value of country newspaper advertising space” to tobacco firms’ attention for more than three years, the American Press Association boasted that it had increased tobacco advertising in country papers from zero in 1917 to several hundred thousand dollars in 1920. It then subtly intimated the potential economic consequences of a failure to cooperate with “this big industry”: “We are happy to say that, once having interested these manufacturers in country newspaper space, your newspapers have delivered eminently satisfactory results and consequently we have now established this industry as a permanent client for your newspapers.”

Galbraith, who was satisfied that the article would enhance publishers’ understanding, informed the TMA Executive Committee that he was confident that as TMA’s “campaign progresses,” the American Press Association would “use its influence amongst its members to cooperate with us to the fullest extent.”

Ironically, the American Press Association was engaged in a bitter feud with TMA’s consultant N. W. Ayer & Sons over the placement of cigarette advertising in Iowa weeklies. After the Association had written to the papers several times “claiming credit for business which...Ayer...had forwarded,” Ayer

---

This form letter to country publishers quoted the TMA letters.

177 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. (Sept. 10, 1920), Bates No. 502359581.
179 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. (Sept. 10, 1920), Bates No. 502359581.
180 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. (Sept. 10, 1920), Bates No. 502359581.
181 [American Press Association], [untitled] (August 1920), Bates No. 502359582.
182 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. (Sept. 10, 1920), Bates No. 502359581.
wrote directly to the Iowa weeklies, informing them that whereas “the A.P.A. is telling the publishers of Iowa that it hopes to get some Camel Cigarette advertising for them, if they will all sign up special with the aforesaid A.P.A.,” Ayer had actually been persuading tobacco companies to advertise in newspapers for three decades.\footnote{Ralph Hower, \textit{The History of an Advertising Agency: N. W. Ayer and Son at Work}, 1869-1949, at 416 (rev. ed. 1949 [1939]).}

By mid-May 1921, about a month after the Iowa legislature had adjourned, TMA was able to publish the results of the editorial survey, of which Dushkind risibly said that it “may be properly called a census of public opinion...to ascertain in the most practicable way how the American public views the anti-tobacco agitation.”\footnote{Charles Dushkind, \textit{Tobacco Manual} 37 (1923).} Although TMA apparently never succeeded in persuading the \textit{Literary Digest} to associate itself with this charade of a poll, \textit{Leslie’s} illustrated weekly newspaper, which was not wholly bereft of cigarette advertising,\footnote{\textit{Leslie’s}, 132(3412):333 (Mar. 19, 1921) (large American Tobacco Co. ad).} not only opened its pages to the tobacco industry, but even published an accompanying editorial characterizing the outcome as “the unmistakable verdict of the people in a referendum of editors representing the entire country.”\footnote{Garret Smith, “Many Industries Tied to Tobacco,” \textit{Deep River Record} (IA), June 10, 1921 (1:6). Under the same title it appeared, inter alia, in: \textit{Ada Evening News} (OK), July 18, 1921 (4:4); \textit{Englewood Times} (IL), July 1, 1921 (6:4).} Many newspapers, including ones in Iowa, ran a somewhat compressed version of the article.\footnote{“Tobacco’s Foes Losing Ground,” \textit{Leslie’s} 132(3420):488 (May 14, 1921) (edit).}

The ostensible author of the brief article was Garret Smith, a journalist\footnote{Garret Smith, “Many Industries Tied to Tobacco,” \textit{Deep River Record} (IA), June 10, 1921 (1:6). Under the same title it appeared, inter alia, in: \textit{Ada Evening News} (OK), July 18, 1921 (4:4); \textit{Englewood Times} (IL), July 1, 1921 (6:4).} who appears to have been fully occupied at the time on behalf of the tobacco industry: at the same time he published another piece that ran in numerous newspapers (including the very country papers that TMA was targeting) stressing how great the financial loss would be to industries producing inputs for the tobacco industry if prohibition were enacted.\footnote{“‘Tobacco’s Foes Losing Ground,’ \textit{Deep River Record} (IA), June 17, 1921 (8:1-2); ‘Tobacco’s Foes Losing Ground,’ \textit{Sun-Herald} (Lime Springs, IA), July 7, 1921 (n.p.) (NewspaperArchive).} In at least one paper it appeared next to a large ad for Camel cigarettes, while in another next to one for Chesterfield. Numerous Iowa weeklies published both of Smith’s articles during the brief period in late June and early July when city and town councils and county boards of supervisors were deciding whether to issue cigarette sales permits as repeal of prohibition was about to go into effect. For example, the Newton Daily News, which had illegally begun running cigarette advertisements at the beginning of May and ran its first legal ad on July 5, published both articles on facing pages on the day that the city council voted on the question of issuing permits. Smith’s piece, “Is Tobacco Doomed?,” like TMA, was facially focused on the antis’ alleged drive for total prohibition of tobacco, yet when it discussed actual legislative efforts in 1921, it misleadingly cited bills or laws that merely banned sales (in the case of Idaho even falsely claiming that the law banned the use of cigarettes). Since bans on use obviously dwarfed sales bans in terms of intrusiveness, Smith’s contention that “analysis of legislation on the subject [in 1921], checked up with the returns of the questionnaire, indicates the accuracy of this test of sentiment” was illogical.

Interestingly, Smith revealed that TMA (whose general objectives he failed to mention) stood behind the survey—an actual though indirect poll of popular opinion—which it had had the Press Service Company of New York conduct “in order to determine more accurately the sentiment of the general public on the
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

Although Smith failed to explain what the Press Service Company was, Dushkind in his later and more extensive presentation of the data, called it “an entirely disinterested concern....” In fact, the Press Service Company was a New York advertising (or, perhaps more accurately, publicity) firm with a sleazy reputation specializing in precisely the kind of operation it pulled off for the cigarette companies—and not for the first time teamed up with Smith. In 1917, for example, despite a Federal Trade Commission report indicating that no coal shortage was imminent and that “false scares” had created earlier shortages in order to drive prices up, a Lincoln, Nebraska newspaper reported that “a New York advertising concern is sending out full-page illustrated announcements forecasting a coal famine and high prices. The double-led story is written by one Garret Smith. Nowhere does there appear any indication that the story is sent out by coal companies. And the press service company sending it out has the immaculate gall to offer it free, with the illustrations, to such publishers as may be suckers enough to print it.”

In the winter of 1921, when coal profiteering had prompted calls for government control of mines and railroads, the Press Service Company conducted a questionnaire to “find out how the people feel about government ownership. And who,” asked one editor, “did they send the questionnaire to? To the editors of NEWSPAPERS, most of them CONTROLLED by the railroads, the coal mining interests, and similar beneficiaries of privilege. But suppose the questionnaire had been sent out to 5,000 representative farmers, or to 5,000 representative wage-workers, what would have been the answer?”

In 1913, congressional testimony brought out that for $2,500 a month the Press Service Company guaranteed publication of 50,000 lines a month pertaining to the sugar industry. Amusingly, on at least 199 Charles Dushkind, Tobacco Manual 37 (1923). Although the book bore the date 1923, Dushkind was already sending out copies to cigarette manufacturers in mid-November 1922. TMA, Special to Cigarette Manufacturers (Nov. 16, 1922), Bates No. 501870686.

---

201 “Coal Profiteering,” Capital Times (Madison, WI), Feb. 9, 1921 (8:1).
202 “Sugar Trust ‘Educating Lawmakers,” Iowa City Daily Press, June 18, 1913 (1:5). The sugar industry was of special interest to the Press Service Company because one of its incorporators, corporate lawyer Herbert Lakin, was also heavily involved in sugar investments in Cuba as president of the Cuba Company. “New York Incorporations,” NYT, Mar. 4, 1906 (22); “Cuba Near Normal, Says Big Investor,” NYT, Aug. 2, 1922 one occasion even The New York Times—possibly inadvertently—pierced the veil of one of the Press Service Company’s corporate pseudo-public opinion polls. In 1919, the Association of Railway Executives “sent” questions to over 13,000 newspapers “through the Press Service Company” concerning government ownership of the railroads. Although the questions were framed in terms of “public opinion” and “sentiment in your community,” the article’s subhead and text unambiguously revealed what the poll really showed: “Newspapers Vote Overwhelmingly Against Government Ownership.”
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

The survey was conducted for TMA by Edward A. Moree, the treasurer of the Press Service Company. Before devoting himself surreptitiously to the health of the cigarette corporations, Moree had worked for several newspapers, entered social work with the Russell Sage Foundation, the New York State Charities Aid Association—helping organize the anti-tuberculosis movement and becoming an advisory expert in public health education for the New York State Health Department—and the Red Cross. (A quarter-century later, in 1946, after a stint representing automobile sellers, Moree, in his capacity as vice president of the Transportation Association of America, specialized in jeremiads about “the growing threat of nationalization, in the belief that if transportation goes over the dam into a Marxian scheme of nationalization the death-knell of private enterprise will be sounded.”) Some time in 1920 the Press Service Company sent the tobacco questionnaire to 12,518 editors of whom 7,847 or five-eighths replied;

(30); “Herbert C. Lakin, 80,” NYT, Dec. 30, 1952 (19). Smith also wrote an article promoting these very interests. Garret Smith, “How We Satisfy Our Sweet Tooth,” Frederick Post (MD), Dec. 7, 1921 (7).

205“Camp Trip Ends in Divorce,” NYT, Apr. 8, 1922 (13). At the 1910 population census Moree, who was 28 at the time, was returned as an office secretary living in the Bronx.

209“Port Authority Criticized,” NYT, May 13, 1946 (18) (letter to editor).
the circulation of the newspapers edited by the respondents totaled 21,870,046.\textsuperscript{210} The questions that TMA wanted answered were:

Do you favor the enactment of laws prohibiting the personal use of tobacco by adults?
In your judgment does the general sentiment in your community favor such legislation?
Is the use of tobacco personally objectionable to you?\textsuperscript{211}

Threadbarely ludicrous was Smith’s assertion that from the absence of any accompanying arguments or from the form of the questions “it was entirely impossible for any editor to determine the attitude of the Press Service Co. toward tobacco.”\textsuperscript{212} Given editors’ abundant experience with questionnaires distributed by the Press Service Company in order to generate a pro-industry-client outcome, it transcends plausibility to imagine that editors might have wondered whether the Press Service Company’s customer this time round might perchance have been the WCTU. Moreover, editors, as developed above, were well aware from repeated and massive contacts by TMA and its intermediaries that continued or new cigarette advertising revenue was contingent on adopting pro-tobacco editorial positions and making their newspapers otherwise mouthpieces of the cigarette companies’ messages.

Of the 7,847 responding editors 7,393 or 95 percent “represented public sentiment in their communities as opposed to anti-tobacco legislation,” while only 260 or three percent represented it as favorable.\textsuperscript{213} To be sure, this claim was a vast overstatement since the question asked not about just any kind of “anti-tobacco legislation,” but specifically and exclusively about the most extreme kind—namely, a prohibition of the “personal use of tobacco by adults”—a ban even more drastic than the recently enacted intoxicating liquor prohibition, which banned manufacture, transportation, and sale, but not personal drinking at home,\textsuperscript{214} which even prohibitionists deemed too severe.\textsuperscript{215} The hypothetical ban was discontinuous with any enacted laws, the most radical of which banned neither the personal use of cigarettes by adults nor the sale of any other kind of

\textsuperscript{210}Garret Smith, “Is Tobacco Doomed”? \textit{Leslie’s} 132(3420):485, 493 (May 14, 1921).
\textsuperscript{211}Garret Smith, “Is Tobacco Doomed”? \textit{Leslie’s} 132(3420):485, 493 (May 14, 1921).
\textsuperscript{212}Garret Smith, “Is Tobacco Doomed”? \textit{Leslie’s} 132(3420):485, 493 (May 14, 1921).
\textsuperscript{213}Garret Smith, “Is Tobacco Doomed”? \textit{Leslie’s} 132(3420):485, 493 (May 14, 1921).
\textsuperscript{214}National Prohibition Act, tit. II, § 33, 41 Stat. 305 at 317 (1919).
\textsuperscript{215}Andrew Sinclair, \textit{Era of Excess: A Social History of the Prohibition Movement} 169 (1964 [1962]).
tobacco to adults.\footnote{One exception to the latter was North Dakota’s ban on the sale of snuff in 1913, which was upheld by the state supreme court. 1913 ND Laws ch. 271 at 425; State of North Dakota v Olson, 26 ND 304 (1913). The legislature did not repeal the ban until 1927, when it amended the statute to prohibit the sale to persons under 21. 1927 ND Laws ch. 253, § 1 at 418.}

That under these circumstances any editor, let alone 260, judged that the “general sentiment” of his community favored a universal use ban was noteworthy. Apart from assuming without any discernible basis that these thousands of editors could possibly know what their communities thought about the issue, the survey was methodologically flawed by the failure to ask what proportion of the community opposed prohibition of tobacco use. Even if the aforementioned percentages had been correct, the result would have been much less clear-cut if, for example, a 25-, 35-, or 45-percent minority in numerous communities had favored a ban. The example of Iowa, however, strongly suggests that even in the unlikely event that the editors gave their “unprejudiced and unbiased opinions,”\footnote{Charles Dushkind, \textit{Tobacco Manual} 37 (1923).} they did not have their fingers on their communities’ tobacco pulse. Smith insisted that the Iowa legislature’s repeal of the anti-cigarette law (in connection with the judgment of 95 percent of the editors in Iowa that the general sentiment of their communities did not favor the hypothetical adult use ban) confirmed his claim that “analysis of legislation on the subject [in 1921], checked up with the returns of the questionnaire....”\footnote{Garret Smith, “Is Tobacco Doomed”? \textit{Leslie’s} 132(3420):485, 493 (May 14, 1921).} In fact, however, legislative repeal and editorial judgment bore no such confirmatory relationship to each other; more plausibly they were incommensurable with each other. As the House and Senate votes on the bill impressively revealed, almost half of the members opposed repeal of the universal ban on cigarette sales,\footnote{Smith mistakenly asserted that Arkansas’s law, repealed that year, had been in effect for over 20 years; he correctly stated that Tennessee’s had been too, but by implication suggested that Iowa’s had not.} and no proponent charged that the alignment failed to reflect—in Smith’s words—“an overwhelming opposition by the public to anti-tobacco legislation.”\footnote{See above ch. 15.} On the contrary, participants in the debate generally agreed that opinion was closely divided, albeit most sharply along big city/small town-rural areas lines. Indeed, the very fact that so many people had commented that the old law was still being enforced in many small towns where it enjoyed wide support either made it implausible that only 17 editors believed that they lived in communities whose...
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

general sentiment favored the total tobacco use ban or showed a large-scale disconnect between attitudes toward the hypothetical ban and the real cigarette sales ban.

It may very well have been the case that only a small proportion of the population in the United States wanted to prohibit adult men from smoking cigars or pipes or chewing tobacco, though many more may have supported various kinds of bans on cigarettes. But, as the cigarette companies were well aware, it was also very unlikely that the WCTU and other groups would waste their political capital on the highly implausible cause of universal tobacco bans just at the moment when the industry was inflicting the coup de grace on the last of their old-style cigarette sales bans. It was therefore tactically clever of the cigarette manufacturers to project tobacco as a homogeneous target in order to protect the only even marginally plausible object of attack—cigarettes, especially as smoked by women and children.

TMA’s counterattack had become so intense by 1920 that its president felt compelled to warn the members of the need to guard against “uncalled for, unnecessary and ill-advised aggressiveness in defense of our industry.” Nevertheless, at the annual convention in May, Charles Eisenlohr urged, now that “famous chemists, physicians, toxicologists, physiologists, soldiers and experts of every nation and clime...had given tobacco a clean bill of health and pronounced it a great God-given boon to mankind,” that everyone in the industry “constitute himself a guardian of the personal liberty involved in this issue”—otherwise “[t]he very objects for which this great republic was founded...would...be subverted....” The tobacco industry’s self-portrayal as the target of a global prohibitory target was very convenient at a time when manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigar production were just beginning their long decline, eclipsed by what had all the makings of an inexorably and indefinitely 221 In Iowa 415 editors responded that the general sentiment in their communities did not favor the ban, while only 17 responded that it did. Charles Dushkind, Tobacco Manual 39 (1923). In an article on the macroeconomic impact of a tobacco ban that Smith wrote for the TMA and that was published in many newspapers at the same time he mentioned that: “In their remarks accompanying their replies many of the editors expressed it as their opinion that the opposition of their communities to the abolition of tobacco was based to some extent on the damage that such a change would do to the business interests of the community. This was particularly true in the tobacco growing states and centers where there were large tobacco plants.” Garret Smith, “Many Industries Tied to Tobacco,” Hopewell Herald (NJ), June 1, 1921 (2:2). Neither Smith’s article in Leslie’s nor Dushkind’s chapter mentioned such qualitative responses.

---

222 “Eloquent and Well Considered Address of President Eisenlohr,” Tobacco 70(3):5, 7 (May 20, 1920).
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

Why branches that were losing market share and profits to the cigarette manufacturers should have been concerned about laws that restricted only their competitors’ sales may not have been intuitively clear. At TMA’s 1920 convention Eisenlohr sought to give substance to the organization’s founding message that its purpose was to “look out for its [i.e., the industry’s] general welfare” by declaring:

[A]s to whether or not the cigarette is the only object of these intolerant reformers is entirely immaterial. The cigarette business is an inseparable branch of the tobacco industry and it is incumbent upon the entire industry and upon each and every branch of it to stand solidly behind every division of the trade. ONE FOR ALL and ALL FOR ONE is the principle that we must follow when any member of the tobacco family is under fire.

Coopting and Degrading Physicians: The Curious Case of Dr. Oliver Victor Limerick

The court held that Limerick was the sewer pipe through which the filth was to flow....

In laying the groundwork for a pseudo-scientific campaign bearing remarkable similarities to more sophisticated ones developed by the cigarette companies and the Tobacco Institute many decades later, Galbraith informed the Committee that, based on having talked to many doctors, he believed that “the opinion of the great majority of the medical profession can be crystallized into a common sense opinion as to the moderate use of tobacco.” To be sure, he then disingenuously added that it was “extremely desirable in advance of securing the opinion of the medical profession to do some education work in crystallizing the same....” To that end he recommended that: a “committee of eminent scientists and doctors be formed by and acting under the direction of one man who will be responsible to your Committee”; this group would “make a [sic] thorough research and submit a report favorable to the use of tobacco,” which would be submitted to and published by a leading medical journal—“preferably” by the Journal of the American Medical Association or the Medical Record. Reprints of the article could then be mailed to the 125,000 doctors listed in the American Medical Directory. Having been duly subjected to the desired “education work,” all these doctors were to be sent, “preferably” by the journal, a questionnaire, which, like that for newspaper editors, would contain several important questions being widely discussed by physicians and one on tobacco. To prepare this project, Galbraith had “carefully investigated” and then conferred with Dr. Oliver Victor Limerick, who then submitted a proposal, which, “owing to the confidential relation which he bears to the medical profession and to his clients,” Galbraith urged the Committee members to guard carefully. Unfortunately, the copy that Galbraith appended to his communication to the Committee appears no longer to be extant. He expressed his excitement about the value of the “tremendous amount of favorable opinions” generated by the results of the questionnaire poll for “any future activity”—that is, “if” the results themselves were “favorable”; if not, they would not be published. In case the Committee was not able to see its way to adopting the plan on a national scale, Galbraith suggested possible implementation in Oregon and “a few middle western Anti or near-Anti states which will need some attention later.”

224 “Tobacco Men Form $1,500,000,000 Union,” NYT, Nov. 9, 1915 (18).

225 “Eloquent and Well Considered Address of President Eisenlohr,” Tobacco 70(3):5, 7 (May 20, 1920). Eisenlohr was himself a cigar manufacturer.

226a “Sensational Grounds,” CT-S, June 3, 1897 (1:1). See also “One Ohio Blackmailer Convicted,” PE 17(22):665 (June 3, 1897).

The tobacco industry documents made available through recent litigation do not definitively reveal whether this plan was adopted, the article published, or the survey conducted. However, Limerick himself did publish an article in 1921 in the New York Medical Journal—which, notably, merged with the aforementioned Medical Record the next year—that appears to be just what the doctor ordered for TMA. Moreover, the Journal of the American Medical Association published in its Current Medical Literature department an abstract of the article (consisting of the authors’ conclusions) twice within two weeks just a few weeks after the article’s appearance.

Before analyzing Limerick’s article, it is well worth delving into its author’s biography in order to highlight the bizarre personality to which Galbraith and the cigarette companies were willing to entrust this highly important propaganda campaign. Limerick (1872-1926) was born and grew up in Mississippi, where his father, John Aldridge Limerick, was a pharmacist (in the drug business) and analytic chemist,\(^3\) whatever those occupational designations may have encompassed in nineteenth-century Rodney, a small Mississippi River town south of Vicksburg, which eventually died after the river changed its course.\(^4\) By the age of 19, in 1891, Oliver Victor Limerick was himself working as a “pharmaceutical chemist” in Vicksburg,\(^5\) but was not listed in any late nineteenth- or early twentieth-century Vicksburg city directory,\(^6\) although his obituaries in the local newspapers stated that “[y]ears ago deceased was engaged in business... in that city and specifically in the “drug business...”\(^7\) He had been preceded in Vicksburg by his older brother, a physician, who had attended Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York.\(^8\) While still in his teens O. Victor Limerick went to Baltimore to study chemistry, after completing which studies he took up medicine\(^9\) and in 1893 was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Baltimore.\(^10\)

227 F. W. Galbraith, Jr. to W. B. Bell et al. at 3-5 (July 2, 1920), Bates No. 502359605/7-9.

228 A search of all articles listed in Index Medicus for 1920-22 on tobacco, smoking, or cigarettes found no publication that plausibly fit the TMA’s requirements other than Limerick’s discussed below.

229 “Current Medical Literature,” JAMA 76(126):1859 (June 25, 1921); “Current Medical Literature,” JAMA 77(2):154 (July 9, 1921).

What Limerick did directly after graduation or where he went is not known,\(^1\)

---

\(^3\) Biographical and Historical Memoirs of Mississippi 1:1133 (1891). According to William E. S. Fales, “Introduction,” in Billy Burgundy, Toothsome Tales Told in Slang 13-15 at 14 (1901), Limerick was “a collegian by education...” Where and when he attended college is unknown.

\(^4\) Telephone interview with Jeff Coleman, Old Court House Museum, Vicksburg, (Nov. 15, 2007).

\(^5\) “Dr. O. V. Limerick Dies in New York City Last Night,” Vicksburg Evening Post, May 11, 1926 (8:5).

\(^7\) Dr. G. S. Limerick Died Early This Morning,”, Vicksburg Evening Post, July 8, 1904 (6) (copy furnished by Warren County-Vicksburg Public Library).

\(^9\) Physicians and Surgeons: A Graduating Class of 170 Members,” Sun (Maryland), Apr. 20, 1893, on www.genealogybank.com. The college later merged with the University of Maryland medical school.

\(^10\) If one of his obituaries was not in error in stating that he had gone from Vicksburg to New York, he must have returned to Vicksburg after medical school. “Dr. O. V.
but in November 1895, when in Louisville, Kentucky, he applied for a trademark for Antipyrexine, a “medicinal powder for certain named diseases,” stating that that name had been used since November 1, 1892.\textsuperscript{240} In 1895 he was living in Cincinnati, where he was listed in the city directory as a physician boarding at the Palace Hotel.\textsuperscript{241} Absent from the 1896 directory, he reappeared in 1897 with the same occupational designation boarding at the St. Clair Hotel.\textsuperscript{242} Despite the listing, he was apparently not practicing medicine since, according to family lore, illness had prevented him from ever practicing.\textsuperscript{243} Nor was he licensed to practice.\textsuperscript{244} In fact, Limerick was in Cincinnati as the “local agent” of the Fraser Tablet Triturate Manufacturing Company of New York,\textsuperscript{245} which, among the 300 million tablets it produced annually,\textsuperscript{246} manufactured opium tablets for bronchitis and heroin tablets for asthma.\textsuperscript{247} Limerick, then, “traveled for the Fraser Drug Company”—he was, in other words, some kind of drummer for Fraser. Limerick, whom Fraser had employed as an agent “for some time,” had been “at one time a trusted and faithful employee of the Fraser Tablet company, but...was discharged because his sales for the past year were not satisfactory.”
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

These facts became widely known as far off as Oregon and Limerick himself was stripped of his obscurity when, on April 10, 1897, he was arrested in Cincinnati in his capacity as a “discharged employee of the Fraser Tablet Company of New York,” who “evidently tried to get even with his old employer by threatening to have the latter’s goods held up by the Food Commission.” The charge, as readers as far away as San Antonio, Texas learned, was attempted blackmail—a conspiracy to “shake down” Fraser. According to the company’s sole owner, the wealthy and socially prominent Dr. Horatio N. Fraser, in March Dr. J. W. Prendergast, the Cincinnati Health Officer, and Dr. Limerick originally asked for $10,000, but then for $2,000 agreed to “fix things” so that Fraser’s company would not have any trouble with

---

248“Ohio,” ADPR 30(9):278 (May 10, 1897).
249At the same time, according to the city directory entry for Fraser Tablet and Triturate Manufacturing Company, Samuel A. Crocker & Co. was Fraser’s general agent. Williams’ Cincinnati Directory 514 (1896); Williams’ Cincinnati Directory 538 (1897); Williams’ Cincinnati Directory 556 (1898). Information provided by Genealogy and History Department, Cincinnati Public Library (Dec. 1, 2007). Crocker, who was Fraser’s “manager” in Cincinnati, testified at the trial discussed below that he had been afraid that he would be arrested because of Fraser’s substandard tablets. “Ohio Blackmailers in Court,” PE 17(15):455 (Apr. 15, 1897) (quote); Limerick v. Ohio, 14 Ohio C.C. 207, 212-13 (1897).
250“Justice,” CE, Apr. 15, 1897 (12:1-5 at 2).
251“Overruled,” CT-S, Apr. 17, 1897 (1:4). Alternatively, Fraser testified that Limerick had been discharged because there was “a difference between Limerick and the tablet house.” “Justice,” CE, Apr. 15, 1897 (12:1-5 at 3).
252“Charges Against City Health Officer,” MO, Apr. 13, 1897 (6:6).
253“Health Officer Arrested,” CT-S, Apr. 12, 1897 (2:1).
254[No Title], NYT, June 3, 1897 (2) (erroneously referred to as “A. V. Limerick”).
256“Blackmailing Officer,” San Antonio Daily Light, Apr. 12, 1897 (1:3).
257“Limerick,” CE, May 26, 1897 (7:1).
258“Prendergast’s Trial Begins,” CT-S, Apr. 14, 1897 (1:7).
259“Dr. Horatio N. Fraser,” NYT, Nov. 9, 1942 (23).
260The statement in “Prendergast Back,” PE 18(24):886 (Dec. 9, 1897), that Limerick was an Assistant Health Officer appears to have been erroneous.
the Ohio pure food department. Until then Prendergast had been using Fraser’s pills “at all of the city stations in his official practice—that is, having them used by police surgeons and others.” Prendergast had been furnishing Fraser’s tablets to “the out-door poor”; the active ingredient that had allegedly been deficient in at least one kind was caffeine.) Their conversation in a Cincinnati hotel room was allegedly overheard by a Pinkerton agent, whom Fraser had stationed in an adjoining room, while Limerick was on duty standing guard outside the door.

When “the celebrated case,” which attained “unprecedented prominence” because of Prendergast’s prominence, “the brilliant array of legal talent and the disclosures promised,” came on for an evidentiary hearing, “crowded to suffocation,” before a magistrate on April 14 and 15, Fraser testified that Prendergast had told him that part of the money they demanded was for George Cox, “a well-known Cincinnati politician” otherwise known as Boss Cox, who ran the city for a quarter-century. The 25-year-old Limerick, whom the prosecution called the “Mephistopheles of the conspiracy,” had approached Fraser before the hearing, apparently with the desire of unburdening himself to the prosecuting witness, but he left Fraser’s hotel before doing so. A grand jury quickly indicted Limerick and Prendergast, and, in order to avoid being outsmarted by the defendants at trial, the prosecution allegedly had respectable local chemists analyze Fraser’s tablets to prove that they were not substandard, thus demonstrating that the basis of the attempted blackmail—namely, that the 261 “Under Arrest,” Daily Times (Portsmouth), Apr. 12, 1897 (3:2).

262 “Ohio Blackmailers in Court,” PE 17(15):455 (Apr. 15, 1897) (quoting letter by Fraser).
264 “Under Arrest,” Daily Times (Portsmouth), Apr. 12, 1897 (3:2). See also “Telegraphic Brevities,” NYT, Apr. 18, 1897 (2).
265 “Trial and Conviction of Dr. C. [sic] V. Limerick,” ADPR 30(11):323, 324 (June 10, 1897).
266 “Justice,” CE, Apr. 15, 1897 (12:1-5 at 1).
268 “Justice,” CE, Apr. 15, 1897 (12:1-5 at 2).
271 “Gauzy,” CE, Apr. 16, 1897 (10:1-5 at 5).
272 “Limerick,” CE, Apr. 18, 1897 (8:2).
273 “Big Men,” Daily Times (Portsmouth), Apr. 24, 1897 (1:5).
274 “Ohio,” ADPR 30(9):278 (May 10, 1897).
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

State Dairy and Food Department chemist’s analysis of some of the medicinal tablets that Fraser’s firm had furnished to the Cincinnati Health Department for use by district physicians had found them to be impure—was a mere pretext.275 On June 1, after Prendergast had jumped bail276 and following a five-day trial, the jury, never in doubt about Limerick’s guilt277 and not crediting his claim that he had “simply carried messages between Mr. Fraser, his employer, and Dr. Prendergast,”278 and had been ignorant of Prendergast’s motives and really been working in the interest of the company, which in the meantime had re-employed him,279 found Limerick guilty of attempted blackmail.280

When the jury announced its guilty verdict at 10 p.m., “Limerick took his sentence coolly and when informed he would have to go to jail, lit a cigarette and smoked it.”281 Overruling Limerick’s motion for a new trial, Judge Murphy conceded that: “I don’t know whether you are the victim of another designing person or whether you yourself put the whole thing in motion.” He mentioned that Fraser and (unnamed) personal friends had appealed to him on Limerick’s behalf, but, despite feeling sorry for Limerick, he had to do his duty.282 The judge then sentenced him, as even residents of Denver read, to “Two Years in the Pen.”283 While still in court, “Limerick took the sentence more coolly than his 276“Prendergast Has Fled,” CT-S, May 24, 1897 (1:1).

277“One Ohio Blackmailer Convicted,” PE 17(22):665 (June 3, 1897).
278“Limerick on Trial,” CT-S, May 25, 1897 (1:3).
281“Two Years,” CT-S, June 8, 1897 (1:1).
282“Two Years in the Pen,” RMN, June 9, 1897 (6:7). See also “Two Years in the Pen,” Portsmouth Times, June 12, 1897 (2:7); Daily Public Ledger (Maysville, KY), June aged father, who...could not repress the tears that flowed down his cheeks.”

But once the judge had remanded him to the sheriff’s custody, he exhibited the “first signs of breaking down” and when he saw the “preparations being made to take him to the bastile he refrained from weeping with the greatest difficulty.” Scarcely able to speak, Limerick, accompanied by his father—who had been “more affected by the sentence than his son”—asked the prosecutor whether he could get out on bond, but, being rebuffed, was taken to jail. Having previously given bond for his appearance, he had not been in jail so that when the basement door to the jail opened, according to the bathetic account of a Cincinnati Enquirer reporter, “a perceptible shudder went over his frame.”

He then “asked if he could smoke,” and when the jailer said yes, Limerick “dispatched a deputy for a package of cigarettes. ... The doctor looked at the iron stairs which lead up to the cells. He could hardly keep from sobbing as he said: ‘Will I have to go up there?’” Hearing from the jailer that “there was no alternative[,] the slight, almost girlish form of the doctor quivered as he swallowed the lump in his throat....”

Before returning to New York, Fraser had presented a strong appeal for mercy for his ex-employee, to which was appended a “touchingly pathetic” personal request from Limerick’s mother. The letter to Fraser from “the aged mother of the prisoner” pleaded that her son “was easily led into doing things, which, if he had a stronger individuality, he would not do,” and that “if he had done wrong in this instance he was led into it by others.” Fraser had become “decidedly adverse to continuing the prosecution” once he felt that Limerick and Prendergast had been sufficiently punished by the “public degradation that their disgraceful conduct brought upon them.” Fraser even made the “kindly offer” to withdraw the prosecution if Prendergast and Limerick signed a written acknowledgment of their guilt and the authorities agreed to it, but Prendergast refused and in any event the prosecutor intended to “go to the full limit in the performance of his official duty.” In the letter he sent to Judge Murphy before Limerick was convicted, Fraser asked him to be lenient to Limerick as a first offender, adding that he felt no ill will toward him “and would like to see him start life again without the stigma of the penitentiary against his chances.” Fraser had contact with Limerick’s parents since he mentioned that the trial expense “will cost his parents about all they are worth” and enclosed to the judge a copy of a letter he had received from Limerick’s mother showing that “any punishment he gets will hit her and his father harder than the boy himself.”

While Limerick remained in jail, on June 17 his lawyers filed a bill of exceptions with the First Circuit Court in Hamilton County, which was “based on the alleged partiality of Judge Murphy and the jury under the influence of public clamor” and quoted the judge’s characterization of Limerick as “the sewer pipe through which the filth would flow.”

It took the appeals court less than a week to reverse the judgment and remand the cause to the Court of Common Pleas for further proceedings. Although Limerick was granted a new trial, the pharmaceutical trade press reported that this turn of events had not “given general satisfaction” in Cincinnati, where “public feeling against” the defendants was strong and the view was held that another conviction would result. Fraser, for his part, disavowed any personal interest in Limerick’s prosecution or conviction as an individual other than regarding its impact on his firm: “If guilty, these men are representatives of a class that is dangerous alike to society and the interest of all manufacturers who market their products in the State of Ohio.” In the meantime, the notoriety had not made it impossible for Limerick, who was released on a $1,500 bail bond, to return to the same occupation, “acting as a 291“Limerick Sentenced to the Penitentiary,” PE 17(23):695 (June 10, 1897) (quoting from letter from Horato Fraser to Judge John P. Murphy ((May 27, 1897).

292Docket No. 2638, Entry for June 17, 1897, Circuit Court Record Book; telephone interview with Anna Haas, Microfilm Department, Hamilton County Court of Appeals, First Appellate District of Ohio (Dec. 3, 2007).

293“Limerick’s Last Chance,” PE 17(25):756 (June 24, 1897).

294Docket No. 2638, Entry for June 24, 1897, Circuit Court Record Book; telephone interview with Anna Hoff, Microfilm Department, Hamilton County Court of Appeals, First Appellate District of Ohio (Dec. 3, 2007).

295Limerick v. Ohio, 14 Ohio C.C. 669 (1897). The reversal was based on errors made by the trial judge concerning a juror’s partiality and admissibility of evidence. See also “Reversed,” CE, June 24, 1897 (12:5); “New Trial in the Latest Ohio Case,” ADPR 31(1):18 (July 10, 1897).

296“The Cincinnati Boodlers,” Denver Evening Post, June 23, 1897 (5:2); “Another Chance for Limerick,” Daily Times (Portsmouth), June 25, 1897 (1:6). See also “Miscellany,” JAMA 29(2):93 (July 10, 1897) (“Dr O. V. Limerick...was granted a new trial”).
representative of an Eastern drug house.” Rumor had it that Limerick was in fact “quietly working” for Fraser again, but when Fraser visited Cincinnati in October 1897 he denied that his firm would restore Limerick to his former position as its local agent if the prosecution were dropped. The date for Limerick’s new trial was not scheduled even after Prendergast returned to Cincinnati, and finally in December 1898 the prosecution agreed not to pursue the matter any further because it had proved impossible to insure the attendance of its witnesses from New York “doubtless” as a result of Fraser’s unwillingness to spend more than the $6,000 that Limerick’s trial had already cost the firm.

Where Limerick went and what he did immediately after the blackmail charges were dropped are not clear, but it was presumably at this time that “he was called to New York to edit a medical journal”; by 1900, however, he “deserted the field of medical literature to devote himself to fiction.” From 1901 to 1904 he published five small books of purportedly humorous short stories pseudonymously under the name of Billy Burgundy. The likelihood of his 297 “A New Trial for Dr. Limerick,” PE 18(2):50 (July 8, 1897).

---

298 “Mr. Fraser in Cincinnati,” ADPR 31(8):266, 267 (Oct. 25, 1897).
299 “Prendergast Back,” PE 18(24):886 (Dec. 9, 1897); “Dr. Prendergast Returns to Stand Trial,” ADPR 31(11):357 (Dec. 10, 1897).
301 “Attractive Feature for Sunday Times-Dispatch,” Times-Dispatch (Richmond, VA), Aug. 30, 1903 (13:6-7). The biographical information for this article announcing that the newspaper would be publishing a Billy Burgundy story every Sunday presumably derived from Limerick himself.

302 Billy Burgundy, Toothsome Tales Told in Slang (1901); Billy Burgundy’s Letters (1902); Billy Burgundy, Billy Burgundy’s Opinions (1902); Billy Burgundy, The Villagers: Comprising Humorous Sketches (1904); Billy Burgundy, A Feast of Fun: Twelve New Stories Picked from the Fun Tree (1904). Although the books all use the same pseudonym, the author was identified on the dedication page of the first book: “to my dear friend Harry Kent Holmes Billy Burgundy (nee [sic] O. Victor Limerick).” Billy Burgundy, Toothsome Tales Told in Slang n.p. (1901). Henry Kent Holmes was some kind of Wall Street financier. “Harrison Gets Injunction,” NYT, Sept. 18, 1910 (10). The introduction to this first volume by William E. S. Fales (1852-1906), a magazine writer and lawyer who lived in Brooklyn, stated of “Billy Burgundy” that “[f]or several years his skits and sketches have made the country laugh, and have brightened dull hours for myriads of readers.” William E. S. Fales, “Introduction,” in Billy Burgundy, Toothsome Tales Told in Slang 13-15 at 15 (1901). The Oxford English Dictionary 16:503 col. 2 (2d ed. 1989), erroneously states that Billy Burgundy’s Opinions at 57 contains the first published use of “stand up” as in snub someone by not showing up for an appointment.
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

having lived in New York at this time is strengthened by these books’ factual focus on New York City as well as by his having testified in 1902 at a friend’s divorce proceedings in New York, the press account of which characterized Limerick as a “book and magazine writer,” without mentioning any connection to medicine or pharmaceutics. 303  The Chicago Tribune opined that the best thing about Billy Burgundy’s Letters was that it was less than a hundred pages, 304  but other critics were considerably less critical. In 1905, there appeared under the name Robert Louis Sanderson, who in his nearly two decades as a French teacher at Yale never advanced beyond assistant professor, 305  a ten-page brochure, “Billy Burgundy: An Appreciation,” which bore all the marks of literary hucksterism. Revealing Limerick’s authorship and including biographical details that presumably only Limerick would have known, the brochure was replete with the fulsome praise that only a press agent eager to sell “Billy Burgundy’s stuff in slang [a]s undeniably the greatest circulation multiplier ever placed at the disposal of newspapers” could utter. 306  Praising the “universality of his attainments” but skipping over Limerick’s fortnight in the Cincinnati slammer, Sanderson, offering no sources, called him “a chemist of no mean grade,” a physician, “an authority upon therapeutics,” and “without any doubt the greatest inventor of slang words and phrases we have ever had....” Moreover, Limerick allegedly “had earned a celebrity as a writer upon medical subjects, especially therapeutics, before he devoted himself to fiction writing.” 307  For Sanderson 303  “Absolute Divorce Given to Mrs. William E. S. Fales,” Brooklyn Eagle, July 31, 1902 (6). Fales had written the introduction to the first of Limerick’s Billy Burgundy books. What articles Limerick had written in which magazines is unknown. Searches of numerous periodical indexes for these years found no references to him.

1760

304  “Gossip of the Theatrical and Operatic Stage,” CT, Aug. 23, 1902 (16:1-3 at 3).

305  Sanderson, who was born in France in 1851 and did not come to the United States until he was 21, appears to have published only translations and textbooks in his field. “Prof. Robert Louis Sanderson,” NYT, Nov. 7, 1922 (16).

306  Robert Louis Sanderson, “Billy Burgundy: An Appreciation” n.p. [8] (1905). It is unclear how the brochure, which only one library (Wisconsin Historical Society) in the world appears to have cataloged, was distributed. The copyright-holding Cosmopolitan Press Association of New York was presumably the agent, whose purpose was to drum up business for “Mr. Next,” Limerick’s “latest creation,” which does not appear to have made it into book form. Id. at [5-7].

“genius” was a “trite and inadequate” description of Limerick aka Billy Burgundy because he was “without question, one of the most talented writers of the day,” “held in the highest esteem by literary folk,” and had “perhaps done more to enlarge our vocabulary than any other writer of the day.”

What else he may have been doing from the turn of the century until World War I is also largely unknown. He was missing not only from the 1900 and 1910 Census of Population—perhaps because he lived in a hotel in New York City—but also from the world: in 1902 his friends in New York, “mystified and worried over his prolonged and unexplained absence” and “fearing foul play” with regard to the unmarried and temperate writer known to have had a “considerable sum of money with him,” reported him missing to the police.

Two of Limerick’s judicial entanglements there in 1904 indicate that New York was his place of residence during these years: a summons to his “former literary partner, ‘Steve’ Floyd,” to appear before a magistrate in the Tombs Court to “explain why he laid claim to checks, which Limerick said wehe [sic] his, although made out to Floyd’s order” and a judgment filed in court against O.

---

309 In addition to not having been returned as living anywhere in the United States at the time of the 1900 or 1910 population census, Limerick was also not listed in the 1900, 1901, 1904, 1910 or 1915 city directory for Manhattan/Bronx. Trow’s General Directory of the Boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx City of New York for the Year Ending July 1, 1900 (Vol. 113); Trow’s General Directory of the Boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx City of New York for the Year Ending July 1, 1901 (Vol. 114); Trow’s General Directory of the Boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx City of New York for the Year 1904 Ending July 1, 1905; Trow’s General Directory of the Boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx City of New York for the Year Ending August 1, 1910 (Vol. 123, 1909); R. L. Polk’s 1915 Trow General Directory of New York City Embracing the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx (Vol. 128, 1915). He also did not appear in the 1899, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1906, 1907, 1908, or 1909 city directory for Brooklyn, according to a search done by the staff of the Brooklyn Collection of the Brooklyn Public Library. Email from Joy Holland to Marc Linder (Dec. 13, 2007).
310 In 1902, for example, he “made his home” in the Criterion Hotel in New York City. “‘Billy Burgundy’ Has Disappeared,” Evening World (New York), Aug. 22, 1902 (4:4).
312 “Checks for Early Riser,” Evening World (New York), Jan. 15, 1904 (9:3). Limerick and Floyd had written syndicate letters to newspapers under the name “‘Steve Floyd,’ the business man.” The magistrate dismissed the summons. At least some Billy Burgundy stories published in newspapers appeared under copyright by Steve Floyd. E.g.,
Victor Limerick “or Billy Burgundy” for $27.313 His father’s obituary in 1908 also stated that he was living in New York.314 At the 1920 Census of Population the 47-year-old Limerick did not tell the enumerator that he was a physician, but rather an author of books,315 though he appears not to have published one since 1904. The remainder of what is known about Limerick is best interwoven into the account of his aforementioned article of 1921.

Limerick, who at the time was the director of the pharmacology department at the Brooklyn Diagnostic Institute—founded in 1910316 as an early example of a new type of clinic established for the purpose of diagnosis317—co-authored the piece, “The Effect of Tobacco on Man,” with two academics, who were much better known. William John Gies—whose lengthy entry in that year’s Who’s Who eloquently testified to his research and administrative eminence318—was a very prominent professor of biochemistry at Columbia University, where he had been a founder of the School of Dental and Oral Surgery. Later he wrote a landmark report on revamping dental school education for the Carnegie Foundation.319 Max D. Kahn, a physician with a doctorate in biochemistry, was also an associate professor in biochemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Columbia and an expert on metabolism. Two years later Kahn became famous for his discovery of intarvin, an alternative to insulin for diabetes treatment.320 Since Billy Burgundy, “Tale of Book-Worm Who Found Change of Diet,” Times-Dispatch (Richmond), Nov. 15, 1903 (sect. 3, 4:5-7).

313“Judgments,” NYT, July 21, 1904 (9).
315Census of Population, 14th Census (1920) (HeritageQuest) (residing on Riverside Drive in Manhattan).
316“Dr. Jacob Gutman, Physician 44 Years,” NYT, May 9, 1944 (19).
317The clinic’s aim was “declared to be ‘to hold at the command of the general practitioner the highest type of skill and to be scrupulously observant of the loftiest standards of professional ethics.’” With each of its 17 departments “under the direction of a well-known specialist in the given field,” Limerick was presumably one in pharmacology. “News of the Week,” New York Medical Record 97(2):73 (Jan. 10, 1920).
320“Dr. Kahn Reveals Diabetes Treatment,” NYT, Aug. 3, 1923 (17). Kahn died even younger (at 39) than and only a few weeks before Limerick. “Dr. Kahn, Noted Physician, Dead,” NYT, Apr. 10, 1926 (17); “2,500 Mourn Dr. Kahn,” NYT, Apr. 12, 1926 (21).
neither of Limerick’s coauthors appears to have studied or published on tobacco or smoking, Limerick was the only one to respond to a critique of the article, and the article’s argumentative anti-anti-tobacco style resembled that of an article on tobacophobia published by Limerick a few years later, it seems plausible that Limerick was the real author, whose colleagues for reasons unknown merely permitted their illustrious names to be used,\textsuperscript{321} which preceded his alphabetically in the publication.\textsuperscript{322}

In addition to their formal institutional connection, Gies and Kahn had collaborated on a study of caries as early as 1912.\textsuperscript{323} In 1920 Kahn published a book dedicated to Gies, who in turn wrote the foreword.\textsuperscript{324} How they knew Limerick is less obvious. One link went back to the beginning of 1915, when Gies and Limerick were both members of a “committee of prominent New York physicians and surgeons” petitioning Congress to rescind the war tax on toothpaste on the grounds that it severely undermined governmental work on behalf of oral hygiene.\textsuperscript{325} Intriguingly, since Limerick, according to an obituary, “had been residing in New York City for many years, being connected with \textsuperscript{321}Dr. Allan Formicola, former longtime dean of the Columbia University School of Dental and Oral Surgery and honorary trustee of the William J. Gies Foundation for the Advancement of Dentistry of the American Dental Education Association, when told about the article and its background, responded that the “whole thing seems out of context of what I know about Gies as a careful researcher and individual.” Email from Allan Formicola to Marc Linder (Nov. 14, 2007).

\textsuperscript{322}Whether the TMA paid any of the authors is unknown. Interestingly, Gies was a nonsmoker. Frank Orland, \textit{William John Gies: His Contribution to the Advancement of \textsuperscript{323}William Gies and Max Kahn, “An Inquiry into the Possible Relation of Sulfocyanate to Dental Caries,” \textit{Dental Cosmos} 55:40-53 (1913). Gies also wrote the foreword to Max Kahn et al., \textit{Functional Diagnosis} (1920). Later they co-authored an article on intarvin. Hattie Heft, Max Kahn, and William Gies, “Studies in the Physiological Behavior of glyceryl-tri-margarate (intarvin),” \textit{Proceedings of the Society

\textsuperscript{324}Max Kahn et al., \textit{Functional Diagnosis} n.p. [v], vii-viii (1920).

\textsuperscript{325}“Tooth Wash Tax Opposed,” \textit{NYT}, Jan. 11, 1915 (16); \textit{JAMA} 64(4):351 (Jan. 23, 1915); \textit{American Journal of Tropical Diseases and Preventive Medicine} 2(8):538 (Feb.
1915). Gies’s participation in this petition was ironic since a year and a half earlier he had causd a stir when he announced his finding that toothpastes promoted rather than prevented dental caries, which could be more effectively prevented by brushing with food acid such as orange juice. “‘Food Acids' for the Teeth” \textit{NYT}, July 28, 1913 (6) (edit.); “Acid Bad for the Teeth? Not at All, Says Chemist,” \textit{NYT}, Aug. 10, 1913 (Sunday Magazine at 6).
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

Colgate and Company," perhaps Limerick was pursuing some commercial (self-)interest. Another link was forged in 1919 when Limerick, together with seven other doctors and dentists, published an article in the Journal of Dental Research, a new dental journal edited by Gies. Titled, “Highfalutin Dupery: Comment on the Falsity of Various Published Claims for Certain Dentifrices,” the article complemented work that Gies himself published in the immediately following pages of the journal attacking the claims made by the manufacturer of Pepsodent. Since all four toothpastes attacked by Limerick et al. were competitors of Colgate, suspicion arises, again, that Limerick’s critical efforts may have been driven by some non-science-based interest, although Gies appended a note to the article by Limerick et al. praising it as “the verdict of trustworthy sources of specialized enlightenment” whose “respectable authority” it had become expedient to enlist in the “uproot” of certain “popular fallacies.”

Ironically, the vitriol—such as “A dog will return to his vomit”—that Limerick and his co-authors (doubtless justifiably) poured over manufacturers’ efforts to “enrich themselves” by means of “a mass of scientific imbecilities” as well as the responsibility that they placed at the door of magazine and newspaper publishers and editors for giving publicity to such “previcication” would have applied with greater force then and even more decades thereafter to cigarette manufacturers and the press. Much more profoundly ironic, however, was that the barbs hurled by Limerick and his dental and medical associates at “certain grades of intellect in the medical and dental professions” in whom “bombastically propounded fallacies sometimes take root” and who then become “phrase-juggler[s]” with a “tremendous power for...evil” by virtue of being able to “make black appear to be white” while disseminating the “utterly 326“Dr. O. V. Limerick Dies in New York City Last Night,” Vicksburg Evening Post, May 11, 1926 (8:5). Another obituary stated that Limerick “was connected with Colgate and Co., at the time of his death.” “Dr. Victor Limerick, Former Vicksburger, Dead in New York,” Vicksburg Herald, May 12, 1926 (3:7).

---

327There appears to be no scholarly history of the Colgate Company that might shed light on the firm’s use of scientists in its toothpaste production in the early part of the twentieth century. Shields Hardin, The Colgate Story (1959), is a vapid hagiography. The company itself asserted that it had no relevant archival records. Email from Tom Paolella to Marc Linder (Nov. 28, 2007).

preposterous” should have been cast at their own article on tobacco, which was a prime illustration of the “testimony of experience” in medicine and dentistry as “the testimony of erratic speculations—a succession of phrase-embellished fads that do not survive intelligent deliberation.”

What at its core distinguished Gies’s and Limerick et al.’s toothpaste debunking from Gies, Kahn, and Limerick’s tobacco bunk was that the latter was supported by absolutely no theoretical or empirical-experimental science conducted by others or themselves. The tobacco article thus conformed admirably to the model constructed for toothpaste, permitting cigarette manufacturers also “to adjust their methods of dupery to” the growing tendency on the part of the average individual to require explanations that appear to him to have scientific basis or the support of high authority. ... In order to invest this fiction with an appearance of having due corroboration, lavish use is made of quotations from the writings of such members of the medical and dental professions as can be made prey to dialectic trickery. The wickedness of this use of dazzling language, supported by what is falsely represented as reputable authority, lies in the fact that it at once deceives the unsophisticated and casts discredit on the respectable members of the medical and dental professions.

Gies, Kahn, and Limerick’s barely three-page article cast aspersion on the “emotionalist,” who was unable to reason from cause to effect or distinguish between fact and fallacy, and whose testimony on “the so-called tobacco question” was not deserving of as much consideration as the conclusions derived by “those specially trained in scientific investigation....” To be sure, the authors nowhere alluded even to a single investigation to support any of their numerous assertions masquerading as “conclusions.” Nowhere, for example, did they even mention in passing how they as scientists had “taken recourse to the most rigid methods of verification” to discover that the “development of tolerance to tobacco...explain[ed] the absence of deleterious effects in the many who habitually use tobacco in excess,” or that such tolerance was “partly inherited” and that it was therefore “certain that the tobacco habit is preserved, in some degree, through [natural] selection,” or, that “excessive tobacco smoking is rare in the servile” (as opposed to those “engaged in intellectual pursuits”), or, finally, that what “persistently tends to exist presumptively has a valid basis”—meaning specifically the “smoking impulse, or craving for tobacco,” in the form of which “[w]e invariably find on investigation that Nature is justified in what it repeatedly expresses....”333 In the event, their “conclusions” delivered with all imaginable clarity the message for which Galbraith and TMA had contracted:

332William J. Gies, Max Kahn, and O. Victor Limerick, “The Effect of Tobacco on Man,” NYMJ 113(15): 809-11 at 809 (June 1, 1921).

The habitual moderate use of tobacco is not harmful to adults.
The moderate use of tobacco proves distinctly helpful to certain adult types.
The habitually excessive use of tobacco may prove harmful to certain individuals.
But the same holds equally true of all foods.
The excessive use of tobacco may prove harmful in certain neurovascular disorders.
The habitual use of tobacco by juveniles is harmful.334

Oddly, the last “conclusion” was based on absolutely nothing since juveniles were nowhere mentioned in the article (except with regard to their manufacturing “makebelieve cigarettes”).335 Nevertheless, it fit in well with the cigarette companies’ public relations strategy of pretending to discourage use by minors.
The speculative concession that “excessive use” by adults might cause neurovascular disorders was also odd since in the text the authors pooh-poohed the claim that “immoderate use...bears a causal relation to arteriosclerosis”: not only did they call the (unmentioned) underlying theory “implausible,” but asserted that what was commonly termed “smoker’s heart” was often “due to endocarditis associated with gonorrhea, syphilis,...tonsilitis,...dental abscesses....”336 In the same vein, Gies et al. declared that the “moderate but 333William J. Gies, Max Kahn, and O. Victor Limerick, “The Effect of Tobacco on Man,” NYMJ 113(15): 809-11 at 810, 811 (June 1, 1921).

334William J. Gies, Max Kahn, and O. Victor Limerick, “The Effect of Tobacco on Man,” NYMJ 113(15): 809-11 at 811 (June 1, 1921). For some criticism of the article four deades later, see Tobacco: Experimental and Clinical Studies: A Comprehensive Account of the World Literature 521, 532 (S. Larson et al. 1961). Two years later a British tobacco manufacturers organization referred to the article (along with several others) as offering “medical or other scientific reporting...on the basis of impression or experiment, of the tranquilising effects attributed to smoking.” Tobacco Research Council, “Review of Past and Current Activities” at 13 (1963), Bates No. 500051463/78.
335William J. Gies, Max Kahn, and O. Victor Limerick, “The Effect of Tobacco on Man,” NYMJ 113(15): 809-11 at 810 (June 1, 1921).
336William J. Gies, Max Kahn, and O. Victor Limerick, “The Effect of Tobacco on temporary rise in blood pressure” that was “the immediate effect” of tobacco—along with “an increase in the power of concentration, in consequence of a better adjustment of the ego to its environment”—that “laymen” stressed who condemned tobacco use did “not exceed in degree or duration that which ordinarily follows a cold bath or sponge” and “rarely ever equals that caused by such wholesome pastimes as dancing.”337 In purported refutation of the “possible contention” that tobacco had to be an “economic menace” because its excessive use “occasionally affect[ed] the vascular system and neuromuscular coordination” the three co-authors offered the “quite simple” answer that only the total net effect of a thing could determine whether it was an economic asset or liability. To carry out the necessary calculation, they left it to their readers to reason analogically back to tobacco from their tale that no right-minded person would advocate closing the schools just because the eye strain caused by the reading that is essential to education required some to wear glasses.338

Unsurprisingly, nowhere in the article was to be found any trace of the finding published in Gies’s own Journal of Dental Research in 1919 that leucoplakia, a precancerous oral lesion, was “invariably caused by excessive use of tobacco,” and that unless the cause was removed, “we invariably have carcinomatous degeneration.”339

Omitted from Gies et al’s formal conclusions was the unmediated assertion that the “sequence of the potency of the different forms in which tobacco is generally used runs as follows, in the order of greatest degree to least: Chewing, smoking pipe, smoking cigar, smoking cigarette.” From this pure assertion allegedly followed: “It can thus be seen that, contrary to the prevailing belief among laymen, the cigarette is in fact the least harmful form in which it is possible to use tobacco,” whereas “in fact” the only thing that could be “seen” was that the authors had made that assertion in the previous sentence (and just in case the reader or a popularizing publicist had overlooked it, they justified their “emphasis on the relative innocuousness of the cigarette” by reference to the “persistence with which the misinformed strive to convey a contrary impression”).340

Man,” NYMJ 113(15): 809-11 at 811 (June 1, 1921).
340William J. Gies, Max Kahn, and O. Victor Limerick, “The Effect of Tobacco on
Also absent from the final conclusions was the claim—odd given the proliferation of cigarette smoking by women at the time—that tobacco had “no special attractiveness for the female of the species” but was merely a passing fad: “The same impulse that caused some women of yesteryear to wear the deforming corset and others of today to expose their legs to wintry winds will prompt a few to affect a fondness for tobacco until another and more fetching stratagem of sex attraction has been thought of.”

Limerick’s dogmatism was vividly on display in a reply to an objection raised by a Pennsylvania physician several weeks later in the New York Medical Journal. Dr. D. W. Collins had had a mine inspector do tests to determine the volume of carbon monoxide in the gases drawn through a cigarette and the amount of carbon monoxide absorbed by the tissues of the mouth. The result was that between 0.6 and 0.7 percent of the carbon monoxide in the gases given off during smoking were absorbed in the upper air passages; crucially, the physician added, “[i]nhaling the smoke would materially increase the amount of carbon monoxide absorption, and the continued absorption of carbon monoxide certainly would have a deleterious effect on the human organism.” Collins’ conclusion harkened back to a health-related aspect of smoking peculiar to cigarettes that physicians and scientists had emphasized for decades: “As the cigarette smoker is, as a rule, an inhaler, I cannot understand why assertion is made that the cigarette is the least harmful form of tobacco, especially when the smoker absorbs a larger amount of carbon monoxide.”

Limerick’s very brief response continued in the purely apodictic mode of his original article by asserting that the cigarette was the least harmful form of tobacco use because “it yields the smallest amount of toxic materials.” He then made two additional uncorroborated empirical assertions: “Carbon monoxide is not the most toxic constituent of tobacco smoke. The inhalation of tobacco smoke is not confined to cigarette smokers.” Limerick did not specify the other more toxic compounds, but the Gies et al. article had mentioned nicotine, pyridine, collidine, and aldehydes as producing, together with carbon monoxide, tobacco’s vascular effects. But why cigarette smokers would not inhale more... of these toxic compounds as well he explained nowhere. Thus his entire defense boiled down to the implication that cigar and pipe smokers inhaled too. Although no one denied that some of them did inhale, it had been uncontradicted common knowledge and the central scientific basis of attacks on cigarettes for decades that a much higher proportion of cigarette smokers inhaled. Limerick’s reply was thus pathetically irrelevant.

Presumably also as part of the TMA’s anti-anti-tobacco propaganda and publicity strategy a summary of the article, correctly stating its alleged conclusions, appeared a few weeks later on the “Things You Ought to Know” page of the Sunday World Magazine of the New York World. Titled, “Tobacco Injurious Only When Abused,” the piece, which was pitched as of interest to “those now engaged in the anti-tobacco crusade,” absurdly and grotesquely characterized Gies, Cahn [sic], and Limerick’s “study of the effects of tobacco on man” as “exhaustive.” And the editor of the Cigar Makers’ Official Journal, which was published in Chicago, may not have read the New York Medical Journal, but he quickly brought the conclusions of the article—which he called “lengthy” and highly technical”—to members’ attention.

Definitely not planned by Galbraith was a brief but sharply critical contemporaneous review of the article by Friedrich Wohlwill (1881-1958), a well-known German-Jewish neuropathologist and teacher on the Medical Faculty at the University of Hamburg (who was later forced to leave Germany by the Nazis, emigrated to Portugal, and, after World War II, emigrated to the United “Tobacco Injurious Only When Abused,” World Magazine Section, July 10, 1921 (11:1). This article was one of 26 (including the Gies et al. article itself) listed in an “Index” in American Tobacco Co. documents produced in litigation. Index (n.d.), Bates No. 950297792/3 (erroneously dated 1915 but could not have been compiled before 1921). The World at this time appears to have opened its pages to pro-tobacco propaganda. The ATC files also included an article published there a few weeks earlier stating that Dr. William Golston had opined at a New Jersey State Dental Society annual convention that if reformers succeeded in banning tobacco along with liquor, the result would be an increase in diseases of gums and teeth because chewing tobacco was “‘one of the best disinfectants known to dental science’ by virtue of promoting saliva formation around the teeth and thus preventing bacteria from gaining a foothold. “Tobacco the Teeth’s Finest Quid Pro Quo,” World, June 2, 1921, Bates No. 950297937.

---

See above ch. 2.

“Professional Opinion,” Cigar Makers’ Official Journal 45(8):3 (Aug. 15, 1921). Unsurprisingly, the piece did not allude to the article’s rank-ordering of various tobacco products’ harmlessness.
States where he worked at Boston University and Harvard Medical School) in the Zentralblatt für die gesamte Neurologie und Psychiatrie, which accurately and dismissively treated the article as “a kind of apology for tobacco.”

Whether the article was produced with this purpose in mind is unknown, but at least on one occasion the American Tobacco Company’s chief chemist trotted it out more than ten years after its publication in response to a letter to the company asking whether tobacco smoked in a pipe was safer than the same amount in a cigarette. A. L. Chesley of the research department found it “impossible for me to answer the question” because its underlying premise that smoking was injurious “seems to be wrong.” His basis for this refutation was none other than the article by Geis [sic] “in collaboration with” Kahn and Limerick, whose five “conclusions” he conveniently quoted. The only comparison between pipes and cigarettes he was willing to offer was to “foods which are very highly seasoned and foods which are but little seasoned.” As late as 1936, TMA listed Gies, Kahn, and Limerick in the supplement to its Tobacco Manual as “[a]mong the distinguished scientific and medical authorities who have found the moderate use of tobacco harmless....”

Although, as noted earlier, in 1920 TMA did not realize its plan to use the Literary Digest as a vehicle for its bogus editor/publisher survey, five years later it may have achieved success. Less than a year before his death, Limerick published in a medical journal a diatribe against the “tobaccophobe,” in which he, inter alia, attacked the false belief that inhaling smoke could cause lung disease on the grounds that very little smoke ever entered the smoker’s lungs when he “inhaled” because the smoke was not conveyed further than the larynx. Such false beliefs and the prejudice against tobacco in general were based largely on “popular opinion,” which was “the scum of mass reaction.” In fact, Limerick asserted, the “habit of inhaling tobacco smoke was every whit as pure and undefiled in origin as is the habit of kissing.” (According to researchers at the 349 Fr. Wohlwill, [Review], Zentralblatt für die gesamte Neurologie und Psychiatrie 26:274 (1921).

350 A. L. Chesley to Charles A. Mack (Nov. 11, 1931), on tobaccodocuments.org/atc/60322323.

Swedish National Institute of Hygiene, 96 percent of particulate matter, ranging from 86 percent of acetone to 99 percent of acetyldehyde and isoprene, and 54 percent of carbon monoxide in cigarette smoke was retained in the lungs.)353 Was it sheer coincidence that of the thousands of medical articles the Literary Digest could have digested for its readers, it had no better use for three magazine pages than spreading across them these and other excerpts from Limerick’s piece?354 Or did the invisible hand of the cigarette oligopolists grease the decisionmaking process? Because TMA documents from the period in question were by and large too old to be relevant for late-twentieth-century litigation, not enough of them have been required to be produced to answer this question. It is nevertheless astonishing that almost a quarter-century later a semi-scholarly book adduced Limerick’s tobaccophobe article as an example of doctors’ having presented a “mild defense of the weed” in the 1920s.355

Ironically, in the 1950s, when the president of Philip Morris (for reasons unknown) wanted to find a statement by the biostatistician Raymond Pearl about cigarettes and tuberculosis and tasked his company’s public relations firm with the chore, the closest its “comprehensive research” came to turning up such a statement was a quote in the Nov. 14, 1925 issue of Literary Digest by “a Dr. Victor Limerick”: following the aforementioned assertion about smoke’s not entering the lungs, Limerick had claimed that more non-smokers than smokers had been discharged on account of tuberculosis during the World War I draft.356 Manifestly by the mid-1950s the cigarette manufacturers had lost their institutional memory of the services that Limerick had once performed for them and had to reinvent that wheel.357

Less amusingly ironic is that at the end of the twentieth century one of the leading tobacco addiction researchers in the United States, writing in a National Cancer Institute/National Institutes of Health publication, actually cited Gies et al. as a source for the proposition that “[m]easures of physiological response (e.g. Gies, 1921...)...demonstrate that humans can be exposed to high levels of nicotine 353Tore Dalhamn, Marie-Louise Edfors, and Ragnar Rylander, “Retention of Cigarette Smoke Components in Human Lungs,” Archives of Environmental Health 17:746-48 at 747 (Nov. 1968). Ironically, Rylander was Philip Morris’s paid agent. See below ch. 23.

356John Scott Fones to [O. Parker] McComas (July 8, 1955), Bates No. 1005039633. through their consumption of cigars—despite the fact that they had measured nothing at all.

Limerick had a far darker side than even his ludicrous articles in the cigarette oligopolists’ service revealed. In his family’s papers at the Vicksburg Old Court House Museum is preserved a seemingly completed typescript in a cardboard binder tied with string on which (presumably) his sister handwrote in pencil: “This is what Victor was working on at time of his death.” Titled, “The Inside of the Melting Pot: An Epochal Picturization of the Laws of Heredity,” the typescript appears to have been the prospectus for a motion picture, which was so profoundly racist and anti-Semitic, so thick with ignorant and obsessively stereotypical eugenicist hogwash, and so thoroughly suffused with delusions of grandeur that it is difficult to imagine that its author could have possessed the self-reflective distance or social skills to prevent his pathetically xenophobic and trivial Ku Klux Klanish psyche from communicating itself to multicultural society at large in New York City, let alone to associates such as Galbraith and Gies. Stringing quotations together renders commentary unnecessary while doing complete contextual justice to Limerick’s nonsensical prejudices.

In subhead form Limerick’s quasi-title page boasted that the script was (in upper case): “The most stupendous and entrancing treatment of momentous facts in all the history of mankind” and followed up with self-certification of the project’s “Absolute Accuracy” and “Scrupulous Fidelity to Scientific and Historical Fact.” Limerick then declared that saving the American family from “extinction through promiscuous bastardization” would “confer an endless blessing on all humanity” by insuring that “its blood shall not be lost to the world in the veins of a mongrelized herd.” Limerick’s film would “open our eyes to the hideous fact that we have been contaminating the blood of a truly wonderful race with that of the dregs from all parts of the world” and, by exposing this “ghastly 358Reginald Fant and Jack Henningfield, “Pharmacology and Abuse Potential of Cigars,” in Cigars: Health Effects and Trends 181-93 at 186 (1998). In addition, they found it “interesting[ ]” that Gies et al. had “listed cigars before cigarettes in order of greatest to least degree of psychoactive and toxic potency,” id. at 181, although, the rank-ordering was based on absolutely nothing. Even though Henningfield could not fairly be expected to have known that the cigarette companies had stood behind the writing and publication of this article, it is astonishing that he apparently read the text in such a slipshod manner that he remained unaware that the authors neither cited nor conducted any empirical investigations on which their then facially either plausible or implausible allegations could have been based.

Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States

truth...in photographic fidelity,” prompt the surviving American family members to “think soberly of their own unborn.” The film would “be refreshingly free from the low-appealing touch of men just come from the Cloak and Suit factory....” Despite or perhaps precisely because of the scores of millions in America who were unable to read a book, the film was designed to “present within the brief space of a single afternoon or an evening a complete exposition and a simple explanation of facts that could not possibly be ascertained in a whole year of intensive reading of the literature dealing with the laws of heredity and their all-powerful effect on the lives of individuals and the destiny of human races.” As such it would “completely outstrip ‘Uncle Tom’s Cabin’ and ‘The Birth of a Nation’ in its appeal to human emotions. It will go down in history as the most gripping, convincing admonition of all times.” Among the scenes that would “surpass in magnitude and nicety of detail anything of the kind hitherto cast upon the screen” would be: contrasting Ancient Greece’s grandeur with today’s “bootblack and banana-monger”; the “Ghetto of New York; filth; disease; ignorance; poverty; crime; push-cart peddlers; Bolshevism. Lower Fifth Avenue at noon; a gesticulating swarm of alien faces; foreign language newspapers screaming class hatred and demanding more and more tolerance. Ellis Island: a ‘close-up’ of the source of our racial ruin. Sing Sing; the conspicuously small number of Anglo-Saxon faces”; “Marriage of an Anglo-Saxon girl of distinguished ancestry to a Jew. Offspring flat-footed, twisted-nosed, swarthy boy, who later in life burns store to collect insurance.” The film would also show that “when a white crosses with a negro, the offspring is a negro; a Nordic with a Jew is a Jew; an Alpine with a Hindu is a Hindu.” The script ends with the sequence of scenes, which culminates in “[o]pening our gates to the world’s unfit,” followed by the start of the “historical romance that will hold interest” in the film. “End.”

Limerick had apparently moved on since his Billy Burgundy days, when his writings were “always free from animosity” and he found “food only for harmless fun in the imperfections of life,” but was “never brutal” and “always sweet in 360[Oliver Victor Limerick], “The Inside of the Melting Pot: An Epochal Picturization of the Laws of Heredity” [unpaginated] (n.d. [ca.1926]), in Limerick/McRae file, Old Court House Museum, Vicksburg, MS. Limerick’s obsession with heredity was reflected in an article on acid dentifrice he co-authored with two periodontia instructors at Columbia University that gratuitously asserted that “intelligence is chiefly a matter of native endowment” and that in “the higher spheres of intellectual pursuit...we find proof that the transmission of mental abilities is subject to the laws of heredity....” Paul Stillman, John McCall, and O. Victor Limerick, “The Acid Dentifrice as an Intelligence Test,” Dental Items of Interest 45:303-305 (April 1923).

temper, playful and tender; even sympathetic.”

It is unknown whether Limerick carved out an exception from his blanket condemnation of ethnic and racial otherness for his Russian-Jewish immigrant co-author Dr. Max D. Kahn or his boss, Dr. Jacob Gutman, the Latvian-born founder and director of the Brooklyn Diagnostic Institute or, alternatively, whether Kahn, Gutman, and their ilk formed part of his experience with the world that prompted him to end his days ranting and raving about New York’s non-Anglo-Saxon population, countless thousands of whom, sharing Limerick’s anti-tobaccophobic position, were helping to expand the cigarette market to unprecedented levels. When Limerick died of angina pectoris at the age of 54 in 1926, The New York Times did not even dignify his death or life with an obituary.

---

TMA’s Campaign to Habitate the Whole World to “smoking second hand smoke”

Frank Walden Pettigrew, son of United States Senator Pettigrew, of South Dakota, was assaulted and seriously injured by an usher in the theatre here [Kansas City] tonight. Young Pettigrew lighted a cigarette in the lobby and became involved in a controversy with the usher as to the rule forbidding smoking. He was struck a vicious blow on the right cheek bone, fracturing it, also dislocating the jaw. He was removed to a hospital.

A bitter and long fought squabble over smoking marked the opening of the socialist national convention... yesterday.

---

362 “Dr. Jacob Gutman, Physician 44 Years,” NYT, May 9, 1944 (19).
363 JAMA 87(23):1933 (Dec. 4, 1926).
364 The news that he had died in Harlem Hospital on May 11 after a brief illness appeared in a column of death announcements. “Died,” NYT, May 12, 1926 (27); “Died,” NYT, May 13, 1926 (25). Five years after his death, his name appeared on a list of unclaimed deposits at the Manufacturers Trust Company; oddly, the date of the original deposit was the day he died. “Unclaimed Deposits,” NYT, Sept. 9, 1931 (45). Limerick must have been sufficiently well-known for the author of a book on smoking in 1939 to have been aware that he had died. Referring to, without citing, Limerick’s article on tobacophobes, the non-medical author correctly pointed out that contrary to Limerick’s claim that heavy smokers, unlike (other) drug addicts, reached a plateau of dosing, more recent (also uncited) research had discovered that “instead of increasing the number of cigarettes smoked daily, the inhaling cigarette addict is always increasing the depth and duration of his inhale...” J. Furnas, So You’re Going to Stop Smoking! 76-77 (1939).
365 “Young Pettigrew Hurt,” DDR, Dec. 29, 1900 (1:3).
When the motion to prohibit it was introduced nearly every delegate jumped to his feet and demanded to be heard. The chairman, after considerable pounding for order, recognized John Kerrigan of Texas, who declared that “to prohibit smoking in this convention is destructive of that comradeship for which we socialists stand.” Mrs. J. Smith, a delegate from Oregon, demanded the passage of the motion on the ground that “we who do not smoke protest against smoking second hand smoke.”

After a futile appeal from the decision of the chair the motion was declared passed amid confusion. 366

[T]he only persons who will receive the proposition [to provide a smoking car on the New York City subway] without shuddering will be cigar manufacturers so prosperous that their automobiles take the place of public conveyances. No! air is what we need in the subway, not smoke. The atmosphere of the subway would be an insult to a decent cigar.” 367

During the years of cigarettes’ inexorable ascendancy to domination of the tobacco industry TMA sought to propitiate the other branches by suggesting that cigarettes, far from diminishing consumption of the other forms, actually increased it. Thus in praising cigarettes (as what later would be called a gateway drug) at the 1923 annual convention President Jesse Bloch offered his sincere conviction that the Cigarette Industry is the fountain source that constantly supplies the cigar trade, as well as the pipe tobacco business, with new consumers. As smoking is becoming more popular from year to year, and as there is probably a yearly addition to the great army of tobacco users of approximately a million young men who attain maturity, the cigarette is the form of tobacco that gets the first call in the great majority of cases, for usually the new tobacco consumer begins with the cigarette, but eventually he adds also the other forms of tobacco....

Thus, with the multitude of new consumers that the cigarette industry is apparently creating from year to year, cigar smoking, as well as pipe smoking, should secure their proportional shares of increased business. 368

For those whose cash registers told a different story 369 what better way to 366 “Socialist Have a Row over Rule ‘No Smoking,’” CT, May 2, 1904 (4).

368 “President Bloch’s Address a Thorough Survey of Industry’s Progress,” USTJ 99(20):12 (May 19, 1923).
369 Production of large cigars had peaked at 8.1 billion in 1920 and declined to 6.95 billion by 1923; peak production of small cigars was 1.2 billion in 1911 and fell to 633 million by 1923; smoking tobacco production peaked at 258 million pounds in 1918 before dropping to 235 million by 1923. In contrast, whereas large cigar production had less than doubled from 1890 to its 1920 peak and smoking tobacco production had less than foster solidarity of firms facing a shrinking market with their expanding rivals than by conjuring up the specter of a movement dedicated to achieving a “Tobaccoless World by 1925”?\textsuperscript{370} A less speculative and more tangible tactic was to focus on regulatory restrictions that in fact already did affect all branches of the smoking tobacco industry—namely, the “[l]ack of accommodation for smokers on surface cars and rapid transit lines,” which, according to TMA, reduced tobacco merchants’ sales by more than a million dollars alone in New York City in 1916 and prompted the TMA to appeal to the Public Service Commission and railroads for “more liberal arrangements.”\textsuperscript{371}

This battle over secondhand smoke exposure was in fact one of the first public manifestations of the new organization: already at its founding meeting in 1915 TMA used the regulation of smoking on public transportation in New York City as an example of the consequences of the fact that “no trade organization has ever taken any action in that regard”—namely, the loss of millions of dollars of business there and in other big cities such as Philadelphia and St. Louis, where similar regulatory action took place also in the absence of any representation of tobacco interests. Nor were these disputes confined to means of transport: TMA groused that: “In New York we see people arrested daily and fined as high as $50 for smoking in their own offices, and according to present indications it will not be long before smoking will be prohibited in every building and in every shop building in New York.” When a hearing had been held, the TMA recounted, on whether the Public Service Commission should eliminate the smoking cars from the Coney Island trains, the most militant anti-smoking figure in New York City, doubled from 1902 to its peak in 1918, cigarette production had increased 27-fold from 1890. U.S. Department of Agriculture, First Annual Report on Tobacco Statistics (with Basic Date), tab. 14 at 90 (Statistical Bull. No. 58 (May 1937). Similarly, whereas peak per capita consumption of large cigars (86) was recorded in 1907 and of smoking tobacco
(2.37 pounds) in 1916, that of cigarettes continued to rise from 35 in 1900 to 578 in 1923
(and far beyond in later years). \textit{Id.} tab. 16 at 100.

\textsuperscript{370}L. Ames Brown, “Is a Tobacco Crusade Coming?” \textit{Atlantic Monthly} 120: 446-55 at 446 (Oct. 1920).

\textsuperscript{371}“No Smoking’ Costs Millions to Trade,” \textit{N.Y.T}, Feb. 21, 1916 (12). After cigar companies had persuaded the Public Service Commission in St. Louis to permit smoking in the three rear seats of street-cars when the weather permitted the windows to be open and at all times on all open rear platforms, it was “estimated that means an increased consumption of 20,000 cigars daily.” “Permit Smoking on St. Louis Cars,” \textit{USTJ}, vol. 83, Apr. 24, 1915 (4:4). In Chicago cigar sellers estimated that the prohibition of smoking on surface and elevated cars reduced consumption of cigars by 12 to 15 million dollars annually. “Chicago Cigar Dealers Resent Interdiction Upon Smoking in Cars,” \textit{USTJ} 91(20):82 (May 17, 1919).
Dr. Charles Pease, the president of the Non-Smokers’ Protective League of America, had been there with “all his forces,” but “not a single organization to represent the tobacco industry that is now losing a million dollars worth of business every year.”372 (At its founding in 1911 the tobacco trade press denounced the League for seeking to “crib, cabin and confine smokers” so that its sympathizers “may not have their dyspeptic systems deranged by a puff of good tobacco smoke.”)373 To be sure, in 1916 Dushkind and TMA fared no better when they requested that the Commission rescind its 1913 order—not even when firms were supported by the Joint Advisory Board of the Cigar Makers Organization, which requested “greater liberties” for smokers because the existing rule was “prejudicial” to many union workers and “discriminatory and unjust to the large majority of the people who indulge themselves in the pleasurable habit of smoking.”374

In the welter of the public health, cultural, political, moral, and economic wars to reduce and end secondhand smoke exposure that have been raging since the 1970s, historical memory has been blotted out of the reverse contentious and contested process, forced by profit-hungry producers rallying their addicted customers, that began in the nineteenth century and led to the nearly ubiquitous de jure and de facto acceptability of tobacco smoking by the 1960s. (Even when users of the Kansas City, Missouri street-railway in 1912 voted three to one to retain the company’s prohibition, “[a] rule of that kind couldn’t be enforced, it

372 “Jacob Wertheim First President of Tobacco Merchants’ Association,” WTJ 42(46):2 (Oct. 15, 1915). Presumably the bans in offices were fire related. On Pease and his group, see “Form Non-Smokers’ League,” NYT, May 10, 1910 (18); Arden Christen and Joan Christen, “Charles G. Pease, DDS, MD: Anti-Tobacco Crusader and Clean Life Advocate,” Journal of the History of Dentistry 49(2):81-86 (July 2001). Pease, noting that “we have allowed custom to ride roughshod over us,” urged the right to breathe air uncontaminated by tobacco smoke, which produced headache, dizziness, nausea, and fainting in addition to injuring eyes and lungs. Chas. Pease, “The Non-Smokers’ League,” NYT, Nov. 10, 1911 (10) (letter to editor).

373 “Cranks Combine,” USTJ, vol. 76, July 8, 1911 (7:2).

374 “Only 4 Seats for Smokers,” NYT, May 23, 1916 (22). Back in 1913, too, the Central Federated Union of Greater New York, representing 300,000 workers, attacked Pease for trying to abridge the personal liberty of many thousands of workers who found “in the pipe or cigar a solace and harmless pleasure after their day’s toil.” “Workers Assail Dr. Pease,” NYT, Aug. 10, 1913 (11). In connection with a street-car anti-smoking ordinance in St. Louis one alderman argued that since “many workingmen were not permitted to smoke during working hours...they should not be denied the pleasure of smoking going to and from their work.” “The Anti-Smoking Ordinance in St. Louis,” Tobacco 69(16):19 (Feb. 19, 1920).
was said. The right to smoke was too well intrenched [sic].” Both conflicts over the externalities caused by smoking on modern means of mass transportation—especially as commuting distances to and from urban workplaces increased and smokers spent more time traveling on them daily—and tobacco products firms’ complaints of lost business resulting from restrictions and prohibitions long antedated the formation of TMA and even preceded the creation of the Tobacco Trust. As early as 1887, the United States Tobacco Journal bemoaned the intransigence of officials of the elevated trains in New York City, who failed to appreciate the need to accommodate nicotine addiction and the tobacco industry’s profitability:

New York is the largest producer of cigars in the world; but it is relatively and comparatively not the largest consumer of them. As a very considerable part of the time of a New Yorker is spent on the cars, and mostly on the elevated roads, where even the use of the platform for an occasional puff is denied him, he is restricted to the consumption of the fragrant weed more by the lack of opportunity than of his own volition. He may be craving for a smoke; but then he remembers he has to take the cars either up-town or down-town; it won’t do just now to light a cigar to throw it away the next minute, and he has to forego his appetite. Millions of cigars have thus lost their chance of being consumed, and our manufacturers lose their best and most profitable opportunity of enlarging their trade in home consumption.

Without speculating about the possible market niche that might be opened up for the as yet infant cigarette, which could be smoked much more quickly than a cigar, the cigar-centered Journal, which preferred to impute reified quasi-agency to its favored commodity, spun out its market-widening dream:

But fancy the result if smoking cars should be attached to the elevated trains! Most people like to light a cigar right after breakfast. At present they have to stifle their liking till they reach their downtown offices. Urgent business may await them there, and they forget their cigars till after luncheon. The trade’s opportunity is lost. But if the smoker knew he could

---

375 F. J. Munagle, “Voting Out the Street-car Smoker,” Harper’s Weekly, 56:23 (July 20, 1912). The company held the referendum after the “[t]he cigar men” had induced the city council to pass an ordinance authorizing limited smoking on the street-cars because the company did not acknowledge the city’s right to permit smoking on the company’s cars. Despite having been “[d]eprieved of the moral influence of official support,” the company continued to enforce the ban for “sanitary” reasons. When rare wilful violators persisted, “the car was stopped to wait until they got off or threw away their cigars, a result which was always aided by the manifestations of outraged and indignant sentiment on the car.”

enjoy his cigar on his ride down-town he would light it after breakfast and keep on smoking all the forenoon. For appetite begets appetite. Likewise in the evening.... At least several hundred thousand more cigars would be consumed daily, and the bulk of the benefit our home manufacturers would reap.\textsuperscript{377}

The management of the elevated train in New York, much to the \textit{Journal}'s consternation, characterized anyone who would want to smoke a cigar on it as "belonging to that class of people whose bump of selfishness overtops their numerous other bumps.... They are always looking after their own enjoyment and comfort, regardless of the annoyance and discomfort they may occasion others, so long as their own wants are satisfied." Management was primarily concerned about the additional employment costs associated with hiring workers to clean the smoking cars, but it also rejected the proposal because inevitably smokers—including boys carrying their "odorous cigarettes"—would walk through the entire train to get to the smoking car. The \textit{Journal}, though chagrined by management’s opting to "inconvenience the gentlemen" to save a "trifle" in cleaning expenses, realized that its hope for a smoking car could be "pushed into reality" only by "our manufacturers, to whose advantage and profit it will turn out ultimately.\textsuperscript{378}

The battle over smoking on New York’s elevated trains raged on. Two years later, even Russell Sage, robber baron and elevated railroad owner, rejected smoking outright on the grounds of odor alone, but assigned as an additional "clincher" that the provision of smoking cars would necessarily also confer on smokers the privilege of lighting their cigars wherever they pleased because one important reason for wanting to smoke on the elevated was the wish to finish a cigar that they had been smoking when they reached the stairs: "Consequently while women and children and men who do not smoke are standing on the platform waiting for the train they are subject to the annoyance of smoke."\textsuperscript{379}

Two decades later, public revulsion at smoking on elevated trains was reflected in the view of the Frank Hedley, the vice president and traffic manager of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company about the state of smoking cars on the “L”: “The car cannot be kept clean. Windows are clouded, the straps and seats saturated by tobacco juice secretions; passengers none too clean in their habits expectorate everywhere and anywhere; and the car comes to justify the name it bears wherever it is employed—the Hog’s car.”\textsuperscript{380} In its push to \textsuperscript{377}“Smoking on the ’L,’” \textit{USTJ}, vol. 23, Feb. 5, 1887 (2:7).

\textsuperscript{378}“Smoking on the ’L,’” \textit{USTJ}, vol. 23, Feb. 5, 1887 (2:7).
\textsuperscript{379}“To Smoke on the ’L,’” \textit{USTJ}, vol. 28, Sept. 14, 1889 (4:2-3).
\textsuperscript{380}“Hedley Against Smoking Car,” \textit{USTJ}, vol. 71, May 8, 1909 (7:3-4). Four years
Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States eliminate all space-and-time limitations on smoking in order to increase both smoking prevalence and per capita consumption, the tobacco trade in 1909 did not even shy away from accusing the New York City Board of Health of “obtuse and reactionary paternalism” for suppressing smoking on subways.\(^{381}\) Although the Board of Health stood its ground and strengthened enforcement,\(^{382}\) the tobacco industry—which by 1925 acquiesced in the subway ban to the extent that, while mourning the untold hours during which “several billion passengers a year” were not permitted to consume tobacco, urged that suggestions for permitting its use “not be pressed where the plan is not feasible, or liable to become a nuisance and redound to the disadvantage of the industry”\(^{383}\)—soon found no end of other forums in which to agitate for freedom to smoke. Thus, for example, when Dr. Pease complained about smoking at Central Park concerts—the parks commissioner agreed that smoking should not occur immediately in front of the band stand because some people there were annoyed by it, but favored smoking at “reasonable points about the stand” because it was “his duty to make the public as comfortable as possible at the concerts”\(^{384}\)—the United State Tobacco Journal took Pease to task for having written that while he was not requesting that tobacco

---

\(^{381}\)“A Rebuke to Paternalism,” NYT, Mar. 20, 1909 (8) (edit.).

\(^{383}\)“Industry Should Encourage Smoking in Conveyances When Proper Facilities Are Provided,” USTJ 104(1):12 (July 4, 1925). By 1934, during a two-week anti-smoking campaign, more than 2,600 people appeared in city magistrates’ courts, 1989 of whom paid $2,631 in fines for having carried lighted cigarettes, cigars, or pipes into subway stations or trains. “2,600 Appear in Court for Smoking in Subways,” NYT, May 3, 1934 (2). By 1950, transit police served court summonses on 9,167 for smoking. “10,175 Arrested in Subways,” NYT, Jan. 9, 1951 (39). Whether these figures, against the background of billions of passengers annually, indicated widespread compliance and strict enforcement, is unclear.

\(^{384}\)“Won’t Stop Park Smoking,” NYT, July 19, 1913 (6).
smokers as nuisances be prohibited from smoking, he was requesting that they be prohibited from discharging tobacco smoke into the air that nonsmokers had to breathe. The trade journal’s response was curiously at variance with its touted medical findings that smoking did not vitiate the air people breathed because it was carbonic acid gas exhaled during ordinary breathing that did so and the condition of smokers’ mouths was, according to leading dentists, “far better” than nonsmokers.\(^{385}\) Accusing Pease of “unchecked idiocy,” the Tobacco Journal rhetorically asked what the smoker was supposed to do with his cigar, pipe, or cigarette smoke: “Absorb it into his lungs, swallow it and eat it? Is a smoking man to be converted into a kind of coal smoke consuming furnace?”\(^{386}\)

Having achieved a partial success at open-air concerts, the tobacco industry went after movie theaters: if only a “material percentage” of them “could be induced to permit smoking in the whole or a portion of their auditoriums”—many theaters in New York City permitted smoking in balconies and loges—“another tremendous influence would be at work for an increased consumption of tobacco products.” The Journal urged the trade to tell smokers to make their wishes known because smoking would be permitted if enough people asked for it. After all: “There is no doubt that smokers and wives, sisters and sweethearts of smokers, are in the majority.”\(^{387}\)

A turning point in this particular locus of the secondhand smoke conflict was marked by the decision of the Public Service Commission in 1913 not to permit smoking on New York City’s mass transit except in the four rear rows of open cars.\(^{388}\) Contrary to TMA’s later account, the tobacco industry was represented \(^{385}\)“Seek Smoking Privilege on ‘Low-Level’ Cars and ‘L’ Trains in New York,” USTJ, vol. 83, May, 29, 1915 (8:2-3). The medical authority was Dr. J. Gardner Smith, who at an earlier Public Service Commission hearing had “pointed out the scientific value of tobacco as a disinfectant...” “Hearing Before the Public Service Commission Attaching Smoking Cars,” USTJ, 80, Oct. 25, 1913 (1:1-4 at 4). Smith claimed that 75 percent of men smoked and 75 percent of women liked it, whereas he was asking for only 20 percent of space for 75 percent of the population—otherwise 5 to 10 percent of people would crowd all the rest out of their personal comforts. “Seek Smoking Privilege on ‘Low-Level’ Cars and ‘L’ Trains in New York,” USTJ, vol. 83, May, 29, 1915 (8:2-3).

---

\(^{386}\)“Who’s the Nuisance?” USTJ, vol. 80, July 26, 1913 (4:1-2) (edit.).

\(^{387}\)“Smoking Permitted,” USTJ, vol. 83, Mar. 20, 1915 (24:3-4). The Journal later bemoaned the drop in consumption that would result if even only one-thirteenth of the 13 million people attending movies daily were men prohibited from smoking one to two hours a day, regardless of how much they smoked the rest of the day. “For Smoking Privileges in Picture Shows,” USTJ, 83, June 5, 1915 (24:3-4).

\(^{388}\)“Lays Down Smoking Rule,” NYT, Aug. 2, 1913 (1). Making a virtue of a necessity, the United States Tobacco Journal tried to depict the retention of this exemption as a victory because it “is to the practice of smoking in open cars that the trade owes a very great part of the increase in consumption of cigars, cigarettes and tobacco in Greater New York during the Summer.” “A Hearing Against Smoking on the Open Surface Cars,” USTJ, vol. 79, June 14, 1913 (1:2-3). Thus the continued exemption meant that “the increased consumption of cigars, cigarettes and tobacco is not threatened.” “Smoking Permitted as of Yore,” USTJ, vol. 79, Aug. 9, 1913 (1:4). However, although the Journal urged that a “crushing defeat administered the ‘anti-tobacs’ now will scatter their puny strength for years to come,” the paper did not assert that it had been achieved. “A Hearing Against Smoking on the Open Surface Cars,” USTJ, vol. 79, June 14, 1913 (1:2-3).

According to an anti-smoking group, in 1913 the Sanitary Code had been briefly amended to ban all smoking on public vehicles in Brooklyn and the various lines complied with the provision for a few months. Consequently, “[t]he tobacco interests” suffered, and signs were displayed in all stores where tobacco was sold with the message: “Smokers, Assert Your Rights.” The Public Service Commission then issued an order permitting smoking in the rear four seats of open cars. A. Fraser, “Smoking on Surface Cars,” NYT, Sept. 3, 1914 (6) (letter to editor).

389 “72,000 Smokers Petition,” NYT, Oct. 12, 1913 (6).
390 “Topics in Wall Street,” NYT, Oct. 15, 1913 (14:).
391 “To Smoke or Not to Smoke,” NYT, Aug. 21, 1913 (8).
392 “Smokers Demand a Place on Cars,” NYT, Oct. 24, 1913 (12); “Officials Oppose Cars for Smokers,” NYT, Nov. 7, 1913 (7).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside the Iowa House and Senate (1839-1933), Other State Legislatures (from 1816), and Congress (from 1822):

Statehouses Themselves as the Sites of the First Struggles Against Secondhand Tobacco Smoke Exposure at the Workplace

There is nothing goofier than legislators banning smoking here, there and everywhere around the state—EXCEPT where they gather to work.\(^1\)

For more than three and a half centuries legislators in the New World have been resisting exposure to their colleagues’ tobacco smoke at their workplaces and prohibiting smoking in legislative chambers. As early as 1646 the House of Deputies in Massachusetts Bay “ordered, y’ if any ps on shall take any tobacco within the roome where the Courte is sitting, he shall forfeite, for euy pipe so taken, 6\(^6\); & if they shall offend againe, in contemñng this wholesome order, he shallbe [sic] called to y’ barr for his delinquency, & pay double his fyne. Voted.”\(^2\) (This ban was hardly surprising considering that 14 years earlier a court in Boston had “ordered that noe ps on shall take any tobacco publiquely vnder paine of punishm' also that ewy one shall pay j\(^d\) for every time he is convicted for takeing tobacco in any place....”)\(^3\) Ironically, the House of Burgesses of Virginia, the epicenter of tobacco growing, in 1663 included among its “Orders to be observed in the house” (governing such behavior as absences, irreverence, drunkenness, and interrupting): “That every member that shall pipe it after the house is begun to be called over, until adjournment or publick licence by consent of the major part of the house in the vacancy from any business, shall be fined twenty pounds of tobacco.”\(^4\) The New Hampshire Assembly followed suit in 1699, providing as the fifth of the Orders of the House that “none smoak tobacco in the house after calling over, on Penalty of 3 d for the Clerk.”\(^5\) And the lower house of yet

---

\(^3\) A Court holden att Boston New Octob’ 3, 1632, in Records of the Court of Assistants of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay: 1630-1692, 2:28 (1904).
\(^4\) Journals of the House of Burgesses of Virginia 1659/60-1693, at 26 (Sept. 19, 1663) (H. R. McIlwaine ed. 1914); William Hening, The Statutes at Large; Being A Collection of All The Laws of Virginia, from the First Session of the Legislature, in the Year 1619, 2:207 (Sept. 19, 1663).
\(^5\) Provincial Papers: Documents and Records Relating to the Province of New
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

another New England colony, Connecticut, in 1726 adopted a resolution that “if any of the members thereof shall presume to smok tobacco in the chamber wherein they commonly sit, at any time whatsoever, [they] shall pay a fine of 6d. for each offence, to be to the use of the House.”

By 1924, when Robert Luce, a former decade-long member of the Massachusetts House and at the time in the midst of his 20-year tenure in Congress, devoted two pages of what eventually became a four-volume, 2,800-page treatise on The Science of Legislation to smoking, he opined that “[f]ormal prohibition” of smoking was then “to be found in the rules of nearly all the Legislatures.” He nevertheless added that: “Probably there are few rooms of standing committees where smoking is forbidden.” In fact, not only had quasi-universality of formal bans been attained far earlier, but, as the case of Iowa demonstrates, by the 1920s the rise of the seeming quasi-ubiquity of smoking was leading to the dismantling of that solid front.

An Overview of the History of State Legislative Self-Regulation of Smoking

WHEREAS, A large number of the Senators and employes of the Senate, as well as the visitors to the Senate Chamber, are not addicted to the habit of smoking, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the file room and cloak room be designated as the smoking rooms, and that those desiring to smoke be allowed the use of said rooms for that purpose; and that smoking in the Senate chamber and in the committee rooms be prohibited, and the sergeant-at-arms and other officers are instructed to see that this resolution is enforced.

---

1 Robert Luce, Legislative Assemblies: Their Framework, Make-Up, Character, Characteristics, Habits, and Manners 637 (1924). Luce mentioned two limitations: The California rule made a “generous exception that at evening sessions it may be suspended by majority vote without notice or reference to a committee,” while the Michigan Senate did not extend the ban to the committee of the whole. Id.

2 Journal of the Senate of the Thirtieth Session of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota 203 (Feb. 11, 1897), Bates No. BYL-000002 (Republican Senator William Yale). Because a senator gave notice of debate, “the resolution went over, under the rules.” Id.

1784
The various rules that the Iowa House and Senate have created over the years to prohibit smoking at the state capitol have reflected changing attitudes among the public at large towards smoking, but they also constitute material for a unique look at the first workplace-based struggles against secondhand smoke. As the Iowa legislature began requiring schools to educate children about the dangers of tobacco in the 1880s, the House and Senate, like their counterparts in some other states, codified in their standing rules bans on smoking in their chambers that for decades had been formulated in less formal resolutions. To be sure, as early as 1816, the Pennsylvania House, following vigorous debate, incorporated this ban in its rules: “It is not permitted to any person to smoke tobacco, at any time, within the chamber of the House.”

Unsurprisingly, these bans remained in force during the period (1896-1921) in which the Iowa General Assembly prohibited the sale of cigarettes in Iowa, though legislatures in some states banned internal smoking that had never enacted sales bans (e.g., Ohio, North Carolina, and South Carolina). Soon after the Iowa legislature had repealed its statewide sales ban, the two houses began deregulating smoking at the capitol. During the heyday of virtually unimpeded smoking in the United States, no rules interfered with smoking in the Iowa legislature. (To be sure, even at the zenith of smoking laissez-faire, some restrictions were enforced at the local level in Iowa. For example, still in force during World War II was a 1916 Des Moines ordinance prohibiting smoking, snuffing, or chewing tobacco in any bakery. In 1936 the Des Moines police and health departments joined in a “drive for more rigid enforcement of the city ordinance against smoking and spitting on street cars.... The ordinance was enforcible “regardless of whether women are aboard the cars.” And even during

---

9See above ch. 9.
10For example, in 1887 Rule 64 of the Kansas Senate provided that: “No person shall be allowed to smoke tobacco in the Senate chamber or the galleries.” Senate Journal: Proceedings of the Senate of the State of Kansas 77 (Jan. 13) (1887).
11Journal of the Twenty Seventh House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania 61, 64, 91-92 (Dec. 13 and 18, 1816) (1816-17). For detailed discussion, see above ch. 3
13Press ‘No Smoking’ Rule in Street Cars,” DMT, Jan. 8, 1936 (1A:6-7). For the original 1886 ordinance, see above ch. (on 1921). A somewhat later ordinance read: “It shall be unlawful for any person to smoke on any streetcar, bus or other vehicle operated for the carriage of passengers as a common carrier except in a place provided for smoking therein by the owner thereof.” Ord. 4273, § 6, Municipal Code of Des Moines 1942, ch. 104-11 at 474. In 1942, the City of Des Moines still prohibited smoking in opera houses.
World War II the police in Iowa’s capital were detailed to remove from street cars any passengers who refused to stop smoking.\(^{14}\)

Not until the mid-1970s, when the Iowa and other state legislatures began debating and enacting statewide (but limited) public smoking bans did the House initiate a process of incremental restrictions on internal smoking.\(^{15}\) The Senate did not follow suit until the early 1990s—in large part because of the power exercised by smokers who held leadership positions—having fallen behind the laws that it had helped enact for the rest of the public buildings in the state. By 2007, the situation had been reversed: both houses had banned smoking virtually everywhere in the state capitol, thus affording legislators more rigorous protection from exposure to secondhand smoke at their workplace than they did for (almost) the rest of Iowa’s working people until 2008.\(^{16}\)

In order to put the Iowa experience in the national context, the (non-exhaustive) overview of nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century smoking bans in state legislatures displayed in Table 6\(^{17}\) impressively underscores how early on and broadly legislators throughout the country successfully protested against being forced to endure the tobacco fumes during interminable sessions. The salient point of this review is not merely that, with the possible exception of several New England legislatures (which had, ironically, already in the colonial period formally penalized smoking and in which in the nineteenth and early-twentieth century custom may have formed the basis for the absence of smoking), virtually all legislatures (and many state constitutional conventions) at some point imposed such bans.\(^{18}\) Rather, at least as significant were the strong, sharp, and

---

13. See below ch. 25.
16. See below at end of this ch.
17. Identifying which state legislative chambers established, by rule or resolution, internal no-smoking bans between the beginning of the nineteenth century and World War I would be excruciatingly burdensome enough if it could done by looking up “smoking” or “smoke” in the indexes of nearly 10,000 House and Senate journals (accessing which, since no single library has all of them, would impose a tremendous burden on an interlibrary loan department), if they all had indexes and those indexes were relatively comprehensive. In fact, however, most journals fail to index “smoking” even when the word appears in the volume; in such instances, eyeballing a large volume of as many as 2,000 pages, with undiminished vigilance, for a single word mentioned once or twice is scarcely an optimal use of limited research time, especially when a large proportion of the journals do not contain the word. (That smoking was banned during one session does not mean that it was necessarily banned the next session; it is also more likely that a smoking ban formulated by resolution than by rule will be found in a journal. Moreover, the fact that “smoking” is not used may be ambiguous because it may not mean that the chamber did not deal with the issue, but that the rules (which were often adopted from the previous session’s) are not printed in the volume, though they may have been printed in a much more ephemeral and inaccessible publication; on the other hand, in some states, especially from the late nineteenth century on, they were included in legislative manuals, yet all of the following manuals contain House and Senate rules, but none mentions smoking.

Register and Manual of the State of Connecticut: 1889 (1889); Register and Manual of the State of Connecticut: 1893 (1893); State of Connecticut: Register and Manual 1908 (1908); Maine Legislative Manual: 1867 (1867); Maine State Year-Book, Annual Register, For the Year 1871; and Legislative Manual for 1870 (Edmund Hoyt comp.); Edmund Hoyt, Maine State Year-Book, and Legislative Manual, for the Year 1885-86; Maine Register or State Year-Book and Legislative Manual: From April 1, 1891 to April 1, 1892 (G. Donham comp. 1891); Maine Register, State Year-Book, and Legislative Manual No. 31—June 1900 (1900); Maine Register, State Year-Book, and Legislative Manual No. 36—June 1905 (1905); Maine Register, State Year-Book, and Legislative Manual No. 40—June 1909 (1909); Maine Register, State Year-Book, and Legislative Manual No. 45—July 1914 (1914); Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Manual for the Use of the General Court (1859, 1863, 1878); Manual for the Use of the General Court of New Hampshire for 1895 (1895); Manual for the Use of the General Court of New Hampshire for 1917 (1917); Manual for the Use of the General Court of New Hampshire for 1931 (1931); Manual for the Use of the General Court of New Hampshire for 1941 (1941); Manual for the Use of the General Court of New Hampshire for 1951 (1951); Manual for the Use of the General Court of New Hampshire for 1961 (1961); Manual, with Rules and Orders, for the Use of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, 1889 (1889); Manual, with Rules and Orders, for the Use of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, 1895-96 (1896); Manual, with Rules and Orders, for the Use of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, 1912 (1912); Manual, with Rules and Orders, for the Use of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island: 1916 (1916); Manual of the State of West Virginia: Legislative, Executive and Judicial Departments: Corrected to January 1, 1899 (1899); Manual of the State of West Virginia for the Years 1907-1908 (1907); West Virginia Legislative Handbook and Manual and Official Register: 1917 (John Harris ed.); West Virginia Legislative Handbook and Manual and Official Register: 1920 (John Harris ed.); West Virginia Legislative Handbook and Manual and Official Register: 1922 (John Harris ed.). In recent years, many hundreds—but thus far only a small proportion—of state legislative journals have been digitized and can be word-searched on the websites www.hathitrust.org, www.archive.org, and books.google.com; even with less than perfect performance of its optical character recognition software—Google Books, in particular, fails to retrieve many journals when searched by title that can, however, be found by a textual word search—this enormously powerful labor-saving technology still awaits its application to thousands of others journals. (At least one library organization is considering digitizing all of the journals, some of which salty rhetoric and the type of arguments that legislators deployed to justify bans, which predominantly focused on non-smoking legislators’ own health and physical comfort. Moreover, ahistorically deformed imagination buckles at the notion that in the mid- and later-nineteenth century legislative majorities existed to “suppress smoking”\(^19\) and thus deprive arch-rugged individualist colleagues, even in such preserves of personal freedom as Texas, Nevada, and (Territorial) Montana and Wyoming, of their god-given right to smoke tobacco wherever and whenever they felt like it. Of overriding cultural importance here is that this massive and pervasive rejection of exposure to secondhand smoke both antedated the cigarette era—during the last two decades of the nineteenth century cigars accounted for about 25 percent of all tobacco consumed compared to only about 18 percent for all other forms of smoking tobacco (including cigarettes) combined\(^20\)—and did not implicate race, ethnicity, nationality, religion, or party since the state legislators were a relatively homogeneous group.
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

To be sure, the existence of non-smoking rules did not mean that all smokers complied with them all the time. Evidence of mass violation was impressively on display even in Mormon Utah just four days after achieving statehood, when the House Speaker invited the janitor to offer prayer at the opening of the session on January 8, 1896:

the members dutifully arose and bowed reverently their heads. In deference to the invocation, some of the members who had been smoking ceased temporarily their puffing, \(^{19}\) House Journal of the Thirteenth Session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana...1883, at 283 (Mar. 3) (1883).

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

only to resume it with “Amen” pronounced.

This aroused the ire of Mr. Gibson of Uintah county, who inquired sarcastically if it would not be well for the members to learn the rules, which prohibited smoking. “As for me,” he said, “I hate smoking worse than—” but comparisons failed, and he sank back into his seat. The smokers kept on puffing.21

Determined, stolid, and open resistance to a rule created by a majority of suffering white male colleagues, fellow party members, and co-religionists suggests just how contentious the battle for control of (breathing) space could become even in the nineteenth century. And that smokers and libertarians, especially when they constituted a legislative minority, sought to construct as many procedural barriers as possible to the imposition of anti-smoking rules in their workplace was humorously illustrated by this debate in 1855 in the House of Representatives of Missouri, which was at the time the seventh largest producer of tobacco, which enjoyed special state protection and aid:22

Mr. Acock offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That smoking shall be prohibited in the Hall of the House of Representatives during sessions thereof.

Mr. Brown of St. L., offered the following amendment:
That no more apples be eaten in this Hall.

Mr. Clippard moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table;
Which was decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. Morrow, the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. Heryford offered the following amendment:
Amend by instructing the door-keeper to furnish member [sic] with a twist of pig-tail tobacco each day, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House, which was,

On motion of Mr. Williams, of D., laid on the table.

Mr. Barrett offered the following amendment:
If gentlemen will chew tobacco, they shall not be allowed to spit, which was,

On motion of Mr. Ritchey, laid on the table.

Mr. Lightner offered the following amendment:
After the word “smoking” add “and chewing ot tobacco,” which was,

On motion of Mr. Smith, of P., laid on the table.

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

The resolution was then adopted.23

Iowa

Like legislatures in many other states, the Iowa House and Senate began banning smoking long before the rise, let alone mass proliferation, of cigarettes, thus underscoring the non-empirical basis of deconstructive claims that anti-smoking movements were driven by ethnic, religious, and gendered antipathy to cigarette smokers. The persistent majorities that voted for protecting nonsmoking legislators from secondhand smoke undermine the empirically unsupported claim that in the late nineteenth century “few respectable Iowans would condemn the enjoyment of cigars by bankers, lawyers, and other solid middle-class males....”24 Beginning with Iowa’s very first territorial legislature, the House of Representatives on January 7, 1839, on the motion of Andrew Bankson (1787-1853), a Tennessean25 who had been an Illinois state senator from 1822 to 1826,26 resolved that “no person shall be allowed to smoke a pipe or cigar in this hall during the sittings of the House of Representatives.”27 Perhaps Bankson was moved to propose this prohibition by his experience as a member of the Illinois 23Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, at the First Session of the Eighteenth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four 271 (Feb. 12, 1855) (1855).

26Official Directory of the Fortieth General Assembly of Illinois: Session of 1897, Appendix 22-23 (1897). As a senator, Bankson was one of 15 Illinois legislators who joined in an appeal to the people of Illinois, “in the name of the injured sons of Africa, whose claims to equal rights with their fellow men will plead their own cause against their usurpers before the tribunal of eternal justice,” to oppose the calling of another constitutional convention designed to make Illinois a slave state. E. B. Washburne, Sketch of Edward Coles, Second Governor of Illinois, and of the Slavery Struggle of 1823-4, at 102 (quote), 107-108 (1882).
27Journal of the House of Representatives of the First Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, Begun and Held at the City of Burlington, on the Twelfth Day of November, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty-Eight 188 (n.d.).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Constitutional Convention of 1818,\textsuperscript{28} which had operated under the rule that: “No person shall be permitted to smoke tobacco in the convention while in session.”\textsuperscript{29} At Iowa’s second territorial legislative session, on the motion of Democrat Thomas Cox (1787-1844), a Kentuckian who had been a senator in the first Illinois state legislature and became Iowa House speaker during the third session,\textsuperscript{30} the House “Ordered, That no gentleman be allowed to smoke within this House.”\textsuperscript{31} The Territorial Council—the forerunner of the Senate—followed suit at the third session when, on the motion of Whig Jesse B. Browne, another Kentuckyan, who had been president of the first Council and later became the House speaker of the first legislature after statehood,\textsuperscript{32} it resolved that “smoking \textsuperscript{31}Journal of the House of Representatives of the Second Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, Begun and Held at the City of Burlington, in the County of Des Moines, on the Fourth Day of November, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty-Nine 137 (Dec. 23) (n.d.).

\textsuperscript{32}Benjamin Gue, History of Iowa: From the Earliest Times to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century 4:31-32 (1903).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

in the hall of the Council, during session hours, be prohibited.”

Successful interdiction of smoking was initiated already at the first special session of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa in 1848 when John F. Sanford (1824-74), a noted physician who two years later became “the inspiring genius” and “the father” of the Iowa State Medical Society, offered a resolution that “no person be permitted to smoke in the Senate Chamber during the time the Senate is in session.” Whether in jest or in support of suppression of noxious organic fumes, Senator Evan Jay moved to amend the motion by adding after “person” the phrase “or the stove in the lobby.” The Senate then adopted the resolution as amended. However, because this resolution, like all Iowa no-smoking resolutions until 1884, was not incorporated into the chamber’s standing rules (which were adopted each session from the previous session’s, sometimes with amendments), each session a member had to take the initiative to offer a new resolution. No legislator did so until 1856 (after the elections that brought the new Republican Party to quasi-permanent control of the legislature), when the House adopted the motion of Democrat and farmer Daniel Cort that it “dispense with smoking when the House is in session.”

---

33Journal of the Council of the Third Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, Begun and Held at the City of Burlington, on the Second Day of November, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty 231 (Nov. 5) (n.d.).

34Walter Bierring, “Iowa State Medical and Chirurgical Society,” in One Hundred Years of Iowa Medicine: Commemorating the Centenary of the Iowa State Medical Society 1850-1950, at 21-109 at 21 (1950). Sanford, who became an “excellent teacher” at various medical schools and “one of the leading surgeons of his period,” had attended medical lectures at the Medical College of Cincinnati and Philadelphia College of Medicine, “practiced[d] surgery in Keokuk until 1869 when he retired to New York City to become associated with a life insurance company.” Everett George, “Presidents of the Iowa State Medical Society 1850-1950,” in One Hundred Years of Iowa Medicine: Commemorating the Centenary of the Iowa State Medical Society 1850-1950, at 110-75 at 110-11 (1950). See also David Fairchild, “The Medical Profession in Iowa,” in John Brigham, Iowa: Its History and Its Foremost Citizens 2:694-700 at 694 (1918); History of Lee County, Iowa 1:311-12 (Nelson Roberts and S. Moorhead eds. 1914). The Iowa Medical Society still confers an annual John F. Sanford Award on non-physicians who have contributed to health, although it is unaware that Sanford was a legislator, let alone that he successfully led a battle against secondhand smoke exposure. Telephone interview with Lucinda Stephenson, vice president for communications, Iowa Medical Society, Des Moines (May 19, 2010).

35Journal of the Senate of the Extra Session of the First General Assembly of the State of Iowa 55 (Jan. 14) (1848). Jay was returned at the 1860 census as a farmer.

36Journal of the House of Representatives of the Sixth General Assembly of the State
In 1857 opponents of secondhand tobacco smoke exposure achieved a major victory when the state constitutional convention in Iowa City agreed to the resolution offered by lawyer Lewis Todhunter that “there shall be no smoking allowed in this Chamber during the sittings of the Convention, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to strictly enforce this resolution.” Remarkably, a brief one-paragraph obituary 45 years later observed that his “most distinguished service” had occurred at the convention, in the early days of which “he introduced a resolution to prevent smoking in the hall, which was unanimously adopted.” In 1856, Todhunter (1817-1902) had been one of the founders of the state Republican Party, which secured control of the legislature at the 1856 elections (retaining it until the Great Depression) and used it to implement the priority of Republicans qua “ambitious capitalists” of calling the convention “to eliminate the hated constitutional restriction on banks and other corporations.” A “most aggressive and uncompromising prohibitionist of... more than state reputation,”42 Todhunter had “joined the great army of teetotalers in 1840” and later became president of the State Temperance Association.43 Todhunter was a Methodist who settled in Indianola in 1854 and in 1860 became the president of the organizing trustees of Methodist Simpson College,44 whose historian remarked: “If one is to understand the breathtaking sobriety of Indianola and Simpson College during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, one has but to understand the dedication of men like Lewis Todhunter to the cause of temperance.”45 In Indianola he became prosecuting attorney, treasurer, city solicitor, and mayor,46 but was “widest known” as a temperance man,47 who was lauded as having “doubtless prosecuted a greater number of men who were charged with violating the [liquor] law than any other attorney in the state.”48 Together with his wife, he became a member of the Woman’s Christian Temperance Union and the Iowa State Temperance Alliance, being a delegate of 42W. Schooley, “Governing a Municipality,” Pella Chronicle, Mar. 18, 1903 (3:3). Numerous non-Iowa papers published a filler calling Todhunter “one of the most zealous and effective attorneys employed in enforcing the prohibitory law in Iowa.” E.g., DIO, Sept. 12, 1887 (4:6). Two years later he barged into an anti-prohibitionist Republican convention, which “was at first disposed to throw him out,” but then, since prohibitionists at another Republican convention had gagged those who disagreed with them, decided to teach them what “free speech” meant. He then “spoke from an extreme prohibition standpoint.” “Anti-Prohibition Convention,” BH-E, Apr. 3, 1890 (1:4-5 at 5). A delegate who had known him all his life called him a “crank of the first water.” “Some Speeches,” CREG, Apr. 4, 1890 (2:2-4 at 4). As a hotel owner and bank director, he was able to retire from the law with a “competency.” The United States Biographical Dictionary and Portrait Gallery of Eminent and Self-Made Men: Iowa Volume 778 (1878); “Lewis Todhunter,” Proceedings of the Eighth Annual Meeting of the Iowa State Bar Association 50 (1902) (obituary) (quote).

45Joseph Walt, Beneath Whispering Maples: The History of Simpson College 9-10 (1995). On Indianola as the last city in Iowa to issue cigarette sales licenses, see below ch. 20.

48The History of Warren County, Iowa 426 (1876).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

both organizations to the World’s Temperance Congress in 1893. The other 35 Constitutional Convention members may or may not have shared his views on alcohol, but manifestly a majority sympathized with (or at least acquiesced in) his antipathy to tobacco smoke.

Once Republicans gained control of the legislature—a caesura that coincided with the removal of the state capital from Iowa City to Des Moines and the occupation of a new (temporary) brick capitol in 1858—non-smoking resolutions were offered and adopted with greater frequency from the late 1850s to the early 1880s, the House going through this process in 1858, 1864, 1866, 1872, 1874, 1878, 1880, and 1884, and the Senate in 1860, 1864, 1872, 1874, 1876, 1880, 1882, and 1884. Alone the fact that the smoking ban was neither instituted in every session nor incorporated into the permanent rules strongly suggests that its rationale was not fire hazard. This variability also points to the contested nature of such initiatives as well as the need for especially committed advocates.

A sense of the controversies can be gained by examining passage of the resolutions. In 1858, when Republican Representative W.B. Davis, a physician and a Methodist, offered a resolution that “no smoking shall be allowed in this House during the session hours,” the chamber rejected a narrowing amendment (“except during a call of the House”) by Republican lawyer Ezekiel Cooley and adopted the resolution. Two years later the Senate followed suit in adopting the resolution offered by Democrat William Pusey, a banker and former lawyer from Council Bluffs, that “during the sittings of the Senate, smoking shall be 50Without any evidence or argument, an early twentieth-century scholar hinted that some religious motive had underlain adoption of the smoking ban: he asserted that in connection with the fact that in contrast with the constitutional conventions of 1844 and 1846, each session in 1857 opened with a prayer, “an incident [namely, the ban] should be mentioned which affords further insight into the character of the delegates.” Erik Eriksson, “The Framers of the Constitution of 1857,” IJHP 22(1):52-88 at 60 (Jan. 1924).

51Smoking ban resolutions were identified by examining all the indexed resolutions in the legislative journals or word searching digitized texts.

53Journal of the House of Representatives of the Seventeenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 456 (Mar. 2) (1858). For Cooley’s biographical data, see Charles Tuttle, An Illustrated History of Iowa 716-18 (1876); The United States Biographical Dictionary of Eminent and Self-Made Men: Iowa Volume 63-64 (1878).
prohibited within the Senate Chamber and Gallery,” after rejecting motions by Democrat and lawyer John Johnson to ban chewing tobacco and by Democrat and physician Gideon Bailey to table the proposed resolution.\textsuperscript{54} In 1864 Republican Coker F. Clarkson, a farmer, newspaper editor-owner, “staunch” Methodist, abolitionist, and prohibitionist,\textsuperscript{55} pushed the Senate even further toward clean air with his resolution that “members, officers and visitors be prohibited from smoking in the Hall of the Senate during business hours, and for thirty minutes previous to the meeting of the Senate.”\textsuperscript{56} The same year, the House adopted the resolution offered by Republican Azro Hildreth,\textsuperscript{57} a newspaper editor and prohibitionist, to forbid smoking (and ticket selling) in the Hall and to instruct the sergeant-at-arms to see to it that the resolution was “properly enforced.”\textsuperscript{58}

Not until 1866 did the first effort to attach moral opprobrium to workplace smoking by fellow legislators take place when 34-year-old Samuel Flanders, a New Hampshire-born Republican farmer from Des Moines County who was also a Baptist deacon,\textsuperscript{59} offered the following provocative resolution cum preamble:

\begin{quote}
WHEREAS, the practice of smoking in this hall is indecent and ungentlemanly; therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That any member of this House who shall hereafter smoke within this Hall, either before, during, or after the daily sessions of the House, shall be deemed guilty of a breach of decorum and be liable to be reprimanded by \end{quote}

\textsuperscript{54}Journal of the Senate of the Eighth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 75 (Jan. 12) (1860). The biographical data are taken from List of Members of the Eighth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 6 (1860).

\textsuperscript{55}Rules and Statistics of the Senate and House of Representatives, Adopted by the Tenth General Assembly, January 1864 (1864); Leland Sage, William Boyd Allison: A Study in Practical Politics 106 (1956) (quote); Benjamin Gue, History of Iowa: From the Earliest Times to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century, 4: Iowa Biography 53-54 (1903). In 1870 Clarkson and his two sons bought what became Iowa’s most important newspaper, the Des Moines Iowa State Register.

\textsuperscript{56}Journal of the Senate of the Tenth General Assembly 334 (Feb. 25) (1864).

\textsuperscript{57}Rules and Statistics of the Senate and House of Representatives, Adopted by the Tenth General Assembly, January 1864 (1864); The Life and Times of Azro B. F. Hildreth iii, 176 (Charles Aldrich ed. 1891).

\textsuperscript{58}Journal of the House of Representatives of the Tenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 402 (Mar. 3) (1864). A motion by the aforementioned W. B. Davis to strike ticket selling lost.

\textsuperscript{59}1870 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); Biographical Review of Des Moines County, Iowa 250, 255-56 (1905).
the chair.\textsuperscript{50}

However, shortest shrift was immediately made of this innovative approach by the successful motion of fellow Republican John Garber, a Virginia-born county judge, sheriff, and farmer,\textsuperscript{61} to table the resolution.\textsuperscript{62}

After this rebuff six years passed before the next attempt to suppress smoking in the House—albeit an especially capacious one proposed by Republican Michael Leahy, a lawyer who had once taught school\textsuperscript{63}—which prohibited smoking tobacco on the House floor and in the gallery, “both during the sittings of the House and the intervening time of adjournment,” and directed the sergeant-at-arms to effectuate the resolution. The scope of the prohibition was enlarged when the House adopted an amendment by John P. Irish, the publisher-editor of the Iowa City \textit{Daily Press} and one of the state’s leading Democrats, to include chewing as well. After defeating motions to table and to strike the enforcement clause, the House adopted the resolution.\textsuperscript{64} That Irish may have intended his amendment to kill rather than strengthen the resolution and that it boomeranged on him seems probable in light of the article on the legislature that his paper published that likened the double ban to a resolution of the Pennsylvania legislature prohibiting its members from “eating bread and cheese on the front steps of the capitol and coming in to the House or Senate bare footed.”\textsuperscript{65}

\textsuperscript{50}Journal of the House of Representatives of the Eleventh General Assembly of the State of Iowa 95 (Jan. 17) (1866).

\textsuperscript{62}Journal of the House of Representatives of the Eleventh General Assembly of the State of Iowa 95 (Jan. 17) (1866).

\textsuperscript{63}\textit{History of Franklin and Cerro Gordo Counties Iowa} 180-81 (1883). Leahy, who was a graduate of the University of Wisconsin and the University of Michigan Law School, later became the acknowledged leader of the Greenback Party in his county.

\textsuperscript{64}Journal of the House of Representatives of the Fourteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 86 (Jan. 16) (1872). The movant of the two defeated resolutions was West Liberty farmer (and bank shareholder) William Evans, a Republican. He was a school board member with a special interest in public schools. \textit{Portrait and Biographical Album of Muscatine County, Iowa} 547-48 (1889). The next day the House also defeated a motion to reconsider by Democrat Edward Campbell, Jr., a farmer. \textit{Id.} at 95 (Jan. 17). On Irish, see \textit{History of Iowa: From the Earliest Times to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century, 4: Iowa Biography} 142-43 (1903). Minimal biographical information on the members was provided by \textit{Rules of the Fourteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa} 25 (1872).

\textsuperscript{65}“Des Moines’ Letter,” \textit{Daily Press} (Iowa City), Jan. 18, 1872 (4:2).
That contemporaries might have had some justification for suppressing tobacco chewing as well was graphically documented a few years later in Waterloo:

Several months since we were requested by a lady that had an elegant suit ruined by falling on the sidewalk in tobacco spittle, to send a card to the City Council asking that body to prohibit smoking in the streets and spitting tobacco juice on the sidewalks. Believing our City Fathers had the legal right to do as much as to keep the sidewalks clear of snow-drifts, and hearing that Oberlin, Ohio, and Boston, Mass., have such regulations, and believing tobacco is the stepping-stone to intoxication, and having been nauseated and choked on the streets so frequently by the fumes of the weed, we complied, the editor of the Courier giving our manuscript a place in his columns. Then came a reply from Barclay Township, saying men had a right to smoke, etc., and that “when tobacco spittle was piled up high as snow-drifts on the sidewalks, then it should be removed.\textsuperscript{66}

Three days after the House action, Senator Albert Boomer, a physician who 16 years earlier had been a co-founder of his county medical society,\textsuperscript{67} injected a qualitatively new health dimension into the rationale for smoking bans by securing Senate agreement to a resolution that “the practice of smoking in the Senate Chamber is offensive to many, and positively injurious to others, and the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to suppress it.”\textsuperscript{68} Boomer, a Methodist and a “strong prohibitionist,” took, while a senator, “a very decided stand on the temperance question....”\textsuperscript{69}

Despite the comprehensive scope of the 1872 House resolution, since it had not been incorporated into the standing rules, once the next session in 1874 opened, the ban was no longer in effect, and, consequently, as the Burlington Hawk-Eye reported, smoking was being “carried on indiscriminately in the Hall and postoffice.”\textsuperscript{70} Consequently, at the end of January, Cornelius T. Peet, a delegate to the founding convention of the Iowa Republican Party in 1856\textsuperscript{71} and

\begin{footnotesize}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{66}Citizen, “Reply to Barclay Township,” Iowa State Reporter (Waterloo), Nov. 28, 1877 (3:4).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{67}“Delaware County Medical Society,” North-Western Medical and Surgical Journal n.s. 5(5):241 (May 1856).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{68}Journal of the Senate of the Fourteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 47 (Jan. 19) (1872).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{69}The United States Biographical Dictionary and Portrait Gallery of Eminent and Self-Made Men: Iowa Volume 255 (1878).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{70}“From the Capital,” BH-E, Feb. 1, 1874 (1:2).}
\footnote{\textsuperscript{71}Republican State Convention,” Des Moines Valley Whig (Keokuk), Feb. 27, 1856 (3:1-2).}
\end{footnotesize}
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

a farmer-lawyer and former sheriff of Delaware County,\(^{72}\) offered a resolution to prohibit smoking in those two areas between 6 a.m. and 9 p.m. and to require the sergeant-at-arms to “enforce a strict compliance with this resolution during the rest of the session.” The House adopted the resolution after a Democrat’s motion to amend to add tobacco chewing to the ban had lost by a vote of 19 to 68 and a motion to table the resolution had been defeated.\(^{73}\) That Peet himself voted against the amendment strongly suggests that it was designed to kill the resolution. The House was able to come to an understanding about a smoking ban just after it had finally resolved the titanic struggle over organizing the chamber that the Anti-Monopoly Party had succeeded in thwarting through more than 140 50-50 deadlocked votes over the speakership.\(^{74}\) The Hawk-Eye predicted that the Senate would “probably follow suit,”\(^{75}\) and the very next day it did. After Banker Elisha Smith had offered a resolution with virtually the same language as the House version, Republican John Chambers then offered this much more expansive substitute: “That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to prevent all smoking in the Senate Chamber and post-office.” Merchant Elisha Howland’s killer amendment adding “chewing tobacco and gum” and his motion to postpone both failed, but Republican lawyer John Shane’s to strike “post-office” prevailed; Republican John Rumple’s narrowing amendment to add “while in session” failed as did merchant George Maxwell’s killer amendment to add “tobacco chewing.” In the end, then, the Senate adopted the substitute as amended.\(^{76}\)

At the next session the Senate acted again, but this time at the suggestion of one of the Republican Party’s major figures, long-time senator and future governor William Larrabee, “probably the largest landholder in the state” as well as “one of the state’s wealthiest men.”\(^{77}\) His resolution prohibited smoking in the Senate chamber or the post office while the Senate was in session and ordered \(^{72}\)Biographical Souvenir of the Counties of Delaware and Buchanan, Iowa 489-91 (1890), on http://users.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~iadelawa/bios/1890/peetcorneliusbio.htm; John Merry, History of Delaware County Iowa and Its People 1:75 (1914).

\(^{73}\)Journal of the House of Representatives of the Fifteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 104 (Jan. 30) (1874). Nine of the 19 voting for what was presumably a killed amendment had voted for the Republican (and future governor) John Gear for speaker. Id. at 9.

\(^{74}\)Fred Haynes, Third Party Movements Since the Civil War With Special Reference to Iowa: A Study in Social Politics 73 (1916).

\(^{75}\)“From the Capital,” BH-E, Feb. 1, 1874 (1:2).

\(^{76}\)Journal of the Senate of the Fifteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 59 (Jan. 31 (1874).

\(^{77}\)Leland Sage, William Boyd Allison: A Study in Practical Politics 198 (1956).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

The resolution immediately ran into determined resistance when Dubuque Senator Dennis Cooley, a lawyer, bank president, and Republican of some national prominence—having been secretary of the National Republican Committee for Lincoln’s second campaign and Commissioner of Indian Affairs in 1865-66—moved to postpone the resolution until a date beyond adjournment. The yeas and nays demanded on the motion did not reveal strict party-line positions, but with only nine Democrats in the 50-seat Senate, five of them were among the 16 casting Yes votes for killing the resolution, while only three appeared among the 28 opponents of postponement. The Senate rejected three further motions to kill the resolution before adopting it as amended by Cooley’s motion to strike coverage of the post office.

In 1878 the House adopted the resolution offered by Republican Gamaliel Jaqua, a farmer who had once taught school, that “smoking be prohibited in the Hall of this House, and in the Post office; the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby requested to enforce strict compliance with this resolution during the rest of this session.” During the 1880 session both the Senate and the House sought to ban smoking by resolutions. Senate action was prompted by Republican Lafayette Young, the founder and publisher of the Atlantic Telegraph (who attained greater prominence in state party affairs after buying the Des Moines Daily Iowa Capitol in 1890 and briefly serving as U.S. Senator in 1910-11), whose straightforward resolution read “That no smoking be allowed in the Senate Chamber.” As narrowed by the amendment (“during the session of the Senate”) offered by

---

78 Journal of the Senate of the Sixteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 274 (Feb. 28) (1876).
80 The proposed postponement time was 12:30 p.m. on March 20; the legislature adjourned on March 16.
81 Journal of the Senate of the Sixteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 274 (Feb. 28) (1876). Identification of party affiliation is in part based on data in Rules of the Seventeenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa, and a List of Standing Committees and Members 26-27 (1878), which resumed inclusion of such information. The three killer motions (to refer to the Committee on Constitutional Amendments, to table, and to adjourn) were offered by Democrat Nathaniel Merrell and Republican Henry Rothert).
Democrat Nathaniel Merrell, a lawyer and “one of the prominent capitalists of eastern Iowa,” who had unsuccessfully sought to kill the resolution in 1876, the chamber adopted it. In the House, however, anti-smoking forces were defeated when Republican lawyer (and later judge) Lorin Hayes succeeded in moving to table the resolution (“That no smoking be allowed in the Representative chamber, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms and Janitor be required to see that this resolution is enforced”) offered by fellow Republican farmer Abner Lewis. In 1882, the Senate adopted the resolution offered by Republican Lott Abraham, a farmer who in “the temperance cause” was “quite active” and “never afraid to express his opinion freely upon that question,” that “it shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to enforce the order in regard to smoking in the Senate Chamber during the sessions of the Senate.” To be sure, although the press explained that the resolution dealt with “the order on the west wall of the Senate,” the Journal of the Senate mentioned no such pre-existing order. The Republican Cedar Rapids Times editorially saluted the initiative as “a step toward public decency, and consequently toward reform. In fact, there should be a law prohibiting smoking in all legislative halls and government buildings where large bodies of men assemble.”

Almost a half-century of serially successful skirmishes against smoking in the
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

House and Senate was boosted to a new plane of intensity by the dedication and occupation of the new and permanent Capitol on January 17, 1884. Barely a few minutes after the Senate had returned to its chamber at 4:10 p.m. from the joint dedication convention, and with the Senate just having received the previous day’s communication from the Board of Capitol Commissioners that at 2 p.m. on January 17 various spaces, including “smoking rooms,” would be ready for occupancy, Senator Larrabee, in the last of his 17 years in the Senate before being elected governor, offered another resolution that “smoking shall not be permitted in this Chamber or the galleries, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby required to strictly enforce this order.” Two amendments broadening the ban to include “chewing” and “tobacco” were accepted and the Senate adopted the expanded resolution. Larrabee’s opposition to being exposed to tobacco smoke at his workplace was part and parcel of his more generalized anti-smoking position. As soon as he became governor in 1886, he, as the press ironically observed, “gently hint[ed] by placards that ‘no smoking is allowed’ in the executive offices”—the letters on those cards in every room being six inches high. Not only did he not smoke tobacco, but he did not permit smoking in his 1874 mansion “Montauk,” near Clermont, and on at least one occasion told a visiting politician who was about to light a cigar to go outside with it and enjoy nature.

Following a weekend adjournment, virtually the first matter that the House took up on Monday, January 21 was a resolution that soon led the Iowa General Assembly finally to incorporate a smoking ban in its own brand new building into its formal rules. Republican Representative John A. Storey, a 33-year-old lawyer from Adair County, offered this motion on January 21: “Resolved, That 96 Journal of the Senate of the Twentieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 33 (Jan. 17) (1884); “Iowa Legislature,” ISR, Jan. 18, 1888 (3:7). The amendments were offered by two lawyers, Republican John Kamrar and Democrat Benton Hall (who later became a one-term congressman).

---

97 Malvern Leader, Feb. 4, 1886 (1:2) (untitled).

99 Telephone interview with Nadine West, director of the SHSI-owned Montauk (May 25, 2010). West, a week shy of retirement after a quarter-century’s work there, was unable on the spur of the moment to identify the document describing the incident, but stressed that mention of Larrabee’s anti-smoking position was a staple of the guided tour of the house. Larrabee’s attitude may have been continuous with or related to the energetic anti-saloon and liquor stance he adopted as governor from 1886 to 1890. See above ch. 9.

100 *A List of Executive and Judicial Officers of the State of Iowa, Also Trustees of State smoking on the floor of the House and in the galleries thereof be absolutely prohibited, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms and the doorkeeper be and they are hereby instructed to strictly enforce this resolution.”101 This initiative prompted the Iowa State Register to predict that: “Probably no smoking will be allowed in Representative Hall. Spittoons are provided, however, for the tobacco chewers.”102 Three days after Storey’s motion had been referred to the Rules Committee,103 the committee appointed to report rules for the self-government of the House in the transaction of its business recommended adding as Rule No. 66: “No member or officer of the House shall be permitted to read newspapers within the bar of the House while the journal is being read, nor shall any person be permitted to smoke on the floor of the House or in the galleries at any time.” The House then adopted the recommendation,104 and thus from 1884 on smoking was banned in those areas.105 Notably, “[t]he most important legislation passed” that year, “in terms of immediate political consequences, was...a [liquor] prohibition law” on which Republicans had campaigned.106

The Senate followed suit at the next legislative session in 1886. Republican Senator John S. Woolson, a lawyer who was a member of the state senate for ten years before becoming a federal judge during the 1890s,107 offered a resolution to add as Rule 32 to the Senate Rules: “Smoking by Senate employees, while in the discharge of their duties in connection with the Senate chamber or doors leading thereto, is hereby forbidden. Violations of this rule shall subject the employee to liability for discharge by vote of the Senate.”108 Republican Senator Preston

1803

---

101 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Twentieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 33 (Jan. 21) (1884).
103 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Twentieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 33 (1884).
104 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Twentieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 55 (1884) (Jan. 24). “Iowa Legislature,” Iowa State Leader (Des Moines), Jan. 25, 1884 (1:3), discussed other rules changes at some length, but ignored the adoption of no-smoking rule.
105 Rules of the Twentieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 21 (1884).
107 A List of Executive and Judicial Officers of the State of Iowa, Also Trustees of State Institutions, Etc., January 1, 1886, at 14 (n.d.); http://www.fjc.gov/public/home.nsf/hisj 108 Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-First General Assembly of the State of Iowa 12 (1886) (Jan. 13).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Sutton, a lawyer from Marshalltown, then offered this amendment: “And smoking of tobacco is hereby prohibited in the hall of the Senate.” The Senate adopted the proposed rule as amended. The new Rule 31 as it appeared for the first time in that year’s compilation of rules read: “Smoking in the Senate Chamber is hereby prohibited. And any officer or employe who shall indulge in smoking while on duty in the Senate Chamber or doorways leading thereto, shall thereby subject himself to liability of discharge.” Reinforcing the seriousness of the commitment to a smoke-free workspace, when the Senate that same year added a new rule specifying the duties of its officers and employees, it expressly included among those of the sergeant-at-arms that he “shall see that the rule prohibiting smoking in the Senate Chamber is strictly enforced....”

Another Senate proceeding in 1890 created an especially interesting and perhaps unique gauge of legislators’ attitudes toward smoking, which were hardly homogeneous and appear to have been in flux. On January 23, Madison County Republican Senator Richard Price, a 41-year-old lumber dealer, “provoked considerable merriment by calling for the enforcement of the smoking rule in the senate chamber”—or repeal of the disregarded ban. The “chief objection” that Price, who according to another press account, had called attention to the rule

---

110 Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-First General Assembly of the State of Iowa 12 (1886) (Jan. 13); “The Legislature,” ISR, Jan. 14, 1886 (8:2).

111 Rules and Standing Committees of the Twenty-First General Assembly with List of Executive and Judicial Officers of the State of Iowa 19 (1886). See also Rules and Standing Committees of the Twenty-Second General Assembly with List of Executive and Judicial Officers of the State of Iowa 6 (1888). It is unclear whether there was any sanction for members of the Senate who violated the rule.

112 Rules and Standing Committees of the Twenty-First General Assembly with List of Executive and Judicial Officers of the State of Iowa 20-21 (1886) (Sen. Rule 38). Unchanged, the language remained in the Senate rules as long as the ban itself was in effect. Rule 46, in State of Iowa: 1925-26: Official Register 241 (31st No.).

113 Senators’ occupations are taken from Rules and Standing Committees of the Twenty-Third General Assembly with Official Register: 1890, at 12-13 (1890). For short biographies of Price, see History of Madison County, Iowa 548-49 (1879); The Longstreth Family Records 302-303 (Agnes Longstreth Taylor rev. 1909).

114 “In the Senate,” BH-E, Jan. 24, 1890 (1:2). The Journal of the Senate did not record any discussion concerning smoking during the very abbreviated proceedings on January 23. Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 26 (1890) (Jan. 23).

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

prohibiting smoking in the chamber by employees, raised was “the fact that so many poor cigars were smoked.”116 More specifically, Price “did not object to the aroma of a fragrant havana, but he was sorry to say that many cigars...the fragrance from which would raise the hair on a wooden Indian were smoked in the room.”117 The chair then “ruled that any employe caught in the act would subject himself to discharge, and any senator who desired to smoke in session or out would have to go to the cloak room,”118 conducted by the sergeant-at-arms.119

After the Senate had adjourned for the day, the Burlington Hawk-Eye reported, Republican Senator Frank Bayless “lit a cigar and the sergeant-at-arms was at his side at once to conduct him out. The cigar went instead, and henceforth smoking will be abolished in the senate chamber.”120

A month later, during a debate on the Senate rules, Republican Edward Seeds, a lawyer121 who would soon vote with Dr. Perry Engle on referring (and thus keeping alive) the latter’s no-sales-to-minors bill,122 moved to amend the rule by striking out “smoking in the Senate Chamber is hereby prohibited.” After it had lost on a voice vote, Democrat Michael J. Kelly, moved to amend the rule by adding after “prohibited” the words “while the Senate is in session.”123 This significant relaxation, which permitted smoking in the chamber during the hours

\[\text{References}\]

116“The Iowa Legislature,” Hawarden Independent, Jan. 30, 1890 (2:3).
118“In the Senate,” BH-E, Jan. 24, 1890 (1:2).
120“In the Senate,” BH-E, Jan. 24, 1890 (1:2). Much less dramatically, “The Senate,” ISR, Jan. 24, 1890 (8:4), reported that Price’s request for the rule’s enforcement “led to a little discussion, and the chair ordered the rule to be enforced.” The report a week later in the Hawarden Independent, which may have been garbled because it referred to a nonexistent Senator Woodman who wanted to amend the rule to include senators (when they were already covered), stated that Adolph Meservey, a Republican lawyer, had, with an unlit cigar in his hand, asked whether dry smoking was permitted. In response, Lieutenant-Governor John Hull declared: “‘No; only smoking as is smoking.’ It was his opinion that if the senator refrained from smoking the example would [sic] become contagious and there would be no further cause for complaint.” “Iowa Legislature,” Hawarden Independent, Jan. 30, 1890 (2:3). See also “The Senate,” SCJ, Jan. 24, 1890 (1:1).
121In 1890 Seeds was appointed a justice on the New Mexico Supreme Court; after returning to Iowa he became a law professor at the State University of Iowa. B. Gue, Biographies and Portraits of the Progressive Men of Iowa: Leaders in Business, Politics and the Professions 363-64 (1899).
122See above ch. 9.
123Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 64 (1890) (Feb. 21).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

the Senate was not in session—since legislators had (and still have) no offices, their desks functioned as quasi-offices before and after daily sessions—and thus enabled smokers to “make the hall blue at other hours regardless of feminine presence,” was adopted by a vote of 28 to 9. Joining Engle in opposition were 6 Republicans (including Price), only one Democrat, and the only Independent; the majority was composed of 15 Republicans and 13 Democrats. The overlap between the voting pattern on the no-smoking rule and that on referring Engle’s bill was not straightforward. Of the eight senators who had voted with Engle, a month later seven (including Engle) voted to refer his bill and only one voted against referral, whereas of the 28 who had voted to relax the no-smoking rule, 12 later voted not to refer Engle’s bill, but 10 voted to refer it. The final motion, by Senator Price, “to strike out section 31 entire,” was defeated by a vote of 26 to 9, with 16 Republicans and nine Democrats joining Engle; in contrast, five Republicans, three Democrats, and the only Independent voted to delete the no-smoking rule. The motion that Price, an activist in the temperance movement at least since the 1870s, offered is difficult to interpret since the press reported that he (and fellow Republican Thomas Weidman, a farmer, who voted with Price on the latter’s and Kelly’s motions) “are radically opposed to tobacco smoking and...presented a resolution prohibiting smoking in the hall, but the smokers outvoted them, agreeing not to smoke during sessions.” Whether he (and the five of the other eight opponents of Kelly’s

124“Boies’ Inauguration,” Sioux County Herald (Orange City), Feb. 27, 1890 (3:5).
125Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 64 (1890) (Feb. 21). The Journal totaled the number of yeas at 29, but in fact it listed only 28 legislators who had voted Yea. For the rule’s new wording, see Rules and Standing Committees of the Twenty-Third General Assembly with List of Executive and Judicial Officers of the State of Iowa 8 (1890).
126Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 256 (1890) (Mar. 17).
127Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 65 (1890) (Feb. 21).
128Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 65 (1890) (Feb. 21).
129At the Temperance Convention in Winterset on May 17, 1879, Price was appointed to the resolutions drafting committee. The History of Madison County, Iowa 413 (1879). See also Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 590 (Apr. 8) (1890) (Price’s motion to prohibit licensure of liquor sales within three miles of any public school building or state institution of learning).
130“Boies’ Inauguration,” Sioux County Herald (Orange City), Feb. 27, 1890 (3:5). According to “Lively Tariff Talk,” DML, Feb. 22, 1890 (5:1-3 at 2), and “The End at motion who voted for Price’s motion) were expressing the ultra view that exposure to the lingering smoke produced by smoking before and after sessions was not a superior outcome to no limits on smoking at all seems implausible, but the press failed to formulate, let alone, solve this puzzle. (Instead, the Des Moines Leader mocked: “It will be entirely proper for Senators Price and Weidman to appear in the senate chamber with sponges adorning their very sensitive olfactory nerves since the passage of the senate rule permitting the smokers to revel in the luxury of a havana in the chamber at any time except when the senate is in session.”) The actual outcome was variously described in the press as a “compromise” and as one the result of which was that the “smokers gained a victory by amending the rules so that smoking in the senate chamber is prohibited only when the senate is in session.” Although almost three-fourths of the voting senators chose to retain limits on exposure to secondhand smoke, here, too, the overlap with the vote on referring Engle’s no-sales-to-minors bill was far from perfect. Of the nine who had voted to eliminate the no-smoking rule, five (including Price and Weidman) voted to refer, while three voted not to refer; of the 26 who voted to retain the no-smoking rule, 15 later voted to refer the bill, while 7 voted not to refer.
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Although the no-smoking rules remained formally unchanged until 1923—in 1894 the House adopted a resolution instructing the sergeant-at-arms to “eject all reporters smoking in the press gallery during the sessions of the House”—by the time of World War I and of the more concerted legislative initiatives to repeal the cigarette sales ban, they began, at least in the Senate, to be observed increasingly, if not in the breach, then in any event in the suspension. On March 8, 1917, a motion by Senator James Wilson (who supported Senate efforts to Last,” DML (Weekly), Feb. 27, 1890 (1:1-7 at 7), “Senator Price attempted to have smoking in the entire senate chamber prohibited at all times, but was unsuccessful.” Although this aim seems in character for Price—who was, after all, merely advocating the status quo—his motion would have achieved its opposite; by the same token, it is puzzling that more senators opposed to any limits on smoking did not vote for his motion.

132 “To Visit the Institutions,” ISR, Feb. 22, 1890 (5:3-6 at 5) (stating that in the entire discussion of Senate rules “there was nothing brought out of general interest”).
133 “The Trusts in Iowa,” SCJ, Feb. 22, 1890 (1:3).
134 Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Third General Assembly of the State of Iowa 256 (1890) (Mar. 17).
135 Journal of the House of Representatives of the Twenty-Fifth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 545 (Mar. 2) (1894) (resolution offered by Republican Charles Coonley).
136 Based on spot checks of the Journal, no suspensions appear to have been sought in repeal the ban on cigarette sales in 1917 and 1919) to suspend the no-smoking rule for the afternoon session carried. A week later he successfully moved for suspension near the start of the day, and by March 29, the rule had been suspended on a total of seven days on the motion of five different senators (four of whom were Republicans), including Senator Arthur Rule, who was the chamber’s leading advocate of repealing the anti-smoking statute in 1917 and 1919.137 (Efforts at this time to suspend non-smoking rules were not confined to Iowa; for the example of Nevada, see below.)
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Although no earlier suspension was found in the Senate Journal, March 8, 1917 may not have been the first instance. Not only did the Des Moines newspapers not report on it, but, by serendipity, the Register published an article the next day on a joint Senate-House Constitutional Amendments Committee equal suffrage amendment hearing, chaired by Wilson, which had taken place in the Senate chamber on the afternoon of March 8. In describing the lack of interest that most senators who happened to be at their desks had displayed in the proceedings, the article noted that outspoken anti-suffragist Senator John Price—who by 1921 would become the Senate’s premier movant of suspension—“sat back with his feet cocked up on his desk, enjoying a smoke and the speeches.” Although the fact that a hearing was going on may have meant that the Senate was not in session and that therefore the rule was not implicated, the mention of Price’s smoking suggests that the press would also have highlighted Wilson’s successful motion if it had produced a precedent-setting rule-suspension. Presumably, then, nothing new under the Senate sun occurred that day, which also witnessed a “pickaninny ragtime concert” in the lobby.138

In 1919 the drive for suspensions began already on January 14, the second day of the session, when, on the motion of Republican Senator Ben Edwards, the no-smoking rule was suspended right after the day’s introduction of bills. A succession of Republican senators replicated his success on five more days in January and February, including the two days before the Senate passed Rule’s new licensure bill, on which all the moving suspenders voted Aye. On March 24, four days after Thomas Kingland, a Republican lawyer, who was also the only 137 Journal of the Senate of the Thirty-Seventh General Assembly of the State of Iowa: 1917, at 747, 867, 1107, 1134, 1219, 1259, 1294 (Mar. 8, 14, 23, 24, 27, 28, and 29) (1917). The other senators were Thomas Kingland, William Evans, and Nicholas Schrup. On the legislative debates in 1917, see above ch. 14.

138 “Anti-Suffragists Have Clear Field,” DMR, Mar. 9, 1917 (3:1).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

senator to move to suspend in 1917 and 1919, had made his third successful motion to suspend the rule that year, bank president Walter Anderson secured a majority for his motion to suspend the rule for the remainder of the session (which ended on April 19).\(^{139}\)

The press took note of some of these suspensions. For example, on February 18, 1919, the Des Moines News, which would observe on March 24 that the Senate Rule No. 33 had gone “up in smoke,”\(^{140}\) published this small article (among 50) on its front page under the title: “A ‘Reg’lar Feller’”:

Senator Stoddard of Woodbury co. is the most accommodating member of the upper house.

Observing Tuesday morning that one-half of the senators were chewing on long black cigars, he arose and stated that altho he did not smoke himself he would ask the suspension of rule 33 which prohibits smoking during Senate sessions.\(^{141}\)

That farmer and grain elevator operator Bertel Stoddard was a nonsmoker not only sheds important light on politicians’ readiness to go along to get along, but also highlights the need not to jump to the conclusion that everyone who voted to suspend the rule smoked.

By 1921 a majority of the Iowa Senate was prepared not only to repeal the general ban on cigarette sales,\(^{142}\) but also to make smoking the norm in the chamber despite the continued existence of the rule prohibiting it. On the very first day of the session, as soon as the old Senate rules had been adopted, Senator John Price, a Welsh-born lawyer who had worked in coal mining in Iowa as a child,\(^{143}\) successfully moved to suspend Rule 33. No such motion was offered on the following four legislative days (on one of which the senators met in joint session in the House chamber to listen to the governor’s message and several of which were largely devoted to procedural-organizational matters) or during two very short sessions later in January. Then on January 28, anti-smokers fought back, defeating Senator Walter Anderson’s motion to suspend the rule—the only

---

\(^{140}\) “Smoke Lid Is Off,” DMN, Mar. 24, 1919 (1:8).

\(^{141}\) “A ‘Reg’lar Feller,’” DMN, Feb. 18, 1919 (1:1). Virtually identical text was run as part of “Doings of the Iowa General Assembly,” Maurice Times, Mar. 6, 1919 (4:3-4 at 4) and in many other papers.

\(^{142}\) See above ch. 15.

\(^{143}\) State of Iowa: 1921-22: Official Register 329 (29th No.).
such loss that smokers suffered that year. Why no one moved to suspend the rule on February 5 is unclear, but thereafter the Senate voted to suspend the no-smoking rule every day for the rest of the session—ironically including April 4, when it defeated the House bill to repeal the statewide sales prohibition, but not on April 6, the day on which the chamber reconsidered and passed it. Overall, on 58 of the session’s 67 days senators were free to pollute the air. Twenty-five—exactly one half of all—senators acted as movants, though Price alone performed the task 11 times. Oddly, there was very little correlation between moving for suspension of the no-smoking rule and voting on the bill to repeal the cigarette sales ban. On the first Senate vote on April 4, when the bill was defeated 22 to 26, 12 of the movants voted for and 12 against the bill—including Price and Henry Adams, who was that day’s movant. Even two days later, when the bill finally passed 27 to 22, nine of the 25 movants opposed the bill. Possibly this seeming inconsistency may in large part be accounted for by accommodationist nonsmokers like Stoddard (who was a movant five times) and by cigar and (to a lesser extent) pipe smokers, who looked down on cigarettes.

Smoking senators were even more energetic and successful in suspending the no-smoking rule during the 1923 session. Beginning, once again, on the first day of the session, they moved for suspension every day except two (on one of which a very brief meeting was held); anti-smokers succeeded three times (including on the session’s opening day) in defeating the motion. After refraining from moving for suspension on the opening day of the 1925 session, smokers moved to suspend the rule every single day. This unbroken skein was facilitated by the fact that the governor delivered his message and Helen Keller and her teacher Ann Sullivan spoke at joint sessions that were held in the House

\[145\] See ch. 15.

\[146\] During the 1923-24 special session the rule was also suspended daily. State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the Senate of the Fortieth General Assembly: Extra Session 9, 1609 (Dec. 4, 1923 and July 30, 1924).

\[147\] The days without motions were January 16 and February 12; the days on which the motions were defeated were January 8, and February 2 and 22. State of Iowa: 1923: Journal of the Senate of the Fortieth General Assembly 5, 351, 609. Senators John Ethell and John Price were the movants 11 times and eight times, respectively.
chamber over which the senators had no control.

Finally, in 1927, smokers (and non-smokers acquiescing in secondhand smoke exposure) in the Senate (which was composed of 49 Republicans and one Democrat), after the opening day of the session, succeeded in suspending the rule every day through January 27, when they secured the rule’s outright repeal. Newspapers featured reports of the denouement on their front pages. The Iowa City Press-Citizen, for example, under the headline, “Senators Will Enjoy ‘Smokes,’” recounted that:

No longer will the smokers of the senate be forced to gain permission of the majority each day before they may indulge in a cigar, cigaret or light up their pipes. They were in such force this morning that when an effort [was made] to make it possible for one third of the membership to bar smoking instead of a majority, they put through a substitute rule which strikes the anti-smoking rule from the book and removes all restrictions.

Senator Skromme of Story county, who does not smoke, proposed the amendment which would have made it possible for one third of the senators to clear the senatorial air. He figured that it cost the state $7,000 a session, at the rate of $10 a minute, for the senate to consume one minute each day suspending the anti-smoking rule. Elimination of the rule, with the provision that it might be reinstated by the one-third vote, would save this sum, he pointed out. Senator Haskell of Linn wanted to add to this saving the cost of a “dozen cases of matches furnished the assembly by the state each session.”

Then Senator Benson of Clayton observed that there was little prospect of ending the daily contention over the smoking privilege unless the rule was thrown out all together [sic] and this was done.

The action, at the rate Senator Skromme figures the senate’s time, cost the state about $150.

What Republican Senator Lars Skromme, a Norwegian-born farmer, had sought to do was to reverse the rule’s procedural order by amending Rule 37 to read: “Smoking in the Senate chamber is hereby permitted while the Senate is in session. And any officer or employee may indulge in smoking in the Senate chamber or doorways, while on duty. Provided, this rule may be suspended by a vote of one-third of the members present.”  Thus Skromme’s seeming abolition of the no-smoking rule was merely a bone he threw to his smoking colleagues: instead of placing the burden on them to seize the initiative daily and seek to suspend the rule, his amendment made smoking the default position, but only a one-third minority would have to be mobilized, although these anti-smoking senators would have to act on a daily basis to preserve their right to clean air. Interestingly, C. A. Benson, another Republican farmer, who took up the cudgels for smokers, “also d[id] not use the weed.”  Equally indicative of the fluid alliances despite the intensity of preferences was that at least six senators (Darting, Haskell, McLeland, Shane, Shinn, and Stoddard) voting against abolition of the no-smoking rule had moved to suspend it over the previous 10 years. Indeed, McLeland had been the movant the very day he voted against ending the rule. The close 23 to 20 roll call vote in favor of Benson’s substitute amendment and for “Freedom for Smokers” demonstrated that anti-smokers in the 50-member chamber presumptively constituted more than a one-third minority—at least in 1927. In the event, more than four decades of de jure protection of senators from exposure to “[s]econd hand tobacco smoke,” which was “objectionable to the majority of men and repulsive to the majority of women,” had come to an end.

Guerrilla warfare against the smoking ban developed later and more sporadically in the House. No attempt to suspend the no-smoking rule appears to have been made before the afternoon session of February 18, 1921, when Representative Frank Lake, the newsman who had staked out a high-profile anti-prohibitionist position in 1917, successfully moved to do so. The House permitted smoking on a total of 12 days in 1921. Horace Dodd, who filed H. F. 678, the bill that became the statute that repealed the statewide cigarette sales ban, was the movant two days before the House passed his bill; ominously, the House suspended the no-smoking rule on March 30, the day of passage, and, with great symbolism, by unanimous consent suspended the rule again the day after passage.

---

155State of Iowa: 1927: Journal of the Senate of the Forty-Second General Assembly: Regular Session 183 (Jan. 27). During the few days of the session leading up to repeal McLeland had been the movant three times, while Shinn and Stoddard had made the motion twice each.

On January 26, 1923 the House adopted the recommendation of its Rules Committee, on the one hand, to expand the ban by prohibiting using rather than merely smoking tobacco, and, on the other hand, in principle to repeal it by adding the sentence: “This rule may be suspended by a majority vote of the members present.” Smokers presumably made this change to facilitate suspensions, which would otherwise be subject to House Rule 54, pursuant to which standing rules had to be approved by a two-thirds majority of those present. The non-party-line vote of 57 to 37 saw nine Democrats and one Independent join 47 Republicans in the majority, while 32 Republicans and five Democrats opposed the changes. Perhaps reflecting the ambiguity of the rule change, of the 46 representatives holding over from 1921 who voted on both the Dodd bill to repeal the statewide prohibition on cigarette sales in 1921 and the House smoking rule change in 1923, only 7 voted Nay both times and 10 Aye both times, while 12 who had voted against repeal in 1921 voted for the rule change in 1923 and 17 who had voted for repeal in 1921 opposed the rule change. Emblematic of the sea change in attitudes was the fact that one of the Republican supporters of the reintroduction of smoking was John A. Storey, who 39 years earlier had initiated the entire rule-based no-smoking campaign in the legislature. Moreover, when he returned to the House in 1921, Storey lived in 160State of Iowa: 1921: Journal of the House of the Thirty-Ninth General Assembly 569, 709, 1285, 1353, 1436 1468, 1525, 1604, 1643, 1686, 1786, 1875 (Feb. 18 and 24, Mar. 21, 23, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, and Apr. 2 and 5). Nevertheless, three of the nine movants (Shores, Fackler, and Westervelt) voted against passage of the Dodd’s bill.

159See above ch. 14.

163State of Iowa: 1921: Journal of the House of the Thirty-Ninth General Assembly 1659-60 (Mar. 30); State of Iowa: 1923: Journal of the House of the Fortieth General Assembly iv-vi, 329-30 (Jan. 29). Notably, Toleff Moen, who had been the most militant anti-repealer in 1921, voted against the rule change.
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Indianola and represented Warren County, one of the driest communities in Iowa, which did not permit the sale of cigarettes until 1933, 12 years after the legislature legalized it. The potential suspension immediately became reality when, directly after the vote, a motion (proposed by a representative who had voted against the changes) prevailed to suspend the rule for the rest of the day.

Pro-smoking forces waited two weeks to move to suspend the new rule: following a successful motion on February 10 by William Children, a Republican farmer from Council Bluffs who had voted against the Dodd bill in 1921, they initiated a spasm of suspensions that began on Valentine’s day, lasted until recess on February 23, and then resumed for two days on March 8-9, only to vanish again. Anti-smokers’ varying degrees of successful resistance were on display on three of these 10 days. On February 15, the anti-smokers defeated the motion to suspend the no-smoking rule; on February 20, an objection subverted the request by Representative John Rankin (who in 1921 had filed a bill to repeal the cigarette sales ban) for unanimous consent to suspend the rule, forcing him to achieve his goal by means of a motion; and, finally, on March 9, opponents defeated Samuel Fackler’s motion to suspend the rule for 30 minutes, but were unable shortly thereafter to prevent hog-breeder James McClune’s motion to suspend for the rest of the day from prevailing.

The battle almost immediately after the start of the first day of the 1923-24 special session (to complete the revision of the Iowa Code), when anti-smokers defeated Rankin’s motion to suspend for the rest of the forenoon, but in the afternoon McClune’s motion to suspend for the rest of the day carried. A fortnight later a motion to suspend the rule for the remainder of the forenoon prevailed, but then considerably later in the session, when Children moved to 164On Storey’s generally conservative legislative record in 1921, see “Judge Storey’s Work in the Legislature,” Indianola Herald, Apr. 14, 1921 (4:2).

165On Indianola, see below ch. 20.
166The representative was R. O. Garber, a Republican lawyer from Adair.
171State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the House of the Fortieth General Assembly: Extra suspend, a roll call was demanded, which makes possible a comparison with the ing the voting pattern on Dodd’s bill in 1921. Although the close 29 to 24 vote in favor of suspension was ultimately moot because it was immediately thereafter determined that a quorum was absent, of the 11 members who both had voted on the Dodd bill and voted Nay on Rule 63, nine had (consistently) also voted against repealing the cigarette sales ban, while only two had voted Aye.
Somewhat less consistently, 12 of the 17 representatives who voted to suspend the rule had also voted for Dodd’s bill, while five had voted against it.\footnote{172} Although three weeks later the House suspended the rule for the remainder of the session,\footnote{173} presumably because the House then recessed for three months, on the day it resumed proceeding, it suspended the rule for that day and again the next day, but not for the last days of the session.\footnote{174}

At the end of 1923 the State University of Iowa student newspaper published a brief article even the title of which ("Anti-Smoking Rule in Iowa Legislature Is Always Suspended") forcefully underscored how quickly the tide had turned against protection from secondhand tobacco smoke exposure, ushering in a decades-long socioeconomically pressured acquiescence:

One of the first house and senate rules the newcomer to the general assembly learns by number is the rule forbidding smoking during the sessions—63 in the house and 33 in the senate. The senate generally suspends the rule a few moments after convening, while the representatives seldom wait more than an hour to let down the anti-smoking bar.
On the usual aye and nay vote the nays are frequently louder than the ayes, but the chair nearly always declares the ayes have it and there is no protest.
The few non-smokers make up in volume for the lack in numbers, but always good naturally submit.\footnote{175}

\footnotetext{Session 170 (Dec. 19, 1923) (n.d.) (by Davenport Republican John Hansen).
172State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the House of the Fortieth General Assembly: Extra Session 1352-54 (Apr. 5, 1924) (n.d.); State of Iowa: 1921: Journal of the House of the Thirty-Ninth General Assembly 1659-60 (Mar. 30). Once again, Moen voted against the suspension; one of the two members who had supported Dodd's bill but voted against the suspension was House Speaker J. H. Anderson.
Session 1683 (Apr. 25, 1924) (n.d.). George Venard, who had been the other member to vote against suspension on April 5 who had voted for the Dodd bill, made the motion.
Session 1712, 1731 (July 22 and 23, 1924) (n.d.) (Rankin and Hansen, respectively, the movants).
175"Anti-Smoking Rule in Iowa Legislature Is Always Suspended," \textit{DI}, Dec. 23, 1923
(1:4).}
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Only a few attempts were made in the House to suspend the rule in 1925, beginning with a success on the opening day of the session for the remainder of that day and again during the forenoon of January 28. No initiative was made on February 3, when Helen Keller and Ann Sullivan addressed a joint legislative session in the House chamber, but the next day, Volney Diltz, who played a prominent role on behalf of the American Legion in repealing the sales ban in 1921, sought to have the rule suspended for the remainder of the forenoon; anti-smokers defeated his motion only to see Representative L. Forsling’s to suspend it for the forenoon prevail shortly thereafter. After another suspension a few days later, smokers appear to have relented until March 16, when Representative David Brittain, a Farm Bureau official from Madison county, unsuccessfully moved to hollow out the rule by amending A. G. Rassler’s motion to suspend for the remainder of the day by extending it to the rest of the session. After the amendment’s defeat, smokers had to make do with the freedom to smoke just for the rest of that day, which appears to have been the last suspension of the session.177

In 1927, the resistance of the anti-smoking legislators was again on display when, on January 26, the House rejected the motion of Representative Irving Knudson, a Republican auctioneer-banker, to suspend the rule for the forenoon.178 Later that morning, however, George Edge, a Republican farmer from Newton, offered another motion to suspend the no-smoking rule for the forenoon, triggering a demand for a roll call vote, which laid the basis for the second record of the comparative strength of pro- and anti-smoking forces in the Iowa House on the issue of smoking in the legislature itself prior to the 1970s. That almost two-fifths of House members—the vote was 61 to 38—objected to being exposed to secondhand smoke as late as 1927 indicates that the antagonism was widespread and in no way the preserve of a fringe group of WCTU-affiliates.179 The intense contentiousness of smoking and nonsmokers’ tenacity were impressively underscored for a third time that day during the afternoon session on January 26,

---

176 See above ch. 15.
when the chamber defeated a motion by Republican lawyer Leonard Simmer to suspend the rule. Thereafter, the pro-smoking contingent managed to prevail on 16 additional occasions, while their opponents defeated the motion to suspend only once more (on February 4), though smokers ceased offering such motions after February 19.

No attempt appears to have been made in 1929 to suspend the House no-smoking rule, but in 1931 the House Rules Committee proposed amending the rule by not permitting smoking “prior to ten o’clock a.m. on any legislative day.” Floor amendments were proposed to push the smoking time back to 10:30 a.m. and twelve o’clock as well as to strike the committee amendment altogether, thus leaving the old rule in place. Ultimately the House adopted 10:30 a.m. as the end of daily smoke-and tobacco-freedom. Thus the new rule read: “[N]or shall any person be permitted to use tobacco on the floor of the house during its session, prior to 10:30 o’clock a.m. on any legislative day, or in the galleries at any time. This rule may be suspended by a majority vote of the members present.”

Finally, at the next session, in 1933, the House proceeded to abolish even this tenuous regulation. The elimination of the last vestige of regulation took place without any debate or even express declaration that the no-smoking rule was at stake. The Rules Committee merely submitted a report recommending that “Rule 63 be stricken”—without any mention of that rule’s content—and that a rule of totally unrelated content (relating to rules suspension) be inserted in its stead. On February 6 the House, without discussion, adopted the “committee

---

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

amendment to Rule 63,187 thus ending almost a century of codified prohibition of smoking in the Iowa legislature and ushering in more than four decades of laissez-faire.188

The Advent of Women State Legislators Produces a Surprising Impact on Smoking Rules: Examples of the “shepherdess of the male members”

[E]vidently Madame Nicotine appeals to them more strongly than Madame Rachael [sic] Berry.... 189

How many ever saw a real woman legislator, the kind able to withstand the haze of tobacco smoke and other “wickedness” in the legislative halls at Salem?190

Yet a decent regard for the rights of others should preclude it [smoking] if women are in attendance [as members of legislatures]. This truism would be both superfluous and smug were it not for the astonishing fact that some men with brains enough to be preferred for public office by their fellows, do fail to use them in this particular. When none but men are in the room, question of propriety is not so fairly raised, for most men who take part in public affairs are quite accustomed to tobacco smoke, and it is expected that the unlucky exceptions to the rule will submit in silence rather than interfere with the satisfactions of their neighbors.191

Some legislators’ willingness to put up with secondhand smoke exposure was not confined to Iowa192 and may, surprisingly, even have been reinforced by the advent of women as members of state legislatures beginning in the mid-1890s in the West, where, purportedly, “no such asceticism prevailed” as to ban smoking.

188 See below ch. 25.
189 “Random Notes,” Bakerfield Californian, Mar. 5, 1915 (12:2) (edit.).
191 Robert Luce, Legislative Assemblies: Their Framework, Make-Up, Character, Characteristics, Habits, and Manners 637-38 (1924).
192 In 1889 the Kansas House adopted a resolution instructing the sergeant-at-arms to enforce House Rule 67—which prohibited smoking in the hall, rooms opening into the hall, or the galleries, while the House was in session—which was “constantly being violated, to the great discomfort of many members....” House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas 268 (Jan. 23) (1889).
Consequently: “When women lawmakers began to appear, it was wondered whether their presence would expel the cigar.”

Indeed, initially in Colorado in 1895, when the first (three) women elected to a state legislature sat in the House, they made it their “business to see that the rule against smoking on the floor was enforced strictly.” In particular of 32-year-old Brooklyn native Clara Cressingham the New York World contemptuously asserted: “Her delicate nostrils would invariably detect the most delicate smoke wreath ascending from behind any of the big oaken desks, whereupon she would immediately demand that the Sergeant-at-Arms enforce the House rule without delay.” When “men members felt greatly annoyed because, as a result of the women legislators’ “sustained pertinacity,” “they could not solace their brains with tobacco” and “toward the end of the session no smoking was allowed for a minute in the house,” the New York Sun commended the women “without stint” for having rendered “a most excellent service...to the cause of good manners in the Legislature.” In contrast, the Chicago Tribune (falsely) complained that they had intervened only to protest “venerable and accepted masculine privileges,” such as smoking, thus making themselves “disliked.” The paper editorially pounded on this theme as evidence that the “woman suffrage experiment in Colorado” was largely a “fad,” of which the women themselves were the first to “get tired....” Four years later, the press (misleadingly) reported that: “On appeal of the women members of Colorado house, smoking has been prohibited in the house chamber.” And given the repeated references during congressional debates to the need to protect women in the galleries from members’ tobacco smoke on the floor, an expectation that legislatures would 193 Robert Luce, Legislative Assemblies: Their Framework, Make-Up, Character, Characteristics, Habits, and Manners 637 (1924).

194 See above ch. 6.
196 Sun (New York), Apr. 16, 1895 (6:4) (untitled edit).
197 “Tired of Their Fad,” CT, Apr. 12, 1895 (6) (edit.). For a similar (false) complaint about the female members’ failure to distinguish themselves, see “Those Women Legislators,” World (New York), Apr. 14, 1895 (7:7-8). For a more positive evaluation of their overall performance by the local press, see “Women as Legislators,” RMN, Apr. 8, 1895 (8:3).
198 Even before statehood Colorado’s territorial legislative chambers had banned smoking. See above ch. 6.
200 See below this ch.
intensify their anti-smoking bans would have been eminently plausible. In the event, new female legislators in a number of states enabled their male colleagues to smoke on the job and expose their non-smoking co-workers to the by-products.

Arizona

The first nationally newsworthy female facilitation of legislative smoking took place in Arizona in 1915, when for the first time a woman occupied a seat in the Senate (as well as in the House). Soon after Arizona had achieved statehood in 1912, women secured the right to vote through an initiative measure, in part as a result of the efforts of Frances Lillian Willard Munds (1866-1948), the president of the Arizona Equal Suffrage Association from 1909 to 1912, whose participation in that struggle had arisen out of her activity in the Arizona WCTU.201 In 1914 Munds won election to the Senate of the state’s second legislature, only the second woman ever to be elected to a state senate in the country.202

At the same session, Rachel Berry (1859-1948), a Mormon emigrant from Utah and “ardent [liquor] prohibitionist,” who had been “a factor to be reckoned with in the suffrage campaign,” became the first woman elected to the Arizona House.203 On the day that they took their seats, January 11, 1915, smoking, as a headline put it the next day, became the “First Serious Issue in New Legislature.”204 Directly following election of a House speaker and a motion to make the First Legislature’s rules the Second’s temporary rules, Berry, whose primary legislative concerns were women, children, and education, introduced Resolution No. 1, which triggered the session’s “first clash”: “That no smoking be permitted on the floor of the House during all sessions of the House and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to enforce the same in the lobby” —leaving, as the L.A. Times put it, “the gallery mob without mention.”

---

During the ensuing discussion, a member (of the entirely Democratic House) from Tempe, James Cooper Goodwin, a prominent rancher, was Berry’s most ardent supporter. Indeed, the fact that Goodwin during his only other term, in 1897, had successfully moved the adoption of an identically worded resolution in the Territorial House strongly suggests that he was cooperating very closely with Berry. On the second day of the 1897 session, Goodwin had introduced a simpler resolution that “no smoking be permitted during all sessions of the House,” which the official Journal reported as tabled. The carnival atmosphere in the chamber emerged in a press account: “The speaker, taking a cigar from his mouth, asked something about intermissions for refreshments and then, with an eagle swoop the house dropped on the resolution and it was no more.” Undaunted, the next day, “in a cloud of fragrant Havana smoke,” Goodwin offered a more expansive resolution (with precisely the same wording that Berry submitted 18 years later), which the House, “[m]uch to the astonishment of the lobby and possibly of the members,” adopted. The Assembly then promptly took a 20-minute recess, during which “everybody lit a fresh cigar.” Two 207 Journals of the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona: Regular Session...1915, at 24 (Jan. 11). The fact that Berry found it necessary to offer the resolution implied that the House rules embodied no such ban. The House rules for the First and Second Legislature (1912-13 and 1915), according to rare separate prints (Rules of the House of Representatives), contained no reference to smoking. Email from Barbara Howe, Arizona State Law Library, to Marc Linder (May 9, 2011).

---

209 Journals of the Nineteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona...1897, at 16 (Jan. 19) (1897).

210 Unidentified and undated newspaper clipping in James C. Goodwin Folder, Biographic Files Collection, Tempe History Museum Research Library (copy furnished by Joshua Roletter, Curator of Collections).

211 Journals of the Nineteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona...1897, at 20 (Jan. 20) (1897).

212 Unidentified and undated newspaper clippings in James C. Goodwin Folder, Biographic Files Collection, Tempe History Museum Research Library (copy furnished weeks later the struggle over smoking broke out again, when a motion to allow smoking during session hours lost, but in March smokers secured a partial victory by a motion that excepted Committee of the Whole proceedings from smoking ban.

In 1915 Goodwin “warmly sustained the Hon. Mrs. Berry’s contention that tobacco is a nasty weed and that smoking is a wasteful and even injurious habit that should be abolished generally and that, therefore, should be shown disapproval in any body of representatives of the people.” Their addicted antagonist protested that: “Tobacco gave him clarity of vision. He needed tobacco in order to do his best work for his constituents....” After Berry had yielded to a motion to strike out enforcement of the ban in the lobby, the House passed her resolution on a 25 to 10 roll call vote. The “many members” to whose “obvious distress,” the resolution, according to the Arizona Gazette, prevailed, presumably did not exceed 10. In a press interview, Berry explained her position: “If smoking were abolished it would be a benefit to mankind. It’s all nonsense about tobacco quieting the nerves. If the men did not use it they would not be nervous.” The Arizona Republican was impressed that Berry had articulated this view “in a quiet, dignified way that stamped the speaker an earnest reformer yet not one seeking notoriety by freak legislation.” And the rival Arizona Gazette, while “still for Mrs. Berry,” was “much disappointed in” her because the ban was “mighty tough on the press lads” and would “spoil what by Joshua Roffler, Curator of Collections).

The vote of 13 to 9 failed to achieve the requisite super-majority. Journals of the Nineteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona 110 (Feb. 4) (1897).

Journals of the Nineteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona 272 (Mar. 13) (1897).

“Women Shy on Teamwork,” LAT, Jan. 16, 1915 (II3). Yet another legislator insisted that “if the atmosphere of the house were vitiated by tobacco smoke his constituents would be deprived of his best efforts.” “Second State Legislature Convenes at State House,” AR, Jan. 12, 1915 (1:1-2).

The press made sarcastic comments suggesting that there was no such space as a lobby. E.g., “Second State Legislature Convenes at State House,” AR, Jan. 12, 1915 (1:1) (“the lobby, whatever or whe[re]ver that may be”).

Journals of the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona: Regular Session...1915, at 24 (Jan. 11).

looked like a nice cozy session with plenty of free smokes.”

In the Senate, Munds pursued the diametrically opposed tack. When the Arizona Republican noted that she had “said that she had no objection to indulgence by her colleagues in the weed,” what it really meant was, as Munds herself stated, “[w]hen the question of smoking came up in caucus I asked that it be continued” because she, a self-described “democrat, progressive but not radical,” had “fought for equality” and hoped she was “consistent.” In other words, whatever Munds said, she said it not on the Senate floor, but in the non-public caucus setting. The Arizona press reported that: “In the senate members can smoke all they please. Mrs. Frances Munds not only approved of smoking but insisted that male legislators continue to smoke during the session.” Munds, to whom her colleagues’ smoke was “perfectly agreeable,” even disclosed her partly opportunistic motivation in an interview with the Republican that seemed to take direct exception to Berry’s aforementioned position: “‘Abolish smoking on my account? Not if I know it! I certainly hope the men will smoke. It will soothe their nerves and keep them in good humor. When my husband gets cross, I run for his tobacco and even fill his pipe.’”

Vindicating...

\[\text{\textsuperscript{220}}\] “At the Capitol,” Arizona Gazette, Jan. 12, 1915 (4:3).
\[\text{\textsuperscript{221}}\] “Second State Legislature Convenes at State House,” AR, Jan. 12, 1915 (1:1).
\[\text{\textsuperscript{222}}\] “Smoking Is First Serious Issue in New Legislature,” AR, Jan. 12, 1915 (5:2).

Consequently, the Senate Journal for Jan. 11, 1915 did not record any intervention by her with regard to smoking. Journals of the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona: Regular Session...1915, at 1-3 (Jan. 11). The Senate rules for the First and Second Legislature (1912-13 and 1915), according to rare separate prints (Rules of the State Senate) in the state library, contained no reference to smoking. Email from Barbara Howe, Arizona State Law Library, to Marc Linder (May 9, 2011). The 1917 Senate rules also did not address smoking. Journals: Third Legislature of the State of Arizona 49-65 (Jan. 23) (1917) (Senate). Since the Senate rules included no smoking ban, Munds was merely signaling to fellow Democrats (who occupied all but one Senate seat and monopolized the House) that she would not be proposing one. To be sure, press coverage of the caucusing during the weekend before the legislature convened did not mention smoking. “Dr. W. P. Sims to Be President of the State Senate,” Arizona Gazette, Jan. 9, 1915 (1:1); “First House Caucus Today,” AR, Jan. 9, 1915 (5:3); “Sims, President; Brooks Speaker, Caucus Results,” AR, Jan. 10, 1915 (1:4-6); “Veterans Chase and Cook to Call Solons to Order Today,” AR, Jan. 11, 1915 (1:1); “Doings in the State Legislature,” Tombstone Epitaph, Jan. 17, 1915 (4:1-2). The use of “continue” suggested that legislators’s smoking had already been unconstrained by Senate rules and that Munds merely announced that she was acquiescing in that regime.

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

the wisdom of her plan, the Los Angeles Times noted that Munds “got some sincere applause coming her way at the very outset of her career as a stateswoman.” The out-of-state press—wire-service blurbs appeared in many newspapers across the country, which were amused by the two women’s opposed approaches—invited a formal process that had never taken place by adding that: “She had little difficulty in securing the passage...of a motion to that effect.”

Dunbar’s Weekly, edited and published by J. O. Dunbar, “a prickly, independent and generally astute political observer with strong prohibitionist sentiments,” expressed a widely held (male pro-smoking) view in praising Munds’s and ridiculing Berry’s approach:

We commend the tact and good judgment of Mrs. Senator Munds for her refusal to prohibit the senators from smoking. Mrs. Munds has had a heap of experience dealing with men politically and she realizes that they always respond to the just demands of women. Smoking is indulged in the houses of probably 90 percent of the people of the nation, and just why any person would seek to prevent their associates from this privilege is peculiar, to say the least. Senator Munds has certainly started her senatorial career along the right lines, and we predict she will be a valuable member of the second Arizona legislature.

The female of the species—in the person of Mrs. Berry of Apache—got herself in the limelight (and incidentally got herself disliked in many places) by butting in at the earliest possible moment with a “no-smoking” resolution. The resolution would have come with much better grace from some of the men, but Mrs. Berry, it seems, decided to take no chances. Many of the men voted for the resolution out of a mistaken sense of chivalry.... Out of revenge, it is said that a resolution will be offered demanding that Mrs. Berry lay aside the skyspicewhich adorns her crown of glory. One member said he favored the no-smoking resolution because cigar smoke contaminated the air the rest were forced to breathe [sic]. As long as this is to be a perfectly sanitary Legislature, and “safety first” is to be the watchword, why not make all visitors secure doctors’ certificates of health and purity

According to “Women Shy on Teamwork,” LAT, Jan. 16, 1915 (II3), Munds “request[ed] her colleagues to not consider her at all if they wanted to smoke. She wanted to be on an equality...and she had observed that mankind, and particularly her own husband, was much more pacific and manageable when under the influence of nicotine.”

229“Woman Legislators Carry Their Point,” SLT, Jan. 12, 1915 (9:3).
before permitting them entrance to the gallery.232

In contrast, boasting that it had “not been subsidized by the iniquitous tobacco trust whose practices were infinitely worse than its products,” the self-proclaimed independent progressive Republican judiciously declared that both Berry’s and Munds’ way of looking at the question had much to recommend them.233 While failing to mention that the all-male Arizona Territorial House and Council in 1897 and 1905, respectively, had prohibited smoking (and as early as 1887 the House printed large placards prohibiting smoking in the Assembly chamber or lobby while the House was in session),234 the editorialist traced Berry’s position all the way back to Sir Walter Raleigh:

To most women, before the suffrage movement had a start, smoking was repugnant. ... We may add that the repugnance to tobacco in any form is not confined to women. Many men share it, as we learn from the members of the house who supported Mrs. Berry’s resolution against smoking....

Mrs. Munds, we may presume, is no more favorable to smoking than her sister at the other end of the capitol. But she was inclined to accept it as one of the lesser evils of American politics into which she entered with the full knowledge that a majority of men are smokers. She doubtless had a hope, as well as the rest of us who favor participation by women in political affairs, that equal suffrage would work a purification of politics. But it is a question whether it should be begun with a purification of the physical, rather than the moral air of our legislative chambers.235

Its Solomonic suggestion for dealing with “stubborn” male legislators, who reacted to their pipes and cigars’ being taken away from them like children whose toys had been snatched away, was to put ventilation fans into the chambers’ walls.236

From the two pioneering legislators’ irreconcilable preferences the weekly Tombstone Epitaph male chauvinistically constructed commonality by detecting the unifying principle that they had “established the supremacy of a single female wish over a large number of male votes in the senate and house.”237 Unwritten was the contradictory logical implication that a large number of senators resented their uncollegial colleagues’ exposing them to secondhand smoke and that in both houses majority rule had been instantiated. The out-of-state press reveled in invidiously comparing the two legislators’ tactics. The Oakland Tribune, for example, knew that with regard to “securing legislation benefiting her particular district it is by no means difficult to determine which of the two ladies will have the most influence on the nicotine-loving membership, and it is safe to predict that the senator will have a decided advantage over her sister in the lower house.” With Munds “wish[ing] the men to smoke if they wanted to,” and Berry “determined to stop them, no matter what they wanted,” the Los Angeles Times could “imagine which one of the two had the most influence in the Legislature.” To be sure, in the most literalist factual sense, this claim was incorrect: despite her favor-currying acquiescence in being inundated with male senators’ tobacco smoke, Munds succeeded in securing enactment of only one of the 13 bills she had introduced—exactly the same number as Berry, who refused to prioritize winning friends and influencing people over her own personal health or establishing the principle of smoke-free public places.

234See below Table 6.

Ironically, almost a century later, the leading historian of early Arizona women politicians, according no weight to Berry’s anti-public-smoking initiative and therefore perceiving no public policy trade-off in Munds’ acquiescence, replicated yesteryear’s male chauvinist press praise of Munds’ willingness to accept traditional male prerogatives. Apparently unaware that all-male legislatures throughout the United States, including Arizona’s, had been banning smoking in House and Senate chambers for decades before women’s advent as colleagues, Heidi Osselaer objectively associated herself with early-twentieth-century pro-tobacco politicians and journalists by charging that “Berry had no by stating that “[e]ven” one who had criticized Munds during her campaign “applauded her reluctance to ban smoking” as indicating that she would be a cooperative legislator.

it would in no way improve their morals or their dispositions.” The minister may have “severely criticized” her, but her colleagues applauded her and “smoked as much as they pleased on the Senate floor and thanked Frances for it.”

Munds “request[ed] her colleagues to not consider her at all if they wanted to smoke. She wanted to be on an equality...and she had observed that mankind, and particularly her own husband, was much more pacific and manageable when under the influence of nicotine.” Apart from the issue of human beings’ comparative tractability while under the influence of withdrawal symptoms, Munds’s aspiration to equal treatment brings into sharp focus the one circumstance in which her laissez-faire approach toward smoking would have attained its greatest plausibility: if—counterfactually—the sole or chief reason for the legislative smoking ban had been to comply with a prevalent male-chauvinist behavioral code, shared by some women, that it was disrespectful for men to smoke in women’s presence. But in fact many years before Munds and Berry’s election anti-smoking male legislators such as Goodwin had prevailed upon their all-male chambers to institute smoking bans and Berry herself did not urge prohibition based on gendered notions of courtesy. If, on the contrary, public smoking disputes are interpreted as public health policy questions and not as grounded in narrow-minded religious dogmatism propagated by puritanical WCTU WASP busybodies trying to stick their noses into everyone else’s personal rights and privileges, then Munds’s willingness to jettison debate in order to disarm men who might be won over as allies on some other substantive matters takes on a much different character, which would have to be evaluated according to traditional criteria probing the efficacy of legislative compromise and trade-offs wholly unrelated to the advent of female legislators, whose successes would have to be judged in relation to those of their anti-smoking male predecessors and contemporaries in the statehouse.

In the event, Berry’s victory was not definitive. Evidence that smoking representatives had failed fully to internalize the need for compliance surfaced at the House session on January 29, when Berry, detained by a big rain storm, 245Sally Munds Williams, History of Valuable Pioneers of the State of Arizona 78-79 (1987 [1979]). In quoting a version of this passage, an historically amnesiac late-twentieth-century reporter insisted that Munds had “sidestepped an issue which could have been as unpopular then as a suggestion to ban Monday night football might be now.” Bonnie Walker, “Frances Willard Munds: Suffragette, Senator,” Courier (Prescott, AZ), Sept. 17, 1985 (1C:1), on http://news.google.com/newspapers?id=ocQAAAAIABAJ&sjid=TU8DAAAAIABAJ&pg=4778,3551877.

---

246“Women Shy on Teamwork,” LAT, Jan. 16, 1915 (I1).
arrived a half-hour late. During her brief absence, the House rules were, on the motion—“greeted with enthusiastic applause”—of one of the representatives who had voted against her resolution, suspended, and “about two thirds of the members, with contented sighs, began puffing at cigars and pipes.” On Berry’s arrival, according to the Arizona Gazette, “the smoker came to an end, most of the members resembling boys caught with their fingers in the jam.” The Republican less plausibly reported that the House had passed a resolution rescinding Berry’s, which “went through with a whoop and the next instant the chamber began turning blue.” Why the members, who “smoke[d] pipes, cigars and cigarettes... for the first time since the legislature met three weeks ago,” would have bothered to try to “conceal the evidence of a broken rule”—especially with “the smoke... everywhere”—is unclear if they had properly suspended the rules, but an amused male-chauvinist press instinctively trivialized the anti-public smoking initiative by headlining the wire-service report: “Naughty Legislators! She Caught ’Em Smoking.”

Then, on March 1, with only 10 days left in the 60-day session, “[a]fter almost fifty smokeless days” during which male members had seemingly learned to control their addiction, the “Lure of Nicotine Proves Too Strong,” as the Boston Globe headlined the wire-service report that was picked up across the country. The day’s “most thrilling episode,” at least from the Gazette’s perspective, was the rebellion by the “disciples of My Lady Nicotine” who had been “in more or less agony,” which was psychologically exacerbated by the Senate’s “wont to blow smoke in their faces and to remind them that the sovereign house of lords was not bound by blue laws.” That day, “[h]uman nature being so constituted that it can stand just so much,” Representative John B. Flanagan, who lived on the Colorado River Indian Reservation and had voted for Berry’s smoking ban, offered Resolution No. 7: “that smoking is hereby permitted on the floor of the House during all sessions of the House.” While Flanagan aimed at affording members freedom to “puff their souls into purgatory if they saw fit,” Berry’s ally “Goodwin complained that even the slight abatement of the nuisance” under her resolution “had not afforded him relief and, ‘what would be his state if all the bars were thrown down?’” Speaker Brooks allegedly feared “that the action would be considered a reflection that Mrs. Berry had lost her hold upon the legislature.” Member Joseph Lines—who in 1921 as a senator would introduce a bill to empower local governments to prohibit the sale of all tobacco—wondered whether the “age of chivalry had passed away....” Seconded by a representative who had voted against Resolution No. 1, it carried by a “rising vote—which the Gazette
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Mar. 2, 1915 (5:5). If it was already clear at this time that a special session would be necessary (to deal with appropriations and tax bills), then perhaps the smokers were signaling that they would not tolerate another ban.

255 1910 and 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest). In 1920 he was returned as a Ford auto dealer; his occupation was illegible in 1910.

260 See above ch. 15.

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

confusingly characterized as “fifteen in favor of the smokes”—over Berry’s protest and vote.\(^{263}\) Dunbar’s Weekly, which called “repeal of the no-smoking rule...the most important thing the House has done for a week,”\(^{265}\) was unable to resist a sarcastic poke in the eye: “The Hon. Mrs. Berry refuses to smoke even after being ordered to by the house.”\(^{266}\)

Munds was scarcely the last female legislator in Arizona publicly to declare her refusal to stand in the way of male smoking. Prefiguring Chesterfield’s 1926 woman-centered “Blow Some My Way” advertisement,\(^{267}\) Democratic Representative Nellie Bush (1888-1963), a former teacher, principal, and justice of the peace,\(^{268}\) and future Southern Pacific Railroad and Santa Fe Railroad lawyer,\(^{269}\) virtually solicited exposure to men’s tobacco smoke as part of her principle that women in politics “simply have to eliminate some of their old fashioned ideas regarding the difference in sexes.” As she told a reporter in 1922: “I expect nothing more from a man in politics than life gives another man. If he wants to smoke, I say, ‘Go ahead and smoke.’ And if he wants to swear, I’ll sit by and enjoy hearing him do it. If it doesn’t hurt him, it certainly isn’t going to hurt me.”\(^{270}\) Practicing what she preached, in 1921, during the first of 16 years

---

\(^{264}\)“Lure of Nicotine Proves Too Strong,” BG, Mar. 2, 1915 (8:8). “Stateswoman Gets Colleagues on Edge,” Lock Haven Express, Mar. 4, 1915 (3:2), appears to have invented quotations in attributing to Flanagan (“the member from Gila Bend,” which was located in Yuma County, which he represented) a motion, which allegedly carried unanimously, back in January “that we abstain from smoking during our deliberations, lest the smoke offend Representative Berry’s nostrils.” Presumably similarly invented was his supposed statement in March that he was “confounded—that is I’m very weary—of dodging into a corner of a committee room or Jim Higley’s ‘Statesmen Rest’ whenever I want a puff of a cig.” Also fabricated presumably was Munds’s alleged remark to senators, by which she “made herself immensely popular,” that they should “smoke as much as you please....I like the odor of a fragrant cigar.”

\(^{266}\)Editorial Comment,” Dunbar’s Weekly 2(8):6 (Mar. 6, 1915).

\(^{267}\)http://tobaccodocuments.org/pollay_ads/Ches01.01.html

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

in the legislature, Bush moved (seconded by Republican John Udall), that “members of the House be allowed the privilege of smoking during the session of the House.” The only other woman in the House, Democrat Miss C. Louise Boehringer, joined the majority in adopting the motion by a vote of 24 to 14.\(^{271}\) When, as late as 1931, a female House member who was “personally opposed to the habit,” nevertheless “would not deny a man one of life’s few remaining pleasures,” Osselaer judged this “decision to tolerate spittoons and smoke-filled rooms [] as important to female success: women did not seek to radically alter the way business was conducted but rather tried to achieve their goals by quietly blending into the existing male power structure.”\(^{272}\)

Oregon

An account of the experience of Sylvia (Mrs. Alexander) Thompson, a Democratic minority member of the Oregon state legislature from 1917 to 1920,\(^{273}\) was provided by Carrie Chapman Catt, the president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, who pointed out that architectural changes would be necessary to give women a “‘fair deal’” in statehouses because, while men were discussing politics during recess “‘wreathed in halos of smoke,’” \(^{273}\) The press and Oregon legislative documents appear always to have identified her as Mrs. Alexander Thompson; according to the 1920 population census the 46-year-old’s first name was Sylvia. Catt erroneously referred to her as a member of the Senate, when in fact she was a member of the House in 1917, 1919, and during the special session of 1920. State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly Regular Session: 1917, at 5 (1917); State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly Regular Session: 1919, at 5 (1919); David Duniway, Members of the Legislature of Oregon, 1843-1967, at 40 (Oregon State Archives, Bull. No. 2, Rev., Publication No. 30 (1968); Oregon Legislative Assembly: Legislators and Staff, 1841-2007, on http://arcweb.sos.state.or.us/legislative/histleg/statehood/1917reg.htm; http://arcweb.sos.state.or.us/legislative/histleg/statehood/1919reg.htm; http://arcweb.sos.state.or.us/legislative/histleg/statehood/1920spe.htm. Thompson was not the first woman legislator in Oregon: in 1915 one served in the House and the Senate. Elizabeth Cox, “The Three Who Came First,” State Legislatures 20(11):12-19 at 12 (Nov. 1994).

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

the woman member sat alone in some room “‘out of the atmosphere of the matters she is dealing with as well as of the tobacco smoke.’”

“A story in connection with smoke, showing how well women fit into politics...from Oregon. When Senator [sic] Mrs. Alexander Thompson went to the state senate [sic] a committee of gentlemen from the house went to her and said, ‘Senator [sic], what are you going to do about rule 5?’

‘Well, I don’t know what rule 5 is,’ she replied.

‘It deals with the smoking in the senate [sic] chambers,’ she was told.

‘What are you in the habit of doing with it?’ she asked.

‘Overlooking it,’ was the reply.

‘Well, gentlemen, I’m in the habit of living up to laws and rules that are made; but if you are in the habit of overlooking rule 5, do as you have been doing.’

Shortly after the opening of the meeting one senator [sic] rose and addressed the speaker, asking what disposition was to be made concerning rule 5. Before an answer could be made Mrs. Thompson rose and made a move [sic] that rule 5 be suspended. It was seconded and passed. The room was filled with smoke as usual. Again later in the session the same incident occurred, and was again met by Mrs. Thompson with a motion to suspend the rule.

When the house closed the members had taken up a subscription to present the speaker with a gift. As the moment for the presentation neared the speaker, sensing the situation, called Mrs. Thompson to the chair while he received the gift and made a fitting speech. Immediately following the words of the speaker another gift was sent forward and presented to the woman senator [sic]. It was marked, “With appreciation from the smokers,” and it developed that no man, no matter how much he wanted to, was allowed to contribute to the gift unless he was a smoker.”

Thompson’s acquiescence was especially noteworthy in light of the fact that during the House debate in February 1917 on a radical bill that would have not only banned the sale of cigarettes to anyone, but prohibited smoking cigarettes by anyone in any indoor or outdoor public place, she declared: “‘I blush with shame for my sex when I consider how women are taking up the cigarette, and I warn you men right now that if you turn down this bill the 30,000 women of Oregon who are behind it will put it on the ballot next election and put it through.”

---

276 House Bill No. 268, §§ 1 and 5 (Jan. 25, 1917).
277 “House Vote Favors Ban on Cigarettes,” MO, Feb. 9, 1917 (6:4). Thompson voted for the bill, which initially passed the House, against recalling it from the Senate, and against the watered down version, which applied only to minors. State of Oregon: 1833
Thompson’s successors would have both an easier and harder time politicking in the context of smoking: as soon as she left the legislature, at the beginning of the 1921 session the House adopted its Rules Committee’s proposal to eliminate Rule 66, which had provided that: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall or lobby thereof while the House is in session.”

The go-along-to-get-along moral that Chapman Catt derived from Thompson’s acquiescence in and facilitation of smoking was that “Oregon men appreciate the truth that women know how to handle their affairs, and needless to say, Oregon’s woman senator [sic] had little opposition in her work.”

Presumably, Chapman Catt would not have approved of the gendered self-censorship in which Thompson’s colleagues had earlier engaged. Ironically, on January 24, 1917, soon after Thompson had become a member of the House, the speaker, complaining of throat trouble, turned the gavel over to her for the remainder of the morning session, making her the first woman to preside over that chamber. Representatives addressed her as “Mrs. Speaker” as they introduced their bills, “and not one of the fifty-nine men on the floor lit a cigar during her rule.”

Less clear is how Chapman Catt would have evaluated the confrontational approach of Thompson’s colleague Walter Pierce, one of only three Democrats in the Oregon Senate in 1919, who offered the following resolution, which the Senate promptly adopted:

---

Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly: 1917, at 395, 413, 425 (Feb. 8, 10, 12) (1917). See also above ch. 16.

State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Thirty-First Legislative Assembly Regular Session: 1921, at 303-304 (Jan. 12) (1921).

Although only one of four Democrats in the House, Thompson seconded the motion to make a Republican speaker. State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly Regular Session: 1917, at 304 (1917) (Jan. 8).

“Politics Lonely Life for Woman,” WEC, Jan. 24, 1920 (12:5).

“Mrs. Speaker’ in Oregon House for First Time,” CT, Jan. 25, 1917 (3). See also “Woman Presides over House,” Pinedale Roundup (WY), Feb. 8, 1917 (6:5). Oddly, the House Journal did not reflect that Thompson had sat in the speaker’s chair. State of Oregon: Journals of the Senate and House of the Twenty-Ninth Legislative Assembly Regular Session: 1917, at 327-30 (1917) (Jan. 24).

1834
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Whereas there are many members of the senate to whom smoking on the part of other members is very obnoxious, and often causes sickness and headaches; therefore be it

Resolved, That there shall be no smoking allowed in the senate chamber during the time the senate is in session.²⁸³

Nevada

The Nevada legislature had been prohibiting smoking in its chambers for more than half a century before a woman finally became a member in 1919. Indeed, not even the language of those bans had changed from the very first legislative session of 1864.²⁸⁴ As in Iowa, by the time of World War I conflicts over these rules were becoming more frequent as a number of legislators sought to suspend them in order to permit smoking on various days.

As far back as the second legislature of 1866, the Assembly suspended the rule temporarily during an evening session.²⁸⁵ During the following decades the confrontation of smokers’ withdrawal symptoms and non-smokers resistance to secondhand smoke exposure burst forth sporadically.²⁸⁶ In order to supplement its standing rule banning smoking during its sessions, the Senate in 1879 adopted a resolution “that the Sergeant-at-Arms be requested to prohibit smoking in the Senate Chamber prior to convening each day.”²⁸⁷ Just how contentious the ²⁸⁵Journal of the Assembly During the Second Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, 1866, at 68 (Jan. 15) (1866).

²⁸⁶Identification of references to smoking in the Nevada legislative journals was facilitated by Google’s word-searchable digitization of all House journals and almost all Senate journals through 1921. The search words were “smoking,” “smoke,” and the House or Senate rule number in effect in each year. It is possible that less formalized disputes and their resolutions were not captured in the journals, which were not stenographic reports of debates.
²⁸⁷Journal of the Senate of the Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1879, at 51 (Jan. 20) (1879).
addiction vs. breathing battle became manifest nine days later when the Senate adopted another resolution “that smoking in the Senate Chamber shall be allowed up to within ten minutes of the convening of the Senate; and at that hour of each day the Sergeant-at-Arms is instructed to shut off smoking and open the windows.”

A dozen years later the Assembly suspended its rule for the evening of the penultimate day of the session, but then voted down the same member’s motion the next day to suspend the rule for the balance of the day.

By the second decade of the twentieth century these disputes erupted with ever greater frequency. In 1911, after the Assembly had voted down a motion in mid-February to suspend Rule 58 during evening sessions, a member “protested against” the Assembly’s “wasting fifteen minutes of time (which cost the people of the State of Nevada large sums of money) upon a frivolous question and one below the dignity of the Assembly....” On five days in March four different members successfully moved to suspend the rule during various hours. In the Senate that year, however, the rule was suspended only once and even then only for the reading of a single bill. By 1913, the Assembly had become a hot house of rule suspensions. No fewer than nine members on 18 occasions on 16 days (including almost every day during the last two weeks of the session) moved to suspend Rule 58; three of those times the anti-smoking representatives succeeded in defeating the motion. The Senate, in contrast, was quiescent: no motions to suspend were offered. House suspensions were radically reduced in 1915: only two members moved for them, one motion losing and the other 290 Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Fifth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1911, at 130 (Feb. 17) (1911).

---

291 Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Fifth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1911, at 204, 213, 223, 252, 263 (Mar. 3, 4, 6, 9, 10) (1911).
292 Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Fifth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1911, at 138 (Feb. 28) (1911).
294 Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Sixth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1913 (1913).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

carrying. A revealing event on the last night of the session suggested that compliance with the no-smoking rule may well have been strict: the governor sent a message “To the Honorable the Assembly. You are respectfully requested to suspend Rule 58 and to have a cigar with my compliments.” The motion to thank him for the cigars carried. That same session on three days a different senator successfully moved to suspend the other chamber’s no-smoking rule.

In 1917, the Senate suspended its Rule 50 only once, but smoking conflicts erupted often in the Assembly: on five separate days Rule 58 was suspended; on one occasion pro-smokers failed to muster the requisite super-majority; once a smoker was fined for smoking; and once the Assembly voted to fine a smoker for having succeeded in using the suspension procedure. On the third day of the session, the “first real debate” was “staged” after Harry C. Heidtmann, a 43-year-old, German-born, Reno beer bottler, had moved to suspend Rule 58 for the day. Then 68-year-old William Booher offered—presumably just in case—the main motion carried—an amendment prohibiting cigarettes. That it lost by a vote of 13 to 19 was interpreted by the press as meaning that a majority of assemblymen were cigarette smokers. Heidtmann’s motion secured 20 of 35 votes but fell short of the required two-thirds majority. Thus, although the smoking ban remained in effect, the press cautioned that the situation might be different the next day because “smokers are seeking new recruits and may be able to muster the required two-thirds majority” the next time. No such motion was 300 1910 Census of Population (HeritageQuest) (saloon employee); Nevada State Journal, Apr. 1, 1916 (8) (ad for Heidtmann’s bottling business).

303 “Assembly Places Ban on Smoking After First Real Debate of Session Is Staged,” Nevada State Journal, Jan. 18, 1917 (3:4-5). The press accounts are adopted here in preference to the seemingly confused procedure in the Journal, which had the amendment offered the next day, but a week later the rule was suspended for the day. On the last day of January, the rule was enforced when the Assembly voted unanimously in favor a motion to fine Isaac Alexander, a physician, a box of candy because he had “consciously or unconsciously, lig[h]ted a cigar and was serenely puffing away at the weed, much to the discomfort of his colleague Fulmer. Fulmer declared he had no objections to anyone smoking, but he did object to the weed that Alexander was using to perfume the assembly chamber.” Two days later an extended conflict unfolded, when smokers, controlling a majority but not two-thirds of the votes, were “Unable to Scent Up Assembly.” After the first motion lost on a standing vote, Heidtmann—anticipating the widespread but feckless designated smoking/no-smoking sections of the last quarter of the twentieth century—“moved that the suspension apply only to the east half of the chamber, where the greater number of smokers are seated,” but his motion “was not entertained when it was pointed [out] there could be no such division.” Undaunted, a Democrat asked whether chewing unlighted cigars was permitted; not only was no objection raised, but some frustrated addicts doubtless drew solace from the announcement that, since the rule did not ban it, the chewing of tobacco could also be indulged in. Nevertheless, in spite of these smokeless concessions, smoking remained “tabooed” and “the assemblymen were forced to go out in the hallway for their morning smoke.” Two days after another rule suspension on February 6, the Assembly voted to fine a senator (whose presence was not explained) a box of cigars for smoking, and on the same day the members voted 28 to 7 to suspend first losing and then carrying without a vote on the main motion. Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Eighth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1917, at 9 (Jan. 17) (1917).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

\[\text{footnotes}\]

305“Violation of Assembly Rules by Smoking Cigar Costs Alexander of White Pine One Box of Candy; Fair Attaches Given a Treat,” Nevada State Journal, Feb. 1, 1917 (3:6-7). At the 1910 census Fulmer was returned as a deputy sheriff.

306“Smokers Unable to Scent Up Assembly,” Nevada State Journal, Feb. 3, 1917 (3:7). Oddly, none of these disputes was reflected in the Assembly Journal, which indicated that the day’s session lasted only about a half hour. Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Eighth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1917, at 51-52 (Feb. 2) (1917).

307Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Eighth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1917, at 60 (Feb. 6) (1917).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Rule 58 for the rest of the day. On Valentine’s Day, after the House rule had been suspended for the rest of the morning, Democrat C. W. Renfro—who always objects to suspending Rule 58...because smoke injures his throat—successfully moved to amend the motion to require its movant, Speaker pro tem Roy Hardy, to furnish two dollars for candy for attachés. If Renfro was trying to discourage smokers from seeking to suspend the rule by imposing a financial penalty, Hardy revealed that two dollars was not a sufficiently severe deterrent when he stated that the privilege of smoking was worth the fine for making the motion. Finally, on March 2, on the motion of Danish-born farmer Christian Duborg pro-smokers succeeded for the last time during the session in suspending Rule 58.

The tension between want-to-be-smoking and anti-smoking Assemblymen was visibly on display on February 22, when the chamber “had considerable fun” over the introduction by “five of the leading smokers of the lower house” of a bill to ban the manufacture or sale of cigarettes. After one of the members who had successfully moved to suspend Rule 58 moved to refer the bill to “a select committee composed of Renfro,” the Assembly, by a standing vote, defeated Duborg’s motion to reject the bill, but the speaker nevertheless declared the motion carried and the bill rejected.

\footnote{Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Eighth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1917, at 69 (Feb. 8) (1917).}

\footnote{“Cigarette Bill Talk Gives Assembly Fun,” REG, Feb. 22, 1917 (2:1).}

\footnote{Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Eighth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1917, at 89 (Feb. 14) (1917). Later that day Heidtmann successfully moved that another member be fined two boxes of candy for not knowing that Rule 58 had been suspended. \textit{Id.} at 92. The candy-fine system was not limited to punishment for smoking violations. For example, it was imposed against a member for sitting with his feet on the table. \textit{Id.} at 304 (Mar. 14). On another occasion a member was fined “a box of cigars for the exclusive use of the Speaker, Chief Clerk, and the Sergeant-at-Arms” for having made a mistake in a motion; the whole Printing Committee was fined a box of cigarettes for not having had the rules correctly printed. That the cigarettes were designated for the exclusive use of Renfro, one of the chamber’s leading opponents of suspending Rule 58, suggested the theatrical character of the fine system. \textit{Id.} at 157 (Mar. 2).}

\footnote{“It Cost Hardy Two Dollars to Take Smoke,” REG, Feb. 14, 1917 (8:3).}

\footnote{1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).}

\footnote{Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Eighth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1917, at 157 (Mar. 2) (1917).}

\footnote{“Cigarette Bill Talk Gives Assembly Fun,” REG, Feb. 22, 1917 (2:1). The Assembly Journal revealed neither by whose “request” the bill was introduced nor its subject matter. \textit{Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Eighth Session of the Legislature of Nevada: 1917, at 313 (1917).}
In 1919, a motion was offered in the womanless Senate on February 7 to suspend the rule for the rest of the session, but it lost; such a motion did finally carry, but not until the last day of the session.\textsuperscript{315} That motion was offered by Dr. John V. Ducey, a well-known dentist\textsuperscript{316} and member of the Board of Dental Examiners,\textsuperscript{317} who a week earlier had successfully moved to suspend Rule 50 for the day.\textsuperscript{318} Earlier in the session his colleagues both punished him for violating the no-smoking rule and potentially expanded the universe of his dental patients by fining him a box of candy for the legislative attachés.\textsuperscript{319}

On February 13, 1919, Nevada’s first female legislator, Republican Mrs. Sadie D. Hurst, successfully moved to suspend Rule 58 until the noon recess.\textsuperscript{320} She offered no other such motions during the rest of the session, but ten different male representatives did on 19 separate occasions, all but one of their motions carrying.\textsuperscript{321} Smokers’ overwhelming string of victories was not uncontested: following anti-smokers’ defeat on March 14, they may have drawn some small solace from the Assembly’s vote to fine Elbert Stewart—who had successfully offered more (four) motions to suspend Rule 58 than anyone else that session—candy for the attachés because he had smoked before the rule’s suspension that day.\textsuperscript{322}

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{315}Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1919, at 116 (Feb. 22) (by Stewart et al.) (1917).
\item \textsuperscript{316}Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1919, at 53, 277 (Feb. 7, Mar. 20) (1919).
\item \textsuperscript{318}State of Nevada: Message of Gov. Emmet D. Boyle to the Legislature of 1917 (Twenty-Eighth Session) 37 (1917).
\item \textsuperscript{319}Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1919, at 189 (Mar. 13) (1919).
\item \textsuperscript{320}Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1919, at 48 (Feb. 6) (1919); “Jots from Legislature,” \textit{Nevada State Journal}, Feb. 7, 1919 (5:2).
\item \textsuperscript{321}Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1919, at 104 (Feb. 13) (1919).
\item \textsuperscript{322}Journal of the Assembly of the Twenty-Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1919, at 345 (Mar. 14) (1919) (motion by James Lockhart).
\end{itemize}
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Hurst made what was perhaps the most unoverlookable effort at going along to get along when, at the 1920 special session devoted to ratifying the congressional resolution proposing woman’s suffrage, she “moved that inasmuch as the women were so greatly indebted to the members of the Assembly for their cooperation, that [sic] Rule 58 be suspended for the remaining portion of the session.” The motion carried unanimously, though the very brief mini-session lasted only a few hours.323

During the 1921 session, 23-year-old Ruth Averill,324 the only woman in (and the youngest member of) the legislature, shortly before the end of the third day of the session, successfully moved to suspend Rule 58 for the remainder of the day.325 On two other days Averill also secured rule suspension late in the day,326 another day her motion carried unanimously,327 but her last motion was defeated.328 All 19 of male legislators’ we-wanna-smoke motions carried, five of them offered by lawyer James Lockhart,329 who in 1919 had offered the motion to fine that session’s leading smoking advocate for smoking before a suspension went into effect.

Shortly after the session had adjourned, Averill, in response to a request from 324“Pioneers of 1921: Ruth Averill of Nevada,” Woman Citizen 6(3):11 (July 30, 1921). Averill was a first-grade teacher one year out of college who had been admitted to the bar but had never practiced law.

---

327Journal of the Assembly of the Thirtieth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1921, at 175 (Feb. 28) (1921).
328Journal of the Assembly of the Thirtieth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1921, at 195 (Mar. 2) (1921).
329Journal of the Assembly of the Thirtieth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1921, at 61, 88, 105, 126, 132, 155, 185, 197, 216, 230, 242, 251, 168, 270, 277, 288, 299, 344, 366 (Feb. 2, 8, 11, 16, 17, 24, Mar. 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 16, 17) (1921). The Assembly also voted to require anyone violating Rule 58 to buy the attachés a box of candy, though the fine was not imposed. Id. at 141 (Feb. 21). In light of the fact that the overwhelming majority of motions to suspend were offered by male legislators, it is misleading to state that: “Assemblmen did not rely entirely on their new female colleagues—some men still made the motion....” Dana Bennett, “Smokin’ in the Boys’ Room: A Case Study of Women State Legislators in Nevada, 1919-1931,” Frontiers: A Journal of Women Studies 31(1): 89-122 at 93 (2010).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

a woman’s periodical to discuss her experience as a pioneering state legislator, chose to focus on her pro-smoking initiatives, which, in their avowedly manipulative purpose, mirrored Munds’s approach in Arizona six years earlier:

...especially I am a true Nevadan and not a radical reformer, for I am afraid a radical would not last very long in the Nevada legislature. I have no sympathy with the “blue laws.” One of my first moves was to suspend the rule against smoking in the legislature. Although I never would smoke myself and hate to see a woman doing it, I feel that men are much easier to get along with when they have something sticking in their mouths to talk around and look wise over. The men seemed to appreciate my attitude and were certainly wonderful to me.

In 1921, pro-smokers in a Senate that would remain utterly bereft of women senators for many years pursued suspension of Rule 50 just as energetically as their fellow addicts in the Assembly—without suffering a single defeat. On 20 days one of 10 senators succeeded in securing permission to smoke (including one motion that covered the last four days of the session). Just how little male smokers needed women to make the motion to enable them to smoke became manifest in 1923 when the Senate simply amended Rule 50 to strike out the ban altogether and thus introduce smoking laissez-faire.

During the remaining years until the Assembly followed suit and outright repealed its own no-smoking rule in 1931, battles continued to be fought over retention or suspension. After all four assemblywomen during the opening days... of the 1923 session had “courteously taken the initiative” in taking turns moving suspension of Rule 58 rather than declaring that “tobacco smoke [wa]s offensive” to them, on the eighth day Mrs. Louise Hays, contemplating “dispensing with the daily formality,” gave notice that on some future day she would offer an amendment to Rule 58. The next day the chamber adopted Hays’s Assembly Resolution No. 8, suspending the rule for the remainder of the Thirty-First Session. In 1925, the next contingent of four assemblywomen again took turns offering the motion virtually every day from February 5 to 25 before they “concluded that they have been wasting a lot of breath”: the next day’s motion to suspend the rule for the remainder of the session carried unanimously. On the second day of the short special session in December 1926, Mrs. Ethel McGuire was the movant. In 1927 the press reported that McGuire, that session’s only woman legislator, “has assumed the doubtful honor of asking each day that the rule forbidding smoking be suspended. Mrs. McGuire admits she doesn’t care much for the job but it seems to be expected of her so she willingly complies. Each day, a bouquet of flowers graces her desk, lending a dash of color to the drab assembly room.”

---

335“Legislative Doings Told in Summarized Form,” REG, Jan. 23, 1923 (5:2).

341Frank Helmick, “Repeal of Primary Law Not on Program of 1927 Session, Leaders
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

first days of the session, when in fact McGuire had been the only movant on two days; over the entire session, however, while she offered the motion 18 times, eight different male members were the movants on 19 days.342 That anti-smokers succeeded in defeating suspension only twice was misleading inasmuch as it did not mean either that smoking had become hegemonic in the Assembly or that non-smokers had gone along to get along. On the contrary; as the press reported midway through the session:

Smoking in the assembly chamber, coupled with the defeat of a bill to provide better ventilation in the room, may cause a rupture in the lower house. Already there’s a break in sight although it is in a more or less humorous stage at present. But some of the members cherish the smoking privilege and when a motion to suspend the no smoking rule was voted down yesterday, they resented it somewhat. Earlier in the week a bill was introduced by Boak to provide ventilation in the assembly and senate chambers. ... There weren’t enough votes to put it over when the roll call was taken but the non-smokers and those persons who insist there’s too much tobacco smoke in the air most of the time had their innings yesterday. They stuck tight to their refusal to permit fellow-members to smoke and there was a real division among the members for the first time. A recess had to be called during the afternoon because so many of the smokers walked out [for?] respite from the smokeless room.343

This standoff was replicated several days later when the House speaker broke a tie vote to defeat yet another motion to suspend the smoking ban.344

At the beginning of the special session in January 1928 the press reported that it was “indicated” that assemblymen would be allowed to smoke during consideration of a motion to “rescind the smoking rule.... Mrs. McGuire told the Assert,” REG, Jan. 22, 1927 (2:2-4 at 4).

342Journal of the Assembly of the Thirty-Third Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1927, at 6, 10, 19, 22, 25, 35, 40, 45, 51, 55, 61, 66, 74, 87, 92, 101, 106, 111, 130, 134, 144, 148, 154, 159, 175, 185, 196, 203, 208, 215, 225, 237, 246, 255, 265, 277, 289 (Jan. 18, 19, 24, 25, 26, 31, Feb. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, Mar. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17) (1927). Men were the movants every day from Feb. 28 to the penultimate day of the session; on the final day McGuire offered the motion, triggering a unanimous vote of thanks.

343“New Set of Candidates Must Be Chosen in 1930 Say Democratic Leaders,” REG, Feb. 19, 1927 (3:2-5 at 5). The Journal did not reflect any Rule 58 motion on Feb. 18 or 19, let alone a defeat.

344“House Lobbying Frowned upon Again by Tandy,” REG, Feb. 23, 1927 (2:5). The Journal merely stated that the motion “lost” without specifying the vote. Journal of the Assembly of the Thirty-Third Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1927, at 134 (Feb. 23) (1927).

1844
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

assembly that she enjoyed holding the smoking club over their head but under the circumstances might relent.”345 How McGuire with her one vote might have been able to wield power on this or any other issue over 36 other legislators the press did not reveal. In fact, while she did offer the first Rule 58 motion, the other seven motions during the 20-day session stemmed from three male legislators.346

At the outset of the regular session in 1929, McGuire “tried hard to offer a resolution” to enabled smoking, but: “While assemblymen, badly in need of a smoke, looked wistfully at her she arose to make the motion but the presiding officer heeded her not and no smoke curled...over the assembly desks.”347 This proceeding raised a different aspect of McGuire’s mysteriously unique power: why were male smokers dependent on McGuire to act at all when in fact any one of them could have moved to suspend the rule himself? In the event, the following day one of the other two assemblywomen successfully moved to suspend Rule 58 for the balance of the session.348

Whatever room female legislators had had at their disposal for accommodating or playing off male smokers and non-smokers against each other disappeared in 1931, when women themselves disappeared from the “unanimously masculine”349 Assembly, whose Rules Committee Resolution No. 5 recommended, inter alia, that Rule 58 be eliminated from the chamber’s permanent rules. Even now, with a sharply divided committee the House speaker had to cast the tie-breaking vote in the chamber at large so that the repeal carried by a vote of 19 to 18.350

Repeal, according to Dana Bennett, a former longtime Nevada legislative 345“House Smoke Rule May Be Rescinded,” REG, Jan. 18, 1928 (2:1).

347“Senate Gives Smoking Right to President,” REG, Jan. 22, 1929 (3:2). The article’s statement that McGuire succeeded the next day does not accord with the Journal. See below.
349“Women Gone; Assembly to Smoke Again,” Nevada State Journal, Jan. 23, 1931 (2:7).
350Journal of the Assembly of the Thirty-Fifth Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1931, at 20 (Jan. 22) (1931); “Tie in Assembly Vote on Rules Broken by Speaker,” REG, Jan. 22, 1931 (2:3). To be sure, the three Republican and two Democratic committee members, despite having submitted majority and minority reports, appear to have agreed on the smoking rule.
research analyst and lobbyist,\textsuperscript{351} “exposed men’s antagonism toward their new colleagues. ... Claiming that the nonexistence of women now permitted the legislators to smoke freely,” the all-male lawmakers “quickly moved to repeal the no-smoking rule and establish men’s right to smoke at will during floor sessions.”\textsuperscript{352} Bennett’s interconnected assertions lacked both an empirical foundation and logical coherence. Since all of the women legislators, as Bennett will shortly be seen to have argued, had purportedly been the smoking male legislators’ benefactors by virtue of their role as the monolithic and chief facilitators of rule suspension, it is unclear why their absence was a prerequisite for rule repeal; this causal-temporal link is especially puzzling since Bennett also contended that their support had been strategic and self-interested rather than charitable or altruistic; in other words, they were acting as calculating politicians who conferred on smoking legislators the right/opportunity to smoke (which cost the women nothing if they were indifferent to secondhand tobacco smoke exposure) in exchange for those legislators’ cooperation in passing the women’s bills. But if the male smokers would not otherwise have voted for those bills and were therefore forced to give up something for the giving free(r) rein to their nicotine addiction, their most rational action would have been to achieve the even superior outcome of total carte blanche (rather than mere hit-or-miss daily or periodic suspensions) without any trade-offs by repealing the no-smoking rule, which the women (who, between 1919 and 1929, occupied a minuscule 2.7 to 10.8 percent of the Assembly seats) would have been powerless to prevent—unless the women had entered into a (complicated and complicating) alliance with the non- and anti-smoking males, about whose existence Bennett mentioned (and may have known) absolutely nothing.

Ignoring or ignorance of those men made it possible to ignore the question as to why legislators had had no “right to smoke at will during floor sessions” during the 55 years preceding women’s advent as legislators. Presumably the principal reason for permanent repeal of the no-smoking rule in 1931 was not, as Bennett imagined, women’s (temporary) disappearance, let alone any shift in the “delicate balance” between the benefits and costs of women’s advocating suspension,\textsuperscript{353} but, rather, the growing ubiquitization of (especially cigarette) smoking, which reduced directly the number of non-smoking male legislators and indirectly that of anti-smoking male legislators, the increasing implausibility of whose stance was a function of the solidifying acceptance of and acquiescence in cigarette smoking as a quasi-natural attribute of social life in the United States, which endured, virtually uncontested, into the 1970s. In this regard repeal in Nevada closely resembled its simultaneous counterpart in Iowa as well as the action by the Nevada Senate in 1923 and other legislatures in the 1920s and 1930s.

Bennett’s arguments (and their brittleness) were embedded in her analysis of Nevada’s early female legislators from 1919 to 1931, for whom she sought to carve out an exceptionalist niche by asserting that they “deliberately permitted smoking,” whereas in other states such as Arizona, “the new female legislators simply tolerated men smoking. In Nevada they actively encouraged it.” Apart from the fact that the minuscule number—ranging from one to four—and proportion of women in the Assembly made it impossible for them to permit or prohibit anything (unless they were able to furnish or withhold the crucial swing votes to reach or deny the requisite super-majority for rule suspension), the reference to Arizona was ironic since, as detailed earlier, Senator Munds had pursued a similarly opportunistic course (as did female legislators in New Hampshire discussed below). Bennett then imputed to the 13 assemblywomen who served between 1919 and 1929 a crafty strategic deployment of their motions to suspend the no-smoking rule, the empirical success of which she, however, never even attempted to document:

[T]he first female legislators maneuvered the antismoking rule to their benefit.... Through the rest of the 1920s, as each of Nevada’s female legislators rose to move the temporary suspension of Assembly Rule No. 58, they revealed their sophisticated political skills and nuanced understandings of group dynamics. They clearly recognized the legislature as a place where rules mattered, cooperation could be beneficial, and battles should be carefully chosen. They acted like politicians. ... Once elected, they played by the rules of the legislative game as it then existed, rather than try to change the game completely. This is particularly noticeable through the haze of cigar smoke. When the first women arrived in the Nevada assembly chamber, they discovered that smoking was a privilege granted by one’s colleagues, and they quickly adopted that strategy. Inviting the male legislators to smoke, but not smoking themselves, female legislators demonstrated that they could work with men without altering men’s behavior or, especially, trying to be men. For ten years, the strategy worked well, and female legislators achieved some legislative successes. By the end of the decade, however, that delicate balance was tilting.

---

355 The press was, therefore, also incorrect in stating that “Women Legislators to Permit Men to Smoke;” Nevada State Journal, Jan. 23, 1923 (4:3).

These far-flung claims raise and ignore more questions than Bennett ever tried to answer. Ironically, the very fact that Bennett, to her credit, was aware of the Nevada legislature’s long pre-1919 tradition of smoking bans and suspensions made even more serious her failure to raise, let alone discuss, the question as to whether the dynamics between male anti-smokers and smokers before and during women’s representation differed from those between non-smoking female legislators and their smoking male colleagues. In other words, did male opponents of smoking deploy their (larger number of) votes in the same opportunistic fashion as all the women (allegedly) did or did they insist on breathing cleaner air regardless of whether that confrontation might have thwarted passage of some legislation they favored? By treating men as an undifferentiated mass, Bennett rendered incoherent her celebration of all the women as not “trying to be men.” Which men—the smoking or the anti-smoking ones, who had been protesting against their tormentors for decades? In other words, would “trying to be men” have entailed smoking or self-protectively “altering men’s behavior” by opposing smoking regardless of the impact on some legislative initiatives? This question, in turn, cannot be explored unless information were unearthed as to whether these anti-smoking male legislators themselves had acted strategically or principledly both before and after 1919.

Bennett’s overlooking the internal male struggles also rendered meaningless her assertion that the women played by the existing “rules of the legislative game”—instead of trying to “change the game completely”—which in this particular instance referred to collegial grants of smoking privileges, which “strategy” they then “quickly adopted.” But in fact the women, by the structural logic of Bennett’s account, did change the game (or the rules) completely: whereas anti-smoking men in the past both created the no-smoking rule and resisted smokers’ efforts to suspend it, the women (purportedly) immediately and persistently capitulated to the smokers even to the extreme of moving for suspensions on their behalf. Nowhere did Bennett explain how or why this invariant active intervention reflected “sophisticated political skills and nuanced understandings of group dynamics.” Indeed, Bennett did not reveal (and it is probably no longer possible to know) whether the (or any) women ever voted against suspension or whether their failure to move for suspension on various days constituted casting a kind of implied strategic Nay, and if it did, what the success rate of each strategy was. Although Bennett asserted that the women had been motivated by the recognition that such “cooperation could be beneficial,” she failed to come to grips with the fact that, since male legislators were not a monolithic bloc but riven between smoking and non-smoking factions, women who sided with the former inevitably ran the risk of alienating the latter, who might well have expected their support in resisting exposure to secondhand smoke. Whatever those cooperative benefits might have been, she nowhere quantified them, merely claiming globally, without any documentation, that “the strategy worked well, and female legislators achieved some legislative successes.” Yet even she was forced to admit that “their success was mixed”—alone because three of them had introduced no bills whatsoever, while all the measures of three others failed.357 Much more intractable methodologically, however, was the lack of any effort by Bennett to correlate passage of certain (or any) bills and the women’s compliant motions for suspension. And even if she had perceived this problem and been able to assemble data to test what should have been an hypothesis, the lack of a control group would still have made it impossible to discover whether the women could have achieved roughly the same level of success even if they had not sought to ingratiate themselves with smokers by facilitating their addiction.

---

Kansas

The pattern of acquiescence soon spread east to Kansas, where it was replicated in the person of Lovonia Myrtle Donica (1881-1942), who during the 1925 session was the only female legislator.358 To be sure, that year’s “New Legisladay”359 was not the first woman elected to the Kansas legislature. That precedent had been set by Minnie Grinstead, whose election in 1918 prompted male House members to wonder whether she would ‘‘nag’’ them for smoking cigars.360 And the longtime WCTU member did not disappoint: the first bill she

358 http://www.kslib.info/legislators/membd.html 360 Kansapedia, on http://www.kshs.org/kansapedia/minnie-j-grinstead/11734 (visited introduced prohibited smoking in public eating places. 361

In contrast, “Miss Donica,” a Republican, teacher, and county superintendent of public instruction, was engaged in a vast understatement when she confided to the press that she “will go to Topeka with no revolutionary ideas.” 362 Not only did she “not intend to vote on legislative measures from a purely feminine viewpoint” or “to fight the men” or “want them to fight me,” she made it clear that, while she had not yet formed an opinion on whether to support the federal child labor amendment, “if she decided it was Russian soviet propaganda as had been stated by its opponents, she would vote against it despite the fact that it had been indorsed by various woman’s organizations.” 363 In the event, Donica must have concluded that conferring power on Congress to limit, regulate, or prohibit labor by under-18-year-olds was a Bolshevik plot: her House floor speech 10 days later opposing it not only struck a blow against its supporters, but amounted to cozying up to her all-male colleagues by belittling her erstwhile female ones: “She warned the gentlemen of the house against the propaganda of the women’s organizations supporting the federal plan, organizations of which she is a member. She said they were accustomed to recommend measures they did not understand...and that their recommendations were not to be taken too seriously.” 364

Both houses of the Kansas legislature had banned smoking for decades 365 and retained those rules through the 1923 session. 366 But in 1925 the House and Senate both dropped the rules 367 —“[t]he first day out they kicked the daylights out of the anti-smoking rule” 368 —and, at least in the House, that change was linked to Donica. On the first day of the session “[f]oes of the ‘fag’ lost the first round...when members of the house rejected a temporary rule of the 1923 session

Feb. 16, 2011).

361 See above ch. 16.

362 “Miss Donica in Capital,” IDR, Dec. 31, 1924 (2:3).

365 See below Table 6.

367 The 1925 Senate rules no longer included the smoking ban. Senate Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-Fourth Biennial Session...1925, at vii-xvi (Jan. 13) (1925). The Rules Committee report recommending amendments did not mention the smoking ban. Id. at 69 (Jan. 28).

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

which forbade smoking during regular meetings.” Republican ranchman W. V. Jackson, the leader of the “attack against tobacco users,” insisted that although “legislators should be the first to obey the anti-cigarette law,” in fact House Rule 70 “never is obeyed and ought to be stricken out.” In contrast, millionaire banker Orlando Jolliffe, who did not smoke and did not “like to breathe the smoke that others make,” urged the rule’s retention, adding that the sergeant-at-arms should be “instructed to enforce it rigidly. ‘Besides,...we have a lady member who doesn’t want to breathe a lot of tobacco smoke. We ought to think of her.’ The lady member, Miss Lovonia Donica...sat mute.” A “thundering majority” nevertheless voted to strike the rule. After the Rules Committee had recommended that the no-smoking rule be dropped from the permanent rules—its chairman expressing confidence that “all the members were perfect gentlemen and would not abuse their smoking privileges”—the House eliminated it. Donica “won the hearts of all the men” when, in response to a resolution that House members refrain from smoking “out of deference to the Lady Member,” she asked that “no special rule be enacted on her account, calling attention to the fact that the chamber was large and the ceiling high and declaring that the smoke would not be in the least offensive to her.” In general, she “oppose[d] any alteration in house rules ‘because there is a lone woman present,’” and although she “appreciate[d] the courtesy intended by sponsors of the [no-smoking] resolution who say my presence prompted it[,]...it would embarrass me to feel that I was interfering with the pleasure of the other 124 members—or as many of them who care to smoke.’” Donica’s acquiescence in smoking was consistent with, if not entailed by, her reflexive support for Republican Party measures: “‘I will not permit my woman’s viewpoint to reflect any prejudice in 369“Won’t Forego Fags While in Session,” HN, Jan. 13, 1925 (2:3). Kansas law prohibited the sale but not the smoking of cigarettes. See above ch. 16.

370“Members in House May Smoke If They Want to Without Violating Rules,” TDC, Jan. 14, 1925 (5:5). On Jolliffe’s role in repealing the statewide sales ban in 1927, see above ch. 16. Ranchman W. V. Jackson successfully moved to amend the motion to adopt the 1923 rules as the temporary rules in 1925 by striking out the no-smoking rule (Rule 70). House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-Fourth Biennial Session...1925, at 4-5 (Jan. 13) (1925).
371“Legislative Notes,” TDC, Jan. 20, 1925 (3:3).
373IDR, Jan. 21, 1925 (6:1) (untitled editorial).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

my voting.” The (male-dominated) press appreciated Donica, ironically noting that when the smoking question arose in the House, “Lovonia didn’t assume that pure, holy, superior air of some of our new world creating feminine political reformers, nor when the boys voted to have their smokes did her nose go up in the air and she make biting comment about boorish, filthy males. ‘It’s all right with me, boys,’ she smiled. ‘Far be it from me to deprive you of the pleasure you get out of it.”

While boasting that she could take a joke at her own expense, she nevertheless explained in a letter to the editor of her local newspaper that the press had not provided a completely accurate account, offering this corrective: “When approached by a number of members of the House who are non-smokers and asked by them whether they should make the stand to have no smoking in the session this year on account of a woman being present, I told them that if the rule were adopted I felt it should be because a majority of the House favored it and not because one woman demanded it.” (On the other hand, Donica had no objection to receiving the privilege of first choice of seats after the speaker and speaker pro tem).

New Hampshire

Beginning in the late 1930s, over several decades several women in both chambers of the New Hampshire legislature systematically and programmatically facilitated smoking by their male colleagues (though by the 1970s other women led the struggle to ban it). The New Hampshire legislature appears to be one of the very few that neither by rule nor by resolution banned smoking. Nevertheless, the fact that in 1931 the House adopted a resolution that “smoking 374“Only One Woman in Kansas Legislature Interested in School Activities,” Lawrence Journal World, Feb. 12, 1925 (4:3-4). There was no such resolution; procedurally, the question was whether the previous session’s rules, including the smoking ban, would be adopted.

375“But Look at the Newspaper She Has Been Reading All Her Life!” IDR, Jan. 23, 1925 (4:3) (reprinted from Chanute Tribune).
be permitted in the House for the 1931 session” presumed must have meant that (as was the case in the U. S. Senate before 1914) an unwritten custom prevailed that members would not smoke. Then at the outset of the 1939 session, the House by a viva voce vote adopted the resolution offered by Republican Mabel Thompson Cooper “that the members of the House of Representatives be permitted to smoke during sessions of the House.”

Ironically, Cooper, a first-term representative and insurance agency owner who went on to serve 12 terms, until the end of her life may have been “an emancipated female of long standing, but that (female) doesn’t go as far as smoking or bending the elbow. Her two pet taboos for women would be smoking and drinking.” Such sexist-suicidal solicitude on behalf of the (male) smokers hardly went unnoticed: at the end of the session the House unanimously adopted this resolution: “Whereas, the lady members at the opening of the 1939 session, voluntarily, thoughtfully and courteously motioned and carried a rule that granted the men members the privilege to enjoy the universal weed tobacco to their heart’s content.... We, the men, wish to express our thanks and appreciation by a rising vote.” At the beginning of the 1941 session Cooper once again came to her addicted male colleagues’ rescue by offering a resolution that House members “be allowed the privilege of smoking during the time the House is in session.” On this occasion, however, after a male representative had spoken against resolution, it was, on a viva voce vote, not adopted. Then Hilda 380 The House rules contained no such prohibition. See above this ch. for references to the Manual for the Use of the General Court of New Hampshire for various years from 1895 to 1961. Press sketches of legislators in 1901 depict two smoking (one a cigarette and the other a cigar) “during the noon hour”; one of them appears to be sitting in his chair in the House chamber. “Thumbnail Sketches During the Noon Hour,” Manchester Union, Jan. 3, 1901 (1:4-6).

---

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Constance Frederika Brungot, on her way to 19 terms and “an all-time world’s record as a woman legislator,”\(^{386}\) intervened. A “conservative Republican” who more than three decades later was “quite against women’s lib,”\(^{387}\) Brungot during the discussion on reconsideration of the first vote told the House that: “Men are better humored, yes, and much better to handle if they have not been denied their smoke.”\(^{388}\) After the chamber had on reconsideration voted viva voce to adopt Cooper’s resolution,\(^{389}\) at least one newspaper credited Brungot, “a mother of six children who doesn’t smoke herself,” with having made it possible for the 422 House members to “smoke during their sessions....”\(^{390}\) By now almost a ritual, the end-of-session resolution once again embodied the male members’ gratitude to the “lady members” for permission to smoke.\(^{391}\)

In 1943, however, the anti-smokers regained the upper hand when, after both the Republican majority leader (future U.S. Senator Norris Cotton) and the Democratic minority leader had spoken in favor of it, by a vote of 203 to 129, the House adopted a resolution that “in recognition of the dignity of our position as members of the state government, smoking during the time the House is in session shall not be allowed.”\(^{392}\) In 1945 virtually the same resolution banning smoking during its proceedings was offered by Republican majority floor leader J. Walker \(^{388}\) “N.H. Solons Vote Right to Smoke,” \textit{Portsmouth Herald}, Jan. 9, 1941 (9:7). See also Gail Parker, \textit{More Than Petticoats: Remarkable New Hampshire Women} 140 (2009): “Hilda later stated that her motives were not simply a maternal concern for the men’s comfort. Being practical, she knew that if they were more comfortable, they would be more likely to agree with her” (from the chapter “Hilda Brungot: 1886-1982: Legendary Legislator”).

Wiggin, who justified it on the grounds that the House “‘represents the people of New Hampshire and should maintain a certain amount of decency and decorum, and avoid having billows of smoke rising to the ceiling which would prove inconvenient to onlookers in the gallery.’” Interestingly, this time Brungot (and other female legislators), “were talked out of taking the issue to the floor for debate, as they wanted to go on record, they later explained, as not wanting special consideration from their male associates.” In the event, the House overwhelmingly adopted the resolution by voice vote.\textsuperscript{393} To be sure, the question of compliance was raised by a photograph of the full House in session from 1945 that clearly reveals two men with cigarettes in their mouths.\textsuperscript{394}

After the “dignity” resolution had once again been adopted, by voice vote, in 1947,\textsuperscript{395} Mabel Thompson Cooper in 1949 once again “assumed a leading part in” what the \textit{Nashua Telegraph} called “the annual comedy in the House to decide whether or not there shall be smoking while the lawmakers are in session. Rep. Cooper was instrumental in getting a resolution to ban smoking killed.”\textsuperscript{396} The House defeated that resolution, which was identical with the text of the 1945 ban, by a vote of 126 to 180.\textsuperscript{397} In April, after having blocked the anti-smokers’ initiative, Cooper, who “declared she did not personally object to smoking,” succeeded in securing “overwhelming” support\textsuperscript{398} for adoption of a compromise pursuant to which “for the remainder of the session, the members of the House shall refrain from smoking until noon, out of courtesy to the visitors in the Gallery.”\textsuperscript{399} How precisely “it would be pleasanter and more dignified not to

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{394}Leon Anderson, \textit{To This Day: The 300 Years of the New Hampshire Legislature} 166 (1981).
\textsuperscript{396}“Concord Notes,” \textit{Nashua Telegraph}, Jan. 13, 1949 (11:1).
\end{flushright}
smoke for the first hour of the session" but would have become less so if the ban lasted all day she did not explain. (The year 1949 also witnessed the intervention of a female colleague in the Senate, when, on July 19, on motion of Republican Sara Otis, “smoking was permitted in the Senate by its members during today’s session.”)

This regime of one daily hour of smoke-freedom in the House became a standard of sorts into the early 1970s when the modern anti-secondhand smoke exposure movement arose. During the 1951, 1953, 1957, 1959, 1961, 1965, and 1967 sessions the House, often at the urging of female members, adopted Cooper’s 1949 no-smoking-before-noon practice. An ahistorical view of this much diluted regulation was presented by a senator in 1961, who attributed it to the House’s having become “concerned with public relations. [T]he House voted, and has continued to vote, that there would be no smoking from 11-12 in order that school children and others in the gallery would not be in a smoke

---

401 Journal of the Honorable Senate [of New Hampshire]: January Session of 1949, at 583 (July 19). Again, this need for permission logically suggests that there must have been a pre-existing prohibition, yet neither did the Senate rules contain such a ban nor did its Journal mention any, suggesting that the ban, as was the case in the U.S. Senate before 1914, rested on custom. Such an understanding may explain a press report in 1947 that the Senate had “for many years prohibited smoking while in session.” “Solons Vote to Ban Smoking This Session,” Concord Monitor and Patriot, Jan. 10, 1945 (1, 6) (copy furnished by Jane Lyman, NH State Library). The same consideration applies to a point of personal privilege raised by Senator Curtis Cummings during the 1950 special session when he asked that senators be permitted to smoke for the balance of the session and the Senate President Perkins Bass granted the privilege. Journal of the Honorable Senate [of New Hampshire]: Special Session of 1949, at 52 (May 18, 1950). Similarly, two years later, when the Senate on a viva voce vote rejected Republican Senator Katharine Jackson’s motion to grant the same privilege, presumably the default rule must have been no smoking. Journal of the Honorable Senate [of New Hampshire]: January Session of 1953, at 240 (May 5). Jackson was married to Bass.
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

haze.” At least one attempt to reduce the no-smoking period failed—a motion in 1955 to suspend the rules to allow smoking during the call of the roll. In other years, the House Journal contains no reference to a resolution regulating smoking at all. At the end of this phase, the 1971 session, which also coincided with the golden anniversary of women’s membership in the legislature, the House paid tribute to Brungot for having, inter alia, “functioned through the years as shepherdess of the male members, sponsoring smoking privileges for them during dreary deliberations....”

In the event, women also led the battle to put an end to smoking in the House. On January 9, 1973, a House session most of which was devoted to a “smoking versus non-smoking debate,” Republican Alice Davis (in her ninth of 10 terms) offered a resolution that no smoking be permitted on the House floor. Her justification was thoroughly in line with that of the burgeoning national anti-smoking movement: “The people that have to sit in here during a long day’s session go out of here with sore eyes and sore throats.... When we have to inhale this second-hand smoke blown out by others, I think it’s an imposition on us as individuals.” Unsurprisingly, Brungot opposed the resolution, as did Republican Malcolm Stevenson, who complained that “a ban would impose hardship on him as a smoker.” He then continued in the jocularly irrelevant vein that still fit within the framework of early discourse on secondhand smoke: “I think I would take to chewing tobacco...and that would be a danger to all who are 404 Journal of the House of Representatives [of New Hampshire]: January Session of 1955, at 79-80 (Jan. 12) (Mr. Spaulding). It is unclear which rule Spaulding was referring to.

---

409 See below Pt. IV.
sitting near me." Despite the quality of his argument, Stevenson succeeded in securing a 215 to 129 majority to table the resolution. Because the House, after defeating Davis’s no-smoking resolution, was “left...without any limitation,” the next day’s proceedings were also “confined mainly to deciding when to smoke and when not to....” In the last hurrah of female-facilitated smoking, the House adopted Brungot’s Cooper-era resolution. In opposing an amendment to prohibit smoking in the legislative hall while members were required to be in their seats, Democratic Minority Leader Ernest Coutemarsh deployed an argument that apparently did not strike a majority as based on a theretofore unknown type of logic: “[P]ointing out that tobacco revenue is important to the state [h]e said it would be inconsistent for the lawmakers to stop smoking in the chamber when ‘we have been trying our best to get everyone who is not a member to smoke the state into solvency.’” The anti-smokers’ weak position was underscored a week later when the House adopted a motion to postpone indefinitely as well Davis’s cri de coeur resolution that at least the “legislative lounge be reserved for non-smokers.”

House anti-smokers finally achieved a major objective in 1975, when, in an inversion of the previous session’s voting arithmetic, the House, by a vote of 234 to 114, adopted Democrat Marian Woodruff’s resolution to prohibit smoking on the floor of the House while it was in session, but to permit smoking at all times in the Legislators’ Lounge and the Sergeant-at-Arms’ Room. Woodruff, a 413 Journal of the House of Representatives [of New Hampshire]: January Session of 1973, at 72 (Jan. 9). Pending was also an amendment by Sara Townsend to water down the resolution by expanding the smoke-free period to the first two hours of the session.

---

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

(second-term) nonsmoker who complained that more than once she had gone home with a headache caused by exposure to the smoke in the House, was reinforced by other members who underscored the unfairness to those with heart or lung problems. At this point, in New Hampshire, as elsewhere, attention shifted to protecting the non-legislative population from secondhand smoke.

No-Smoking Rules in the United States House of Representatives and Senate

For the past season I have heard no complaint as to the ventilation of either the Senate or the House of Representatives, and I have made frequent inquiries of the members of the House, who have said that there it is as good as it need be, or would be except for a novel habit of some novel members who indulge occasionally in smoking in spite of the majesty of the Speaker and the mace of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Neither a dead letter nor universally complied with, the smoking ban in the House of Representatives dating from the early 1870s was sharply contested: from the periodic crescendos of frustration by representatives fed up with exposure to secondhand smoke that were recorded in the Congressional Record as appeals to the speaker, who invariably called on smokers to comply, it is apparent that rule-backed social pressure was in constant demand to suppress an activity that was obnoxious to many adult power-holding men, but that had not yet transformed their smoking peers into pariahs who had internalized the majority’s loathing for the external effects of their addiction. Rather, a kind of equilibrium evolved in this pre-cigarette era, in which anti-smoking congressmen galvanized collective opinion against the acceptability of tobacco smoking in their very public workplace, but had not yet succeeded in prevailing on their own smoking colleagues consistently to conform their behavior to an explicit rule arrived at democratically and without any audible opposition.

In contrast, until well into the twentieth century the ban on smoking in the Senate chamber during public sessions was based on custom and, apparently, secured greater compliance than the formal House rule.

---

422CR 10:3312 (May 13, 1880) (Vermont Republican Justin Morrill).
House of Representatives

The inception of a smoking ban in the United States House of Representatives was remarkably straightforward, albeit contextually mysterious. An unsuccessful effort was undertaken as early as 1822, when, in connection with a general discussion of House rules, Democratic Republican, Robert Wright, a former governor of Maryland, moved as a new rule that “no person shall be permitted to smoke a cigar in the hall nor in the outer lobby of the hall.” Without a division, the House negatived the motion.423 Although conventionally historians recite that “smoking was permitted on the floor until 1871,”424 in 1856 the press reported that: “Little printed cards have been hung up in the hall of the House of Representatives at Washington signed by Speaker [Nathaniel] Banks, direct[ing] the Doorkeeper to prevent smoking on the premises.”425

Nevertheless, a new regime did begin on February 28, 1871. In the middle of his three-term incumbency, Representative Ginery Twichell, a Massachusetts Republican who was the president of the Boston & Worcester Railway and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway,426 apropos of nothing being discussed that day, asked unanimous consent to offer a resolution amending House Rule 65 by adding: “Smoking is prohibited within the bar of the House or the galleries.” His proposal prompted an apparently bewildered Illinois Republican John Farnsworth to object: “This is not necessary. Is not that the rule already?” In clarification, Republican House Speaker James Blaine—a future unsuccessful presidential nominee and two-time secretary of state who was in the second of his three terms as speaker—set the record straight: “There is no rule upon the subject. The Chair has been appealed to by a great many gentlemen to prevent smoking in the House, but he has no power.” This intelligence, in turn, sparked bipartisan “[t]here

---

423 Annals of the Congress of the United States 39:1301 (Mar. 13, 1822) (comp. 1855). Previously, Wright had opposed an amendment—which was also negatived—prohibiting a member from reading newspapers or reading or writing a private letter in his seat during the session. Id. According to the House Journal Wright’s language was slightly different: “No person shall be permitted to smoke cigars in the lobby between the hall and the post office attached to the House.” Journal of the House of Representatives of the United States, Being the First Session of the Seventeenth Congress 353 (1821).

425 South Carolinian (Columbia), Feb. 29, 1856 (2:1) (untitled). Republican Banks, who became a Civil War general, had just recently assumed the speakership.

ought to be a rule” enthusiasm by Indiana Democrat William Niblack (the Democratic Caucus chair) and California Republican Aaron Sargent.” Hearing no objection, Speaker Blaine announced that the rule was agreed to. The House then inserted the new prohibition into Rule 65 of its Standing Rules and Orders for Conducting Business, which The New York Times reported under the rubric, “Reforming Bad Habits.”

A brief overview of the conflicts that broke out in the immediately ensuing years offers a sense of the tenor and frequency of the struggles, which did not even always require member complaints. For example, in 1872 in the midst of a testy procedural dispute over motions to suspend the rules, adjourn, and recess at the time of a debate over building a marine hospital in San Francisco, on his own, Speaker Blaine, “though not connected with this subject,” directed the clerk to read the non-smoking rule aloud. During the final months of the Forty-Third Congress in January-February 1875 the contentious subject burst forth again, this time in connection with the fierce procedural battle that Democrats were mounting to thwart passage of the Civil Rights Bill: with a Democratic majority due to replace the Republican majority in the Forty-Fourth Congress at the beginning of March, Democrats sought to bring the proceedings to a halt by a neverending cascade of motions to adjourn. As yet another such motion was being launched, Radical Republican William Kelley’s request for unanimous consent to be excused from attending that day prompted Kentucky Democrat James Beck to declare: “We will excuse all you gentlemen on that side of the House.” After Kelley had explained that his throat was in such a condition that he was unable to “remain in this atmosphere with impunity,” Beck’s question as to whether any other Republicans wanted to be excused was matched by Indiana Republican Jeremiah Wilson’s request for unanimous consent to excuse “all the gentlemen on the other side of the House...from further attendance,” which the speaker pro tempore, Republican John Cessna, held not in order, “although the Chair would be very happy to entertain it.” At this point Tennessee Republican Horace Maynard, chairman of the Republican Conference, asked for the last clause of Rule 65 to be read. Following the clerk’s recital of the smoking ban,

---

428 Journal of the House of Representatives of the United States 70:522 (Appendix, 1871). It is unclear why, when, or how the rule was changed to read “or gallery.”

429 “Forty-First Congress,” NYT, Mar. 1, 1871 (5:2-4 at 4).

430 Congressional Globe 3389(42d Cong., 2d Sess., May 13, 1872). Remarkably, the two central actors in the debate were Farnsworth and Sargent; two other participants, Garfield and Speer, are mentioned below as involved in smoking disputes.
Maynard explained that: “I ask to have that rule enforced. I do it for the benefit of various persons within the House.” Rather incongruously, Democrat Robert Speer then asked Maynard: “Do the other side intend to smoke us out?” The speaker pro tempore then concluded this series of exchanges by declaring that “the officers of the House are requested to see that the rule is enforced.”

In March 1876, Republican Representative (and future President) James Garfield rose to a point of order: “The heat of this Hall is very great, and the discomfort under any circumstance. I respectfully ask for the reading of the last clause of the sixty-fifth rule of the House, and ask that it be enforced.” After the had clerk had read it aloud, the chairman declared that: “The Doorkeeper will see that this rule is enforced.” A year later, the new speaker, Pennsylvania Democrat Samuel Randall (who “never uses tobacco in any form”), called to the attention of the House that he had received repeated complaints that Rule 65 was being violated on the House floor. The particular complaint that he had received that day stated that non-House members who were there by courtesy of the House were in the habit of smoking within the bar of the House. In addition, however, Randall, revealing both just how insistent he was on compliance with the letter of the rule and underscoring the health hazard linked to smoking, pointed out that he had himself noticed that members sometimes in the hurry of coming from the cloak-room to vote keep their cigars in their hands, but hereafter the Chair requests that members when they come into the Hall of the House from the cloak-room, where they have the privilege of smoking, will see that they do not smoke within the bar. The ventilation of the Hall is a subject of serious complaint and a source of injury to the health of members, and smoking inside the bar of the House increases and augments the difficulty in that respect. The Chair hope that, therefore, from now until the close of the session he will have no further complaints in this respect.

---

431 CR 3:793 (Jan. 27, 1875). A watered down version of the bill eventually passed the House. Id. at 1011 (Feb. 24).
432 CR 4:2056 (Mar. 29, 1876).
433 “The Use of Tobacco,” The Laws of Life: A Family Health Journal 28(6):229 (June 1885). Other congressional “total abstainers from the weed” included both senators from Massachusetts (Dawes and Hoar) and New Hampshire (Blair and Pike), and the Quaker senator from Rhode Island (Chase), as well as two House members New York (Cox and Hewitt). Id.
434 CR 5:1874 (Feb. 23, 1877). At this point, Massachusetts Republican Nathaniel Banks, himself a former House speaker, asked Randall why, if members did not have the privilege of smoking cigars there, half a dozen to a dozen cigar stands were located in that part of the Capitol. After Randall had explained that they were already there when he
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Nine months later Speaker Randall felt compelled to intervene again as a result of repeated complaints “and again this morning....” After the clerk had once again read the prohibitory rule aloud, the speaker declared: “Gentlemen desiring to smoke during the pendency of public business will be kind enough to do so elsewhere than in the Hall of the House.” In the teeth(lessness) of Randall’s admonitions, three months later Tennessee Democrat John Atkins, a Confederate lieutenant colonel, rose to a question of privilege, directing the chair’s attention to the rule. Reduced now seemingly to the role of a mere supplicant, the speaker intoned that: “This rule is known to members as well as to the Chair, and the Chair hopes that members will obey the injunction of the rule.” Once again in 1879 the speaker began the day’s proceedings on April 23 by having the clerk read the smoking ban rule aloud and then launched into yet another admonition: “The Chair has thus far refrained from directing the members of the House to this subject, in the hope that without being reminded of the rule they would see the necessity of abstaining from smoking in the Hall of the House; but to-day the Chair has been requested not to delay any longer to remind members of the existence of this rule. Those who do not smoke complain that members smoke in their seats on the floor. The Sergeant-at-Arms and his deputies will hereafter notify gentlemen who are smoking in the Hall that it is in violation of the rules.”

As a result of the initial revisions of the House Rules in 1880, Rule 65, transformed into Rule XIV (“Of Decorum”), provided, inter alia, that “during the session of the House no member...shall smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms is charged with the strict enforcement of this rule.” Then, as the debate on the rules proceeded, the Rules Committee proposed amending the provision by charging the Doorkeeper as well with strict enforcement of the smoking rule. After Randall, who was participating in debate while a speaker pro tempore was in the chair, had remarked that “[w]e want everybody we can called into the service to prevent smoking in the seats,” the chamber agreed to the became speaker and that he was opposed to them but had transferred the power to grant applications for such stands to a committee, Banks proposed a resolution instructing the committee to forbid the sale of cigars in the portion of the Capitol controlled by the House, but it failed. Id. at 1874-75.

435 CR 6:345 (Nov. 12, 1877).
436 CR 7:716 (Feb. 1, 1878).
438 CR 10:206, 830 (Jan. 6 and Feb. 11, 1880); Asher Hinds, Hinds’ Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States 2:750, § 1136 (1907).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Just three weeks later, when a procedural battle over a bill was raging that involved repeated motions to adjourn and mass unexcused absences, Tennessee Democrat Charles Simonton requested that the no-smoking rule be enforced because the “atmosphere becomes disagreeable when we have to stay here all night. Michigan Republican Omar Conger then denounced this request as a ruse: “This is an attempt to withdraw the Sergeant-at-Arms from his duty. He has been sent to arrest [absent] members and should not be recalled to arrest members for smoking. He is fulfilling the order of the House now.” However, the speaker pro tempore ordered the sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper to enforce the rule. Strengthening the enforcement corps failed to deter congressional smokers: a month later Ohio Democrat Adoniram Warner felt compelled to request enforcement, not on his own account, “but on behalf of ladies in the gallery, from whom I understand complaint is made of the violation” of the smoking prohibition. With this prompt the chair requested the sergeant-at-arms to enforce the rule. Even if the pleas for enforcement recorded in the Congressional Record represented merely the no longer suppressible complaints about a minuscule fraction of infractions, just how frequent and massive those violations were is unclear, though even two interventions by the sergeant-at-arms within a short space of time on a single day were not unheard of. Transgressions resulted in part from the failure of representatives who had actually left the Hall to smoke to extinguish their burning tobacco when hurrying back in to participate in a debate that suddenly compelled their presence. For example, in 1881 Republican Conger wanted the question to be put on a motion he had made even though he did not want it “driven along, but I do not want, while I am back here smoking, to have matters going on without my knowledge.” When Randall, his speakership valedictory only three days off, one last time intoned that “[t]he rule prohibits smoking,” Conger replied: “I asked that the question be put, so that I might go back out of the place where the rules prohibit smoking. I was making 440 CR 10:1853 (Mar. 24, 1880). For an illustration of the huge gap in efficacy between the sergeant-at-arms’ mass arrests of absent members and his enforcement of the no-smoking rule, see CR 7:2944-48 (Apr. 29, 1878).

442 E.g., CR 11:1630 (Feb. 15, 1881).

443 CR 11:2040, 2044 (Feb. 24, 1881).
an unsuccessful effort to comply with the rules. [Laughter.]” Democrat Warner then made it clear that smoking and taking part in floor debate were mutually exclusive: “We have no objection to the gentleman’s retiring to the smoking-room, but we cannot consent that he shall retain while there the right to object.”

That compliance and enforcement left something to be desired was highlighted the following year, when the Cleveland Leader’s new Washington correspondent, Frank Carpenter, turned his attention in one of his regular columns to the question of smoking. Focusing on the House, he asked rhetorically:

Do Congressmen smoke during the session? Why, bless you, yes! I have seen ladies grow sick in the galleries from the vile odor of the tobacco that rises from the two-for-five-cents cigars in the mouths of the so-called gentlemen below. The Congressmen smoke in their very seats, and peer through wreaths of smoke to catch the eyes of members behind them.

As simple and straightforward as the rule was, even the House speakers at times failed to enforce it. These failings were revealed in 1884 in connection with a request for enforcement by Massachusetts Independent Republican Theodore Lyman, a marine biologist, who was, inter alia, a member of the National Academy of Sciences and American Academy of Arts and Sciences as well as a Harvard University overseer. After Lyman had conveyed complaints by women about air in the galleries so bad that they were often compelled to leave, Speaker John Carlisle, a Bourbon Democrat from the leading tobacco producer, Kentucky, “observed with regret” that members had frequently violated the rule and that he had more than once directed the sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper to enforce the rule; he then directed those officers once again to enforce it rigidly on behalf of members on the floor as well. When Carlisle stressed that the no-smoking area encompassed the Hall of the House, the seats, and the lobby, his immediate predecessor, as speaker, Ohio Republican J. Warren Keifer, asked, whether it extended to the part of the Hall outside of the railing. Not only did it, but it also extended to the lobby in the rear of the speaker’s chair; however, Carlisle admitted that he had “never undertaken to enforce the rule strictly in the lobby,” the reason (perversely) being that it was “the most convenient place for members to meet, in order to avoid the disagreeable effect

---

444CR 11:2312 (Mar. 1, 1881).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

In 1886 in connection with a row over allegations that non-members had been present on the floor of the House and the need to define that space, Indiana Republican Thomas Browne observed that many members thought that “they may smoke anywhere outside of the seats without being guilty of an infraction of the rules,” adding the he himself was “in the habit of violating this rule as much as anybody else.” Rejecting the contention of Georgia Democrat Nathaniel Hammond that the smoking issue was “ridiculous in comparison with” the “graver” issue of non-members, Pennsylvania Republican William Brown contended that it was “a matter of a great deal of concern,” particularly to non-smoking House members, and especially because smoking violations were, unlike non-member intrusions, anything but rare. Browne explained that the problem was not the failure to read the rule aloud repeatedly during the session, but the practice of members whose attention was called to the fact that they were smoking in their seats of “simply retir[ing] to the rear of the desks and continu[ing] to smoke at some point there, believing in good faith, I suppose, that they may do so without violating the rule.” Although Browne readily admitted that smoking was “offensive to many gentlemen,” that members should know that the smoking-prohibited space meant “anywhere this side of the cloak-rooms,” and that the smoking rule was “more frequently violated than any other,” the resolution to instruct the Rules Committee to investigate the entire matter was tabled.

Despite this contretemps, the following year the press reported that during the closing session the atmosphere in the House was “well impregnated with tobacco smoke, notwithstanding the repeated appeals of the speaker to the members requesting them to observe the rule which prohibits smoking on the floor.” Fortunately for history, in 1890 Robert Graves, a syndicated Washington correspondent inventoried tobacco use in Congress, naming names. Taking a walk through its deserted halls, inhabited only by renovators and carpenters, on October 7, he noted that: “The only thing that reminded me of the absent statesmen was a smell of tobacco smoke in the cloak rooms.” Attendants confided to him that “the odor of tobacco could not be taken out of these apartments without consuming them literally and wholly by fire. Walls and ceilings and furniture have become so saturated with nicotine during the long session just ended, and the many sessions long and short which preceded it, that their woodwork is like an old pipe.” In the aggregate, he recorded that: “Fully two-thirds of the members of congress smoke. By coming over here and taking a look at our statesmen foreigners are able to see at a glance what a nation of nicotinists we are. Those of our legislative representatives who do not smoke use the weed in the other way. I doubt if there are two dozen men in both houses of congress who do not use tobacco in one way or another.” In addition to these two-thirds cigar smokers and one-third tobacco chewers, Graves was able to identify only one member of congress who “had the nerve to appear in the cloak room of the house with a pipe in his mouth” and only two senators who still used snuff, even though the Senate made an annual appropriation to provide it free of charge. Perhaps the most revealing sign of the times (as well as of the legislators’ age and wealth) was that as far as Graves had been able to see, “there is not one cigarette smoker in congress,” even though 2.5 billion cigarettes were produced in 1890 compared to 4.2 billion cigars.

---

450 In this position Graves appears to have flourished between 1888 and 1895.

New Hampshire Republican Senator Henry William Blair, also a high-profile alcohol prohibitionist, was “the most conspicuous anti-tobacco champion we have in congress....” He would, in Graves’s estimation, “as soon think of throwing himself from the top of the Washington monument as of putting a cigar or a quid of tobacco in his mouth.” However, on the House side Massachusetts Republican Elijah Morse rivaled Blair for the honor of the foremost anti:

When Mr. Morse first came to congress [in 1889] he was very much annoyed by the smoking on the floor of the house. In vain did Mr. Morse endeavor to have the rule strictly enforced. The rule is that no member shall smoke on the floor, but members do smoke on the floor, the rule and Mr. Morse to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. Morse has appealed to the sergeant-at-arms, to the speaker and to the members themselves, but without avail. Tobacco smoke is one of the fixed features of the American congress, and if Mr. Morse doesn’t want to inhale the odor of the tobacco plant he will have to stay out of congress, that’s all.

452 Arthur R. Burns, Production Trends in the United States Since 1870, tab. 44 at 298 (1934).
453 H. W. Blair, The Temperance Movement: or, the Conflict Between Man and Alcohol (1888). For Blair’s hostile allusions to tobacco, see id. at 70, 145.
455 Robert Graves, “The Virginian Weed,” North American (Philadelphia), Oct. 8, 1890 (5:2-3). As an example of violation of the no-smoking rule Graves adduced New York Democrat Amos Cummings, a former editor of the New York Tribune, who had “a trick of Morse’s complaints in 1889-90 are significant because they occurred under the speakership of Thomas Reed, of whom another House member said that during his first term as speaker (1889-91) “smoking was not allowed, not in a single instance.”

During the 1890s, with “the smoke nuisance” having become “the question of the hour,” complaints about smoking in the House increasingly focused on its health consequences. For example, in 1892 the speaker pro tempore, Tennessee Democrat James Richardson, in causing the clerk to read the rule again, noted that several members had “complained that they are ill, and can not remain here if members persist in smoking.” He nevertheless sounded almost apologetic in “appeal[ing] to members not to violate the rule....”

The loopholes were tightened somewhat the following year at the initiative of Morse, a stove polish manufacturer who had been the unsuccessful Prohibition Party candidate for lieutenant governor in 1877. He proposed expanding the existing rule, which covered only members during the session on the House floor, to include “any other person...at any time” on the floor so that “Tom, Dick, and Harry should [not] be permitted before the meeting of the House to fill this Hall with vile cigar, cigarette and pipe smoke....” Morse’s motivation was his observation, during his three-term incumbency, that the “amount of sickness” among his colleagues was “great” and the death rate “appalling”—14 members had died alone during the 1889-90 session—which he attributed, “in no small measure to foul, vile, bad air that we are asked to breathe in this Hall.” Especially in the winter, when the windows were closed, the air was “blue with this vile 456Sanitary Conditions of the Capitol Building, Etc. 8 (H. Rep. No. 1980, 53d Cong., 3d Sess. Mar. 2, 1895) (Rep. Joseph Walker). On at least one occasion in 1890 Speaker Reed did say that his attention had been “called to what is either a case of smoking in the gallery or of smoking on the floor so that it seems to be in the gallery. The Chair hopes that the rule of the House will be obeyed alike by members and individuals in the galleries. The doorkeepers will see that order is preserved in the galleries.” CR 21:8343 (Aug. 8, 1890).

457“A Smoke Nuisance,” DP, Dec. 5, 1893 (3:6). The press reported that Interior Secretary Hoke Smith had issued a fiat that “the infantile clerk who infests the department with his cigarette shall be crushed. He will be called upon to decide whether his smoke or his job is more valuable to him. Smoking by the official force during office hours is to be squelched.”

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

smoke to such an extent that you could scarcely see across the room, and this is especially offensive to our lady visitors in the galleries.” Without, unfortunately for the sake of a quantitatively curious posterity, providing any numerical estimates, Morse referred to the group on whose behalf he was seeking to regulate: “There are a good many members of this Congress, as well as its predecessors, who do not use tobacco in any form, and a smaller number to whom it is downright offensive and poisonous.” Willing to grant “all deference” to smokers, Morse nevertheless insisted that non-smokers did “have some rights in this matter, and that our convenience and health ought to be a subject of some little consideration as well as theirs.” Morse’s pleading climaxed with a religious analogy: “The children of Israel, under Divine direction, established what was known as ‘cities of refuge.’ The Committee on Rules have in their wisdom established in this vast building at this end one ‘city of refuge’ for nonsmokers by forbidding the members to smoke in this Hall.”

In the end, as The New York Times reported the next day, “[e]nough members agreed with” Morse that “this room of all others ought not to be turned into a bacterial machine for the propagation of disease” that the House adopted his amendment strengthening the rule prescribing spatial segregation of smokers. Two years later, in reporting that “Stove Polish Morse” was proposing to “banish tobacco smoking from the House of Representatives,” the Memphis Commercial Appeal treated him as a self-righteous officious intermeddler: “Because Mr. Morse is virtuous shall there be no more cakes and ale? ... The average statesman could not endure the good habits of Mr. Morse.”

460 CR 25:1147-48 (Sept. 1, 1893). Morse went on to declare: “Every other part of this vast building, except the Senate chamber, the lobbies, the corridors, the Rotunda, the committee rooms, and every part of the building, except these Halls, are open to smokers.” Id. at 1148. Presumably the first “except” was a typographical error; its presence not only subverts Morse’s manifest meaning, but creates a grammatical error since “part” does not agree with “are.”

463 Commercial Appeal (Memphis), Nov. 26, 1895 (4:3) (untitled edit.). The editorial failed to mention the specifics of Morse’s new proposal, but Morse expressed the belief that there would be “enough gentlemen” in the next House to “enable him to get through his oft defeated measure for the prohibition of smoking in the house.” “Personal and General Notes,” DP, Nov. 22, 1895 (4:5-6 at 6). See also “To Abolish Smoking,” Lowell Daily Sun, Nov. 27, 1895 (4:1).
Even after the innovation, in June 1894, in the midst of a floor discussion of ventilation in the Hall of the House, Tennessee Democrat Benjamin Enloe complained to his assembled colleagues that: “Despite that rule I have seen—particularly during the consideration of the tariff bill when we had long continuous sessions requiring the continued presence of members—I have seen the atmosphere of this Hall so dense with tobacco smoke that you could scarcely see persons in the galleries. Members of the House were violating the rules and smoking their cigars in this Hall, making the atmosphere impure, giving themselves and the visitors in the galleries headaches, and disgracing the American Congress.”

That conflicts over smoking continued to disrupt the House was manifested on March 2, 1895, the last day of the Fifty-Third Congress and of Democratic control of the chamber, when Indiana Democrat William Bynum rose to a point of order requesting that the no-smoking rule be enforced. Outgoing Speaker Charles Crisp, a Democrat from Georgia, transcended the traditional appeal for compliance by noting not only the pervasive noncompliance, but also the intensity of the nonsmokers’ demands for protection and the untoward political consequences of their continued exposure: “While we all know that this rule is very much disregarded, yet the Chair appeals to gentlemen, in view of the probably protracted character of the session, to observe this rule. There are many gentlemen on the floor who have privately said to the Speaker that if the smoking be persisted in they will be forced to absent themselves from the Hall.” Crisp then requested that smokers go to the Speaker’s lobby or the cloak room if they wanted to smoke.

The very same day the Joint Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics and Public Buildings and Grounds submitted its report, Sanitary Condition of the Capitol Building, Etc., which concluded that smoking was “largely accountable for the bad air complained of” in the House and that enforcement of the House smoking rules and abstention from tobacco use there would contribute to purifying the air from its “present unhealthy condition.”

A few days after Republican “Czar” Thomas Reed had begun his second term as House Speaker in December 1895, A. Maurice Low, a British-born journalist who was the Boston Globe’s Washington correspondent, described the smoking scene in the House:

---

464 CR 26:5993 (June 8, 1894). Enloe also accused the smokers of “violating the proprieties of life by smoking in the presence of ladies....”

Mr. Reed has always been opposed to the practice of smoking on the floor while the house is in session, and although the rules prohibit it, the rule has been more honored in the breach than the observance.

When Mr. Reed was speaker in the 51st congress he drove the smokers off the floor, and this year he is more determined than ever that members who want to smoke must retire either to the cloak rooms or the corridors or else go outside.

Today on two separate occasions he sent pages to two members to tell them that smoking was in violation of the rules. Both of the members when they received the message looked somewhat surprised, but at once they threw their cigars away. Curiously enough both members were republicans.467

The congressional struggle for protection from secondhand tobacco smoke exposure and its grounding in health considerations reached a higher plateau in 1896 when Iowa Republican David Henderson, soon to become speaker himself, but for now chairman of the Judiciary Committee and, next to the speaker—Thomas Reed, who three decades later was still credited with not permitting smoking on the House floor468—the highest-ranking member of the Rules Committee,469 presented the latter’s proposed rules revisions to the House. Henderson’s role here was noteworthy since he opposed liquor prohibition and had a “legendary reputation as a heavy tippler,” though he also “crusaded against intemperance.”470 The change in question consisted simply in striking the word “other” from Morse’s amendment so that by now reading, “Neither shall any person be allowed to smoke upon the floor of the House at any time,” it prohibited members from smoking there as well. Prompted by Mississippi Democrat Thomas Catchings to explain this “amendment of very great importance” to the House so that members could grasp its “full significance,“471 Henderson limned its reach and basis:

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose from the manifestation of applause on the part of the House that this provision is thoroughly appreciated. ... Under the present rule smoking is prohibited only during the sessions of the House and on the floor of the House—within this Hall. Under the amendment reported from the committee smoking is never to be allowed before or after the sessions in this Hall. It is absolutely prohibited here.

468 Robert Luce, Legislative Assemblies: Their Framework, Make-Up, Character, Characteristics, Habits, and Manners 637 (1924).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Many Members. That is right.

Mr. HENDERSON. The cloakroom is not a part of the House....

The theory of the committee in making this recommendation was briefly this: It is well known that many ladies are compelled to leave the galleries of this House because of the impure air resulting from the practice of smoking. This evil is not averted by discontinuing smoking during the sessions of the House if it goes on upon this floor one, two or three hours before the gavel falls for the commencement of business. The committee believe that at all times the air of this Legislative Hall should be exempt from the polluting influence of tobacco in this form, so that the American citizen desiring to look down upon Congress from our galleries may do so without suffering the contaminating influence of tobacco smoke. [Applause.]

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I believe that since I have had a seat in this body members have been killed not alone because of the polluting effects of tobacco, but generally because of the impure air in this Hall. I think this provision will be a great step toward the preservation of the health of this body. [Cries of “Vote!” “Vote!”]

The question being taken, the amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to. [Loud applause.]472

Both Henderson’s starkly aggressive and accusatory anti-smoking language, culminating in the charge that tobacco “killed,” and the wide, enthusiastic, and boisterous resonance that it elicited from congressmen suggest that even in the period before the breakthrough of mass cigarette smoking, a significant proportion of adult males not only did not smoke tobacco, but intensely resented the involuntarily inhalation of tobacco smoke and welcomed liberation from it.473 That Henderson himself had internalized the limits of the contest that smokers and nonsmokers were engaged in he revealed the very next day when he stated during debate that “since we have established a more strict rule against smoking, a larger latitude may be needed in that respect outside of this Hall, and gentlemen desiring to smoke who have hitherto indulged upon the floor may be driven into these corridors to enjoy their cigars.”474

---

473 Press coverage focused on the new rules’ design to centralize power, control members, and stifle debate; the smoking ban was mentioned only perfunctorily. E.g., “Making the House Harness,” NYT, Jan. 11, 1896 (3). One important paper did report that the smoking ban was received with “general applause.” “New Rules for the House,” New-York Tribune, Jan. 11, 1896 (13:2-3).

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Yet four months later Kentucky Republican Samuel Pugh rose to an ironic parliamentary inquiry: “While we are laboring here with closed doors in this dense atmosphere in the presence of this magnificent assemblage of ladies who grace with their presence this kindergarten performance of the national schoolhouse, I would like to know whether a call of the House suspends the rule against smoking in the Hall?” After the speaker pro tempore had informed him that anyone who smoked was infringing the rule, Pugh revealed that: “Not only one, but quite a number of those present have been infringing the rule, and while it may be fun for the boys on the floor, it must be very disagreeable to the ladies and other visitors in the galleries.”

Even when Henderson became speaker he was not only compelled to continue the ritual readings of the rule and admonitions—“and this [was] never more necessary than at the close of a session of Congress”—but, at least on one occasion, he had to point out that he had “learned that officers of the House, when calling attention to smoking, even during the session, have been very severely spoken to by members.” More pleading than leading, Henderson was “glad to say that he is not advised who any of these members are; but appreciating this rule and its object—the comfort of the persons in the Hall and galleries, as well as the health of members—the Chair trusts that every pains [sic] will be taken by members to observe this rule; and if, forgetting it for a moment, one of these subordinate officers should call attention to it, it is hoped that members will appreciate the fact that he is discharging a duty and not desiring to be offensive to any member.” The speaker’s plea to representatives to be nice to the sergeant-at-arms was a far cry from the latter’s rule-bound duty, which he was still performing in the late-nineteenth and early-twentieth century, to bear the mace vis-a-vis contumacious members and, if need be, arrest them. In 1901, five years after having closed the loophole, Speaker Henderson indirectly admitted that the nation’s lawmakers did not understand a brief, unambiguous rule: “Many members have been under the impression in the past, without having carefully examined the rule, that they could smoke in this Hall when the House is not in session. That is against the rule.” Rather than rebuking them for their sloth, negligence, or lack of comprehension, he cheerfully “trust[ed] that every member of the House will feel it to be a pleasure to aid in the enforcement of this most needed rule. [Applause.]” 476 CR 33:6224 (May 29, 1900).

---

The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

On February 1, 1915, when the Henderson’s 1896 rule was still in force, Speaker Champ Clark, according to the Western Tobacco Journal, “came down heavily...on one of the supposed immutable rights of the members of Congress.” Speaking in a “honeyed...tone which gave no portent of the ominous declaration he was about to make,” Clark stated that he desired to make a statement before taking up the next bill: “The rules of the House prohibit smoking inside of this Hall. Complaint has been made to the Chair more than once about Members smoking in the Hall. Now, there is plenty of space outside of this Hall for gentlemen to smoke. And while the Chair is at it, he will suggest it is a good thing for Members to keep their feet down from the tops of the seats. [Applause.]”

Senate

The Chairman [South Carolina Democrat Rep. George Shell, Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics]. Colonel Bright, is it the habit and practice of the members of the Senate to smoke in the Senate Chamber while it is in session?

Mr. [Richard] Bright [Senate Sergeant-at-Arms]. No, sir. The rule of the Senate would require if a Senator was smoking in the Senate Chamber for him to be notified promptly. ... The cloakroom is used for a smoking room, and I do not remember to have ever seen a Senator smoking a cigar in the Chamber. ... If it was my own grandfather, and he was a Senator, I would notify him. That is mandatory on the part of the rule of the Senate.

In contrast, not until 1914 did the U.S. Senate vote to protect its nonsmoking members from secondhand smoke exposure by amending its rules so that “no smoking shall be permitted at any time on the floor of the Senate, or lighted cigars be brought into the Chamber”—a rule that remains in effect today (as Rule 33),

---

481 CR 52:2823 (Feb. 1, 1915).

483 S. Res. No. 42, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. (1914), amending Senate Rule 34. Similarly, at the turn of the century the U.S. Supreme Court held “cigarets as an abomination, though it gives a respectful place to the custom of smoking tobacco. In the clerk’s room there is displayed a large notice—‘Cigaret Smoking Prohibited’—but cigars may be freely used.” “Still Using Quill Pens,” Davenport Republican, May 18, 1901 (7:5).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

strengthened by the ban in 1979 on lighted cigarettes and pipes. Until then, according to the Senate Historical Office, by unwritten custom, "senators never smoked in the chamber during public sessions," but "happily brought out their cigars whenever the Senate went into executive session to consider nominations and treaties." This regime, in fact, turns out to have been considerably more blurred than that global account suggests, but before filling in some of the gaps, 486 http://www.senate.gov/artandhistory/history/minute/Smoking_Ban.htm (visited May 26, 2010). Senators did, however, use snuff and chew (and spit) tobacco during public sessions. Telephone interview with Donald Ritchie, Senate Historian, Washington, D.C. (May 27, 2010). Purportedly, it was not until 1889 that it was publicly known that senators smoked during executive sessions. New Hampshire Republican Senator Henry Blair, an ardent supporter of alcohol prohibition and an opponent of tobacco, “gave away a secret of executive sessions by saying that ‘if Senators would not smoke during executive sessions the air in the Senate chamber need not be complained of. This was [a] bombshell. [I]t was never known before that smoking was one of the customs indulged in during those conclaves. We all know that Representatives smoke their cigars on the floor of the House...but that body of most potent, grave and reverend seigniors, the United States Senate, never before was suspected of permitting the ignition of a cigar during either open or executive sessions. [T]hat smoking was indulged in—who would have thought it?” Smith D. Fry, “From the Capital,” Milwaukee Daily Journal, May 25, 1889 (3:1). Fry was a syndicated Washington columnist; this article also appeared, e.g., as “Washington Letter,” Elyria Democrat, May 23, 1889 (6:4-5). Eighteen years later, the Washington Post insisted that the “secret” that senators smoked during executive sessions was not revealed until 1907, when, after the end of a brief secret session, which, contrary to the expectation of a dozen smoking senators, was not adjourned without reopening the doors, “assistant sergeant-at-arms and pages were kept busy for at least five minutes warning Senators that they were transgressing the rules against smoking in the open sessions of the Senate.” Ultimately the officials “succeeded in banishing every cigar” except that of Henry Cabot Lodge (the body’s only holder of a law degree and a Ph.D. from Harvard); they “created much hilarity by their efforts to lasso Mr. Lodge’s cigar. They would plant themselves squarely in front of him to attract his attention, but the Massachusetts Senator was evidently not a hypnotic subject. He failed to see them. He would suddenly shift his position or turn around, and then the sergeant-at-arms and his scouts would shift again, and again line up at ‘Present arms.’ But Mr. Lodge smoked on.” At the end of the open session, “Lodge, his cigar still firmly planted between his teeth, marched out, unmindful that he had created such a flutter by his unconscious defiance of Senate rules.” “Smoked in Senate Chamber,” Washington Post, Feb. 3, 1907 (6) (copy provided by Katherine Scott, Assistant Historian, U.S. Senate Historical Office).

it is useful to examine the Senate’s regulation of smoking outside of the chamber.

As early as March 15, 1884, the Senate Rules Committee adopted Rules for the Regulation of the Senate Wing of the United States Capitol, under Rule XIII of which smoking in the elevator was “strictly forbidden.” By 1896 the prohibition was extended to elevators, corridors, and passageways. Possibly this expanded rule had its origins in 1890, when, according to a report in The New York Times, the sergeant-at-arms, “under instructions from” third-term Kansas Republican Senator John Ingalls, the president pro tempore, issued an “order” forbidding any person “(except Senators, of course)” from smoking in any corridor in the Senate wing of the capitol. Whereas, pursuant to this order, “[g]entlemen with lighted cigars in sight will be stopped by policemen or doorkeepers when they attempt to cross the line between the central building at the north wing, and given an opportunity to put their cigars out or turn back[,] Senators...will continue to sit in the doorways of the cloak rooms and puff out little clouds of tobacco smoke, to float up for the benefit of the ladies and gentlemen occupying the visitors’ galleries.”

---

487 Rules for the Regulation of the Senate Wing of the United States Capitol: Adopted by the Committee on Rules, March 15, 1884, at 8 (1884). See also Standing Rules for Conducting Business of the Senate of the United States 46 (1890).

489 “A Little Steal Stopped,” NYT, Aug. 9, 1890 (2). For further evidence of the difference between the House and Senate mentioning that police made visitors throw away their cigars when approaching the Senate wing, in which no smoking was allowed except in the cloak rooms, see “Plumb and Prohibition,” Galveston Daily News, Aug. 25, 1890 (6:1). The president pro tempore was empowered by the Senate rules to enforce the Rules Committee’s orders for the use of the Senate wing of the capitol. Since Ingalls frequented the smoking room (Willis Hawkins, “Nast in Washington,” LAT, June 22, 1890 (9:1-3)), his animus against tobacco smoke might be puzzling but for a newspaper article many years later that claimed that Ingalls had complained about smoke wafting into the chamber from the corridors or cloakrooms; in fact, the smoke had resulted from burning waste. “Smoked in Senate Chamber,” Washington Post, Feb. 3, 1907 (6). Ingalls was a reactionary, whom the Populists unseated in 1891. Scott McNall, The Road to Rebellion: Class Formation and Kansas Populism, 1865-1900, at 174, 274, 276 (1997). Ironically, several years later, the chief newspaper in his hometown in Kansas referred to the “queer rules” of the Senate under which “[a]lmost hourly some man is asked to stop smoking a cigar” as he walked from the House- to the Senate-controlled half of the capitol: “The American house of lords has shut down upon tobacco smoking in its half of the capitol, save in committee rooms and the senators’ lobbies. It is often comical to watch the
The broader prohibition was prompted by Senator “Pitchfork” Ben Tillman, the white supremacist from South Carolina, who, being “very sensitive to the odor of tobacco,” in February 1913 complained about smoking during the Senate’s executive sessions, but, in the absence of a rule covering the matter, failed to have it banned. He then announced that he planned to introduce a resolution prohibiting smoking at all times in the Senate chamber on the grounds that there was no more reason to permit smoking in closed than in open sessions: “‘Many men object to tobacco smoke and just because they are members of the senate they should not be compelled to sit where they must submit to it.’” 490

Soon thereafter he introduced two identical resolutions to ban smoking in the Senate chamber. 491 A year later, after the Rules Committee had reported the resolution without recommendation, 492 Tillman was finally able to secure its consideration. 493 He sought the ban because four years earlier he had been paralyzed and tobacco smoke began to nauseate him. He was well aware that “a large majority” of senators were smokers, whom, “unfortunately, a pernicious habit has so mastered...that they are nervous and miserable when they do not get the nicotine poison which soothes their nerves. Consequently, as soon as the doors are closed for executive session they light their cigars and puff away, and the Chamber soon has the appearance of a beer garden.” He complained that since the smoke forced him to leave the Chamber, it infringed on his rights as a senator, whereas the smokers could go to the cloakrooms to smoke; similar circumstances prevailed in the Democratic caucus, so that he was “beset with the danger of being driven out of the party and of the Senate itself....” (He nevertheless opined that tobacco was “in moderation....harmless....”) In response to a letter that Tillman wrote in May 1913 to all his colleagues seeking their opinion and urging them to adopt the ban he received replies from almost all; one of their most interesting features was that “the nonsmokers are far more anxious lest they have the appearance of selfishness than some of the smokers.” He had the Senate secretary read an outstanding exemplar of this genre, which not only represented an extreme version of going along to get along in politics, but illustrated, several decades before the zenith of nearly ubiquitous cigarette smoking, the coercive power of social pressure to acquiesce in exposure to secondhand smoke even when the large minority of nonsmokers was keenly aware of negative physical consequences. In the letter non-smoking Vermont Republican Carroll Page replied that “I accept with best possible grace the discomforts that result from the gratification of their [his smoking colleagues’] appetites for tobacco. ... I enjoy making sacrifices for my friends, and regard this as one of the qualities of a gentleman.” Page would also have been pleased to make “any reasonable sacrifice” on Tillman’s behalf, but he wanted to act so that he did not seem to be what he really hoped he was not, “selfish, and I should seem selfish if, disliking the intense smoke of the Senate, which sometimes reaches a density that is quite offensive, I should act from a selfish standpoint and vote against smoking in the Senate.” Tillman also had read aloud the letter of a smoker, New York Republican Elihu Root, a wealthy Wall Street lawyer, who had been secretary of war and secretary of state, and was supremely centrally situated in the U.S. political economy. Root allowed as the informality and freedom of executive sessions, which prevented frictions and unnecessary delay, was “a good deal aided by the fact that the Members are at liberty to smoke.” Though personally willing to “forego [sic] the privilege” if it inconvenienced Tillman, Root—who had received the Nobel Peace Prize the previous year for his contribution to international arbitration—suggested “a general understanding as to the conduct to be observed when you are present without making a new rule.”

American citizen, the independent sovereign of this land of ours, as he is requested by a member of the capitol police to remove the cigar from his mouth.” “Senate Exclusive,” Atchison Daily Globe, June 3, 1896 (2:8).

Amusingly, during the latter half of the first decade of the twentieth century, while he was secretary of state, Root was “Tobacco’s man in the higher circles of government”: when the Justice Department began considering antitrust prosecution of the American Tobacco Company, its general counsel, Williamson Fuller, “persuaded Root to defend the Tobacco position within the Administration and, if possible to prevent an antitrust suit.” In the event, the Senate agreed to Tillman’s resolution unanimously.
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

The rule was apparently enforced: for example, in 1922, when senator-elect Burton Wheeler created the “unusual but brief spectacle” of smoking a cigar on the Senate floor, another senator sent a page to inform him of the rule.497 This nationally widely reported incident prompted one newspaper to editorialize that the “rule is a never-ending source of joy to anti-tobacco crusaders.... It is creditable to the senate that the rule against smoking is maintained. [O]n the floor of the chamber there is greater dignity when the faces of the speakers are not hidden by clouds of tobacco smoke.”498 And even when Huey Long a decade later walked up the aisle holding a lighted cigar, whose ashes he “flicked...all over the carpeted floor,” as he was being sworn in, everyone understood that his violation of the Senate rule was just one of his many intentional provocations.499

Ironically, if Tillman’s account, according to which even prior to 1914 senators had in fact abstained from smoking in the chamber during public sessions (“[w]hen the executive session is not on they have to go to the cloak rooms to smoke”),500 is credited, senatorial compliance with custom was much stricter than House compliance with a formal written rule.501 Interesting light was shed on the purportedly reflexive conformity by an “unusual scene”502 involving senior Republican Senator Joseph Hawley of Connecticut and Sergeant-at-Arms Richard Bright, who, during his own long Senate career, “had become an authority on the Senate’s rules, procedures, and customs.”503 The incident, which was memorialized by the Chicago Tribune, took place during a public session on the Senate floor in 1897 when Hawley and Bright were seated near Hawley’s desk engaged in conversation:

source for this erroneous assertion.

497“Smokes Cigar in Senate,” NYT, Dec. 8, 1922 (3).

498“Smoking Prohibited,” BT, Jan. 18, 1923 (4:3) (edit.) (reprinted from Pittsburgh Sun).

500Congressional Record 51:4531 (Mar. 9, 1914).

501In 1941 Michigan Republican Representative George Dondero, a stickler for rules, charged that the no-smoking rule was “honored more in its breach than in its observance,” albeit “in most instances behind the rail, nevertheless on the floor.” CR 87:4483 (May 27, 1941). Eight years later he stated that the rules was “grossly violated by many members....” CR 95:537 (Jan. 25, 1949).

502“Jail for Rich Men,” CT, Apr. 21, 1897 (1).

503http://www.senate.gov/artandhistory/history/common/generic/SAA_Richard_Bright.htm
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

One of the most rigid rules of the Senate Chamber prohibits smoking on the floor at any time and no one is more punctillious [sic] about observing the rules of the Senate than Gen. Hawley.... Apparently oblivious of the sensation that his act was about to create Senator Hawley drew a cigar from his pocket and striking a match on his boot heel proceeded to light his fragrant weed and waft the smoke upwards into the gallery. There were few Senators on the floor at the time and those who were there paid no attention to the breach that was being committed by Senator Hawley, and he puffed away for quite a while with a zest that showed that he was enjoying his cigar. There came a pause in the conversation, however, during which the Connecticut Senator took the cigar from his mouth and for the first time seemed to realize the enormity of his offense in breaking through a strict Senate regulation. He looked at the cigar, then he looked at Sergeant-at-Arms Bright in a quizzical, hesitating way as if trying to see what effect this breach would have upon that functionary, and then both their faces were wreathed with smiles. Not a word passed, but Senator Hawley, rising from his seat, took Col. Bright by the arm, and both of them ambled off to a Senate cloak room where the...Senator probably finished his seed leaf cigar in comfort.

That senators were also otherwise known to comply systematically with the custom was evident from a New York Times piece in 1882 that mentioned in passing that a speech that a senator was reading on the floor “most of the Senators could hear only from the cloak-rooms, to which they had retired to smoke their after-lunch cigars.”

Nevertheless, scattered press mention of congressional smoking in the latter part of the nineteenth century suggests Senate violations may have been widespread. For example, in 1873, Grace Greenwood, the pen name of Sara Jane Lippincott, the first woman journalist to report from Washington, where she was a New York Times correspondent for years, complained about the “bad air” in the Senate and House galleries, which was “very much mixed with cigar-smoke from the ante-rooms and the breaths of seventy-five Senators.” And the next year the Times reported that: “Some members have been known to smoke in their seats in the Houses of Congress, and they would often do so if the rules against it were not enforced.

One of the most eloquent strands of evidence documenting senators’
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

willingness to refrain from smoking on the floor and to have recourse instead to the cloak room arose, ironically, in connection with the chamber’s rejection of a proposed ban on smoking in executive branch office buildings. This initiative emerged as an immediate response to the fire on January 10, 1921 that destroyed irreplaceable census manuscript schedules in the Commerce Department building.\(^{509}\) The very next morning Utah Republican Senator Reed Smoot, a right-wing businessman who was both a very high-ranking member of the Mormon church hierarchy and chairman of the Public Building Commission, which was in charge of housing federal government activities, stated on the floor of the Senate that, against the background of four other recent fires in government departments, which had been reportedly “started by employees carelessly throwing down a lighted cigarette stub,” he could “not conceive of a fire starting” in “what was supposed to be a fireproof vault...unless it came from carelessness on the part of an employee, and more than likely from a lighted cigarette stub.” He therefore concluded that “the time has arrived when there should be an order made in all the departments that while employees are at work smoking shall be prohibited.”\(^{510}\) Four days later he introduced a bill embodying this proposal:\(^{511}\)

That any person who shall smoke, or carry a lighted cigar, cigarette, pipe or any form of tobacco for smoking purposes, in any building in the District of Columbia, which is owned by the Government of the United States and used by any executive department or independent establishment of the Government, including the respective field services of such departments or establishments, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and when convicted thereof shall be fined not more than $50.\(^{512}\)

Without spelling out the basis for such a construction (of “executive department or independent establishment”), The New York Times claimed that a 509“Fire Ruins Records,” \textit{WP}, Jan. 11, 1921 (1): “Census Records Lost in Washington Fire,” \textit{NYT}, Jan. 11, 1921 (1). To historians’ dismay, almost all of the 1890 census manuscript schedules were destroyed, but more by the tons of water that the fire fighters poured on to the fire than by the flames. The documents’ exact condition during the interim before the Commerce Department, with the approval, acquiescence, and authorization of the Census Bureau, Library of Congress, and Congress, physically destroyed them in 1934/35 is unclear. Kellee Blake, “‘First in the Path of the Firemen’: The Fate of the 1890 Population Census,” \textit{Prologue} 28(1):64-81 (Spr. 1996), on http://www.archives.gov/publications/prologue/1996/spring/1890-census-1.html.

511\textit{CR} 60:1440 (Jan 15. 1921) (S. 4853).

“strict interpretation” would also make it unlawful for the president in the White House, senators and representatives in the cloakrooms, and Supreme Court justices in their chambers to smoke. To be sure, though Smoot was said to be intent on pressing for quick action on the bill, it was “certain to be opposed by many Senators of both parties.”

In the event, instead of proceeding with S. 4853 as an independent bill, Smoot secured its adoption by the Appropriations Committee, of which he was the ranking majority member, as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriations bill (H.R. 15422), of which he was in charge. His anti-smoking proposal provoked a multidimensionally revelatory debate lasting almost two hours in the Committee of the Whole on February 5. Interpreting the amendment as not applying to the Congress, Arkansas Democrat Joseph Robinson—the soon-to-be Senate minority and later majority leader, who did not smoke and “suffers a good deal physically when others smoke about him”—wanted to know why the prohibition was confined to executive departments because: “I apprehend that it would work great inconvenience and discomfort to thousands of persons employed in the Government service, and it seems to me it ought to be made universally applicable if adopted rather than applied to certain classes.”

Smoot’s initial response was that the purpose was to protect not only buildings, but also government records, while the Capitol and Senate Office Building were excluded both because they were fireproof and because they housed few records. Robinson contested this latter point, but he was centrally concerned with the alleged unfairness and unreasonableness of senators’ prohibiting the secretary of state, attorney general, and other cabinet secretaries from smoking in their offices while exempting themselves from this ban. At this juncture Smoot shifted his own focus away from fire protection and toward a theme that would not begin to resonate for decades: “I do not think there has ever been anything suggested in the Senate that has met with such popular approval 514 The account of the congressional debate provided by Smoot’s biographer is marred by his ignorance of Smoot’s high-profile bill and his false assumption that Smoot was concealing his authorship of the amendment. Milton Merrill, Reed Smoot: Apostle in Politics 162-63 (1990).

515 CR 60:2627-28 (Feb. 5, 1921); “Harding May Smoke in the White House,” NYT, Feb. 6, 1921 (3). The texts of the bill and the amendment were identical except that the latter extended coverage to buildings that the U.S. Government also rented or leased. According to one news report, the Government was renting the Commerce Department building. “Census Records Lost in Washington Fire,” NYT, Jan. 11, 1921 (1).

516 CR 60:2629 (Feb. 5, 1921).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

by the employees of the Government as this very proposition. I have had thousands of letters giving a description of what takes place in the departments, and...there is an immense amount of time lost in all of the departments through the smoking that is going on in them."

He then quoted from a letter from a chief clerk of a division who confided: “The smoking employee thinks more of his smoking than he does of his work. He will stand around with a cigar in his mouth, sometimes a cigarette or a pipe, and talk to others who do not smoke, blowing the smoke in their faces, and he will sit at his desk making the room blue with smoke, like an old-fashioned country tavern, regardless of women or others who may be compelled to work in the same room. ... Furthermore, the loss of time and labor on the part of this army of smokers— they all stick together—as they stand around in the toilet rooms and elsewhere taking their smoke, which occurs regularly several times a day, is far greater than all the losses by fire from smoking.”

The theretofore unrepresented tobacco addicts’ paladin finally stepped forward in the figure of Arizona Democrat Marcus Aurelius Smith, a lame duck with less than a month’s incumbency. Having been defeated for reelection in 1920, in part because of his anti-labor stance, he was about to deliver his libertarian swan song—“my final protest in public life against the effort of...the Congress of the United States to reach out its hand under various pretenses of power, through the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, or some other device, to go into the homes of the people...and regulate...them all in their conduct, where that conduct, even if it is not exactly the right thing, takes no right from anyone else, and leaves them at least in the possession of some of the natural liberties of man.”

(In fact, because President Wilson appointed Smith to the International Joint Boundary Commission effective the day after his Senate term ended, Senate Democrat Henry Myers wondered whether the “outburst of oratory” by Smith might have something to do with his feeling that the proposed legislation “may encroach upon his personal fondness for the fragrant Habana or the pleasing cigarette” inasmuch as he was to “continue in the service of the Government, in a department of the Government not located in the Capitol....”)

---

517 CR 60:2629 (Feb. 5, 1921).
518 CR 60:2631 (Feb. 5, 1921).
520 CR 60:2632 (Feb. 5, 1921).
522 CR 60:2633 (Feb. 5, 1921).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Denouncing the amendment “as the entering wedge of a most contemptible and restraining blue law backed by the Government of the United States to suit the particular tastes of different gentlemen who find great pleasure in looking over all parts of the human body to see if they can find a boil”—Smith audibly took comfort from relating the tale of a senator who, after having said that he did not smoke, never chewed, and had never taken a drink of whisky, was asked by another senator, “one of the most distinguished men in this country,” “‘What do you do to smell like a man?’”—he readily conceded his own addiction: “I have tried many a time to stop the use of tobacco. I have found, as far as my health or my happiness is concerned, that it was an impossibility with me.” Deeply empathizing with a secretary of labor or other cabinet official “who likes his cigar,” he rebuked his colleagues who would continue to be entitled to “go through the corridors and smoke” while saying to that executive department head that “he must carry on the multifarious and responsible duties of that great office without the consolation of a cigar,” with the result that they would “drive out of the departments for hours in the day every responsible head. The heads..., if not allowed to smoke in them, will find time, when they feel they have to smoke, outside of the department, with a result ten times worse than any possible condition could be now.” Certain that Smoot’s ban, like other “blue laws,” prohibited men from doing “things that are harmless to other people and harmless to themselves,” Smith floated on a rhetorical tide of bathos to “a final question as to whether the human family shall be deprived of tobacco.” But before his arrival at that destination, he tarried long enough to regale the senate with his impassioned plea not to block the rise of the next generation of tobacco addicts and inhalers of secondhand smoke:

I protest against an effort to raise the great American boy of the future under a glass globe, as you would protect the delicate tints of a frail flower, not letting the winds of heaven visit his damask cheek too roughly. You will thus raise a generation of dudes and nincompoops.

Man must be brought up in his environment. He must feel the touch with other men. [Y]ou can not isolate him..., you can not make him an earthly angel by taking from him those habits exercised among the men with whom he comes in contact, which raise his character as a man....

---

523CR 60:2631 (Feb. 5, 1921).
524CR 60:2631 (Feb. 5, 1921). Smith’s position was further developed three quarters of a century later by Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation’s chairman and CEO, Thomas Sandefur, who, after swearing that he believed that tobacco was not addictive, responded to Congressman Wyden’s other theatrically brilliantly scripted question as to what he would say to a seven-year-old asthmatic witness whose exposure to secondhand
Smoot’s lapidary response to Smith’s wide-ranging complaints was that it would not hurt the secretary of state to refrain from smoking during business hours.\textsuperscript{525}

Support for Smoot’s amendment came from only two senators. Florida Democrat Park Trammel, that state’s former attorney general and governor, expressed his astonishment that department heads had so little respect for their “women and girl employees...as to permit the men to sit all around among them smoking their cigarettes, their cigars, and their pipes. Many of the rooms in these Government departments may more properly be called smoking rooms than working rooms.” Smith may have been loath to condone disrespect for womanhood, but Trammell’s characterization of a female employee’s tormentor as a “cigarette or pipe fiend” precipitated a lengthy colloquy in the course of which Trammell, who himself smoked, settled on a definition that stamped a man as a “fiend” if he was “such a slave to the pipe or the cigarette” that, as a result of being deprived of the privilege of smoking in his office, he spent three of his seven work hours with his pipe or cigarette out of his office. In the end, rejecting the label “blue laws,” Trammell also denied that an office smoking ban would be unjust to or curtail the liberty of an employee. The senator framed the issue as one of managerial prerogatives: it was simply “the custom when employing people to tell them what it is proposed to do during office hours.” Otherwise, by an inverted logic, “[w]e might as well say it is a restraint of the freedom of speech because, forsooth, some concern that employs a large number of employees prohibits promiscuous conversation during office hours.”\textsuperscript{526}

This same position stressing the need for employers to impose discipline in the interest of productivity underlay the support for Smoot’s amendment offered by Montana Democrat Henry Myers, a former and future state court judge who smoked “a great part of my life, and I like now to see those who are addicted to the habit enjoy a fragrant cigar or soothing pipe.”\textsuperscript{527} Going even further than Trammell he rigidly insisted that “people should have some recreation and \textsuperscript{525} CR 60:2632 (Feb. 5, 1921).

---

\textsuperscript{526} CR 60:2632 (Feb. 5, 1921).
\textsuperscript{527} CR 60:2633 (Feb. 5, 1921).
amusement, but Government employees should have it in their own time and not in the time of the Government. They only work between seven and eight hours a day, and during those hours I think the Government is entitled to their best efforts and all their time and attention. I think they should not mix pleasure and recreation with their work.”

Many decades would pass before empirical studies were conducted on the impact of smoking on workers’ productivity and non-smoking workers became antagonized over extra smoking breaks that employers granted smoking co-workers in workplaces in which smoking was prohibited. However, in 1921, the Senate resolved the controversy on the basis of a substitute for Smoot’s committee amendment offered by New York Republican James Wadsworth. Scion of one of the largest land-owning families in New York, Wadsworth, whose father had been a congressman and whose grandfather had been one of the founders of the Republican Party, was very conservative and opposed liquor prohibition; his opposition to women’s suffrage contributed to loss of his Senate seat in 1926, and when, after a hiatus, he was elected to the House, he became an adamant opponent of the New Deal. The substitute provided that:

The heads of executive departments and independent establishments of the Government are hereby directed to issue and enforce such regulations as will prevent smoking in those portions of buildings owned or leased by the Government in which smoking endangers Government property or constitutes a hindrance to the efficient conduct of Government business.

This new version prompted Democrat Charles Thomas, a former Colorado governor and another lame duck, to get off his chest complaints that he had been storing up about federal civil servants “who are protected by governmental regulations and laws whereby their places are secured for life or during good behavior and whose length of daily service is limited in many instances by seven and in others by eight hours” and who were nevertheless engaged in “deplorable neglect of their duties” (regardless of whether they smoked tobacco) and employed in numbers exceeding those “necessary for the business which is

---

528 CR 60:2634 (Feb. 5, 1921).
531 “James Wadsworth, Ex-Senator, 74, Dies,” NYT, June 22, 1952 (1).
532 CR 60:2634 (Feb. 5, 1921).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

transacted.” Consequently, while regarding Wadsworth’s proposal as “much the best method of legislating upon this subject,” Thomas was unable to reconcile himself to what he deemed “[t]he fact that employees can do as they please with impunity under civil-service regulations, whether conformably to them or not, without running the risk of discharge,” which in his view “ma[de] the amendment...somewhat deficient unless it confers power upon the heads of departments to discharge summarily those who are guilty of the violation of these regulations.” He was disappointed to hear Wadsworth state that not only could this rule “not visit summary discharge upon” violators, but—divining Thomas’s real interest—especially that “I do not think we can repeal the civil-service law in this way....” Stymied, Thomas sputtered: “If these employees are so addicted to smoking that they can not quit it...regardless of the duties which their positions require them to discharge, then they should be made to quit....” The only backing that his cri de coeur engendered came from Smith, who proposed fining executive department employees who smoked in working rooms in the presence of others during working hours $10 for the first and second offenses and dismissing them for a third offense. Not even Smoot welcomed this last salvo: revealing that he had never imagined that the Senate would pass his bill, he explained that his real object had been that “publicly this abuse” would be called to the department heads’ attention. He harbored no objection to Wadsworth’s substitute, because it would “have the effect at least of checking for a month or two the outrageous abuses...in the different departments.”

Ironically, after the Senate had devoted two hours to debating the issue of smoking and adopted Wadsworth’s wording “by an overwhelming majority,...immediately two-thirds of the Senators in the chamber sauntered into the cloak room to enjoy their cigars or pipes, as the case might be.” In so doing, however, that large majority continued to comply with the Senate’s custom-based smoking ban in the chamber itself. In spite of the Senate vote, later that month Smoot’s initiative became moot; when the appropriations bill was returned to the House—some of whose smoking members were less punctilious about observing its formal no-smoking rule—the chamber, under the prodding of Iowa Republican and Appropriations Committee Chairman James Good, who opined that the provision “would be a farce” if a department, which already was able to prevent smoking “if it wants to,” did not want to prevent smoking, insisted on disagreeing to the amendment. The pro-tobacco scene on the House floor

533 CR 60:2634-35 (Feb. 5, 1921).
534 “Harding May Smoke in the White House,” NYT, Feb. 6, 1921 (3).
was depicted by the national press: “The House, composed largely of smoking men, stood up last night for the man who smokes peacefully while working at a government desk. There was a shouting of ‘Noes’... Less than a score of members supported” the Senate amendment. Under the compromise worked out by the conference committee, of which Smoot himself was a member, the Senate receded from the Smoot-Wadsworth amendment, thus ending this tentative federal government inroad against the ascendancy of smoking laissez-faire.

---

536 “Smokers in House Protect Clerks from Tobacco Ban,” WP, Feb. 25, 1921 (4); “House Upholds Smokers,” NYT, Feb. 25, 1921 (15:5).
537 CR 60:4432, 4499-4500 (Mar. 3, 1921).

1888
Appendix

Table 6: No-Smoking Rules Inside State/Territorial Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Body</th>
<th>Type of Prohibition</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>AL</td>
<td>1861</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule introduced: “Smoking shall not be allowed in the Senate chamber during the time the Senate is in session.” Senate on January 18 “‘was principally occupied with a discussion of a new rule....’ One member thought the Senate should become accustomed to smoke, for in less than six months they would smell much smoke of a sulphurous character, and it was well to begin on tobacco smoke. The rule was finally withdrawn.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1873</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That it shall be considered as a standing rule of the Senate that no smoking shall be allowed in the Senate chamber.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1896</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke within the house, lobby or gallery.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke within the house, lobby or gallery.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AK</td>
<td>1915</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall or lobby thereof during the session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AZ</td>
<td>1887</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“On motion of Mr. Worres the Sergeant-at-Arms was instructed to have several large placards printed, prohibiting smoking in the Assembly chamber or lobby during the time the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1897</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking be permitted on the floor of the House during all sessions of the House, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to enforce the same in the lobby.” Adopted</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1905</td>
<td>C</td>
<td>Resolution: “that smoking shall not be indulged in by members of the Council while in the Council Chamber, nor shall any other persons be permitted to smoke in the Council Chamber while the Council is in session...[a]nd...that the President of the Council instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to strictly enforce this regulation.” Adopted 11 to 1.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1915</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking be permitted on the floor of the House during all sessions of the House and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to enforce the same.” Carried 25 to 10. Resolution: “[T]hat smoking is hereby permitted on the floor of the House during all sessions of the House.” Carried by rising vote.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AR</td>
<td>1871</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution passed to prohibit smoking in the Senate chamber. Rule: “[N]or shall smoking be allowed in the Senate Chamber, hall or gallery, during sessions of the Senate.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking in the House During session hours is strictly forbidden.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1907</td>
<td>H</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1889
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Action</th>
<th>Resolution/Rule</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1851</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Resolution: “WHEREAS, this House has no rule prohibiting smoking in the Hall during business hours; and WHEREAS, this improper practice is indulged in to a disreputable extent, not only by members but by others having privileges within the Bar of this House: Therefore, Resolved, That it be made the duty of the Speaker of this House to forbid any person from smoking during the sessions of the House; also, the Speaker shall give his order to the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper not to suffer a member or other person to come within the Bar in the act of smoking, or suffer any one to smoke within the Hall during business hours.” Substitute Resolution: “That smoking shall not be permitted within the Hall during the sessions of the Assembly.” Resolution and substitute both tabled 17-11.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1851</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Ordered by Motion: “[N]either smoking nor chewing will be allowed within the bar of the Senate, during the remainder of the present session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1854</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Assembly Chamber during the session of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1854</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“Mr Coffroth submitted the following as Rule 47. ‘Smoking shall not be allowed at any time in the Senate Chamber or lobby.’ Mr. Smith submitted as a substitute: ‘No smoking shall be allowed within the bar of the Senate during its sessions.’” “[T]hey were referred to the Committee on Vice and Immorality.” The committee reported that it “would recommend adoption of the Rule as originally introduced, in preference to the substitute.” “The report was accepted and laid on the table.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1862</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Senate Rules for trial of District Judge James Hardy: “No smoking shall be allowed within the bar of the Senate during said trial.” Adopted by roll-call vote 20 to 8.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1863</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“Mr Perkins offered the following resolution: Resolved, That no smoking shall be allowed in the Senate Chamber.” Adopted by roll-call vote 31 to 5.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1878</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“By Mr. Satterwhite: Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to allow no smoking in the Chamber at any time.” Adopted</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1891</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“By Senator Maher: WHEREAS, The rules of good breeding and health require that smoking be not allowed in the Chamber; therefore, be it Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to arrest all Senators smoking within the bar of the Senate.” Adopted</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1905</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Senate Chamber.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1911</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Assembly Chamber during the session of the House; provided, that during night session, this rule may be suspended by a vote of the majority of the members present, without notice or reference to committee.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1921</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Senate Chamber when objected to by the presiding officer or by any five members.”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>House</th>
<th>Resolution/Rule</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>CO</td>
<td>1865</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “no smoking shall be allowed in the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1875</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “no smoking shall be allowed in the hall of the Convention.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1876</td>
<td>C</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking be permitted in the Council Chamber during the sessions of the Council.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1887</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Motion carried “that the senators smoke, and they did, Chairman Christian smoking as much as any one.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “During the sessions of the Senate, smoking within the Senate chamber shall not be allowed.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “[N]o member or other person shall smoke in the lobbies or upon the floor of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this rule.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CT</td>
<td>1918</td>
<td>H&amp;S</td>
<td>Rejected resolution to prohibit smoking in Hall of House or Senate chamber during session hours.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DE</td>
<td>1847</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Amendment to resolution “That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to prevent smoking in the hall of the House” was lost.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution to prohibit smoking in the House chamber while the House in session and instructing the sergeant-at-arms to enforce rule adopted last day of session.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1907</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Motion prevailed “that no smoking be allowed in the House while in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1909</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That any member, attachee or visitor who indulges in smoking in the hall of the House of Representatives while in session, shall be arrested by the sergeant-at-arms.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1917</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “that from and after the passage of this resolution no person whether or not he shall be a member of the General Assembly shall smoke in the Hall of the House of Representatives while the House is in session.” Motion lost.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1919</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “that smoking within the Senate Chamber shall be and is hereby prohibited during such times as the Senate shall be in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FL</td>
<td>1854</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Motion “that Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to inform persons within and without the bar that smoking is not permitted in the Representative Hall during the sitting of the House” was lost.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1893</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, That smoking shall not be allowed in the hall during the session of the Legislature.” Adopted</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution No. 11: “That smoking is strictly prohibited in the House of Representatives while in session.” Adopted</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1903</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1913</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “[D]uring the session of the Senate no Senator shall...smoke upon the floor of the Senate....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GA</td>
<td>1857</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No member shall smoke in the House....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1891</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Senate Chamber during the Sessions of the Senate....”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Body</th>
<th>Rule/Resolution</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>HI</td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No member or officer shall smoke within the Hall of the House during any of the sessions of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Motion carried “that the rules be suspended in order to allow smoking during the Senate’s wait for the message from the governor.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1911</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No member or other officer shall smoke within the Senate Chamber during any of the sessions of the Senate.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ID</td>
<td>1867</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Assembly Chamber during the session of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1891</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the house while in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the representative chamber, gallery or any committee room.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1907</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “During the session of the senate, smoking within the Senate Chamber shall not be allowed, nor in a committee room during a sitting without the consent of the committee.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1917</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Representative chamber or gallery.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IL</td>
<td>1818</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke tobacco in the convention while in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1834</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke tobacco in the Senate Chamber while in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1840</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “That no smoking be allowed in the Hall during the hours of the session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IN</td>
<td>1850</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke within the Hall, nor within the lobbies or galleries thereof.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1858</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the Door-keeper be directed to prevent smoking in the Senate Chamber during session hours.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1861</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the Doorkeeper is requested to prevent smoking in the lobbies while the Senate is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1879</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking will be allowed in the Senate chamber before, during, or after the sittings thereof.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1893</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “It shall be the duty of the Doorkeeper...to prevent smoking in the halls and lobbies at all times....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IA</td>
<td>1839</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no person shall be allowed to smoke a pipe or cigar in this hall during the sittings of the House of Representatives.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1840</td>
<td>C</td>
<td>Resolution: “That smoking in the hall of the Council, during session hours, be prohibited.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1884</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “nor shall any person be permitted to smoke on the floor of the House or in the galleries at any time.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1886</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking in the Senate Chamber is hereby prohibited. And any officer or employe who shall indulge in smoking while on duty in the Senate Chamber or doorways leading thereto, shall thereby subject himself to liability of discharge.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1927</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: Repealed</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1933</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: Repealed</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1892
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Assembly</th>
<th>Resolution</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1859</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking shall be allowed in this Hall, either within or without the bar, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to strictly enforce this rule.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1861</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the smoking of tobacco be prohibited in the Senate Chamber during the time of session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1862</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That smoking shall not be allowed in this room while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1874</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, That smoking in the Hall of Representatives be and hereby is strictly forbidden while the House is in session. Mr. Drenning moved to amend by substituting the words, ‘no smoking will be allowed in this hall at any time.’ The motion as amended revailed, and the resolution was adopted.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1874</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“Resolved, That smoking in the Senate chamber, or in the wash-room connected therewith, be disallowed during the sittings of the Senate, in any capacity whatever, and that we request the President of the Senate to see that the provisions of this resolution are strictly enforced.” Adopted after being amended to strike out “wash-room” and substitute “Sergeant-at-Arms” for “President.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1875</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, That smoking is entirely prohibited in the hall of the House of Representatives during the present session.” Adopted.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1876</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolved, That smoking be absolutely prohibited in the Senate chamber, and the post office and cloak room connecting with said chamber, during the actual sessions of the Senate, and for half an hour previous to the meetings of the Senate; and that the sale or keeping for sale of cigars or tobacco within any of the rooms aforesaid be prohibited at all times; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed and required to enforce the requirements of this resolution strictly. Senator Crichton moved to amend so that spitting tobacco spit on the floor of the Senate chamber be also prohibited, which motion to amend did not prevail. The question recurring on the motion to adopt the resolution a vote being had, the motion to adopt prevailed.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1881</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Mr. Snoddy moved that it be made a standing order, that no smoking be allowed in the building. The motion prevailed.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1883</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall, or in the rooms opening into the hall, or the galleries, while the house is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1889</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas, Rule 67, of the rules governing this body, declares that ‘no person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall, or in the rooms opening into the hall, or the galleries, while the house is in session’; and Whereas, Said rule is being constantly violated, to the great discomfort of many members; therefore, be it Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be duly instructed to enforce said rule.” Adopted.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1889</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke tobacco in the Senate chamber or the galleries.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1891</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall, or in the rooms opening into the hall, or the galleries.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1920</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke in the Senate chamber or the galleries during the session of the Senate.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1921</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall, or the galleries, while the House or committee of the whole is in session.”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Body</th>
<th>Resolution/Rule</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1876</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolutions: “That members of the House be requested to abandon the habit of smoking during business hours in this Hall.” “That hereafter smoking within the Chamber or lobbies shall not be permitted.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1892</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“WHEREAS, Tobacco smoke is offensive to many persons; therefore, be it Resolved by the House of Representatives of Kentucky, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby instructed to prohibit smoking in the hall at all times during this session of the Legislature.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1892</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the Sergeant at Arms is hereby directed to prohibit smoking in the Senate chamber after 9:30 A.M. until the Senate adjourns.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1906</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas, tobacco smoke is offensive, obnoxious, and unbearable to many members of the Senate; and, Whereas, smoking in the presence of ladies is ill-mannerly and ungentlemanly; and, Whereas the presence of good women at our session is appreciated and desired by the members; and, Whereas, smoking is productive of foul, filthy and impure air, which is destructive of the health and comfort of the members. Therefore, be it resolved that smoking in this hall be prohibited, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate is hereby requested to rigidly enforce this rule, ‘No Smoking Allowed.’”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1916</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Senate Chamber, except under the galleries.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1864</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “that hereafter no smoking be allowed in the Senate chamber while the Senate is in session.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1879</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the hall of the Convention while it is in session.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>House</th>
<th>Action</th>
<th>Quote</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1889</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Presentation of order</td>
<td>“no smoking be allowed in this hall during the remainder of the session; any member violating this order shall be subject to a fine of five dollars” was postponed indefinitely despite presenter’s rhetorical question as to “how the young men in this house who don’t smoke can get down to work when they are half stifled by tobacco smoke.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1889</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Order adopted</td>
<td>“the House concurring, the Messenger of the Senate be directed to have printed in bold type and to post in conspicuous places, in both the Senate Chamber and the House of Representatives, placards requesting gentlemen not to smoke in the halls or galleries.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1889</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>After concurring in the Senate order, the House adopted a motion</td>
<td>for an order that “the clerk be directed to have the unsightly signs now posted upon the walls of this House removed forthwith.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1917</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule</td>
<td>“Smoking is not allowed in the hall of the House while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Rep. and future Gov. Percival Baxter explained his amendment to the House Rules:</td>
<td>“in my opinion it detracts a good deal from the dignity of the House if the members smoke while in session. I also think it lessens the efficiency of the House. We are going to have serious work here and we need clear heads. One of the first requisites for a clear head is pure air; and I believe we will do better work and that our health will be better, if we refrain from smoking. Also, we often have ladies present as our guests, and it seems to me it is not quite courteous to smoke in their presence.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1920</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule</td>
<td>“Smoking is prohibited in the Hall of the House of Representatives while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1921</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>House Speaker:</td>
<td>“By your vote this morning, you adopted the rules of the preceding session. The Chair will call the attention of the House to a rule which prohibits smoking in the House of Representatives during business sessions. This rule will be implicitly obeyed by the members and no less by the guests of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1888</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>On motion</td>
<td>it was ordered “that no smoking be permitted in this Hall during the session of this House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1906</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Ordered, That the use of cigars, cigarettes and pipes be prohibited in this chamber while the House is in session, and that the doorkeepers allow no one to enter if using either [sic] of them. That the Sargent [sic]-at-Arms and pages see that this order is enforced.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Body</th>
<th>Action</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>MA</td>
<td>1877</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Order offered: “That no smoking be allowed in the rooms and halls connected with the Representatives' Chamber, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to strictly enforce this order.” Indefinitely postponed.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the writing room of the House or in the ladies’ parlor.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1898</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking shall not be permitted in the reception room.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MI</td>
<td>1850</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the committee on education be instructed to inquire whether the practice of smoking in this hall be not detrimental to the health of members.” Committee Report: “If that which produces nausea of the most disagreeable kind, if that which pollutes the air so as to be unfit for the respiration demanded by nearly a hundred pair of lungs from six to eight hours a day...be detrimental to health, then there can be no doubt that the smokers and the smoked are all in the same category of danger, from which there is no escape for the latter, but in the forbearance and gentlemanly consideration of the former.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1861</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution (unanimously adopted): “That the practice of smoking in this Hall is ungentlemanly, prejudicial to the health of members, and disgusting to those who do not indulge in the filthy and disgusting habit.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1863</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution (unanimously adopted): “That the atmosphere of this Hall is sufficiently impure without the introduction of the poisonous fumes of tobacco smoke; and that the members of this House be requested to desist from that practice in this Hall and its ante-rooms, as a nuisance to the majority of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1869</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking shall be hereafter allowed upon the floor of this House, by any members or employés of this House, during the session of this Legislature.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1873</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking be permitted in the Senate Chamber during the present session of the Legislature.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking shall not be allowed in the senate chamber during the time the senate is in session, and the presiding officer shall enforce the rule.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MN</td>
<td>1859</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking be allowed in the Hall of this House previous to adjournment on each day.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1889</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No senator or officer of the Senate, or other person, shall be permitted to smoke in the Senate chamber during the session of the Senate.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1889</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke in the hall of the house while in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MS</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Hall during the hours of session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1890</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “nor shall any smoking be allowed in the hall of the Convention, during its session.”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1896
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Body</th>
<th>Resolution</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1839</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “[T]hat no person be allowed to smoke cigars or tobacco in any manner in this Hall, or lobby, during the setting hours.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1845</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That smoking is not allowed during the remainder of the session, within the Senate Chamber, and the door-keeper is authorized to prevent the same.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1851</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That smoking tobacco shall not be allowed hereafter in the hall of the House of Representatives, and that the Speaker be instructed to notify the House of the tenor of this resolution.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1852</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, by the House of Representatives, that there shall be no more smoking allowed in the House or about the door of said House, during the sitting of the present extra session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1853</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the smoking of cigars and pipes be prohibited in the Hall of Representatives, in session hours, during the present session of the General Assembly, nor shall members of this House, take grog during the sitting of the House.” Resolution instructing rules committee to incorporate this rule in the rules they report for government of the House rejected.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1855</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“Resolved, That there shall be no smoking in the House, during the Joint Session” (to elect Bank of Missouri presidents and directors).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1855</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, That smoking shall be prohibited in the Hall of the House of Representatives during the sessions thereof.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1857</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“Resolved, That smoking within the Senate Chamber be, and the same is, hereby forbidden during the session of the Senate.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1857</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, That, in the sense of this House, it is proper for the Speaker to prevent smoking within this Hall, and that his efforts to do so will be approved by this House.” Read first time and, being a proposition to amend House rules, under a House rule, it lay over and was never taken up again.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1861</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, That no member or officer of this House, and no person not a member thereof, be allowed to smoke in the Hall of the House while the House is in session. Resolved, That the Speaker and all other officers of this House be required to enforce the foregoing resolution.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1861</td>
<td>SC</td>
<td>Rule: “No member or other person shall be permitted to smoke within the hall or lobby at any time.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1869</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“Resolved, That notice be given that smoking is not allowed within the Hall while the Senate is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1873</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Senate Chamber while the Senate is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1883</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Senate chamber between 9 o’clock in the morning and the final adjournment of the Senate for the day.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1883</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “Speaker...shall preserve decorum and order and prevent smoking in the hall....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1887</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Senate Chamber.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1917</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking shall not be allowed in the Senate chamber.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1921</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas, Rule 7 [sic; should be 6] has been put into force prohibiting smoking; therefore, be it Resolved, That the ash trays ordered for desks be sold as junk and funds derived from such sale be returned to contingent fund of the House.” Failed of adoption.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1897
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Session</th>
<th>Passage</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>MT</td>
<td>1869</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved, That there be no smoking allowed inside the bar of this House. Carried.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1883</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Resolved: That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be instructed to suppress smoking within the bar of this House during the sessions thereof.” Adopted.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat...or smoke upon the floor of the House; neither shall any other person be allowed to smoke on the floor of the House at any time; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with strict enforcement of this clause.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1907</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “Loud talk or smoking shall be discontinued on request of the Speaker.” Adopted.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1911</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Motion that “after this date the smoking of cigarettes be prohibited in the House” tabled.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NE</td>
<td>1858</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no member be allowed to smoke within the bar during the time the House is in session.” Laid over.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1871</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “there shall be no smoking in the bar or gallery of this House while in session.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1873</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Senate Chamber or galleries during the session of the Senate.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1877</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “The speaker...shall have general direction of the hall, and permit no smoking therein.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1917</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “The speaker...shall not permit smoking while the house is in session.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1931</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the house chamber, lobby, or gallery, during session [sic] of the house or its committee of the whole.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NV</td>
<td>1864</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Assembly Chamber during the session of the House.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1864</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking shall not be allowed within the Senate chamber during the session of the Senate.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1923</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: Repealed</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1931</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: Repealed</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NH</td>
<td>1931</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Apparently by custom smoking was prohibited in the House chamber for some period before 1931 since that year the House adopted a resolution that “smoking be permitted in the House for the remainder of the 1931 session.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1943</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “in recognition of the dignity of our position as members of the state government, smoking during the time the House is in session shall not be allowed.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1949</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Apparently by custom smoking was prohibited in the Senate before 1949 since on July 19, 1949, “smoking was permitted in the Senate by its members during the balance of today’s session.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NJ</td>
<td>1872</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Rule: “It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms, at all times, not to allow any person to smoke in the Assembly Chamber.”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year(s)</th>
<th>Body</th>
<th>Rule/Resolution</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>NM</td>
<td>1899</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“No person shall be allowed to smoke tobacco in the chamber of the galleries while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NY</td>
<td>1859</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas, the smoking of tobacco upon this floor is exceedingly offensive, therefore Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keepers be, and are hereby directed to prevent any smoking, either on this floor or in any room adjacent thereto.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1867</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That smoking be strictly prohibited in any of the rooms or ante-rooms of the Senate while the Senate is in session, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms and his assistant be directed to see this resolution strictly enforced.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NC</td>
<td>1875</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the hall during sessions.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the Senate Chamber during the sessions.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking shall not be allowed in the hall.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ND</td>
<td>1889</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed within the hall at any time, whether the Convention be in session or not.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1889</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the House while in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OH</td>
<td>1857</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas the smoking of tobacco is very offensive to a number of the members of this House; therefore be it Resolved, That the members and officers of the House of Representatives be requested to refrain from smoking within this Hall, whether the House be in session or not, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed not to permit it to be done by others.” As amended to include chewing tobacco, defeated 38-40.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms and his assistant to prevent smoking within the Senate Chamber during the session of the Senate.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1884</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That during the sessions of the House no smoking be permitted within the Hall, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to strictly enforce this order”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OK</td>
<td>1890</td>
<td>C</td>
<td>Rule: “It’s shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-arms and his assistants to prevent smoking within the Council Chamber during the session of the Council.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1890</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “nor shall any person be permitted to smoke on the floor of the House or in the galleries at any time during the session of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1905</td>
<td>C</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed during the session of the Council.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1905</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “nor shall any person be permitted to smoke on the floor of the House or in the galleries at any time during the session of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1906</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas, There are members to whom smoking is offensive; therefore, Be it Resolved, That all smoking upon the floor of the Convention hall be prohibited during the hours of sitting of the Convention.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1909</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No member or other person shall be permitted to smoke on the floor of the House or in the gallery during sessions.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OR</td>
<td>Date</td>
<td>CH</td>
<td>Rule</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>------</td>
<td>----</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1856</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“No person shall be allowed to smoke within the Hall or lobby thereof.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1860</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall or lobby thereof while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1911</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas there are many members of the senate to whom smoking on the part of other members is very obnoxious, and often causes sickness and headaches; therefore be itResolved, That there shall be no smoking allowed in the senate chamber during the time the senate is in session.” Adopted.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PA</td>
<td>1816</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “It is not permitted to any person to smoke tobacco, at any time, within the chamber of the House.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1908</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“An amendment introduced by Mr. Kearney proposing a new rule as follows: ‘smoking shall be prohibited on the floor of the House during the session thereof,’ is not passed.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RI</td>
<td>1898</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule amendment: “Nor shall smoking be permitted in the Senate chamber.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SC</td>
<td>1885</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed inside the hall during the sessions of the Convention....”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Decision Type</th>
<th>Text</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>TN</td>
<td>1851</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That smoking be prohibited, either in the lobby, or in the bar of the Senate during business hours.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1853</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “that neither pipe nor cigar shall be smoked in the Senate Chamber in business hours, during the present session of the Legislature.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1869</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No member shall smoke tobacco within the Representative Hall during the hours of the session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1875</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “WHEREAS, Members and visitors have been in the habit of smoking in the Senate Chamber, and filling the same so full of tobacco smoke as to make some members of this House, who are not in the habit of smoking the weed, sick, when they come into the Chamber, and thereby rendering them unfit for business; therefore, be it Resolved, That the members of this House be most respectfully requested, and visitors strictly forbidden, from smoking in the Senate Chamber while the Senate is in session, and for one-half hour before the setting of the same; and that it shall be the duty of the Doorkeeper and porter to see that this Resolution is carried into effect.” Withdrawn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TX</td>
<td>1849</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “Whereas, It is deliterious [sic] to the health of many of the members of this House to inhale fumes of tobacco; and whereas, all respectable deliberative bodies consider smoking during their sessions, as a breach of decorum; Be it therefore resolved, that this House consider smoking during its session, to be a breach of decorum, and shall therefore not be permitted either within the bar of the House, or its lobby.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1849</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Senate Chamber during the session of the Senate.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1875</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No smoking shall be allowed in the Hall during the session of the Convention.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1879</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “There shall be no smoking, eating or cracking nuts allowed in the House during its sitting.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UT</td>
<td>1896</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke in the Senate chamber....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1896</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke in the House of Representatives....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1899</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke in the House of Representatives, or in the committee rooms....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1917</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Motion that smoking be prohibited in the House Chamber carried.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1919</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke within the House, or gallery, while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1919</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be permitted to smoke within the Senate Chamber while the Senate is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1921</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>House speaker rule interpretation: “while the House is in session” meant only “the actual time the body was in session” and not the entire 60-day period.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Type</th>
<th>Resolution/Rule</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>VT</td>
<td>1878</td>
<td>S&amp;H</td>
<td>Joint Resolution: “That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed and authorized to prohibit the smoking of pipes and cigars within the Hall of the House, Senate, library and executive chamber.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VA</td>
<td>1882</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the sergeant-at-arms of this Senate be, and he is hereby required to prohibit and prevent smoking by senators and all others, within the Senate chamber while the Senate is in session, and on every day before the opening of the day’s session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1883</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That the sergeant-at-arms be, and he is hereby instructed to take such steps as will prohibit all persons from smoking in the hall.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1901</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall, lobby, or galleries during the sitting of the Convention.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WA</td>
<td>1889</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“The speaker ruled that smoking was out of order during the sessions of this House.” Motion carried and ordered: “That it is the sense of this House that members be prohibited from smoking in the hall during recesses.” “The sergeant-at-arms was directed to enforce rule No. 56, prohibiting smoking in the hall or lobby during recess.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1889</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking shall not be allowed within the Senate chamber during the session of the Senate....”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1891</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Rule: “No person shall be allowed to smoke in the hall or lobby thereof during session or recess.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1897</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rules Committee report recommended amending rule by striking out “within the Senate Chamber” and inserting instead “on the upper floor of the capitol building, except in room 6. The purpose of this change is to prevent smoking, which is offensive to so many members, in and about the Senate, and confining [sic] smoking to the room adjoining [sic] the room of the sergeant-at-arms.” Adopted</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1921</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“On motion of Mr. Adams, Rule No. 20 was suspended for the purpose of permitting the House members and employees to enjoy the smoking of cigars presented with the compliments of Senator Barnes.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WV</td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Resolution: “That no smoking be allowed in the hall of House of Delegates while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1923</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Concurrent Resolution: “A Bill to prohibit the smoking of cigarettes within the temporary state capitol building or any of the offices of said building” failed to secure required 3/4 majority.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WI</td>
<td>1853</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Rule: “No member or officer of the assembly shall be permitted to...smoke in the assembly room at any time.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1878</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>Rule: “Smoking on the floor of the Senate, or in the lobby, while the Senate is in session is prohibited.”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>WY</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Chamber</th>
<th>Rule</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1888</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“No smoking shall be allowed within the Assembly Chamber at any time.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1888</td>
<td>C</td>
<td>“Smoking shall not be allowed in the Council Chamber while the Council is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1889</td>
<td>CC</td>
<td>“No smoking shall be allowed in the hall while the convention is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>“Smoking shall not be permitted on the floor of the House while the House is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1895</td>
<td>S</td>
<td>“Smoking shall not be allowed in the Senate while the Senate is in session.”</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1917</td>
<td>H</td>
<td>Proposed Rule: “Smoking shall not be permitted on the Floor of the House while the House is in the Committee of the Whole.” “Mr. Kelley moved that the report of the Special Rules Committee be amended by striking out ‘Smoking shall not be permitted while the House is in the Committee of the Whole,’ which motion prevailed.”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Abbreviations: A=Assembly; C=Council; CC=Constitutional Convention; H=House; SC=State Convention; S=Senate

Sources and annotations:

Alabama: Journal of the Called Session of the Senate of the State of Alabama...1861, at 20 (Jan. 17) (1861); “All Ended in Smoke,” Milwaukee Daily Sentinel, Feb. 6, 1861 (2:2); Journal of the Session of 1872-73 of the Senate of Alabama 133 (Feb. 8, 1873) (1873); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Alabama. Session of 1896-7, at 95 (1897) (Rule 48); Journal of the Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Alabama 59 (1901) (Rule 19)

Alaska: Journal of the House of Representatives of the Second Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Alaska 347 (1915) (Rule 46)

Arizona: Journals of the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona...1887, at 280 (Jan. 15) (1887); Journals of the Nineteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona 20 (Jan. 20) (1897); Journals of the Twenty-Third Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona...1905, at 212 (Mar. 11) (1905).

California: Journals of the Legislature of the State of California; at Its Second Session...1851, Journal of the Proceedings of the Assembly 1441-42, 1452-54 (Mar. 27-28) (1851); Journals of the Legislature of the State of California; at Its Second Session...1851, Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate 418 (Apr. 17) (1851); Journal of the Fifth Session of the Legislature of the State of California: Journal of the Proceedings of the Assembly 70 (Jan. 11) (1854) (Rule LXVII); Journal of the Fifth Session of the Legislature of the State of California...1854, at 368, 377 (Mar. 31, Apr. 1) (1854); Journal of the Senate During the Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of California: 1862, at 574 (Apr. 17) (1862) (Rule XIII); Journal of the Senate During the Fourteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of California: 1863, at 7 (Jan. 5) (1863); Journal of the Senate During the Twenty-Second Session of the Legislature of the State of California, 1877-8, at 19 (Dec. 7, 1877) (1878); Journal of the Senate During the Twenty-Ninth Session of the Legislature...1903
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

of the State of California, 1891, at 553 (Feb. 27) (1891); Journal of the Senate During the Thirty-Sixth Session of the Legislature of the State of California: 1905, at 77 (Jan. 6) (1905) (Rule 62); Journal of the Assembly During the Thirty-Ninth (Extra) Sessions of the Legislature of the State of California, 1911, at 13 (Nov. 27, 1911) (1912); List of Members Officers and Committees and the Rules of the Two Houses of the California Legislature...for the Year 1921, at 83 (1921) (Rule 71). Under the rubric, “Votes Necessary on Senate Activity,” No. 30, the Senate also provided that a majority of those present was required to permit smoking during a night session. Id. at 86. The 1921 Senate rule was still in effect in 1931: Journal of the Senate During the Forty-Ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of California: 1931, at 246 (Jan. 12) (1931) (Rule 71)

Hawaii: Journal of the House of Representatives Regular and Extra Session of the 1901: First Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii...1901, at 75 (Feb. 28) (1901) (Rule 74); First Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Hawaii: 1901: In Extra Session: Journal of the Senate 6 (May 9) (1901); The Sixth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii: Journal of the Senate: 1911, at xxxii (1911) (Rule 72)

1904
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Indiana: Journal of the Convention of the People of the State of Indiana, to Amend the Constitution...1850, at 38, 58 (Oct. 11, 14) (1851) (Rule 43); Journal of the Indiana State Senate, During the Forty-First Session of the General Assembly...1861, at 108 (Jan. 18) (1861); Journal of the Indiana State Senate, During the Called Session of the General Assembly...1858, at 11 (Nov. 22) (1858); Journal of the Indiana State Senate, During the Fifty-First Session of the General Assembly...1879, at 68 (Jan. 16) (1879) (Rule 57); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Indiana During the Fifty-Eighth Session of the General Assembly...1893, at 90 (1893) (Rule 74)

Iowa: Journal of the House of Representatives of the First Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, Begun and Held at the City of Burlington, on the Twelfth Day of November, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty-Eight 1838 (Jan. 7) (n.d.);
Journal of the Council of the Third Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, Begun and Held at the City of Burlington, on the Second Day of November, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty 231 (Nov. 5) (n.d.);
Rules of the Twentieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa 21 (1884) (Rule 66);
Journal of the Senate of the Twenty-First General Assembly of the State of Iowa 12 (1886) (Jan. 13) (Rule 32); State of Iowa: 1927: Journal of the Senate of the Forty-Second General Assembly 189 (Jan. 27); State of Iowa: 1933: Journal of the House of Representatives of the Forty-Fourth General Assembly 309 (Feb. 6)

Kansas: Kansas Constitutional Convention: A Reprint of the Proceedings and Debates...1859, at 40 (July 7, 1859) (1920);
Senate Journal of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Kansas...1861, at 15 (Mar. 27) (1861);
House Journal of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Kansas at Its Second Session 51 (Jan. 22) (1862);
House Journal: Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Kansas: Fourteenth Annual Session...1874, at 80 (Jan. 19) (1874);
Senate Journal: Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Kansas: Fourteenth Annual Session...1874, at 112 (Jan. 26) (1874);
House Journal: Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Kansas: Fifteenth Annual Session...1875, at 103, 125 (Jan. 15, 18) (1875);
Senate Journal: Proceedings of the Senate of the State of Kansas: Sixteenth Annual Session...1876, at 205 (Feb. 5) (1876);
House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Second Biennial Session...1881, at 110 (Jan. 18) (1881);
House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Third Biennial Session...1883, at 147 (Jan. 17) (Rule 67) (1883);
House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Sixth Biennial Session...1889, at 268 (Jan. 23);
Senate Journal: Proceedings of the Senate of the State of Kansas: Sixth Biennial Session...1889, at 147 (Jan. 16) (Rule 64) (1889);
Admire’s Political and Legislative Hand-Book for Kansas: 1891, at 59 (Sen. Rule 64) (1891);
House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-First Biennial Session...1919, at xiv (1919) (Rule 72);
House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Special Session...1920, at xxxii (1920) (Sen. Rule 66);
House Journal: Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas: Twenty-Second Biennial Session...1921, at xiv (1921) (Rule 70). The House and Senate both dropped their no-smoking rules in 1925. See above this ch.

Kentucky: Journal of the Regular Session of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Kentucky...1875, at 490 (Feb. 5, 1876), 694 (Feb. 17) (1876);
Journal of the Regular Session of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Kentucky ’76 (Jan. 7, 1892) (1891 [sic]);
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Mississippi: Manual of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi: Session of 1870, at 63 (1870) (House Rule XLV); Journal of the Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention, of the State of Mississippi...1890, at 44 (Rule XIV)

Missouri: Journal of the Senate, of the State of Missouri, at the First Session of the Tenth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight 296 (Feb. 3) (1839); Journal of the Senate, of the State of Missouri, at the First Session of the Thirteenth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and forty-four 265 (Feb. 8) (1845) (amendment to include chewing tobacco negatived); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, at the First Session of the Sixteenth General Assembly 324 (Feb. 12) (1851); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, at the Extra Session of the Seventeenth Extra Session...1852, at 80 (Sept. 11, 1852) (1852); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, at the Extra Session of the Seventeenth Extra Session...1852, at 250, 251 (Jan. 4, 1853) (1852); Journal of the Senate of the State of Missouri, at the First Session, Being the Regular Session of the Eighteenth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four 80 (Jan. 15, 1855); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, at the First Session of the Eighteenth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four 271 (Feb. 12, 1855) (1855); Journal of the Senate of the State of Missouri, at the First Session, Being the Regular Session, of the Nineteenth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six 81 (Jan. 14, 1857) (1857); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, at the First Session of the Nineteenth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six 105-106 (Jan. 15) (1857); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, at the First Session of the Twenty-First General
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Assembly 65 (Jan. 7) (1861); Journal and Proceedings of the Missouri State Convention...March, 1861, at 14 (Mar. 1) (1861) (Rule Forty-Fifth); Journal of the Missouri State Senate at the Regular Session of the Twenty-Fifth General Assembly...one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine 75 (Jan. 14) (1869); Journal of the Missouri State Senate at the Adjourned Session of the XXVIIth General Assembly...1873, at 87 (Jan. 9) (1873) (Sen. Rule 73); Journal of the Senate of Missouri of the Thirty-Second General Assembly (Regular Session): 1883, at 75 (Jan. 9) (1883) (Rule 46); Journal of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Second General Assembly, of the State of Missouri (Regular Session): 1883, at 84 (Jan. 9) (1883) (Rule art. II sec. 2); Journal of the Senate of Missouri of the Thirty-Fourth General Assembly (Regular Session): 1887, at 42 (Jan. 7) (1887) (Rule 46); Journal of the Senate of the Forty-Ninth General Assembly of the State of Missouri: 1917, at 55 (Jan. 17) (Rule 46); Fifty-First General Assembly (Regular and Extra Sessions): Journal of the Senate of the State of Missouri 23 (Jan. 12) (1921). The 1883 House rule was still in effect in 1921. Fifty-First General Assembly (Regular and Extra Sessions): Journal of the House of the State of Missouri 1:95 (Jan. 19) (1921). The 1917 Senate rule was still in effect in 1921. Fifty-First General Assembly (Regular and Extra Sessions): Journal of the House of the State of Missouri 1:31 (Jan. 12) (1921).

Montana: House Journal of the Sixth Session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana 102 (Dec. 22, 1869) (1870); House Journal of the Thirteenth Session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana...1883, at 283 (Mar. 3) (1883); House Journal of the Fourth Session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana...1895, at 67 (Jan. 17) (1895) (House Rule XI.7); Senate Journal of the Tenth Session of the State of Montana 49 (Jan. 17) (1907) (Rule 1 amended); House Journal of the Twelfth Session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana...1911, at 35 (Jan. 6)

Nebraska: House Journal of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Nebraska, Fifth Session...1858, at 161 (Oct. 26) (1859) (not taken up); House Journal of the General Assembly of the State of Nebraska: Eighth Regular Session 46 (Jan. 9) (1871) (Rules Committee reporting that it had substituted that provision for previous Rule 49, which had obligated the sergeant-at-arms to keep House secrets); Senate Journal of the General Assembly of the State of Nebraska, 6th Regular Session 45 (1873) (Rule 43); House Journal of the General Assembly of the State of Nebraska, Fourteenth Regular Session 58 (Jan. 4) (1877) (Rule 5); Manual of Nebraska Legislative Procedure: Edition of 1919, at 44 (Rule 2). The Senate rule (now Rule 58) was unchanged from 1873. Id at 42; House Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Forty-Seventh Session...1931, at XXVIII (Rule 20). By 1931, when the Senate rule was no longer in effect, “the senators voted almost to the man against a proposal to ban smoking in the senate chamber.” “Would Prohibit Campus Smoking,” BDS, Mar. 11, 1931 (1:5). That year the House prohibition was still in the rules but apparently not stringently enforced: “Max Kier, speaker of the Nebraska house of representatives, arose in session yesterday and read a standing rule against smoking in the chamber. Two members had requested him to do so. While he spoke, blue rings of cigar smoke circled lazily upward. After he concluded, more of it continued to rise. Today smoke continued to rise in the Nebraska house of representatives.” “Take Rules Lightly,” BDS, Jan. 15, 1931 (10:3). Nevertheless, shortly thereafter the House voted to table a motion to strike out all of the rule. House Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Forty-Seventh Session...1931, at 169 (Jan. 16).

Nevada: Journal of the Assembly During the First Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada 1864-5, at 51(Dec. 16, 1864) (1865) (Assembly Rule LXVII); Standing Rules of the Senate (n.d.) 11 (Rule LXV), in Appendix to Journals of Senate of the First Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada (n.d. [1864-65]); Journal of the Senate of the Thirty-First Session of the Legislature of the State of Nevada: 1923, at 7 (Jan. 16) (1924); “Tie in Assembly Vote on Rules Broken by Speaker,” REG, Jan. 22, 1931 (2:3); “Women Gone; Assembly to Smoke Again,” Nevada State Journal, Jan. 23, 1931 (2:7). The rule was enforced by means of fines. For example, in 1919 Sen. Ducoy was fined for breaking Rule 50: “The fine was a box of candy for the attaches.” “Jots from
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Nevada:
- Journal of the Honorable Senate: January Session of 1949, at 583 (July 19).

New Jersey:

New Mexico:

New York:
- Journal of the Assembly of the State of New York: At Their Eighty-Second Session, at 97 (Jan. 14) (1859); Journal of the Senate of the State of New York: At Their Ninetieth Session...1867, at 144 (Feb. 1) (1867).

North Carolina:

North Dakota:
- Journal of the Constitutional Convention for North Dakota 11 (1889) (Rule 37); State of North Dakota: 1889-90 Legislative Manual 15 (1890) (Rule 57). As late as 1915 the Senate still had no rule regulating smoking. State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Fourteenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 20 (Jan. 6) (1921). On the first day of the 1915 session a motion to eliminate the House anti-smoking rule was lost. State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Seventeenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 54-61 (1915). The Legislative Manual (or Blue Book) was not published in 1915 or 1917, and when publication resumed in 1919 it no longer contained the House and Senate Rules; it then ceased publication again. The 1921 Senate Journal adopted the rules of 1919 without printing them. State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Fourteenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 54-61 (1915). The Legislative Manual (or Blue Book) was not published in 1915 or 1917, and when publication resumed in 1919 it no longer contained the House and Senate Rules; it then ceased publication again. The 1921 Senate Journal adopted the rules of 1919 without printing them. State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Fourteenth Session of the Legislative Assembly 20 (Jan. 6) (1921). On the first day of the 1915 session a motion to eliminate the House anti-smoking rule was lost. State of North Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the Fourteenth Session of the Legislative Assembly...1915, at 61 (Jan. 5) (1915); “Fourteenth Legislative Session Organized Without Any Friction,” BT, Jan. 6, 1915 (1:6). Some weeks later, during an evening session, when the acting house speaker “had a freshly lighted cigar in his hand” despite the fact that the House rule had been brought to members’ attention that very afternoon, a member, noticing his “predicament,” successfully moved the rule’s suspension for the evening “and the speaker had his smoke.” “Legislative Notes,” BT, Feb. 24, 1915 (4:7). The House rule in 1923, as it had ever since the first legislative session of 1889, read: “No smoking shall be allowed in the House while in session.” State of North Dakota: Journal of the House of the Eighteenth Session of the Legislative Assembly...1923, at 62 (Jan. 8) (1923) (Rule 57). That same year the Senate rules contained no such provision.

Ohio:

Oklahoma:
- Journal of the First Session of the Legislative Assembly of Oklahoma Territory...1890, at 33 (Sept. 1), 56 (Sept. 3) (1890) (Council Rule 65 and House Rule 62); Journal of the Council Proceedings of the Eighth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma 33 (1905) (Council Rule 48); Journal of the Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the Eighth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma...1905, at 63 (Rule 60) Proceedings of the Constitutional
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

South Carolina: Journal of the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina: Being the Regular Session Commencing January 11, 1898, at 189a (Feb. 12) (1898) (amending Rule IV); Legislative Manual of the Seventy-First General Assembly of South Carolina 86, 88 (1916) (Rule 82)

South Dakota: Dakota Constitutional Convention...1885, at 1:71 (Sept. 9) (1907) (Rule 7); State of South Dakota: Journal of the Senate of the First Session of the Legislature: January 1890, at 27 (Jan. 7) (1890) (Rule 36)

Tennessee: Senate Journal of the First Session of the Twenty-Ninth General Assembly of the State of Tennessee...1851, at 175 (Nov. 6) (1852); Senate Journal of the First Session of the Thirtieth General Assembly of the State of Tennessee...1853, at 23, 27 (Oct. 6 and 7) (1854); House Journal of the First Session of the Thirty-Seventh Session of the State of Tennessee 235 (1869) (House Rule 54); Senate Journal of the First Session of the Thirty-Ninth General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, at 426, 449 (Feb. 25) (1875)

Texas: Journals of the House of Representatives, of the State of Texas: Third Session 307 (Dec. 18) (1849) (by Adolphus Sterne); Rules for Conducting Business in the Senate of the State of Texas 5 (1849) (Sen. Rule 19); Journal of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Texas...1875, at 18 (Sept. 8) (1875) (Rule 17); A Legislative Manual for the State of Texas: 1879-80, at 177 (1879) (Rule 20)

Utah: Senate Journal of the First Session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Utah 76 (Jan. 13) (1896) (Rule 35); House Journal of the Special and First Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah 97 (Jan. 14) (1896) (Rule 18); House Journal of the Third Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah 70 (Jan. 11) (1899) (Rule 18); House Journal: Twelfth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah 355 (1917); House Journal: Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1919, at 73 (Rule 18); Senate Journal: Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1919, at 19 (Rule 15); “House Smoking Rule Interpreted by Speaker,” SLT, Jan. 18, 1921 (10:2); House Journal: Fourteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1921, at 70 (Jan. 18) (Rep. A. W. Morrison moved to amend House Rule 18 to read: “No person shall be permitted to smoke within the House or gallery during the Fourteenth session of the Legislature,” but the motion died in Rules Committee). The House Rules of 1915 contained the identically same no-smoking provision as those of 1896. House Journal: Eleventh Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah 77 (1915) (Rule 40). Neither the Senate nor House Rules of 1917 contained any mention of smoking. House Journal: Twelfth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah 44-55 (1917); Senate Journal: Twelfth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1917, at vii-xix, 8-19. The press offered various explanations for Salt Lake Rep. J. W. McKinney’s 1917 House motion to prohibit smoking in the House chamber: (1) smoking in House chamber was prohibited “at all times” because “it was impolite to the women members”; (2) House banned smoking “in its legislative chamber at all times” because “the health of some members ha[d] been injured in the chamber during the past six weeks”; and (3) “[i]nasmuch as smoking has not been tolerated while the house was in session in the past, the action has to do only with the periods when the house is in recess.” ‘Dry’ Amendment to Be Recalled,” DEN, Feb. 21, 1917 (2:3); “Appropriation of $100,000, for Ogden Fair, Favored by the Joint Committee,” Ogden Standard, Feb. 21, 1917 (6:3); “Lady Nicotine Introduced and then Banished,” Salt Lake Telegram, Feb. 21, 1917 (3:3). The House and Senate Rules of 1923 were identical to those of 1919. House Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 33 (Rule 18); Senate Journal: Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1923, at 13 (Rule 18). The identical House rule was still in effect in 1929. House Journal: Eighteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Utah: 1929, at 110 (Rule 18).
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Vermont: Journal of the Senate of the State of Vermont: Biennial Session, 1878, at 116, 117 (Oct. 31) (1879); Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Vermont: Biennial Session, 1878, at 176, 177, 179 (Nov. 1) (1879)

Washington: House Journal of the First Legislature of the State of Washington: Commencing...1889...and Ended...1890, at 10 (Nov. 7, 1889), 24 (Nov. 13, 1889), 505 (Feb. 14, 1890) (1890); Senate Journal of the First Legislature of the State of Washington: Begun...1889...Adjourned...1890, at 38 (Nov. 20, 1889) (1890) (Sen. Rule 62); House Journal of the Second Legislature of the State of Washington: Begun...1891...Adjourned...1891, at 27 (Jan. 9) (1891) (Rule 54); Senate Journal of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Washington: Begun...1897...Adjourned...1897, at 75 (Jan. 15 (1897); House Journal of the Seventeenth Legislature of the State of Washington: Begun...1921...Adjourned...1921, at 199 (Feb. 14) (1921).

The identically same House and Senate smoking bans were still in effect in 1921: House Journal of the Seventeenth Legislature of the State of Washington: Begun...1921...Adjourned...1921, at 70 (Jan. 25) (1921) (Rule 20); Senate Journal of the Seventeenth Legislature of the State of Washington: Begun...1921...Adjourned...1921, at 610 (1921) (Rule 63)

West Virginia: Journal of the House of Delegates of the State of West Virginia, for the Twenty-Second Session: 1895, at 6 (Jan. 9) (1895); Journal of the Senate of the State of West Virginia for the Thirty-Sixth Regular Session...1923, 441 (1923). The 1917 House rules contained no reference to smoking. Journal of the House of Delegates of the State of West Virginia, for the Thirty-Third Regular Session...1917, at 14-31 (Jan. 15) (1917)

Wisconsin: Manual for the Use of the Assembly of the State of Wisconsin, for the Year 1853, at 103 (1853) (Rule 29); In Senate: Journal of Proceedings of the Thirty-First Annual Session of the
The Prohibition of Smoking Inside Legislatures

Wisconsin Legislature: 1878, at 303, 313 (Feb. 27 and 28) (1878) (Rule 53)

PART IV

CIGARETTE SALES LICENSURE AND TAXATION IN IOWA DURING THE PERIOD OF LAISSEZ-FAIRE SMOKING: 1921 TO THE 1960s

The state department is planning to have a force of deputies gumshoeing about to pick up violators. 1

Cigarette law is having its trouble. Several town and city councils refused to grant permits for the sale. 2

It is true that there has always been more or less opposition among certain groups...toward cigarette consumption, with the result that the tax may have been originally levied in part for regulatory purposes. ... The writer of this dissertation vividly recalls the agitation against cigarette smoking that was rife in the middle-western sector of the United States a few years ago,—an agitation that was based upon the combined grounds of immorality and health deterrents allegedly connected with cigarette smoking.

If the aim in taxing cigarette sales in Iowa had been primarily one of regulation, the revenues from this tax, of necessity, would have been of secondary importance. However, in view of the fact that the Joint Legislative Committee on Taxation recently proposed to the General Assembly of Iowa an increase in the rates on cigarette sales, in addition to a tax on the sales of other forms of tobacco, all for the purpose of gaining more revenue, it may be concluded that the essential purpose of the present tax in Iowa is to raise revenue for the state. 3

1“Iron Clad License Is Necessary to Sell,” Oelwein Register, July 15, 1921 (4:3-4).
2“Neighborhood News,” Adams County Free Press (Corning), July 16, 1921 (1:1).
The Aftermath of Licensure in Iowa: 1921-1939

“[W]hile our victory in the recent anti-tobacco war has been almost complete, the menace has not yet passed, and it is not likely to pass so long as professional agitators are able to pass their hats and collect the coin.”

Because his department had been receiving so many requests for copies of the new cigarette law, which was to go into effect on July 4, 1921, William Burbank, the new treasurer of state, who was in charge of enforcement, on April 30 published a leaflet containing the statute’s full text prefaced by a comprehensive synopsis by Attorney General Ben Gibson. Burbank furnished newspapers with copies of the pamphlet, requesting that they publish the synopsis. From a reading of the act Burbank discovered that it had “two ends in view”: raising revenue for cities and the state and eliminating minors’ use of cigarettes. Interestingly, Burbank’s focus on the goal of insuring that minors stopped smoking cigarettes was broader than Gibson’s more formalistic stress of suppressing sales to minors. Underscoring that this law was definitely worth far more than the “mere scrap of paper” it was written on, Burbank point blank expressed his expectation that “every person, hamlet, city and county” in Iowa would “do its bit in the observance of this measure and earnestly solicit[ed] the hearty co-operation of officers and people in the plain duty of enforcement.”

Before being elected state treasurer in 1920, Burbank had been county treasurer in Black Hawk county (whose county seat is Waterloo) and treasurer of a smaller county as early as 1900, though at the time of the 1910 census he was a bookkeeper of a wholesale grocery. While still state treasurer, Burbank in 1923 self-published a 300-page anti-Catholic screed, The Knighthood of Catholicism, whose title page announced that the book contained a “Map of the Papal State in which the Author Resides,” which midwest papal state turned out... to extend all the way into Wyoming and the capital of which was Dubuque.\textsuperscript{6} When he left the state treasurer’s position in 1924, he unsuccessfully ran as a candidate in the Republican primaries for governor “under a Klan banner” and was “termed the klan candidate for governor.”\textsuperscript{9} In March 1924, residents of Waterloo found on their doorsteps copies of \textit{The New Menace} devoting considerable space to Burbank’s gubernatorial candidacy as well as to a review of his book, the proceeds from which were impliedly to be used for his campaign.\textsuperscript{8} In Waterloo, the Ku Klux Klan’s local organizer urged Burbank’s candidacy as a means of replacing three state officials appointed by Governor Kendall whose religious affiliations were objectionable to the Klan.\textsuperscript{10} Although Burbank failed by a narrow margin to secure the Republican nomination, the KKK did succeed in winning Polk county for him.\textsuperscript{11}

By way of hortatory introduction Gibson emphasized that the law “‘should be enforced by every official’” in Iowa and that in order to implement the legislature’s intentions, as expressed in the bill and on the House and Senate floor, there should be no hesitation to bring prosecutions or injunction suits for enforcement.\textsuperscript{12} As summarized by Gibson, the law encompassed the following elements:

1. No one is authorized to sell cigarettes except a permit-holding dealer.
2. A permit may be issued by city councils and county boards of supervisors to any person, firm, or corporation complying with the law’s provisions.
3. No permit can be issued until the applicant files a bond of not less than $1,000.
4. The annual permit fee is $100 in first-class cities, $75 in second-class cities, and $50 elsewhere, regardless of when during the permit year the permit is issued; the fees are to be paid to the treasurer of the city or county issuing the permit.

\textsuperscript{6}W. J. Burbank, \textit{The Knighthood of Catholicism as Advertised and as It Really Functions} 261 (1923).
\textsuperscript{7}Ed. Dose, “McCoy Backed by Burbank’s Klan Element,” \textit{DD&L}, May 30, 1925 (10:5).
\textsuperscript{8}“Burbank Kluxers Given Credit for Victory in Caucus,” \textit{WEC}, May 17, 1924 (1:7).
\textsuperscript{10}“Ku Klux Organizer Speaks for Burbank,” \textit{WEC}, May 29, 1924 (5:1).
\textsuperscript{11}David Chalmers, \textit{Hooded Americanism: The History of the Ku Klux Klan} 139 (1981 [1965]).
\textsuperscript{12}“New Cigarette Law Goes into Effect July 4th,” \textit{Jackson Sentinel} (Maquoketa), June 7, 1921 (4:2-6 at 2-3). See also “Council Reverses on Cigarets,” \textit{WM}, July 13, 1921 (1:5).
(5) No cigarettes or cigarette papers maybe sold or given to anyone under 21.
(6) The law applies equally to sales of cigarettes and cigarette papers/wrappers.
(7) Cigarette dealers are required to attach and cancel stamps in all sales of cigarettes and cigarette papers amounting to one mill per cigarette on those weighing not more than three pounds per thousand and one-half cent per 50 papers.
(8) Any dealer failing to attach stamps is subject to a fine ranging between $100 and $300 and commitment to jail until the fine is paid for up to six months; all cigarettes and papers [in the possession of violators] are to be confiscated and forfeited to the state.
(9) All cigarette packages have to contain specified a number of cigarettes ranging between 8 and 100.
(10) Stamps will be on sale by the treasurer of state, who will redeem unused stamps.
(11) “The permit fees are called mulct taxes,” and anyone, whether a permit-holder or not, who fails to pay the permit fee “may be assessed a mulct tax for the amount thereof,” which is assessed by the assessor, who is “liable for a fine for failure to do so. If the assessor fails to assess the mulct tax the sheriff or three citizens may do so.” After one month failure to pay the mulct tax “results in a penalty being added thereto of twenty per cent and [1 percent per month until] the tax is fully paid.”
(12) Minors found possessing cigarettes or papers “are required to furnish to any peace officer, juvenile court officer, truant officer, or teacher information as to where the same was obtained,” refusal to comply being a misdemeanor punishable by a maximum $5 fine or five-day jail sentence or both. Minors under 16 have to be certified to juvenile court for action deemed proper by the court. The court is empowered to suspend the sentence of any minor who afterwards gives evidence in proceedings against the person who furnished cigarettes or papers to him.
(13) The punishment for furnishing cigarettes or papers to minors under 21 is a fine of $25 to $100 for first offense or imprisonment for up to 30 days; for additional offenses the punishment is a fine ranging between $100 and $500, or imprisonment from one to six months, or both.
(14) Anyone violating any of the law’s provisions or maintaining a place where cigarettes or papers are sold or kept with intent to sell in violation of any of the law’s provisions “shall be deemed guilty of keeping and maintaining a nuisance, and the building or place so used...shall be deemed to be a nuisance, and such person, firm or corporation may be enjoined and such building or place abated as a nuisance,” the injunction/abatement procedure as well as that for...
contempt for violating such an injunction are to be the same, as far as practicable, as provided for enjoining/abating intoxicating liquor nuisances.\textsuperscript{13}

In addition to omitting mention of the fact that the mulct tax was made a lien on the real estate where cigarette selling business were located, the attorney general failed to specify for citizens and government officials that local governments had the discretion not to issue cigarette permits.

Cigarette Advertising Becomes Lawful

Apparently some senators had the idea that newspapers were champions of the [1919 Nebraska cigarette sales prohibition repeal] bill because they saw visions of large additional revenues therefrom. At any rate a strong effort was made to bar manufacturers and dealers from advertising them in the newspapers. It is quite natural that this should occur to them. They simply fail to distinguish between the newspaper business and most others. Even the most greedy of publishers long ago learned that the real source of his advertising revenue lay in the number and character of his subscribers. There are also publishers who daily turn down advertising offered them that offends their sense of propriety and decency or are opposed to their standards of what should be admitted, and the editorial conduct of their newspaper is not swayed by considerations of revenue in the sense that revenue considerations govern what shall appear in the policy making department of the newspaper.\textsuperscript{14}

The day of buying cigarettes under cover is past in Iowa. All over the state bill boards carry advertisements of the popular sellers. Since July 2 cigarettes have been displayed in cigar store windows in the large towns.\textsuperscript{15}

On July 4 and 5, 1921, the day and day after the repeal of the anti-cigarette law went into effect and cigarettes were therefore no longer an article the sale and advertising of which were prohibited,\textsuperscript{16} Iowa newspapers resumed publishing such advertising. To be sure, even during the four years (July 4, 1917 to July 4, 1921) while the advertising ban was in effect the American Tobacco Company

---

\textsuperscript{13}“New Cigarette Law Goes into Effect July 4th,” Jackson Sentinel (Maquoketa), June 7, 1921 (4:2-6 at 4-6). For a shorter version, which nevertheless included some information omitted from the longer version, see “Recently Passed Cigarette Law,” Riceville Recorder, May 18, 1921 (1:1).

\textsuperscript{14}“Making Real Progress,” Evening Standard Journal (Lincoln, NE), Mar. 17, 1919 (6:1).

\textsuperscript{15}“Neighborhood News,” Adams County Free Press (Corning), July 16, 1921 (1:1).

\textsuperscript{16}On the enactment of the ban in 1917, see above ch. 14.
in cahoots with receptive publishers skated right up to the edge of the law and over by publishing three-quarter-page ads for Lucky Strike roll cut tobacco for pipe or cigarette that contained the sentence: “This is the same toasting process that made the Lucky Strike Cigarette the greatest success in cigarette manufacturing.”

The 12 weeks between the governor’s approval of the Dodd bill and the law’s effective date proved to be an agonizingly long time for the cigarette manufacturing oligopolists to wait to acquaint potential solvent demanders with their still contraband commodities and for publishers to wait for the advertising revenue to start rolling in. Consequently, at the beginning of May, with two months still to go before the advertising ban was to be lifted, many newspapers, especially small rural weeklies, which had been enticed for a considerable period of time by the Tobacco Merchants Association and its member-cigarette manufacturers with prospects of lucrative advertising if the ban on sales and advertising were repealed and the press contributed to that outcome, began publishing the same relatively small one-column advertisements with the text: “Lucky Strike cigarette Its toasted.” One of these appeared on May 3 in the Newton Daily News\(^{17}\) and the Waterloo Evening Courier,\(^ {19}\) followed by its appearance in the immediately following days in numerous small weeklies. For example, the next day the Palo Alto Tribune in Emmetsburg, a small rural town in northwestern Iowa, published not only the same ad but one six-times as large for Liggett & Myers’ Chesterfield on the same page.\(^{21}\) Nor did ATC remain content with breaking the law with smallish Lucky Strike ads: two weeks later, the company began publishing ads almost five times larger that boasted of \(^{17}\) Iowa City Daily Press, June 10, 1920 (6:2-7). See also Iowa City Daily Press, Sept. 30, 1920 (7:4-7) (“As in the famous Lucky Strike cigarette, this toasted flavor is delicious”). These ads also ran numerous times between June and September 1920 in the Waterloo Evening Courier, Waterloo Times Tribune, Muscatine Journal, and Des Moines Daily News (search result on NewspaperArchive).

---

\(^{19}\) See above ch. 17.

\(^{21}\) Palo Alto Tribune (Emmetsburg), May 4, 1921 (8: 1, 5-7). The same Lucky Strike advertisement also appeared in Marble Rock Journal, May 5, 1921 (3:1); Anita Record, May 5, 1921 (8:6); Anita Tribune, May 5, 1921 (3:1); Griswold American, May 5, 1921 (2:3); Kellogg Enterprise, May 6, 1921 (3:1); Alton Democrat, May 7, 1921 (2:7); Boyden Reporter, May 7, 1921 (8:1); Ruthven Free Press, May 11, 1921 (3:6); Progress-Review (LaPorte City), May, 12, 1921 (7:7); Stanton Call, May 12, 1921 (6:6); Vicor Record, May 12, 1921 (7:1); Adams County Free Press, May 14, 1921 (4:1). See also ICP-C, May 7, 1921 (9:8).
facilitating and profiting from violations of the still valid sales ban by announcing that “[d]ealers now carry both sizes: 10 for 10 cts; 20 for 20 cts.”\textsuperscript{22} On May 19 they appeared in two papers in the same small southwestern town of Anita,\textsuperscript{23} one of which, ironically, in the same issue ran an article published all over the state, titled, “New Cigarette Law Is Most Stringent.”\textsuperscript{24} During the final days of the old prohibitory regime the American Tobacco Company and publishers launched yet another wave of unlawful advertisements for Lucky Strike.\textsuperscript{25} One publisher who surely was not ignorant of the law he was violating when his \textit{Winterset Madisonian} published a Chesterfield advertisement on June 15\textsuperscript{26} was Edward Smith, who as state senator had voted for the Dodd bill just two months earlier.\textsuperscript{27}

Although no publisher appears to have been prosecuted for any of these violations, the Iowa Press Association was well aware of them. The May 1921 issue of the \textit{Corn Belt Publisher}—an official organ of the Association—published a detailed and accurate exposé, which manifestly failed to deter member-publishers from illegally enriching themselves and the cigarette oligopolies. Written by Grant Caswell, a former state senator who as the Association’s field secretary edited the monthly,\textsuperscript{28} the article was excerpted by at least one daily newspaper.\textsuperscript{29}

On passage and signing of the new cigarette law...tobacco companies and cigarette manufacturers got busy prematurely to place their goods on the Iowa market and advertise same. Newspapers and bill boards in Iowa for the first time in several years contain prominent mention of cigarettes in connection with tobacco advertising—a thing which we have seen and read here in Iowa only through other mediums and in papers published outside the state but freely distributed in Iowa.

\textsuperscript{22}\textit{Lewis Weekly Standard}, May 17, 1921 (3:1-2). See also \textit{Brooklyn Chronicle}, May 26, 1921 (7:1-2).

\textsuperscript{23}\textit{Anita Record}, May 19, 1921 (2:4-5); \textit{Anita Tribune}, May 19, 1921 (7:1-2).

\textsuperscript{24}“New Cigarette Law Is Most Stringent,” \textit{Anita Tribune}, May 19, 1921 (4:1).

\textsuperscript{25}\textit{Sun-Herald} (Lime Springs), June 30, 1921 (8:6) (a weekly in Horace Dodd’s own Howard county); \textit{Rock Rapids Reporter}, June 30, 1921 (6:6) (Lyon County, of which Rock Rapids was the county seat, was represented by Moen, the Dodd bill’s most vociferous opponent in the House).

\textsuperscript{26}\textit{WM}, June 15, 1921 (6:5-7).

\textsuperscript{27}See above ch. 15.

\textsuperscript{28}On Caswell’s position as the Iowa Press Association’s field secretary, see the notice he placed in \textit{Spirit Lake Beacon}, Sept. 15, 1921 (1:1-2). On Caswell’s editing and publishing the \textit{Corn Belt Publisher}, see \textit{N. W. Ayer and Son’s American Annual and Newspaper Directory} 291 (1920).

\textsuperscript{29}“Cigaret Advertising Not Legal Till July,” \textit{Oelwein Register}, June 1, 1921 (7:7).
The Aftermath of Licensure in Iowa: 1921-1939

We say prematurely, for at least three and perhaps more agencies began making schedules and placing orders for cigarette and tobacco advertising the first of May when the old cigarette law is still in force and the new law ineffective till after the first of July. Apparently the only information the big concerns handling this advertising had of the illegality of such advertising at this time was by way of a telegram from Field Secretary Caswell to the Newell-Emmett Co., New York, suggesting that our newspapers could not legally run their schedules at this time. They came back with a further inquiry regarding the matter, when we gave them the information that the governor’s office had advised us that the new law cannot possibly become effective until July 4th...

That Newell-Emmett was facilitating illegal advertising was hardly unexpected since it had been the Tobacco Merchants Association’s chief media and propaganda consultant, whose strategy in large part hinged on securing the cooperation of rural weeklies in the anti-anti-cigarette campaign by promising them cigarette advertising revenue.

After offering ignorance of the law’s effective date as an explanation of the “premature” advertising, Caswell commented that a bill’s “long and rocky road” had been “particularly hard to travel” in the case of the cigarette bill “because of the prejudice against cigarettes in some people’s minds and the fear that the new law might make it easier for boys to get and smoke the little pills.” He also belittled the violations by referring to the ban on cigarette advertising as “[t]his hidden law,” which was, to boot, “perhaps unconstitutional”; and although he asserted that “nobody wants to violate” it, he was even more certain that no one at that late date wanted to bother to seek its invalidation by the Iowa Supreme Court. (Since his own Corn Belt Publisher had never contested the law’s validity, let alone constitutionality, when it was passed in 1917 or later, Caswell’s newfound interest in this excuse was curious.) Lame and lacking credibility was his closing rhetorical question: “Just why there should be such hurry to get this cigarette advertising started in this state we cannot see. Results cannot be secured for advertising that which cannot be sold, at any rate.” Since Caswell’s syndicated column analyzing weekly developments in the Iowa legislature during the 1921 session had uniformly disparaged the anti-cigarette law, claiming that it was neither respected not obeyed, he was acutely aware that cigarettes were 30“Cigaret Advertising Illegal,” Corn Belt Publisher 5(9):1 (May 1921).

---

31See above ch. 17. On the ambiguous relationship that Caswell, who was supposed to be representing the publishers’ interests vis-a-vis advertising agents such as Newell-Emmett Co., which placed tobacco advertising for Liggett & Myers, maintained with Newell-Emmett, see “Respect Iowa B. R. List,” Corn Belt Publisher 5(8):5 (Apr. 1921).
33See above ch. 15.
being sold in many cities, giving manufacturers every incentive to advertise them.

By way of excusing its own “non olet” approach to making money by publishing cigarette ads, the Upper Des Moines-Republican in mid-May also sought to distinguish itself both from its openly scofflaw and from its ethical competitors:

[W]hen the cigarette law in this state was changed tobacco factories began sending out advertising. The advertisement of cigarettes under a present law is illegal so few papers accepted the ads not wishing to violate the law. On July 4th the sale of cigarettes will become legal, so will the advertising. Several papers in this state have refused to accept this advertising because they believe the use of tobacco to be wrong. [T]hese editors have the privilege of selling their space to whom they please. It is no worse for a newspaper to advertise tobacco than it is for the groceryman to sell it and they all do. It is probable that this paper will run tobacco ads as we already have several contracts ready and copy for the July 5th issue. We expect to be criticized by some for doing it but the critics are entitled to a square deal and we will sell them space if they so desire to combat the sale of the weed. That is our business.\(^{34}\)

On July 4, the veritable flood of lawful cigarette advertisements began to cascade through the state. The Des Moines Register, the paper with the largest daily circulation in Iowa, published a large advertisement for Camel and a smaller one for Lucky Strike,\(^{35}\) while the Dubuque Times-Herald also published one for Lucky Strike.\(^{36}\) The next day large advertisements for Camel appeared, inter alia, in the Cedar Rapids Evening Gazette,\(^{37}\) Muscatine Journal,\(^{38}\) Iowa City Press-Citizen,\(^{39}\) and Ottumwa Courier,\(^{40}\) while Lucky Strike ads appeared in the Sioux City Tribune,\(^{41}\) the Waterloo Times-Tribune,\(^{42}\) the Cedar Rapids Republican,\(^{43}\) and the Des Moines News.\(^{44}\) The Charles City Press, Dodd’s hometown paper, published two Lucky Strike advertisements and one for Camel on July 5; in the same day’s issue of the Marshalltown Times-Republican an advertisement for Liggett & Myers’ Fatima cigarettes appeared, which that day also adorned the Council Bluffs Nonpareil along with one for Camel. Nor did Liggett & Myers stint on Chesterfield: the Oskaloosa Daily Herald published a very large one on July 6—the same day that it reported that the city council had denied the issuance of cigarette permits—and printed a different one six days later. The cigarette oligopolists did not renge on their promises to spread their advertising wealth to small-town papers. On July 6 and 7, the Iowa Recorder in Greene and Rockwell City Advocate published large Camel ads, while the Albia Republican and Hamburg Republican on July 7 and 8 made sure their readers did not forget Chesterfield. The weekly Howard County Times—a leading paper in the county that Horace Dodd, who had made it all possible, represented—published Camel and Chesterfield advertisements on July 6. The same day the Marengo Republican hit the nicotine revenue jackpot when it carried ads for all three oligopolists’ market-dominating commodities, a feat matched two weeks later by the Anita Tribune. Some small-town or specialized weeklies, such as the Riceville Recorder and the Iowa Farm Republic, took an extra week to publish their first advertisements. And at least one small-town weekly, the Deep River Record, wanted to have it both ways: On July 1, noting that Grinnell and Newton had “refused to grant the privilege,” it editorialized that the town “council has the right to refuse to issue a permit if it wants to exercise its authority in the matter. Maybe it would be a good thing banish the pill 45 CCP, July 5, 1921 (2:7, 3:7, 4:5-7).

46 MT-R, July 5, 1921 (7:5-8).
47 Council Bluffs Nonpareil, July 5, 1921 (2:1-3, 6:6-8).
48 Oskaloosa Daily Herald, July 6, 1921 (2:4-7).
49 See below ch. 20.
50 Oskaloosa Daily Herald, July 12, 1921 (3:2-5).
51 Iowa Recorder (Greene), July 6, 1921 (6:4-6).
52 Rockwell City Advocate, July 7, 1921 (3:5-7).
53 Albia Republican, July 7, 1921 (7:2-4); it also published one for Lucky Strike (3:2).
54 Hamburg Republican, July 8, 1921 (3:3-6).
55 HCT, July 6, 1921 (6:4-6, 8:4-6).
56 Marengo Republican, July 6, 1921 (2:4-6, 3:4, 7:4-6).
57 Anita Tribune, July 21, 1921 (4:1-3, 7:5, 8:4-6).
58 Riceville Recorder, July 13, 1921 (7:6, 8:4-6) (Lucky Strike and Chesterfield).
59 Iowa Farm Republic, July 14, 1921 (3:1) (Lucky Strike).
The Aftermath of Licensure in Iowa: 1921-1939

altogether." But then from July 8 on the paper began publishing Lucky Strike and Chesterfield advertisements galore.61

Cigarette Sales Permit Mulct Taxes

With the stub of a black cigar clenched firmly between his teeth, Mr. Dushkind tilts back in a swivel chair and speaks frankly.

“Five years ago? Six States then had laws entirely prohibiting the sale of cigarettes...Arkansas and Tennessee, North Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa. [T]oday there are only two states left...which continue to carry on their statute books laws forbidding the sale of cigarettes to adults. They are North Dakota and Kansas. The South Carolina Legislature at its latest session imposed a heavy tax on cigarettes...but this is a measure affecting price, not a prohibition. So on the whole we can’t complain.”62

One way of tracing the extent to which local communities made use of their statutory power to deny cigarette sales permits is to examine the data on cigarette license receipts for the hundred or so largest cities published in the auditor of state’s annual Report on Municipal Finances to determine whether any cities reported no such receipts.63 Since the 1921 statute required the mulct tax, which applicants had to pay for the license, to be paid to the city or town treasurer and go into its general fund,64 the absence of cigarette license receipts in the uniform statewide reporting should be interpretable as the result of a city council’s blanket

60“Local and General News,” Deep River Record, July 1, 1921 (5:1). Deep River (population 487 in 1920) is about 25 miles southeast of Grinnell.
61Unfortunately, from June to October 1921 the Deep River Record neither published any minutes of any town council meeting nor referred to any council action on cigarette permits.
62Charles Cushing, “Prohibition as ‘Big Brother’ Fails to Win for Blue Laws,” NYT, May 20, 1923 (XX5).
63During the 1920s, there were a total of 107 to 111 first- and second-class cities (based on federal and state censuses), the former having a population of 15,000 or more and the latter of 2,000 to 15,000; the categories were somewhat more flexible inasmuch as once a city’s population reached these thresholds, subsequent population decreases did not cause a city to lose its status unless its population fell below 10,000 and 1,500, respectively. Compiled Code of Iowa §§ 3507-3508 at 1063 (1919); Code of Iowa §§ 5623-24 (1924). Unfortunately, for the approximately 800 incorporated towns (with a population of under 2,000) the auditor of state did not publish separate data on cigarette license receipts.
641921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, §§ 5 and 12, at 213, 214-15, 216.
denial of permits. However, although this procedure eventually functioned as expected, several start-up problems frustrate its use in the earliest years. To begin with, the state did not publish such receipts data for the first partial year of the law’s operation (July 4, 1921 to March 31, 1922). It is known that during the first two months 3,000 permits had been issued and by February 1, 1922, 3,200, and that during those first seven months in the aggregate permit fees to cities, towns, and counties had amounted to $225,000. Second, even for the first full year, 1922-23, apparently not all cities reported their cigarette license receipts, even though they had collected them. Thus, the state’s four largest cities, Des Moines, Sioux City, Davenport, and Cedar Rapids, and the sixth largest, Waterloo, all lacked entries for cigarette license receipts, although the press reported that they had issued permits for which dealers had paid the mulct tax. It seems implausible that the few cities that failed to report cigarette license receipts intermittently had actually granted, then denied, then granted permits. For example, Dubuque, the fifth largest city, reported receipts of $5,400 in 1922-23, nothing in 1923-24, and $6,600 in 1924-25.

---

66 “Golden Stream Pours in Iowa’s Coffers from Cigaret Laws,” WEC, Sept. 10, 1921 (8:4).
69 The auditor of state identified several municipalities that had failed to report as required, but the largest cities mentioned below were not among them. Auditor of State, State of Iowa: 1923: Report on Municipal Finances for the Year Ending March 31, 1923: Statistics of Cities and Towns of Iowa 5. However, one of the smallest cities, Hamburg, which was listed as having no receipts of any kind for 1923-24, was among the cities having failed to report as required. Auditor of State, State of Iowa: 1924: Report on Municipal Finances for the Year Ending March 31, 1924: Statistics of Cities and Towns of Iowa 6.
70 “The City Council,” DD&L, July 25, 1922 (8:8); see below.
This methodology identified two cities as likely candidates for further scrutiny: Grinnell, the 32nd largest city, with a population of 5,362 at the 1920 census, which did not report cigarette license receipts until fiscal year 1924-25, when it collected $675; and Indianola, the 55th largest city, with a population of 3,628 at the 1920 census, which reported no cigarette license receipts until fiscal year 1934-35, when, as the 59th largest city with a population of 3,488 at the 1930 census, it reported $525 in receipts. The struggles that underlay these bare chronologies are analyzed below.

Before proceeding to an account of those last open local conflicts over cigarette sales in Iowa for several decades, the growth of the cigarette trade in Iowa during the 1920s can be tracked by reference to the aforementioned total annual permit fees in the first- and second-class cities, which at the 1920 federal population census accounted for 925,152 or 38.5 percent of the total state population of 2,404,021, at the 1925 state census for 987,720 or 40.8 percent of the total population of 2,419,927, and at the 1930 census for 1,038,166 or 42.0 percent of the total population of 2,470,939. Keeping in mind that the receipts for the very largest cities were missing for 1922-23 and 1923-24, the total receipts developed as follows: 1922-23: $101,111.09; 1923-24: $105,038.88; 1924-25:

73See below ch. 20.

$193,953.50; 1925-26: $201,130.92; 1926-27: $208,415.00; 1927-28: $217,128.30; 1928-29: $222,049.88; 1929-30: $231,044.30. By way of comparison, stray aggregate figures for 1923-24 and 1928-29 revealed statewide local permit fees of about $300,000 and $350,000, respectively.

During the last five years, beginning with the inclusion of data for the largest cities, the mulct tax rose by about 19 percent, suggesting a modest increase in the number of permit holders. At $100 per permit in the first-class cities—at the 1920, 1925, 1930 censuses the population in 14, 15, and 16 cities, respectively exceeded 15,000—it is possible to estimate the number of permit holders in each city, which only roughly corresponded to the rank-ordering of population. Des Moines, the largest city with a population of 141,441 in 1925, collected $26,700 in receipts (its peak figure during the 1920s) in 1925-26, which would have translated into 267 permit holders. Its only close competitor, Sioux City, the second largest city with a population of 76,411, collected cigarette license receipts of $21,600, indicating 216 permit holders—a gap that by 1928-29 closed to $1,525 or only 15 permit holders. The smallest first-class city in 1925-26, Iowa City, with a population of 15,289, collected $2,275 from (presumptively)

76 “Cigarette Revenue Nets $700,078.12 to State in Year,” Davenport Democrat and Leader, July 11, 1924 (10:7-8); W. E. Hawse, “Cigarette Stamp Tax of Iowa and How Administered,” in Report of Proceedings: Third Annual Conference of Administrators of Tobacco Tax Laws 33-40 at 33 (1929). The figure for 1928-29 may have been somewhat overstated since Hawse (who was the Cigarette Revenue Department superintendent) also stated that Des Moines with “a population of 167,000, received in the neighborhood of $30,000.00” in 1928. Id. Yet, in fact Des Moines (whose population was about 25,000 lower) received cigarette permit revenue of $24,875.
about 23 permit holders. The largest second-class city, Keokuk with a population of 14,501, collected $2,300 in receipts, which at $75 per permit was (presumptively) paid by about 31 permit holders. The 15 first-class cities collected $127,775 in cigarette permit fees, which would have translated into about 1,278 permit holders; the remaining $73,355 collected by the 95 second-class cities would have been the equivalent of about 978 permit holders, for a grand total for the state of 2,256. Thus for all 110 first- and second-class cities there was one permit for 438 people, but a greater density of permits in the smaller cities: one permit for 478 people in the first-class cities and only 385 in the second-class cities. Among the first-class cities, the density ranged from one permit for 354 people in Sioux City to one for 672 people in Iowa City.\textsuperscript{77}

Whether the difference was accounted for by the permits issued by the approximately 800 towns and by numerous county boards of supervisors in unincorporated places or by some flaw in the aforementioned methodology, a total of 3,400 retail dealers in Iowa held permits in early 1923,\textsuperscript{78} which would have worked out to a little more than 700 people per permit.

Shortly before the law went into effect it was assumed that the combined impact of the mulct tax (which amounted to $50 in towns smaller than second-class cities and in unincorporated places) and the required $1,000 bond\textsuperscript{79} would \textsuperscript{77}Auditor of State, \textit{State of Iowa: 1926: Report on Municipal Finances for the Year Ending March 31, 1926: Statistics of Cities and Towns of Iowa}, table 1A at 14-15; Auditor of State, \textit{State of Iowa: 1929: Report on Municipal Finances for the Year Ending March 31, 1929: Statistics of Cities and Towns of Iowa}, table 1A at 12-13. Density may have been lower in larger cities because stores were larger. In its first year Grinnell granted so few permits that there was only one for 777 people. The equivalence between the amount of receipts and number of permit holders is not perfect since the former may have included penalty payments and been reduced by less than full amounts paid by holders who applied for permits later in the fiscal year. 1927 Iowa Laws ch. 33, at 26.

\textsuperscript{78}"Direct Tax Upon All Tobacco Sold Provided in Bill," \textit{WEC}, Mar. 8, 1923 (9:1-2 at 2).

\textsuperscript{79}In 1939 the legislature reduced the bond for retailers from $1,000 to $500 and in 1974 eliminated it altogether. 1939 Iowa Laws ch. 72, § 10.9, at 102, 109; 1974 Iowa Laws ch. 1116, § 1, at 368, 369. In 1974 Democratic Representative Robert Krause tried to amend an unrelated Senate cigarette bill by adding the bond repeal, but the amendment was deemed non-germane; a few days later the House reconsidered the vote, adopted the amendment, and passed the bill 91 to 0. \textit{State of Iowa: 1974: Journal of the House: 1974 Regular Session Sixty-Fifth General Assembly} 2165-67, 2213-14, 2263-65 (Apr. 26, 29, and May 1). The press did not report on this measure, but 34 years later Krause recalled even the details of the first amendment whose passage he as a freshman legislator had secured. The need for repeal had been suggested to him by a banker in his small town of prompt smaller groceries and other smaller stores that had been selling cigarettes illegally to stop.\textsuperscript{80} And although the financial pressure did in fact eliminate some dealers,\textsuperscript{81} the state treasurer’s office later concluded that a smaller number of stores would sell the same number of cigarettes.\textsuperscript{82}

Cigarette Sales Excise Taxes

The object of the law is to prevent the sale of cigarettes to minors, and to enable the control of the sale of cigarettes; it was not passed primarily to increase revenue.\textsuperscript{83}

[T]he more broadly prohibitive anti-tobacco legislation...has been proven to be unsatisfactory by practical experience. The penumbra of malediction once surrounding the use of tobacco has considerably faded in recent years. [T]here is reason to suggest that further experiments with this type of legislation would result in but little progress. ... It would seem to be by far the more practical course for lawmakers to regard tobacco in the light of a source of revenue only.\textsuperscript{84}

\textsuperscript{80}“Twenty-Five Dealers May Sell Cigaretts,” \textit{CRR}, June 18, 1921 (8:4) (discussing Cedar Rapids).

\textsuperscript{81}For example, in 1925 the Goreham Hotel in Grinnell requested that its permit “be cancelled on account of not wishing to pay the required tax.” “Proceedings of the City Council,” \textit{GR}, July 6, 1925 (5:4) (June 30).

\textsuperscript{82}W. E. Hawse, “Cigarette Stamp Tax of Iowa and How Administered,” in \textit{Report of Proceedings: Third Annual Conference of Administrators of Tobacco Tax Laws} 33-40 at 36 (1929). The mulct tax’s bite in 1921 can be presumed from the fact that almost 90 years on it remains unchanged, although the consumer price index has risen almost 12-fold in the interim. Iowa Code § 453A.13.3 (2010).

\textsuperscript{83}“The Cigaret Law,” \textit{Evening Tribune} (Des Moines), Sept. 9, 1921 (6:2) (edit.).

\textsuperscript{84}C. Wheatley, Jr., “Anti-Tobacco Legislation,” \textit{Law Notes} 35(11):204-206 at 206
Iowa was the first state to enact a cigarette sales tax, which quickly proved to be “such a lucrative source of state revenue” that before it had even been in effect for a full year “other states [were] casting covetous glances its way, and several requests have come to the state treasurer for copies of the law, and a report on its administration.” 85. The sales tax was also a much more sensitive indicator of cigarette sales than the sales permit mulct tax. Table 7 shows the amount collected from July 4, 1921 through June 30, 1932:

---

86. “State Gets Big Revenue from the Cigarets,” DD&L, June 13, 1922 (2:1).
The Aftermath of Licensure in Iowa: 1921-1939

Table 7: Annual Collection (in $) of the Iowa Cigarette Stamp Sales Tax, July 4, 1921 to June 30, 193287

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Amount</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1921-22</td>
<td>593,279.74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1922-23</td>
<td>640,733.89</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1923-24</td>
<td>700,078.12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1924-25</td>
<td>777,358.99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1925-26</td>
<td>828,293.13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1926-27</td>
<td>902,516.03</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1927-28</td>
<td>1,103,128.04</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1928-29</td>
<td>1,247,997.12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1929-30</td>
<td>1,371,683.44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1930-31</td>
<td>1,406,928.59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1931-32</td>
<td>1,207,137.94</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

As early as January 1923 the state treasurer’s office had commented that the increased tax collections reflected (not so much a higher rate of compliance but) 87Executive Council of the State of Iowa, Census of Iowa for the Year 1925, at lix (data for 1921-22); State of Iowa: 1932: Report of the Treasurer of State for the Biennial Period July 1, 1930, to June 30, 1932, at 41 (data for all other years). The state treasurer initially reported that the excise tax collected on cigarette and cigarette papers during the first year the law was in effect amounted to $590,918.99. State of Iowa: 1922: Report of the Treasurer of State for the Biennial Period July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1922, at 5. In the next biennial report the figure for 1921-22 given as $490,918.99 was presumably a typographical error. State of Iowa: 1925: Report of the Treasurer of State for the Biennial Period July 1, 1922, to June 30, 1924, at 5. The figure in the table, taken from the 1925 state census volume, presumably corrected the initial figure, just as the 1932 state treasurer’s report corrected the initial published figure for 1922-23. On June 2, 1921, State Treasurer Burbank estimated that one company selling cigarettes in various cities and towns in Iowa “will pay more than $70,000 yearly as their share of the tax due the state from the sale of cigarettes. Another company will contribute more than that....” “Heavy Cigarette Tax,” Times-Republican (Bedford), June 6, 1921 (2:4). The article did not identify either company and no other newspaper was found with a more complete report.

increased sales caused by lower cigarette prices during the second half of 1922.88

Representing a tax of one-tenth of a cent per cigarette, the tax collections multiplied by 1,000 conveniently translated into an approximation of total annual cigarette sales and consumption, which more than doubled during the eight years ending with the onset of the Great Depression. Although the tax also covered cigarette papers, contemporaries typically assumed the full equivalence, as, for example, was expressed in this press account: “The full amount collected for 1928 was $1,183,032. This means that 1,183,000,000 were smoked in Iowa last year.”89 The periodic publication of cigarette tax revenue data thus finally offered the public for the first time ever the opportunity to gauge the consumption of cigarettes in an individual state—information that theretofore only cigarette companies had possessed but not shared with government officials.90 For example, in June 1922 the press noted that the $2,000 a day in tax revenue collected on average during the first eight days of the month reported by the assistant state treasurer in charge of cigarette revenue collections meant that two million cigarettes a day were smoked in Iowa, almost the equivalent of one for every man, woman, and child: “This enormous consumption of the slim, white, ‘fags,’ while possibly proving injurious to cigaret addicts, is proving a very profitable source of revenue to the state....”91 By mid-1924, when the state

---

88“Licenses for Cigarets Give State Million,” DD&L, Jan. 7, 1923 (3:4). How sellers managed to lower prices while having to pay the new sales tax and permit mulct tax is unclear.

89J. Jarnagin, “News and Comment About Iowa People and Events,” Iowa Recorder (Greene), Mar. 27, 1929 (9:1-3 at 3).

90In 1927 the legislature amended the cigarette law to require (non-wholesaler) retail permit holders to file with the treasurer of state a monthly report detailing the number of cigarettes they had bought during the previous month, the names of the suppliers, and the kinds and brands of cigarettes. 1927 Iowa Laws ch. 33, § 3, at 26, 27 (codified at Iowa Code § 1570-b1). The onset of this reporting requirement in 1927 was associated with a very marked rate of increase in revenue collection. Neil Jacoby, “Statistics of State Cigarette Revenues and Cigarette Sales, with Particular Reference to Iowa” at 2-3 (Address at a dinner meeting of members of the staff of the Iowa Cigarette Tax Administration, Des Moines, June 1931), in Collected Articles and Papers of Neil H. Jacoby, Vol. 1: 1930-1942, at 26-33 at 27-28 (1975) (available only at Rosenfeld Library, Anderson School of Management, UCLA). The monthly reports do not, however, appear to have been published.

91“State Gets Big Revenue from the Cigarets,” DD&L, June 13, 1922 (2:1). Whereas earlier records had showed the $2,000 a day average for working days only, by August it included Sundays and holidays. “Iowans Smoking over Two Million Cigaretts a Day,” DD&L, Sept. 8, 1922 (2:3).
treasurer’s office was forecasting that annual sales would reach one billion “fags,” it estimated that daily consumption was on the order of 2.5 million. A year later state cigarette tax collectors estimated that “Iowans Smoke Up Nearly 3 Million Cigarets Every Day.”

A nationally unique contemporaneous opportunity to calculate cigarette sales on a county and even city level was given in 1930 to Neil H. Jacoby, a research assistant at the University of Chicago studying state sales taxation in general and state tobacco taxation in particular (who went on to become dean of the UCLA School of Management and a member of President Eisenhower’s Council of Economic Advisers). Because Iowa’s tax had been in force for the longest period and was also the only one showing tax collections for cigarettes alone, and the trends, if there were any to be discerned, had already had time to appear, Iowa, he explained at a dinner meeting with the staff of the Iowa Cigarette Tax Administration in June 1931, afforded “the best evidence for study” of cigarette tax yields. At the time there were no other data available on cigarette sales at the county or city level.

---

92 Ed Dose, “Iowa Launches Drive to Get Cigaret Taxes,” DD&L, June 5, 1924 (2:4).
93 “Iowans Smoke Up Nearly 3 Million Cigarets Every Day,” WEC, July 2, 1925 (2:8).
95 Neil Jacoby, “Statistics of State Cigarette Revenues and Cigarette Sales, with Particular Reference to Iowa” at 1-2 (Address at a dinner meeting of members of the staff of the Iowa Cigarette Tax Administration, Des Moines, June 1931), in Collected Articles and Papers of Neil H. Jacoby, Vol. 1: 1930-1942, at 26-33 at 26-27 (1975) (available only at Rosenfeld Library, Anderson School of Management, UCLA). In 1975, four years before his death, Jacoby personally assembled and had bound and cataloged at the UCLA business library a set of “all available articles and papers, published and unpublished” that he had written during the previous 45 years; he excluded, however, “unpublished monographic studies of considerable length,” which would have made the collection “far too bulky.” Collected Articles and Papers of Neil H. Jacoby, Vol. 1: 1930-1942, at iii (1975). This informal paper “presented some results of a yet unfinished statistical study on cigarette tax yields and cigarette consumption, with particular reference to the state of Iowa.” Id. at 1 (1:26). It seems likely that the paper was related to a larger study that he wrote the next year: Neil H. Jacoby, “The Estimation of Yields for State Tobacco Taxes,” prepared for the Social Science Research Committee, University of Chicago (Feb. 1932) (unpublished), which was cited a year later by E. Schoenberg, “The Demand Curve for Cigarettes,” Journal of Business 6(1):15-35 at 18 n.5 (Jan. 1933). Since the page number cited by Schoenberg was 116, it is possible that the paper, which does not appear in Jacoby’s collection, was excluded because it fell into the category of “unpublished monographic studies of considerable length.” Neither the UCLA management school library nor dean’s office nor Jacoby’s son was able to find the study; likewise, librarians consumption or sales (which he used synonymously) for any state. Jacoby needed such data to estimate cigarette tax yields in various states, determine the volume of evasion achieved by consumers who bought cigarettes in non-taxing states, and discover heavy and light revenue-yielding areas in each state that did tax cigarettes. His first choice as a source for such data had proved inaccessible: “The different cigarette manufacturing companies to whom an urgent application was made for sales data by states or geographical areas, politely refused to divulge any information whatsoever.” The next best sources were the states that required dealers to file reports periodically on their cigarette purchases (of which Iowa had been one since 1927). Fortunately for Jacoby, William E. Hawse, the superintendent of the Iowa Cigarette Revenue Department, gave him at the University of Chicago were unable to find the paper within the records of the Social Science Research Committee located there. Both of these papers appear to be related to an address that, as W. E. Hawse, the superintendent of the Iowa Cigarette Revenue Department explained, “a gentleman...from Chicago” was supposed to present on September 2, 1931 to the annual conference of state tobacco tax administrators that took place in Des Moines that year; he was to have been on the program, but with “time pressing us too much to give him any time now,” he was, instead, to “present the facts that he has compiled on the tobacco tax through the Business Research of the Chicago University at the banquet tonight.” Report of Proceedings: Fifth Annual Conference of Administrators of Tobacco Tax Laws: September 1-2, 1931, at 72. At the next conference, M. F. Snider, the head of the Tobacco Division of the U.S. Internal Revenue Dept., referring to the previous year’s conference, mentioned a “young fellow, an economist from the University of Chicago, who had been given access to the figures of collection in the State of Iowa by counties, and his analysis of them was very good,” singling out the data for the county in which the University of Iowa was located as showing the difference between rural and urban consumption. Report of Proceedings: Sixth Annual Conference of Administrators of Tobacco Tax Laws: September 16-17, 1932, at 32 (statement by M. F. Snider, head, Tobacco Div., U. S. Internal Rev. Dept.).

1933

98Hawse’s career sheds interesting light on the background and ethics of enforcement officials. A 27-year-old bakery clerk in Grundy Center at the time of the 1920 population census, the Virginian was a world war veteran, who was an inspector in the Cigarette Department from 1921 to 1928. When he left he bought a cigar store in Waterloo and obtained a cigarette sales license; later in 1928 when he was appointed superintendent of access to the Cardex file reporting individual dealers’ purchases and cigarettes and stamps, enabling him to calculate for 1930 each dealer’s sales and, cumulatively, those for the state and by county.\textsuperscript{99}

With cigarette sales at 1,340,484,000 in Iowa in 1930, per capita consumption was 543 or about 58 percent of the 940 recorded for the United States in 1929. With no reason to believe that Iowa’s figure was the country’s lowest and knowing that some states must have had averages much higher than 940, Jacoby raised the question as to what made cigarette consumption relatively high or low in any state, and tentatively answered it by reference to relative population density. To test his hypothesis, he constructed a scatter diagram plotting population per square mile and per capita cigarette consumption for each of Iowa’s 99 counties.\textsuperscript{100} Unfortunately for purposes of historical research, the fruits of Jacoby’s unique access to this unique data set have been irretrievably lost because Jacoby failed to include any of the charts in the sole copy of his unpublished paper that he left behind.\textsuperscript{101} Consequently, all that remains is his very brief discussion of the data, which began by pointing out that since the points were not closely strung out along an upward and rightward slanting line, the relationship between greater population density and high per capital consumption was “not significantly close,” although generally densely populated counties were also characterized by high consumption. However, he did, as another missing scatter diagram revealed, find a close relationship on the county level between total cigarette consumption and total population. Equally interesting to him was whether the deviations from the line of average relationships were readily explainable. For example, the very high per capita consumption (943 cigarettes) in Johnson county, the site of the State University of Iowa, relative to its total population was “undoubtedly due to the high percentage of cigarette-smoking individuals in its population” (the basis for which he did not mention). At the other end, Dubuque, Des Moines, Lee, Pottawattamie, Appanoose and Page counties’ relatively low per capita consumption—he mentioned no numbers—relative to their population density was explicable by reference to their location on the borders with non-cigarette-taxing states. Finally, Warren county’s especially low (but unfortunately unspecified) per capita consumption relative to its population density he explained as a function of the strong Methodist community there, which had resulted in the cigarettes’ not being purchasable in the county seat of Indianola.

\textsuperscript{99}Neil Jacoby, “Statistics of State Cigarette Revenues and Cigarette Sales, with Particular Reference to Iowa” at 4 (Address at a dinner meeting of members of the staff of the Iowa Cigarette Tax Administration, Des Moines, June 1931), in Collected Articles and Papers of Neil H. Jacoby, Vol. 1: 1930-1942, at 26-33 at 29 (1975). Since dealers’ duty to provide monthly data began in 1927, presumably Jacoby had access to the data for all of 1928 and 1929 as well, which are now also no longer extant.

\textsuperscript{101}The Iowa State Archives does not have the underlying data from the Cigarette Revenue Department or any other relevant documents. Email from Jeffrey Dawson to Marc Linder.

Jacobi also separately compiled the sales data for 21 cities with a population above 10,000. Although this scatter diagram has also been lost, it showed that per capita sales there were much higher than in the counties: with only 29 per cent of the population, these cities accounted for 33 per cent of permit-holding dealers and more than 50 per cent of cigarettes sold. In particular, the two largest cities, Des Moines and Sioux City, accounted for 23 per cent and 13 per cent, respectively, of all cigarettes sold in all Iowa cities. The diagram indicated that the 21 cities were “grouped fairly closely about a line of average relationship,” meaning that in cities with more than 10,000 inhabitants, once the population was known, per capita sales could be predicted within a small margin of error at about 1,027. Overall, per capital consumption for cities was 944 compared to only 543 for counties.

Enforcement

[T]he new law provides for a tax on cigaret sales which will add materially to state revenues. The danger is that we may be too apt to collect the revenue without enforcing the other and more important feature of the law.

Mayor Ahrens, of Sac City, has authorized the town marshal “to arrest every boy under 21 years of age seen smoking in public. The boy will be brought before the mayor and required by law to tell where he obtained his cigaret.” ... The same attitude all over the state will make it decidedly interesting with minors who persist in looking with favor upon the seductive coffin nail.

A corps of secret operatives is constantly on the move in the state seeing that the cigaret law is enforced, Mr. McCoy declares.

105 “The Cigaret Law,” Evening Tribune (Des Moines), July 5, 1921 (10:1-2 at 2) (edit.).

106 J. W. Jarnagin, “News and Comment About Iowa People and Events,” Spirit Lake Beacon, July 21, 1921 (32:3-6 at 3). This paragraph of the article was printed adjacent to a three-column advertisement for Chesterfield.

At the beginning of July 1921, when the city council in Decorah, a northeastern Iowa town of about 4,000 with a heavy Norwegian concentration, issued eight cigarette sales permits, the local newspaper remarked that they represented about one-fourth of the dealers who had been selling cigarettes during the prohibition period.\textsuperscript{108} In order to market their legality, the next week six of these permittees—including owners of a hotel, a lunch parlor, and two restaurants—took out a large joint advertisement in the weekly paper under the heading: “Buy Your Cigarettes of Decorah’s Licensed Dealers.”\textsuperscript{109}

The dealers’ judgment of Decorah’s law-abidingness may have been exceptional. Less than three weeks after the new cigarette licensure and tax law had gone into effect the first arrest in Iowa for selling cigarettes without revenue stamps took place in Davenport on July 23, 1921.\textsuperscript{110} A “new situation” arose in state “law enforcement circles” by virtue of the law’s having turned over enforcing powers “entirely” to the treasurer of state’s office.\textsuperscript{111} The number of men in the “picked group” in pursuit of bootleggers was kept secret so that, despite having badges numbered from 1 to 19, no one outside the treasurer’s office knew exactly how many.\textsuperscript{112} They were, boasted their boss, Clarence C. McCoy, in mid-1922:

“At work all the time. They do not make their presence known in a town until they have evidence they are after, and the tax violators under arrest. They do not cooperate with local officials. Cases are on record where they have gone into a town, secured the evidence, made the arrests, and had fines imposed in less than an hour after their arrival.

“The number of cigarettes sold daily in the state without the revenue stamps is exceedingly small....”\textsuperscript{113}

\textsuperscript{108}“Eight Cigarette Licenses in Decorah,” Decorah Journal, July 13, 1921 (1:4).
\textsuperscript{109}Decorah Journal, July 20, 1921 (3:5-7).
\textsuperscript{110}“Cigaret Stamps Are in Demand,” DMC, July 27, 1921, 38(182) (14:1).
\textsuperscript{111}“State Gets Big Revenue from the Cigarets,” DD&L, June 13, 1922 (2:1). Two weeks after the law had gone into effect one newspaper erroneously reported that Attorney General Gibson would be enforcing the cigarette law because the treasurer of state was given no law enforcement officers. “Gibson to Enforce New Cigaret Laws,” DMC, July 18, 1921, 38(174) (8:2).
\textsuperscript{112}“State Gets Big Revenue from the Cigarets,” DD&L, June 13, 1922 (2:1).
\textsuperscript{113}“State Gets Big Revenue from the Cigarets,” DD&L, June 13, 1922 (2:1). In at least one instance when agents did cooperate with local officials by requesting that the deputy sheriff in Davenport obtain search warrants for 31 raids, a district court judge, overruling the issuing justice of the peace, later held them illegal because the deputy sheriff, knowing nothing about the facts of the alleged violations, had merely sworn to the warrants at the state agents’ request. “Court Order Holding Writs Illegal Stands,” DD&L, July 26, 1925.
A year later, reviewing the first 18 months of the law’s operation, McCoy reported that under a “program of rigid prosecution for all violators” 104 had been arrested, of whom 96 were convicted; four cases were still pending and only four dismissed. Local governments had promptly revoked the permits of 53 of the violators, no explanation being given as to why the city and town councils had not complied with the law’s mandate that they revoke the permits of all violators. The state treasurer’s office considered the cigarette act “one of the smoothest working laws of its type” in Iowa because the “fact that revenue stamps must be placed on every package...makes it immediately patent to the purchaser whether the dealer he patronizes is complying with the law.”

This conspicuousness would have been relevant only if much enforcement had been driven by customers’ denunciations to the agency, but the press did not indicate that the secret treasury agents’ swoops were in fact based on such information.

The superintendent of the cigarette revenue department of the state treasurer’s office, 47-year-old McCoy, was a protégé of William Burbank, the state treasurer. McCoy had also been in charge of the motor license department under Burbank when the latter was Black Hawk county treasurer. During World War I, leaving his job as a traveling salesman, McCoy became a Red Cross official. After his election as state treasurer, Burbank hired McCoy to work in the collateral inheritance department in February 1921 and on June 1 transferred him to a clerk position to prepare a new department to collect the new cigarette tax and enforce the law. Then on July 1, Burbank transferred McCoy, who was deemed an expert accountant, to the superintendent’s position, thus making him (12:1). Although the attorney general ordered an appeal to the Iowa Supreme Court, no such appeal appears to have been decided. “Carry Cigaret Litigation to Supreme Court,” DD&L, July 31, 1925 (10:7).

---

“Licenses for Cigaretts Give State Million,” DD&L, Jan. 7, 1923 (3:4) (headline incorrect and misleading since article was not about licenses). In early March 1923, five dealers were arrested by state agents in LeMars for selling cigarettes to minors. “Direct Tax upon All Tobacco Sold Is Provided in Bill,” WEC, Mar. 8, 1923 (9:1-2 at 2).

For an extreme position speculating that the new law might eventually have to be “entered in the legislative joke book along side of [sic] many other side-slitting [sic] comedies which purport to be laws,” see “Is It a Farce?” Jackson Sentinel (Maquoketa), Aug. 16, 1921 (4:1) (edit.).

At the 1920 census McCoy was returned as having no occupation; in 1910 he was a dealer in mineral lands (or perhaps bonds); and in 1900 he was a music dealer (HeritageQuest). He died in California in 1945. “Friends Notified of Sudden Death of Former Resident,” Progress-Review (La Porte-City), June 27, 1946 (8:7).

an assistant state treasurer. 118 Little more than a month into his superintendency, McCoy found himself the object of a legal action filed in Polk county district court by a Spanish-American war veteran, Fred G. McCutcheon, under the newly enacted Soldier’s Preference law to force Burbank to hire him instead of McCoy. 119 That law, which had gone into effect on April 12, provided that in every public department and on all public works on the state level and in all political subdivisions, honorably discharged army and navy soldiers, sailors, marines, and nurses in wars from the Civil War to the world war were entitled to preference in appointment, employment, and promotion “over other persons of equal qualifications”; whenever such a person applied for such appointment or employment, the official charged with filling the position was required, before appointing or employing anyone, to investigate his or her qualifications and appoint or employ him or her if he or she was man or woman of good moral character. A refusal to allow the preference entitled the person to a right of action for mandamus to right the wrong. Excluded from the act was the “position of...deputy of an official or department” or “any person holding a strictly confidential relation to the appointing officer.” 120 Arguing at a hearing on Burbank’s demurrer at the end of September were a former Supreme Court judge, speaking for 19 lawyers who volunteered to represent McCutcheon, and Attorney General Gibson for Burbank. Oddly, at the same time, the Iowa branch of the American Legion, while professing interest in enforcing the new preference law, disavowed any interest in this or any similar suit. 121

Though district court Judge James C. Hume in October refused to sustain Burbank’s demurrer, thus ruling in McCutcheon’s favor, his “somewhat humorous discussion” of the case openly “ridiculed” the preference law as “freak legislation,” and, since the position in dispute involved enforcement of the new 118 “C. C. McCoy Chosen Head Cigaret Tax Collector in Iowa,” WEC, May 4, 1921 (1:8); “M’Coy’s Record thru War Good,” WEC, Aug. 24, 1921 (6:6).

119 “Test Recent Iowa Law out on W. J. Burbank,” Sunday Times Tribune (Waterloo), Aug. 7, 1921 (1:1); “M’Coy’s Record thru War Good,” WEC, Aug. 24, 1921 (6:6). The plaintiff was perhaps the Fred McCutcheon of Sioux City who had unsuccessfully run for chief clerk of the Iowa House of Representatives in January. “MacFarlane Choice for Speaker,” ICP-C, Jan. 8, 1921 (1:8). No such person was returned at the 1920 population census; the only person by that name was a 66-year-old laborer in Fairfield. A Fred McCutchten, an insurance agent born in 1875 was returned in the censuses of 1900 (living in Iowa City), 1910 (living in Onowa), and 1915 (living in Sioux City) and, spelled McCutchinn, of 1920 (living in Des Moines).
120 1921 Iowa Laws ch. 166, §§ 2-3, at 162-63.
121 “Vets Preference Case Before Court,” CREG, Sept. 28, 1921 (3:5).
cigarette law, threw in his “contempt” for that statute for good measure, characterizing it as “the product of prejudice and conceit.” More generally, he declared that legislatures had long been “subject to ridiculous and illogical enactments.” Rejecting the state’s argument, Hume ruled that if the legislature had intended the person appointed by the state treasurer to enforce the cigarette law to be a “confidential adjunct to the office the measure would doubtless have so stated.” The attorney general’s office immediately announced that it would appeal the decision to the Supreme Court. In the interim McCoy retained his position.\footnote{Freak Legislation Ridiculed by Judge,” \textit{CREG}, Oct. 10, 1921 (3:1). See also “Judge Rules Against M’Coy,” \textit{Progress-Review} (La Porte City), Oct. 13, 1921 (1:1). The legislature included the broad and unspecific confidentiality provision in the statute when it was first enacted in 1913, eight years before enactment of the cigarette law and creation of the position at issue. McCoy denied the press claim that according to the decision he could remain in his position but not be paid. “C. C. McCoy Explains Opinion Rendered by Judge,” \textit{Progress-Review} (La Porte City), Oct. 20, 1921 (6:2).}

Having retained former attorney general H. M. Havner\footnote{See above ch. 14 on Havner’s enforcement of the anti-cigarette law.} to assist in his defense, Burbank would offer as his main contention on appeal that under the law the soldier must be given preference if other things were equal, which in this case they were not.\footnote{“Soldier Preference Case Now Goes to Trial on Its Merits,” \textit{WEC}, Oct. 25, 1921 (11:1).} Since McCutcheon did not replace McCoy, Burbank presumably ultimately prevailed on this claim, which he intended to substantiate in large part by reference to the proceedings in McCutcheon’s divorce case, for which purpose he employed the lawyer who had represented Mrs. McCutcheon to assist the attorney general.\footnote{“Soldier Preference Law to Be Tested in Burbank’s Office,” \textit{WEC}, Dec. 19, 1921 (9:1). This article stated that the trial would take place within a few weeks, but the press appears not to have reported on further proceedings. See also “Iowa News Notes,” \textit{Adams County Free Press} (Corning), Nov. 12, 1921 (6:4-6 at 5). The Polk County Clerks Office was unable to locate any file on the case, McCutcheon in any name index, or a docket number corresponding to the time when the case was filed. Email from Angie Johnson to Marc Linder (Dec. 3, 2007). Fred Clifton McCutcheon’s death on Sept. 17, 1922 may explain why his suit was apparently never prosecuted to conclusion or why, if he was successful, he never replaced McCoy. \url{http://www.familysearch.org}.}

In 1925, when McCoy announced that he would leave the treasurer’s office to become a candidate in the Republican primaries for secretary of state, the press reported that he was being backed by the same Ku Klux Klan elements that had supported Burbank when he ran for the gubernatorial nomination in 1924.\footnote{Ed. Dose, “McCoy Backed by Burbank’s Klan Element,” \textit{DD&L}, May 30, 1925}
From the outset McCoy talked and acted tough. He frequently appeared before city councils to persuade them to apply the strict letter of the law. At the beginning of 1922 he asked the council in Cedar Rapids to revoke permanently the permits of two dealers who had recently been convicted of selling cigarettes without revenue stamps\(^{127}\) (although the statute mandated revocation for a violation and merely prohibited reissuance of a permit before two years had passed).\(^{128}\)

In February 1922, about seven months after the law had gone into effect, he reminded “everyone in Iowa dealing in cigarettes and cigarette papers that the law has teeth enough to make itself felt” and gave warning to “‘watch your step.’ Revenue agents are scouring the state at all times and experience shows that the hand of the law is felt in many unexpected places.” While—for reasons unknown—absolving Burbank of any responsibility for the law’s enactment, McCoy stressed that the former’s desire to be fair but firm entailed that violators had to be prosecuted. He was also able to boast of the enforcement successes that the state had already achieved (although the factual basis for some of his claims was not always clear). To begin with, more than 95 percent of 3,200 permit holders were “living up to the letter of the law. A few are violators and they are being apprehended and prosecuted.” During the act’s first half year, the state had “secured conviction in every case of violation except one....” Of unstamped cigarettes sales were “very light”; although he insisted that the “sale of cigarettes to minors in Iowa is practically wiped out,” McCoy made no claims about the suppression of smoking by minors.\(^{129}\)

A squad of the cigarette revenue department’s agents paid special attention to all of Iowa’s county fairs in pursuit of concessionaires who sold cigarettes without revenue stamps. After the first such arrest in 1922 had resulted in a justice of the peace’s meting out a $100 fine, McCoy issued a warning that his department “will not countenance any violation of the cigarette law any place in the state during the fair season.”\(^{130}\) In order to implement the law’s ban on sales to minors, McCoy institutionalized statewide cooperation with the Boy Scouts, which as an organization “does not approve of cigarettes for minors and does not use them, and is ready and willing to assist as pals and help to keep them clean so that they will not form the cigarette habit.” The assistance contemplated by

\(^{128}\)1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 3, at 213, 214.

McCoy and the Boy Scouts, which appears to have involved sting operations, was especially useful in the case of a tobacco dealer who “has what is commonly known as free papers or the ‘makings’ and furnishes them to minors, or puts them into a receptacles or in the back yard of his place of business where they are convenient to minors,” and who was as guilty as anyone selling directly to minors.¹³¹

In the course of their zealous enforcement efforts McCoy’s agents were not above entrapment. Thus in 1923 two departmental enforces entered a candy kitchen in the small town of Spencer to buy cigarettes: “as the clerk was about to put the revenue stamps on the state agent told him not to bother as he often bought them without the stamps. After the transaction the officers made their business known.” The owner was fined $100 plus costs.¹³² Pursuant to the new law’s provision mandating the confiscation and forfeiture to the state of all cigarettes in the possession or place of any offender convicted of violating any provisions of the sales tax section,¹³³ the agents confiscated $6,000 worth of the proprietor’s cigarettes. Although the 1909 search and seizure law, which the legislature left untouched in 1921, mandated the destruction of seized cigarettes, the state did not destroy the cigarettes, but “usually” disposed of them by sending them to disabled soldiers at the state hospital at Knoxville.¹³⁴ (The next year, after the legislature had revised the Code, requiring seized cigarettes to be sold with the proceeds to go to the county school fund, such lethal gifts presumably...

Jury nullification was not unheard of in selling-to-minors stings. One enforcement agent related that with the help of a county attorney he had secured the services of a 14-year-old boy whom he accompanied into a billiard parlor after having received complaints about sales to boys regardless of age. Following the sale he and the boy filed an information with a justice of the peace, who issued a warrant; the owner pleaded not guilty and asked for a change of venue because the old judge “looked as though he would deal out justice with a capital ‘J.’” When the defendant asked for a jury trial before the next court, the “bailiff went out into the city park and gathered a jury of six loafers who happened to be there”; at trial, after the boy and the agent had testified and the owner had denied the charges, the jury took five minutes to return a verdict of not guilty. The next day the agent happened to see the foreman and asked him about the evidence on which the jury had based its verdict; biting off a generous chew of tobacco, the foreman replied: “Just like the damn prohibition law, don’t amount to anything’…” Report of Proceedings: Fifth Annual Conference of Administrators of Tobacco Tax Laws: September 1-2, 1931, at 50-51.

¹³²“Near-By News Notes,” HI, Mar. 8, 1923 (3:1-6 at 3).
¹³³1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 13, at 213, 216.
¹³⁴“Near-By News Notes,” HI, Mar. 8, 1923 (3:1-6 at 3). stopped.)

In fact, the Cigarette Revenue Department systematically sought to identify dealers who might be inclined to sell cigarettes without tax stamps. When, as field agent J. L. Hicks explained to his counterparts from other states gathered at the Annual Conference of Administrators of Tobacco Tax Laws, which in 1931 happened to take place in Des Moines, auditors determined that a dealer was short on revenue stamps purchased, his name was written down in the “‘Little Black Book’” that all the enforcement agents carried with them, and each time they happened to be in that dealer’s town, they would “purchase a few packages or a carton of cigarettes from him and eventually he gets a little more careless and we are able to make the purchase without revenue and when this happens, we take him into court....”

Although the press was fond of opining that it had not heard of minors’ having any difficulty buying cigarettes, McCoy’s men also descended upon schools, even in small communities. For example, toward the end of 1923 a state agent and a deputy sheriff raided a school in Gilman (population 490), where in the course of a search they found “‘pills or the ‘makins’s’” on a number of boys, thus providing evidence that they had been illegally supplied with cigarettes, and threw a “‘[s]care” into the local “[l]aw [b]reakers.”

In some cities and counties enforcement was rigorous from the outset. For example, the Black Hawk county attorney notified the sheriff in writing the day after the law went into effect that he was to investigate complaints of persons alleged to have sold or kept for sale without a permit: “‘You will report to this office in reference to such investigation and a rigid prosecution will follow to all persons whom the facts show to have been illegally selling cigarettes.’”

Contending that it was one of the law’s bedrock purposes to “enable the authorities to check up on the distribution [of cigarettes] at all times, the Muscatine county attorney issued an opinion that it was a violation of the law to distribute them as premiums in games or contests without a permit.

The 1921 cigarette sales law provided that any city council that issued a permit “shall revoke the permit of any person who has violated any of the

---

135See below this ch.
137“The Cigarette Law,” Evening Tribune (Des Moines), Sept. 9, 1921 (6:2) (edit.).
140“After Violators of Cigaret Law,” WEC, July 6, 1921 (3:1). provisions of this act, and no such permit can be issued for a period of two years thereafter. Superintendant McCoy reiterated in February 1922 that the legislature’s intent was to “create a prohibitive measure,” attaching to the conditional privilege to sell cigarettes “a command to city and town councils and boards of supervisors to take these privileges away from anyone on the first offense.” In May 1922, in revoking a cigarette sales permit the Waterloo city council adopted the view pressed upon it by McCoy that not only was revocation mandatory on conviction for a first offense, but that it was “not even necessary to convict a dealer in court in order that his license be revoked” since the statute mandated revocation whenever any permit holder violated any of its provisions, although court conviction was “absolute proof” of violation. (To be sure, McCoy’s more relaxed interpretation became textually impossible once the 1924 Iowa Code changed the language from “has violated” to “has been convicted of violating.”)

It is unclear why an attorney general’s ruling was needed to interpret this unambiguous command, but a dispute broke out in Davenport in 1922 over canceling the license of William Smith, a cigar store owner, who had been convicted of selling cigarettes to minors. When the Davenport city council, pursuant to Attorney General Ben Gibson’s recently issued ruling that it was mandatory to revoke the licenses of those guilty of violating the law, finally ended the dispute by revoking Smith’s permit, his lawyer, Glenn Kelly, insisted that the council had “now made it possible for the state to accomplish what is a virtual cigaret prohibition” in the city. His contention was based on the assertion that under a mandatory revocation regime it was “an easy matter for the state to bring about convictions of practically every local cigaret seller, since there is no certain way of knowing, at the time of the sale, whether a patron is or is not a minor.” To be sure, Kelly’s alarmist claim was untenable: a cigarette dealer

142 1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 3, at 213, 214.
144 “City Smoke Laws Held Sufficient,” WEC, May 23, 1922 (9:3-4). The relevant statutory provision was 1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 3, at 213, 214.
145 See below this ch. By 1924 McCoy also announced that there would be stringent enforcement of the law voiding all permits on which the mulct tax had not been paid by July 1. Ed Dose, “Iowa Launches Drive to Get Cigaret Taxes,” DD&L, June 5, 1924 (2:5).
The Aftermath of Licensure in Iowa: 1921-1939

intent on not violating the law had means at his disposal to avoid selling to minors by leaning on the side of caution. One means that he did not have was erroneously reported as available under the statute itself by the Howard County Times, just two days after the statute’s effective date: “A young man wishing to purchase cigarettes must sign a paper stating that he is at least 21 years of age. Then when the poll-tax collector calls on him and he declares he is not 21 years of age he is at once in the clutches of the law and subject to severe penalty.”147 In fact, as Walter French, the Black Hawk county attorney in Waterloo, had written to the sheriff the day before: “‘The merchant sells cigarettes to minors at his own peril. Representations made by the minor to the merchant that he is 21 does [sic] not constitute a defense in behalf of the merchant.’”148

Cigarette dealers soon (unsuccessfully) lobbied the Iowa legislature to amend the law to criminalize such misrepresentation,149 although at least in Waterloo dealers reported that, knowing that they would be unable to get cigarettes, few minors tried to evade the law by trying to “‘fool us with their age.’”150 In the meantime, however, an understanding judiciary could be of some help. For example, in Muscatine the first prosecution under the new law took place in September 1921 involving Peter Callas, a cafe owner, who pleaded guilty to selling cigarettes to Robert LaGrille, 19-year-old barber. In offering the plea on Callas’s behalf, his lawyer, Everett Richman, argued that he had not wilfully violated the law because the “LaGrille boy [had] misrepresented his age,” throwing in that Callas did not operate a tobacco store, but “merely keeps cigarettes for the accommodation of the cafe patrons.” In an effort to deflect attention and responsibility from his client, Richman informed Justice Harry Horst that: “‘I believe that there are several tobacco shops in town where cigarettes are sold to minors...because I see boys smoking cigarettes on the streets

147“No Cigarettes for Boys,” HCT, July 6, 1921 (1:2). Two months later a capital city paper repeated this error by claiming that a “minor who misrepresents his age in order to purchase cigarettes is liable to punishment.” “The Cigaret Law,” Evening Tribune (Des Moines), Sept. 9, 1921 (6:2) (edit.).
148“After Violators of Cigaret Law,” WEC, July 6, 1921 (3:1). In 1917, after Oregon had enacted a stricter no-sales-to-minors law, one county district attorney sent out a circular pointing out “the fact that since the War Census registration of all males citizens between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-one...the production or non-production, by a civilian seeking to purchase cigarettes, of his blue registration card, will quickly inform the seller whether or not such person may lawfully buy cigarettes.” Walter H. Evans, “To Whom It May Concern” (n.d.), Bates No. 501994501.
149See below this ch.
150“Few Minors Try to Buy Cigarettes,” WEC, July 20, 1921 (7:4).
every day. The police should be able to see them as well.” In imposing the $25 minimum fine for a first offense against the no-sales-to-minors provision, Justice Horst observed that he had taken the circumstances of the case into consideration. Three years later Attorney General Gibson cut the ground from under another collusive ploy when he opined that a written order from an adult authorizing the minor to buy cigarettes for him or her would not relieve the seller of liability for violating the ban on sales to minors. In the meantime, however, some held that the law was defective because it failed to impose a jail sentence on minors who refused to divulge the source of their cigarettes. In the small south-central town of Deep River, for example, sensing that more boys were smoking than ever, the town council decided in August 1922 to find out who was selling them the cigarettes. But when it summoned a number of minors to appear at its regular monthly meeting to “tell what they knew about the prevalence of the cigarette habit...the city dads reckoned without their host. When they questioned the boys they found them as dumb as oysters regarding their course of supply, each one refusing to divulge the name.” Confronted with this stonewalling, the mayor assessed a five-dollar fine on each one, but the local press speculated that the threat of jail might induce youngsters to be more forthcoming.

The Onset of the Long-Term Stagnation of Statewide Tobacco and Smoking Regulation

The state senate yesterday...defeated the additional one cent tax proposed to be placed on cigarettes. ... [S]mokers would get their cigarettes by mail from other states, thereby paying no tax whatever on them, except the federal tax. [T]here is now being paid six cents on each package of cigarettes as a federal tax, and in addition to that two cents as a state tax, making a total of eight cents that is already being paid. If this was increased to nine cents, this together with city license of $75 to $100 per year paid by the retailers would almost make the handling of them prohibitive. In view of the fact that these cigarettes are sold now to the retailers for 12 cents a package, it would leave but little profit for the dealer or manufacturer unless the tax was all passed to the consumer. Then as a matter of equity, is it right to tax a twelve cent article three-fourths of the price? That almost amounts to confiscation. We are not upholding cigarettes particularly...but we do know there are any number of folks who do enjoy them and would be placed at a considerable inconvenience if they had to send out of the state to get them, as many would do. If it resulted in stopping the smoking of them, perhaps this might have some compensation, but it would not.\textsuperscript{154}

---

The Aftermath of Licensure in Iowa: 1921-1939

The inception of the Dodd-bill regime marked the end of the long period of dynamism and statewide contestation of tobacco and smoking regulation in Iowa. A half-century would pass before the quasi-ubiquitous ascendancy of (cigarette) smoking as a social norm would generate sufficient anxieties as a self-destructive and even other-destructive activity that the Iowa legislature would begin to concern itself with intensifying its regulatory hold on tobacco use.

The first effort at amending the cigarette statute took place almost immediately in connection with the first codification since 1897 of Iowa law, which had been pending since 1919, but which the legislature failed to complete during the 1921 session.\textsuperscript{155} Once the Dodd bill had been enacted, the code commissioners had to include that body of law in the codification process. As they formulated it in 1922 in their “brief,” the purpose of Bill No. 257 on cigarettes and tobacco was to “gather into one chapter all the present law relating to those subjects.” However, in 1921 the General Assembly had left five or six sections of the old cigarette law “untouched,” which were “apparently...purposely left as a means of better enforcement.” But since they were “adapted to the former law of absolute prohibition,” they needed “modification to adapt them to the present mulct tax law.”\textsuperscript{156}

The most important changes proposed by the Code Commissioners in the cigarette law were adopted by the legislature and enacted as part of the new Code of 1924. First, the prohibition of the possession of cigarettes by minors under 21 anywhere except on the “premises” of their parents\textsuperscript{157} was modified to apply only to their parents’ “home.”\textsuperscript{158} The commissioners, who here went far beyond \textsuperscript{154}“Defeated Cigarette Tax,” \textit{ODR}, Feb. 15, 1929 (2:1) (edit.).

\textsuperscript{156}\textit{Supplement to the Code Commission’s Report of 1919}, at 581 (U. Whitney ed. 1922); Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257, in \textit{File of Code Revision Bills} 257-1(1923). The brief of Code Commissioner’s Bill No. 257 was prepared by J. C. Mabry, a lawyer from Albia.
\textsuperscript{157}1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 2, at 203.
\textsuperscript{158}Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257, § 4, in \textit{Supplement to the Code Commission’s neutral editorial suggestions and presented their own policy judgment in implicit criticism of the legislature, justified this change on the grounds that: “At present a minor can purchase his cigarettes from a ‘bootlegger’ in the alley and rush to an old building or a business block, a vacant lot or a farm building, [belonging?] to his parent and smoke to his heart’s content while the bootlegger plies his trade in security. There should be no immunity anywhere, but we have ventured to propose a change of this newest legislation to the extent of conferring the immunity to [sic] the home alone.\textsuperscript{159}\textsuperscript{159} Second, the commissioners raised from 16 to 18 the age at which minors could be sentenced to a fine and/or imprisonment for refusing to reveal the source of their illegally possessed cigarettes.\textsuperscript{160}\textsuperscript{160} Third, they changed from “has violated” to “has been convicted of violating” any provision of the cigarette law as the mandatory trigger for revocation by local governments of a permit.\textsuperscript{161}\textsuperscript{161} The commissioners explained the change as designed to “make [the language] more definite and certain so that the authorities could not hesitate about revocation.”\textsuperscript{162}\textsuperscript{162} While plausible, the revision also undermined Superintendent McCoy’s aforementioned efforts to persuade city councils to revoke permits for violations not based on judicial convictions.

Two other notable changes proposed by the commissioners and adopted by the legislature revised the search and seizure law that the legislature had enacted in 1909\textsuperscript{163}\textsuperscript{163} and did not amend in 1921. First, the commissioners deleted the provision requiring the destruction of all illegally kept cigarettes that were seized,\textsuperscript{164}\textsuperscript{164} replacing it with one requiring the magistrate who found that the seized cigarettes had been kept in violation of the law to enter an order for their forfeiture to the county in which they had been seized and to direct any peace officer of that county “to sell such forfeited goods to any person having a permit

\begin{flushright}
\textit{Report of 1919, at 645 (1922); Iowa Code § 1555 (1924).} \\
\textsuperscript{159}\textsuperscript{159}J. C. Mabry, Brief of Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257, in Briefs of Code Commissioners’ Bills 581-82 (U. Whitney ed. 1922). \\
\textsuperscript{160}\textsuperscript{160}1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 2, at 203-204; Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257, § 5, in Supplement to the Code Commission’s Report of 1919, at 646 (1922); Iowa Code § 1556 (1924). \\
\textsuperscript{161}\textsuperscript{161}1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 3, at 203, 204; Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257, § 8, in Supplement to the Code Commission’s Report of 1919, at 647 (1922); Iowa Code § 1559 (1924). \\
\textsuperscript{162}\textsuperscript{162}J. C. Mabry, Brief of Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257, in Briefs of Code Commissioners’ Bills 583 (U. Whitney ed. 1922). \\
\textsuperscript{163}\textsuperscript{163}See above ch. 14. \\
\textsuperscript{164}\textsuperscript{164}1909 Iowa Laws ch. 223, § 1, at 202, 203. \\
\end{flushright}
to keep and sell the same at the highest cash price he can obtain."165 The peace officer was then required to pay the proceeds from the sale to the county treasurer, who in turn had to credit them to the county school fund.166 The commissioners’ explanation for the change was that, whereas under the old prohibitory law the cigarettes could not lawfully be sold at all, since they were now “an article of commerce that may be lawfully sold, there is no reason why they should be destroyed."167 While a certain plausibility attached to this purely monetary viewpoint, by treating cigarettes as a normal commodity, it departed from the underlying legislative judgment—soon to be emphasized by the Iowa Supreme Court168—that cigarettes were in principle contraband except under narrow circumstances specified by the legislature. The other change made in the search and seizure law deleted the provision deeming the “discovery of cigarettes or cigarette papers in any public place...prima facie evidence of the keeper’s intent to unlawfully sell or give the same as prohibited” in the old law,169 and substituted for it a provision under which only a dealer’s refusal or failure to exhibit his permit to a requesting peace officer constituted such prima facie evidence.170 Again, the commissioners’ explanation was that mere finding of the cigarettes should not by itself be prima facie evidence of guilt, but only when coupled with the refusal to exhibit the permit.171 Since (voluntarily) permanently displaying a permit was no burden at all and refusal by a legitimate permit holder to show it to an official seemed so irrational as to verge on the empirically improbable, the commissioners and the legislature drained the provision of any efficacy as an enforcement tool that it ever may have possessed.

In considering Code Commissioners’ Bill or Senate File No. 257172 during the extra session on February 9, 1924, the Senate voted on several significant 166Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257, § 27, in Supplement to the Code Commission’s Report of 1919, at 655, 656 (1922); Iowa Code § 1580 (1924).

168See below ch. 21.
1691909 Iowa Laws ch. 223, §1, at 202, 203.
amendments that went beyond the scope of the commissioners’ proposed changes. Senator Lloyd Thurston, who had been a consistent opponent of the Dodd bill in 1921, offered one to delete imprisonment as punishment for a minor who refused to give information about the source of his illegally possessed cigarettes, but it lost on a voice vote.\footnote{State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the Senate of the Fortieth General Assembly 611 (Feb. 9).} Most of the debate on the bill was provoked by an amendment offered by Senator M. L. Bowman\footnote{“Senate Passes Cigaret Law,” DMR, Feb. 10, 1924 (Iowa sect., 1:5).}—who had been a professor in the farm crop department at Iowa’s land grant college at Ames\footnote{State of Iowa: 1923-24: Official Register 270-71 (C. Lundberg ed. 30th Number).}—presumably at the behest of cigarette dealers, subjecting, on conviction, to a fine of $25 to $50 or imprisonment of up to 30 days “[a]ny minor who misrepresents his age to a dealer in cigarettes for the purpose of making such a purchase....” Before the chamber voted on the change, it adopted by a vote of 21 to 15 an amendment to the amendment, offered by George Banta, who had voted against the Dodd bill on its final passage, striking the imprisonment provision.\footnote{State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the Senate of the Fortieth General Assembly 611-12 (Feb. 9).} Of the 21 senators voting Aye 13 had voted on the final passage of the Dodd bill in 1921, nine of whom favored and only four of whom opposed it; similarly, of the 15 voting Nay, ten had opposed and only three favored the Dodd bill.\footnote{State of Iowa: 1921: Journal of the Senate of the Fortieth General Assembly 1738 (Apr. 6).} Although the alignment between the two votes might seem intuitively plausible—those who supported retention of prohibition supported imprisonment of minors who refused to denounce those who supplied them with cigarettes, while those who opposed prohibition opposed imprisonment—the voting patterns may have been somewhat confused by the fact that John B. Hammond, the WCTU’s lobbyist, in 1921 had sharply rejected criminalization of minors’ refusal to testify.\footnote{See above ch. 15.} Immediately after this vote, the Senate rejected an amendment offered by Perry Holdoegel, who had voted inconsistently on the Dodd bill, providing that “the fact that the minor has misrepresented his age does not in any manner absolve the dealer from responsibility in the sale.” To be sure, since nothing in Bowman’s original amendment implied, let alone stated, that a finding of the minor’s guilt absolved the dealer, the basis of the opposition to the amendment is unclear. When the chamber finally voted on Bowman’s amended amendment, only six senators supported it against 31 Nays.\textsuperscript{179} Why the press characterized the chamber’s action as having “strengthened the law as to the responsibility of the dealers who sell tobacco to minors” is difficult to discern.\textsuperscript{180} In contrast, the United Press delighted in interpreting the amendment’s defeat as senatorial condonation of lies a darker shade of white: “Boys who lie about their age in order to purchase cigarettes are no worse than their fathers who telephone home that an important business deal will detain them at the office when in reality it is something else....” In the same vein, Senator Ed Smith twitted some of his colleagues by remarking that making it a crime for a boy to tell a falsehood would create a legal standard more drastic than that to which senators were subject. That the gender dimension was becoming more prominent than it had been during the debates in 1921 was highlighted by the proposal by Willis Haskell (who had voted for the Dodd bill on final passage) to increase the legal age for buying cigarettes. Decrying “flapperish tendencies,” he demanded: “‘Catch those who are selling cigarettes to girls.... The girls are leading on our boys and the boys do nearly anything the girls say.”\textsuperscript{181} In the end, the Senate passed the bill in its entirety by a vote of 33 to 2.\textsuperscript{182} After making one minor change, the House also passed the bill by a vote of 74 to 7,\textsuperscript{183} and the cigarette laws were codified.\textsuperscript{184}

One year later at least one larger city accomplished what the legislature had been unable to pass. Acting at the behest of local cigarette dealers, Marshalltown sought, by means of an ordinance, to deter minors from involving permit holders in sales to them. In 1925 the city council, in response to a petition, decided that “[t]he only way to make the cigaret law effective...and the only equitable way to enforce the law is by placing the cigaret purchaser in the position of violating the law as fully as the man who sells the ‘pills.’” In order to share the responsibility for sales to minors, the council provided that it was unlawful for anyone under 21 not only to buy, accept or receive cigarettes or cigarette papers from any merchant or dealer, but also to “‘represent, pretend to claim that he is 21 or over for the purpose of inducing any merchant or dealer in cigarettes or papers to sell to such minor person, in violation of the law.’” The deterrent consisted in imprisonment

\textsuperscript{179}State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the Senate of the Fortieth General Assembly 612 (Feb. 9).

\textsuperscript{180}“‘Gun Toting’ Bill Is Passed,” ICP-C, Feb. 9, 1924 (1:2).

\textsuperscript{181}“House Bill Will Let Only Sheriff Issue Gun Permit,” WEC, Feb. 9, 1924 (1:2).

\textsuperscript{182}State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the Senate of the Fortieth General Assembly 612-13 (Feb. 9).

\textsuperscript{183}State of Iowa: 1924: Journal of the House of the Fortieth General Assembly 832, 879-80 (Feb. 12 and 23).

\textsuperscript{184}Iowa Code §§ 1552-86 at 246-50 (1924).
up to 30 days or a fine of up to $100. The local ordinance could not override the state statute and absolve dealers of guilt in selling to minors who, for example, lied to them about their age, but might dissuade some from trying.

In 1925, the year after the special session had codified the state’s cigarette and tobacco laws, the House Judiciary Committee filed a bill to introduce several changes, which on balance might have strengthened the law somewhat. First, it prohibited local governments from granting a permit to any person who had twice been convicted of violations of the statute when the second had taken place within two years of the permit application. Second, it conferred on all special enforcement agents all the authority vested in peace officers. Third, it amended the nuisance/abatement section by imposing as punishment for selling cigarettes without a license a fine between $100 and $500. Fourth, giving city councils the flexibility that the law (and McCoy) had denied them, it increased the number of convictions for violations of the statute from one to two after which local governments were required to revoke a person’s permit. And fifth, for the purposes of this section, it construed any violation of the statute by “any manager, agent, clerk or employee of a permit holder during such employment and in connection therewith...to be a violation by the permit holder.”

A week later, when the House debated the bill, Volney Diltz, who in 1921 had been one of the American Legion’s most prominent backers of the Dodd bill, filed an amendment designed to undo dealers’ strict liability for the unlawful acts of their workers by making the permit holder liable only for his subordinates’ violations committed with his “knowledge or consent....” The provision having been stripped of its bite, the House adopted the amendment and then passed the weakened bill by a vote of 56 to 14. The effort, however, was for nought: the bill died in the Senate sifting committee, thus leaving the law unchanged.

In his inaugural address at the outset of his second term in 1923, Governor Kendall promoted an expansion of Iowa’s pioneering role as a cigarette taxer by suggesting that its also become the first state to tax other forms of tobacco: “The slave of the cigar—why should he go free while the devotee of the cigarette is 186 H.F. No. 374, §§ 2-5 (Mar. 20, 1925, by Judiciary Committee No. 2).

---

187 See above ch. 15.
189 State of Iowa: 1925: Journal of the Senate of the Forty-First General Assembly 948 (Mar. 30) (referred to sifting committee).
Kendall’s rhetoric was (inadvertently) ironic: although the proposal was driven by the need for enlarged government revenue by means of a new taxable object of consumption so that the general property tax rate could be lowered, and he alluded to the cigar smoker’s addiction as a justification for the burden, the chief reason that the WCTU and other anti-tobacco groups had shied away from calling for the prohibition of the sale of non-cigarette tobacco to adults was the acknowledgment that since so many more millions of adult men smoked cigars and pipes and chewed tobacco than smoked cigarettes that such a ban would trigger much more widespread and intense resistance, undermining most of whatever support for, or at least acquiescence in, cigarette bans that could be mustered. Yet here was the governor himself, who had refused to rise to the occasion and give a reprieve to the country’s oldest universal prohibition of cigarette sales, attacking and mocking the enslaved adult cigar smoker.

Five weeks later Republican Senator Ben Abben, the youngest bank president ever elected in Iowa, filed a bill that went even farther than Kendall’s suggestion, proposing the imposition of a retail price-differentiated sales tax on cigars, smoking and chewing tobacco, and snuff. Five-cent cigars would be taxed a half cent and 25-cent cigars two cents; the tax on chewing and smoking tobacco costing less than 10 cents would be one-half cent, while snuff containers retailing at 10 cents or less would be taxed one cent and more expensive kinds at 10 percent of the retail price. Abben estimated that the new tax would generate $1.5 million annually, which, together with the cigarette tax, would lower the general millage levy by two mills. It was referred to the Ways and Means Committee as was the identical companion bill in the House. The “blow,” as a newspaper headline put it, may have been “aimed at the users of tobacco,” but it was definitely not designed to depress consumption. By March the press was reporting the belief that the bills, which were popular—after all, according to “the best information available,” such a law would bring in $2 million “and nobody would feel the burden”—would pass both houses. This sum would, according to McCoy, the head of the cigarette revenue department of the state treasurer’s revenue department.
office, have sufficed to lower the general state levy by two mills. The chief obstacle was the opposition by tobacco retailers, who claimed that as drafted the measure would require them rather than the consumer to pay the tax. Their assertion was, ironically, based on the argument that the tax on “popularly priced cigars” was so small that it might require the sellers to pay it instead of shifting it to consumers.

The expected tobacco tax revenue was exposed to one potential threat: “cut-rate mail order houses” had been trying to use the cigarette tax law by advertising in Iowa newspapers lower-priced, tax-free cigarettes available by parcel post. Although this method of competition had, according to McCoy, not yet noticeably affected tax revenues, Iowa retailers, who had paid $50 to $100 for their permits on top of the stamp tax, resented it. In order to deal with this problem, bills were filed in the House and Senate at the same time as the Abben tax bill that made it illegal for anyone except dealers with Iowa cigarette sales licenses to solicit orders to sell cigarettes by advertisements in newspapers, magazines, posters, billboards, hand bills, or other printed matter. Likewise, the bills made it unlawful for anyone but licensed dealers to publish or circulate such advertisements or to permit such billboards to remain on his premises. However, in mid-March the House adopted the recommendation of the Committee on Police Regulations to postpone the bill indefinitely, and two days later the Senate sponsor asked that his bill be withdrawn from further consideration.

Toward the end of March, however, the Associated Press disclosed that growing business resistance had made key legislators pessimistic about passage

---

197 “Direct Tax upon All Tobacco Sold Provided in Bill,” WEC, Mar. 8, 1923 (9:1-2 at 1).
198 J. W. Jarnagin, “Record Broken for New Bills,” HI, Mar. 15, 1923 (1:5). Since the tax payment provision was the same as in the cigarette law the basis for the retailers’s claim is unclear.
199 “Direct Tax upon All Tobacco Sold Provided in Bill,” WEC, Mar. 8, 1923 (9:1-2 at 1).
200 “Direct Tax upon All Tobacco Sold Provided in Bill,” WEC, Mar. 8, 1923 (9:1-2 at 1).
201 H.F. 517, §§ 1-2 (Feb. 16, 1923, by Ralph Rumley); S.F. 474, §§ 1-2 (Feb. 16, 1923, by Ray Scott).
of the tobacco tax bill. Now it was the tobacco wholesalers who were identified as having become “alarmed” and done “highly thoro” work to beat the bill: “When a man buys a cigar, he is asked to sign a letter protesting against the imposition of a tax on his indulgence in the weed. Literally thousands” of these identical letters had in the meantime inundated the state house, most going to the chairmen of the two ways and means committees. As a result of this “widespread opposition,” neither Abben nor Oliver, the House sponsor, was sanguine that the bills would be passed.204 By a vote of 16 to 6 the House Ways and Means Committee soon acted in accordance with this sense,205 recommending that the bill be totally stripped of its original language, instead of which it recommended the mere licensing, for an annual $10 fee, of the sale of non-cigarette tobacco. The House adopted the committee report, presented by committee chairman Tollef Moen,206 who had been the chamber’s most ardent anti-cigarette advocate in 1921 and represented the same county as Abben. Even this proposed “nominal” license fee substitute, which would have generated only “negligible” revenue,207 died in the sifting committee.

Therewith Iowa lost the opportunity to become also the first state to tax other kinds of tobacco. Even before the tobacco merchants had killed the Iowa bill, South Carolina not only became the second state to tax cigarettes, but at the same time also subjected cigars and smoking tobacco—though not plug chewing tobacco or snuff—to a license tax measured by sales volume and weight or price.208 Two additional states, Utah (which expressly modeled the repeal of its short-lived universal ban on cigarette sales on Iowa’s law) and Georgia, enacted cigarette sales taxes in 1923, followed in 1925 by North Dakota and Arkansas (which also taxed cigars), and in 1927 by Kansas and Alabama (which also taxed cigars). That year South Carolina also became the first state to tax chewing tobacco and snuff, and in 1929 Tennessee became the second state to tax all forms of tobacco.209 Thus six of the first nine states to enact cigarette taxes 205Minutes of the [House Ways and Means Committee] Meeting held April 6, 1923 (SHSI DM). Unfortunately, although the vote was by roll call, the minutes reveal neither how members voted nor whether there was discussion.

2081923 South Carolina Acts No. 11, § 10 at 12, 18-19.
209*State of Iowa: 1930: Report of Joint Legislative Committee and State Board of Assessment and Review* 22-23 (1930). In 1926 Louisiana enacted a tax on all tobacco products amounting to 10 percent of the retail price, but it was repealed in 1928. 1926 La.
(Iowa, Utah, North Dakota, Arkansas, Kansas, and Tennessee) had had universal cigarette sales bans and repealed them between 1921 and 1927.\textsuperscript{210}

In order to raise more revenue to make up for a reduction in the state levy two years earlier and to help finance the current year’s increased appropriation without increasing the “millage levy too radically,” at the end of January 1929 Governor John Hammill urged the Senate Ways and Means Committee to increase the cigarette stamp tax by one cent, thus yielding an additional $600,000 in state revenue.\textsuperscript{211} The next day the committee filed a bill increasing the cigarette tax from 1 to 1.5 mills per cigarette.\textsuperscript{212}

The Senate debate two weeks later was the occasion for the resumption of a wide-ranging discussion of a social conflict that the advent of licensure in 1921 had not at all laid to rest. Even the burgeoning question of women smokers arose when (now) Senator Clark, who had contributed so heavily to the amendment of the Dodd bill in 1921,\textsuperscript{213} suggested (albeit jocularly) that a higher cigarette tax “might ‘get women used to paying for equal suffrage.’”\textsuperscript{214} More generally, controversy “resolved into a dispute between smokers and non-smokers” as well as between advocates and opponents of sales taxes.\textsuperscript{215} The intersection of these two issues generated a “strange alignment of votes,” prompting progressives such as Toleff Moen, the Dodd-Clark bill’s most vociferous opponent in the House a decade earlier, and farmer George Patterson, to “follow[ ] the leadership of their arch political enemy,”\textsuperscript{216} William Baird, the committee chair and the bill’s chief proponent, who had consistently voted against the Dodd bill in 1921. Baird, a conservative who typically voted with the sales tax bill’s principal opponent,
Joseph Frailey, who had consistently voted for the Dodd bill, charged that the latter had “‘a personal interest in this matter’” because he smoked “‘all the time.’” Demanding to know “‘why don’t you fine us instead of calling it a tax,’” Frailey, making a not so “veiled threat[ ] of an uprising similar to the Boston tea party,” hinted at the nicotine addiction issue: “‘Cigarettes are necessary to 80 per cent of the smokers. You remember what happened in the colonies when England taxed tea?’” Frailey, who railed against those who “‘want to tax our cigarettes,’” also turned empirical: characterizing the measure as “‘unscientific,’” he argued that it would be self-defeating because the tax increase would merely cause smokers to buy their cigarettes by mail. 217 Not coincidentally, this argument about interstate leakage was made by Frailey and Senator J. O. Shaff, both of whom represented Mississippi River counties. 218 To be sure, this claim, especially when intertwined with the related claim that the increase in out-of-state mail order business would redound to the detriment of “many folks in Iowa making their daily income off the sale of” cigarettes, 219 was not confined to the border counties.

Provoked by Frailey into calling cigarette smokers immature, 220 Baird, who admitted that the precedential character of the bill’s passage would probably lead to the introduction of bills to tax other kinds of tobacco, chewing gum, near beer, and cosmetics, 221 incautiously suggested that the cigarette sales tax “would be paid by those who complain the least.” 222 (This remark came back to haunt Baird later that day as he presided over a joint Ways and Means Committees hearing on S.F. 80, Moen and Patterson’s income tax bill, in the course of which Baird asserted that its advocates “desired to cripple industry and take unjust revenues from those who were successful in the management of their business,” prompting Patterson to allude to Baird’s earlier comment and add that proponents of the income tax also wanted to tax those with the greatest ability to pay. Patterson then parried Baird’s charge that he was a socialist by countering that Baird’s stand and the current tax system were the world’s best breeding ground for socialism.) 223 Even Moen, a progressive with impeccable anti-cigarette

---

218 “Iowa Senate Votes Against Cigarette Tax Boost,” DD, Feb. 14, 1929 (1:1, at 12:1).
219 “Exceeding the Limit,” ODR, Feb. 1, 1929 (2:1) (edit.).
221 “Iowa Senate Votes Against Cigarette Tax Boost,” DD, Feb. 14, 1929 (1:1, at 12:1).
222 Byron Allen, “Legislative News from Des Moines,” PAR, Feb. 21, 1929 (3:2-7 at 3).
credentials, justified the cigarette sales tax on the grounds that increased revenue was needed to pay for increased appropriations and the enactment of special taxes was superior to an increase in the general property tax. When the cigarette tax bill came up on its final passage, the Senate defeated it by a vote of 21 to 28, thus signaling rejection of the principle of the sales tax as a general state revenue policy. Later in the session the House Ways and Means Committee introduced a more wide-ranging sales tax, which included an additional tax on cigarettes amounting to 25 percent of the existing tax. Though endorsed by the governor and many legislative leaders, it faced “tremendous opposition” from businesses at a joint Ways and Means Committees hearing and never came to a vote.

During the Depression, towards the end of the 1931 legislative session—when there were already over 5,000 permitted dealers in Iowa—the Senate sifting committee introduced a bill to increase the cigarette tax to 1.5 mills per cigarette (or three cents per pack of 20). At the same time, it would have required dealers in all other kinds of tobacco to obtain permits, which would have cost $15 in first-class cities, $10 in second-class cities, and $5 elsewhere. The bill would also have imposed a sales tax on all non-cigarette tobacco amounting to 10 per cent of the retail price. Unsurprisingly, Senator Moen voted for the bill, but only eight other members joined him, and the Senate resoundingly defeated it by a vote of 9 to 33. What little discussion preceded the vote focused on the claims of Clark, now chairman of the tax revision committee, who supported it, but in order to reduce personal property taxes. He estimated that the non-cigarette tobacco tax would raise an additional million dollars annually; since there was little opposition to the cigarette tax, which brought in even more revenue, he saw no reason for not taxing other forms of tobacco. Opponents, 231S.F. 421, §§ 3-4 (Apr. 6, 1931, by sifting committee).

especially Senator Joe Frailey (from the Mississippi river town of Fort Madison), alleged that the new taxes would both prompt Iowa tobacco users to make their purchases in Illinois, Nebraska, and other neighboring states and promote shipments into Iowa by out-of-state mail order houses, driving local dealers out of business with the net result that state revenue would be lower than under the then existing law.233

In the event, decades would pass before the Iowa legislature finally enacted a non-cigarette tobacco tax.234

The Aftermath: The 1939 Code Amendments

By 1939, according to estimates, 40 percent of the cigarettes smoked in Iowa were evading the tax stamp system run through the state’s 8,000 permitted dealers.235 This porousness was a function of Iowa’s being surrounded by states without cigarette tax laws. Moreover, the perception of a lax law and comparisons with cigarette tax revenues in other states left administrators in little doubt that bootlegging and shipments of unstamped cigarettes into Iowa were the causes.236 In 1939, the legislature, which the Republicans, after a brief New Deal hiatus, once again dominated by huge majorities (38-12 in the Senate and 89-19 in the House),237 was driven by the goals of suppressing the bootlegging of cigarettes from other states and increasing tax revenues—by $800,000 to $1,000,000 above the $1.8 million then being collected annually238—by making manufacturers (distributors) and wholesalers responsible for affixing stamps to packages before they entered the state rather than continuing to require retailers to attach the stamps.239 After having failed to achieve these objectives during the 234 1967 Iowa Laws ch. 348, § 2, at 666, 667.

238“Senate Sends Governor Reorganization Bill,” ODR, Mar. 6, 1939 (1:1); “Vote to Curb Bootleg Cigaret,” ICP-C, Mar. 8, 1939 (1:8).

239“House Adds Approval to Senate Measure to Curb Bootlegging of Cigaret,” MCG-
1937 session, the General Assembly amended the cigarette sales statute to establish a bifurcated permit structure under which “[e]very distributor, wholesaler, and retailer...shall obtain a state and/or retail cigarette permit.” S.F. 128 also provided that on the state level, “[t]he treasurer shall issue state permits to distributors, wholesalers, and retailers, subject to the conditions hereinafter provided.” In contrast: “Cities and towns may issue retail permits to dealers within their respective limits.”

G, Mar. 8, 1939 (14:7); “Cigarette Law Welcomed,” HI, Mar. 9, 1939 (4:3); “Bill Against Bootleg Cigarettes,” ODR, Mar. 25, 1939 (2:2) (edit.). The new framework was also designed to deter consumers from bringing back to Iowa large numbers of untaxed cigarettes bought elsewhere. The new law penalized the possession for use of more than 40 unstamped cigarettes. S.F. 128, § 32.1 (1939); Iowa Code § 1556.31 (1939). In general, the new approach was supposed to deal with the problem that tax evasion was facilitated by the lack of a penalty for mere possession (as opposed to the sale) of unstamped cigarettes. “House Passes Cigarette Bill,” DMR, Mar. 9, 1939 (15:3).

240 The 1937 bill was also designed to stop bootlegging and increase tax revenues. “Cigarette Tax Paid by Jobber,” ODR, Apr. 9, 1937 (1:7, 6:5). The measure, which was similar but not identical to the bill that passed in 1939, specified that the state “shall” issue permits to distributors and wholesalers (but the state was also empowered to deny licenses to those known to be unreliable), whereas city and town councils and county boards of supervisors “may issue retail dealer’s permits.” S.F. 465, § 8.2 (Apr. 3, 1937, by Manufacturing, Commerce, and Trade Committee). The bill passed the Senate by a vote of 40 to 0, but died in the House. State of Iowa: 1937: Journal of the Senate of the Forty-Seventh General Assembly 1018 (Apr. 9). In 1939 the same structure marked H.F. 27, which was withdrawn. H.F. 27 (Jan 17, 1939, by Scott and Kohlhaas); State of Iowa: 1939: Journal of the Senate of the Forty-Eighth General Assembly 343 (Feb. 10).

241 1939 Iowa Laws ch. 72, § 9.1, at 102, 107. The current structure of the law, under which the Department of Revenue “shall issue state permits to distributors, wholesalers, and cigarette vendors,” whereas “[c]ities may issue retail permits to dealers within their respective limits,” was introduced in 1980. Iowa Code § 453A.13.2.a (2007); 1980 Iowa Laws ch. 1029, § 6, at 211, 212.

242 1939 Iowa Laws ch. 72, § 9.2, at 102, 107. The bill as it passed the Senate included the provision that: “The treasurer shall issue state permits to distributors, wholesalers and retailers...who, in the opinion of the treasurer based upon the past record and history of the applicant, can be relied upon to comply faithfully with the provisions of this act.” S.F. 128, § 9.2. However, the House deleted the “who” clause and the Senate concurred in the amendment. State of Iowa: 1939: Journal of the House of the Forty-Eighth General Assembly 661 (Mar. 7) (amendment by Phil Roan), 677 (Mar. 8) (adopted); State of Iowa: 1939: Journal of the Senate of the Forty-Eighth General Assembly 578 (Mar. 10).

this slightly modified language (which was now in the active mood rather than casting councils in the role of passive agents) against the background of high-profile Iowa Supreme Court decisions was visibly on display later that year in Keokuk’s new municipal code. It explained that under the new statute “permits to sell cigarettes are to be granted by the City Council but it shall have absolute discretion as to the granting of all permits.”

One other aspect of S.F. 128 is relevant because it imposed a prohibition on a very convenient form of cigarette sales and purchases in a period marked by the dismantlement rather than the erection of such barriers. As early as 1931 the treasurer of state had asked the attorney general for an opinion as to whether it was lawful for a cigarette permit holder to dispense cigarettes by means of a vending machine and whether, if a minor used the machine to buy cigarettes, the permit holder would be liable. The attorney general failed to respond to the first question at all, limiting himself to the seemingly foregone conclusion that the permittee would indeed be just as liable as if had sold the cigarettes “personally” to the minor. In 1938, a county attorney asked a successor attorney general whether it was permissible for a city council to issue permits to people considering the sale of cigarettes through vending machines. If it was, the attorney wanted to know whether it would also be permissible for the council to deny a permit to “reputable people, with the express intention” of using vending machines, on the grounds that they would enable minors to buy cigarettes and make it more difficult to police permittees properly. After noting that the earlier attorney general opinion “inferentially approves” cigarette vending machines, the new opinion, based on the Ford Hopkins and Bernstein cases, pointed out that since city councils did have discretionary power with regard to granting

---

244 See below ch. 21.

245 Municipal Code of Keokuk, Iowa: 1939, § 339, at 146, 147. This language was retained in the 1970 Municipal Code. Keokuk Municipal Code: 1970, ch. 4.12.010. By 1984, “shall have absolute discretion” was replaced by: “The chief of police shall investigate the location wherein it is proposed to sell cigarettes, ascertain if the applicant is a person of good moral character, and make a recommendation to the city council. The city council shall either issue the license or deny the license, stating in writing the reason for any denials.” Keokuk Municipal Code: 1984, ch. 4.12.010

248 See below ch. 21.
permits—though whether that discretion was absolute or limited was uncertain—they were empowered to “refuse to grant a permit where such refusal is substantiated by facts which establish that the granting of such permit may be inimicable [sic] to the health or morals of the community or where such granting may hinder law enforcement.” Evading as studiously as his predecessor the primary question of whether cigarette vending machines were per se legal, the attorney general dealt only with the subsidiary question as to whether a city council had the discretion to deny permits to applicants wishing to use them. Focusing on the improbability that the operator could constantly observe all transactions as easily and the fact that a “machine would not refuse to deal with a child as would a reputable merchant,” the opinion concluded that machine sales fell into a different classification than ordinary personal sales, which it would not be unreasonable or arbitrary for a council to use as the basis for denying a permit.\footnote{State of Iowa: 1938: Twenty-Second Biennial Report of the Attorney General for the Biennial Period Ending December 31, 1938, at 711.}

Treading where attorneys general had feared to, S.F. 128—presumably in response to what Attorney General John Mitchell had called “questions of considerable public interest”—as it passed the Senate by a vote of 47 to 0\footnote{State of Iowa: 1938: Twenty-Second Biennial Report of the Attorney General for the Biennial Period Ending December 31, 1938, at 708.} made it “unlawful to sell or vend cigarettes by means of a device known as a vending machine.”\footnote{State of Iowa: 1939: Journal of the Senate of the Forty-Eighth General Assembly 236 (Feb. 9).} Then in the House, Mrs. Isabel M. Elliott, a 49-year-old farmer and Democrat,\footnote{S.F. 128, § 32.6.} filed an amendment to delete the ban.\footnote{State of Iowa: Official Register: 1939-1940, at 53 (38th No., David Brown ed.).} Whereas the amendment’s sponsors called the “‘death sentence’” imposed by S.F. 128 on vending machines “‘confiscation without due process of law,’”\footnote{State of Iowa: 1939: Journal of the House of the Forty-Eighth General Assembly 530 (Feb. 23).} those opposed to the amendment argued that it would facilitate sales to minors.\footnote{“House Buries Cigaret Bill,” ICP-C, Mar. 6, 1939 (1:6).} The House then “expressed itself very clearly on the matter of cigarette vending machines”\footnote{“Senate Sends Governor Reorganization Bill,” ODR, Mar. 6, 1939 (1:1, at 2:7).} by its overwhelming defeat of Elliott’s amendment by a vote of 15 to 79.\footnote{“Action Delayed on Cigaret Bill,” DMR, Mar. 7, 1939 (5:5).} After the House had passed the bill by a huge majority (92 to 5)\textsuperscript{259} the ban on vending machine sales of cigarettes went into effect, remaining in place until 1963 when, Iowa, which for years was the only state with such a prohibition, finally repealed it.\textsuperscript{260}

\textsuperscript{259}State of Iowa: 1939: Journal of the House of the Forty-Eighth General Assembly 677 (Mar. 8). The Senate, as already noted, concurred in numerous House amendments.

\textsuperscript{260}See below ch. 22.
City Councils that Actually Used Their Discretionary Power to Perpetuate the Ban on Cigarette Sales in the 1920s and 1930s

The new cigaret law places in the hands of the city councils absolute power either to grant or deny licenses.¹

Several towns in the state have refused to allow any licenses whatsoever to be issued.²

The governor has held that cities have discretionary power regarding the issue of permits....³

Even during the 12-week interim between the law’s approval and effective dates the 25-year-old law, which opponents had declared long dead, continued to be enforced in places in which it had always been enforced. For example, in Indianola, a Methodist sanctuary of prohibitionism, just days after Governor Kendall had signed the bill into law, a number of members of the high school YMCA organized sting operations by buying cigarettes; they informed the county attorney, who drafted an information against cafe and confectionary store owners, who pleaded guilty and paid the $25 fine.⁴

More importantly, if localities chose not to authorize cigarette sales, essentially the 1896 prohibition would continue in perpetuity. As James Powell, the publisher of the Ottumwa Courier, who editorially proclaimed that it was “practically impossible to prevent” the sale of cigarettes to adults, put it, “[i]f there is a community in Iowa where the local officials find it possible and practicable to prevent the sale of cigarettes, even to adults,” then “for practical purposes the condition is unchanged....”³

Nevertheless, despite the emphasis that Governor Kendall had placed on the home rule powers unambiguously conferred by the legislature, there were, according to a front-page, above-the-fold article in the Des Moines Capital in mid-May, to judge by the number of inquiries that newspapers and the secretary had received, “quite a few folk in Iowa who don’t understand all about the new

¹“Council Inaction on Cigaret Permits,” DMC, June 23, 1921, 38(153) (9:8).
³Cigaret Hearing Tomorrow,” T-WS-P, July 18, 1921 (8:3).
⁴“High School Boys See Cigaret Law Is Enforced,” DMR, Apr. 17, 1921 (10M:2-4); New Era (Humeston), Apr. 20, 1921 (4:1) (untitled). It appears that the students may have focused on stores that sold to minors rather than adults.
⁵“Sensible Law Making,” OC, Apr. 12, 1921 (3:1) (edit.). On Powell’s letter to Kendall urging him to sign the Dodd bill, see above ch. 15.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s law....” And it turned out that “[o]ne of the particularly foggy points” was whether it really provided for local option in granting permits. The paper affirmed that indeed city councils and boards of supervisors did have “arbitrary power in the matter”: nothing in the law abridged their right to grant or deny a permit to anyone.⁶

The Special Case of the Skeptical Des Moines City Government

During the almost three months before the Dodd bill went into effect local communities and governments had the opportunity to discuss and determine whether they would avail themselves of the power afforded them by the new law to ban cigarette sales within their borders. Already the day after Governor Kendall had signed the bill, members of the city council of the state’s largest city, Des Moines, stated that licenses would probably be granted. Despite his reservations, Mayor H. H. Barton, a building contractor committed to a nose-counting approach to democratic local control, concurred:

“Personally, I wish there were no cigarettes...but I do not intend to be narrow and attempt to force my prejudices on other people.

The war and the change in public opinion during the last few years has done away with the stigma and opprobrium which was formerly attached to a cigaret smoker. The use of them by so many men, among them many of our best business men, indicates...that the public desires them to be sold.

City Council wants to be governed by the wishes of the people and I believe if the matter comes to a vote in Council meeting the licenses will be granted to dealers.”⁷

The very next day Des Moines dealers declared that on July 4 they would increase the price of a package of cigarettes—which in April cost 16 cents at the factory and retailed for 20 cents—by five cents in order to enable them to “make any profit” after the imposition of the two-cent stamp tax and the $100 annual permit.⁸ As of June 23, the city council still had not adopted a policy and only two applications for permits had been filed.⁹ On July 1 the city council rejected the Des Moines corporation counsel’s plan for a $75 surcharge to finance

---

⁶“Cigaret Licenses Local Question,” DMC, May 12, 1921 (1:2).
⁷“License Fags,” DMN, Apr. 12, 1921 (6:1).
⁸“Dodd’s Bill May Increase Cost of Fags,” DMN, Apr. 13, 1921 (1:8).
⁹“Council Inaction on Cigaret Permits,” DMC, June 23, 1921, 38(153) (9:8).
enforcement on top of the $100 statutory permit fee\textsuperscript{10} on the grounds that “very little extra police work will be occasioned by the cigaret law, and that practically no extra clerical work will be required for permits.”\textsuperscript{11}

Unlike city councils in most cities and towns in Iowa, which merely approved or rejected applications for permits, the Des Moines city council on July 1 passed a kind of framework ordinance, which shed interesting light on the lingering skepticism about the entire enterprise of selling cigarettes even in the state’s largest city on a council that decided to issue permits.\textsuperscript{12} The preamble to the ordinance underscored the administrative, enforcement, and economic burdens that licensure would impose:

:\textit{Whereas}, by Chapter 203, Acts of the Thirty-ninth General Assembly...authority is given to cities to issue permits for sale of certain commodities heretofore prohibited by law; and if permits are granted therefor large expense will be caused to this city for clerical work, printing and postage, and for extra police and other inspection and regulation, and for litigation in the Municipal and other courts, in connection with such business and the regulation thereof...; and

:\textit{Whereas}, numerous inquiries have been received, and some bonds have already been filed with the City Clerk preparatory to asking the issuance of permits to engage in such business; but this city is unwilling to issue such permits, or incur the expense incident to said matters, without being assured adequate protection against loss or expense in connection therewith and the inspection regulation of such business and enforcement of the laws respecting same....\textsuperscript{13}

The two most salient sections revealed the council’s perception of the broad array of looming and lurking dangers and risks, its apparent impatience with the need for the permit system altogether, and its desire to put applicants on notice that its deeply rooted suspicion of them meant that they enjoyed virtually no \textsuperscript{10} Drop ‘Fag’ Fee,” \textit{DMN}, July 1, 1921 (1:6).

\textsuperscript{11} Cigarets to Cost Dealers $100 Year,” \textit{DMC}, July 1, 1921, 38(160) (16:1).

\textsuperscript{12} Many of the formal ordinances passed by other city councils merely tracked the statute, adding no local restrictions. E.g., “Cigaret Ordinance Adopted by Council,” \textit{Rockwell City Advocate}, June 9, 1931 (1:5); Rockwell City, Ordinance No. 188, \textit{Rockwell City Advocate}, June 30, 1921 (3:2-4) (passed June 6, 1921); “Council Proceedings,” \textit{Rockwell City Advocate}, July 7, 1921 (7:5-7) (unanimous); Lytton, Ordinance No. 27 (Aug. 2, 1921), in \textit{Lytton Star}, Aug. 4, 1921 (8:1).

\textsuperscript{13} Ordinance No. 3124, in \textit{Ordinances of the City of Des Moines: Passed During the Fiscal Year Ending March 31, 1922}, at 79-82 at 79. These provisions remained identically in place in the city’s revised ordinances 11 years later. \textit{Revised Ordinances of the City of Des Moines: 1932}, ch. 99 at 362-63.
vested right in the permits, which could be revoked at any time by new rules necessitated by as yet unforeseen interference with the public interest:

Sec. 6. No permit shall issue for such a business to be conducted in a residence district, unless the City Council is fully assured that there is no objection thereto by residents of the neighborhood; nor to a person or party not of good character; nor to one who is found guilty of violation of such act or of this ordinance. And any such permit may be revoked for violation of said act of this ordinance, or for other cause arising whereby it is deemed to the public interest or welfare to have same revoked or canceled. And further provisions may be made as to the terms on which and the persons to whom permits may issue, and the causes for revocation thereof.

Sec. 7. No loud or boisterous conduct, no loafing or lounging, and no immoral or illegal act, shall at any time be permitted in any place for which a permit is held under this ordinance. Especially shall no violation of said act be permitted in any such place.14

After the council had passed the ordinance, about 30 dealers filed their bonds and paid their fees so that they could be issued permits and secure state tax stamps in time to do business on July 4.15 Dealers’ self-fulfilling price prophecies came true: after “flocking” to city hall, dealers made sure that on July 4 the price of a package rose by the two-cent tax that kicked in that day, and it was anticipated that within a few days dealers would increase the price by an additional three cents because their “margin of profit is so narrow they are unable to make an adequate profit at the lower price."16

Despite the Des Moines city council’s refusal to provide financially for strict enforcement and to use the surcharge to restrict the number of permit holders, the anti-smoking movement continued the struggle in other forums. On July 5, the day after the Dodd-Clark law had gone into effect, the Des Moines school board, under the leadership of Charles Hutchinson, who had testified against the Dodd bill before the House Police Regulations Committee and the governor,17 passed a resolution prohibiting teachers, principals, and employees from smoking on duty or while on school grounds.18 The ban applied as well to “coaches and 14Ordinance No. 3124, in Ordinances of the City of Des Moines: Passed During the Fiscal Year Ending March 31, 1922, at 79-82 at 81. These provisions remained identically in place in the city’s revised ordinances 11 years later. Revised Ordinances of the City of Des Moines: 1932, ch. 99, §§ 1411-12, at 364.

---

15Cigarets to Cost Dealers $100 Year,” DMC, July 1, 1921, vol. 38 no. 160 (16:1).
17See above ch. 15.
18‘Don’t Smoke, Board Says to Its Teachers,” DMC, July 6, 1921, vol. 38 no. 165 (2:3). assistants, whether paid or not, at any game or public exhibition given by or participated in by any of our Des Moines schools, whether held on premises controlled by the school board or elsewhere."\(^{19}\) Moreover, according to another resolution sponsored by Hutchinson, which was also imbued with the WCTU’s strategic insight into youths’ emulation of adult behavior, the “board will ‘look with disfavor’...upon the smoking of cigarettes in any public place where persons of school age are present. The resolutions were passed because the State law prohibiting the selling of cigarettes to minors will be very difficult of enforcement if teachers and others with whom they come in contact at school, are allowed to smoke....”\(^{20}\) As the Oskaloosa Daily Herald’s front-page article put it the same day that it reported the Oskaloosa city council’s mass denial of cigarette sales permits: “Woe to the school teacher, principal or other employee of the board of education who is caught with a cigarette in his mouth while on duty or, in fact, most any place except in the privacy of his own room.”\(^{21}\) The intrusiveness of this rule, which regulated employees’ conduct during nonworking time in myriad public places away from their workplace—even though the board acknowledged that it had no control of employees during such time or in such places\(^{22}\)—revealed that the intensity of the anti-smoking movement’s efforts to prevent the formation of the next generation of cigarette smokers had in no way been diminished by the signal defeat that enactment of the Dodd bill had inflicted on it.

But the movement, even as applied to the schools, was unable to gain the upper hand everywhere in Iowa. A few days before the new law went into effect, the board of education in Cedar Rapids submitted an objection to the city council regarding the granting of cigarette permits to businesses located within 400 feet of school buildings.\(^{23}\) The board was referring to the 400-foot rule in a 1904 law, still on the books, prohibiting tobacco advertisements.\(^{24}\) It took the city council only two days to decide that dealers in tobacco, “particularly the wicked cigarette,” would be permitted to sell their commodities. The council reasoned that since the \(^{19}\)“Teachers Cigaret Placed Under Ban by School Board,” DMR, July 6, 1921 (1:6).

\(^{20}\)“Don’t Smoke, Board Says to Its Teachers,” DMC, July 6, 1921, vol. 38 no. 165 +(2:3). In her letter to Governor Kendall back in April, Lucy Page Gaston had mentioned that when schools reopened in September, the Des Moines school authorities were planning a citywide campaign to eliminate smoking in the schools. Lucy Page Gaston to Nathan E. Kendall (Apr. 8, 1921), in Folder: N. E. Kendall Correspondence re Cigarette Bill (SHSI DM).

\(^{21}\)“Teachers Cigaret Placed Under Ban,” Oskaloosa Daily Herald, July 6, 1921 (1:6).

\(^{22}\)“No Smoking,” DMN, July 6, 1921 (4:6).

\(^{23}\)“Many Will Sell ‘Em,” CRT, June 30, 1921 (1:6).

\(^{24}\)Compiled Code of Iowa § 8881, at 2425 (1919); see above ch. 13.
law did not prohibit selling tobacco near schools and permit-holders had to post a $1,000 bond to insure compliance with the new law, including its ban on sales to minors, it was “unnecessary to take further precautions.” Since the chief purpose of the two laws acting in concert was to prevent children from starting to smoke—and not to increase municipal revenues from bond forfeitures—the council’s argument was irrelevant. Even if, implausibly enough, the advertising were all inside the store and not visible to those outside, the city council could nevertheless have exercised its absolute discretion not to issue permits to tobacco stores within 400 (or any number of) feet of schools on the grounds that they were a species of attractive nuisance to children. In this sense the speculative claim made two days earlier that the city solicitor would hold that the courts would construe denial of a permit as discriminatory because “minors are barred and none others attend school” was irrelevant under the new law, which conferred absolute discretion on councils to deny all permits.

Frictionless Issuance of Permits in First-Class Cities

The city councils of numerous towns are just now wrestling with the question of whether their town shall license the sale of cigarettes...

In none of the 14 first-class cities (with a population of 15,000 or more) did the city council decide in 1921 not to issue any cigarette permits. The largest city in which any form of resistance was recorded was Fort Madison, the seventeenth largest with a population of 12,066. There, when the eight-member city council met in special session on July 6, 1921 to deal with 20 applications for permits, it voted 6 to 1 to approve each of them. One member, William H. Benbow, voted against each resolution. Benbow, a 65-year-old retired farmer, had been born... in Utah, the son and grandson of English-born Mormons. Presumably his religion’s prohibition of tobacco and smoking underlay his across-the-board opposition to the issuance of any cigarette permits.29

Initially, the lead in issuing permits appears to have been gained by the state’s second largest city, Sioux City (population 71,227), where by June 14 applications for permits were already coming in steadily and predictions were for 120 to 150 to be issued.30 By June 30 the city government, which was pushing permits—the city clerk announced that they “may be taken out at any time”—had already been “enriched by the sum of $12,800” from the sale of 128 permits. With five days to go before the law even was to go into effect, 150 dealers were expected to be engaged in the sale of cigarettes.31

Typical for the process was Council Bluffs, the seventh largest city, with a population of more than 36,000. Two weeks before the new law went into force, when 20 to 25 people had already made known their interest in buying a permit, the city council held a special meeting to consider their applications.32 After approving the first 16, the council held a second special meeting a week later to act on 14 more that had been filed in the meantime with the expectation that another 10 to 15 would be filed later.33 In fact, 33 were filed and 33 approved, “the councilmen run[ning] across none...that should been denied in their opinion of the matter. This makes a total of forty-nine permits issued and none denied....” The total of $4,900 in mulct tax paid into the city treasury34 was “unexpected income to the city...which was not figured on when the city budget was made out.”35 If the windfall pleased the city government, by the time the law went into effect the “Cigaret Dealers Are Smiling Now”: indeed, they were so filled with proper confidence in their own rectitude” that most of the dealers who had not 30“Nine Fag Permits Issued,” SCJ, June 14, 1921 (7:5).

32“Council to Discuss the Cigaret License,” CBN, June 21, 1921 (6:1).

33“Special Meeting of City Council,” CBN, June 27, 1921 (5:5).

34“More Licenses to Sell Cigarets,” CBN, June 29, 1921 (7:4).

35“Special Meeting of City Council,” CBN, June 27, 1921 (5:5).
yet received their revenue stamps from the state treasurer went ahead and ( illegally) sold cigarettes anyway, allegedly charging buyers for the tax and keeping track of sales “with the idea of setting aside the requisite number of cigaret stamps” after they received them. 36

In Cedar Rapids, the state’s fourth largest city with a population of almost 46,000, the local government was so eager to facilitate issuance of the greatest number of permits that it announced a month before the law was to go into effect that permits would be available at city hall on June 6. Indeed, it “urged that dealers obtain permits and bonds immediately as a duplicate of the permit must be sent to the secretary of state [sic] before stamps can be issued to the applicant,” adding that dealers’ “[q]uick action” would “insure that they will be inside the law when the new law goes into effect....” 37 Mayor Rall—who,ironically, as justice of the peace exactly a quarter-century earlier had presided over the first prosecution under the sales prohibition law 38—was so impatient to initiate licensure that he had arranged to have permits ready a month before the new law went into effect and had to seek an opinion from the attorney general as to whether dealers could be officially licensed before that date. 39 By June 17, with two and a half weeks to go, 25 dealers had already made the city $2,500 richer with estimates of another 25 to be issued by July 4; by July 24 the number of permits issued had reached 47. 40

Two days before the law went into effect, the city council in Mason City, the eleventh largest city, with a population just over 20,000, had already issued 32 permits to a broad array of businesses, including hotels, drug stores and pharmacies, cafes, a grocery store, a soda grill, a chocolate shop, and a pool hall in addition to cigar stores. The local government may have shared the (erroneous) view of the local newspaper that the new law’s primary purpose was

37. “Cigaret Dealers Must Get Permits to Sell,” CREG, June 4, 1921 (8:5-6).
38. See above ch. 11.
opinions of the attorney general for 1921 contain none on this subject, but the treasurer of state did send instructions to city clerks at about this time stating that: “City or town councils or boards of supervisors may use their pleasure in issuing permits prior to July 4, but in each and every case the issuance of each permit must be confirmed by the said city or town council or board of supervisors immediately after July 4, 1921.” “Date Here on Cigaret Sale,” OC, June 20, 1921 (2:2).
40. “City Gets $2,500 from Cigaret License Sale,” CREG, June 17, 1921 (15:5).
41. “Defer Action on Bids for Paving,” CREG, June 24, 1921 (3:1).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

to “raise the revenue of the city...”42 In Iowa’s sixth largest city, Waterloo, whose population exceeded 36,000, the city council already in May decided not to require dealers to post more than the statutory minimum bond of $1,000;43 before the end of June it had already issued about thirty permits,44 approving still more later.45 In mid-June the city council of Muscatine, the thirteenth largest city with a population of 16,000, unanimously46 passed a framework ordinance authorizing in principle the sale of cigarettes by holders of permits.47 It then promptly approved 14 petitions for permits.48 In Burlington, Iowa’s ninth largest city, whose population exceeded 24,000, dealers had already been granted 22 $100 permits by June 25, prompting officials to predict that mulct tax revenue would reach $3,000 before July. In fact, by the time the law went into effect during the first week of July the “substantial present” that the legislature had given the city49 had already reached $4,900.50

Davenport, with a population of almost 57,000 the third largest city, favored mass processing. At its July 6 session, the city council, on motion of one of the aldermen, authorized the city clerk to issue permits to 102 cigarette dealers who had furnished bonds in the proper amounts. Among the permit holders was, beyond the usual array of cigar stores, drug stores, pharmacies, pool room, and a wholesale grocery store, one especially interesting location: the Palmer School of Chiropractic, the first and largest in the world. Of note, too, was that the Davenport Chamber of Commerce also received a permit.51 (Later, the city

42a“Permits Issued to 32 Dealers Here,” Mason City Daily Globe-Gazette, July 2, 1921 (2:1-3).
43a“Local Cigaret Dealers Must Post $1,000,” WT-T, May 29, 1921 (2:1).
44a“New Bus Line Given License,” WT-T, June 28, 1921 (7:1); “Council Proceedings,” WEC, July 2, 1921 (11:4) (June 27, 5 permits ordered issued).
46a“War on Motorists Shifts to City Council Chamber,” Muscatine Journal, June 17, 1921 (4:1).
47a“Official Proceedings of City Council,” Muscatine Journal, June 20, 1921 (5:3-7 at 6) (June 16).
48a“Permission to Sell Smokes Given to 14,” Muscatine Journal, June 21, 1921 (8:2); See also “Eight More Ask to Sell Smokes,” Muscatine Journal, June 24, 1921 (5:2).
49a“Cigaretts Aid City,” BH-E, June 25, 1921 (2:2).
51aDavenport City Council, Council Proceedings, Regular Session, July 6, 1921, at 1973.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s council restricted the issuance of cigarette sales permits to applicants “engaged otherwise than incidentally or as an adjunct to some other occupation not...listed” in the following listed “occupations”: retail grocery, retail tobacco, restaurant, or hotel business, selling of malt beverages, or operating a private club.)

In Dubuque, Iowa’s fifth largest city with a population in excess of 39,000, at the end of June the city council, on the city manager’s recommendation, authorized him to issue permits to 30 applicants who had already filed applications as well as to all dealers who filed applications and posted the proper bonds between then and the next council meeting on July 3. During the ensuing days many more dealers than expected applied. Unlike their counterparts in Council Bluffs, dealers in Dubuque, who had failed to receive their tax stamps by Monday morning July 4, law-abidingly resisted the importunings of would-be buyers who were “unable to satisfy their cravings for the weed,” who were forced to wait until late afternoon when some dealers received the stamps.

In Ottumwa, the tenth largest city (population 23,003), the council on July 5 unanimously granted 32 permits. The city council in Clinton, the eighth largest city with a population of 24,151, approved 37 permits on July 1, 1921. Fort Dodge, the twelfth largest city with a population of 19,347, issued six permits to cigar, candy, and grocery stores on June 21. Boone, the sixteenth largest city with a population of 12,451, issued two permits on June 22.

Nor was the quasi-automatic granting of permits confined to the larger cities. Kalona (pop. 632), Lake Park (789), Lime Springs (595), Lytton (278), 13396 (copy furnished by Karen M. O’Connor, Special Collections, Davenport Public Library).

521943 Municipal Code of the City of Davenport, Iowa, ch. 16, Ordinance No. 107, at 347. Existing permit holders were grandfathered in regardless of a change in occupations.

53“Grant Manager Authority to Issue Permits,” DT-J, June 29, 1921 (3:1).

56Email from Ann Cullinan (Ottumwa City Clerk) to Marc Linder (Jan. 15, 2008).

57“New Cigaret Licenses to Be Taken Out,” Clinton Advertiser, July 2, 1921 (10:1).

61“Council Proceedings,” Lake Park News, July 14, 1921 (2:5) (2 applications approved July 7); “Council Proceedings,” Lake Park News, Nov. 17, 1921 (10:4-6 at 5)
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Milford (908), Renwick (501), Riceville (960), and Stanton (749) were just a few of the small towns that followed that same path. One town with fewer than a thousand residents may have won the race to the bottom in terms of the laxity of its regulation. The town council of Victor, a town of 802 located a few miles from the even smaller Ladora and 20 miles from Grinnell, both of which banned cigarette sales, already on June 9 unanimously passed a resolution effectively waiving the council’s power to vet each application individually. Instead, the resolution provided that beginning on July 4 “it shall be lawful for any persons engaged in business in the Town of Victor, who shall pay to the Town Treasurer the sum of Fifty Dollars per year in advance and file with the Town Clerk a good and sufficient bond in the sum of One Hundred Dollars to have, keep for sale and sell...cigarettes...and the Town Clerk is hereby authorized and empowered to issue permits to such person, persons, firm or firms as comply with the conditions hereof.” Not only did the council permit applicants to bypass council scrutiny, but it grossly violated the law by requiring a bond of only $100 whereas the statute unambiguously imposed a minimum bond of $1,000. Similarly, at a special meeting a month later, the town council of Sidney (pop. 1,154)—which was founded after the discovery of gold in California and initially served as a way station to the West—in Fremont county, the state’s southwestmost and a WCTU stronghold of prohibition, by majority vote decided to grant permits to “all reputable dealers....”

---

63 Council Proceedings,” Lytton Star, July 14, 1921 (5:4) (July 7, unanimous, 1 permit).
64 New Cigarette Law in Force, Milford Mail, July 14, 1921 (1:1).
65 Council Proceedings,” Renwick Times, July 14, 1921 (1:4) (July 5, all Aye).
67 City Council Met Last Night in Regular Session,” Stanton Call, July 7, 1921 (two permits).
68 Council Minutes,” Victor Record, June 9, 1921 (8:2). The occupations of three council members at the 1920 census were building contractor (Ellis Bowman), salesman (Charlie McAninch), and retail farm implement merchant (Samuel Steffy); a fourth had no occupation (Steven Smith), and the fifth did not appear in the census (Jas. Lawlor).
69 1921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 4, at 213, 214.
70 Thumbprints in Time: Fremont County Iowa 404 (1996).
71 Council Licenses ‘Fags,’” Sidney Argus, July 7, 1921 (1:1) (only 1 permit issued to the Nix brothers who owned a restaurant, but 2 more applications anticipated at next meeting). In this first issue in which cigarette ads became lawful the Argus ran two large
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

In small many cities, too, city councils acted expeditiously to approve applications for cigarette sales permits. Among them were Anita (1,236), Chariton (5,175), Charles City (7,350), Cherokee (5,824), Colfax (2,504), Decorah (4,039), Emmetsburg (2,762), Hamburg (2,017), Hampton (2,992), Hawarden (2,491), Humeston (1,214), La Porte City (1,443), Leon (2,193), ones for Chesterfield and Camel. Sidney Argus, July 7, 1921 (2:4-6, 6:4-6). The article was also reprinted as “Cigarettes Sold at Sidney,” T-WS-P, July 11, 1921 (3:6). The expression “majority vote” suggests that it was not unanimous; unfortunately, exploration of the presence, magnitude, and character of the resistance to issuing permits has become impossible because the Sidney town council lost its minutes from 1921 to the 1930s.

Email from Sidney Town Clerk (Suzanne) to Marc Linder, Feb. 13 and 14, 2008. The brief article in the Argus provided no other details and, even if the newspaper did publish the council minutes, they were not published through the issue of July 21, 1921, after which a three-year gap in holdings by any library opens. The Fremont County Herald, which was also published in Sidney in 1921, printed neither the council minutes nor any article on the permit issue. Presumably one of the two additional permits in Sidney was for C. M. Ambler Drug Co., a drug store, which by the end of the month was advertising that it sold cigarettes in the county paper, which in the same issue also ran ads for Camel, Chesterfield, and Lucky Strike. Fremont County Herald, July 28, 1921 (2:1-2).

Council Proceedings, Anita Tribune, July 14, 1921 (3:2) (July 6, 4 permits).

Council Men Get Cigaret Permits, OC, July 7, 1921 (2:3) (6 permits).

Cigaretts Not Legalized in Rockford, Ia, WEC, June 30, 1921 (3:2) (4 permits).

Dealers Apply for Cigaret Licenses, Semi-Weekly Democrat (Cherokee), June 27, 1921 (1:5) (5 permits granted).

Colfax City Council Gives Cigarette Permits to Six Dealers, Newton Record, July 15, 1921 (2:3).

Eight Cigaret Licenses in Decorah, Decorah Journal, July 13, 1921 (1:4).

Council Proceedings, Emmetsburg Democrat, July 20, 1921 (7:3-6 at 4) (NewspaperArchive) (June 27, 21, 4 permits). To be sure, at least one newspaper asserted that because the new law was “very drastic...very few who have been handling cigarettes have been taking out licenses.” Only three had applied in Emmetsburg because “[m]any dealers here do not figures [sic] that they can get enough out of the cigarettes to pay this license fee and have anything left over.” “Take Out Licenses for Cigarettes,” PAR, June 20, 1921 (1:2).

License Pill Dealers, Hampton Chronicle, July 14, 1921 (12:4) (5 permits).

City Council Meets, HI, June 30, 1921 (8:1-2) (June 22, 2 permits, June 27, 5 permits).

Four Cig Licenses Granted, Humeston New Era, July 13, 1921 (1:1) (unanimous).

[Untitled], Progress Review (La Porte City), July 7, 1921 (3 permits granted to only Maquoketa (3,626), Oelwein (7,455), Red Oak (5,578), Rockwell City (2,039), Sac City (2,630), Spencer (4,599), Spirit Lake (1,701), and Tama (2,601).

The press depicted both large and small cities as eager for the windfall largesse of the permit fees. For example the Ottumwa Courier reported that the city clerk was “beginning to ‘recover’ this afternoon from the ‘effect’ of eight $100 checks submitted to the city this morning for the first cigarette licenses ever distributed in Ottumwa.” Town councils in the smaller towns were especially receptive to the mulct tax revenue, which municipalities of all sizes turned into a purpose in its own right (“Cigarette Aid City”). The council, as one member of the Humeston town council put it, “thought the town had ‘just as well have that $50 per.’” Many smaller municipalities were no more immune than the bigger cities to uncritical appreciation of the “Golden Stream” that was pouring into their coffers thanks to the cigarette law.
Resisting Localities

However eager most city and town governments may have been to obtain as much mulct tax as possible from issuing permits, battles over these decisions did take place in councils in numerous smaller cities and towns, some of which in fact refused to countenance cigarette sales within their limits. The largest such city was Oskaloosa, Iowa’s nineteenth largest, with a population of 9,427 in 1920. Table 8 shows all cities and towns (with their population and rank for cities in 1920) in which opposition (defined here minimally as the casting of at least one vote on the council against issuance of permits) is known to have manifested itself in 1921; in many instances the opposition was much more intense.

This list in no way purports to be complete—councils in (perhaps even many) other, especially smaller, towns, may have resisted or even prohibited cigarette sales. For example, a newspaper in neighboring Shenandoah reported that the town council in Farragut, a town of 494 people in southwestern Iowa founded in the early 1870s, was “laboring with the cigarette question,” but had not yet decided “whether to license the so-called ‘coffin nails’ or not.” In order to put the town’s indecision into context, the Tri-Weekly Sentinel-Post presented the hostile extreme view:

Most of the people who believe in the welfare of the human race would like to see the cigarette abolished from the face of the earth but they are divided in opinion as to the attitude a town council should take. Some say that a public official should [not] make any compromise with evil, no matter what course might be taken elsewhere. Others say that if the state legalises the use of cigarettes and provides the way to secure them the people will get them and use them and the town council might as well be in position to regulate the sale and to derive some revenue from it.

A weekly in neighboring Sidney added that: “Many of the citizens are opposed to license and circulated petitions asking the council not to grant licenses.” Unfortunately, the council’s ultimate action is unknown because none of the newspapers covering Farragut followed up on it in the following weeks, and, even more fatally, the Farragut town council lost all of its minutes for meetings from...
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

1915 to 1934.\textsuperscript{101} The information about resistance derives from reading scores of bound and microfilmed contemporaneous Iowa newspapers and systematic computerized searches of a web-based, full-text facsimile of many, but far from all, Iowa newspapers from 1921 and 1922.\textsuperscript{102} Since newspapers often reported on denials of permits in other towns,\textsuperscript{103} including quite small ones, it is plausible that the list more than scratches the surface. Thus a small-town weekly in Stanton in extreme southwest Iowa, after reporting that the town council had approved two permits, noted that “[p]ractically all our neighboring towns” had granted permits, but that the council in Shenandoah had “decided that ‘fags’ cannot be sold legally” there.\textsuperscript{104}

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>City/Town (County)</th>
<th>1920 Population/Rank</th>
<th>Action</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Albia (Monroe)</td>
<td>5,067/36</td>
<td>Mayor briefly delayed issuance</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cedar Falls (Black Hawk)</td>
<td>6,316/25</td>
<td>1 council member opposed issuing any permits</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cumberland (Cass)</td>
<td>561</td>
<td>Ban for 11 weeks</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Earlham (Madison)</td>
<td>803</td>
<td>Ban until 1931</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fort Madison (Lee)</td>
<td>12,066/17</td>
<td>1 Mormon councilman voted against issuing all 20 permits</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grinnell (Powesheik)</td>
<td>5,362/32</td>
<td>Ban until 1924</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Indianola (Warren)</td>
<td>3,628/55</td>
<td>Ban until 1933</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

\textsuperscript{101}Telephone interview with Farragut town clerk Marilyn (Feb. 14, 2008).
\textsuperscript{102}Newspaper Archive.
\textsuperscript{103}For example, a weekly in Corning in one column on its front page reported on denials in three towns within about 50 miles. “Neighborhood News,” Adams County Free Press, July 16, 1921 (1:1).
\textsuperscript{104}“City Council Met Last Night in Regular Session,” Stanton Call, July 7, 1921 (1:3).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>City</th>
<th>Population</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Result</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ladora (Iowa)</td>
<td>340</td>
<td></td>
<td>Ban at least thru 1924</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lamoni (Decatur)</td>
<td>1,787</td>
<td></td>
<td>Issued no permits until 1935?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Newton (Jasper)</td>
<td>6,627/24</td>
<td></td>
<td>Ban, reversed 2 wks later</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oskaloosa (Mahaska)</td>
<td>9,427/19</td>
<td></td>
<td>Ban, lifted (1922?)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perry (Dallas)</td>
<td>5,642/30</td>
<td></td>
<td>Mayor vetoed ordinance; council overrode veto</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rockford (Floyd)</td>
<td>1,031</td>
<td></td>
<td>Ban (until 1927)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rockwell (Cerro Gordo)</td>
<td>800</td>
<td></td>
<td>Unanimous vote against issuing permits</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shannon City (Union)</td>
<td>333</td>
<td></td>
<td>Ban</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shenandoah (Page)</td>
<td>5,255/34</td>
<td></td>
<td>Refused then granted permit, but mayor vetoed twice; then in Sept. 1921 permits issued</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winterset (Madison)</td>
<td>2,906/68</td>
<td></td>
<td>Ban, reversed 2 days later</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Remarkably, most of these towns were located in Iowa’s southwestern area in which the group was especially strong. In 1921 WCTU membership was 13,030—or, in relation to the state population, one member for 184 Iowa residents. This statewide average density concealed very large county-level differences: whereas the ratio for most of the counties with the largest cities far exceeded the statewide average, in most of these southwestern counties the ratio was much lower. Map 3 and Table 9 show WCTU membership and density by county as well as the percentage of voters in each county who voted for the (failed) Iowa state constitutional amendment on liquor prohibition in 1917 and against ratification of repeal of the 18th Amendment to the Constitution in 1933.

---

105 Since the WCTU was a women’s organization (with a small number of male honorary members) this ratio should be halved, but presumably the gender ratios among counties did not vary sufficiently to skew the averages.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>County</th>
<th>% Voting for State Liquor Prohibition Constitutional Amendment in 1917</th>
<th>WCTU Members in 1921</th>
<th>County Population 1920/WCTU Members in 1921</th>
<th>% Voting Against Repeal of National Prohibition in 1933</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Adair</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>133</td>
<td>107</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Adams</td>
<td>66</td>
<td>102</td>
<td>103</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Allamakee</td>
<td>31</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>691</td>
<td>21</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appanoose</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>35</td>
<td>872</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Audubon</td>
<td>47</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benton</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>502</td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Black Hawk</td>
<td>49</td>
<td>1,127</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boone</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>298</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bremer</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>192</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Buchanan</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>272</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Buena Vista</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>[81]</td>
<td>[229]</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Butler</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>233</td>
<td>77</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Calhoun</td>
<td>51</td>
<td>[21]</td>
<td>[847]</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carroll</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>224</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cass</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>[43]</td>
<td>[452]</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cedar</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>162</td>
<td>108</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cerro Gordo</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>189</td>
<td>183</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cherokee</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>66</td>
<td>269</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chickasaw</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>351</td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Clarke</td>
<td>74</td>
<td>117</td>
<td>90</td>
<td>71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Clay</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>83</td>
<td>189</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>City</th>
<th>1920 Sales</th>
<th>1930 Sales</th>
<th>1983 Sales</th>
<th>1983</th>
<th>1983</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Clayton</td>
<td>52</td>
<td>133</td>
<td>188</td>
<td>18</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Clinton</td>
<td>31</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>452</td>
<td>7</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crawford</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>81</td>
<td>254</td>
<td>24</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dallas</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>184</td>
<td>137</td>
<td>56</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Davis</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>3144</td>
<td>65</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Decatur</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>233</td>
<td>64</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delaware</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>92</td>
<td>198</td>
<td>37</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Des Moines</td>
<td>38</td>
<td>151</td>
<td>235</td>
<td>28</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dickinson</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>166</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>50</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dubuque</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>117</td>
<td>498</td>
<td>6</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Emmet</td>
<td>57</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>57</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fayette</td>
<td>49</td>
<td>324</td>
<td>90</td>
<td>37</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Floyd</td>
<td>51</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>43</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Franklin</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>527</td>
<td>46</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fremont</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>178</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>58</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greene</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>1830</td>
<td>70</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grundy</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>288</td>
<td>49</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Guthrie</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>146</td>
<td>121</td>
<td>61</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hamilton</td>
<td>66</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>195</td>
<td>58</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hancock</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>258</td>
<td>43</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hardin</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>103</td>
<td>227</td>
<td>55</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Harrison</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>293</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>43</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Henry</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>124</td>
<td>148</td>
<td>44</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howard</td>
<td>38</td>
<td>72</td>
<td>190</td>
<td>45</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Humboldt</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>1079</td>
<td>48</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ida</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>162</td>
<td>72</td>
<td>31</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Iowa</td>
<td>42</td>
<td>117</td>
<td>159</td>
<td>31</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>City</th>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Sales</th>
<th>Ban</th>
<th>Permutation</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Jackson</td>
<td>38</td>
<td>124</td>
<td>161</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jasper</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>222</td>
<td>125</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jefferson</td>
<td>64</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>587</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Johnson</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>160</td>
<td>165</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jones</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>1861</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Keokuk</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>129</td>
<td>163</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kossuth</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>79</td>
<td>317</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lee</td>
<td>35</td>
<td>143</td>
<td>277</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Linn</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>429</td>
<td>173</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Louisa</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>94</td>
<td>130</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lucas</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>51</td>
<td>308</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lyon</td>
<td>34</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>1286</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Madison</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>233</td>
<td>64</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mahaska</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>373</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marion</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>384</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marshall</td>
<td>54</td>
<td>104</td>
<td>314</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mills</td>
<td>66</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>220</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mitchell</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>150</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monona</td>
<td>57</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monroe</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>546</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Montgomery</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>139</td>
<td>123</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muscatine</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>708</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>O’Brien</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>953</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Osceola</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>341</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Page</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>359</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palo Alto</td>
<td>47</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>43</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Plymouth</td>
<td>38</td>
<td>112</td>
<td>211</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>County</th>
<th>1985</th>
<th>1930</th>
<th>1920</th>
<th>1917</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Pocahontas</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>186</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Polk</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>646</td>
<td>238</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pottawattamie</td>
<td>51</td>
<td>227</td>
<td>271</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poweshiek</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>125</td>
<td>159</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ringgold</td>
<td>77</td>
<td>120</td>
<td>108</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sac</td>
<td>54</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>175</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scott</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>245</td>
<td>302</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shelby</td>
<td>44</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sioux</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>157</td>
<td>169</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Story</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>353</td>
<td>74</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tama</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>142</td>
<td>154</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Taylor</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>147</td>
<td>106</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Union</td>
<td>64</td>
<td>199</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Van Buren</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>35</td>
<td>402</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wapello</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>31</td>
<td>1224</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Warren</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>242</td>
<td>75</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Washington</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>161</td>
<td>127</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wayne</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>216</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Webster</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>230</td>
<td>164</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winnebago</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>214</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winneshiek</td>
<td>34</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>381</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woodbury</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>258</td>
<td>357</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Worth</td>
<td>52</td>
<td>54</td>
<td>215</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wright</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>210</td>
<td>97</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>13,030</td>
<td>184</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Thus, whereas the population/membership ratio for Polk (Des Moines), Pottawattamie (Council Bluffs), Scott (Davenport), and Woodbury (Sioux City) counties was 238, 275, 302, and 357, respectively, the ratio for Madison (Earlham and Winterset), Page (Shenandoah), Mahaska (Oskaloosa), Warren (Indianola), Union (Shannon City), and Jasper (Newton) counties was 64, 67, 70, 75, 87, and 125, respectively. To be sure, above-average WCTU density and opposition to alcohol did not translate into resistance to, let alone prevention of, cigarette sales. Thus, the city council of Bedford, the county seat of Taylor, a southwestern county, whose dry voting record was exceeded by none, nevertheless immediately issued a cigarette permit to a cigar maker. Yet, in other counties and towns the WCTU’s strength was on display even where its exercise failed of its purpose. For example, in Clarinda (population 4,511), the county seat of Page county, in which Shenandoah is also located, the city council unanimously issued a permit to one firm and sent word to other dealers that it was prepared to act on their applications, too, as soon as they paid their fees and 106The total membership was calculated by adding the members reported by the individual county chapters to the annual convention in October 1921. Total membership was probably somewhat higher since some counties (e.g., Cass, in which Cumberland is located) failed to file a report, while others (including Floyd, in which Rockford is located) were unorganized and may not have had a complete count. The convention report also included (without methodological explanation) an alternative total membership of 15,250, which would have produced a statewide density of 158. Woman’s Christian Temperance Union of Iowa, Forty-Eighth Annual Convention 31-51 (1921). WCTU membership in 1921 is used as a gauge of the group’s strength during its battle against repeal of the cigarette sales ban that year. There are no membership data for a number of counties for 1921 either because the county was unorganized or the county organization failed to submit a report. In the latter instance data have been inserted (in square brackets) from 1920 (when the total membership was 11,556), if available, but they have not been included in the statewide totals. In a few unorganized counties a few residents nevertheless paid dues directly to the state WCTU, producing very low membership densities for those counties.

107To be sure, several counties were outliers. For example, Black Hawk, which included Waterloo as well as Cedar Falls and had the largest membership (1,127), exhibited a very low ratio (50). Decatur, in which Lamoni is located, had only 71 members and thus an above-average ratio (233). Powesheik, in which Grinnell is located, had a slightly below-average ratio (165).

108“One Cigarette License,” Times-Republican (Bedford), July 11, 1921 (1:3) (permit issued to L. D. Willman at July 9 meeting); 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest). Two more applications were to be presented at the next council meeting.
posted their bonds. The council took this action despite having on file remonstrances from nine local organizations and the presence at the meeting of two people seeking to use their influence against cigarettes. The groups included the WCTU, City Federation of Missionary Societies, Christian Endeavour, Society of the Christian Church, Presbyterian Congregation, Methodist S. S., Troop 2 Boy Scouts of America, Official Boards of the M. and E. and Christian Churches, and the Alethan Class of the Methodist Church. Ames, the location of Iowa State College of Agricultural and Mechanic Arts, offers another example. The density of WCTU membership in Story county (74) was far above average as was its electoral opposition to alcohol in 1917 and 1933. Yet, apparently without any opposition, the Ames city council granted eight cigarette permits as early as June 20, although at the same session the WCTU presented a petition with upward of 1,600 signatures requesting an ordinance prohibiting the showing of movies on Sunday.

Finally, to be distinguished from towns in which formal resistance to selling cigarettes took place were those in which the market, so to speak, knew better: perceiving no profitable demand, potential sellers did not bother to apply for a permit. For example, in the small north-central town of Burt (pop. 626), by the time the law went into effect no one had applied for a permit, prompting the local Republican weekly to comment: “People who must have them will have to go to the neighboring towns for their supply of `pills.’” But the paper then added: “We doubt if very many care if the sale of cigarets in this burg was dispensed with entirely.” That, however, someone cared about sales even in tiny Burt was manifested in the very same issue (July 6) of the town’s only newspaper, which was the first in which cigarette advertising became lawful: the back page displayed an ad for Lucky Strike, as it did throughout July and until the last week in August when it was replaced by a larger one for Chesterfield. Whether American Tobacco Company and Liggett & Myers were seeking to stimulate 110“New Pavement Project Starts by August 1st,” ADT, June 21, 1921 (1:7); “Official Proceedings,” ADT, June 27, 1921 (5:4-6) (minutes of council meeting of June 20). This newspaper began publishing (large) cigarette advertisements as soon as it became lawful to do so. Id. July 5, 1921 (3:5-7) (Camel).

---

112“No Cigarets for Burt,” Burt Monitor, July 6, 1921 (1:1). It is assumed here that, unlike the situation, described below, in Lamoni, potential applicants in Burt were not deterred by the knowledge or perception that the city council would not approve a permit.
113Burt Monitor, July 6, 1921 (n.p. [8]:1).
cigarette smokers in Burt to travel to the nearest town where cigarettes could be bought\textsuperscript{114} or to build up a market in Burt itself so that demand would justify paying for a permit is unclear, but after ATC had, for an extended period in 1922, published ads for its new brand, 111, on August 9 a motion carried in the city council to authorize the clerk to issue a permit to Francis Pratt,\textsuperscript{115} a 32-year-old retail druggist,\textsuperscript{116} whose sales continued to be supported by ATC: the same issue of the newspaper that published the council minutes also ran an ad for 111, and soon Lucky Strike again appeared on the back page.\textsuperscript{117}

\textbf{Albia}

The minimal resistance in Albia appears to have been carried on by one person—Mayor Pabst—who engaged in a limited holding action, which the local newspaper called a “rather unusual and to some extent embarrassing condition....” Although the new statute did not expressly confer any power on mayors to deal with issuing permits, mayors in neighboring towns called special city council meetings to act on it, but councils could also meet on their own. In Albia, the mayor had “taken it upon himself to handle the matter...to suit his own interpretation of the law and as a result of his action no permits will be issued in Albia until after” the next regular meeting on the evening of July 4. Because the rush on stamps at the state treasurer’s office was causing delays of three days to three weeks in securing them, the seven or eight dealers in Albia who had applied for permits and paid the $75 mulct tax would not be permitted to sell cigarettes (even if their applications were approved). The \textit{Albia Republican}, which consequently headlined its account, “No Cigarettes for July Fourth,” was unable to explain the mayor’s usurpation of all authority and control over the permits.\textsuperscript{118} In fact, the council did meet at 8:00 o’clock on July 4 and authorized the city council to issue permits, but the permit applications for the dealers were not processed until after the regular meeting on July 4. The council then issued permits to the dealers who had applied and paid the mulct tax.

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{114}In Algona (pop. 3,724), the county seat of Kossuth County, which was 10 miles away, the city council immediately issued permits to five sellers (including three pool halls). “Five Are Given Permits to Sell Cigarettes in Algona,” \textit{Kossuth County Advance}, July 7, 1921 (8:2). But even Titonka (pop. 418), which was even smaller than Burt and almost as close, issued two permits. “Council Proceedings,” \textit{Burt Monitor}, Aug. 9, 1922 (1:3).
\item \textsuperscript{115}1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).
\item \textsuperscript{116}“Council Proceedings,” \textit{Burt Monitor}, Aug. 9, 1922 (1:3).
\item \textsuperscript{117}“No Cigarettes for July Fourth,” \textit{Albia Republican}, June 30, 1921 (1:1).
\end{itemize}
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

clerk to issue permits to eight applicants.\textsuperscript{119}

\textbf{Cedar Falls}

With a population of 6,316 in 1920, Cedar Falls was the location of Iowa State Teachers College, whose enrollment was 1,402.\textsuperscript{120} The local WCTU’s innovative anti-smoking campaign in 1913 underscored the movement’s size, influence, and vibrancy.\textsuperscript{121} By the last week in June 1921 it was publicly known that at least six dealers would definitely and another three probably apply for cigarette permits, but the city council had not considered the matter before its meeting on June 27.\textsuperscript{122} At that session three applications were on the agenda, while three others were not discussed because they were not accompanied by bonds. Five different and liberally signed petitions, submitted by three WCTU organizations in Cedar Falls and two church groups, were read urging the council not to issue any permits. One council member, Robert Waters, a 57-year-old livestock buyer, voted against each petition because he was opposed to granting any licenses as provided by the new law. The majority, however, voted to issue permits to a drug store, cafe, and cigar store/billiard hall because they regarded cigarette sales “licensed under strict regulations” as “preferable to a ‘closed town’ with the constant temptation to ‘bootleg’” cigarettes.\textsuperscript{123}

\textbf{Cumberland}

The council of this small town called a special meeting on June 27, 1921, whose sole object was to consider the matter of granting permits for the sale of cigarettes. After an informal discussion Councilman H. Glenn Liston, a 32-year-old undertaker, offered a resolution authorizing the clerk to issue cigarette sales permits “to any party whose application is accompanied by the town treasurer’s \textsuperscript{119}“The City Clerk Issues Permits,” \textit{Albia Republican}, July 7, 1921 (1:6).

\textsuperscript{120}http://www.uni.edu. It later became the University of Northern Iowa.
\textsuperscript{121}See above ch. 14.
\textsuperscript{122}“Cedar Falls,” \textit{WT-T}, June 26, 1921 (6:5) (NewspaperArchive).
Receipt for $50 and good and sufficient bond in the sum of $1,000 to comply with the law governing the sale of cigarettes.” The council then defeated the motion to adopt the resolution by a vote of 4 to 1. In voting against his own resolution, Liston was joined by Councilmen William Burton Denham (a 31-year-old veterinarian operating his own veterinary hospital), H. Lee Breckenmaker (a 34-year-old meat market merchant/butcher), and Whitney (either 33-year-old Floyd, an undertaker, or his 36-year-old brother Orville G., a general store merchant and Baptist association activist); the sole Nay was cast by Lattimer (either 67-year-old George H., or his 38-year-old son John M., both of whom were carpenters). The press did not adequately describe the generalized and programmatic character of the council’s action when it reported that the council had merely “refused to grant a license to cigarette vendors....”

The council did not discuss the cigarette question at its monthly meetings on July 7 or August 2, but did return to it on September 12 in connection with the permit applications of C. Mott Pigsley (a 41-year-old produce buyer), and C. F. Lassen. Councilman Breckenmaker’s motion to reconsider the resolution that had been defeated 11 weeks earlier was seconded by Lattimer and carried by a vote of 4 to 1. Breckenmaker’s motion to adopt Liston’s resolution, again seconded by Lattimer, passed this time by a vote of 3 to 2, Whitney and Denham adhering to their earlier Nays. The clerk was then authorized to grant permits when applications were accompanied by proper bonds and the treasurer’s receipt of $50 for the license, thus ending Cumberland’s brief resistance against cigarette sales.
Earlham

Founded by Quakers, the small town of Earlham was by 1927 the place of publication of the WCTU Champion, and as late as 1933 its exquisite ideological dryness was on display in its 80 percent electoral majority against repeal of national liquor Prohibition in the teeth of a 60 percent statewide vote for repeal. In mid-1921 the Madison County WCTU was “making a determined effort to make the [county?] solidly prohibitory of cigarette smoking. They believe they have the campaign against the pill well in hand in all of the smaller towns as well as in Winterset,” the county seat. The intensity of feeling in Earlham on the question was reflected in the extraordinary procedure used by the community to form and measure public opinion. On Sunday June 26 a vote was taken in every church to determine the congregations’ sentiment regarding cigarette sales permits: “There proved to be slight division of opinion expressed. Aside from a few who failed to register their vote, the sentiment was almost unanimously against the licensing of local dealers to sell the ‘pill.’” To be sure, the Earlham Echo hardly expected to see a majority casting a vote in church for licensing cigarettes, “especially in a community where the cigarette smoker is in the minority as he is in Earlham.” But it was nevertheless clear that licensing was “unpopular.” On the other hand, the cigarette smoker was allegedly “not deeply concerned one way or the other. He figures if he can’t buy ‘em one place he can buy them another.” During the run-up to the council vote the press was aware that the members were split, some opining that “licensed sale was not worse an evil than unlimited bootlegging” because a licensed dealer would be “the surest safeguard against misuse of cigarettes through his efforts to curb the illicit trade in them.” How and why such dealers would perform that service the Echo did not disclose, but since it believed that the new law’s “principal purpose” was to “withhold the pestiferous alkaloid laden things from the minor” so that enforcement would “unquestionably reduce the amount of cigarette smoking within a decade by curtailing the formation of the habit,” it is odd that the paper began publishing cigarette advertising on the first day it became lawful. At a special meeting of the Earlham town council on July 8 to consider a dealer’s application a committee of representatives of local churches, including 129 “Repealists Are Victors Tuesday,” EE, June 22, 1933 (1:1).

130 “Cigarette License Unpopular Here,” EE, June 30, 1921 (1:5-6). The word “county” inserted in square brackets may be the word that appears to have been mistakenly omitted in the newspaper.
131 EE, July 7, 1921 (8:4-6) (Chesterfield).
the Friends, Methodist, Christian, and Presbyterian, “registered a strong protest against” cigarette sales permits. The council then defeated the application for a permit by a vote of 4 to 1.\textsuperscript{132}

The council during the next three years appears never to have dealt with the question of cigarette permits at any of its mid-year meetings with the exception of June 1924, when Edward G. Tough, a cafe owner, asked for one, but the “Council failed to take action thereon.”\textsuperscript{133} Likewise, from 1925 through 1929 the council minutes again did not mention cigarettes.\textsuperscript{134} That the refusal to issue permits really meant that cigarettes were not sold in Earlham was confirmed by a lifelong resident (born in 1916), one of whose earliest childhood memories was of his older brother’s having to go to the even smaller town of Dexter, six miles away, to buy them sometime during the 1920s.\textsuperscript{135} Although during these years the \textit{Earlham Echo} did publish a long, two-column front-page article quoting various prominent opponents of youth smoking,\textsuperscript{136} it was an unoriginal piece that was probably placed in the paper by the WCTU, the printing of whose \textit{Champion} had become a major component of the \textit{Echo}’s business.\textsuperscript{137} More interesting, perhaps, is that the WCTU entrusted the work to a newspaper that regularly published

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{133}“Council Proceedings,” \textit{EE}, June 5, 1924 (4:4). Unfortunately, the minutes as published in the newspaper often omitted the date of the meeting and did so on this occasion; since it was a regular meeting, which was held Mondays, the date was probably June 2. The biographical information on Tough is taken from the 1930 Census of Population, T626, Roll 666, Page 174 (HeritageQuest), and http://iagenweb.org/boards/madison/obituaries/indexcgi?read=92844 (accessed Feb. 7, 2008).
\item \textsuperscript{135}Telephone interview with Frank Inman, Earlham (Feb. 14, 2008). When Inman’s father found out, he was angry that his son was wasting his time instead of working.
\item \textsuperscript{136}“Tobacco Traffic Menaces Youth,” \textit{EE}, June 14, 1928 (1:3-4).
\item \textsuperscript{137}“To Echo Patrons,” \textit{EE}, June 2, 1928 (1:3-4).
\end{itemize}
cigarette advertising. 138

In 1930 Tough once again applied for a permit as did John E. Bechtel, another cafe owner. At the June meeting the council voted 3 to 2 to deny the request to accept their cigarette bonds and in July denied another request by Bechtel alone by the same vote. The five members were all businessmen, who were returned at the 1930 Census of Population as engaged in the following occupations: John H. Junkin (coal dealer), Charles E. Deets (grain elevator manager, farmer in 1920), Sanford J. Golightly (farmer), Robert J. Lewis (general store owner), and Edward A. Anderson (implement store owner), the first two voting Aye and the last three Nay. 139 Undeterred, on October 6, 1930, Deets introduced the following resolution:

WHEREAS, there are no cigarettes now being sold in the Town of Earlham, Iowa and [sic] are being sold in all neighboring towns and in justice to tobacco dealers in Earlham, Iowa and in view of increasing the funds of the Town of Earlham, Iowa

Now therefore be it resolved by the Town Council of Town of Earlham, Iowa that the Town Clerk be instructed to issue to E G Tough and J E Bechtel a cigarette [sic] permit.... 140

Manifestly, the worsening impact of the Great Depression on Earlham’s financial solidity prompted it at last to abandon the decade-old legal expression of the townspeople’s aversion to cigarettes, but it is nevertheless noteworthy that instead of justifying the facilitation of cigarette sales on the grounds that the policy was not working because residents were going to other towns to buy them anyway, the council chose to focus on—to use today’s ubiquitously deployed rhetoric to justify market-driven legislative decisions—‘creating a level playing field’ for Earlham merchants who were already selling other tobacco commodities, which did not require a permit. When Anderson, who had cast one of the three Nays in June and July, seconded the motion to adopt the resolution, the die was cast: on roll call he shifted to Aye, thus producing a 3 to 2 majority, and bringing Earlham’s ban to an end. 141

138E.g., EE, Sept. 15, 1927 (7:4-6) (Camel).
139Email from Kathy Timmerman, Earlham Town Clerk, to Marc Linder (Feb. 19 and 20, 2008); 1920 and 1930 Census of Population (HeritageQuest). Unfortunately, no issues of the Earlham Echo—which published the council minutes—from 1930 appear to be extant.
140Earlham, Iowa Town Council Minutes, Oct. 6, 1930, at 173 (copy furnished by Town Clerk Kathy Timmerman).
141The loss of the Echo for 1930 eliminates what would otherwise be the most accessible source of gauging public reaction to the reversal in policy.
By the next year the same members achieved unanimity: at its meeting on July 6, after passing a motion to accept the cigarette bonds of Tough and Bechtel, the council unanimously passed a resolution “that since cigaret [sic] permits were in effect in Earlham, Iowa, and also that the town is badly in need of funds,...the Town Council...grant a cigarette permit to E. L. Scar....” Remarkably, Elmer Scar, a drug store owner, was the town clerk. The following year the council again accepted Scar’s and Tough’s bonds, but the motion to accept Bechtel’s lost. Then at the bottom of the Depression in 1933, the council unanimously passed a resolution that since cigarettes were being sold in Earlham, a permit be issued to Bechtel.

Grinnell

A college town located in a rich farming community about halfway between Iowa City and Des Moines, Grinnell was the most prominent example of secular-political municipal action against cigarette sales that was not led by the WCTU or churches. (It is unclear that there was a rift between the WCTU and the city government, but in 1922 in connection with a legal dispute over an ordinance banning movies on Sundays, the mayor strongly objected to an impression created by the WCTU that “this worthy organization” had been the campaign’s main force; in fact, the WCTU, he charged, had neither lent the movement any active cooperation nor been in any way identified with it.) Grinnell also most clearly embodied that part of Governor Kendall’s declaration of legislative intent at the time of signing the Dodd-Clark bill advising anti-cigarette Iowans to elect like-minded citizens to their city council if they wished

---

142“Council Proceedings,” EE, July 23, 1931 (2:3-4) (July 6, 1931).
144“Council Proceedings,” EE, July 13, 1933 (4:4-6) (July 3, 1933). Because the newspaper was apparently bound very tightly, the last several letters of the lines in the right-most column of the article were in the gutter and not captured by the microfilming; consequently, some of the words had to be guessed at.
145According to Grinnell College, its enrollment in 1921-22 was 880 students, while faculty members numbered 79. Email from Chris Jones (Grinnell College Special Collections and Archives) to Marc Linder (Jan. 5, 2011). According to State of Iowa: 1923-24: Official Register 623 (13th No.), enrollment that year was 794.
146*Polk’s Iowa State Gazetteer and Business Directory: 1922-1923*, at 565 (Vol. 20, 43rd Year, 1922).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s to retain their communities’ ban on the sale of cigarettes. The town’s interest in tobacco control antedated 1921: among its revised ordinances of 1917 was a section prohibiting and making a misdemeanor of the distribution of sample packages of tobacco (or any drug, medicine, nostrum, or soap) by leaving them on “any porch, steps, sidewalks, or by throwing the same in any doorway or yard...”

The city council that met on June 20, 1921, to decide whether to permit the sale of cigarettes had been elected on March 28, when the Citizens ticket, headed by mayoral candidate James L. McIlrath (1871-1955), gained five of the six seats, largely by wide margins, leaving only one seat to the People’s Ticket. Just 10 years old when his dying father charged him with caring for his mother and five younger siblings, by the age of 14 McIlrath was in full control of the family’s 80-acre farm not far from Grinnell. At some point, with “[n]o money, no schooling, or any qualification upon which I could build a career,” he took up auctioneering. By 1921 the 49-year-old own-account auctioneer was well-known in Iowa with a reputation of being a strong leader with strong opinions. McIlrath was a relatively high earner: he reported to the Iowa state census enumerator that his total earnings from his occupation as auctioneer was $3,500 in 1914—when the average annual money earnings of employed wage earners in all industries in the United States was only $580. The value of his farm or 149 Grinnell Revised Ordinances of Nineteen Hundred Seventeen, sect. 74 at 18 (S. Crosby ed. 1917). The “actual delivery of such sample to any adult person” was not covered by the provision.

---

148See above ch. 15.
151“City Election Is Over,” GH, Mar. 29, 1921 (1:3); 1900, 1910, 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); A Reader, “The People’s Ticket,” GH, Feb. 25, 1921 (4:3) (letter to editor). For a list of the People’s and Citizens tickets and Independent candidates, see [Untitled], GH, Mar. 25, 1921 (4:1).
152“J. L. McIlrath Tells of His Life in County,” Montezuma Republican, Jan. 1, 1952, at 1 (clipping provided by James L. McIlrath). Unfortunately and oddly, this very lengthy autobiographical account, which 81-year-old McIlrath wrote while recovering from a broken hip, consists largely of isolated details about auctions and does not even mention his having been mayor or state legislator.
153 Telephone interview with James McIlrath, auctioneer, Grinnell (Mar. 16, 2008) (a relative, but non-direct descendant, of McIlrath, who is custodian of his papers).
154 Iowa Census 1915, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, Card No. [A]835.
155 Paul Douglas, Real Wages in the United States 1890-1926, tab. 84 at 230 (1930). In 1914 the earnings of John H. Patton, a leading lawyer in Grinnell and Poweshiek home was also considerable at $35,800. The five victorious Citizen ticket candidates were: 65-year-old James Harpster, a merchant and Methodist Episcopalian at the 1915 Iowa census, who was also a director (and about to become president) of the Mutual Home Loan and Savings Association, and was otherwise “a power always” in “various business organization”; 64-year-old Horace S. Lowrey, who was returned as a retired farmer and Methodist Episcopalian at the 1915 Iowa census; 50-year-old Charles Cratty, a mechanic employed in a garage; 59-year-old William Simmons, a farmer; and 62-year-old David McBlain, who had been returned as a waterworks engineer in 1910. (The Citizens ticket’s only defeated city council candidate was Herbert Brock, a dentist.) The only successful People’s ticket council candidate was Bernard Carney, the 28-year-old vice president of the Grinnell Savings Bank. A capitalist class bias in the composition of the People’s ticket seemed to emerge from the fact that, in addition, McIlrath’s opponent on the People’s ticket, Jesse Fellows, was the director/manager of Grinnell Washing Machine Company, and Cratty’s, Charles Snyder, was a furniture business employer, but other unsuccessful People’s candidates for city council were a washing machine company foreman (Cedric Barnes), telephone company lineman...
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

(James C. Martin), railroad freight agent (John Foster), and carriage factory receiving clerk (Michael J. Garrigan, the only incumbent).

As in other Iowa towns of the period, the Grinnell ticket platforms were suffused with such commonplaces that it was difficult to tell them apart. McIlrath himself, responding to a letter to the Grinnell Herald seeking information about the various platforms, declared that “the city of Grinnell is not in ‘Politics’” and the campaign’s “real goal” would be “lost if our city should be divided into factions drawn up along lines representing factional platforms which did not represent the interests of all the People.” Drawing out this harmonized suprafaction, -class, and -gender ideal, he insisted that “Grinnell is a city of homes, churches and educational institutions, business enterprises, factories, etc., wage earners, business men, professional men and women, and retired citizens, all of whom represent the high type of character which has placed Grinnell in a high class by herself as a model home town.” Anticipating Coolidge’s “the business of America is business,” McIlrath’s secular manifesto declared that Grinnell “is looking for executives and not politicians. Men who have business ability to manage the business affairs of the town in the interests of economy as well as good business expansion, men who have the courage to stand for the enforcement of the ordinances of the town and thereby maintain the moral character and ideals of the city.” Projecting—on the very day that Warren Harding became president—an apolitical normalcy, “refus[ing] to develop or discuss any factional issue in this campaign,” and “vouch[ing] for every candidate on the ‘Citizens’ ticket,” he assured the public that a “‘Radical’ has no place in such a position any more than a ‘Liberal’....”

Even voters’ complaints that candidates had been “very vague in regard to what they stood for” were unable to tempt McIlrath to violate his self-imposed promise not to campaign on “factional issues,” but just three days before the election “a few mis-statements relative to my position on certain questions pertaining to the blue laws” did finally prompt McIlrath to speak out. In particular, he objected to allegations that “I would go as far as to interfere with the personal habits and practices of individuals that did not conform to my own of thinking.” After noting the obvious point that no mayor was authorized to enforce restrictions not provided for by ordinances or statutes, he allowed as that he stood for “a clean Grinnell or a standard of public morals that will be wholesome for the great aggregation of young people that make up the whole life as well as the school life of our city.” Without explanation McIlrath also revealed that he had developed a position on the completely unrelated matter of utility rates, which, he owned, were “little short of burdensome, but any candidate would...show a great lack of judgment who takes a rap at such utilities until he had made a thorough and impartial investigation of such rates by competent authorities”; judiciously he would then “feel in duty bound to use my influence to bring about such action that would secure justice to producer and consumer alike.” And to make sure that the electorate had not forgotten his program of subordinating “the administration of city affairs [to] the highest kind of business efficiency obtainable,” McIlrath promised that as mayor he would “give to the municipal affairs the same active interest, hard work and careful attention to details which heretofore I have given to my own private business.”

161“J. C. Martin Was Buried Tuesday,” Grinnell Herald-Register, July 1, 1943, on http://www.grinnell.lib.ia.us/Obit/M/MartinJC.pdf

Despite McIlrath’s reluctance to be pinned down on specific policies, he was well known as an opponent of smoking. (Although a member of the Congregational church from the time he moved to Grinnell in 1909, McIlrath for almost 25 years taught an adult Sunday School at the First Methodist church; whether this engagement had any connection to his position on cigarette sales is unknown.) The author of a purportedly humorous letter to the editor observed several weeks before the election that “sum say if Mac is elected, he wunt let ennyboddy smoke on Sunday nor Thanksgiving day, but if Jess [Peoples ticket candidate Jesse Fellows] is Mayr they can smoke every day and nites to, after they have gon to bed even if they do set the howse on fire....” Moreover, incumbent mayor and Independent candidate Dan White “don’t care a dam who smokes or goze to church and he wunt interfer with no smoker nor no drinker if he donte drink nuthing hotter than Wawter or Cowfee.”

Despite his earnestness and zeal on the subject, McIlrath also displayed a sense of humor on cigarette law enforcement in his newspaper column just a week after he had been sworn in. After a mayor in Iowa had recently been “elected on an anti-cigarette and law and order platform,” the city council appointed a young lawyer as city solicitor “who was some what [sic] of a cigarette smoker. On being sworn into office he thanked the council for the honor bestowed on him and addressing the Mayor assured him every cooperation in enforcing the law and making a clean city. ‘All right,’ replied the Mayor. ‘Just tell me where you are buying your cigarettes?’”

McIlrath’s ability to take a joke on the subject was (presumably) on display a few months later when he wrote in his column: “The Mayor has just received a package of twenty-four books of cigarette papers from the American Tobacco Co., of Durham, N.C. The merchant who placed the order for for [sic] use [sic; should be “us”?] forgot to include the tobacco otherwise the papers are worthless to us. However if he will call at our office we will gladly remit for them.” Since the sale of cigarette papers was as unlawful as the sale of cigarettes without a permit, and since no one in Grinnell (thanks to McIlrath) had a permit, this transaction was unlawful (at least as mediated by a merchant, though a consumer could lawfully have directly bought cigarettes for his own use from an out-of-state seller). But even if it had been lawful, McIlrath’s making and smoking his own cigarettes while spearheading the city’s drive against (manufactured) cigarette sales would have been so bizarre as surely to have prompted his opponents to accuse him of hypocrisy. Since McIlrath’s platform clearly stated that he did not smoke, perhaps the order placed in his name had been an anonymous hoax and McIlrath was jocularly acknowledging and trying to smoke out the hoaxster. (That McIlrath was a lifelong nonsmoker was consistent with his ability in 1951 to blow out all 80 candles on his 80th birthday, “indicating that he has lost none of his lung power which he had developed during his 50 years...as a livestock auctioneer.”)

At the special council meeting on June 20, 1921, Cratty of the Citizens ticket moved—seconded by Carney, the sole People’s ticket member—a framework resolution putting the city in principle on record in favor of licensure. After citing the new cigarette law as making it optional with city councils to grant permits and as “rigidly” safeguarding minors’ interests, the proposed resolution focused primarily on the public and private financial advantages accruing from a sales regime:

WHEREAS, Refusal to grant permits under said law will deprive the city of revenue and dealers of profits that will go to other municipalities and will not insure protection to 167[. L. McIlrath.] “Mayor’s Corner,” GH, Apr. 12, 1921 (4:5-6).

169See below.
170“J. L. McIlrath Was Honored on 80th Birthday Saturday,” Montezuma Republican, Sept. 27, 1951 (SHSI IC, biography clippings file).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

minors,

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED, that it is the sense of this Council that upon proper applications being made and strict compliance with the said law relative to applications for and the granting of said permits, that [sic] permits will be granted by the City Council of the City of Grinnell, Iowa.\textsuperscript{171}

No member having joined the mover and the seconder, the motion was defeated 2 to 4,\textsuperscript{172} and Grinnell became one of the first cities in Iowa programmatically to oppose licensure, although strictly speaking the form of the defeated resolution did not necessarily mean that the majority had committed itself to denying all individual requests.

Unfortunately, the press failed to shed any light on the arguments deployed at the meeting, but Mayor McIlrath in his regular column in the \textit{Grinnell Herald}—which at least through September published no cigarette advertisements\textsuperscript{173}—offered a sparse account of “[o]ne of the most spirited council meetings yet held under the present administration,” the cigarette permit question being “[t]he principal bone of contention....” After the aforementioned resolution had been presented by the owner of the Rex Cigar store, 25-year-old E. J. Sullivan\textsuperscript{174}—previously engaged in the bank business in Canada, Chicago, Davenport, and Los Angeles, Sullivan had just bought the store in February\textsuperscript{175}—a 90-minute discussion ensued, resulting in its defeat, which the mayor “heartily endorse[d]... believing it to be the sentiment of the majority of the voters of Grinnell.”\textsuperscript{176} A month later, the Poweshiek county board of supervisors reinforced the council’s action by refusing to grant a permit to an applicant: “If Grinnell wants cigarettes sold in the city or just outside, the Board thinks the council is abundantly able to handle the matter.”\textsuperscript{177}

\textsuperscript{171}“Cigarettes Lose Out,” \textit{GH}, June 21, 1921 (1:1) (minutes).
\textsuperscript{172}“Cigarettes Lose Out,” \textit{GH}, June 21, 1921 (1:1) (minutes).
\textsuperscript{173}However, both before and after cigarette ads became lawful on July 4, 1921, the \textit{Herald} did publish some pipe tobacco ads. E.g., \textit{GH}, July 29, 1921 (7:4-6). In contrast, the \textit{Register} early on published ads for Lucky Strike and Chesterfield. \textit{GR}, July 7, 1921 (2:7, 3:5-7).
\textsuperscript{174}1925 Population Census Schedule—Iowa, Roll No. 344, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, 2d Ward.
\textsuperscript{175}“Mayor’s Corner,” \textit{GH}, June 21, 1921 (2:4).
\textsuperscript{177}“Mayor’s Corner,” \textit{GH}, June 21, 1921 (2:4).
\textsuperscript{178}“Board Refuses Sale,” \textit{GH}, July 22, 1921 (4:4) (meeting of July 18).
Despite these setbacks, would-be cigarette sellers did not abandon their efforts to undo the council’s action. At the council meeting on August 1, 1921, which lasted four and a half hours but dealt with other matters as well, such as utilities and the city dump, the American Legion, represented by John Horn, a 26-year-old bank bookkeeper who had unsuccessfully run for city treasurer against the People’s ticket candidate, asked the council to reconsider its refusal to permit cigarette sales. In a remarkable role reversal for a churchman, one Rev. Mr Roberts—who, interestingly, had to be imported from Sheffield, 80 miles away—“spoke in behalf of the Legion and the change of sentiment that had come over the country in its attitude toward this habit.” However, as the mayor ironically reported in his column: “Further discussion soon revealed the fact that this so-called change of sentiment had not taken possession of the council as yet and the matter was not brought to a vote.”

On April 3, 1922, the day before the first anniversary of the new council’s swearing in, Emery Boren and Carl Phelps, two restaurant owners, joined Sullivan in presenting petitions requesting permits. Mayor McIlrath broke the tie-vote by voting No and thus preserved the ban.

In explaining the basis for his vote to Grinnell’s citizens three days later, Mayor McIlrath revealed an elaborated, deeply held, and historically shaped view of cigarette sales. His motivation for disclosing these beliefs was, once again, rooted in what he regarded as critics’ misstatements of his actions: “As mayor I have been frequently accused of trying to force my personal opinion upon the people of this community by those who have been opposed to the policies of the present administration.” In the not unrelated area of banning the public showing of movies on Sundays, he had experienced vindication in the form of an Iowa Supreme Court decision, issued the day after the council vote, that he took as “proving that I was clearly within my rights on one of these questions where religious intolerance was charged and [I] was simply carrying out the policies of the community as outlined in the laws and ordinances of the city that were handed to me at the beginning of this administration.”

---

179 “Mayor’s Corner,” GH, Aug. 2, 1921 (4:1).
180 “Carl Phelps Has Gone,” undated clipping, on http://www.grinnell.lib.ia.us/Obit/P/PhelpsC.pdf. At the 1925 census Phelps was returned as a cafe owner with no religion. 1925 Population Census Schedule—Iowa, Roll No. 344, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, 4th Ward.
181 “Cigarettes Lose,” GH, Apr. 4, 1922 (1:2); “Minutes of the Council Meeting,” GH, Apr. 4, 1922 (5:4) (Apr. 3).
182 “Mayor’s Corner—For You and Me,” GR, Apr. 6, 1922 (3:1-5 at 1-2). The case was G. W. Mart & Son v Grinnell, 194 Iowa 499 (1922).
concerned, whatever his “personal opinion” may have been regarding the “cigarette habit,” it was without weight in this discussion. Segueing to the history of the law, the mayor adopted what may well have been, at least for a secularist, an unprecedentedly broad, publicly articulated view of the taint with which the Iowa legislature intended to imbue cigarette sales even while empowering local governments to issue permits. McIlrath reminded his fellow citizens, who had been aware of his stance at the election, that for some period of time until July 1921, cigarette sales had been “absolutely abolished”:

A strong effort was made to appeal the law and legalize the traffic within the state but they [i.e., the legislature] refused to do so. Why? They must have had some reason other than their own personal opinion. The law making body of the state of Iowa has given the traffic in cigarettes whatever [sic] questionable flavor it may have and not the mayor of this or any other city. A license measure was enacted however which resembled the old mulct law governing the liquor traffic except that the option of granting a license was left with the town councils...instead of a county referendum. On this point as mayor I positively refused to cast the vote that would commit Grinnell to a license policy on this or any other traffic which has been considered questionable in the eyes of the state law or the local sentiment of my constituents and as I stated to the members of the council last Monday under these circumstances I would owe my resignation to this council if I would commit Grinnell to such a license law before the community had expressed themselves otherwise by a referendum vote. I do not believe that the voters of Grinnell elected me to license the cigarette traffic or any other traffic not having the moral freedom of the laws of the state. If the cigarette traffic is to be legalized within the state and given its full moral freedom, I believe the state of Iowa should so enact, but until such time I shall refuse to commit Grinnell to any license policy unless I have a different expression from the one given at the last city election. 183

Finally, McIlrath hypothetically set forth one criterion that he would use for deciding whether to vote to grant a permit and at the same time distinguished himself from those (presumably the WCTU and various church organizations) that would interfere with smoking—as opposed to buying—cigarettes:

If I were ever to cast my vote for such a license I certainly would exercise my personal privilege of refusing to vote to issue such a license to any person whose court records showed had been willful violators of the law governing such as I would have no reason to believe that the rights of the community would be safely guarded when such licenses were issued to such applicants. In this position we are dealing only with this question as a traffic and not in any way antagonizing those who may wish to indulge in the use of cigarettes as 183“Mayor’s Corner—For You and Me,” GR, Apr. 6, 1922 (3:1-5 at 3-5).

a habit. That is their own personal business and not the mayor’s.\textsuperscript{184}

The WCTU of Poweshiek county—whose local unit in Grinnell in March 1922 urged members to study conditions relating to “cigarette-using” and announced that Anti-Cigarette Sunday would take place April 23\textsuperscript{185}—reported to the state convention in October 1922 that in “cooperation with others” it had “prevented licensing the cigarette in the County.”\textsuperscript{186} What activities it had engaged in to achieve that objective it did not reveal.

In spite of the ongoing ban on the sale of cigarettes in Grinnell, unlawful selling was nevertheless not unknown. For example, at the end of October and beginning of November 1922, state officers, who traveled all over Iowa, were in Grinnell investigating; in addition to finding a minor smoking a cigarette and identifying the boy who had given away cigarette papers to him (leading to judicial imposition of a fine), they “filed an information against George West, colored, an employee of a local cigar store, for selling cigarettes to minors.” A representative appeared before Superior Court Judge James Robison on November 3 to “plead guilty for the offender,” but no sentence had been passed by the time the local press lost interest in the case.\textsuperscript{187} What is remarkable about this account is that the \textit{Grinnell Herald} omitted any mention whatsoever of the fact that this sale, regardless of whether it was to a minor or an adult, had violated the state law because neither that store nor any other store in Grinnell had been issued a permit by the city council. Yet the article said nothing about the owner’s failure to pay the mulct tax, imposition of a penalty for that failure, or any effort to seek an injunction to abate the nuisance that the owner was carrying on. Likewise, although the store owner had presumably sold the cigarettes without having paid the sales tax, neither a prosecution nor confiscation of the cigarettes in his possession was mentioned. Whether cigarette prosecutions were impeded by “the ‘silent’ sympathy of the well meaning public” is unknown, but McIlrath denounced “this class of citizen” whose failure to cooperate actively hampered liquor law prosecutions.\textsuperscript{188}

---

\textsuperscript{184}“Mayor’s Corner—For You and Me,” \textit{GR}, Apr. 6, 1922 (3:1-5 at 5).
\textsuperscript{186}Woman’s Christian Temperance Union of Iowa, \textit{Forty-Ninth Annual Convention} 40 (1922).
\textsuperscript{187}“For Selling Cigarettes,” \textit{GH}, Nov. 3, 1922 (1:4). 32-year-old Missouri-born George West had been living in Des Moines in 1920 as a teamster for an ice and fruit company. At the time of the census only eight blacks live in Grinnell. 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).
\textsuperscript{188}“Mayor Puts It Before Public,” \textit{GR}, Jan. 22, 1923 (1:1).
The paper may have ignored the city’s ban on cigarette sales, but not another dimension of the cause in which many residents continued to take an intense interest. For example, on January 3 and 4, 1923, a “fair-sized crowd” attended a program of entertainers and speakers under the auspices of the Anti-Cigarette League presented at the Friends church and Christian church. The Herald observed that “[i]n addition to speaking on the evils of the cigarette habit, its spread and reforms,” Messrs Filmore and Huddleston had been “great entertainers,” who “kept the audience in good humor throughout the program” and would, if their appearance had been better advertised, have faced a “much larger crowd.”

By February 1923 Grinnell was gearing up for the biennial city election. The tickets’ fluid and/or nonbinding character was reflected even in their name changes: this time round McIlrath’s group called themselves Progressives, while their opponents nominated candidates “under the party name of ‘Citizens’ the idea being to make the...candidates a group to be voted for on one ticket.” Initially the Citizens’ mayoral nomination was James Harpster, who had been elected to the city council in 1921 on McIlrath’s Citizenship ticket. In the wake of McIlrath’s intimation on March 1 of the possibility of being a candidate for reelection—“while I feel that I cannot really afford to give the city two more years of my time, there are some things I can afford better than others”—the Citizens ticket, which had already undergone changes in composition, now was headed by former mayor Daniel White, a founder and for many tears director of the Mutual Home Loan & Savings Association. The six Progressive candidates for city council—every one of whom McIlrath heartily endorsed as owning his own home or place of business and as a taxpayer and thus “in a position to understand the problem of the taxpayers, and carefully guard their interests”—were: James Corrough (farmer), Norman Pilgrim (retired farmer), Horace S. Lowrey (none), Fred Dee (director of Grinnell State Bank and 189 “Against Cigarettes,” GH, Jan. 5, 1923 (1:1).

190 “Name Ticket for Election March 26th,” GR, Feb. 22, 1923 (1:1).
191 “McIlrath Says He May Be Candidate,” GR, Mar. 1, 1923 (2:6).
194 “Mayor M’Ilrath Gives His Platform,” GR, Mar. 19, 1923 (1:3-5 at 5).
195 On all the candidates of both tickets, see “White to Head the ‘Citizens’” and “New Ticket Now in Field Headed by Mac,” GR, Mar. 8, 1923 (1:1); 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest); [Untitled], GH, May 23, 1924 (4:2).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Methodist Episcopal church Sunday School superintendent), 196 John Will Ent (owner of Grinnell Laundry Company),197 and David McBlain (engineer),198 Lowrey and McBlain being incumbents. The five Citizens candidates (none of whom was an incumbent or a candidate in the Third Ward) included Gilbert Hatcher (own-account automobile dealer),199 Howard Triplett (planing mill owner),200 Morris Bidwell (electric utility engineer), Albert Dickerson (garage owner),201 and John Jantzen (pop corn elevator laborer). 202

During the run-up to the election the two mayoral candidates explained in some detail their tickets’ platforms, of which cigarette sales and Sunday movies were virtually the only matters set forth with sufficient specificity to put the voters on notice as to what they might expect from either administration. To be sure, White’s statement left readers awash in platitudes such as “[t]he greatest good to the greatest number is always a safe and sane policy” and “I am committed to a city policy that will, as nearly as possible, meet with the reasonable and lawful desires of all our citizens....” Arguably no less trite was his belief in administering the city so as to increase business and engender “a spirit of cordial invitation to people to come to our city to live and transact business,” but the public might have understood his promise to “endeavor, by lawful means, to bring back and hold patronage that has been lost to us through ignoring and violating such a policy” to encompass the McIlrath council’s outlawing of the cigarette trade, which prompted addicted residents to patronize out-of-town stores. So, too, might voters have detected a reference to the refusal to grant 197 At the 1915 Iowa census Ent was a traveling salesman without a religion; at the 1925 census he was a Baptist. Iowa Census 1915, Poweshiek County, Card No. A911; 1925 Population Census Schedule—Iowa, Roll No. 344, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, 3d Ward.

201 In 1915 Dickerson was returned as a Baptist. Iowa Census 1915, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, Card No. B-153.

202 At the 1925 census, Jantzen was returned a shipping clerk and a Methodist/Baptist. 1925 Population Census Schedule—Iowa, Roll No. 344, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, 4th Ward.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s permits in White’s declaration that “I am unalterably opposed to imposing upon the many the peculiar wishes and dogmatic demands of any clique or faction.” But there was no need to speculate on opaque references to cigarettes: after all, White devoted more space to the question than any other in his platform statement:

There is a good deal of talk about permits to sell cigarettes. The Iowa law authorizes the sale of cigarettes, but gives the city council power to grant or refuse permits to sell them. I do not smoke cigarettes. If the council grants permits to sell them, dealers will be protected in their rights. If the council refuses to grant permits to sell them, violators of the law will be prosecuted. My personal attitude, if called upon to express it officially, will be governed by the will of the majority, as I may be able to determine it. I do not feel called upon to commit myself to a policy which may prove to be the policy of an inconsiderable minority. This would not be fair to the people generally.

Since White “believe[d] in indiscriminate enforcement of all laws,” his promise to apply his unconditional enforcement policy to whatever stance the council took shed as little light on his own position as did his plan to divine the townspeople’s views in case he was required to cast a tie-breaking vote. Nevertheless, since his ticket was viewed as hostile to McIlrath’s administration and as favoring licensure, voters could be presumed to interpret “inconsiderable minority” to refer to the antis.

McIlrath’s platform, presented a week later, was more forthcoming than that of White, whom he challenged to prove his assumption “that any legitimate business has been driven away from Grinnell or that we have as a town incurred the hate of any one [sic] on the outside unless it is a few disgruntled bootleggers and booze-fighters who have been obliged to leave town and are anxiously awaiting the return of the old regime that they may return to Grinnell and carry on their business unmolested.” After having thrown down the gauntlet to White, the incumbent confusingly asserted that “we coincide with him exactly and have no quarrel with him” regarding cigarettes and Sunday movies:

He says he does smoke cigarettes. Neither do we nor do we have any quarrel with those who do so long as they procure them in the manner prescribed by law. If the council votes to

---

203“Dan White States His Platform,” GR, Mar. 12, 1923 (1:3-5 at 3).
204“Dan White States His Platform,” GR, Mar. 12, 1923 (1:3-5, at 1-2). White made parallel opaque comments on Sunday movies.
205“Dan White States His Platform,” GR, Mar. 12, 1923 (1:3-5).
206Mayor M’Ilrath Gives His Platform,” GR, Mar. 19, 1923 (1:3-5). The same text was published as “McIlrath States Platform,” GH, Mar. 20, 1923 (2:1-2).
license the sale of cigarettes we bow to their decision but if obliged to cast a deciding vote we still refuse to vote to license a traffic which the state law will not give the moral right of way.\textsuperscript{207}

Since White had never stated that he would break a tie by voting against granting permits, it is unclear why McIlrath glossed over their sharp difference, but precisely what goal he was pursuing with the suppression of cigarette sales absent any objection to smoking them he did not explain. Instead, he emphasized that movies and cigarettes were “only incidents in the process of law enforcement,” while the taxpayers were “vitaly interested” in other questions as well. Concrete where White had been silent, McIlrath specified certain aspects of the city disposal plant, police, superior court, and streets as interesting taxpayers more than “imaginary things” developed by “anti-administrationists...purely for campaign purposes.”\textsuperscript{208}

In its large newspaper advertisement several days before the election, the Citizens ticket emphasized that if it were elected, “individual dictation” would yield to government by majority rule and legislation by the council. Taking yet further aim at McIlrath and his “vilifying screed” of a platform, the Citizens defended farmers who had ceased trading in Grinnell as “neither bootleggers nor booze fighters.”\textsuperscript{209}

Gauging “how moral” each party was in the upcoming “moral election” was easy for one self-appointed town humorist: “Jim McIlrath don’t smoke cigarettes and so don’t Dan, of who it may be said he is strictly moral. But Jim McIlrath don’t even chew gum so if Jim wins maybe it’s going to be a ex-Spearment after all.”\textsuperscript{210} Less amused by McIlrath’s moral leadership was the dean of the city’s (and county’s) bar, John H. Patton, a one-time city solicitor and mayor,\textsuperscript{211} whose animus against McIlrath was presumably in part shaped by his unsuccessful representation of the plaintiff in the aforementioned case testing the city ordinance against Sunday movies.\textsuperscript{212} Four days before the election Patton warned voters that if McIlrath were reelected, “with three pliable echoes [on the city council], as he has had the past two years, his personal notions and ambition are likely to be very expensive.” Mocking McIlrath’s declaration that movies and cigarettes were “only incidents” as capable of fooling no one, Patton charged that the mayor had “said the same thing in the press two years ago. After he was elected he insisted that he was elected on the Sunday movie issue” and then spent $3,000 of “taxpayers’ money” on the litigation. Patton concluded that McIlrath “seems to be more concerned about making people live according to his pattern,” which was none of the mayor’s business.213

\textsuperscript{207}“Mayor M’Ilrath Gives His Platform,” \textit{GR}, Mar. 19, 1923 (1:3-4).

\textsuperscript{208}“Mayor M’Ilrath Gives His Platform,” \textit{GR}, Mar. 19, 1923 (1:3-5).

\textsuperscript{212}G. W. Mart & Son v Grinnell, 194 Iowa 499 (1922).

At the election on March 26, which generated more interest than any in years and the largest turn-out in Grinnell’s history,214 McIlrath secured 58 percent of the votes. His Progressive ticket won four of the six council seats, including the two at-large races, by virtually the same margin as the mayor’s. Lowrey, the only successful incumbent, won 72 percent of the vote in the First Ward, but Ent gained only 47 percent of the vote against two independent candidates in the Third Ward, where the Citizens fielded none, although it was the only ward in which White outpolled McIlrath. Dickerson won in the Second Ward by a bare majority of 50.7 percent, while Jantzen with 55 percent turned out the incumbent McBlain.215

Patton may have been depressed that the “cohorts of darkness and retrogression prevailed,” but he took hope from the “protest” vote for the Citizens ticket, which he regarded as “almost a majority....” Insisting that—without explaining why—only the vote for individual ward councilmen (as opposed to at-large councilmen or mayor) could be “considered in determining the wishes of the voters as to administrative policy,” he concluded that if, as many believed, voters treated cigarette permits and Sunday movies as an issue, it was “very clear” that a majority of Second, Third, and Fourth ward voters had voted for permits and movies. Rather than analyzing the underlying substantive issues, Patton merely left readers with the trivial arithmetical question as to whether the fewer than three-fourths majority of the First ward should determine the city administration’s policy. In any event, without on-site cigarette sales (and Sunday movies), Grinnell would not be “restored to its former favorable estimate by the traveling public and the people in the surrounding country....”216

Following its first meeting two weeks earlier,217 all six members of the new city council met in special session on April 16 to deal with the payment of interest on water bonds and other matters. Not a single No was cast on any motion except that moved and seconded by the two Citizens representatives Dickerson and Jantzen to grant Sullivan’s newest application for a cigarette permit at the Rex Cigar Store. Because councilman Ent broke ranks with his No-voting Progressive colleagues to vote Aye, the council was tied 3 to 3, causing Mayor McIlrath, unsurprisingly, to cast the deciding vote against violating his own principles, his sense of the town majority’s stance, and granting the city’s first permit ever.\textsuperscript{218} Ent’s apostasy may not have been unforeseen: Patton’s post-mortem election analysis observed that it had been “well known to the promoters of the Citizens ticket that either [sic] of the three candidates in the Third ward would be satisfactory, hence no candidate for councilman from the Third ward was placed upon the Citizens ballot.”\textsuperscript{219} To be sure, the fact that the Citizens ticket in its advertising urged Third Ward voters to place an X in the square opposite the name of “a Third Ward candidate for councilman...no matter where you find it,”\textsuperscript{220} still left unexplained why the Progressives included Ent on their ticket.

In its piece the next day on the council’s action, the \textit{Herald} provided some background on how cigarettes had taken “the ropes in the first round.” In addition to the tactical criticism voiced by some proponents of licensing of Sullivan’s “starting something” at an inopportune time\textsuperscript{221} (meaning, presumably, while McIlrath was still in a position to break deadlocks) and speculation that certain tobacco dealers in Grinnell would probably be unable to obtain permits even if the council decided to grant them to others, the newspaper focused on several fundamental dimensions of the conflict:

Councilman Dickerson says that he has tried to inform himself as to the desires of the people, and so canvassed the business houses finding an overwhelming majority in favor of licensing the sale. This, he thinks, indicates the feeling of the public.

Those of course favoring the license say it will outlaw bootlegging of cigarettes, and make it much harder for minors to get them, and also that it is costing the people of Grinnell too much in gasoline to drive to adjoining towns to buy their coffin nails.

Those opposing the license stand on the proposition that the young public needs an education on the injurious effects of cigarettes and that outlawing cigarettes is the best \textsuperscript{218}Minutes of Council Meeting,” \textit{GH}, Apr. 17, 1923 (5:1-2) (Apr. 16); “Proceedings of the City Council,” \textit{GR}, Apr. 19, 1923 (3:3-4). At this time the \textit{Register} was publishing cigarette ads regularly. E.g., \textit{GR}, Apr. 16, 1923 (2:5) and Apr. 23, 1923 (2:7) (Lucky Strike).

\textsuperscript{220}GR, Mar. 22, 1923 (4:1-7).

\textsuperscript{221}“Our Cigarette Corner,” \textit{GH}, Apr. 17, 1923 (1:3). example to the young.\textsuperscript{222}

That Dickerson, himself a businessman, surveyed only other business owners, was hardly surprising, but the report that the anti-smoking movement was sophisticated enough to understand the ban as an educational measure designed to delegitimate cigarettes among young people confirms the view of Grinnell as the leading example of a non-religiously motivated refusal to grant permits; the leakage represented by the (inconvenient and expensive) out-of-town cigarette-buying trips may even have reinforced rather than under undermined the denormalization efforts.

Enforcement of the state law also contributed to cigarettes’ image as contraband. In addition, “the best argument yet made against that license,” as the editor of the \textit{Herald} noted, was that “so many of the dealers who wish to have them licensed have been guilty of selling them illegally.” If Grinnell ever licensed them, he urged the council to grant the privilege only to law-abiding tobacco dealers “and not those who have been caught red-handed in the act of violating the law.” (The editorialist went on, with impeccable logic, to ask rhetorically why, when a cigarette manufacturer or wholesaler “sends a salesman into a town where there is no license to secure customers,” it should not be treated as a “bootlegger within the meaning of the law as much as the lesser man who hocks them in the alley?”)\textsuperscript{223}

The pro-licensing group’s strategy of biding its time until McIlrath, the driving force behind city government’s steadfast refusal to permit cigarette sales, left the mayor’s office, finally came to fruition on January 21, 1924, when he confirmed rumors that he would resign no later than April 7. Although he would give up his position in any event in order to take up work that would no longer permit him the time required by the mayoralty, he also admitted that he might become a candidate for state legislative representative in the Republican primary in June.\textsuperscript{224} The \textit{Grinnell Register} editorially took up the cudgels for McIlrath as representative, praising his knowledge of agriculture and the contribution he could make in the legislature to the “relief of the farm interests.”\textsuperscript{225} The breathtaking praise that the prominent Republican editor and owner, Charles Needham, bestowed on Vladimir Ilyich Lenin—“If we try to judge him by the effete standards of a smoothly working society, his greatness becomes doubtful.
But Lenin worked under conditions which few Americans can ever understand. ... Russia has advanced amazingly under his influence.... He was a Communist, but Communism is better than imperialism”226—who died the same day that McIlrath announced his resignation, manifestly did not taint McIlrath, who was elected in November 1924 and became a Republican House member for one term.227

Once McIlrath had officially tendered his resignation to the city council on February 4,228 a long battle erupted over electing his successor. At its meeting on April 7—the day McIlrath’s resignation went into effect—a “sudden and unexpected upheaval in the smooth running machinery of the city administration...re-opened several old arguments that were supposed to have been dead for lo these many months.”229 With Lowrey, the council president, presiding instead of McIlrath, the council undertook several unsuccessful efforts to elect a new mayor. The two Citizens members, Dickerson and Jantzen, moved and seconded the election of the Progressive Corrough to McIlrath’s unexpired term,230 but the council deadlocked at 3 to 3 (the nominee presumably voting for himself and all his ticket mates against him). Dickerson raised the point of order that since, according to an 1888 rule “‘the presiding officershall have the casting vote on all questions upon which the council is equally divided but otherwise not,’” Lowrey was not entitled to vote on an otherwise non-tie vote, but Lowrey, arguing that the rule was not law and that the consequence of Dickerson’s interpretation would be the First Ward’s disenfranchisement, declared the motion lost and Corrough was not elected.231 Then Corrough moved and his ticket-mate Pilgrim seconded that Ross V. Coutts, a bookkeeper for a building materials firm, be elected mayor, but this motion also lost. Making a more concerted effort at 9:30 that evening, the council met in special session to elect a mayor. Dickerson moved and Pilgrim seconded that the council vote by ballot to fill the mayoral vacancy. However, another impasse arose when Corrough again received three votes and Frank Knight, an auto salesman who... was an employer at a garage, received the same number.232

The stalemate, as the out-of-town press observed, was rooted in the council’s even split on the McIlrath administration’s ban on cigarette sales (and Sunday movies): “Now the opposition swear they will control the election [of the next mayor] and repeal the ordinance [sic].”233 In the event, even before a new mayor was elected, the opposition, more by crook than by hook, achieved its objective. “In the absence of two of the up-holders of the blue laws,”234 Progressive-ticket anti-cigarette members, Lowrey and Pilgrim, at the special council meeting on May 19, 1924, Dickerson was elected chairman. After the council had voted to buy two flags and requisition two copies of the Iowa Code, Jantzen, seconded by Ent, moved that Sullivan be granted a permit for the Rex Cigar store.235 With Dickerson joining the pro-permit faction, only Corrough voted No.236 Thus, after a three-year struggle, the free commerce forces won by an anti-climactic 3 to 1 vote, and for the first time in 28 years one store could lawfully sell cigarettes, at least to adults.

Whether the WCTU had been caught off guard is not clear, but the next day at the Grinnell local branch’s monthly meeting—which was held at the home of member Mrs. John Mincer, whose non-drinking, -smoking, or -chewing husband, astonishingly, owned a pool hall, which “he endeavored to maintain...along strictly business lines”237—after the president had opened the session for the 42 attendees with a song, “The World Is Going Dry,” and scripture had been read, “Miss Buck, Lincoln and Richards were appointed to give attention to the city councils [sic] action toward the selling of cigarettes.238 If they in fact hastened to perform their mission, it went unreported and failed: three days after its precedent-setting vote, the council, meeting again in special session, this time called by three councilmen for the purpose of approving cigarette bonds, granted, by the same voting configuration, a permit to restaurateur Phelps.239
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

The only implicit analysis of this turn of events that the Register offered was a nod to an editorial in a Des Moines paper that prompted the conclusion that cigarettes had become “the great national smoke” and “the ideal smoke” because, unlike cigars, they were short and cheap.240 Even less analytically, the Grinnell College student newspaper was elated that Mr. Sullivan had traveled to Des Moines several times to buy “the necessary supplies” and downright proud that he was going to announce their arrival in a “Scarlet and Black advertisement.”241 And that pride swelled the collegiate editorial breast much sooner than the ten-day wait Sullivan had predicted: on May 24, one day after the Rex Cigar Store had run a large ad in the Herald—adjoining a piece on, of all things, the aforementioned WCTU meeting—announcing its “complete line of Turkish and Domestic Blends” and adding at the bottom, “Positively No Cigarettes to Minors,”242 the Grinnell Scarlet and Black published one more than twice as large, shouting that “The CAMELS Are Here. Arrived at THE REX CIGAR STORE This Morning.” After listing 10 brands he carried, Sullivan dropped the “Positively,” simply stating in the smallest unbolded font: “No Cigarettes Sold to Minors.”243 Since a solid majority of Grinnell students were presumably under the legal age of 21 for buying or being sold or given cigarettes, the advertisement itself represented precisely the kind of bad-faith temptation of minors that all

---

238[Minutes of May 20, 1924], Record of Woman’s Christian Temperance Union, Grinnell, Iowa, Book V [1913-1928] at 157, in WCTU of Iowa, Unprocessed, Local Branches, Grinnell, Iowa Women’s Archive. University of Iowa. For a much abbreviated account of the meeting that failed to describe the “regular business,” see “Entertains W.C.T.U.,” GH, May 23, 1924 (4:4-5). Buck was presumably 65-year-old Harriet Buck, a school teacher, who for many years was treasurer of the local WCTU. “Miss Harriet C. Buck Is Dead,” [unsourced newspaper clipping], Aug. 20, 1926, on http://www.grinnell.lib.ia.us/Obit/B/BuckHarrietC.pdf

239“Council Votes Cigaret Permits to Both,” GR, May 22, 1924 (1:2); Proceedings of the City Council, GR, May 22, 1924 (2:3-4); “Grant C. C. Phelps Cigarette Permit,” GH, May 23, 1924 (1:2); “Minutes of City Council,” GH, May 23, 1924 (3:4) (May 22).

241“Council Grants Cigarette Permit,” Grinnell Scarlet and Black, May 21, 1924 (1:2).

242GH, May 23, 1924 (4:5-6).

243Grinnell Scarlet and Black, May 24, 1924 (2:4-6).
elements of the anti-cigarette movement had all along feared and suspected would accompany legalization and licensure. This reckless commercialism was of a piece with the fact that Sullivan had already been convicted twice of violating the cigarette law and cast the three-member council majority into further disrepute.

Grinnell’s antis had, to be sure, lost the battle against the suppression of cigarette sales, but they could not resist launching an afterclap to underscore the underhanded manner in which the commerce über alles forces had secured their triumph. The day after the rump council had granted the second permit, councilman at large Pilgrim announced on May 22 that he was resigning in protest. On returning on May 20 from an out-of-state trip that could not be put off, Pilgrim was informed that a special meeting had been called (on May 19) during his absence at which a permit was granted. He explained why he regarded the scheduling as devious:

As this was one of the clean-cut issues during the last campaign and while both sides had their ardent devotees, the result of the election gave forth no uncertain sound as to where the large majority stood on the question. So I have felt in honor bound to carry out the desires of my constituency on this question and hence it struck me as a little cowardly or at least an unmanly act on the part of some members of the council to take advantage of the absence of some of the members of the council who have consistently stood for the platform upon which they were elected.

He had nevertheless been willing to let the whole incident pass without protest, “but the straw that broke the camel’s back” had been the appearance of two police officers on the morning of May 22 calling him out of bed and demanding his presence at the city office. Having assured the city clerk that he would attend the meeting as soon as he received notice of it and never having been in police custody before, Pilgrim took such umbrage at this “drastic” step that he apparently resigned rather than attend the meeting at which the second permit was granted.

Surprisingly, the circumstances surrounding his encounter with the police were even more bizarre than Pilgrim himself had let on. As a backgrounder in the Herald disclosed, the police had rung his bell around five o’clock in the morning

---

244 See below this ch.
245 Pilgrim was returned as a Baptist in 1915 and a Methodist in 1925. Iowa Census 1915, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, Card No. A19; 1925 Population Census Schedule—Iowa, Roll No. 344, Poweshiek County, Grinnell, 4th Ward.
to present him with a summons to appear at the council meeting at eight. Members of the council admitted to the Herald that Pilgrim had been “the victim of a misunderstanding” and that one policeman appearing somewhat later would have sufficed.\(^\text{248}\) Although it is unclear why the council members who had pushed through the permit on May 19 would have wanted to insure Pilgrim’s presence on May 22 when the second one would be debated, ironically, had Pilgrim attended the meeting, he might have been able to mobilize greater resistance. However, without Lowrey—whose absence went unexplained and whose presence the other council members apparently did not seek to compel—he would presumably nevertheless have been unable to forge the tie to deny Phelps a permit.

Former Mayor McIlrath could barely contain his wrath. In a letter to the Register four days after Pilgrim’s resignation, he handed down a damning judgment on the political processes, remarking:

That the game played in putting over this piece of legislation would not stand the ruling of a referee.

That for the first time in the history of the city, Grinnell is committed to a license law...permitting a traffic which the state law will not give the moral right of way.

That if getting the money is the chief argument there are many other things which would be equally...productive of revenue. Why not [l]icense them all and “get the money.”

That accepting a place on a ticket representing a certain platform has no bearing with certain councilmen as to how they will vote on these questions when elected.

That the cigarette license may have come to stay but the tactics of its promoters will not be forgotten in the next spring election so why not forget it for the time being.

... That the cigarette license seems to have been so important to the business interests of Grinnell in the minds of these three Councilmen, that it was necessary to deprive the entire First ward of their representation by taking advantage of the temporary absence of their Councilman [Lowrey].

That there might have been some ground for sincerity in the purpose of these councilmen were it not for the fact that the first permit granted was to an applicant who had been twice convicted for violation of the Cigarette laws.\(^\text{249}\)

Unfortunately, McIlrath failed to flesh out the details of the connections between and among the city’s “business interests,” cigarettes, and Councilmen Dickerson, Jantzen, and (the Progressive renegade) Ent. Had he analyzed these links, \(^{248}\) [Untitled], GH, May 23, 1924 (4:2).

---

perhaps he would have explained his belief in the inevitability of the future permanence of cigarette sales in Grinnell and explored whether and/or why his three-year successful resistance had been merely conjunctural, serendipitous, and ultimately subject to certain defeat, and what the anti-cigarette movement might have done to build a more solid base to overcome the businessmen’s profit über alles drive for licensure.

As a counterpoint to Pilgrim’s and McIlrath’s complaints and criticisms, the Herald also published a defense of the council by someone who professed not to be a member, but lacked the courage to self-identify. Taking exception to the impression created by opponents that a few members “had craftily waited until other members were out of town,” the anonymous letter writer insisted that the meeting, which “was perfectly legal in every respect,” had been called by (Progressive and No-voting) Corrough as well as by Ent and Dickerson. However, the gravamen of the riposte was the Schadenfreude at the sight of tables’ allegedly being turned:

If it is true that three of the councilmen were elected to oppose cigaret legislation, it is equally true that three others were elected to favor it. The same logic that applies to one applies to the other as well. On previous occasions attempts to grant cigaret permits were blocked by three members of the council and there was no outcry from the other three. Now, when the worm turns and the three under dogs are in the saddle temporarily, there is great indignation from some quarters, by people who forget that for more than a year a city with half its council favoring cigarets has been forced to bow to the will of the other half.

It still makes a difference whose ox is gored.250

What the author conveniently failed to deal with was that Grinnell had elected Progressives to four of the six council seats, thus affording them, especially with McIlrath as the tie-breaker, an insuperable majority. Regardless of whether the rump council had arranged the May 19 meeting as a surprise attack or not, given the overriding significance of the matter and intensity of convictions, making the outcome hinge on the fortuity of one-third of the membership’s absence was manifestly not an act of quintessentially democratic self-governance.

Undaunted by this brief postlude, the council, having earlier elected the editor of the Herald mayor and the owner of an implements business to replace Pilgrim,251 doubled the number of outstanding permits on June 16, 1924, by 251 “Ray Is Mayor,” GH, June 6, 1924 (1:5); “Minutes of City Council,” GH, June 6, 1924 (3:3-4) (June 3, W. G. Ray and Harry Sanders).

---

City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s granting four more to a hotel, smoke house, news depot, and billiard parlor.\textsuperscript{252} Two years later, when five of the six permittees applied for new permits, the council accommodated all of them with two-year permits.\textsuperscript{253}

Indianola

Located only 17 miles from Des Moines in an agricultural area in south-central Iowa, Indianola, the 59th largest city with a population of 3,488 in 1930, refused to issue any cigarette sales permits for the longest period among all 110 first- and second-class cities in Iowa: not until 1933, after 12 years, did the city council grant the first permits. Although the density of WCTU membership (1 in 75) in Warren county, of which Indianola was the seat, was one of the highest in the state, even more important for the longevity of prohibitionist practices in Indianola was the influence of the Methodist church and its educational institution, Simpson College, on whose campus smoking was prohibited.\textsuperscript{254}

The sentiment against cigarettes was so widespread and deeply ingrained in Indianola at the time the new cigarette law went into effect in mid-1921, that: “Not a single application for licenses to sell cigarettes was made here by business men. The feeling of the council on the subject was too well known for anyone to give them a chance to express it.”\textsuperscript{255} The WCTU in Indianola and Warren county actively combatted cigarettes there, reporting to the 1923 state convention that it had “protested against renewal of cigarette license.”\textsuperscript{256}

That the town’s attitude toward cigarettes was still forcefully negative in 1927, when Indianola had already become the only first- or second-class city to continue the ban on cigarette sales, was visibly on display in connection with an expose by the Simpson College student newspaper of a plan by the American Tobacco Company to mail a sample package of cigarettes to every male student at the college and to sample the town as well in an effort to “stampede Indianola with the sale of cigarets....” As part of this plan a farmer named John Piffer had \textsuperscript{252}“Proceedings of the City Council,” GR, June 19, 1924 (5:4) (June 16); “Others Licensed to Sell Cigaretts,” GH, June 17, 1924 (1:3); “Cigaret Licenses Granted to Four,” GR, June 19, 1924 (4:2).

\textsuperscript{253}“Proceedings of the City Council,” GR, June 7, 1926 (3:2-3) (June 3).

\textsuperscript{255}ICP-C, July 9, 1921 (3:4) (untitled).

\textsuperscript{256}Woman’s Christian Temperance Union of Iowa, Fiftieth Annual Convention 46 (1923).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s applied to the Warren County Board of Supervisors for a cigarette permit to set up a stand beyond the city limits on the north and south sides of town, which would net $300 a month. \(^\text{257}\) Although Piffer claimed that he would “advise anybody against” cigarettes, since he believed that they were being bootlegged anyway in Indianola, “he thought he might as well have the profits to use in paying for his farm....” \(^\text{261}\) However, after the board at its meetings in September and October had postponed action on his application, \(^\text{258}\) at its meeting on November 14 the board had refused the application, \(^\text{259}\) interestingly, on the grounds that issuance would both be contrary to the college’s interests and circumvent the city council’s regulations. However, ATC apparently had its own method for creating demand for cigarettes among students and townspeople (based on a modern understanding of early onset nicotine addiction): it was focusing on students “on the theory...that if the young man starts the habit early, he will be a regular customer of the tobacco industry for life.” To this end the company intended to send the male students several brands so that the light smoker might choose the one that suited him best, thus “making him a constant smoker.” If its readers had not intuited the point, the student newspaper added that “[c]ommercial reasons are back of the plans of the syndicate.” \(^\text{260}\)

The editor, Wendell Tutt, hastened to add that “it is not that we are opposed to cigarettes. They have their place....” Although the tobacco syndicate’s plan to “circumvent” the city council’s ban on cigarette selling was “not unlawful,” it was “underhanded and crooked.” The only illegality the editor could discern was sampling the entire male student body because more than half of it consisted of minors. \(^\text{261}\) Pushed by a letter to the editor arguing that since minors in Indianola who wanted cigarettes could and did buy them in Des Moines, thus profiting dealers there, “the dealers of Indianola should be allowed to use the profits of cigarette sales which are inevitable,” \(^\text{262}\) the editor returned to “The Fag Question” the next week. Sharpening the critique of the original article, whose purpose he now admitted was “to cripple, if possible,” the cigarette manufacturer’s campaign, the editor observed that the company’s plan was to sample the college’s men, 75 percent of whom were under 21, “in order that they might develop the ‘habit’ and become regular customers in later life.” Turning bolder this time round, he now substituted “‘illegal’” for “‘underhanded.’” As for the suggestion that the Indianola dealers might as well receive the profits, he agreed that such a redistribution would be “a fine thing,” but asked whether “profits and material gain” were “the only goal in life....”263

\(^\text{258}\)“Tobacco Firm Plans Sales Campaign Here,” IT, Dec. 6, 1927 (1:1).

\(^\text{260}\)“Plan Cigaret Campaign Here,” Simpsonian, Dec. 5, 1927 (1:4-5).

The cooperation between Warren county and Indianola was not a one-time phenomenon. (Similar coordination took place between the Poweshiek County board of supervisors and Grinnell.)264 Although the county board of supervisors did issue some cigarette permits in the 1920s,265 it steadfastly refused to grant permits to sell in locations it deemed too close to Indianola. Evansville, six miles away, was the closest place it had permitted sales; in 1928, it denied a permit to the owner of a filling station under a mile from Indianola.266 Unlike Piffer, who had twice unsuccessfully sought a permit at the same station, as had two other operators,267 J. E. Hackley, an applicant in 1932, did not simply abandon his quest for cigarette profits. On March 26 he applied for a permit to sell from a business combining a gasoline and oil filling station with a restaurant selling soft drinks, candy, and lunch—he had taken over the aforementioned gas station on March 1—located less than one mile north of Indianola, arguing that the board had no

---

264In 1922 the supervisors refused to permit cigarette sales at a dance pavilion just outside of the city limits because they “did not care to issue license [sic] so close to Grinnell when the city authorities refused to issue license [sic] inside the corporate limits.” “Local News,” Pella Chronicle, May 4, 1922 (4:1).
265According to the Warren County Auditor, the board granted the first permit in 1923. Supervisors’ Minute Book, No. 11, Warren County, Iowa, at 14-15 (Dec. 3, 1923) (to John C. Duncan) (copy furnished by Warren County Auditor); email from Mary Lynn Keene to Marc Linder (Feb. 4, 2008). See also Supervisors’ Minute Book, No. 11, Warren County, Iowa, at 126 (July 6, 1925) (to W. B. Evans); “County Board Proceedings,” Indianola Herald, Sept. 1, 1927 (7:6) (at July 5 meeting permit of sellers who gave up business cancelled and auditor directed to issue permit to seller in Beech); “Board Proceedings,” Indianola Herald, July 9, 1931 (7:1) (application for permit renewal granted at June 1 meeting).
266“Refuse Hackley Permission to Sell Cigarettes,” Indianola Herald, Apr. 7, 1932 (1:8).
267“Hackley Denied Permit to Sell Cigaretts Here,” Indianola Record, Apr. 7, 1932 (1:1).
right to deny such an application. The board, which had consistently denied all permits within a five-mile radius of Indianola in deference to the city’s ban on cigarette sales within its limits, took the position that it did have the right to deny permits to everyone within that area, treating all alike. WCTU representatives, the Simpson College president, and the Indianola mayor attended the supervisors’ meeting on April 4, asking that the application be denied or postponed until the case’s legal aspects could be further studied. The board appeared to be proceeding in that direction anyway, since it was awaiting a report from Joseph Watson, Jr., the county attorney, who had already informed it that, since “legal precedent in such cases is conflicting,” he wanted more time to study the facts in the local case before submitting his report. The next day Watson delivered his report, which very cautiously stated that, based on the consistent precedent of denying all permits to persons operating at locations within a five- or six-mile radius of Indianola, the board was justified in denying one to Hackley. He added his (unexplicated) belief that the Iowa Supreme Court decision in Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, which had been decided just two months earlier and had been called to his attention, was “‘not controlling in this matter.’” Unfazed, Hackley immediately insisted that “I don’t know just how soon but we are going to have cigarettes here.” His optimism derived from his having retained Des Moines lawyer Howard L. Bump, who planned straightaway to file an action seeking a writ of mandamus forcing the board to issue the permit.

At its meeting on April 5 the board of supervisors offered a surprisingly detailed and concrete explanation of the reasons for its action, which proceeded from its (and its predecessors’) consistent denial of permits within a five-mile radius of Indianola, which it justified on the grounds that:

This board feels that since the City of Indianola has seen fit to deny applications for cigarette [sic] permits...and since the reason for said denial has been the presence...of Simpson College and the various public schools, this board should aid in the curbing of smoking and sale of cigarettes in said City, and feels that by denying the issuance of cigarette permits where the place of business is within a radius of five miles...it will be cooperating with the City of Indianola in preventing the smoking of cigarettes by the students in the various schools....
Considerably less transparent was the constitutional basis for the board’s open declaration of assistance to a church school’s implementation of what was in part a religious tenet: “This board further feels that since Simpson College is a sectarian school and is attempting to prevent its students from smoking cigarettes, by denying permits within the above radius it will be aiding the college in its program.”272

Hackley’s response to the board’s contention that it could not have discriminated against him because it had already denied applications for permits at the same filling station four or five times was that once the supervisors granted a permit in any part of the county outside of the incorporated towns, denying his application constituted unfair discrimination—even though the eight county permits then outstanding were all for locations more than five miles distant from Indianola.273

On April 7, two days after being rebuffed by the council, Hackley filed his petition for a writ of mandamus in Warren County District Court, claiming that the board had “arbitrarily, and without legal excuse or reason,” refused to grant him a permit, thus unjustly, unfairly, and illegally discriminating against him.274
That very same day, District Judge Norman Hays, a Harvard Law School graduate who later became an Iowa Supreme Court justice (1946 to 1965),275 assigned April 27 as the trial date.276 A week after Hackley had filed, the board answered, denying that it had discriminated against him since it had “repeatedly refused” permits to others to sell cigarettes within a five-mile radius of Indianola because of its “desire to cooperate with...Indianola...in preventing the smoking of cigarettes” there. Consequently, granting Hackley a permit would constitute discrimination—in his favor. The supervisors also stressed their desire to cooperate with the officials of Simpson College and Indianola’s public schools who had requested the city council to refuse to grant permits, pointing out that permitting cigarette sales within five miles of the city would “nullify” Indianola’s

272Supervisors’ Minute Book, No. 12, Warren County, Iowa, at 71 (Apr. 5, 1932)
(copy supplied by Warren County Auditor). The minutes were published in “Board Proceedings,” Indianola Herald, May 12, 1932 (7:4-6 at 6) (Apr. 5).

273“Hackley Cigaret Hearing Called for Wednesday,” IT, Apr. 26, 1932 (1:7).

275http://www.judicial.state.ia.us/wdata/frame1773-1463/pressre172.asp 276Hackley v. Powers, Order (No. 8635, Warren County Dist. Ct., Apr. 7, 1932) (copy archived at Warren County Historical Society, Indianola).

City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

ban. Finally, and in the present context most importantly, the Warren County Board of Supervisors argued that the act of granting or denying a cigarette permit to Hackley was “a matter within this board’s discretion,” which was not subject to compulsion pursuant to a mandamus action.277

At trial, in an effort to undermine the logic of the board’s argument, his lawyer, Bump, elicited testimony from the defendant board members that some of the county’s eight permit holders were located closer to consolidated schools than Hackley’s business was to Indianola schools. In refutation, county attorney Watson elicited from his clients the differentiating datum that no one had protested against the issuance of any of those permits. In his summation he explained that the board’s denial of a permit to Hackley had been actuated by the fear that granting his would then force it to grant one to the operator of an oil station just outside of Indianola’s southern limit (if he should ever apply), with the ultimate consequence that the board “would virtually nullify” Indianola’s ordinance.278 As expeditiously as Hays heard argument on the case, it took him an entire year—during which the board of supervisors continued to renew cigarette permits279—to issue a very brief decree on April 22, 1933, denying Hackley’s request for a writ of mandamus on the opaque grounds that the board of supervisors had acted “by a vote duly recorded by the secretary” and that their “denial was for good cause...and was within their sound discretion.” Hays also ordered that the supervisors recover $14.10 in costs from Hackley.280 By the time the judge issued his decision interest in the outcome had diminished considerably, not least of all on the part of Hackley, who in November 1932 had left the filling station to farm in another county.281

277 Hackley v. Powers, Answer at 2-3 (No. 8653, Warren County Dist. Ct., Apr. 13, 1932) (copy archived at Warren County Historical Society, Indianola). The defendants alleged that Hackley’s place of business was located two miles north of Indianola.

278 “Hays Ponders on Cigarette Mandamus Case,” Indianola Herald, Apr. 28, 1932 (1:8). See also “Hays Considers Petition Asking Cigarette Permit,” IR, Apr. 28, 1932 (1:8, 3:7-8) (copy supplied by Indianola Public Library).

279 E.g., “Board Proceedings,” Indianola Herald, July 14, 1932 (8:2) (June 6).

281 “Hackley’s ‘Fag’ Permit Decided; But He’s Gone,” Indianola Herald, Apr. 20, 1933 (1:5-6). This article had appeared before the written decision was issued because Hays had “recently...made an oral ruling to” the county attorney. Id.
The regular city council meeting on May 15, 1933 (the same day on which the Iowa Supreme Court announced its decision upholding the power of the Iowa City city council to limit the number of cigarette permits) was a harbinger of the anti-prohibitionist finale. On March 22, 1933—between the time in February when Congress voted to submit the repeal of the Prohibition Amendment to the states and its ratification by the requisite number of states in December—Congress passed a bill amending the National Prohibition Act so as to exempt 3.2 percent beer from its scope. On April 15 the governor approved the bill passed by the Iowa legislature to give cities the power to issue retail permits to sell such beer. Interestingly, the legislature required cities to determine—as they were not with regard to cigarette permit applicants—that applicants were of “good character.” On the other hand, if applicants met this requirement and several objective requirements, the beer permit statute, unlike the cigarette permit statute, provided that permits “shall be issued,” leaving cities with no discretion as to whether any permits would be issued at all or as between individual applicants.

On April 17, with “the whole town on the qui vive over the return visit of Old John Barleycorn,” the Indianola city council “was all set...to issue the required licenses to sell..., but 'nary' an application was filed.” This failure to file “opened up the beer question for discussion,” prompting members who had heard that some local dealers were planning to apply to “admit[ ] that there was no other way out in case the applicants to sell squared with the new beer bill.” On the other hand, other local merchants—pointing to a risk that did not appear to factor into the profit-and-loss calculation of would-be cigarette permittees—had informed the council that “75 per cent of their trade is made up of minors and even if their transient customers demanded beer they could not afford to sell it on account of the continual trouble that would arise over the legal age limit.” Council members nevertheless expected that local people would apply for permits a little later.

In Indianola, pursuant to an announcement at a special session on May 11 that the council would vote on the issuance of beer permits, 14 organizations in Indianola presented signed petitions requesting the council not to issue beer permits. The groups included the WCTU of Indianola and of Warren county, the Baptist and United Presbyterian Sunday schools, the Friends church, the ladies...
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Aid and Woman’s Home Missionary societies of the Methodist Episcopal church, a parent-teachers association, two bible classes, the Ministers’ Wives association of Indianola, and the Simpson College faculty. During the almost hour-long discussion on May 15, four opponents addressed the council, including Dr. Ruth Van Clark, a physician who was the president of the Warren county WCTU, John L. Hillman, the president of Simpson College, Rev. W. C. Smith, and Florence Conrey, the 73-year-old wife of a clergyman. President Hillman’s wife, former Warren county WCTU president and physician Rose Butterfield, and three other women also appeared before the council.287 One claim that drys such as Van Clark and Hillman pressed on the council members was that they would be violating their oath of office by voting to implement the unconstitutional beer law.288 Smith even went so far as to warn the councilmen that by granting beer permits they would “‘violate God’s law. It would be against your own conscience. ... You are facing a question of righteousness or sin. You will violate the vows to your church if you vote for the license. Don’t listen to the Iowa law when the constitution of the United States says the sale of beer is illegal.’” But such admonitions merely provoked the members to reply that, on the contrary, refusing to obey the state law and to grant the permits might, as the city attorney had advised, make them personally liable in ensuing litigation.289 Hillman, who assured the council that he spoke for the students’ parents as well in pleading with it to refuse the permits, astonishingly descended from the religio-moral plane to engage in commercial competition by intimating that Simpson College brought more cash to Indianola than beer ever would when he declared that: “‘We are standing for an institution that brings more money to the town than any other institution in the town. The welfare of the college depends to a very great degree upon the moral condition of the town. We will be able to make less of an appeal to our constituents for students if beer is allowed to be sold here.’”290

Some of the prohibitionists fancied themselves legal experts as well. When Hillman opined that “‘I doubt if a court could compel you to grant these permits,’” city attorney Berkeley Wilson presented a sharply differing legal opinion, explaining that “the only question involved is the ministerial power to issue permits. The only judicial or discretionary matter is a consideration of the 287 “City Council Votes 3.2 Beer for Indianola,” Indianola Herald, May 18, 1933 (1:8).

288 “Council Grants Permits; Beer Goes on Sale,” IT, May 16, 1933 (1:7). The drys argued that it was unconstitutional for Congress to define 3.2 beer as not comprehended within the scope of the proscribed “intoxicating liquors” because some courts had ruled that even 1 percent beer was intoxicating. Id. at 8:1.
289 “Council Grants Permits; Beer Goes on Sale,” IT, May 16, 1933 (1:7, 8:1-3 at 1-2).
290 “Council Grants Permits; Beer Goes on Sale,” IT, May 16, 1933 (1:7, 8:1-3 at 1).
applicants’ character.”

Growing impatient with the drys’ opposition, councilman and building contractor William Fears argued that the only result of refusing the permits would be the appearance of bootleggers on every corner. Pleading for identical treatment of the two commodities, he offered a basis for changing the council’s course: “The beer situation would be similar to the cigarette situation here.... Everyone knows that any boy can go five miles and buy cigarettes. We might as well bring beer and cigarettes too out in the open.”

Despite the concerted urging by the venerable town leadership of the temperance/prohibitionist movement, the councilmen voted 5 to 1 to issue 3.2 beer permits to three applicants (two of whom would soon be applying for cigarette permits as well). The only No vote was cast by 74-year-old James McGranahan, who had retired in 1928 as a retail grocery merchant. One of the city’s “most highly esteemed citizens,” McGranahan was a long-time Presbyterian church elder. He disagreed with his colleagues regarding the law’s constitutionality, taking the prohibitionists’ position that because other states had declared beer unconstitutional and other towns had refused permits, Indianola could too.

During their beer debate the other council members manifestly were acutely aware that, unlike the cigarette permit law, that providing for beer permits conferred no discretion on them not to issue them for reasons other than those expressly set forth by the legislature. As Mayor N. D. Gordon, who believed that all beer was intoxicating and knew that “saloons were the worst curse of prohibition days,” put it, “Iowa law makes it mandatory on the council to grant the permits....” Consequently, the day after the council had voted to issue beer permits, “beer trucks rolled into Indianola,” where beer began to be sold legally for the first time in more than half a century. Whether cigarette sales would follow suit, despite the undisputed discretion that the Indianola city council had been exercising for a dozen years and was indisputably empowered to continue...
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s exercising not to issue any permits to sell them, would be decided next.

The key role played by the Simpson College Methodist hierarchy sheds light on the moralistic underpinnings of the anti-cigarette movement in Warren county. At the same time that President Hillman and others were agitating against beer, a battle was raging at the college over dancing: in April 1933 the board of trustees had “agreed that something must be done to meet the growing unrest on the campus due to a continuation of the ban against dancing.” In exchange for students’ compliance with the ban until June, the trustees agreed to take some action favoring the students’ requests. After the students had lived up to their side of the bargain, the student council declared that if the trustees did not live up to theirs, the council refused to accept responsibility for the student body’s action. The upshot was that in June the trustees, without granting specific permission to dance, decided to leave the decision up to individual conscience as prescribed by Methodist Episcopal church doctrine. To be sure, dancing continued to be prohibited in college buildings and campus social programs had to be “‘kept free from dancing so that our college be not responsible for that activity [against] which our church warns,’” and whatever dancing did take place had to be supervised by administration-approved people. Smoking, drinking, and dancing hardly exhausted the universe of proscribed activities on the Methodist index. Cause for grave concern was given by all manner of amusements including “‘attendance upon immoral, questional [sic] and misleading theatrical or motion picture performances’” as well as games of chance, which had been “‘found to be antagonistic to vital piety’” and “‘productive of worldliness,’” thus “‘dull[ing] the spiritual life....’”298

Ironically, one activity in which the college administration permitted its charges to indulge at the nadir of the Great Depression was listening to socialists proclaim that capitalism, a doomed “epileptic” system, was due to be replaced by a cooperative commonwealth.299

No business appears to have applied for cigarette permits from the city council in 1932.300 Yet the decision to end the prohibition on cigarette sales in Indianola which, under the statewide law (1896-1921) and as a result of the non-issuance of any permits since 1921, had lasted continuously for 37 years,301 was

---

298“Students May Dance But Not on the Campus,” IT, June 6, 1933 (1:7, 5:7).
300“Council Proceedings,” Indianola Herald, July 21, 1932 (7:3-5) (no mention of cigarette permit applications at June 20 or July 5, 1932 meetings).
301The account in a local newspaper turned history on its head by stating that: “Cigarettes will be legally sold for the first time since the passage of the state license law. Prior to that time no licenses were required.” “City Council Permits Sale of Cigarettes,” IT, June 20, 1933 (1:8). In fact, from 1896 to 1921 no licenses were issued because selling made, seemingly, not even with a whimper, at a city council meeting on June 19, 1933. In contrast to the deliberations on beer permits five weeks earlier, the front-page articles in the Indianola Tribune and the Indianola Herald mentioned no protest petitions or appearances by the WCTU, Simpson College officials, or church groups. Instead, the resolution to authorize the city clerk to issue cigarette permits (effective on July 1) to five applicants was voted on “without discussion.”\textsuperscript{302} This apparent silence\textsuperscript{303} was all the more remarkable since the very next day, June 20, Iowans voted in record numbers (in a special election) to repeal the national Prohibition Amendment. Whereas 60 percent of voters statewide supported repeal, southern Iowa alone showed any unified opposition; in Warren county as a whole the drys “won a smashing victory,”\textsuperscript{304} 70 percent of voters opposing repeal.\textsuperscript{305} To be sure, even this high proportion masked the fact that 66 percent of voters outside of Indianola voted against repeal, while in Indianola itself that shared reached 80 percent.\textsuperscript{306} Whether the temperance movement was too preoccupied with that vote to be able to devote adequate attention to the council vote seems improbable, but is unclear. Without any doubt, however, the anti-alcohol campaign took precedence: the Warren County Emergency Prohibition group insured that for more than two weeks before the vote and “[r]ight up to the hour when the flap in the voting booths closes on the last voter” a “fighting campaign all over Warren county” was waged that included numerous meetings and rallies, at which Simpson College President Hillman and other college administrators and professors were featured speakers.\textsuperscript{307} The relative neglect of the city council’s action on cigarettes was, ironically, symbolized by the fact that the council’s first vote on June 19 dealt with a petition concerning a water pipe submitted on behalf of a relative by attorney A. V. Proudfoot, who as a state senator in 1909 had, at the WCTU’s behest, been the chief legislative advocate of the bill banning public smoking by minors.\textsuperscript{308}

2026

\textsuperscript{302}“City Council Permits Sale of Cigarettes,” \textit{IT}, June 20, 1933 (1:8); “City Council Votes Permits for Cigaretts,” \textit{Indianola Herald}, June 22, 1933 (1:8).

\textsuperscript{303}The \textit{Indianola Record} (of June 22, 1933) did not even report the issuance.

\textsuperscript{304}“Warren Co. Drys Win Smashing Victory Tues.,” \textit{IR}, June 22, 1933 (1:1).

\textsuperscript{305}“Vote by Counties,” \textit{MCG-G}, June 21, 1933 (2:4).

\textsuperscript{306}Calculated according to “Unofficial Results in Warren County Wet-Dry Vote Tuesday,” \textit{Indianola Herald}, June 22, 1933 (1:3-6).

\textsuperscript{307}“Dry Meetings Are Schedule Up to June 18,” \textit{IR}, June 8, 1933 (1, 8) (copy furnished by Indianola Public Library).

\textsuperscript{308}See above ch. 6.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Although Proudfoot did not address the council on cigarette sales,\textsuperscript{309} he was the main speaker at one of the big anti-liquor prohibition repeal rallies.\textsuperscript{310}

In any event, the resolution to grant permits to five applicants, including two drug stores, two cafes, and the A & P—despite the fact that other cities much less hostile to cigarettes had denied permits to chain stores selling them and the Iowa Supreme Court had upheld their discretion in doing so\textsuperscript{311}—was passed by a vote of 4 to 2. Interestingly, in spite of the absence of any discussion, councilman McGranahan was joined this time by another dissenter—Lester D. Weeks, a dentist, who this time did not have to vote against his conscience as he had on the beer permit vote. The four-member majority included building contractor William F. Fears, barber shop owner Bruce Rowe, local bank president William Buxton, Jr., and Robert Ernest Hansell (automobile or farm implement dealer).\textsuperscript{312}

Two weeks later, by a vote of 3 to 2, with, once again, McGranahan and Weeks voting Nay, the council granted a cigarette permit to the first person to whom it had granted a beer permit in May.\textsuperscript{313}

Indianola was the only city in Iowa that collected no cigarette permit taxes in 1932-33.\textsuperscript{314} The next year, the first in which all 110 first- and second-class cities recorded such receipts, Indianola’s receipts totaled $525 (the equivalent of seven permits), than which only 17 cities received less.\textsuperscript{315} By October 1934, when a druggist applied for a cigarette permit, Weeks deserted McGranahan, leaving the

---

\textsuperscript{309}Indianola City Council Minutes at 327 (June 19, 1933) (copy furnished by city clerk’s office); on Proudfoot’s legislative activity, see above ch. 13.

\textsuperscript{310}“Dry Meetings Are Schedule Up to June 18,” \textit{IR}, June 8, 1933 (1) (copy furnished by Indianola Public Library).

\textsuperscript{311}See below ch. 21.

\textsuperscript{312}Indianola City Council Minutes at 327-28 (June 19, 1933) (copy furnished by city clerk’s office); “City Council Permits Sale of Cigarettes,” \textit{IT}, June 20, 1933 (1:8); “City Council Votes Permits for Cigarets,” \textit{Indianola Herald}, June 22, 1933 (1:8); “Council Proceedings,” \textit{Indianola Herald}, Sept. 21, 1933 (6:5) (June 19). The biographical information, which was needed in part to determine the kinds of businesses to which the permits were issued, is taken from the 1920 and 1930 population censuses (HeritageQuest), and “R. E. Hanssell Rites Friday,” \textit{Indianola Record Herald}, Aug. 31, 1967 (copy furnished by Indianola Public Library).

\textsuperscript{313}Indianola City Council Minutes at 330 (July 3, 1933) (copy furnished by city clerk’s office); “Del Comito Given Cigaret Licenice [sic],” \textit{Indianola Herald}, July 6, 1933 (1:2).

\textsuperscript{314}State of Iowa: 1933: Report on Municipal Finances for the Year Ending March 31, 1933, tab. 1A, at 8-11.

\textsuperscript{315}State of Iowa: 1934: Report on Municipal Finances for the Year Ending March 31, 1934, tab. 1A, at 8-11. All but one of those cities was smaller; many cities were tied with Indianola.
latter as the only No vote, a pattern that was replicated in 1936 when the council composed of the same members granted four permits. Finally, in June 1937, when McGranahan was no longer a member but Weeks was, the council granted permits without any No votes, this time to the A & P and seven other applicants, including three of the other original four permit holders. This pattern of no Nays persisted through at least 1945 with the exception of one session on June 21, 1943, when, after granting two permits unanimously (including one to A & P), the council voted 4 to 2 to deny a permit to a cafe that had been one of the original permit holders from 1933, although it then by a vote of 6 to 0 granted one to the same person for a lunch room. Two other permits were also granted 6 to 0, but when the council tied 3 to 3 on a cigarette permit to the first beer permittee and one of the first cigarette permittees from 1933, the mayor broke the tie in the applicant’s favor; one of the persistent Nay-voters also cast a lone vote against a permit for a cigar store. The reasons for these No votes are unknown.

The end of World War II also marked the end of Indianola’s unique position in another way. When nicotine-addicted soldiers returned to Simpson College, they at first complied with its campuswide smoking ban by standing across the street to smoke. But after a while the veterans chafed under what they perceived as an “infringement on their personal rights,” a criticism that the student newspaper reinforced by arguing that because this “‘national habit’” was not a “‘social evil,’” the college’s tradition had to give way to “‘the dictates of modern society.’” In order to persuade the administration to yield, one day dozens of young male students confronted professors as they were leaving the administration to walk to weekly chapel at the Methodist Church: flanking both 316 Indianola City Council Minutes at 464 (Oct. 15, 1934). These and all later minutes were identified by the city clerk’s office, which found some council items dealing with cigarette permits from 1933 to 1946. Email from Jennifer Baughman to Marc Linder (July 7, 2006).

---

317 Indianola City Council Minutes (June 15, 1936) (page number missing from copy).

318 Indianola City Council Minutes at 195 (June 21, 1937).

320 Indianola City Council Minutes at 148 (June 21, 1943). The only councilman to cast three Nay votes was John L. Main, who served on the council from 1939 to 1949; in addition to having been a custodian at Simpson College and an operator at the municipal light plant, he had also been in the restaurant and real estate businesses. “Services Held Wednesday for John L. Main,” Indianola Record Herald and Tribune, Dec. 28, 1967 (1:2) (copy furnished by Indianola Public Library).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s sides of the walk, “each one silently, confidently, even jauntily holding a lighted cigarette, their ranks formed a smoky gauntlet through which the astonished faculty was forced to pass. Not a word was said by anyone. And afterwards, no notice was taken of their act of defiance. No rules were changed. But from that day forward smoking on the campus—not in the buildings, to be sure—was commonplace, at least among the men.”

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth century many colleges prohibited students from smoking on campus. For example, in 1887 when the college faculty of the University of Pennsylvania forbade students to smoke within the building, the tobacco trade press wondered whether the university would also side with Pope Gregory that the sun moved around the Earth and require students not to hold to Galileo’s theory. “A Ukase Against Smoking,” USTJ, vol. 24, Nov. 19, 1887 (3:4). Columbia College in New York City had prohibited smoking anywhere on campus until 1889, relaxing the ban that year to cover only inside buildings. “Cigarettes and Classics,” USTJ, vol. 27, Apr. 6, 1889 (4:2). By 1897 the press spoke of the beginnings of a “crusade against the use of tobacco” at universities, mentioning Boston and Ohio Wesleyan University. “Should Students Use Tobacco?” WNC, Feb. 17, 1897 (2:7). In 1911 the University of Notre Dame began penalizing students who smoked cigarettes on campus, in the streets, or in residence halls with suspension. “College Bars Cigarettes,” NYT, Sept. 28, 1911 (1). On the ban at the University of Minnesota in the first decades of the twentieth century culminating in the year-long suspension of the future New York Times reporter Harrison Salisbury, see vol. 2. In 1921, John Hibben, the cigarette-smoking president of Princeton University, objected to the “war on cigarette smoking” declared by Chancellor Day of Syracuse University, who had been “shocked to see” male students who “insolently blew smoke in girls’ faces.” “Hibben Smokes ’Em; Fags Safe at Princeton,” NYT, Jan. 30, 1921 (2). But 40 years later Princeton barred smoking in lecture halls and classrooms—purportedly “merely match[ing] rules long in force at Yale and Harvard”—in an effort “not to stop smoking ‘as a moral evil,’” but to save $16,700 annual cleaning, sanding, and refinishing costs. “Princeton Bans Butts,” Crimson (Harvard), Oct. 13, 1960, on http://www.thecrimson.article.aspx?ref=248723 (visited May 9, 2006). The same year the president of Barnard College asked students to observe a longstanding rule against smoking in classrooms, but added that there would be no penalties for violations. “No Smoking, Positively,” NYT, Oct. 25, 1960 (41). In fact, in 1952 Yale prohibited smoking (along with “putting feet on other seats”) in classrooms, but continued to allow it in seminars with a limited enrollment. “Yale Smoking and Slouching Prohibited by Dean’s Office,” Crimson (Harvard), Feb. 27, 1952, on http://www.thecrimson.article.aspx?ref=482513 (visited May 9, 2006). In 1927 Harvard University for the first time permitted smoking in any college library when it allowed it in the reading room of the new business school library.

---

322 In the late nineteenth and early twentieth century many colleges prohibited students from smoking on campus. For example, in 1887 when the college faculty of the University of Pennsylvania forbade students to smoke within the building, the tobacco trade press wondered whether the university would also side with Pope Gregory that the sun moved around the Earth and require students not to hold to Galileo’s theory. “A Ukase Against Smoking,” USTJ, vol. 24, Nov. 19, 1887 (3:4). Columbia College in New York City had prohibited smoking anywhere on campus until 1889, relaxing the ban that year to cover only inside buildings. “Cigarettes and Classics,” USTJ, vol. 27, Apr. 6, 1889 (4:2). By 1897 the press spoke of the beginnings of a “crusade against the use of tobacco” at universities, mentioning Boston and Ohio Wesleyan University. “Should Students Use Tobacco?” WNC, Feb. 17, 1897 (2:7). In 1911 the University of Notre Dame began penalizing students who smoked cigarettes on campus, in the streets, or in residence halls with suspension. “College Bars Cigarettes,” NYT, Sept. 28, 1911 (1). On the ban at the University of Minnesota in the first decades of the twentieth century culminating in the year-long suspension of the future New York Times reporter Harrison Salisbury, see vol. 2. In 1921, John Hibben, the cigarette-smoking president of Princeton University, objected to the “war on cigarette smoking” declared by Chancellor Day of Syracuse University, who had been “shocked to see” male students who “insolently blew smoke in girls’ faces.” “Hibben Smokes ’Em; Fags Safe at Princeton,” NYT, Jan. 30, 1921 (2). But 40 years later Princeton barred smoking in lecture halls and classrooms—purportedly “merely match[ing] rules long in force at Yale and Harvard”—in an effort “not to stop smoking ‘as a moral evil,’” but to save $16,700 annual cleaning, sanding, and refinishing costs. “Princeton Bans Butts,” Crimson (Harvard), Oct. 13, 1960, on http://www.thecrimson.article.aspx?ref=248723 (visited May 9, 2006). The same year the president of Barnard College asked students to observe a longstanding rule against smoking in classrooms, but added that there would be no penalties for violations. “No Smoking, Positively,” NYT, Oct. 25, 1960 (41). In fact, in 1952 Yale prohibited smoking (along with “putting feet on other seats”) in classrooms, but continued to allow it in seminars with a limited enrollment. “Yale Smoking and Slouching Prohibited by Dean’s Office,” Crimson (Harvard), Feb. 27, 1952, on http://www.thecrimson.article.aspx?ref=482513 (visited May 9, 2006). In 1927 Harvard University for the first time permitted smoking in any college library when it allowed it in the reading room of the new business school library.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s town, remained decades ahead of its time.

Ladora

A very small town located about 25 miles east of Grinnell, Ladora appears to have devoted much of the early twentieth century to burning down. The town’s active WCTU organization presumably contributed to banning the sale of cigarettes into the mid-1920s. Because no copy of the Ladora News from 1921 is still extant, the events surrounding the introduction of prohibition there are unknown, but renewed struggles in 1924 (“Ladora Delivers Blow to Cigarettes”) shed some light on the origins. At the town election on March 31, 1924, considerable interest focused on the question of issuing cigarette permits. Indeed, the “Citizen’s ticket ran on a platform which proposed the issuance of cigarette licenses.” Because “the old council, which had in past years declined to issue licenses, refused to make the race...only one ticket was printed on the ballot.” Nevertheless, “the opponents of cigarettes rallied in force and wrote in the names of their candidates in sufficient numbers to elect a mayor and three of five councilmen.” Although there was “some talk of a contest,” none appears to have been conducted. Unfortunately, even the press account that revealed cigarette sales permits to have been the central issue of the election failed to mention which of the newly (re-)elected councilmen belonged to the anti-cigarette group.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Lamoni

Lamoni, located in south-central Iowa a few miles from the Missouri border, was founded as a religious colony and became the headquarters of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, a Mormon split-off. In 1921, prominent townspeople, including the mayor, had opposed the Dodd bill

---

327 “Much Interest in Ladora Town Election,” Victor Record, Apr. 3, 1924 (1:2). Part of this article was republished as “Ladora Delivers Blow to Cigarettes,” GH, Apr. 4, 1924 (4:4).

328 The Ladora News did not report on a contest or cigarette sales permits during the following weeks.

329 “Ira Wyant Re-Elected Town Mayor,” Ladora News, Apr. 4, 1924 (1:6), the main article on the election did not even mention the cigarette or any other issue. Clearly Mayor Wyant, who was a farmer, belonged to the anti-cigarette group. Of the five councilmen, three (Oliver Davis, George Morse, and Elwyn Madison [and not Matteson, as reported in the newspapers]) were farmers; one (Lawrence Shedenhelm) was a 23-year-old machinist working at a battery service station); and one, Jasper L. Augustine, was a physician-surgeon and director of the local bank, lumber company, and gas company, and member of the Ladora Improvement Company (and father of the future first Nancy Drew ghost writer, Mildred Augustine Wirt Benson aka Carolyn Keene). On Dr. Augustine, see History of Iowa County Iowa and Its People 2:38-39 (1915); “Well Known Iowa County Physician Dies,” Williamsburg Journal-Tribune, Nov. 4, 1937 (1:2); The First 100 Years: Being a Historical Outline of the First Century of Ladora, Iowa n.p. [5] (C. Morgan, Edith Shaul, and Margaret Daniels eds. Aug. 17, 1968); Melanie Rehak, Girl Sleuth: Nancy Drew and the Women Who Created Her 33-34 (2005). The occupational data are taken from the 1920 population census. The newspapers stated that H. W. Smith was elected, but he received only 59 votes compared to Morse’s 61. The current town clerk’s lack of cooperation in finding the council minutes made it impossible to determine when the council first issued permits.

330 Lamoni: The Story of a Town Established Fifty Years Ago: 1879-1929, at 3 (n.d.); Joseph Anthony, Lamoni’s Passing Parade: Stories of Lamoni and Mamoni People 19 (1948). Although the church later moved its headquarters across the border to Missouri, the college’s presence in Lamoni reinforced the church’s continuing influence there. and urged Governor Kendall to veto it.\textsuperscript{331} The church’s position on smoking is reflected in the fact that its college, Graceland University in Lamoni, has always prohibited smoking on the entire campus, indoors and outdoors, to the present day.\textsuperscript{332}

The local newspaper, the \textit{Lamoni Chronicle}, which published no cigarette advertisements in July-August 1921, also did not mention that the town council had received any applications for cigarette permits or taken any action on them.\textsuperscript{333}

That the council minutes for 1921-30 also contain no references to cigarette permits,\textsuperscript{334} in combination with the church’s influence on the town at that time, strongly suggests that sentiment against cigarettes was so strong that no one applied for a permit. At its April 1931 meeting Howard M. Silver, a 40-year-old cafe manager\textsuperscript{335} who had no church affiliation, but whose mother, an LDS member, owned the cafe,\textsuperscript{336} asked the council to consider an application from him for a cigarette permit, but it took no action at the meeting.\textsuperscript{337} Silver appeared again at the May meeting, asking the council to consider and act on his

\begin{footnotesize}
\textsuperscript{331}See above ch. 15.
\textsuperscript{332}Telephone interview with Alma Blair, former history professor at Graceland, who began teaching there in 1955, Lamoni (Dec. 21, 2007). In contrast, the church’s influence on the town has waned considerably. Emblematic of this diminution (as well as of the persistent opposition to smoking) is the current city clerk’s statement that since two council members are adamantly opposed to issuing alcohol and cigarette permits, whenever the council meets on these matters, they have to make sure that none of the three other members is absent—otherwise they would be unable to issue permits. Telephone interview with Deanna Ballantyne, city clerk, Lamoni (Dec. 21, 2007).
\textsuperscript{333}“Town Council Meeting July 5, 1921,” \textit{LC}, July 28, 1921 (1:2). The paper did not publish the minutes for the June council meeting.
\textsuperscript{334}Telephone interview with Deanna Ballantyne, city clerk, Lamoni (Dec. 21, 2007). In September 1921 the council did pass an ordinance on cigarette sales to minors. \textit{Id}. The city clerk examined the minutes through July 1923. The minutes for June and July 1924 as published in the local newspaper also included no mention of cigarette permits. “Council Proceedings: July 7, 1924,” \textit{LC}, July 10, 1924 (5:2).
\textsuperscript{335}1930 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).
\textsuperscript{336}Silver did not appear in the 1925 Iowa state census, but in 1915 he was returned with no church affiliation and garage work as his occupation; his mother Flora was a member of LDS, while his father Joseph Silver was returned as a restaurant proprietor who had been born in Utah and was also without a church affiliation. Iowa Census 1915, Decatur County, Card No. A500, A499, and A498. At the 1920 population census Joseph Silver was again returned as a restaurant owner; in 1930, he no longer appeared, but his wife was returned as a cafe owner.
\textsuperscript{337}“Council Proceedings,” \textit{LC}, Apr. 23, 1931 (6:3) (Apr. 6).
\end{footnotesize}
application, but the minutes do not include any response.\textsuperscript{338} Through 1934 cigarette permits were not mentioned in any council minutes for the months of June or July, in which they would typically have been granted/have had to have been renewed.\textsuperscript{339}

That change had come to Lamoni, however, heralded by the fact that although less than a year earlier 80 percent of the town’s voters had opposed repeal of the national Prohibition amendment,\textsuperscript{340} remarkably, on June 5, 1934, the council unanimously granted a beer license to William Hollands,\textsuperscript{341} who at the 1930 population census had been an electric utility manager in Lamoni, but by the middle of the Great Depression was operating the Coffee Shoppe. A year later, on July 1, 1935, the council—whose five members were all businessmen, and four of whom were also members of the Reorganized Latter Day Saints Church\textsuperscript{342}—unanimously approved the cigarette permit applications of Silver.

\textsuperscript{338}“Council Proceedings,” \textit{LC}, May 21, 1931 (6:3) (May 4). The same issue of the newspaper that published the minutes included a large advertisement for Lucky Strike that claimed that it protected the larynx from “certain harsh irritants,” which were expelled and “sold to manufacturers of chemical compounds.” \textit{LC}, May 21, 1931 (2:3-6). A different version of the same advertisement appeared in \textit{LC}, July 2, 1931 (2:3-6).

\textsuperscript{340}“Decatur County Polls Dry Majority,” \textit{LC} June 22, 1933 (1:2); “President Briggs Opposes Locating Liquor Store Here,” \textit{LC}, May 23, 1935 (1:2).

\textsuperscript{341}“Council Proceedings,” \textit{LC}, July 5, 1934 (6:4-5) (June 5, 1934). The council at the same time unanimously rejected two other beer permit application applications pending from the May 7 meeting.

\textsuperscript{342}The 1930 population census returned the council members as Everett W. Bell (Ford dealer), Albert W. Fleet (department store merchant), Edward Stoll (creamery manager), David Vredenburg (general store merchant), and George H. Derry (garage manager). All but Bell (who belonged to the United Brethren) were RLDS members as was Mayor Joseph C. Danielson. 1925 Iowa Population Census Schedules (listing all but Stoll). According to Alma Blair, a former professor at Graceland College and historian of the Hollands, and cafe owner Thomas S. Williams\textsuperscript{343} (a high-ranking official of the RLDS who had been “released” in 1932, opened a cafe to support himself during the Depression, and later was mayor for many years)\textsuperscript{344} as well as a new beer permit for Hollands and Lewis Cafe.\textsuperscript{345} Although the council minutes do not reveal any earlier issuance of permits\textsuperscript{346} and the Lamoni Chronicle did not publish any article commenting on the issuance of the first permits in the town, it did state on July 4, 1935, that since “all licenses to sell beer and cigarettes were cancelled the first of the month, necessitating renewals being made,” the three aforementioned “[n]ew” cigarette permits had been issued on July 1.\textsuperscript{347} A year later the council unanimously issued yet another cigarette permit\textsuperscript{348} to someone to whom it had issued a beer permit the month before.\textsuperscript{349}

Why a town government so heavily influenced by a church opposed to alcohol and tobacco—though not quite so rigidly and categorically as the Mormons\textsuperscript{350}—did an about-face and issued permits for beer and cigarettes in the mid-1930s is not quite so puzzling as on first sight.\textsuperscript{351} After all, from the town’s church and Lamoni, Stoll was also a member. Telephone interview with Alma Blair, Lamoni (Feb. 14, 2008).

\textsuperscript{344}Williams, a coal miner in southern Iowa from 1900 to 1920, had held the position of stake president (the equivalent of bishop), supervising about 20 congregations. The loss of his employment embittered him toward the church, which, in turn, was probably alienated by his selling cigarettes. Telephone interview with Prof. William Russell, History Dept. Graceland University and nephew of Thomas S. Williams, Lamoni (Feb. 17, 2008); telephone interview with Alma Blair, Lamoni (Feb. 14, 2008).

\textsuperscript{347}“Beer Permits Renewed,” \textit{LC}, July 4, 1935 (1:2).

\textsuperscript{348}“Council Proceedings,” \textit{LC}, July 9, 1936 (2:4-5) (July 6, to Ralph King).

\textsuperscript{349}“Council Proceedings,” \textit{LC}, June 25, 1936 (2:4-5) (June 3, to Ralph King).

\textsuperscript{350}Both groups adhered to the prohibition of tobacco in the Word of Wisdom section 89(9).

\textsuperscript{351}Church and town historian Prof. Alma Blair found the turn of events, with which he had not been familiar, surprising. Telephone interview with Alma Blair, Lamoni (Feb. 14, 2008). The nephew of Howard Silver, the first recipient of a cigarette permit, when asked when and why the prejudice against cigarettes had disappeared in Lamoni, inception a large number of people in Lamoni, including RLDS members (but not its prominent leaders), smoked. The RLDS’s somewhat more “flexible” attitude meant that it would not even have been out of character for a member to run a cafe and permit smoking, though many in that church would have frowned on it and him, but expulsion from the church would not have followed. That Lamoni, despite its refusal to issue cigarette sales permits for so many years, was nevertheless no fanatical anti-tobacco fortress, is strongly suggested by the following large advertisement, which appeared at the top center of the front page of the Lamoni Chronicle in 1919:
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Do you know the Fern cafe is the only one in the West that is not selling tobacco in any form? Do you still want a Nice, Clean place in your city like the Fern, where your mother, daughter and respectable friends can go and not endure the perfume of tobacco?

Of course we all know that cigars are a good drawing card for any Cafe, and if you want a good cigar that is your own affair and you can find them in other Cafes. But the question is—Do you still want a place like the Fern in your city?

The fact that the Fern’s owner, at a time when cigarette sales were unlawful in Iowa, apparently felt constrained to plead with the public to patronize a smoke-free and tobacco sales-free cafe, constitutes rather impressive evidence that even in Lamoni many smoked and others put up with exposure to smoke even while eating.

The businessmen-city council members who, in the view of church and Lamoni town historian Alma Blair, were good but not especially pious RLDS members, “would not have been excessively strict in their religious beliefs when applying them to the civic situation.” And Graceland University history professor William Russell, Thomas Williams’ own nephew, explained the council’s decision to issue permits as an example of businessmen’s commercial sense and mentality overcoming their church mores.

Ironically, one of these members in 1935, David Vredenburg, a general store merchant—in 1923 representatives of the RLDS had approached him to take over the church-sponsored General Supply Store in Lamoni—was the co-founder of 352 Email from Alma Blair to Marc Linder (Feb. 15, 2008).

---

353 LC, Aug. 28, 1919 (1) (copy furnished by Alma Blair).
354 Email from Alma Blair to Marc Linder (Feb. 15, 2008).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

what became a major midwestern supermarket chain (Hy-Vee), the largest private employer in Iowa and by the late twentieth and early twenty-first century one of its largest cigarette sellers. Even in the 1930s as a member of the RLDS and co-owner of an expanding grocery chain, Vredenburg sold pipes and smoking tobacco, although this commerce “didn’t mean that smokers or chewers were welcome in the store.” Neither he nor his partner “used tobacco in any form but neither one ever came right out and said ‘Don’t smoke.’” His partner, Charles Hyde, “had his own way of getting his message across. If a salesman came in with a pipe full of tobacco and smoking a cigarette or cigar, Charlie came running with a broom and dustpan...ready to sweep up any ashes that might happen to fall on the floor.” Vredenburg did not like his employees to smoke, especially in his presence, and at least on one occasion in the 1930s decided not to hire a 21-year-old applicant as a store manager because he was not a member of the LDS church and had smoked a cigarette during his job interview. The key to the disconnect between Vredenburg’s and Hyde’s business practices and their RLDS-inspired religious beliefs was that: “They took their church membership seriously but they were wise enough to realize that a particular religious affiliation did not guarantee success.” Nevertheless, as late as 1951, two years after Vredenburg’s death, the Hy-Vee in Lamoni still did not sell cigarettes. Indeed, at that time the only place in town to buy them was a pool hall owned by the aforementioned Thomas Williams, who despite being the mayor, sold them to 357 With 26,113 employees in Iowa Hy-Vee purports to be the state’s largest private employer. Email from Marilyn Gahm, customer service coordinator, Hy-Vee, to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 2008). See also http://www.fundinguniverse.com/companyhistories/HyVeeIncCompanyHistory.html;http://www.hyvee.com/about/about.asp. Vredenburg remained with the company, which his son presided over, until 1949. E. Mae Fritz, The Family of Hy-Vee 89 (1989). Although by 1935 Vredenburg and Hyde owned eight stores, which should have been subject to the chain store tax that the Iowa legislature passed that year, their relatively small size might have meant that they were not perceived as chains, especially since they were owned by varying combinations of owners. E. Mae Fritz, The Family of Hy-Vee 28-29 (1989).

362 Vredenburg, who had been born in 1884, died on Sept. 24, 1949. “Chain Grocer Dies,” Cedar Rapids Gazette, Sept. 26, 1949 (17:5); email from Marilyn Gahm, customer service coordinator, Hy-Vee, to Marc Linder (Feb. 18, 2008).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

minors, at least one of whom was expelled from Graceland for smoking. Despite having been expelled, Edwards became vice president of the college. Although Silver still operated a cafe and gas station in 1950-51, he no longer sold cigarettes. Edwards—who returned to Lamoni in 1960 and lived there until 1982—noted that his son, who worked at the Hy-Vee as a bagger, reported that the store did sell cigarettes. Hy-Vee’s senior vice president for corporate procurement and logistics, when asked whether the company had made a central decision to begin selling cigarettes and when that might have been, at first replied that: “We cannot even try to surmise what total view our founders had toward the sales of cigarettes, but I can tell you that we have had tobacco products in our stores well before 1951. They may not have had them in Lamoni, but there were other areas that did sell the.” Email from Ron Taylor to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 2008). When asked whether there was some way to obtain this information from the company archives, he admitted that: “My comment that we had them before 1951 is based on several veteran people who have around 40 years of service. These particular people would actually have no way of knowing exactly either, it was simply their memories that we carried product back to the early days of our company.” Ron Taylor to Marc Linder (Feb. 20, 2008).

In the event, by 1939, selling cigarettes had become so much a part of second nature even in Lamoni, possibly Iowa’s last hold-out, that when, in the wake of a newly effective law cracking down on cigarette smuggling to avoid taxes, state officials were stopping trucks daily for inspection in the area, the tenor and content of the Lamoni Chronicle’s front-page lecture to its readers would have been unimaginable just a few years earlier:

The cigarette tax is beneficial to every community in the state and everyone receives some good from the funds thus derived.

Another reason why persons here should cooperate in keeping the law is because of the fact that each purveyor of cigarettes in Lamoni will reap a benefit. So, besides being a good citizen of the state, those observing and carrying out the law will also be helping their neighbors here.

Newton

By 1921 Newton, situated about 35 miles east of Des Moines, was a midsize

363 Telephone interview with Paul Edwards, Independence, MO (Feb. 18, 2008). Despite having been expelled, Edwards became vice president of the college. Although Silver still operated a cafe and gas station in 1950-51, he no longer sold cigarettes. Edwards—who returned to Lamoni in 1960 and lived there until 1982—noted that his son, who worked at the Hy-Vee as a bagger, reported that the store did sell cigarettes. Hy-Vee’s senior vice president for corporate procurement and logistics, when asked whether the company had made a central decision to begin selling cigarettes and when that might have been, at first replied that: “We cannot even try to surmise what total view our founders had toward the sales of cigarettes, but I can tell you that we have had tobacco products in our stores well before 1951. They may not have had them in Lamoni, but there were other areas that did sell the.” Email from Ron Taylor to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 2008). When asked whether there was some way to obtain this information from the company archives, he admitted that: “My comment that we had them before 1951 is based on several veteran people who have around 40 years of service. These particular people would actually have no way of knowing exactly either, it was simply their memories that we carried product back to the early days of our company.” Ron Taylor to Marc Linder (Feb. 20, 2008).

364 Again in 1937 without any Nays the council instructed the clerk to issue beer and cigarette permits to Joe Dwyer. “Council Proceedings,” LC, July 15, 1937 (2:5-6) (July 7).

365 See above ch. 19.

manufacturing town owing to the location there of numerous industries, including a foundry, flour mills, manufacture of agricultural implements and gasoline engines, but especially of the Maytag Company, which was on the verge of becoming the world’s leading producer of washing machines and turning Newton into a company town. Even before the company achieved its ascendancy, its owner, Fred Maytag, had been elected to the town council twice in the late 1880s and early 1890s, to the state senate from 1902 to 1912, and mayor of Newton from 1919 to 1921.

Auspiciously, at the city council meeting on May 31, 1921, at which Alderman William Brock, a 62-year-old former farmer (whose wife was treasurer of the WCTU Newton local union), initiated discussion of the cigarette question, those in the audience chamber saw a new sign on display: “‘No cigarette smoking allowed in this office.’” In response to Brock’s request that city solicitor George Campbell report on the question of permits, astonishingly—in light of the unambiguous legislative history of that year’s Dodd-Clark bill—the lawyer remarked that “the question as to whether the granting of licenses was optional was one that he had been unable to determine.” Equally startling was the source of Campbell’s uncertainty: “there was some doubt as to whether” the “may” in the provision that councils “may” issue permits “would be construed as ‘may’ or ‘shall.’” After the solicitor had explained that he had unsuccessfully tried to get in touch with the attorney general, Brock did not object to a motion to postpone the discussion for a week until an opinion had been secured from Attorney General Ben Gibson. The apparently commercially minded mayor found no fault with the motion except that “some of the dealers were anxious to get an early decision,” and the council voted unanimously for postponement. By the very next day the Newton Daily News succeeded where Campbell had failed: Gibson told the newspaper that “at this time he did not care to hand down any ruling. He went on to say that the question was really a big one” and that therefore before issuing an opinion he wanted to study the situation carefully that week.

---

367 Polk’s Iowa State Gazetteer and Business Directory: 1922-1923, at 697 (Vol. 20, 43rd Year, 1922).

369 Woman’s Christian Temperance Union of Iowa Forty-Ninth Annual Convention 156 (1922).

370 See above ch. 9.

371 “Council Holds Question Over,” NDN, June 1, 1921 (1:3).
Since the Daily News had scooped the issue, presumably it would have reported any opinion that the attorney general issued, yet it ran no such report.\(^{372}\) Moreover, the attorney general published no such opinion, which, given its universal applicability and centrality for the administration of the cigarette law, would surely have been published and not merely communicated quasi-privately to city solicitor Campbell.\(^{373}\) And, finally, the fact that the Newton city council on June 20 did decide not to issue any permits strongly suggests that Gibson must have informed the city council that it did indeed have the discretion to do so.

In anticipation of the discussion at the council meeting on June 6, 1921, many people interested in the issue on both sides planned to attend, but since, as of noon, the Daily News reported, the attorney general had not yet been heard from, it was unclear whether the council, which wanted to know “whether the word ‘may’ is to be construed as ‘must,’” would take up the question. The intense interest in the semantic question stemmed from the opposition of some members to issuing any permits “unless the law is to be construed as meaning that they ‘must.'”\(^{374}\) At that session Brock informed the city council that he had prepared a resolution on the question of cigarettes,\(^{375}\) but the absence of one member prompted the body to table the discussion until the next meeting or until all members were present.\(^{376}\) By June 18 the Daily News reported that three council members were known to oppose issuing permits, while two favored it; how the sixth member would vote was unknown, but if he voted Yes, the mayor would have to break the tie.\(^{377}\)

All members were present at the next meeting on June 20, at which “[l]adies
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

representing the WCTU were present and took part in the discussion of the CIGARETTE question.” Brock submitted the question: “Shall the City of Newton, Iowa, issue licenses or permits for the Sale of Cigarettes[?].”378 After Brock had explained why cigarettes should not be sold in Newton, Minnie Grimes (whose husband was a farmer) spoke on behalf of the local WCTU, of which she was the president.379 She urged the need to protect Newton’s girls during a period of proliferating cigarette smoking among girls, while Brock took up the need to defend boys. With no other comments forthcoming, the council then voted 4 to 2 against issuing any cigarette permits. The four no votes were cast by Brock, Robert Sayre (a banker), Bert Beatty (a 49-year-old who had no occupation), and William Elliott (a factory pattern maker); the two votes in favor of issuing permits were cast by George Warner, a real estate agent, and John H. Harvey, a woodworker at the washer factory. Since the public was generally aware of how the members would vote, the result was no surprise. Had the vote been a tie, a rumor had been circulating that Mayor John McLaughlin would have voted against permits, though he denied its truth and refused to divulge his stance. That same night the Grinnell city council rejected cigarette sales by the same margin.380

It was doubtless people like Brock and Grimes whom the weekly Newton Record—which inaugurated cigarette advertising in its first issue after legalization381—had in mind when, back in April, it editorially excoriated the “anti-tobacco people”:

There is, of course, no such case to be made against tobacco as could be made against alcoholic liquor, but enough of a case can be made against the weed to appeal with force

378City of Newton Council Proceedings, Regular Meeting at [82] (Sheet No. 895) (June 20, 1921) (copy furnished by Jayme Ewing, adm. asst., City of Newton, Adm. Dept.).

379“Cigarettes Not to Be Licensed After July 4,” NDN, June 21, 1921 (1:7); “Council Refuses to License Cigarette Dealers,” NR, June 24, 1921 (3:5-7) (same article); Woman’s Christian Temperance Union of Iowa Forty-Ninth Annual Convention 156 (1922).

380City of Newton Council Proceedings, Regular Meeting at [82] (Sheet No. 895) (June 20, 1921) (copy furnished by Jayme Ewing, adm. asst., City of Newton, Adm. Dept.); “Cigarettes Not to Be Licensed After July 4,” NDN, June 21, 1921 (1:7); “Council Refuses to License Cigarette Dealers,” NR, June 24, 1921 (3:5-7). See also “Newton Refuses,” GH, June 21, 1921 (4:3). The occupational information is taken from the 1920 population census; because the newspaper did not mention the aldermen’s first names, it is unclear whether John H. Harvey or his brother Will Harvey was the alderman, but both were returned with the same occupation and John H. had already been alderman in 1916 (information provided by Newton Public Library, Dec. 31, 2007).

381NR, July 8, 1921 (6:5-7) (Chesterfield). to that class which enjoys compelling other people to be as good as the class thinks itself to be. There are many people in this class and they have frequently dominated the affairs of this nation and others. They never wither under silent contempt and they never die of ridicule. The only weapon that is useful against them is sound reason....

As in several other towns, on July 5, two weeks after the first vote, the council, at a meeting adjourned from July 4, on a motion by Warner and seconded by Sayre, voted 4 to 2 (Brock and Beatty) to reconsider its action denying permits. Before the vote was taken, Alderman Elliott explained that he had in the meantime concluded that the council had made a mistake: though a church member, he was able to find only one “big point” in the law—keeping cigarettes away from minors—which he believed licensing would facilitate. After Brock had again explained the basis of his opposition, the council, by the same 4 to 2 vote, Brock and Beatty voting Nay, voted both to issue permits and to issue one to the sole applicant, a confectioner. Following this defeat, Brock announced that at the next meeting he would propose an amendment to the city ordinances requiring that moving picture shows (as well as skating rinks, merry-go-rounds, and other entertainments) be closed Sundays. A week later the council defeated Brock’s motion to amend the ordinance, only Beatty joining him. After Brock had left to catch a train, the council issued three more permits (to another confectioner, a cigar store, and the Dreamland) by a vote of 4 to 1, this time Sayre casting the lone Nay, as Beatty changed sides. At the next meeting, no one joined Brock in opposing the issuance of a fifth cigarette permit to a pool hall manager.

---

383 City of Newton Council Proceedings, Regular Meeting at [85] (Sheet No. 898) (July 5, 1921) (copy furnished by Jayme Ewing, adm. asst., City of Newton, Adm. Dept.).
384 “Council Backs Up on Question of Cigarettes,” NDN, July 6, 1921 (1:7); “City Council Gives License for Cigarettes,” NR, July 8, 1921 (7:6) (identical article).
385 City of Newton Council Proceedings, Regular Meeting at [85] (Sheet No. 898) (July 5, 1921) (copy furnished by Jayme Ewing, adm. asst., City of Newton, Adm. Dept.). The confectioner was Clyde Roswell.
386 “Council Backs Up on Question of Cigarettes,” NDN, July 6, 1921 (1:7); “City Council Gives License for Cigarettes,” NR, July 8, 1921 (7:6).
388 “Council Hunts for Big Game,” NDN, July 19, 1921 (1:2). Frank McCarl’s occupation is taken from the 1920 population census.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Oskaloosa

The state’s nineteenth largest city with a population of nearly 10,000, Oskaloosa in south-central Iowa was both the most populous and industrialized city to ban cigarette sales in 1921. The town’s industrial base included flour and feed mills, iron and brass foundries, garment, cigar, hardware, and washing machine factories, extensive brick and tile works, and surrounding coal mines employing 3,000 miners. At its meeting on July 5, the day after the statewide law had gone into effect, the Oskaloosa city council considered a resolution offered by councilman David Eckenbom, the president of a wholesale drug business, to issue cigarette sales permits to 17 applicants, including six pool halls, three candy stores, two drugstores, two restaurants, a cigar store, a wholesale grocery, and an Eagles Lodge. The council voted 4 to 2 against the resolution, Eckenbom, and Charles Gunnar, a longtime railroad yard foreman—the former a second generation and the latter a first-generation Swede—voting Aye. The occupations of the members casting No votes were lawyer, commercial salesman, garage owner, and (perhaps) farmer or farm laborer. Two weeks later the council “stood pat on its refusal to grant permission to dealers to sell cigarettes in Oskaloosa” by voting unanimously to refund to a dealer the money accompanying his application and then to each of the 17 applicants. For its action refusing licensure the council received commendatory letters and special resolutions from the WCTU, citizens, St. James Episcopal church, the Christian church. The press in Iowa indulged its taste for mockery of the anti-cigarette 389 Polk’s Iowa State Gazetteer and Business Directory: 1922-1923, at 720 (Vol. 20, 43rd Year, 1922); N. W. Ayer and Son’s American Newspaper Annual and Directory 310 (1920).

390 City of Oskaloosa, Iowa, Council Proceedings at 185-86 (July 5, 1921) (copy furnished by Marilyn Miller, city clerk, Oskaloosa); “No Cigarettes for Oskaloosa,” ODH, July 6, 1921 (1:1). The kinds of businesses were identified either directly in these sources or indirectly through the population census, and, in one case, Phil Hoffmann, Oskaloosa: or the First One Hundred Years in a Mid-West Town 141 (1942) (H. L. Spencer Wholesale Grocer Co.). The likely business of one applicant, whom the census returned as a livestock shipper, could not be identified. The occupations of the council members (LeRoy Corlett, Alonzo Drinkle, James Lewis, and C. E. Stockham) were identified thought the population censuses and the first names mentioned in Revised Ordinances of the City of Oskaloosa Iowa 18 (1936). No such Stockham was returned as living in Iowa in 1920, but it was conjectured that the Charles E. Stockham in nearby Davis county in 1900 and 1910 was the councilman.

movement by analogizing the action in Oskaloosa to the sumptuary rules in Zion City near Chicago, a bizarre planned religio-utopian community that banned, in addition to alcohol and tobacco, gambling, theaters, circuses, pork, dancing, swearing, doctors, politicians, oysters, and tan-colored shoes. At the election of 1911, the “overseer” of Zion City, Wilbur Glenn Voliva (the successor to its founder, John Alexander Dowie), had declared that if he regained power, he “would appoint a vigilance committee of prominent citizens to horsewhip on sight any user of tobacco” and “refuse to admit any industries unless it is positively guaranteed that no users of tobacco are hired.”

Over the next two years bloody physical battles erupted over efforts by disciples to prevent employees of an electrical company from smoking. Eventually, in 1914, the Illinois Supreme Court, reversing the county circuit court, invalidated as regulation and control of “the habits and practices of the citizen without any reasonable basis” and as an “unreasonable interference with the private rights of the citizen” the Zion City ordinance outlawing the smoking of tobacco “in any form...in or upon any street, alley, avenue, boulevard, park, parkway, public passageway, depot, depot platform, depot grounds, hospice, hotel, store, post-office, or other public building or public place.”

The article that numerous Iowa newspapers published declared:

Though naughty Manhattan would not listen to Voliva’s agents from Zion City nor forsake its “wicked” ways, Voliva’s blue edicts have found their way into the hands of Oskaloosa’s guardians of public behavior and as a result cigarettes have been outlawed and bare dimpled knees are taboo.

City fathers of this none too wild community have decreed that “fags” are not to be smoked in the best of families, and permission to sell “coffin nails” has been denied seventeen applicants. License fees today were returned to seventeen surprised tobacco merchants by City Clerk Tom Carlin in compliance with the council’s decision.

Mail order business in cigarettes went forward with a bound today when it was found that cigarettes were no longer on the market and a new type of bootlegger has put in his appearance. He’s puttin’ out smokes on the q.t.

And that “ain’t” all.

Rolled down stockings and abbreviated skirts displaying a bit of feminine daintiness do not have the sanction of the city dads.

---

393 “To Whip Tobacco Users,” NYT, Jan. 31, 1911 (7).
394 “Zionist Rioting over Smoking,” NYT, Apr. 23, 1912 (7); “Riot in Zion City,” NYT, Apr. 30, 1912 (1); “Workmen Attack Volivites,” NYT, Mar. 21, 1913 (2).
395 City of Zion v. Behrens, 262 Ill. 510, 513, 510-11 (1914).
No siree.

Policewoman Nellie Howe has her hands full telling the more daring of the dashing young flappers that the long ones must be worn up according to Hoyle and that that bit of nothingness labeled skirt must reach the knees at least. \footnote{396}{“Bare Knees and Cigarets Taboo in Oskaloosa,” CFDR, July 8, 1921 (1:2). See also “Cigarets and Bare Knees to Be Taboo, City Council Rules,” MCG-G, July 8, 1921 (9:5); “Iowa News,” Oxford Mirror, July 28, 1921 (7:4). Though the meaning of “Voliva’s angels” is unclear, in 1903 Dowie had descended on New York City with thousands of his followers, but failed to achieve his goal of prophecy and salvation. E.g., “Dowie and His Host Mass in the Garden,” NYT, Oct. 17, 1903 (1); “Hostile Audience Howls at Dowie,” NYT, Oct. 20, 1903 (1).}

To be sure, since the city council minutes directly before, at, and after this time include no reference to such dress codes,\footnote{397}{Email from Marilyn Miller, City Clerk, Oskaloosa, to Marc Linder (Jan. 3, 2008).} the story may have been a joke or a hoax,\footnote{398}{Since the original version of this article appears to have run in the Oskaloosa local paper, it would have been a joke rather than a hoax; whether the out-of-town papers understood in the same way is unclear. “Must Cover ’Em Up,” ODH, July 7, 1921 (6:4), did not mention cigarettes at all; instead, it stated that “[s]trict enforcement” of dress reform prevailed in Oskaloosa.} just as the assertion that the Oskaloosa city council had in any way limited smoking (as opposed to buying) cigarettes was a canard. Nevertheless, entrepreneurs did immediately seek out profitable methods for satisfying pent-up demand. Three days after the council’s denial of the permits local tobacco merchants were considering opening cigarette sales stores “just outside” the city’s corporate limits, and one had already begun setting up a roadside shop.\footnote{399}{Oskaloosa city clerk Marilyn Miller was unable to identify the first time the council issued a permit.}

Exactly how long the city council continued to prohibit cigarette sales in Oskaloosa is unclear,\footnote{400}{Oskaloosa city clerk Marilyn Miller was unable to identify the first time the council issued a permit.} but the ban ended no later than 1922, since for the year ending March 31, 1923, the city collected $1,350 in cigarette permit taxes,\footnote{401}{State of Iowa: 1923: Report on Municipal Finances for the Year Ending March 31, 1923, tab. 1A at 16-17.} which was the amount corresponding to 18 permits. On July 1, 1923, the city collected a further $1,275 for 17 permits for the year 1923-24.\footnote{402}{“Cigaret Licenses,” ODH, July 6, 1923 (5:7). Since at the same time the council approved the 17 permits it revoked the permit of a holder who had failed to pay the fee for 1923-24, the council must have issued permits for 1922-23.} Signaling its definitive retreat from its one-time anti-cigarette stance, the council on October 15, 1923, passed a boiler-plate ordinance regulating the sale of cigarettes, which presumably meant that it had decided to issue permits. The same ordinance was still in force in 1936, but a decade later the council sequentially capped the number of permits in force at any one time at 55, 59, and 61, before repealing this limitation in 1947 and thus apparently putting an end to Oskaloosa special regulatory approach to cigarette sales.

Rockford

Little is known about the action taken by the small northcentral farming town of Rockford because the local weekly paper, the Rockford Register, in a very brief notice, merely reported that on June 7 the council “took up this important matter, and after an animated discussion as to the merits and demerits of the licensing plan decided by a vote of three to two not to grant any cigaret licenses to retailers in Rockford.” According to the 1920 Census of Population, two of the three Nays were cast by the council’s only farmers, the third by a garage manager; the Ayes were cast by a carpenter and either a hardware dealer or a salesman. How the Cedar Rapids Evening Gazette uncovered this motivation is unknown, but seven weeks after the event it reported that this refusal to grant permits “was taken because the three members of the council disapprove of the use of cigarettes and in the belief that Rockford might set an example to other towns.” Whatever the reason, the result was that a “fag can not be purchased in 403 Ordinance No. 287, City of Oskaloosa, Iowa, Ordinance Record No. 4, at 28-29 (Oct. 15, 1923) (copy furnished by Oskaloosa city clerk Marilyn Miller); “Ordinance No. 287,” ODH, Oct. 17, 1923 (5:7).

---

404 Revised Ordinances of the City of Oskaloosa Iowa ch. 46 at 52-53 (1936).

408 The Nays were cast by farmers (Wallace) Talbot and (Elmer) Webster and garage manager (Charles) Elliott; the Ayes by carpenter (Samuel) Lohr and either hardware dealer (Albert) Koerner or salesman (William) Koerner. Since the newspaper did not mention the members’ first names, these identifications presume that the census did not omit other residents with the same last names.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Rockford, but must be smuggled in. 409 Exactly how long the ban was in place is also unknown, but since no permits were applied for, granted or rejected in 1926, but on July 5, 1927 the council, on the motion of two members, issued two permits, at least one of them to the manager of a billiards room, it seems likely that the ban was in effect until 1927. 410

Rockwell

As reported in the press elsewhere in the state, 411 at a special July 4 meeting of the town council of Rockwell—an even smaller town than neighboring Rockford, but a trading center for an extensive farming and animal stock raising district in north-central Iowa 412—called to decide whether to issue permits, the councilmen (including a telegraph operator, a general store owner, and a 54-year-old German without an occupation, who had been a farmer) voted unanimously not to issue any. 413

409“Cigaretts Are Banned by Rockford Council,” EG, July 26, 1921 (3:4). The use of “smuggled” was misleading since the refusal to permit sales did not set any limits on buying cigarettes elsewhere and bringing them to Rockford. A small piece in a Waterloo paper was even less informative. “Cigaretts Not Legalized in Rockford, Ia,” WEC, June 30, 1921 (3:2).

410Telephone interview with Pam, Deputy City Clerk, Rockford (Dec. 20, 2007). The mention in the minutes consisted of a newspaper clipping: “Council Proceedings,” Rockford Register, July 6, 1927 (1:5). According to the deputy clerk, the city council minutes are missing from 1921 through 1925, but the minutes for June and July 1926 contain no reference to cigarette permits. Telephone interview with Pam, Deputy City Clerk, Rockford (Jan. 14, 2008). Oddly, the council proceedings that the Rockford Register published for July 5, 1927 were the only ones it published from 1922 to 1927. One of the permittees, George Dawson, had been returned as the billiards room manager at the 1920 population census. The council also approved the bonds of two other applicants.

411The Rockwell Tribune for 1921 appears no longer to be extant.

412Polk’s Iowa State Gazetteer and Business Directory: 1922-1923, at 777 (Vol. 20, 43rd Year, 1922).

413“Rockwell City Council Forbids Cigaret Sale,” EG, July 5, 1921 (15:5); “No Cigarettes Sold at Rockwell, IA,” Albia Republican, July 7, 1921 (1:5). The occupational information about Sam J. Rankin, Walter L. Williams, and Gerhart A. Block is taken from the 1920 population census; the occupation of one of the other two councilmen, J. H. [F.?] Hillis, who was a business owner, was illegible, while no one corresponding to A. M. Geer was listed. Oddly, according to the Rockwell city clerk, there is no record of a council
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

Shannon City

The “boom” that the railroad brought Shannon City in 1887 lasted until the 1920s, though the southwestern Iowa town’s population peaked at 380 in 1900. At the council’s evening meeting on July 8, 1921, 25-year-old Rev. Clare H. Maple presented a petition signed by an astonishing 109 voters in a town whose population was only 333. The councillors, according to a brief account published directly above a Lucky Strike advertisement in a neighboring town’s weekly, “at once took action,” voting to “sustain the petition so that until a new council is elected next spring, cigarettes cannot be legally sold in this town.”

Shenandoah

Located in the southwestern corner of the state, about 12 miles from the Missouri border, 20 miles from the Missouri River border with Nebraska, and 60 miles from Council Bluffs, Shenandoah, with a population in excess of 5,000, had an industrial base consisting of foundries and machine shops, flour mills, and large brick and tile works, as well as the largest seed house in the West and two of the largest flower and tree nurseries in the United States.

On March 19, 1921, while the legislature was debating repeal or retention of the statewide anti-cigarette law and during the run-up to the city elections in Shenandoah, an information was filed in Shenandoah Superior Court charging “William Manos, the Greek,” with illegally selling cigarettes. The 35-year-old Manos, who had emigrated in 1906 and not yet become a U.S. citizen, owned 414 Union County Iowa History 50-51 (1981).

---

415 “Neighborhood News,” Adams County Union-Republican, July 13, 1921 (2:1). The article gave Maple’s first initial as “S,” but the only Maple in Shannon City according to the 1920 population census was 24-year-old Clare H., a West Virginia pastor living with his sister.
417 “Charge Against Wm. Manos,” T-WS-P (Shenandoah), Mar. 21, 1921 (1:5).
Manos Cafe and Candy Kitchen. The prosecuting witness was 26-year-old James Way, a 26-year-old Kansas-born married laborer with three children. The Tri-Weekly Sentinel-Post, which charged that the law was “generally a dead letter over the state,” predicted that if Manos was convicted, it was “likely that a great many other arrests will follow,” adding sarcastically that “extra jail room” would have to be hired if all violators were arrested. Presumably seeing no way to overcome the prosecuting county attorney’s evidence, Manos immediately pleaded guilty and Judge Frederick Fischer imposed the $25 minimum fine plus costs.

In its next issue, the Republican Sentinel-Post, which had not shied away from intrusively injecting its editorial position into the original report, returned to the subject in a formal editorial. The orthographically shaky editor urged on his readers that the Manos prosecution brought “Shenandoah people face to face with the anamolous [sic] condition of a state law generally a dead letter over the state”—as witnessed by “flagrant[ ]” cigarette smoking by young boys and even “some girls” in Shenandoah and “every other town.” After getting off his chest what by this time had become a cliche about the “travesty” of arresting and fining someone for selling cigarettes to “the boys who acquired the habit under the quasi sanction of the great religious and humanitarian organizations of the country” during World War I, the editor shifted to an innovative criticism of dead-letter laws as giving people the chance to “get even” with enemies by “get[ting] the goods” on them for violating a law that “most everybody else does” too without legal consequences. Without explicitly stating that Manos had fallen victim to such personally selective denunciation, the editor sought to assimilate the target of prosecution for illegal cigarette sales to America’s preeminent racist and ethnic discrimination by declaring that civilized law “will not pick out the Greek in Shenandoah, the Negro in Mississippi and the Japanese in California for punishment for the same things that ten million Americans two three generations from England or Ireland or Sweden are permitted to do.”

The mayor and city council that would have to decide whether to permit cigarette sales in Shenandoah was voted into office at the election on March 28, 1921, which was contested by the Citizens, People’s, and Independent tickets (of 418 1920 Census of Population, Ser. T625, Roll 506, Page 74 (HeritageQuest); SW, Sept. 6, 1921 (7:5-7) (advertisement).

---

420 “Charge Against Wm. Manos,” T-WS-P, Mar. 21, 1921 (1:5). The maximum fine for a first offense was $50. Compiled Code of Iowa § 8868 at 2423 (1919).

2049
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

which the latter gained no seats), “[t]he main issue” being enforcement of Sunday closing laws. The People’s candidate for mayor, incumbent Fred Hackett, took the position that “when you try to compel [sic] people to follow a strict observation of the Sabbath day, and to take pleasures from them in which they, in their own minds, can see no harm, you are pouring oil on the flames of dissatisfied creation.” As far as he was concerned, “it would be far better to permit Sunday Ball Games and clean picture shows to exist than to drive our people to highways and byways and perhaps to other cities where they could find the amusements best suited to their tastes. My way would be to keep them at home with clean amusements, so that they would be fit for their daily tasks when Monday morning came.” That the People’s ticket was not a citadel of secular libertarianism was underscored by Hackett’s support for the “good work” performed by the “Gospel Team” and others “converting these souls to our Master.” Nevertheless, by analogy Hackett could be imagined as opposed to forcing Shenandoahans to travel to other cities to buy cigarettes as well. The Citizens ticket candidate for mayor, George B. Warner, promised to “strive to keep the city as clean and moral as possible” and to “use his best efforts to keep the amusement places clean and free from vice, so that they may be a necessary adjunct to the business life of the city and not a menace.” Though Warner’s rhetoric made the differences among the tickets on this issue difficult to discern, the Citizens ticket could be interpreted as leaning more toward a regulatory than a laissez-faire stance.

The Citizens candidates secured the mayor’s office (Warner, a farmer) and two council seats (J. W. McMichael, president of a farmers supply company, and H[allie]. A. Rawlings, a carpenter), while the People’s ticket gained three of the five council seats (Harry Shurtz, a poultry man, Clarence Welch, a nursery man, and Oscar Rutledge).\(^{426}\) One newspaper characterized the impact of this outcome on ""Sunday Amusements"" as "about an even break,"" with three councilmen favorable to an open Sunday and two advocating a closed Sunday. Nevertheless, the Tri-Weekly Sentinel-Post argued that since the question had been "magnified out of all proportion to its importance in the campaign," it was unlikely that any member of the new council would "take extreme positions" on it.\(^{427}\)
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

The city council—which, as the Sentinel-Post understood, was empowered to "license or reject the plan of licensing"\(^{428}\)—began discussing cigarette permits at its meeting on June 13, but deferred action until all members were present. One local newspaper noted that it was believed that the council would adopt the local licensing option "as it is in the majority of the cities the size of Shenandoah,"\(^{429}\) while another reported the consensus of opinion that the council would issue about four permits.\(^{430}\) The Democratic Shenandoah World—which published its first cigarette advertisement on July 8\(^{431}\)—reported that the council had decided on June 17 to license cigarette sales, but this confused and skimpy account may have been erroneous,\(^{432}\) as revealed by its next report that the council might decide the issue on June 24. In fact, a previous "conference among members" had "left the matter in doubt," with three favoring permits for a limited \(^{426}\)"City Election Will Be Held on Monday on Three Tickets," SW, Mar. 25, 1921 (1:1, at 2:5-7); "Warner Has Majority over Hackett of 16," SW, Mar. 29, 1921 (1:6-7). The occupational information is taken from the population census; no Oscar Rutledge appeared in Iowa in 1920, but in 1910 a 25-year-old by that name was an assistant farm manager in another county. Use of the 1920 census was complicated by a curious error that apparently listed everyone living in Shenandoah as living in the much smaller town of Shambaugh in Page county. The same ticket names were used in the local elections in Grinnell, Mayor McIlrath of the Citizens ticket leading the cause against permits. What the press meant by the statement that "the election resulted in a one-sided ticket having the majority of the members on the city council" is unclear. "Council Learns Shenandoah’s Debt Is Now $308,500," SW, Apr. 8, 1921 (1:3).

\(^{428}\)"Change Plumbers License," T-WS-P, June 13, 1921 (1:5).

\(^{429}\)"City Council Meets," SW, June 14, 1921 (6:4). By June 13 it is very unlikely that most same-sized cities had made any decision, let alone that this newspaper would have known whether they had in fact.

\(^{430}\)"Council Has Taken No Action," T-WS-P, June 15, 1921 (1:5).

\(^{431}\)"Council Selects New Fire Chief," SW, June 21, 1921 (1:4). Not only did the article fail to disclose the vote, but it conflated the state law and the council’s purported action.
number of merchants and two “disfavoring the idea.” Unsurprisingly, several of Shenandoah’s “leading merchants” requested that they be among the chosen few in case this proposal were limited, their reputations lending credence to their law-abidingness. The council’s failure to issue any licenses, the World commented, would “result in thousands of dollars each year being sent out of the city to procure smokes” by residents. Presumably in order to take advantage of such failure, Council Bluffs, Omaha, and other cities were reportedly monitoring the council’s decision. The council did formally, albeit tentatively, act on June 24, in the presence of a local WCTU delegation, which presented a petition signed by an impressive 480 voters requesting that no permits be issued in Shenandoah. In the WCTU’s immediate presence, following lengthy discussion, the council by a 3 (McMichael, Welch, and Rawlings) to 2 (Rutledge and Shurtz) vote rejected the only application that had been submitted. To be sure, the vote appears not to have been a principled decision since the press observed that the council would probably have further opportunities to act on other applications. Whether Welch would continue to vote with the Citizens ticket against his People’s ticket colleagues remained to be seen.

The possibility that smoking residents of Shenandoah would have to leave town to buy cigarettes triggered diametrically opposed value judgments in the press. A weekly in neighboring Adams county observed that “if the Shenandoah users want to make a ‘stink’ in that town and color their fingers a creamy yellow, they will have to get the ‘paint’ some place else.” The editorial writer of the Times-Republican, published in Bedford, the county seat of neighboring Taylor county, viewed the council members as having “laid down the bars for their young men to either send their money to neighboring towns or burn up $5.00 worth of gasoline making trips to Missouri or to towns who are permitted to sell the ‘coffin nails.’” Committed to a narrow economic framework, the perplexed paper asked: “What will Shenandoah profit by closing the door on the sale of cigarettes when almost every town surrounding it will be permitted to sell?” As far as it was concerned, “[t]he best way to handle the ‘weed’” was licensure 433“Council May Decide on License Issue,” SW, June 24, 1921 (1:3). See also “No Cigarettes in Shenandoah,” Boyden Reporter, July 7, 1921 (8:4). “Divided on Cigarette Sales,” T-WS-P, June 17, 1921 (1:2), had reported earlier that the council was “divided on the propriety of issuing” cigarette permits.

434“City Council Says No Cigaret Sales Will Be Licensed,” T-WS-P, June 27, 1921 (1:1); “To Discuss Oil and Cigarette Cases,” SW, June 28, 1921 (1:2); “Shenandoah Bars Cigarette Sales,” CBN, June 28, 1921 (10:3).

435“Neighboring News,” Adams County Free Press, July 16, 1921 (1:1).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

combined with the appointment of enforcers “who are not users.....” 436 Though the latter point was meritorious as far as it went, it nevertheless failed to deal with the ever-present issue of ubiquitous role-modeling for emulation by minors.

For reasons that the press did not explain, the council’s 3 to 2 vote against permits shifted to favoring them, as Welch switched sides (realigning himself with the other People’s ticket members) at the meeting on July 1, when the council voted to grant permits to six applicants, including owners of two candy stores (one of whom was none other than Manos, the confessed transgressor under the old law), two cafes, a cigar store, and the Elks lodge. However, the shift was trumped when Mayor George Warner vetoed the resolution. 437 With four votes required to pass the resolution over the veto, the press speculatively concluded that unless another opponent of cigarette sales changed his vote, they would be unlawful in Shenandoah. 438 When the applicants’ lawyer declared that he would secure a court order compelling the council to issue the permits, the Sentinel-Post (which two days later inaugurated publication of cigarette advertising), 439 playing legal expert, incorrectly characterized the law as “specifying] that the council shall pass separately upon each applicant for a permit and may grant or reject the same.” The paper then proceeded to conjecture that: “The theory of the law probably is that the discretion of the council is simply as to the general qualifications or fitness of the applicant and does not contemplate the rejection of permits in toto.” However, the article understood that even this restrictive approach could bring about the latter outcome anyway because “the council may reject all applications one by one as they are presented....” And although it significantly overestimated the urgency (“very soon”) of judicial intervention, the Sentinel-Post did correctly predict that the question would probably be tested in the courts because Shenandoah’s dispute would doubtless be replicated in other cities and towns. 440 In the meantime, the likelihood that for some time cigarettes could not be sold lawfully in Shenandoah prompted a cafe in Essex, a smaller town six miles away, to take out a large ad in the Sentinel-Post calling attention to the cigarette brands that it was selling. 441

At the meeting on July 13, with “[t]he cigarette question still occup[ying] the leading place in city activities,” 442 after the six applications that had been 436“No Cigarettes,” Times-Republican (Bedford), July 7, 1921 (4:3) (edit.).

439T-WS-P, July 6, 1921 (3:4-6) (Camel).
441T-WS-P, July 8, 1921 (4:1-3) (Model Cafe).
442“Mayor Again Vetoes Permits to Dealers to Sell Cigarets,” T-WS-P, July 15, 1921
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

presented at the previous meeting were again presented to the council, the members once again voted 3 to 2 in favor of granting permits, and the mayor again vetoed each such motion. To be sure, lawyers in Shenandoah were uncertain as to the veto’s legality and the city government awaited an opinion from the state attorney general.\(^{443}\) The local press framed the question in terms of whether mayors could veto cigarette permit actions of city councils which, according Governor Kendall, had “discretionary power” over the matter.\(^ {444}\) In the meantime, as the out-of-town press reported under the headline, “Shenandoah Has Battle over Fags,” one of the lawyers for the would-be cigarette sellers notified the city clerk that unless he issued the permits by a certain hour, the attorney would “start mandamus proceedings against him personally on the theory that the city clerk is a creature of the council and must obey the wish of the council.”\(^ {445}\) The clerk, however, decided not to act until an opinion was issued by the attorney general,\(^ {446}\) who announced that he had received similar questions from other towns, on all of which he would probably provide an opinion at the same time.\(^ {446}\)

In any event, the Shenandoah Superior Court would not decide the applicants’ mandamus action and therefore no lawful cigarette sales could take place until the court’s next term began on August 3.\(^ {447}\) In turn, the council majority that voted to issue permits was rumored to have decided not to fund the clerk’s legal defense, though an alternative source of funding was also said to be available.\(^ {448}\)

On August 2, Attorney General Gibson responded to the question posed by the Page County Attorney as to whether the mayor of Shenandoah had a right to veto the motion passed by a 3 to 2 city council majority to grant cigarette sales permits. Noting that the new cigarette sales statute did not prescribe any procedure for city councils to follow, Gibson pointed out that in fact councils had been using three methods: ordinances, resolutions, or motions duly recorded. Whereas the last mentioned did not, by judicial precedent, require any mayoral approval, the Iowa Code required councils to pass ordinances and resolutions \(^ {443}\)“Vote on Cigarettes,” \textit{SW}, July 15, 1921 (1:2).

---

\(^ {444}\)“Cigaret Hearing Tomorrow,” \textit{T-WS-P}, July 18, 1921 (8:3).

\(^ {445}\)“Shenandoah Has Battle over Fags,” \textit{EG}, July 19, 1921 (7:2). The same article also ran under a different title: “Shenandoah Has Hot Cigaret Fight,” \textit{WEC}, July 18, 1921 (7:6-7).

\(^ {446}\)“Cigaret Hearing Tomorrow,” \textit{T-WS-P}, July 18, 1921 (8:3).

\(^ {447}\)“Cigarette Sales in City Will Not be Decided Until August 3,” \textit{T-WS-P}, July 20, 1921 (1:2).

\(^ {448}\)“Council May Refuse Attorney Fees to Fight ‘Cig’ Case,” \textit{SW}, Aug. 2, 1921 (1:1).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

over vetoes by at least a two-thirds majority. Since the mayor had vetoed a resolution, his action was valid, but in the meantime the judge held a hearing in the case against the city clerk. As the local press observed, however, Judge Frederick Fischer’s decision would “have but little bearing upon the final outcome, for if the three councilmen favoring the applicants for permits pass a simple motion to grant the permits the mayor cannot veto the action and it would appear that the applicants will therefore win their claim if the three councilmen stick to their former position.” Judge Fischer finally issued his decision on August 26, upholding the mayor’s veto and denying the writ of mandamus without explanation.

In the wake of the ruling vindicating the council in sustaining the executive veto of the permits, the lid was “clamped down” on sales. The next phase in “Shenandoah’s ‘cigaret war’” opened a week later, on September 3, when the deputy sheriff raided several confectionary stores, securing a large number of cigarettes from the businesses of two applicants, the recidivist William Manos and Tom Atherton (the owner of Candyland), which they had allegedly been selling without permits. Superior Court Judge Fisher was also to be in charge of their trial on charges of unlawful selling. It is unclear whether the Sentinel-Post’s editor was now satisfied that the authorities had unambiguously plumped for enforcement.

With two competitors facing charges, the prohibitory regime’s longevity appeared solid enough that on September 6 Zurmuehlin & Gunnoode Smoke House in Council Bluffs (about 60 miles away) published a large advertisement in the Shenandoah World with the following text:

CIGARETTES

You needn’t be without them.

---

450 “Cigarette Veto by Mayor Valid,” SW, Aug. 9, 1921 (1:2).

453 “Cigaret Stocks of Two Dealers Now at City Hall,” Shenandoah Tri-Weekly Sentinel-Post, Sept. 5, 1921 (1:1). The version of this article that appeared as “Officers Raid Alleged ‘Pill’ Bootleggers,” WT-T, Sept. 9, 1921 (1:1), confusingly got the date of the raid wrong.
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

We have them in any quantity you want.
We will send them by mail to you.
Just enclose a money order for the quantity you want, send your name and address, and the brand you want, and you’ll have them in a jiffy.

KEEP YOUR MONEY IN IOWA EVEN THOUGH IT MUST LEAVE SHENANDOAH

Remember, just an order, and you can smoke.\(^{454}\)

This solicitation (by Louis Zurmuehlen, the mayor of Council Bluffs, who two years later was investigated by a grand jury for selling cigarettes without stamps)\(^{455}\) not only presupposed the continuing existence of the prohibition on cigarette sales in Shenandoah, but also hinged on the hope that townspeople’s Iowa commercial pride would deter them from driving a dozen miles to the Missouri border to stock up. And although this outcome was presumably not intended by the Council Bluffs merchants, at a special meeting the very next day, September 7, the city council granted permits to three of the original six applicants (Edwards Brothers, Oviatt & Son, and the Elks Club), the three People’s councilmen, Rutledge, Shurtz, and Welch, voting for and Citizens ticket councilmen McMichael and Rawlings against each application. Although Mayor Warner gave notice that he would veto the council’s actions, under the attorney general’s opinion the veto power did not extend to the procedural vehicle of a “simple motion,”\(^{456}\) which, not requiring the mayor’s approval, was thus immune to his veto.\(^{457}\) Despite this defeat the mayor nevertheless gained the praise of the local WCTU for his stand.\(^{458}\) On September 22 the council then granted permits

\(^{454}\)SW, Sept. 6, 1921 (7:5-7)

\(^{456}\)“Cigaret Dealers at Last Granted Selling Permits,” T-WS-P, Sept. 9, 1921 (1:1).

\(^{457}\)“Mayor’s Hands Tied Is Ruling in Cigaret War at Shenandoah,” EG, Sept. 13, 1921 (3:7); “Shenandoah Loses Big Cigaret Fight,” CRR, Sept. 14, 1921 (10:5). For still later and more abbreviated accounts in weeklies, see “Iowa News” in Humeston New Era, Sept. 21, 1921 (5:5); Lytton Star, Sept. 22, 1921 (6:1); Oxford Mirror, Sept. 29, 1921 (9:7). After the legislature in 1924 had prescribed “resolution” as the sole procedure for issuing permits, the dispute as it had unfolded in Shenandoah could no longer be replicated. Iowa Code § 1557 (1924).

\(^{458}\)“Commends Mayor’s Stand,” T-WS-P, Sept. 12, 1921 (1:5).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s to Atherton and one cigar store, while voting on, but not granting a permit459 to cigar maker, because Rutledge deserted his co-People’s ticket colleagues to join Rawlings and McMichael, who had voted “steadily against all permits.”460
Although, or perhaps precisely because, the anti-cigarette movement had lost the selling war in Shenandoah and greater availability was anticipated, a few days later the school superintendent announced that any pupil found with any form of tobacco on his person would be suspended for three days and for a second offense “expelled...for good.”461 Thus ended the “Cigaret War at Shenandoah.”462

Winterset

The county seat of Madison county—which may have had the state’s highest per capita WCTU membership, which had vigorously and concordantly opposed the Dodd bill463—Winterset was surrounded by extensive farming and livestock-raising operations.464 A few months later it engaged in a see-saw struggle over permits, for which by June 29 only three applicants (two drugstores and a restaurant) had applied.465 At its crucial meeting on the night of July 5, the city council received petitions protesting licensure from the WCTU, the Methodist, Presbyterian, United Presbyterian, and Baptist churches, and Church of Christ, the YMCA, and the ministerial association. With the council vote split 2 to 2, the mayor cast the deciding vote against issuing permits to any of the four applicants.466 However, at the next council meeting held two days later, more 459“Candyland Granted Cigarette License,” SW, Sept. 23, 1921 (1:6). Atherton, the owner of Candyland, the next day published a large advertisement touting its home-made candies and sanitary candy kitchen without mentioning the commodity it was newly authorized to sell. SW, Sept. 23, 1921 (6:5-7). Why Atherton’s application was approved but not Manos’s is unclear as is the outcome of the charges against them for selling without a permit.

460“Grant Two More Licenses,” T-WS-P, Sept. 23, 1921 (1:4). The rejected applicant was William Tomlin.

461“Put a Ban on Smoking,” SW, Sept. 30, 1921 (1:1).

462“Mayor’s Hands Tied Is Ruling in Cigaret War at Shenandoah,” EG, Sept. 13, 1921
(3:7).

463See above ch. 15.

464Polk’s Iowa State Gazetteer and Business Directory: 1922-1923, at 938 (Vol. 20, 43rd Year, 1922).

466“Cigaretts Turned Down,” WM, July 6, 1921 (1:1).
City Councils that Perpetuated Cigarette Sales Bans in the 1920s and 1930s

petitions were presented, this time also by those favoring licensure, who secured theirs “after the petitions signed at the close of Sunday church service” had been submitted at the previous session. The press failed to identify the backgrounds of those urging licensure, merely noting that many who disapproved of the use of cigarettes and acknowledged their injuriousness nevertheless doubted that prohibiting any form of tobacco to adults would be successful. In the event, one of the two council members who had voted Nay—Charles Christensen, a 42-year-old plumber with his own shop who had emigrated from Denmark as a child—for reasons unexplained in news accounts, changed his vote to Aye, thus producing a 3 to 1 vote for issuing permits and ending Winterset’s two-day old ban.467

467“Council Reverses on Cigarets,” WM, July 13, 1921 (1:5). The Nay-voting councilman who did not change his vote, 46-year-old Earnest Hiatt, was county engineer. The two consistent Aye-voters were Albert Rees, a 53-year-old blacksmith, and (apparently) Edward or Will Davis, both of whom were laborers. The occupational information is taken from the 1920 population census. There is a confusion of dates in the two newspaper articles: the first article, which appeared on Wednesday July 6, spoke of the first meeting as having taken place “last night” (Tuesday July 5), whereas the second article, which appeared on Wednesday July 13, referred to the first meeting as having taken place the previous Wednesday (July 6) and the second meeting the previous Thursday (July 7). If the dates mentioned in the second article are correct, then the ban had lasted only one day. A blurb in an out-of-town weekly stated that the first meeting had taken place on Tuesday. “Neighborhood News,” Adams County Free Press (Corning), July 16, 1921 (1:1).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales: The Anti-Chain Store (and Especially Anti-Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company) Battle

With cigarettes being sold by chain grocery stores at a price which it is impossible for the merchants handling only tobacco products to meet.¹

MR. JONES: Does your state compel the municipality to issue the license?

MR. HAWSE: It does not.²

The resistance in the later 1920s and 1930s to permitting the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company to sell cigarettes in various Iowa cities such as Perry, Waterloo, and Iowa City was part and parcel of a nationwide struggle between small independent retail tobacco dealers and the “world’s largest retail organization,”³ the number of whose stores, already at 14,000 in 1925, increased by 1933 to 16,000,⁴ and whose sales for the fiscal year ending February 28, 1930, exceeded a billion dollars.⁵ That A & P was the flash point for disputes over cigarette permits was hardly fortuitous: by the early 1930s it had for several years been selling not only one-tenth of all the food sold at retail in the United States, but also tens of billions of cigarettes. These facts together with the company’s 90,000 employees prompted Fortune to launch this extravagant praise: “If a communistic government, aided and abetted by the toploftiest ‘planned economists’ alive, should set out to devise the most efficient food distribution ¹Chas D. Barney & Co., The Tobacco Industry: Annual Review for 1928, at 23.

²Report of Proceedings: Fourth Annual Conference of Administrators of Tobacco Tax Laws: November 19-20, 1930, at 64. H. M. Jones was a field agent of the Alabama Tobacco Tax Department; W. E. Hawse was the superintendent of the Iowa Cigarette Revenue Department in Iowa.
⁵A. & P. Company Sales for Year $1,053,692,882,” WDC, Apr. 18, 1930 (2:8).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales system and should produce anything half so effective as the Great A & P, the Supreme Food Dictator would command the headlines of the world. In all Soviet Russia there is no division of production or distribution which even in the crude matter of size can compare with the Great A & P.”

Regardless of the Stalinist Soviet Union’s alleged envy, A & P stood at the center of the anti-chain store movement’s protest against the concentration of capital and its impact on economic democracy.7

A study conducted by the Federal Trade Commission during the last week in December 1928 revealed that cigarettes were the commodity on which grocery store and drug store chains showed the greatest losses in terms of selling prices below their total costs (14.0 percent and 26.2 percent, respectively).8 The dispute in Iowa City reflected in part a larger, indeed nationwide, cigarette war between chain grocery stores (preeminently A & P) and chain tobacco retail organizations (primarily the United Cigar Stores Corporation, of which the Duke interests were co-owners, and the second largest firm, Schulte Retail Stores Corporation),9 which local independent dealers feared would destroy them. The latter complained that chain stores were using cigarettes as loss leaders,10 selling them below cost, as the head of the Independent Retail Tobacconists of America put it in New York in 1929, “as a means of bringing people into their stores in order to sell them profitable lines of other goods.” With the list price of cigarettes at 12 cents a pack for small dealers, who were expected to sell them at two for 25 cents, the economic ruin of 400,000 cigar dealers loomed since they were unable to withstand the “unfair competition” of the chains, which could sustain selling 8Federal Trade Commission, Chain Stores: Chain Store Leaders and Loss Leaders tab. 22 at 44, and tab. 25 at 47 (Sen. Doc. No. 51, 72d Cong., 1st Sess. 1932). The FTC reported that “loss leader” included commodities sold below net invoice cost, net purchasing cost, net manufacturing cost, or even the usual mark-up. Id. at viii.

9Recent Economic Changes in the United States: Report of the Committee on Recent Economic Changes, of the President’s Conference on Unemployment 1:366 (1929); “Retailers Aroused by Cigarette War,” NYT, May 21, 1929 (30). On earlier (unsuccessful) efforts to merge the two chains, see “United Cigar Plans to Buy Schulte Co.,” NYT, Oct. 27, 1921 (1).

below cost, whereas small stores found even the 4 percent profit rate unsustainable. These periodic price reductions were in part designed by the cigarette manufacturing oligopolies to undermine competition from manufacturers of cheap 10-cent cigarettes, whose share of total cigarette sales skyrocketed from 0.26 percent in January to 22.78 percent by November 1932, but dropped back down to 6.43 percent by May 1933 in the wake of A & P’s reduction of its selling price to 10 cents. A & P’s large and widespread impact on retail price structures enabled the cigarette oligopolists to use it as “a price-cutting instrumentality,” in connection with which from 1930 to 1933 the oligopolists paid the chain more than $2.5 million for window and counter displays and sales cooperation. In view of A & P’s central role in the oligopolies’ pricing strategy, Iowa municipalities’ denial of permits to the chain stores under their jurisdiction was tantamount to a counterattack by small local sellers on the giant manufacturers.

Remarkably, the city councils of the four cities forced into litigation over the question of their power to deny cigarette sales permit had put up no resistance to issuing them at the outset of licensure in 1921.

Perry (1928)

The power to grant permits for the sale of cigarettes is a matter of public interest. The public interest is against the sale and use of cigarettes and therefore opposed to the granting of such permits. Construing the word “may” as favorable to the public interest, it must be construed as permissive and discretionary in application.

---

11“Retailers Aroused by Cigarette War,” NYT, May 21, 1929 (30).
15American Tobacco Co. v United States, 147 F.2d 93, 106 (6th Cir. 1944).
17Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 8-9, Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

On July 11, 1921, a week after the new cigarette law had gone into effect, the city council of Perry, the state’s thirtieth largest town, with a population in 1920 of 5,600, located near Des Moines, and the center of an important agricultural district with some farm-related industries in addition to cigar and washing machine factories, passed a boilerplate cigarette ordinance. The ordinance had been passed at the previous meeting, but Mayor Adrian Cross, for reasons that he had stated, but that neither the city clerk in her Certificate of Passage of Ordinance over Refusal of Mayor to Sign Same nor the Perry Daily Chief revealed, vetoed it.

Cross (1868-1924) had been publisher and editor of various newspapers before becoming Perry city clerk in 1904, a post that he held until 1923 except for the year and a half he was mayor. Throughout his career he was also extensively involved in various charities and was a long-time Presbyterian Sunday school teacher and superintendent.

Cross’s veto message (“Mayor’s Objections”) of July 5, which he filed with the clerk and is attached to the council minutes, was read by the clerk to the council on its instruction at the July 11 meeting. A unique document in the 1921 post-repeal permit process, it deserves full quotation:

I cannot sign the cigarette ordinance for the following reasons:

First. Because there is no good reason for the use of cigarettes, and furthermore they are exceedingly offensive to the person who does not smoke.

Second. The smoking of cigarettes in restaurants and hotels and other public places, where ladies are present, is being permitted to the extent of becoming a very serious nuisance.

Third. Not only is the cigarette habit very pronounced among young men and boys, but is reaching out to women and girls which is a most deplorable fact.

Fourth. I can see no good reason why cigarette permits should be issued promiscuously to everyone who makes application, merely as a revenue producing proposition. The number of permits should be limited (since the Council have the matter in hand), and the sales confined to the proper places and under the more favorable...
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales conditions.

Fifth. The new cigarette law delegates all the powers to the City Council, so that the Mayor has no voice in the matter, up to the point of signing the Ordinance. I cannot therefore consistently sign my name to an Ordinance that would legalize the sale of cigarettes in Perry.\(^{22}\)

Interestingly, the first reason that Cross, who was not a member of a church that programmatically or doctrinally banned smoking,\(^{23}\) offered for objecting to the issuance of permits was the extreme offense that cigarette smoking caused nonsmokers in general. In second place he listed the nuisance it caused women. Then shifting focus, he drew attention to the increase in smoking by females that increased availability of cigarettes would bring about. Finally, taking a reformist tack, he proposed that, instead of quasi-automatically issuing permits to everyone who met the minimal formal statutory requirements merely in order to raise revenue for the city, the council cap the number of permits and formulate criteria for identifying the sales locations (and presumably sellers) that would give rise to less destructive consequences.

After the mayor’s objections were read, the council—which consisted of an eye doctor, grain elevator manager, feed store merchant, grocery store clerk, and auto salesman\(^{24}\)—passed it over the mayor’s veto by a vote of 4 to 0\(^{25}\) “without discussion or argument.”\(^{26}\) By the same vote the council then issued permits to 13 applicants,\(^{27}\) including the owners of two restaurants, a cigar store, two drug stores, and a billiard hall.\(^{28}\) From 1922-23 to 1928-29 Perry issued between 14

\(^{22}\)Adjourned Regular Meeting of the City Council at 170 (July 11, 1921) (copy furnished by Perry City Clerk Jeanette Peddicord).

\(^{23}\)Cross listed himself as a Presbyterian for the state census. Iowa Census 1915: Dallas County, Card No. B136.

\(^{24}\)The members were B. Roy Emms, Charles A. Etnire, David Hall, Leo Dignan, and E. J. Haupert. Eugene Hastie, History of Perry, Iowa 135 (n.d. [1962]). Edward J. Haupert was not listed in the 1920 population census, but did appear in the 1915 Iowa census, Dallas County, Card No. 71. Etnire’s occupation is illegible, but his occupation from 1910 is used here. Dignan operated the grocery store after his father’s death in 1926. Eugene Hastie, History of Perry, Iowa 144-45 (n.d. [1962]).

\(^{25}\)Adjourned Regular Meeting of the City Council at 171 (July 11, 1921) (copy furnished by Perry City Clerk Jeanette Peddicord). Dignan was absent and did not vote.

\(^{26}\)Council Issues Permits to Sell Cigarettes,” PDC, July 12, 1921 (1:1).

\(^{27}\)Adjourned Regular Meeting of the City Council at 172 (July 11, 1921) (copy furnished by Perry City Clerk Jeanette Peddicord).

\(^{28}\)Council Issues Permits to Sell Cigarettes,” PDC, July 12, 1921 (1:1). See also “Perry Licenses Sale of Cigarets,” Des Moines Sunday Capital, July 17, 1921 (12:7).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Unfortunately, the 1920 population census did not permit unambiguous identification of the other permit holders. 29 Judicially cognizable problems developed in February 1928, when the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company applied for a permit for its grocery store in Perry, which its manager was “in a hurry” to obtain, 30 presumably because the store had not been in a position to sell cigarettes lawfully since its opening in January 1927. 31 A & P’s involvement in this test litigation was hardly fortuitous: after all, the company was “[t]he largest purchaser of cigarettes in the United States.” 32 By 1934, A & P’s purchases accounted for 5.04 percent of all cigarettes produced in the United States—more than 50 percent more than the next five grocery chains combined. 33 A & P’s share also exceeded the 4.6 percent accounted for by the three largest drug and tobacco chains (United Cigar Stores, Schulte Retail Stores Corporation, and United Drug Company, which operated Louis K. Liggett & Company stores). 34

After the manager had paid the requisite mulct tax and posted the proper bond, the city clerk interviewed all but one of the city council members, and, forming the belief that they were “favorable,” issued the permit. Since the council had never acted on the application, let alone issued the permit by the statutorily prescribed procedure of a resolution, the clerk lacked authority to issue it and her action was without legal effect, although A & P suffered no harm, since it actually was able to sell cigarettes pursuant to the permit during the entire term and 17 permits annually. 29

29 Calculated by dividing the permit tax revenue by the $75 fee. See the various issues of Report on Municipal Finances cited above ch. 19.

31 Eugene Hastie, History of Perry, Iowa 154 (n.d [1962]).

33 Report of the Federal Trade Commission on Agricultural Income Inquiry, Part III: Supplementary Report tab. 27 and 28 at 143, 145 (1938). Although it did not reveal absolute dollar amounts, according to an internal cigarette company document on A & P sales from 1930 to 1932, Camel cigarettes accounted for between 24 and 44 percent of the chain’s cigarette sales, while Lucky Strike and Chesterfield accounted for between 36 and 40 percent and 20 and 25 percent, respectively. Sales of Cigarettes in A and P Stores (Feb. 20, 1933), Bates No. 502407226 of its alleged validity.\textsuperscript{35}

In June 1928, as the permit period was approaching its expiration, the manager apparently realized that A & P would need a valid permit and therefore filed an application together with the required bond and tax. But while denying A & P’s application, the council granted “most, if not all, the other applications,”\textsuperscript{36} prompting A & P, on August 24, 1928, to file a mandamus action against the City of Perry, the mayor, the five council members,\textsuperscript{37} and the city clerk in Dallas county district court,\textsuperscript{38} alleging that the council had acted arbitrarily in denying the company a permit and seeking a writ directing the defendants to grant the plaintiff the permit. A & P’s principal claim was that since it had not violated the law before filing its application, “the council had no discretion, but was under legal obligation to issue the permit.”\textsuperscript{39}

\textsuperscript{35}Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v. City of Perry, Iowa at 1 (No. 11,777, Dallas Cty Dist. Ct., Nov. 2, 1928).

\textsuperscript{36}Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v. City of Perry, Iowa at 1 (No. 11,777, Dallas Cty Dist. Ct., Nov. 2, 1928). It is unclear when the council denied the application. According to the minutes of the special session on July 24, the council, which had not discussed the matter at its special session on July 6, tabled the matter of A & P’s application until the next regular meeting. Perry City Council [Minutes], July 6 and July 24, 1928 at 383 (copy furnished by Perry city clerk). The council postponed the discussion until the next regular meeting when all members were present because two members had been absent. “Council Attacks Sewer Problem at Special Session,” \textit{PDC}, July 25, 1928 (1:5). All members were present at the called session of August 1, but the subject was not raised; two members were absent from the regular session on August 6, when the subject was also not discussed. Perry City Council [Minutes], Aug. 1 and Aug. 6, 1928 at 384 (copy furnished by Perry city clerk). Two detailed articles published on the August 14 regular meeting did not mention the issue. “Council Discusses Heat for Building” and “Damages Asked by Building Owner from City Council,” \textit{PDC}, Aug. 15, 1928 (1:2, 5). The next regular meeting was scheduled for September, but A & P filed its action on August 24.

\textsuperscript{37}The members were Barney Archer (marble works), Clinton A. Knee (carpenter), Adelbert M. Thornburg (real estate agent), C. B. Allshouse (carpenter), and Albert S. Kibby (washing machine factory owner/manager). Eugene Hastie, \textit{History of Perry, Iowa} 136, 192-93 (n.d. [1962]); 1920 Census of Population.

\textsuperscript{38}Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v. City of Perry, Iowa (No. 11,777, Dallas Cty Dist. Ct., Nov. 2, 1928), Appearance Docket, Judgment Docket and Fee Book, A-9, at 90. A & P’s lawyer, George J. Dugan, was a leading figure in the Iowa Democratic party and a delegate to the 1928 Democratic National Convention. Edgar Harlan, \textit{A Narrative History of the People of Iowa} 3:291-92 (1931).

\textsuperscript{39}Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v. City of Perry, Iowa at 1 (No. 11,777, Dallas Cty Dist. Ct., Nov. 2, 1928).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

It is unclear whether the parties or the court was aware of the fact that on December 5, 1927, the treasurer of state had requested an opinion from the Iowa attorney general regarding these two questions:

“1. Can a Board of Supervisors or a City or Town Council, where they have granted permits to some persons, refuse to grant a cigarette permit to others?
   “2. In refusing to grant a cigarette permit, can the Board of Supervisors, City, or Town Council, be compelled to furnish or give a reason why said permit was refused?”

The attorney general, who replied four days later, did not reveal (and perhaps was himself not familiar with) the context in which the questions had arisen—not even as to whether the treasurer was himself reacting to an inquiry or merely hypothetically raising the issue on his own. The attorney general’s brief, one-sentence, opinion was based on section 1557 of the Iowa Code, which, in pertinent part, merely provided that a “permit may be granted by resolution of the council of any city or town...and when so granted, may be issued by the clerk of such city or town.” Without engaging in jurisprudential exegesis or offering any explanation as to how he had arrived at his conclusions, the attorney general simply asserted that: “In view of the language used in the above section we are of the opinion that the granting of a cigarette permit by either a board or city council is absolutely discretionary, and they may refuse to grant a permit and are not compelled to give any reason therefor.”

Regardless of what District Judge W. S. Cooper may have known of similar disputes elsewhere in Iowa, he conceded that “all laws and ordinances must operate with equality”; he was even willing to acknowledge that “probably it is true that the discretion vested in the council is not an arbitrary discretion, but rather a legal discretion, but he nevertheless found that “the record does not sustain the contention of plaintiff’s council [sic] that the council was coerced by other cigarette dealers into refusing this permit.” Rather, the evidence showed that after discussing the matter the council decided to grant no permits to grocery stores to sell

---

41Iowa Code § 1557 (1927).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

cigarettes. It seems to me that this was a matter within its discretion. At one time the sale of cigarettes was prohibited; then it was allowed under the restriction that none should be sold until after a permit to do so had been granted by the council. If the council has no discretion in the latter, then the Chapter in relation to this amounts to little.44

Since statutes prohibiting the sale of liquor in certain places such as grocery stores or hotels had been upheld by courts, Judge Cooper reasoned that at the very least “[s]urely some discretion rests with the council as to the places where cigarettes may be sold.” On the other hand, the most that he would concede (counterfactually and speculatively) to A & P was that if its “place of business had been singled out for a denial, such denial might possibly not be upheld unless there was some particular reason therefor, but when the denial of the right extends to all engaged in similar business then no abuse of discretion is shown for that reason alone.”45 Without deciding what obligation the council may have had to explain its reasons, the judge guessed at some plausible ones, some of which, significantly, might also have applied to adults:

Children patronize grocery stores more than other places of business; grocery stores as a rule do more credit business than drug stores, grocery stores deliver goods, more freedom is usually allowed in going about the merchandise in grocery stores than in other stores. All of these reasons and perhaps others might have been in the minds of the council. In the absence of some showing of wrongful motive, the discretion of the council should not be interfered with by the Court.46

Even more remarkable than Judge Cooper’s failure to cite any judicial precedents for the conclusions in his brief and typo-studded ruling47 was the lack of any concrete rootedness in the cigarette sales statute: not only did he not seek to parse the meaning and scope of the legislature’s grant of discretion to local governments, but he appeared to be ignorant of the direct connection, relevance and significance of the legislative history for the question of the extent of city councils’ home rule powers. Although A & P excepted to the ruling,48 it does not 47The local paper’s assertion that the “three page ruling...was a long one” was curious: it was about 55 lines. “Verdict for City in License Case,” PDC, Nov. 5, 1928 (1:5).

48Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v. City of Perry, Iowa at 2 (No. 11,777, appear to have filed an appeal; in any event, the Iowa Supreme Court did not rule on it. But when that Court finally did resolve the same question three times in 1932-33, the statute and legislative history played a central role.

The Iowa Attorney General, apparently during the final two months of 1928, appended a footnote to his aforementioned opinion to the Treasurer of State: “So held in Great A. & P. Tea Co. vs. City of Perry, Dallas Co. Dist. Court, 1928.” Although the assertion that Judge Cooper had held that the city council had the absolute discretion to grant or deny a permit (that the Attorney General had read the statute as conferring) was an exaggeration, the Supreme Court’s superseding decisions soon created or confirmed precisely such a power.

In the meantime, predictably—in view of A & P’s central importance for cigarette sales and vice versa—A & P did not abandon its efforts to sell cigarettes in Perry. On July 7, 1930, the chain once again presented a request for a permit to the city council, which discussed the question, which had become “touchy” since the previous litigation, for more than half an hour, as two A & P representatives from Des Moines were afforded time to state the company’s reasons for the request. In the course of the discussion “[i]t was intimated that the number of permits in the city was already too high numbering 18 which is more than the number allowed in several Iowa towns of this size or larger. Because of the unusually large number already issued it was not considered that more were needed.” These grounds replicated the “opposition to the promiscuous granting of permits...organized by certain organizations” in some other towns. Acutely aware, especially since the district court’s ruling two years earlier, that the state law conferred on the council “full authority in the issuance of permits,” which made the members “privileged to grant or refuse permits as they desire,” they unanimously passed a motion to table the application (along with one by another grocery, Snowball Market), which “constituted a refusal to grant the license....”

Although the city of Perry collected cigarette mulct taxes amounting to $1,462 in 1930-31, 1931-32, and 1932-33, and then $1,106 in 1933-34, suggesting (at $75

---

49 Seventeenth Biennial Report of the Attorney General for the Biennial Period Ending December 31, 1928, at 273. Since the Attorney General’s opinion was dated Dec. 9, 1927, it could not possibly have relied on the A & P case, which did not even arise until mid-1928.

50 Council Refuses Grocery Stores Cigaret Permits,” PDC, July 8, 1930 (1:8).

Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales per permit) a total of 20 and then 15 outstanding permits, the council appears not to have granted a permit to A & P during those years or even as late as 1938 and 1939.52

Waterloo (1930)

“May” Means “Must” 53

Despite its defeat in Perry, by no means did A & P acquiesce in efforts by city councils to deny it the privilege of selling cigarettes. In Waterloo, the state’s seventh largest city with a population just shy of 46,000, though the total number of cigarette permits outstanding was plentiful, the taxes they generated for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, nevertheless accounted for only $10,300 of the city’s total receipts of more than $1.6 million. 54 The A & P stores there did have permits in 1928 and 1929 but “allowed them to lapse.” 55 A & P applied for permits in February 1928 and the council granted all five; 56 in April the council, without objection, received A & P’s application for renewal of cigarette permits and placed them on file, 58 and two months later, at its mid-year session, approved five permits for the same store locations. 59 At its mid-year session in 1929, the Waterloo city council approved all of the almost hundred applications for permits with “but one exception”—A & P’s, which were tabled. 60 The parties later 55 A & P appears not to have been issued permits in 1927: it was not listed among the applicants whose applications were granted at the mid-year session on June 27, 1927. “Council Proceedings,” WEC, July 4, 1927 (9:6-8 at 6-7) (June 25). Nor was A & P listed as having been granted a permit in the minutes of any other council meeting in 1927 published by the Courier, at some of which permits were granted.

60 “City Speed Code Changed in Line with State Law,” WEC, June 25, 1930 (4:1-3 at stipulation revealed what happened at this point without explaining why A& P, “[i]nstead of paying the mulct tax due and payable on each of said permits, on July 1, 1929,...filed new applications for permits” at each location, attaching new bonds and proper mulct tax fees. As a result, “by reason of filing for new permits, instead of paying the mulct tax, under the old permits, then in force, the same [sic] expired.” The council not having acted on the applications or bonds, A & P withdrew them, but filed the five applications again in December 1929, which, however, the lawyer who would was about to represent it in litigation against the city again withdrew.61
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Presumably of causal relevance to the battle that would be fought out in 1930 was the cigarette price war that erupted in Waterloo in mid-April 1929, when a store in the United Cigar chain (the country’s largest retail tobacco company) reduced the per package price on “standard brands” from 18 to 15 cents, thus meeting the price that A & P stores were charging. Local cigarette dealers did not support this price war, which was a local manifestation of an impending national price war, because they claimed that their profit was already narrow as it was on the higher price. In addition, from the two-cent profit on the 15-cent package they had to pay the $100 mulct tax.62

After the company had filed five applications for cigarette permits for five stores on January 13, 1930,63 which the city council did not grant,64 A & P filed

---

2). For the list, see “Council Proceedings,” WEC, July 5, 1929 (20:8, 21:1-2) (June 24).

61 Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v City of Waterloo, Stipulation at 3 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., Case No. 27875 Chancery, n.d.).

62 Cigaret Price War Opens Here,” WEC, Apr. 18, 1929 (22:5-7). The annual permit fee was thus the equivalent of the profit on 5,000 15-cent packages or 2,000 18-cent products. A report in the local press three weeks later that a truce in the destructive national price war was impending turned out to be premature. “Cigaret Price War Truce Is Predicted.” WEC, May 10, 1929 (24:3-4).

63 Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Petition at 1 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct. Feb. 1930); Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v City of Waterloo, Stipulation at 1 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct. Case No. 27875 Chancery, n.d.).

64 The answer and stipulation agreed that the council denied the permits on May 12, Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Answer at 2 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., #27875 Chancery, June 27, 1930); Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v City of Waterloo, Stipulation at 2 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct. Case No. 27875 Chancery, n.d.). Yet the petition, which was filed in February, asserted that already by then the defendants had “failed and refused and still fail and refuse to grant and issue” the permits. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Petition at 2 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct. Feb. 1930). Apparently, in January 1930 the council referred the applications to its committee of the whole, whose failure to report prompted the company to file its
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

a mandamus action in Black Hawk County District Court requesting an order requiring the defendant city, mayor, clerk, and council members, who had granted and issued permits to “all others who have heretofore filed applications...,” including many who are engaged in the same or similar businesses” as A & P, to issue the permits to A& P because the defendants had acted in a “capricious, arbitrary, unreasonable and discriminatory” manner in denying them. By the end of February the council instructed the city attorney to defend against the action. The city’s defense rested on the claim that section 1557 of the Iowa Code conferred on it discretion in granting or refusing permits and that the council had exercised its “sound discretion” in refusing permits to A & P. At the city council meeting on May 12, 1930, the applications for the permits met a “deniance,” the motion carrying by a vote of 4 to 2, but no reason being announced. Unfortunately, the failure to take a roll-call vote makes it impossible to identify the Ayes and Nays among the six councilmen, who were predominantly, but not entirely, businessmen, and who were the same members 65Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Petition at 2-3 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct. Feb. 1930). The parties later that year stipulated that the city council records did not reveal that the council had refused any cigarette permit applications during the previous three years, although there were some applications that the applicants withdrew after the council had neither refused nor granted them. Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v City of Waterloo, Stipulation at 2-3 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., Case No. 27875 Chancery, n.d.).

66“Council Proceedings,” WDC, Mar. 5, 1930 (17:6) (Feb. 24). The notice that A & P’s petition asking for the writ would be filed on or before February 21 was served on the defendants on February 19. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Original Notice (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., Feb. 19, 1930).

67Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Answer at 2 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., #27875 Chancery, June 27, 1930). It is unclear why the city did not file its answer until the day of the hearing more than four months after the filing of the petition.

68Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v City of Waterloo, Stipulation at 2 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct. Case No. 27875 Chancery, n.d.) (“deniance”); “Council Proceedings,” WDC, May 17, 1930 (18:5-7), and May 19, 1930 (26:5-8 at 8). The Courier’s article on the session did not mention the permits. “Andrew G. Reid Will Take Office As City Attorney,” WDC, May 13, 1930 (9:1).

70Kenneth L. Bragdon was an assistant manager of a poultry medicine company (having been a bank cashier in 1920); John A. Hartleip was the manager of Hartleip who had tabled A & P’s applications in June 1929. 71

At a court hearing on June 27, A & P argued that since it had complied with all legal requirements, the city was required to issue the permits. In contrast, the city contended that because granting permits was discretionary with the city council, the court lacked jurisdiction over its action. 72 Republican Judge Alva B. Lovejoy ruled in A & P’s favor on July 16, ordering the city council and clerk to issue the five permits. 74 The judge proceeded from an analysis of the defendants’ claim that the city council had discretion to deny or grant permits and that this discretion derived principally from the use of the word “may” in section 1557 of the Iowa Code in the sentence: “Such permit may be granted by resolution of the council....” 75 Certain that the statute itself contained “conclusive evidence that the word ‘may’ was not here used in merely a permissive sense,” Lovejoy immediately pounced on the city’s argument, pointing out that the code also provided that after the permit had been granted, it “may be issued by the clerk of the city.” Irrefutably he observed that: “No one would seriously contend that the word ‘may’ in the last sentence implied there was a discretion on the part of the clerk whether he would issue the permit after the council had by resolution granted it. Yet the language in form is not mandatory upon the city clerk any more than it is made mandatory on the city council to grant the permit....” Lovejoy went on to point out that, in contrast, the procedure established for unincorporated areas provided that permits “may be granted by the county board of supervisors, and when so granted ‘shall be issued’ by the auditor.” Rhetorically, the judge asked whether it could be successfully argued that the city 71 They had taken office on Apr. 2, 1928; three members of the new council had also been on the old council.

73 Three Judges Nominated for Election Again,” WT, July 20, 1930 (3:1).

74 Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Peremptory Writ of Mandamus (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., No. 27875 Ch., July 16, 1930).

75 Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Decision at 1 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., No. 27,875 Equity, July 16, 1930). Unfortunately, since the case file archived at the Black Hawk County courthouse includes no briefs, the parties’ legal arguments are known only as filtered through the judge’s remarks.
clerk had discretion and the county auditor none “simply by virtue of the use of the word ‘shall.’”? This seemingly unassailable abstract linguistic analysis led him to opine that “the permissive word ‘may’ was used loosely in this statute and that it cannot be successfully maintained that by its use a discretion was vested in the city council.” From this intermediate conclusion Lovejoy then leaped to the far-reaching opinion that “the only discretion” that the legislature conferred on the council was “to determine whether the applicant has complied with all of the requirements of the law preliminary to the issuance of a permit.” If so, then “the council has no discretion, but is required to issue the permit.” In other words, the court, as the press pointed out, held that “‘May’ Means ‘Must.’”

While denying that the city council had any discretion—after all, the statute did not even require applicants to be of good moral character—Judge Lovejoy queried whether, if it did have discretion, the council would be empowered to “grant permits to a favored few and refuse all others” and thus to “to create a monopoly in a business not prohibited by law and which under the statutes of Iowa does not come within the police power,” although he acknowledged that some 30 grocery stores already had permits. After suppressing the elaborate history of the legislature’s subjection of cigarettes to the police power, the judge asserted that, if the council could grant a permit to one applicant and deny it to another without giving a reason or stating the underlying facts, such an exercise of power would be arbitrary, but the court was “unable to extract from the statute that such was the legislative intent.”

In order to understand how these semantic difficulties forming the core of the legal dispute arose, it is necessary to review the historical sequence of legislative events. The original statute of 1921 provided that the “permit may be granted and issued by the council of any city or town....” In 1924 the General Assembly changed the wording to read: “Such permit may be granted by resolution of the council of any city or town...and when so granted, may be issued by the clerk of such city or town.” This change was prompted by the code commissioners’ argument that: “No permits are ever ‘issued’ by a city or town council, which would imply that each councilman must attach his signature to it.” The second

---

76Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Decision at 1-2 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., No. 27,875 Equity, July 16, 1930).
78Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v City of Waterloo, Decision at 3-4 (Black Hawk County Dist. Ct., No. 27,875 Equity, July 16, 1930).
791921 Iowa Laws ch. 203, § 3, at 213, 214.
80Iowa Code § 1557 (1924).
81Brief of Code Commissioner’s Bill No. 257, prepared by J. C. Mabry, in Briefs of Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

use of “may” in the code was odd and ambiguous: if the use of “may” as applied to the council is interpreted as signaling and, indeed, constituting the legislature’s grant of discretion, it would be more than implausible to interpret the second use as also conferring discretion on the clerk to issue or not to issue the permit that the council had granted. On the contrary, the clerk’s action would be a prototypical example of a non-discretionary ministerial act. Interpretation is complicated by the fact that the code commissioners’ report had provided that a “permit may be granted by resolution of the council...and when so granted may be issued by the mayor of such city or town.” The commissioners explained their own modification as providing “for granting ‘by resolution’ of the city or town council and issued by the chief executive officer.” Although it is conceivable that the commissioners actually meant to confer a veto power on the mayor to nullify the council’s action, it seems implausible that they would have chosen such a subtle and indirect way of creating this power, especially since they did not provide for any override of a veto by the council. To be sure, further ambiguity arose because in the very next sentence, dealing with the corresponding procedure to be used in unincorporated areas, the code commissioners proposed and the legislature approved diametrically opposite language: “If issued to a person for use outside of a city or town such permit may be granted by resolution of the board of supervisors and when so granted shall be issued by the auditor of the county.” Despite substituting “shall” for “may,” the commissioners appear to have believed that they were providing for the same procedure: “The language which applies to a city or town council as to granting and issuing permits, likewise applies to the board of supervisors, hence the change that the board grant the permit by resolution and the auditor issue it.” Although the county auditor, like the mayor, was elected (whereas the city clerk was appointed by the council), the auditor did function as clerk to the board of supervisors, and it was therefore logical not to confer any discretion on the auditor not to issue permits that the board had granted.87

In any event, the code commissioners’ bill with the word “mayor” and the aforementioned explanatory note (“issued by the chief executive office”) was the bill that the legislature considered (as Senate File No. 257) in 1924.88 After the Senate had passed the bill without any amendments to this section, Representative John Rankin, a Republican lawyer from Keokuk who chaired the subcommittee on H.F. 257 of the House Committee on Police Regulation, proposed that “clerk” be substituted for “mayor”; the committee adopted the proposed change, unfortunately without any discussion recorded in the minutes.89 The committee then reported out the bill with the recommendation that it pass with this amendment.90 Two days later the House adopted the amendment without a recorded vote and then passed the bill by a vote of 74 to 7.91 Whether the committee and/or the House would have changed “may” to “shall” had it reflected on the meaning of the substitution of a ministerial subaltern for the chief executive officer is unknown. These incongruities came to an end in 1939 when the legislature amended the code to remove all references to individual officials’ roles and powers so that thenceforward “[c]ities and towns may issue retail permits to dealers” and “[c]ounty boards of supervisors may issue retail permits to dealers.”92

The Waterloo city government did not immediately decide whether to appeal the adverse ruling; it would have had to post an appeal bond, but during the pendency of the appeal permits would be withheld.93 At its meeting on July 28 the council decided, for reasons that neither the minutes nor Waterloo’s major newspapers reported, not to appeal; instead, A & P paid the $500 mulct tax and 87 Iowa Code §§ 520, 5141, 5633, 5640 (1924).

88 Code Commissioners’ Bill No. 257 § 6, in File of Code Revision Bills (1923), 1923-24 Special Session.
92 1939 Iowa Laws ch. 72, § 9, at 102, 107; Iowa Code § 1556.08.2 (1939).
93 “A. & P. Stores Win Decision on Cigaret Permit,” WT, July 17, 1930 (5:1).
the council ordered the five permits issued.94 Despite the fact that by mid-1933 the Iowa Supreme Court’s decision in (the Iowa City case) Ford Hopkins II95 would have justified not renewing A & P’s permit, the Waterloo city council did grant all five permits again at the end of June.96 Moreover, five days before Ford Hopkins opened its first store in Waterloo on September 23, 1933, the city council met in special session to vote on an application for a cigarette permit submitted by Ford Hopkins’ district manager. That the council unanimously ordered the permit issued97 might have been part of an appreciative city government’s quid for the chain’s $10,000 investment in Waterloo and employment of 20 Waterloo construction workers for four to six weeks and of 37 Waterloo residents in the store98 at the very nadir of the Great Depression. Or perhaps the council members had drawn their conclusions from the Realpolitik practiced by their counterparts in Iowa City, news of whose agreement to issue Ford Hopkins a permit despite their victory before the state supreme court had appeared in the Waterloo press.99 In any event, press coverage of the permit’s timely issuance100 may have motivated some of the 19,462 people who visited the store on its opening sale day.101

Although the district court opinion was—like all trial court decisions in Iowa—unreported, it is nevertheless noteworthy that neither plaintiff from Iowa

---

94“City Council Gives Shirey Paving Work,” WT, July 29, 1930 (1:6); “Shirey Awarded Paving Contract on $32,385 Price,” WDC, July 29, 1930 (2:3); “Official Council Proceedings,” WT, Aug. 3, 1930 (21:3) (July 28). Neither the minutes nor the newspapers indicated whether any council members argued for appealing and/or voted against issuing the permits.

95See below this ch.

100“One Dance Hall and Two Cigaret Permits Issued,” WDC, Sept. 19, 1933 (8:2).

101WDC, Sept. 25, 1933 (12:4-8) (Ford Hopkins advertisement). Nevertheless, the firm’s full-page advertisement two days before the opening included cigars and pipe and chewing tobacco, but no cigarettes. WDC, Sept. 21, 1933 (16).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

City and Marshalltown in the ensuing Iowa Supreme Court litigation ever alluded to the favorable ruling.

Marshalltown (1930-33)

Sales of cigarettes are still criminal except to those who have obtained an immunity from proper authority. ... The granting of such immunity is placed by statute upon and delegated to the policy forming and deliberative bodies of local authority. Before them every applicant must come. Every applicant in effect...must say “Here is my application for an immunity. Kindly give it your deliberative judgment and if approved authorize the issuance of the privilege I am seeking.”

The state’s fourteenth largest city and smallest first-class city, with a population of 15,731 in 1920, centrally located Marshalltown boasted a large packing house and numerous manufacturing plants. In mid-June 1921 the city council expected at least eight applications for cigarette permits, but by the end of the month it had already approved 16, including those of at least one cafe and one drug store. By fiscal year 1929-30—when Marshalltown was the thirteenth largest city with a population in excess of 17,000—cigarette permit fees had risen to $3,575, the equivalent of about 36 permits, from $2,700, the equivalent of 27 permits, in 1922-23. Despite the alacrity with which the council had handed out permits, by 1930 it decided to draw a line.

On December 8, 1930, one A. H. Bernstein filed an application for a permit to sell cigarettes at his wholesale/retail newspaper and magazine business, which the Marshalltown city council rejected at its meeting that same day.

102Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 11, Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933).

103Polk’s Iowa State Gazetteer and Business Directory: 1922-1923, at 634 (Vol. 20, 43rd Year, 1922).

104“Bond for Cigaret Dealers Is $1,000,” ET-R, June 18, 1921 (7:1-2).

108“Action Deferred on Scott’s Bills,” Marshalltown Times-Republican, Dec. 9, 1930 (8:4); Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 10-11, Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215
Indiscriminately the plaintiff’s name was spelled “Bernstein” and “Burnstein” in various court papers in the case; the Marshalltown city directory in the 1930s spelled it “Burnstein,” supplying Albert as his first name. According to the 1930 Census of Population, however, which returned him as Abraham H. Burnstein living in Marshalltown, he was a 28-year-old merchant in magazines and newspapers, who had been born in Poland to parents also born there, whose mother tongue was “Jewish,” and who had immigrated to the United States in 1914; his wife Minnie, who also spoke “Jewish,” had emigrated from Russia in 1905. In Fort Dodge, where he had also been a news dealer before moving to Marshalltown, the city directory had also listed him as Albert Burnstein one year and Abraham H. Burnstein the next. The plaintiff’s various names and spellings and his background might be relevant as perhaps suggesting that the WASPish council members’ resistance to his application may have been rooted in anti-semitism. Bernstein’s lawyer aggressively raised this possibility in his brief before the Iowa Supreme Court: “Perhaps the fact that the appellee is a Jew, with red hair and blue eyes[,] had its effect upon the minds of some of the council. Such would be just as reasonable as the excuses given by some of them as to why they voted to reject his application.” The plausibility of such a discriminatory motive would have to explain why back in 1921, when the city council had first issued permits, one of the first applicants granted a permit had been Martin Greenstein, a grocery store owner who had been born in Russia and 111 Polk’s Fort Dodge City Directory 1928, at 78 (1928); Polk’s Fort Dodge City Directory 1928, at 70 (1929). He was not listed in the Fort Dodge directory before 1928.

---

113 Appellee’s Reply, Brief and Argument at 8, Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales whose mother tongue was also “Jewish.”

On January 12, 1931, Bernstein, according to the pleadings in the case, filed a second application, and, not having received a response, five days later filed a petition in Marshall county district court seeking a writ of mandamus compelling the city to issue the permit. On January 26 the council rejected that application as well. To be sure, the contemporaneous press accounts differed somewhat. The Marshalltown Times-Republican reported that already on January 12 the council had rejected Bernstein’s third application, while it granted one to (Greek-born) Nick Patakotis. An attorney, Albert B. Hoover (who would later represent Bernstein before the Iowa Supreme Court) appeared at the council meeting to explain that the charges that had been filed against Bernstein when he was arrested for selling obscene literature had in the meantime been dismissed because his brother Herman (whose name was Hyman), the guilty one, had been punished by fine and an order to leave Marshalltown and “stay out.” As for the council’s meeting on January 26, the Times-Republican called the cigarette permit and gas station ordinance on the agenda that night “[t]hose two ‘niggers’ in the city governmental wood pile....” The council did grant cigarette permits to one A & P—whose application had been rejected twice before—and a lunch room, but it voted down Bernstein’s, which had been held over from the previous meeting when the mayor had fruitlessly asked for a motion. This time councilman Clifford Jennings, owner of Jennings Greenhouses, “settled all doubts by the emphatic tone of his voice in moving that the application be rejected.”

In 1931 33 cigarette sales permits were outstanding in Marshalltown, issued to grocery, drug, confectionary, and cigar stores, restaurants, and one news stand. In addition to Bernstein’s, the council had rejected only one application—A & P’s; in fact, A & P’s application for another store had been either rejected or 114“More Cigaret Permits,” Marshalltown Times-Republican, July 1, 1921 (9:3). The 40-year-old Greenstein had immigrated in 1893 and been naturalized in 1912. Fourteenth Census of Population (1920). His hair/eye color is unknown.

115Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 2, 6, Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933).
116“Bernstein Again Refused Permit,” MT-R, Jan. 13, 1931 (9:3). The biographical information on Patakotis is taken from the 1920 census. The 21-year-old Hyman Burnstein was returned at the 1930 census as living with his brother, like whom he spoke “Jewish” and had immigrated from Poland in 1914.
Litigation over Cities' Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

tabled but was finally approved and issued.\footnote{118} One reason for the council’s denial of the A & P application was that, according to the testimony of councilman Albert M. Treat, “there were about twelve people who were handling cigarettes came up there who said that they couldn’t sell cigarettes for what these people were willing to sell them at. That if we were willing to take one hundred dollars from A. & P. and they drop out, and lose twelve hundred dollars, all right. I considered it a matter of revenue for the city. The A. & P. permit was later granted for the west end. I voted for it, as some citizens prevailed upon me as other grocery stores had them.”\footnote{119}

The ostensible reason for the council’s denial of Bernstein’s application was that the police had raided his place of business on the basis of complaints—one of which had been made by a councilman who was also a school board member—\footnote{120} that obscene literature, cow itch powder, and “iron mechanical dogs which would perform vulgar and foul tricks” were kept in the store, which young people frequented.\footnote{121} Although the charges were eventually dropped, the council members did not view the dismissal as proof that Bernstein was “of good moral character and worthy of a permit to sell cigarettes in Marshalltown.”\footnote{122} The “moral reason”\footnote{123} undergirding the council’s conclusion that “it wasn’t a good thing to have a cigarette permit in a questionable place” which “young boys and girls” entered\footnote{124} was the feeling that Bernstein “might sell cigarettes to minors if granted a permit.”\footnote{125}

In April 1931 trial Judge Bertram O. Tankersley found that Bernstein was entitled to a writ of mandamus ordering the city to issue the permit to him.\footnote{126} judge characterized the city’s defense as based wholly on the argument that Code section 1557 conferred discretion on the council to grant or deny permits, which the council and its individual members had properly exercised in denying Bernstein a permit.\(^{127}\) Tankersley, who allowed as the aforementioned items in Bernstein’s store were, in his opinion, not “particularly offensive, but are...well known to be on display and for sale in other reputable places of business in Marshalltown and other cities,” detected “decided hostility” toward Bernstein by some councilmen-witnesses, which was based solely on their knowledge of the search and arrest. Since they had failed to investigate the real facts and disregarded the dismissal of the charges, the judge found that even if the council had the right to exercise its discretion, it had done so arbitrarily and without valid reasons.\(^{128}\)

Judge Tankersley next identified the same semantic problem in the code provision regulating the issuance of permits on which Judge Lovejoy had dwelt in Waterloo in 1930. Whereas section 1557 provided that permits “may be granted by resolution of the council” and when so granted “may be issued by the Clerk,” the corresponding provision for boards of supervisors and county auditors used “may” and “shall,” respectively. Refuting Tankersley’s argument that “[c]ertainly it can not be contended that the use of the word ‘may’...would give the City Clerk the power and discretion to nullify the action of the City Council” would be onerous. Considerably less persuasive was his conclusion that “it may well be questioned whether the words ‘may’ and ‘shall’ have been used in Section 1557 with such care as to be of value in determining the meaning when considering this Section alone.”\(^{129}\) The failure of the City of Marshalltown’s lawyers and, much more significantly, of any member of the Iowa Supreme Court to engage Tankersley’s opinion on this important issue was not a sign of intellectual integrity;\(^ {130}\) in particular the Supreme Court was remiss in failing to bring to the legislature’s attention the need, at the very least, to reconsider whether the seemingly discordant and incongruous uses of “may” and “shall” 127 Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933), Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 40, Order and Decree (Apr. 4, 1931).

---

128 Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933), Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 41-42, Order and Decree (Apr. 4, 1931).
129 Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933), Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 42, Order and Decree (Apr. 4, 1931).
130 Bernstein’s lawyer did repeat Tankersley’s argument without attribution or enlargement. Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933), Appellee’s Reply, Brief and Argument at 5.
were the product of sloppy drafting or actually (but implausibly) designed to express some legislative intent.

To be sure, Tankersley’s critique was hardly the final word. Astonishingly neither he nor any of the litigants or judges involved in any of the three cases appeared to be aware of the legislative history in 1921 that indisputably forged the compromise that paired licensure with local power to continue prohibition.\(^{131}\) Thus, regardless of the ambiguous or careless word usage, that the legislature had empowered local governments to decide whether cigarettes would be sold in their communities constituted, as shown above, the universal and monolithic discourse of the debates surrounding the initial issuance of permits in 1921. There is no evidence that anyone, even where councils approved applications, ever disputed the existence of the power to deny them. After all, even the Afton Star-Enterprise, a weekly published in a town of 926, knew enough to report that cigarettes might be sold in another town “provided that the city council says so. Such is the meat of the local option provision of the committee bill passed as a substitute for the Dodd bill.... The granting of permits to sell is purely optional with the council.”\(^{132}\) Second, none of the judges or litigants appeared to realize that the semantic inconsistencies that Tankersley pointed out did not arise until 1924, when the legislature, pursuant to the code commissioners’ proposed amendments, changed the wording without debate or consideration of the possible real-world consequences. It is inconceivable that either the legislature would have intentionally undermined the historic compromise without any debate or municipalities or anti-smoking groups such as the WCTU would have failed to challenge the changes; rather, it is virtually certain that the General Assembly in 1924 was simply ignorant of the ambiguities it was creating.

In 1933, during the pendency of Bernstein’s case before the Supreme Court, at the lowest point of the Depression, an attempt was made in the legislature to make the case and the issue moot by amending the permit provision of the cigarette statute. As filed by Democrat William Sheridan, a lawyer and American Legion member from Keokuk,\(^ {133}\) House File No. 406 read in pertinent part:

No person shall sell cigarettes...without first having obtained a permit therefor in the manner provided by this chapter. The council of any city or town...may in its sole and unqualified discretion either grant such permit, or, likewise, in its sole and unqualified discretion, may refuse to grant such permit. The grant of or refusal to grant, [sic] shall be by formal resolution, and when so granted such permit shall be issued by the Clerk of such

\(^{131}\)See above ch. 15.

\(^{132}\)“Council Controls Sale of Cigaretts,” Afton Star-Enterprise, June 23, 1921 (3:4-5).

\(^{133}\) State of Iowa: 1933-1934: Official Register 102 (Lester Drennen ed., 35th No.).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

city or town. Such city or town council may grant a permit to one applicant and refuse a permit to another. Likewise, such a permit for use outside a city or town shall be either granted or refused by a resolution of the Board of Supervisors and when so granted shall be issued by the Auditor of the County.\(^{134}\)

Sheridan’s bill thus unambiguously conferred absolute and unfettered discretion on local governments both to deny all permits and to pick and choose among applicants. And by substituting “shall” for “may,” it also eliminated the anomaly created by the Code amendments of 1924 (seemingly) giving discretion to the city clerk to issue or not to issue permits approved by the council.

When the House took up H.F. 406 on March 31, 1933, Republican Blake Willis of Perry, another American Legionaire and long-time city and Dallas county attorney,\(^{135}\) moved to amend by striking the sentence containing the grant of “sole and unqualified discretion” and inserting at the end of the passage quoted above the following proviso:

Provided, however, that there shall be no discrimination between applicants for licenses unless said applicants have previously been convicted of violating any law of this State; and no application for a license shall be refused on the ground that the applicant has refused to join in any combination to fix the price of cigarettes and cigarette paper.\(^ {136}\)

Willis’s amendment, both of whose wings A & P—which, as the country largest cigarette buyer, was getting discounts and manufacturer rebates\(^ {137}\)—would presumably have found quite congenial, would have gutted the bill by eliminating councils’ and boards’ discretion to devise their own criteria for determining on which applicants to bestow immunity from prosecution for what would otherwise have been the crime of selling cigarettes, though it would not have affected their discretion to deny all permits and prohibit all cigarette sales. Given the decision in the Perry A & P case and especially the Supreme Court’s decision in the Iowa City case, the amendment would have left local governments with less discretion than they had under existing law. In a House with a 77 to 31 Democratic majority\(^ {138}\)—the Republican party had never before been in the minority in the \(^{134}\)H.F. No. 406 (Feb. 24, 1933, by William Sheridan).

\(^{135}\)State of Iowa: 1933-1934: Official Register 106 (Lester Drennen ed., 35th No.).

\(^{138}\)State of Iowa: 1933-1934: Official Register 73-75 (Lester Drennen ed., 35th No.).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

House since its founding—Willis’s amendment was adopted by a vote of 55 to 39, but while 35 Democrats and 20 Republicans voted for it, 32 Democrats and only 7 Republicans opposed it. That the amendment’s point was to kill the bill was clearly on display on the final vote, which overwhelmingly defeated the bill 6 to 88.140

Rather than examine any of these legislative developments, Judge Tankersley, in apparent ignorance of history, turned the statute on its head by asserting that it merely created a state revenue raising system: by means of section 1557 and others the legislature “simply set up part of the machinery by which the revenue law and the regulations of cigarette sales are to be put in operation.”141 Having excised the entire struggle over cigarettes, even to the extent both of omitting all reference to the purpose of insuring that minors had no access to them—which, together with controlling the cigarette business, Attorney General Ben Gibson in 1921 had stressed as the purpose of the law—and of seeking to draw meaning from the lack of a requirement that applicants be of “good moral character,” Tankersley subordinated all elements of the law to the maximization of state revenue. He then leaped to the breathtakingly unmediated and ahistorically counterintuitive conclusion that “it was not the intention of the State Legislature to vest in the City Council any discretion, but that a ministerial duty is prescribed for the City Council as an agency for aiding and assisting the putting in force and operation of a state law designed for the purpose of raising revenue.” Because the council thus had no discretion, it instead “had a legal duty to issue the permit to the plaintiff....”143

139Democrats had not controlled the House since 1852, when the Whigs were in the minority. Frank Stork and Cynthia Clingan, The Iowa General Assembly: Our Legislative Heritage 1846-1980, at 5 (1980).

141Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933), Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 43, Order and Decree (Apr. 4, 1931).

143Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933), Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 44, Order and Decree (Apr. 4, 1931). The only opposing view Tankersley cited was a recent student note in the Iowa Law Review, which he did not even bother to refute. Unfortunately, the note, which tantalizingly referred to unnamed city councils that had interpreted the statute as giving them full discretion to refuse permits, provided absolutely no facts and did not even make any reference to any cases involving A & P. While concluding that councils did have some discretion, the note, making as little use of specific legislative history as Tankersley, interpreted the limits of that discretion much more restrictively than the Iowa Supreme Court would in 1932-33. “Power of Local Authorities to Prohibit Cigarette Sales.”
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Before the parties had filed all their appeal submissions with the Iowa Supreme Court, it had issued its decision in Ford Hopkins Company v City of Iowa City on February 9, 1932. Thus by the time the court handed down its decision in Bernstein v City of Marshalltown on April 4, 1933, an outcome upholding the city council’s action would have been foreclosed if the same justices had ruled and voted the way as they had a year earlier. Indeed, given the extraordinary constraints that the majority in the Iowa City case had imposed on city councils once they decided in principle to issue a permit to anyone, the same result would have been such a foregone conclusion in the Marshalltown case that it would have seemed improbable that the Supreme Court would, without more, have chosen to devote further resources to the question. In fact, considerable turnover on the Court and (now) Chief Justice Kindig’s apparent insight that he should have joined the dissenters (who then would have become the majority) instead of allowing his agreement on a subordinate factual issue to enable three justices to stand the cigarette law on its head generated an almost diametrically opposed result.

Whereas no Democrat sat on the Ford Hopkins Court, by the time it handed down Bernstein a year later, the Court was composed of five Democrats and four Republicans. Of the three Republican majority justices in Ford Hopkins, only the author, Albert, was still on the court, whereas Grimm and De Graff had left. Of the two justices who had specially concurred, Morling (who had no party affiliation), had died, whereas Kindig was now chief justice. Of the four Republican dissenters, Evans and Stevens remained, while Faville and Wagner had left. Thus, overall, only four justices remained on the court—two dissenters, the majority opinion author, and one concurring justice. All five of the new justices were Democrats—John Anderson, Maurice Donegan, Richard Mitchell, Hubert Utterback, and John Kintzinger—elected in November 1932 as part of the unprecedented Democratic victory in Iowa.

The majority opinion that Chief Justice Kindig wrote and Evans, Stevens, Anderson, Donegan, and Mitchell concurred in reversed District Court Judge Tankersley based in large part on a verbatim adoption of the dissent in Ford Hopkins. Similarly, the dissent by Utterback, concurred in by Kintzinger and Albert, was taken in large part from the latter’s majority opinion in the same case. Curiously, however, despite the fact that the Marshalltown decision merely inverted the majority and dissenting opinions of the first Iowa City case, nowhere was that case cited.
Litigation over Cities' Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Kindig proceeded from the conclusion that the “whole history, theory, and purpose of the statute indicates that each individual application is to be considered on its merits.” By granting a permit, local government was entrusting to the holder an immunity from prosecution for what would otherwise be an offense. Because the legislature’s use of the police power to declare the sale of cigarettes “objectionable and against the public policy of this state” was (in spite of the repeal of the absolute prohibition in 1921) “still in effect,” the permit provision imposed on local governments “the duty...to determine who may be thus rendered immune from criminal prosecution.” The use of “may” undoubtedly connoted permissiveness and discretion, whereas nothing in the statutory purpose or context suggested that the legislature meant to impart to the word the unusual meaning of “shall” or “must.” This conclusion was hardened by the consideration that the measure constituted a police regulation of cigarettes, whose sale the legislatively declared public policy deemed “illegal and dangerous to the public health and morals.” Consequently, when Bernstein applied for a permit, “he was not demanding an absolute right, but rather asking for a privilege as a matter of grace.”

Conversely, in being charged with administration of the permit system, local governments were “burdened with a great responsibility...of granting immunity to persons who otherwise would be guilty of a public offense,” which required the exercise of discretion. Moreover, this need for discretion was inconsistent with Bernstein’s contention that once a city council decided to grant a cigarette permit, that council and all its successors were legally bound to grant every application regardless of the applicant’s fitness. Indeed, future councils—in the final link in Kindig’s ad absurdum argument—“would be helpless to limit the number of permits or to refuse permits already issued, even though such future council unanimously felt that there should be no permits in the municipality.”

To Bernstein’s other argument that the foregoing general rule concerning discretion did not apply when a city council discriminated in a purely arbitrary and capricious manner the City of Marshalltown offered the counterargument that such exceptions covered only useful occupations as distinct from ones recognized as not being useful and therefore prohibited by the police power and “merely tolerated only to a limited extent.” The majority found it unnecessary to resolve

---

144 Bernstein v City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168, 1170-72 (1933).
145 Bernstein v City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168, 1173-74 (1933).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Bernstein v City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168, 1174-76 (1933).

This dispute and thus to determine whether the city council had “an absolute right to discriminate or act arbitrarily” with respect to denying Bernstein’s application because under the facts of the case the council had “acted clearly within a legal discretion....” What the Iowa Supreme Court had in mind was the evidence before the council that he had “conducted an immoral place”; and even though the charge of “keeping, exhibiting, and selling obscene and lewd magazines” on which he had been arrested was dropped, the fact that the police had also found in Bernstein’s business “‘foul trinkets’...and ‘cow itch or itch powders’”—the latter of which school boys frequenting the premises bought and “caused the boys who took physical exercise in the gymnasiums of the public schools annoyance and physical discomfort”—sufficed to demonstrate that the council had “acted within a sound legal discretion” in denying a permit to an applicant who had surrounded the many young people who visited his store to make purchases with “immoral conditions.”

The three dissenters did not go beyond Albert’s majority opinion in Ford Hopkins I in asserting that: “It would seem that the only discretion conferred by the legislature on the city council is the power to determine in the first instance whether cigarettes may or may not be sold within the boundaries of the city.” Consequently, the dissent agreed that the question was not whether the council was empowered to “prohibit the sale of cigarettes entirely, but whether it can grant permits to some and refuse permits to others similarly situated” when, in this case, Bernstein had complied with the sole statutorily required formality of owning or operating the business where the cigarettes sales were to take place. That the statute did not expressly include any requirements as to applicants’ moral character or business operations was interpreted by the dissenters as proof that taking such factors into consideration was tantamount to an illicit exercise of discretion. Utterback realized that a city council might, pursuant to his statutory interpretation, “some time be required to grant a permit to a person who [sic] on moral grounds it would prefer to refuse,” but such an outcome was not “a wrong that the court can remedy. For protection against such situations, the people must resort to the polls and the legislature, and not to the court[ ],” whose majority opinion was “the equivalent of a legislative amendment to the statute.”

The Iowa Supreme Court in Bernstein v City of Marshalltown thus vindicated local governments’ power both to ban all cigarette sales and to use considerable discretion to discriminate among applicants for permits. Whether city councils also had an absolute right to discriminate arbitrarily was a question that the Court

---

146 Bernstein v City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168, 1174-76 (1933).
147 Bernstein v City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168, 1182 (1933).
148 Bernstein v City of Marshalltown, 215 Iowa 1168, 1183 (1933).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

left open.

Iowa City (1930-33)

There is no provision in the laws and statutes of the State of Iowa which delegates to the City Council the duty of forcing its views on the subject of tobacco on an unwilling public.

This Court recently decided the case of Ford Hopkins Co. vs. Iowa City. The opinion reveals the inner turmoil of this honorable Court. This appellant...most respectfully observes that the majority opinion seems a strange and ingenious construction of what was the legislative intent and purpose in the cigarette statute.

Initial Laissez-Faire

The city council of Iowa City, the state’s premier college town and eighteenth largest city with a population of 11,267, displayed no reluctance whatsoever in 1921 to begin issuing cigarette sales permits. On the contrary, the council, composed of businesspeople, approved them freely. During the run-up to the city elections in March 1921, the Democrats advertised themselves as “A Ticket of Business Men” who “promise a clean, business administration.” The party’s advertising included the business affiliation of all seven of their council candidates except that of Charles Chansky, whose soft drink and billiard parlor was in the process of being shut down as a nuisance for having sold alcohol—the result, ironically, of a raid by the irrepressible John B. Hammond,

---

149*Ford Hopkins Company v City of Iowa City*, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 35.

150*Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown*, 215 Iowa 1168 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 11-12.

151James J. Carroll (butcher); Charles Chansky (soft drink and billiard hall owner); Curtis Dey (civil engineer); Emma Harvat (women’s clothing store owner); William F. McRoberts (treasurer, River Products Co.); Martin O. Roland (manager, Masterphone Co [advertising]); Owen R. Williams (hog dealer). Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1918, at 103 (Vol. 6, 1918); 1920 Census of Population; Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1922, at 66, 86, 184, 237, 297 (Vol. 8, 1922).

state peace officer of Des Moines, who had played such a major role in state cigarette legislation—but who refused to withdraw from the race. Since no one, presumably, doubted the Republican Party’s business bona fides, its city ticket advertising did not need to mention its candidates’ occupation or include a pro-business slogan, though its mayoral candidate’s political advertisement promised “every effort and endeavor to give you a Clean, Businesslike Administration.” 158 On March 28, while the labor movement succeeded in electing a socialist mayor in Mason City, Iowa City’s electorate gave Republican businesspeople (including the city’s first councilwoman) a 4 to 3 majority over Democratic businesspeople. 159

By mid-June the city clerk was animating would-be permit holders to make sure that they missed no deadlines so that they could start selling on July 4: “‘Thus it behooves every dealer to get busy right away, and to get his bond and application filed with me by next Monday.’” 161 On June 20 the city council met and accepted the bonds of all 14 applicants, directing the city clerk to issue them permits. The first four went to Fred Racine, who owned in the downtown central business district four cigar stores (in several of which he also operated soda fountains and pool halls); the others were issued to a cigar and news merchant, owners of two cafes, two drug stores, two pool/billiard halls, a candy store, a fruit store, and a grocery store. At its meeting on July 1, the council directed the clerk to issue seven more permits, this time to owners of two 157ICP-C, Mar. 26, 1921 (3:3).

159“Mason City Elects a Socialist Mayor,” ICP-C, Mar. 29, 1921 (1:2).
160“G.O.P. Controls Council” and “Mayor Swisher Elected Again Defeats Paine,” ICP-C, Mar. 29, 1921 (1:2, 8).
161“Cigarette Law Looms,” ICP-C, June 16, 1921 (2:3).
162Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 20, 1921of the Iowa City City Council 16:509-10; “Proceedings of the City Council,” ICP-C, July 22, 1921 (6:3-4) (June 20). The types of businesses were derived from the occupational data in the 1920 Census of Population, and Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1919-20, at 173, 203, 224 (Vol. 7, 1919).
163Irving Weber, Historical Stories About Iowa City 3:135-38 (1985). The first permit went to Store No. 1 at 132 E. Washington St, on the northwest corner of E. Washington and S. Dubuque St. No. 2 and No. 4 were located across the street at 131 E. Washington and the Jefferson Hotel; No. 3 was located around the corner at 24 S. Clinton St.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales restaurants, two billiard parlors, a hotel, a cafe, and a candy store. What actuated the council is unknown, but several weeks later it solemnified the process by passing a resolution that “ratified, confirmed and approved” the 21 permits “in order to remove any doubt as to the[ir] legality or effect.” The council had, as the Press-Citizen put it, declared all cigarette dealers whose bonds had been filed “bona fide salesmen of the ‘coffin nails’.” Eighteen of these first 21 permitted dealers were densely packed in the compact four square block central downtown business district adjacent to the State University of Iowa campus. Indeed, a decade later, the city, in defending against an action for failure to issue a permit, stated that several of these stores “were located close to the campus and close to the buildings of the University, which certainly would be contrary to the spirit if not to the letter of the statute which prohibits the advertisement of cigarettes within four hundred feet of a school.”

The leading local paper was presumably reflecting the council’s position when, under the heading, “Cigarettes Enrich Community,” it jauntily reported two days before the new law went into effect that:

Once more local merchants proved that the cigarette is a great little medium for enriching the community’s treasury. Seven applicants for licenses filed $1,000 surety bonds, and were granted permits making a total of 21 stores in Iowa City, now authorized, or soon to be authorized, to sell the aromatic little “coffin nail.” That means, at $75 per 164Minutes of a Regular Meeting of July 1, 1921 of the Iowa City City Council 16:524-25; “Proceedings of the City Council,” ICP-C, Aug. 29, 1921 (5:5-6). The types of businesses were derived from the occupational data in the 1920 Census of Population; Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1919-20, at 91, 94, 171, 173, 206, 247 (Vol. 7, 1919); Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1922, at 275 (Vol. 8, 1922).

---

165Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of July 28, 1921 of the Iowa City City Council 16:540.

167The area was bounded by S. Clinton St., E. College St., S. Linn St., and Iowa Ave, and included S. Dubuque St. For business listings by street, see Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1922, at 317-22, 331-32, 349, 364-66 (Vol. 8). In 1995 and 2005, when the total number of permits outstanding in Iowa City was 94 and 70, respectively, 14 businesses in this same central business district had cigarette permits. Calculated according to [Iowa City] City Clerk, Cigarette Permits (Apr. 20, 1995); [Iowa City] City Clerk, Cigarette Licenses (Feb. 9, 2006).

168Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 79.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales license, $1,575 paid into the city’s strong box, made stronger by cigaret smoke.

In fact, however, that cigarette mulct tax amounted only to about 0.5 percent of the city’s total receipts or expenditures.

By 1929-30, when the city had become the state’s fifteenth largest, Iowa City’s mulct tax collections had risen to $4,025—higher than those of the two next biggest cities and much higher than the smaller ones below it.

From the outset of the permit issuance process in June 1921 until 1928 not only did the city council never deny any permit, no council member was ever recorded as having cast a Nay.

To be sure, this uninterrupted stream of approvals did not mean that permit holders were all complying with the law.

For example, in 1922, four permittees—three owned pool or billiards halls and one a cafe—were charged with selling to a college freshman, who was a minor.

Finally the Council Rebuffs A & P

The permitting process itself ran into a first obstacle on May 4, 1928, when the council, controlled by Republicans with a 5 to 2 majority, defeated a motion

\(^{169}“\text{Cigarettes Enrich Community,}”\text{ ICP-C, July 2, 1921 (7:6).}\)

\(^{172}\text{A number of votes were recorded only as “motion carried,” which could possibly have included split votes, but no recorded or roll call votes included any Nays. Not even the notes in the city clerk files on which the minutes were based contain any roll calls for such votes. That no permits were denied during these years was stipulated to by the parties to the litigation discussed below; the city clerk also testified to this fact. Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 14-17. Even the defendant-councilmen themselves apparently did not recall how they voted on these unrecorded or non-roll call votes since their attorney, city attorney Will Hayek, who presumably himself attended at least some of these council meetings, felt compelled to assume for purposes of litigation that “all members who were present at the meeting voted in favor of the particular motion if it was carried, or against it if it was lost.” Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 4.}\)

\(^{173}“\text{Cigarettes Cause Clash,}”\text{ ICP-C, Feb. 23, 1922 (6:3) (Epeneter, Hungersford, Musark, and Smith).}\)

\(^{174}\text{Party affiliations are taken from “Democrats Leading in Election,” DI, Mar. 29,}\)
to grant the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company’s application for a permit by a vote of 2 to 4. The two councilmen who supported A & P were Democrat Leo Kohl (a publishing company press room foreman) and Republican Edward Greer (a retired grocery store manager), while the opponents were all Republicans—William McRoberts (treasurer of River Products Co.), Lou Kaufmann175 (a meat market owner), carpenter Charles Paine, and farmer Clark C. Roup.176 Coming in the midst of the similar disputes in Perry and Waterloo, the battle over issuing cigarette sales permits to A & P in Iowa City microcosmically reflected the national competition between the giant retailer and small independent retail tobacco dealers.

Fortunately, the Iowa City newspaper revealed more of the background to the dispute than did Perry’s. A & P’s application for a permit for its newly opened store “brought the first public opposition to chain stores in Iowa City. As readers of newspapers may have noted, two or three small towns in eastern Iowa have refused to license the A. & P. Company as cigaret dealers because of the objections of their local competitors.”177 The store was not A & P’s first in Iowa City: in 1924 and 1925 it had opened two others in the downtown area.178 Oddly, as recently as February 7, 1928, the council had granted A & P’s application for permits for these two stores.179 In light of the controversy to which A & P’s applications for cigarette permits had given rise elsewhere, why its competitors had not objected to the issuance of permits for these first two stores is unclear. The Press-Citizen’s report of the meeting on February 7 had even characterized the granting of the permit to A & P as one of “several minor matters” to which the council had attended, which apparently paled in significance compared to its approval of the purchase of a used Buick for $350 for the fire department to use to respond to small alarms.180 Perhaps the paper’s blasé attitude was somehow related to its publication on the day of the council meeting of a large Lucky Strike advertisement featuring a testimonial by star professional hockey player Billy Burch that “‘Luckies never cut my wind....’”181 In any event, after A & P had applied for a permit for the third store,182 Joseph (Gus) Pusateri, a 51-year-old, Italian-born retail fruit merchant,183 who had been among the very first permittees in 1921,184 appeared before the council on May 4 as the representative of nine local retailers objecting to A & P’s permit. To lend weight to their objection, Pusateri threatened that if the council granted the chain store a permit, his group would not renew theirs when they came up for renewal in July.185 At $100 a 182It was located at 110 E. College St., which was virtually across the street from the first store. Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 29, 1928 of the Iowa City City Council 19:648.

184Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 20, 1921 of the Iowa City City Council 16:510. His business address of 130 S. Clinton put him across the street from the site of the first A & P, which had opened in 1924.
185“Council Asks Inquiry of Rates on Fire Insurance; Hope to Get Lower Figure,” ICP-C, May 5, 1928 (2:4-5). In light of such a public statement to the council, its defendant-members were at best disingenuous in later quibbling with the Iowa Supreme Court’s finding that local businessmen had told the council that if it issued a permit to Ford Hopkins, their permits would become worthless by virtue of their being undersold. Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 26-27.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

After its population surpassed 15,000 at the 1925 state census, Iowa City became a first-class city and the mulct tax on its cigarette permits rose from $75 to $100. Eight weeks later, at the council’s last meeting before the cigarette permits’ annual expiration date, 24 motions were presented for “renewal” of cigarette bonds and voted on separately: 23 carried, whereas the motion for renewal of A & P’s for its two older stores lost. The council voted the company “out with a whoop, not one of the aldermen voting in favor of the renewals.” For good measure the council then voted not to grant the company’s application for a new permit for its third store, although all other applicants for new permits were successful. “[U]n- fair competition” in the form of A & P’s selling prices below the “prevailing rates” was the basis for dealers’ complaints that they had been injured. Preceding Pusateri’s renewed advocacy on their behalf, A & P’s assistant superintendent, W. L. Caley of Des Moines, had requested the council to renew/grant the three permits. While conceding that the company might be underselling other dealers, he insisted—presumably seeking to anticipate claims that A & P was using cigarettes as loss leaders—that it nevertheless made a “satisfactory profit” and that as an Iowa City taxpayer it was as entitled to the council’s consideration as any other business. Doubtless seeking to parry the small dealers’ threat to deprive the city of their mulct taxes, Caley recited the sums that A & P paid in Iowa City in street light assessments and general taxes. No councilman expressed any opinion on the matter or explained his vote, but the “chorus of ‘noes’ made it quite clear that the plaint of the local dealers had registered with” the council, whose de facto “right to regulate prices,” in the Press-Citizen’s view, “seemed unquestioned.”

Although A & P “consistently undersold the tobacco stores on cigarettes,” the majority of permit holders in Iowa City were not tobacco stores at all, but

---

186 After its population surpassed 15,000 at the 1925 state census, Iowa City became a first-class city and the mulct tax on its cigarette permits rose from $75 to $100.
190“A. and P. Loses Cigaret Fight,” ICP-C, June 30, 1928 (2:3). The student newspaper merely stated that no reason had been given for denying the permit. “City Council Buys 2 Traffic Signals; Renews Licenses,” DI, June 30, 1928 (1:3).
rather cafes, restaurants, lunch diners, pool halls and billiard parlors, candy stores, as well as independent local grocery and drug stores, just as the vast majority of businesses selling cigarettes nationally were not tobacco stores, but grocery stores, eating and drinking establishments, drug stores, and candy stores.192 This very structure may have underlain the question that councilman and acting mayor Will Hayek (who would later represent the city in litigation over the issuance of permits) raised at a council meeting in 1924 as to “whether small dealers really made any money on cigarettes. It was decided that they really didn’t make any money.” Ironically, the council members concluded that even they were treating cigarettes as loss leaders: “Some of them actually lose money on the ‘coffin nails.’ However they help to bring people into stores and visitors are always potential customers.”193 Such an account matched up remarkably well with later analysis by the Federal Trade Commission, which concluded that the hundreds of thousands of retailers for which cigarettes (and tobacco products generally) formed a small part of their total business but a large proportion of the manufacturers’ output had become “accustomed to selling these fast moving tobacco products at a lower mark-up than that customarily received by strictly tobacco distributors....”194 Indeed, despite regarding the profit margin on the oligopolists’ cigarettes as “inadequate,” their customers’ demand “practically force[d]” such retailers to sell them, even against their will at cut-rate prices lest “important sales volume...be lost on other products if they do not meet competitive prices.”195

192 Although for the period in question there were no comprehensive data on the proportion of all cigarettes sold by various types of retailers or the proportion of total sales of each type of retailer accounted for by cigarettes, it was known that cigar stores/stands constituted a minuscule and diminishing proportion of all cigarette retailers (which, excluding vending machines, numbered between 850,000 and 900,000 by the end of the 1930s) and accounted for an absolutely declining dollar amount of tobacco product sales between 1929 and 1935. In 1934 there were only about 15,000 cigar stores, whereas 355,000 grocery stores, 251,000 drinking and eating establishments, 57,000 drug stores, and 55,000 candy stores, in addition to untabulated gas stations and recreation centers, constituted “potential” retail sellers. Report of Federal Trade Commission on Resale Price Maintenance 447-48, 450-51 (1945).

Ford Hopkins Company Wants to Sell Cigarettes Too

A year after the city council had stripped A & P of its permits, a much smaller chain applied for a permit. Ford Hopkins Company, a Chicago-based Midwest drug store chain, was established in 1928 by Lewis J. Ruskin, a Yiddish-speaking child of Russian parents, who was born in London in 1903 and emigrated to the United States in 1905. It opened its first store in Illinois in 1928 and by the time Ford Hopkins first appeared in the Directory of Chain Drug Stores in 1932, it included 16 stores, five of which were located in Iowa (three in the Mississippi River towns of Clinton, Fort Madison, and Keokuk, as well as in Iowa City and Ottumwa in eastern and southeastern Iowa), three in Wisconsin, and eight in Illinois, all eleven being smaller towns. The next year it expanded to 23 stores ranging from Mason City and Sheboygan, Wisconsin in the north to Ottumwa in the southwest. At trial in October 1930, its officials characterized the company as “creating a national chain of drug stores in small cities, confining their operations only to rural communities,” though at the time 196 Ironically, a quarter-century later, D. A. Schulte Inc., a tobacco store chain, arranged to buy Ford Hopkins “to signalize the emergence of Schulte beyond the tobacco shop...into a vigorous new enterprise in the chain drug field.” “Chain to Expand, Change Its Name,” NYT, Jan. 14, 1954 (39, 43:5).

---

199 American Druggist, Directory of Chain Drug Stores 18 (1932). The threshold for inclusion was four stores.

201 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 37 (testimony of Lewis Ruskin).
the chain encompassed only eight stores. In anticipation of opening a store in Iowa City, the company at the council meeting on May 24, 1929, filed a petition for permission to hang out a sign, but when the council—which was now controlled by a 5 to 2 Democratic majority—found that it measured nine feet by five feet and weighed 1,300 pounds, the body referred the request to the Sidewalk Committee and city engineer. More consequentially, at the same meeting the motion by Democrat Charles Sample (dairyman and city milk inspector), seconded by Republican Lou Kaufmann, to refuse the company’s application for a cigarette permit carried. Although “the action was taken without comment,” the Press-Citizen surmised that “the reason is probably the same as actuated the council a few months ago in denying permits to the Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, which had aroused the antagonism of other dealers by selling cigarettes at less than the current price.” (If Ford Hopkins in fact intended to use cigarettes as loss leaders, that motivation distinguished it from late twentieth and early twenty-first century chain pharmacies, which sell cigarettes as profit leaders, that is, very profitable commodities that also allegedly bring in “traffic.” In contrast, Ford Hopkins’ health ethics did not differ from that of latter-day chains, which continued to sell huge numbers of cigarettes despite the fact that in 1970 the House of Delegates of the American 202 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 29 (testimony of C. Paul Johnson, dist. mgr).

---

203 “Democrats Sweep City Election,” DI, Mar. 26, 1929 (1:8).

204 Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings, May 4, 1928-June 1929, Roll No. I 9 (Iowa City Clerk’s Office); Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of May 24, 1929 of the Iowa City Council 20:212; “Council Votes $42,419 Paving Progress; Hearing June 12,” DI, May 25, 1929 (8:1).

205 Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1922, at 241 (Vol. 8, 1922); “Of Interest to Every Voter,” DI, Mar. 24, 1929 (10:5-8) (Democratic City Central Committee political advertisement); Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1930, at 250 (Vol. 12, 1930).

206 Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of May 24, 1929 of the Iowa City Council 20:212. Unfortunately the council minutes did not record the vote and the Iowa City Press-Citizen did not disclose the vote.

207 “Benda Wants ‘Black Maria,’” ICP-C, May 25, 1929 (2:4). The article incorrectly stated that Bywater (rather than Kaufmann) had made the motion together with Sample.

Pharmaceutical Association adopted the position that “mass display of cigarettes in pharmacies is in direct contradiction to the role of the pharmacy as a public health facility” and in 1971 that the same body approved a resolution recommending that tobacco products not be sold in pharmacies.209

At its meeting on July 1, the council had before it a resolution to direct the city clerk to issue permits to 35 applicants (most of whom were seeking renewals). Republican Councilman Jacob Van der Zee (1884-1960), a Dutch-born political science professor at the State University of Iowa with legal training210 who had been a Rhodes Scholar and an assistant to the Iowa Code Commission,211 moved (and Democrat William L. Bywater, a physician who had practiced in Iowa City for three decades and been a member of the school board,212 seconded the motion) to amend by striking from the list The Academy of Interest to Every Voter,213 “Candidates Seeking Municipal Office,”214 and “Of Interest to Every Voter.”215

211“Candidates Seeking Municipal Office,” DI, Mar. 28, 1931 (1:3-6, at 3:2-4 at 3).

212“Of Interest to Every Voter,” DI, Mar. 24, 1929 (10:5-8) (Democratic City Central Committee political advertisement).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Cigar Store and Pool Hall (which also maintained a soda fountain, served food, and frequently advertised in the student newspaper, the Daily Iowan, offering free delivery of cigarettes on orders of 50 cents or more). Van der Zee’s animus was directed against its owner, who had “‘been thumbing his nose at the city administration and doesn’t deserve any favors from the council,” because he had pleaded not guilty to charges of keeping a gambling house, which had been filed the previous week after a raid on slot machines, whereas seven other local men had pleaded guilty. The WCTU’s executive committee may have conveyed its congratulations on the raid, but none of Van der Zee and Bywater’s colleagues having shared their outrage, the motion lost by a vote of 2 to 4; in turn, Van der Zee and Bywater opposed adoption of the original resolution, which was passed by a vote of 4 to 2. In the next few months the council granted the additional applications without opposition by Van der Zee, Bywater, or any other members. The customary unopposed mass approvals for 1930 took place at two meetings at the end of June and beginning of July, generating a total of 36 permits.

On Saturday July 20, 1929, Ford Hopkins finally opened its store in the busiest part of downtown Iowa City across the street from one of the A & P stores. Two days earlier the Press-Citizen had opened its columns to a public 214 DI, Mar. 28, 1931 (3:5). For an example of an earlier tobacco-related ad, see DI, Jan. 3, 1928 (6:5-8).

---

215 “Horrabin Company Gets $27,600 Paving Contract for Seven Local Streets,” ICP-C, July 2, 1929 (3:1-4 at 1-2). The Academy was called “‘poor sports,’” who “‘would not take their medicine.’” “Council Lets Paving Contracts to Horrabin Company,” Daily Iowan (Iowa City), July 2, 1929 (8:1).
216 Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of July 1, 1929 of the Iowa City City Council 20:257.
217 Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of July 5, 1929, 20:262; Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Special Meeting of Sept. 27, 1929, 20:358; Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of Apr. 25, 1930, 20:512; Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of May 2, 1930, 20:521.
218 Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 27, 1930, 20:564; Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of July 3, 1930, 20:569.
219 “Ford Hopkins Store Ready,” ICP-C, July 18, 1929 (15:1-2); id. (6-7) (full page ads for opening). The store at 108 S. Clinton St. was not listed in the 1928 city directory, but was listed in 1930. Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1928, at 365 (Vol. 11, 1928); Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1930, at 330 (Vol. 12, 1930).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales relations article that was presumably a quid pro quo for the two-page advertising spread that highlighted the “Cozy Luncheon Room where 80 people may dine in [an] environment of Art, Beauty and AMERICAN SANITATION” eating food, such as “home baked” pies and cakes, “prepared by trained cooks,” as well as reduced prices for Kotex, antiseptic douche solution, and vaginal douche syringes. The soda fountain’s ice cream sodas and “triple rich chocolate malted milk” and “elaborate candy department” were hardly designed to repel minors.\footnote{ICP-C, July 18, 1929 (6-7).} The PR piece quoted an unnamed company official as confiding that Ford Hopkins had entered into a long-term lease because it believed that Iowa City was “‘destined to become a large and important city. We make a complete study of a city before deciding whether it can support so large a store as ours. We carefully analyze its resources, its location, and its people.’”\footnote{“Ford Hopkins Store Ready,” ICP-C, July 18, 1929 (15:1-2).} Whether that market analysis included the local demand for cigarettes, especially among the students who formed such a large proportion of the city’s population and whose campus was just across the street from the store, the article failed to reveal. (In fact, as early as 1915 the cigarette industry was very attentive to college students as consumers: that year, when the city council of Columbia, Missouri, where the University of Missouri was located, made cigarette smoking in public, allegedly “for the first time in history,” a “statutory offense,” the \textit{United States Tobacco Journal} called the city Missouri’s third best cigarette town, its desirability as a market stemming from the large number of college students, who made up one-fifth of the population.)\footnote{“Cigarette Smoking Statutory Offense,” \textit{USTJ}, vol. 84, Nov. 11, 1915 (1:4).} The company’s ad masquerading as an article also avoided discussing the question of whether in the long run the company could meet the payroll of “nearly a dozen assistants” at the soda fountain and ten store clerks if it was deprived of the legal ability to attract customers—who would breathe air cleansed and cooled every three minutes by a new ventilating system—by means of cigarettes. Instead, it rushed on to assure readers that the “interior incorporates a number of features seen in few stores west of New York.” In particular, “the walls were designed by John Greco, a famous painter who \footnote{220ICP-C, July 18, 1929 (6-7).} \footnote{221“Ford Hopkins Store Ready,” ICP-C, July 18, 1929 (15:1-2).} \footnote{222“Cigarette Smoking Statutory Offense,” \textit{USTJ}, vol. 84, Nov. 11, 1915 (1:4).} The previous week the council had raised the license tax from $10 to $250, prompting a violent protest; in retaliation the council “decided to throw cigarettes out of town altogether.” The \textit{Journal} cited “local opinion” to the effect that the action reflected “a hysteria that any small-town public is likely to contract, and consequently cannot be cried down too quickly or severely.” Purportedly dealers were in the process of finding a lawyer to secure quick repeal an allegedly flagrantly unconstitutional measure.

Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales decorated two Raphael-loggias in the Vatican for the late Pope Leo.223

A few days after the grand opening, to which many were doubtless lured by the offer of a box of free miniature toiletry gifts, the company published a large advertisement in the Press-Citizen both thanking and apologizing to the public:

For surely never before had so many people come to any store in Iowa City in one day—9,687 people—(by door count) passed through Ford Hopkins last Saturday!

To the many thousands who could not get near the counters to be waited on—for the items which were completely sold out—

We Sincerely Apologise.

We had prepared a complete stock—far larger than even Chicago or New York stores carry. We had trained 10 Iowa City men and women—BUT NO QUANTITY OF DRUGS and DOUBLE THE SALESFORCE WOULD HAVE BEEN ENOUGH, so far beyond our expectations was Iowa City’s appreciation of this BEAUTIFUL STORE, THE FRESH MERCHANDISE and the LOW PRICES.

We wish to thank the many Iowa City business men, the university, the banks, the Press-Citizen, the Daily Iowan, and many others for their floral tributes and active cooperation.224

The gala was marred only by what no store in New York or Chicago lacked—the cigarettes and the accompanying profits that the denial of a permit put out of legal reach. Until Ford Hopkins managed to obtain one that would enable it to supply the “FRESH DRUGS” in that particular commodity, “graduate and registered pharmacists” would be confined to advising customers on a variety of other drugs that would defeat deafness, make “rheumatics wild with joy,” or make it possible for them to eat pickles, lobster, and pie without gas or bloating.225

By May 1930 the Cedar Rapids city council had been receiving complaints for months from local dealers that chain stores were selling cigarettes below cost as a way of attracting customers. After the assistant city solicitor had reported that chain stores had not fought Marshalltown’s denial of cigarette permits to them and read aloud a state attorney general opinion that councils were empowered to deny permits without giving reasons, the Cedar Rapids city council unanimously passed a resolution denying permits to chain stores once their existing ones expired in June. Making explicit the pressure that dealers had exerted in Iowa City two years earlier, councilman (and former mayor) Louis

224ICP-C, July 25, 1929 (3:4-7).
225ICP-C, July 25, 1929 (3:4-7).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Roth remarked that he “could see no reason why the council should allow five or six stores to jeopardize the legitimate business of some 110 others who pay $100 each into the city treasury annually for permission to sell cigarets” (meaning that it would be irrational to sacrifice $11,000 in tax revenue to retain $600).226 The chain stores, which were selling two packages of cigarettes for 25 cents plus tax, announced, according to The New York Times, that they “would appeal the case to the highest Federal court, if necessary, on the grounds that the City Council had no right to seek to fix the price of a commodity.”227 The threat appears to have been mere braggadocio: no decision in such a case was ever published.

In Iowa City the dispute with the chains came to a head at the session of August 1, 1930, when the council by a vote of 4 to 2 initially passed a resolution directing the clerk to issue a permit to Ford Hopkins after all. This time Bywater and Van der Zee supported approval, joining Democrats Leo Kohl (the press room foreman) and Charles Regan (nursery owner), while Democrat LeRoy Mercer (vice president of his family’s Economy Advertising Company, one of the city’s largest and oldest manufacturing industries) and Republican Lou Kaufmann (a meat market owner) opposed issuance.228 Then the council, faced with yet another application from A & P (this time for two permits), split 3 to 3 after Bywater had switched to the anti-group, necessitating a tie-breaking vote by Democratic Mayor Carroll, whose Nay caused the motion to fail. Apparently sensing which way the majority sentiment had now drifted, Bywater, seconded by Kaufmann, moved to reconsider the vote on the Ford Hopkins permit; against only Van der Zee’s opposition, the council voted 5 to 1 to reconsider, and then by a vote of 2 to 4 (only Van der Zee and Kohl from the original majority continuing to vote Aye) defeated the resolution to grant the permit.229 Immediately thereafter Bywater’s motion that the Ordinance Committee “bring in an ordinance limiting the number of cigarette permits to the number of permits now issued” carried.230

---

226“City to Bar Chains from Cigaret Sales,” EG, May 1, 1930 (25:1). Interestingly, when asked why the council did not merely refuse to renew the permits without explanation, Roth replied that such action would be “‘arbitrary.’” Id.

228Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Aug. 1, 1930, 20:600. The occupational data are taken from: “Of Interest to Every Voter,” DI, Mar. 24, 1929 (10:5-8) (Democratic City Central Committee political advertisement); Smith’s Directory of Iowa City and Johnson County, Iowa: For 1930, at 171, 199, 238; “Life Sketches of Five Office Seekers Told,” DI, Mar. 29, 1931 (1:1-2). Regan had taken the seat held by Democrat Charles Sample in early 1930.

229Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Aug. 1, 1930, 20:600.

230Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Aug. 1, 1930, 20:601.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

The Press-Citizen, which made the invasion by “aldermanic rigmarole” responsible for the twofold refusals, offered two reasons for the council’s action, which may not have been consistent with each other: “there are enough cigarettes sold in Iowa City at the present time” and “no more retailers of cigarettes were needed in Iowa City....” It is unclear whether inserting a low-price chain-store seller into an already physically crowded market would have widened the market or merely reduced the prices and profits of local merchants. To be sure, those resulting lower prices might have increased sales.

In spite of these actions, on August 8 the council voted unanimously to place Ford Hopkins’ application on file for further consideration, but, as the Press-Citizen noted, “Ford Hopkins is a chain store and heretofore such stores have been refused licenses.” The council treated A & P’s two applications the same way two weeks later, Van der Zee alone voting Nay because he opposed “the delay”.... A Ford Hopkins representative appeared before the council on September 19 to make “an urgent appeal” for a permit. He sought to convince the members that its “local store was a public servant, that they received many calls for cigarettes and that cigarettes belong to a drug store. He said further that...Iowa City was the only city that had denied the company’s stores a cigarette license,” and cited, not so subtly, instances in other cities in which court action had forced the city councils to issue permits. Prefiguring the litigation strategy that Ford Hopkins would soon pursue, the company’s agent—as the State University of Iowa student newspaper, which was following the dispute carefully, reported—argued that “independent merchants” in Iowa City were “charging illegitimate prices,” whereas “a chain store selling at lesser amounts would save persons thousands of dollars annually.” The council, after hearing a “lengthy discussion,” during which the representative quoted the (aforementioned) attorney 232Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Aug. 8, 1930, 20:604.

---

234Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Aug. 19, 1930, 20:613.
235“Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Aug. 19, 1930, 20:613. With the same voting configuration the council also placed on file the application of Mrs. Alice Goza. For the motion and roll call, see Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings, Aug. 5, 1929-Oct. 1930, Roll. No. 110 (Iowa City Clerk’s Office).
general opinion, voted 4 to 3 to postpone action on Ford Hopkins’ application to its next meeting.

On September 23, Owen Elliott, a partner in the Cedar Rapids corporate law firm of Wheeler, Elliott & Shuttleworth, wrote Democratic city solicitor Will Hayek that it had been retained by Ford Hopkins Company, which had authorized the lawyers to file suit against the city if it did not issue the cigarette permit. However, since Elliott understood that there was a possibility that the permit would be granted at the council meeting on September 26, the firm would refrain from filing the action until after the meeting, unless Hayek informed him that the council had “definitely determined not to issue the permit....” Although a score of local merchants with cigarette permits and wholesalers, along with Ford Hopkins representatives, attended the meeting on September 26, none addressed the council. Faced with pending applications from Ford Hopkins and Quality Lunch, the council, “[t]aking a definite stand and defying threatened legal action,” passed a resolution to deny both of them on the grounds that “there are already large numbers of permit holders in Iowa City and each permit granted places an additional burden on the City to enforce a law relative to the sale of cigarettes to minors.” The 4 to 2 vote found Van der Zee and Kohl in the minority. As important as this motive may have been and as sincerely as the majority may have meant it, the council failed to reconcile this objective with the fact that as early as 1924 it had granted a permit to sell cigarettes at the city’s own Recreation Center. On the other hand, the plausibility of the council’s 239Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Sept. 19, 1930, 20:636 (Bywater, Mercer, Piper, and Kohl voting Aye, Van der Zee, Kohl, and Kaufmann Nay). The erroneous recording of Kohl as having voted both Aye and Nay should presumably be corrected by substituting Regan, who had made the motion, for him as having voted Aye.

---

241O. N. Elliott to Wm J. Hayek, Sept. 23, 1930, in Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings, Aug. 5, 1928-Oct. 1930, Roll No. 1 10 (Iowa City Clerk’s Office).
243“City Council Takes Stand and Defies Legal Action; Denied Cigarette Permits,” ICP-C, Sept. 27, 1930 (3:1).
244Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings, Aug. 5, 1929-Oct. 1930, Roll No. 1 10 (Sept. 26, 1930) (Iowa City Clerk’s Office).
245Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of Sept. 26, 1930, 21:13 (Mercer, Piper, Kaufmann, and Regan voted Aye, while Bywater was absent).
246Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of Oct. 17, 1924, 18:171.
trepidations about facilitating minors’ access to cigarettes was underscored by Ford Hopkins’ conscious efforts to attract children to its stores. In opening a store elsewhere in 1932, an “important executive official” of the company candidly told the press that “‘when we decide to establish a Ford Hopkins drug store in a city, we try to get the very best location, one which is easily reached and accessible to the farmers, to every city resident and above all, to school children.”

Ford Hopkins Unsuccessfully Requests the District Court to Order the City Council to Issue a Permit

On October 2 Ford Hopkins, as a seven-column banner headline blared across the front page of the university’s student newspaper,” filed an action in equity in Johnson County District Court against the City of Iowa City, the mayor, the council members, and the city clerk, complaining that the defendants had violated their statutory “duty” to issue the company a cigarette permit by arbitrarily refusing to issue it, and seeking a writ of mandamus ordering the defendants to grant and issue the plaintiff a cigarette permit. The company alleged that the city had granted many permits to others retail drugs stores, whose cigarette sales were “lucrative and profitable,” whereas Ford Hopkins was unable to sell cigarettes to customers who asked for them and then left the store without buying anything. The only reason that the city had ever given for denying the permit, according to the petition, was that increasing the number of permits beyond the large number already outstanding would impose a greater enforcement expense on the city. In fact, Ford Hopkins claimed, this reason was a “sham, false and made for the sole purpose of masking the motive which actuated” the city—namely, the company’s being a “so-called ‘chain store.’” Presumably in order to reinforce the allegation of arbitrariness, the plaintiff pointed out that the city had issued permits to two or more drug and/or cigar stores owned by the 249Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Petition in Equity, in Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 2, 3, 9, 10.

250Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Petition in Equity, in Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 4.
251Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Petition in Equity, in Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 5.
same person, thus arbitrarily discriminating even among chain stores, although Ford Hopkins’ hands were clean in the sense that it had never violated the cigarette law or encouraged minors or anyone else to violate any Iowa laws; moreover, its place of business was “not a place where loafers and lawless people congregate....”\textsuperscript{252} The defendants’ purpose in discriminating against Ford Hopkins was rooted in their “attempt[ ] to create a monopoly for the sale of cigarettes...by compelling the people of Iowa City...to purchase cigarettes from those dealers upon which the...defendants are pleased to capriciously bestow their favor....” Without explaining how limiting sales to 51 dealers (rather than 52) could create or sustain a monopoly, the company alleged that the “great loss and damage” that it incurred by being “deprived of profits”\textsuperscript{253} was also a deprivation of property without due process.\textsuperscript{254}

The defendants’ answer was substantive and set the terms for the resolution of the dispute. The city stressed that the refusal to grant a permit to Ford Hopkins was rooted in its “good faith effort to limit the number of places” where cigarettes could be sold to 51 and thus to “control the traffic in cigarettes” in a city in the “peculiar position” of having an “unusual proportion of minors”: of a total population of 15,000, more than 3,000 university students were under age in addition to a thousand in high schools and junior high schools. The city was acting in the youth’s interest because “the law recognizes the detrimental effect upon minors of the use of cigarettes” as witnessed by the ban on advertising them within 400 feet of any school. Since the law authorized the city council to determine “what permits” to grant and provided for declaring places selling cigarettes without such permits to be enjoineable and abatable nuisances, “compel[ling] the City Council to issue permits to all applicants in unlimited numbers violates both the spirit and letter of the law.”\textsuperscript{255} In refutation of the plaintiff’s allegation that the city’s denial of the permit was based on Ford Hopkins’ being a chain store it referred to its simultaneous denial to Mrs. Alice Goza; and to refute the charge of attempted monopolization the city pointed out that among the 51 sellers were five within a block of the plaintiff. Finally, the \textsuperscript{252}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Petition in Equity, in Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 6. The stores were Whetstone’s three drug stores and Racine’s four cigar stores.

\textsuperscript{253}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Petition in Equity, in Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 9.

\textsuperscript{254}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Petition in Equity, in Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 8.

\textsuperscript{255}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Answer, in Appellant’s Abstract of Record at 11-12.
defendants denied that Ford Hopkins had any “legal right to demand a permit” because if it did, then any applicants would too and the “City Council would...be compelled to sanction and encourage the unlimited extension of traffic in cigarettes recognized as detrimental to the health and”—introducing the specter of a threat thereto absent from public policy discussions—“subversive of the habit of thrift in the youth....” Why the city council gauged 51 permits as the effective limit of enforcement city attorney Hayek explained no more than what the city had been doing to protect minors’ health and thrift before Ford Hopkins’ advent in 1929.

Johnson County District Judge R. G. Popham257 set the hearing on issuance of the writ for October 13.258 That first day numerous witnesses testified including councilmen, the mayor, and city clerk, as well as Ford Hopkins’ district manager, C. Paul Johnson, the local store manager, J. C. Gussmann, and Ruskin himself.259 The plaintiff’s “star witness”260—whom city attorney Hayek alternatively characterized as the company’s “pet witness”261—was, by a wide margin, councilman and professor Jacob Van der Zee, the only council member who testified on the company’s behalf. He recalled for Popham’s benefit that when Ford Hopkins applied for a permit in May 1929 “it was well understood” among the council members “that a permit should not be granted because the Ford Hopkins store was a chain store.” In particular, several (unnamed) members had stated before the vote that “the Iowa City dealers were opposed to a chain store getting a cigarette permit, that the chain store would undersell...the local dealers.” Moreover, no member offered any other reason, such as limiting the total number of permits, for denying the permit. A year later, around August 1, when the company again applied for a permit, no local merchant tried to “get” him to vote against granting it, but about ten days later, Whetstone, whose three drug stores were all permitted to sell, did speak to him; without trying to influence Van der Zee, he told the councilman what cigarettes cost him wholesale and “that in order to continue to sell cigarettes, he should be allowed to sell them at the present prices.” As for the August 1 meeting, at which the council at first voted to grant Ford Hopkins’ application, Van der Zee testified that right after that vote a councilman predicted that A & P would be in to get its permits (which prediction immediately came true). Prompted by the company’s lawyer, Van der Zee complianantly explained that after the fact Hayek had advised the council that it would be empowered to deny permits on moral grounds or to limit their number. Incredibly, although Hayek had already objected to numerous questions, he said nothing at all when Ford Hopkins’ lawyer asked the professor whether Hayek had offered that opinion in response the council’s request as to “what excuse” it could give for refusing to issue the permit to the company. After giving his unequivocal Yes, Van der Zee testified that despite the council’s instruction to the Ordinance Committee—which he chaired—to present an ordinance, it never did, just as it also never tried to enforce the cigarette law or assigned the police to inspect cigarette sellers.262
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Johnson (who by 1932 was the company vice president)263 stated that in the course of conversations with all the city council members about the permit application, he was told by John Piper, who was engaged in the wholesale and retail coffee business, that “personally he had no objections but for business reasons, if he voted for the chain store for cigarettes, he would lose a number of business accounts.” Similarly, LeRoy Mercer, who was involved in a soda bottling business that supplied several dealers, had told him that “he would be liable to lose a number of customers” if he voted to grant a chain store a permit.264 Johnson and Gussmann complained that the lack of a cigarette permit had a negative impact on Ford Hopkins’ ability to compete with six nearby drug stores (including three Whetstone branches)265 because customers—who demanded cigarettes every day—wanted to buy cigarettes in order to be able to make all

262Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 22-27.
263American Druggist, Directory of Chain Drug Stores 18 (1932).
264Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 28-29. Gussmann, who had been present, corroborated Johnson’s testimony about Piper. Id at 30-31.
265Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 32-33.
their purchases in one place. More generally, Johnson’s experience was that it was a benefit to a retail drug store’s general business to sell cigarettes. 266

Perhaps the most intriguing testimony was offered by Ruskin (modestly self-styled company general manager although he was also president), 267 who, after boasting that “[w]e do not permit people to loaf or congregate around our store in Iowa City, particularly young people”—and just to make sure, “[w]e also maintain a system of...store sharpers...[who] lay traps, so to speak, which would immediately detect any let down in the morale or the carrying out of the company’s orders and policies”—testified about an “experiment” that Ford Hopkins had performed in its store in Clinton, Iowa, which it opened after the council in Iowa City had refused to issue a permit in May 1929. Once the city council in Clinton had made it clear that it did not object to granting a permit, “we decided that for some months we would run our store without selling cigarettes and get the volume of business we did, comparing it with the time of the year, and then apply for the cigarette license.... As I recall we permitted that store to operate without cigarettes through the holiday season, to give it the benefit of the best time of the year, or at least rather close to it; then we applied and received our permits [sic] and started the sale of cigarettes, and we noticed a perceptible increase in business, and a great many comments by customers, stating that it made it much easier for them to purchase their drugs where they purchased their cigarettes, and there was a definite increase in business from almost the first week, and now the increase is very considerable.” 268 In light of this remarkable controlled experiment, which was self-serving but also self-inflicted short-term financial loss, it is puzzling that Ruskin, who presumably had initiated the plan in contemplation of precisely this litigation, failed to offer any quantitative estimate whatsoever of the loss of sales/profits caused by the lack of a permit.

Ruskin did provide quantitatively precise data on prices and apparently stylized (but perhaps real) data on turnover and planned/realized profit rates designed to project Ford Hopkins’ image as smokers’ benefactor, which did not prompt city attorney Hayek to ask whether lower prices might attract more underage smokers. After stating that the general wholesale per package price was 11.6 cents (minus 2 percent for cash discount) and the prevailing retail price in Iowa City was 18 cents (though he himself had also bought them there for as much as 20 cents), Ruskin purported to reveal this much about the firm’s profit-

266 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 30.
267 American Druggist, Directory of Chain Drug Stores 18 (1932).
268 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 34-35, 36.
price matrix:

We require that every dollar invested in merchandise return a certain profit; let us say..., just entirely for example, that that profit be 50 per cent. Now if that article of merchandise sells once a year, and it cost a dollar, then necessarily that sells at $1.50, that would be the fifty per cent profit. If the article had a turnover of ten times per year, we would only require five cents profit, or a profit of $1.05 to get our fifty percent profit back at the end of the year, the fixed overhead remaining the same throughout the year. It necessarily follows that with an item like cigarettes, a daily turnover of stock...it is not at all necessary for us to have a full margin of profit to [sic] get on our slow moving article, to realize the same return on our investment over a year’s period.

The general public gets the benefit of the increased turnover.\textsuperscript{269}

Defendants’ witnesses featured four named defendant councilmen and the mayor, all of whom swore that their votes against Ford Hopkins and/or A & P had absolutely nothing to with their being chains.\textsuperscript{270} Indeed, Councilman Kaufmann testified that he was unable to remember why he had voted to refuse to renew A & P’s permit or to grant one to Ford Hopkins\textsuperscript{271} (though he did insist that he had first begun “thinking there were enough cigarette permits in Iowa City when about thirty-five had been issued”).\textsuperscript{272} The most persuasive testimony, such as it was, came from Dr. Bywater, who did not smoke cigarettes, “[a]s a medical man...kn[e]w whether or not a cigarette is harmful to a minor,” and did “not believe in young girls smoking cigarettes.”\textsuperscript{273} Insisting that Ford Hopkins’ status as a chain store played no part in his vote against granting it a permit on August 1, 1930, Bywater testified that the only reason for his vote was that:

I think we have enough licenses in Iowa City, in fact I think we got too many as it is. We have all these young boys and girls here to look after and to protect, and the Ford Hopkins people have a store right in a prominent part of town where young people are passing all the time, they have got an attractive front that is more attractive than any store in Iowa \textsuperscript{269}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 36.

\textsuperscript{270}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 49 (Charles Regan), 52-53 (L. H. Kauffman [sic]).

\textsuperscript{271}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 46.

\textsuperscript{272}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Second Amendment to Abstract at 9.

\textsuperscript{273}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 46.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

City, it has a tendency to bring boys and girls into that store, and when they get in there why they can—in a position to buy their cigarettes. I think that the little store outside, in much more out of the way place, just to settle, the locality, is much more desirable than a store in a prominent place like Ford Hopkins, and I think we have too many places now.274

On cross-examination, Ford Hopkins’ lawyer, Owen Elliott, elicited from Bywater the admission that the plaintiff’s store was hardly the central commercial magnet of students:

The intersection of Clinton Street and Washington Street and the northeast corner thereof is probably passed by more students than any other corner in Iowa City. The student traffic is greater there than any other place in Iowa City. The corner is occupied by the Whetstone Drug Company which has a large business with the young trade. The Whetstone Drug Company makes a special effort to attract the student trade. It has a subpostoffice station and cashes students’ checks. The store is frequented largely by students and has a cigarette permit. It is a very attractive store inside and out. It has many times over the amount of student trade that the Ford Hopkins store has.275

Why, given their alleged solicitude for students’ well-being, neither Bywater nor any of his colleagues ever voted to deny a permit to Whetstone, which also had permits at two other stores in the downtown business district, the physician did not reveal. Nevertheless, the city council had no compunctions about annually renewing the permits of Whetstone Drug Company, locally owned but operating three stores each with a cigarette permit, despite the fact that the aforementioned branch was “a busy student center with post office boxes for fraternities and sororities” and famous for its sherbets, malted milks, and soda fountain.276 The council apparently perceived no contradiction between Whetstone’s perpetual and ubiquitous sale of cigarettes and the company’s boast on one of its anniversaries277 of “55 years of serving the public health.”278

274Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 41-42.
275Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 44.
276Irving Weber, Historical Stories About Iowa City 6:240 (1990). Store No. 1 was located at 32 S. Clinton St. at the corner of Washington St. Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of July 3, 1931, 21:204. This store’s “fountain served as a kind of a [sic] student union before the Iowa Memorial Union was built.” Irving Weber, Historical Stories About Iowa City 6:287 (1990).
277“Three Whetstone Stores Observe 55th Anniversary,” ICP-C, July 9, 1929 (2:5-6).
278ICP-C, July 9, 1929 (12) (full-page ad). The next year the store advertised to
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

That Bywater had never visited any of Racine’s four stores or a pool hall to “see whether it was a fit place to be granted a permit” and “never made any attempt to find out where these minors purchased these cigarettes” suggests that his devotion to “safeguarding the morals of the youth” was as staunch as his conviction that increasing the number of permits from 51 to 52 “would be a tremendous detriment to the youth of Iowa City”—especially since he admitted that he and the other councilmen had, despite their alleged insight as far back as 1929 that there were enough outstanding permits, nevertheless “added some.”

And, to judge by the attention that the cigarette manufacturing oligopolists were paying to them, well might Bywater and his fellow councilmen have been concerned about the university students. The student newspaper, the Daily Iowan, which as early as the outset of 1924 had begun publishing small advertisements for Lucky Strike, soon was printing many large ads for the cigarette trust successors almost daily. By 1930, Liggett & Myers was hawking Chesterfield to SUI students, in a large advertisement featuring a football player motif, as so mild that “You don’t have to learn to like them.” Indeed, two days after Bywater had testified university students read that: “You can bet your bottom dollar—They Satisfy.” This print immersion was not confined to cigarettes or national manufacturers. Racine’s, which in tamer days had advertised its malted milks, now urged students (in the same issue of the paper detailing Ford Hopkins’ efforts to persuade the city counsel to issue it a permit) to take “A Pipe Course” at its four stores.

Elliott, aided by one witness’s apparent ineptitude, effectively undermined the defendants’ monolithic narrative. On cross-examination, Elliott asked Le Roy Mercer, who had just testified that he had never even given any thought to Ford Hopkins’ chain-store status, why suddenly, after having voted to grant 51 students that whatever they wanted from a drug store Whetstone would send over. DI, Nov. 25, 1930 (6:4-5).

279Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 44-47.
280DI, Jan. 8, 1924 (3:5).
281E.g., DI, May 2, 1926 (7:1-3), Mar. 25, 1927 (7:2-5) (Lucky Strike), Feb. 7, 1928 (8:5-8) (Camel), May 24, 1928 (8:5-8) (Old Gold).
282DI, Oct. 19, 1930 (10:5-8).
283DI, Oct. 15, 1930 (6:3-5).
284DI, July 19, 1921 (4:2-3).
285DI, Sept. 20, 1930 (6:4-5).
286Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 57.
permits, he concluded that there were already enough permits in Iowa City:

A. Well, you are always getting new thoughts and they have to come to you at one time or the other.
Q. And this thought broke in on you that night?
A. Yes, it came right then.
Q. The thought just snapped into your mind then?
A. Just popped right out.
Q. How did it happen that the same thought came to—how many councilmen was it there, five of them, right that one night of Aug. 1, 1930?
A. Mental telepathy, I imagine.\

Hayek did not even bother to try to rehabilitate his witness on redirect.\

The defendants’ final witness was James Carroll, Democratic mayor since 1925 and owner of a meat market, who, at least in the version of the testimony that Ford Hopkins printed for the record presented to the Iowa Supreme Court, allegedly testified on direct examination that he had broken the tie vote on and opposed A & P’s application on August 1, 1930, “because it was a chain store.”
In reality, as the city pointed out in its Denial of Appellant’s Abstract of Record and Amendment to Abstract, Carroll had expressly denied that he had voted against granting the permit on the grounds that A & P was a chain. His precise motivation, however, remained unclear. When Hayek asked him directly what his reasons had been for voting no, the mayor, after Elliott had objected to the question’s irrelevance, replied that it had been his first opportunity to vote No on a cigarette permit. Instead of continuing and stating his reasons, Carroll was interrupted by Hayek, who asked: “Do you believe in the issuance of a great number of permits in...Iowa City...?” Neither his denial nor his reasons—“Morals

287 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s
Evidence, at 58.

288 Pursuing a serendipity defense, in an appeals brief the city insisted that the trial judge “clearly and plainly was convinced” that the “City Council seemed to believe that the sales of cigarettes must be limited and they must put a stop somewhere and sometime, and the only arguments appellant has is imputing bad faith because the stop happened to be made upon the application of the Ford Hopkins Company....” Ford Hopkins Company
v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 66.

289 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).

290 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s
Evidence, at 58-59.
and welfare of the young people—were more plausible than the councilmen’s, but, unlike them, the mayor was able, without fear of refutation, to suggest that the fact that his first (No) vote was directed at A & P was purely coincidental. (Ford Hopkins’ lawyers’ excuse for the falsified record testimony—“the apparent misquotation was due solely to a mistake or inadvertence of the printer”—was about as credible as the councilmen’s denial that they had voted against granting the permits because the stores were chains.) He also stated that there was “quite a bit of smoking among minors in Iowa City,” which the police had “made an attempt to curb....” On cross-examination he added that although the police chief had tried to find out where minors got cigarettes, he personally had not, confining his own investigative activities to “find[ing] out where students...are loafing. I find that they are loafing in pool halls that have been granted permits to sell cigarettes by the City Council....” The mayor had seen them loafing in drug stores, including Whetstone and Ford Hopkins.

The lawyers’ arguments occupied the session on October 14. City solicitor Will Hayek argued that the council’s “sincere effort to restrict the sale of cigarettes” on behalf of the large number of minors “should be praised....” The company’s lawyers contended that it was impermissible for cities to discriminate arbitrarily among persons engaged in the same business.

On December 5, 1930, Judge Popham—who after leaving the bench became law partners with Will Hayek, the Iowa City city solicitor who had litigated the case before him—issued his judgment, which had been awaited with “great anticipation” in Iowa City and “over the state,” that “the equities are with the defendants,” dismissing the petition without any substantive opinion.

291 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Denial of Appellant’s Abstract of Record and Amendment to Abstract at 3.
292 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Reply Brief and Argument at 3.
293 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Plaintiff’s Evidence, at 59-60.
296 “Court Upholds City in Cigarette License Case,” ICP-C, Dec. 5, 1930 (2:1).
297 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, Iowa, Judgment and Decree (Johnson County Dist. Ct., Cause No. 24417, Dec. 5, 1930) (archived at Johnson County Courthouse).
The Republican Iowa Supreme Court Reverses the Trial Court

Ford Hopkins quickly filed a notice of appeal to the Iowa Supreme Court, which ruled that the case would be heard in March 1931. In its brief the company failed to formulate precisely what question(s) it was submitting for the Court’s resolution, but it seemed to be requesting: (1) a fact finding that the city council’s declared reason for denying the permit (namely, that it was limiting the total number of permits to 51) was a “subterfuge,” whereas the real reason was that Ford Hopkins was a chain store; and (2) a legal finding that this latter reason was impermissible because the council had admitted the plaintiff’s “equality...with others to whom permits had been granted” without giving Ford Hopkins “an equal opportunity to compete for permits.” The plaintiff charged that the council, in an attempt to legitimate its discrimination against chain stores and in favor of local merchants, “began a systematic course of conduct solely for the purposes of anticipated litigation consisting of numerous self-serving acts and declarations and manifested an intense interest in the morals and welfare of the youth of Iowa City..., an interest which had lain dormant for many years, but was suddenly inflamed by the necessity of finding an excuse for denying a cigarette permit to a so-called chain store.” Although Ford Hopkins made the aforementioned point that the use of “may” in the statute created the “absurd result” that city clerks had discretion not to issue the permits that city councils had granted, whereas county auditors lacked such discretion vis-a-vis county boards of supervisors, its attempt to salvage some meaning for the word by claiming that it was “merely used to indicate” whether an applicant was to apply to a council or board was implausible. As an alternative or fallback position, 298Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Notice of Appeal, in Appellant's Abstract of Record at 63 (Dec. 9, 1930); “Drug Company Appeals Case,” ICP-C, Dec. 12, 1930 (2:6).

299“Supreme Court to Consider Cigarette Appeal in March,” ICP-C, Dec. 16, 1930 (2:4).
300Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 2.
301Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 15.
302Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 22.
303Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 30.
the plaintiff, admitting for the sake of argument that by the use of “may” the legislature had conferred some discretion on city councils, conceded that the word “might very logically be held to confer” on the city council the discretion “to determine whether or not cigarettes would be sold within the city limits” in the sense of a binary local option. Mockingly, Ford Hopkins suggested that the council should indeed have exercised that option and prevented the sale of cigarettes if it had really been “so desirous of protecting the numerous minors within the city...” But once the council had decided to grant some permits, it lost any further discretion because—as the company, without any textual support and in complete disregard of the legislature’s clearly expressed intent to retain features of a police power even after licensure—the law, and in particular the mulct tax, was designed “solely for the purpose of revenue” and thus deprived the council of any discretion because under such a revenue law “every one who complies with the conditions expressed as to filing bond and paying the mulct tax is entitled to a permit.” As a final public policy argument, which would ring perversely today, but even in 1931, given the lingering concern for smoking initiation among minors, presumably drew whatever resonance it may have engendered from the lower incomes of the Great Depression, Ford Hopkins attacked the council’s purported capping of the number of permits (so as to exclude the chains) as logically resulting in allow[ing] those having permits to exploit the public and to maintain an artificial price level. ... The fear of the present permit holders who are so anxious to have a permit denied to this plaintiff is that if a permit is granted the present permit holders will not be able to maintain the artificial and unwarranted price of cigarettes which now prevails in...Iowa

---

304Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 31.
305Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 49.
306Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 32.
307Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 15.
308Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 48. In fact, Ford Hopkins implicitly conceded that the council did retain some discretion by stating that the council could not refuse it a permit “when it brings itself in [sic] the same situation and class as those to whom the City Council has granted cigarette permits.” Id. at 32. Without explaining what those terms meant, the plaintiff was presumably conceding that the council could lawfully distinguish between and among applicants in different situations and classes.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

City... It is the duty of the members of the City Council...to do those acts which will enable the people of Iowa City...to secure the benefits of free competition among merchants. ...

It is difficult to see how the defendants can profess to serve the great mass of the people who elect them and can exercise the powers “held by them in trust for the people of this municipality, and for the public generally,” when they vote to maintain an artificial price level on a commonly used article of commerce, particularly when the result of the artificial price level is to increase the wealth of a limited number at the expense of the majority.309

The city’s brief, filed in February 1931, was much more concise and focused. In contrast to the multiple and diffuse factual issues that Ford Hopkins presented to the court as the questions for resolution, the defendants articulated one question—whether a city council had “legal discretion to limit the number of...permits it will issue when in its judgment a greater number would be inimical to the safety, health, and morals of the inhabitants of the municipality and especially of its youth....”310 Although the medical and lay opinion that cigarettes were harmful for minors might not be universal, “where there are conflicting scientific beliefs...it is for the city council to determine upon which theory it will base its regulations....”311 The city rebutted the plaintiff’s suggestion that the city council lacked authority to limit the number of permits because it was not specifically granted by arguing that it was comprehended within the authority to refuse all permits.312 Hayek’s most transparently untenable argument was directed at refuting the plaintiff’s critique of the statutory meaning of “may.” His assertion that the statutory language confirmed the construction of the city council’s power as discretionary and “not merely ministerial” was nonsensically based on the further assertion that although the statute did use “‘may’” with regard to the council’s granting the permit and the clerk’s issuing it, the law also

309 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument at 48.
310 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument, at 2.
311 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument, at 16. Bizarrely, Hayek injected his “personal opinion...that the youth should be confronted less frequently with the appealing cigarette.” The sole basis for this opinion was his equally bizarre reference to a finding in a series of tests by “Miss Frey, former research worker in Iowa City,...that cigarette-smoking coeds fell 13.3 per cent. below non-smokers in physical efficiency.” Id. at 13.
312 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument, at 13.
went on to use “‘may’” for the county board of supervisors and “‘shall’” for the county auditor. It is difficult to imagine that Hayek had failed to understand that these disparate, irreconcilable, and ultimately incoherent uses of “‘may’” could, when subjected to a purely abstract semantic interpretation, devoid of analysis of the legislative history (including the sloppily drafted, but ultimately meaningless, word changes) and purpose, not ground city councils’ discretionary powers.313 Finally, the defendants, while staunchly denying that they had denied Ford Hopkins a permit because it was a chain store, remarkably conceded that “[w]e do not contend that appellant may be discriminated against because it is a chain store.” Their much more modest contention was simply that the plaintiff had not carried and could not carry its burden of proving that the council’s decision to limit the number of permits in order to enforce the ban on selling to minors more effectively—the real reason for denying Ford Hopkins a permit—was capricious and arbitrary.314

The plaintiff’s reply brief of March 1931 was even testier and more sarcastic than its previous submission. Although skepticism regarding council members’ asseverations that their votes against A & P and Ford Hopkins had not been motivated by anti-chain store sentiments was hardly out of place—surprisingly, nowhere did the plaintiff seek to buttress its claim of discrimination by pointing to similar litigation in Perry and Waterloo and the city council’s action in Cedar Rapids, where Ford Hopkins’ law firm was located—the plaintiff went far beyond challenging the city council’s “good faith” and its being in cahoots with “Mr. Whetstone and other local merchants [who] didn’t want their profit-seeking monopoly interfered with”315 by charging bias on Judge Popham’s part: “Even the trial court, anxious as he [sic] was to find in favor of the City Council, would not go to the extent of declaring the action of the City Council was in good faith.”316

313 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument, at 16-17. Hayek revamped his analysis in the defendants’ petition for rehearing, but it remained absurd. He asserted that the legislature used “‘may’” because cities had “‘various agencies for performing ministerial duties such as Mayors, City Clerks, City Auditors, Collectors, and others,’” thus implying that the council “‘might designate this ministerial duty to others of its agents,’” whereas “‘shall’” reflected the uniform designation of auditors as the ministerial officer in the counties. Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 31.

314 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument, at 22 (quote), 13.

315 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Reply Brief and Argument at 7.

316 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s
The only further concession that the company appeared willing to make at this late stage of the litigation again pertained to the statutory term “may”: assuming, for the sake of argument, that the word indicated a legislative intent to confer some discretion on city councils, the plaintiff now acknowledged that such discretion was “of necessity limited to” (but in any event included) “a determination of the question whether the applicant for a license is a fit person qualified to have a license...”

However, the most significant break with its previous approach that Ford Hopkins made in its reply brief was its plea to the Iowa Supreme Court to turn a new jurisprudential page by getting in sync with the age of normalcy’s acceptance of the sale and use of cigarettes as perfectly legitimate and normal commercial and social activities that had in fact become the norm:

At one time considerable sentiment opposing the sale of cigarettes was prevalent in some of the United States. Laws forbidding the sale of cigarettes were enacted. These laws were sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States solely upon the ground that the legislature could declare the public policy of the particular state. The prejudice against the use of cigarettes has disappeared, and the use thereof has become almost universal. The change of sentiment has been reflected in the various state legislatures which have repealed the legislation forbidding the sale of cigarettes. The legislature of the State of Iowa, at the 39th General Assembly, repealed previous anti-cigarette legislation and legalized the sale of cigarettes in Iowa. This act of the legislature was clearly a recognition of the change in public sentiment and was a recognition that the sale of cigarettes was a legitimate business.

As plausible as some of these empirical claims were, the far-reaching distorted interpretation of legislative history and intent that the company’s lawyers sought to hitch to them was mere assertion based on no reference whatsoever to the slightest shred of evidence:

There is nothing in the act authorizing the sale of cigarettes in Iowa which in any way indicates an intention on the part of the legislature to authorize local authorities to prohibit the sale of cigarettes by a particular individual or to limit the number of permits. Such construction is inconsistent with the legislative pronouncement.

\[\text{Reply Brief and Argument at 9.} \]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{317}}\text{Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Reply Brief and Argument at 15.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{318}}\text{Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Reply Brief and Argument at 26.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{319}}\text{Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s}\]
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

In the interim before the Iowa Supreme Court issued its decision on the appeal, the city council at its mid-year session in 1931, immediately after having directed the clerk to issue permits to 34 applicants, unanimously voted to adopt a resolution that stopped short of imposing a ceiling on the number of outstanding permits at any one time, although the Press-Citizen regarded the council as having “stood firm...on its previous decision about new cigaret licenses....”

WHEREAS, it is the desire of the City Council that the number of licenses to sell cigarettes and cigarette papers be limited and that permits be granted only to such persons, firms, and corporations as will comply with the law relative to the sale of cigarettes and cigarette papers, and before any permits are granted, except in cases where the City Council has knowledge of the record of the applicant as to the observance of the law, investigation shall be made, therefore,

BE IT RESOLVED, that permits be granted to such persons, firms, and corporations only as have previously been granted permits, and that all other applications be filed and action thereon deferred pending investigation as to the question of the qualifications of the applicants and the general limitation of the number of permits to be granted.

In a fractured opinion issued in February 1932, the Iowa Supreme Court—none of whose members was a Democrat—reversed Judge Popham’s denial of mandamus, ruling instead that the city council should have granted Ford Hopkins Company a permit. Written by Republican Justice Elma Albert (1925-36), the opinion was concurred in by Republican Justices Lawrence De Graff (1921-32) and John Grimm (1929-32), who, remarkably, had, until his appointment to the Court, been a name partner in the Cedar Rapids corporate law firm that represented Ford Hopkins in the case he decided and that he rejoined immediately after resigning from the Court in 1932. It became the majority opinion of the nine-member Court because Justices Edgar Morling (1925-32) and James Kindig (Republican, 1927-34) specially concurred in it.

Albert framed the case as dominated by two interlocking questions: Did the city council have “any discretion whatever” in acting on plaintiff’s permit application? And if so, what limits were placed on the exercise of that discretion?

Reply Brief and Argument at 26.

321Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of July 3, 1931, 21:204.
322All were Republicans except Edgar Morling, whose various biographical sketches mentioned no party affiliation. State of Iowa: 1929-30: Official Register 201 (33d No.); State of Iowa: 1931-32: Official Register 213-14 (34th No.); State of Iowa: 1933-1934: Official Register 54-56 (35th No.).
323Martindale’s American Law Directory 273 (1929); http://www.judicial.state.ia.us
Albert concluded that although factually the record did “not show the reasons for the refusal of this permit,” there was no doubt that the council had discriminated against Ford Hopkins, even vis-a-vis other chain stores. The council, however, took the position that it had “a broad and unqualified discretion to grant or refuse a permit for any reason deemed by it, in good faith, to be sufficient.” This “absolute discretion” derived, according to the defendants, from the legislature’s use of “may” in authorizing councils to grant permits.324

Albert rejected this absolutist, but good faith-constrained, interpretation because:

A review of the past legislation touching this subject shows that until the adoption of the present law, the sale of cigarettes and cigarette papers was absolutely prohibited under the statutes of this state. Their sale is still prohibited unless a permit for the sale is procured in the manner provided by law. It is apparent, after reviewing the past and taking into consideration the present legislation on this subject, that the purpose of the Legislature in passing the present law was to give each municipality designated in the statute the right to say whether or not cigarettes should be sold within its boundaries. In other words, it was the “local option” statute pure and simple, and the use of the word “may” in the above statute shows that was the intent of the Legislature, and thereunder each municipality might determine for itself whether or not cigarettes should be sold within its boundaries.325

To this analysis explaining that the legislature had empowered local governments to prohibit the sale of cigarettes Albert then tacked on this non sequitur: “It necessarily follows from this that when the city council has determined that cigarettes shall be sold within its boundaries, every applicant for a permit who complies with the requirements of the statute is entitled to a permit.”326 Albert failed to justify his interpretive leap that denied that a conceded legislative conferral of all-encompassing power to prohibit all cigarette sales excluded the authority to limit the number of permits in order to insure adequate enforcement consistent with the city’s budgetary resources. The only requirement or qualification that Albert found in the statute for being granted a permit was owning or operating the place where the sales were to be made. Thus

324Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 687-88 (Iowa 1932).
325Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 688 (Iowa 1932).
326Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 688 (Iowa 1932). The defendants ironically characterized this discretion as dying “upon its being exercised”; alternatively, “as soon as the Council has...granted a permit to one person, then the word ‘may’ in the statute is,...by some subtle alchemy, turned into the word ‘must.’” Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 7, 8.
once the council decided that cigarettes may be sold, and once it found that this “condition precedent” had been met, “there is nothing left for the city council to do except to grant such permit.” The majority’s lame exegesis of the word “may” was that it was designed to indicate that the council “‘may’ refuse to grant a permit” if the applicant did not own or operate the place where the cigarettes were to be sold.\footnote{Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 688 (Iowa 1932).} However, this interpretation was illogical and incoherent since the legislature conferred no discretion on councils to grant permits to applicants who lacked this qualification; on the contrary, it was, according to Albert, the only basis for denying a permit. Nevertheless, the majority, reversing the trial court, held that the council should have granted Ford Hopkins Company a permit.

The special concurrence was based on the asserted grounds that the evidence conclusively showed that the city council’s denial of a permit was unlawful because it was “discriminatory and purely arbitrary....” In other words, Morling and Kindig did not subscribe to the rest of Albert’s opinion, but merely agreed with the outcome because they took the position that no matter how much discretion the legislature conferred on councils, it could not have lawfully encompassed this kind.\footnote{Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 689 (Iowa 1932).}

Despite the majority opinion’s narrow, if not crabbed, basis, it is crucial to observe that even the majority fully acknowledged that, without any doubt, the legislature had empowered local governments to perpetuate the prohibition on cigarette sales that had been initiated in 1896.

The dissent, written by Republican Justice Frederick Faville (1921-32) and concurred in by Republican Justices Henry Wagner (1927-32), Truman Stevens (1917-34), and William Evans (1908-34), criticized and refuted the entire basis of Albert’s approach. Although the dissenters did not deny that city councils were empowered to ban all cigarette sales if they so chose, they correctly pointed out that:

The statute does not contemplate any such thing as a general resolution of a city council as to whether permits to sell cigarettes shall or shall not be granted within the municipality.
Section 1557 makes the granting or refusal of a permit a personal matter between the applicant and the city council in each and every separate and individual instance. ... There is not a hint in the statute as to any general resolution of the city council as to whether permits to sell cigarettes shall or shall not be allowed within the municipality.\footnote{Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 689 (Iowa 1932).}
Instead, Faville observed:

The whole history, theory, and purpose of the statute is to make the permit a trust granted by proper local authority which renders the holder immune from prosecution for that which, but for the permit, would be a crime. It is most distinctly and essentially a police regulation. By the very terms of the statute the duty is imposed upon the city council (or board of supervisors) to determine who may be thus rendered immune from criminal prosecution. The Legislature used the word “may” advisedly and intentionally. By express, direct, and unambiguous language it placed a discretion and a responsibility as well upon the local authorities.

In my judgment, it is a clear perversion, not only of the intent but of the very language of the statute, to hold that because the city council may grant a permit to one proper applicant, ipso facto it must grant a permit to each and every applicant, regardless of who or what such applicant may be, save only, as the majority say, the applicant “owns or operates the place from which sales are to be made.” Under such a holding the Y. M. C. A. and the notorious bootlegger stand on an absolute equality, and each must be clothed with the trust to do that which otherwise would be a crime.

The law does not so provide, and we should not enlarge it beyond its plain and explicit language.

It is the universal holding that in statutes of this character the word “may” is to be construed as permissive and not mandatory. The decisions are almost without number and can be found in Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, under the word “May.” The majority construe the word as mandatory instead of permissive. They make it the equivalent of “must,” which is directly contrary to every rule of construction as applied to statutes of this character. ... I think the city council has not only a right but a duty under this statute to properly exercise its discretion as to whether a permit shall be granted to any individual applicant, and that duty involves much more than merely ascertaining whether or not the applicant owns or operates the place where the sales are to be made.330

Turning to the facts, the dissenters noted that once the council had issued 51 permits, on August 1, 1930, it ordered its ordinance committee to draft an ordinance limiting the number of permits and granting none beyond that level. Shortly thereafter both Ford Hopkins and another applicant filed applications, both of which the council denied while adopting a resolution explaining that with the already large number of existing permit holders, granting additional permits burdened the city’s ability to enforce the law regarding the sale of cigarettes to minors. Following this denial, the dissenters found, the council had denied all applications. This self-limitation was simply an exercise of the legislatively conferred discretion, for which the Supreme Court was not authorized to substitute its own discretionary judgment as to whether the cap should be set at a higher number. 331

330Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 690 (Iowa 1932).

As far as the plaintiff’s claim was concerned that the council had acted arbitrarily because its denial of the permit was based on Ford Hopkins’ status as a chain store, the dissenters argued that the trial judge had correctly ruled that the plaintiff had failed to prove this point. However, even if the council had refused the permit on these grounds, the dissenters argued that such a judgment would still not have been so arbitrary as to justify issuance of a writ of mandamus: “Many good reasons could well be urged why a city council might hesitate to grant a permit to a foreign corporation, with only employees living within the city where the permit was granted, and with the possibility of frequent changes in such employees. The law contemplates a large degree of personal responsibility on the part of one to whom the permit is granted and we should not hold, as a matter of law, that the refusal of a permit to a foreign corporation operating as a chain store is such an arbitrary classification as to require the court to hold it to be void.” 332

The Democratic Iowa Supreme Court Reverses Itself

Three days after the Iowa Supreme Court had handed down its decision, the press reported that the city council might seek a rehearing based on the ruling’s nature and closeness. 333 A week later Ford Hopkins filed another application for a permit, 334 which the council tabled pending the city attorney’s report on the advisability of petitioning for a rehearing, which the council then promptly decided to instruct Hayek to request. 335

In its petition for rehearing the council lashed its fate to the dissenting opinion so irretrievably that it ventured the sarcastic blast that the dissent was so “able, logical and... convincing” that “[t]he only reason that we can think of for” the majority’s not having adopted it was “that the majority did not read it.” 336 The

---

331 Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 691 (Iowa 1932).
332 Ford Hopkins Co. v. City of Iowa City, 248 NW 687, 691 (Iowa 1932).
334 Application for a Cigarette Permit (Feb. 19, 1932) and Bond for Sale of Cigarettes (Feb. 19, 1932). Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings, Nov. 1931-Apr. 1933, Roll No. I 12 (Iowa City Clerk’s Office).
335 Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of February 19, 1932 (21:313); “Council Asks Re-Hearing of Cigaret Case,” ICP-C, Feb. 20, 1932 (2:8).
336 Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 7.
city forcefully sought to extend the boundaries of its discretionary power to grant cigarette permits by contending that it “had the right to refuse to grant a license to the appellant solely on the ground that it was a ‘chain store’...and such a decision would not be arbitrary” because “granting...a license to carry on a detrimental and tolerated business contemplates a consideration of all the qualifications of the applicant as bearing on the probable manner in which the business will be conducted. [T]he difference between a store owned by a non-resident corporation, and operated entirely by hired servants, many of whom are not even permanent residents of the city, and a store owned and operated by a resident taxpayer, who is presumed to have the moral welfare of his city at heart, is such as to justify a distinction or discrimination in granting a permit...”

The city’s aggressiveness was also reflected in its belittling Ford Hopkins’ position of basing “its desire to sell cigarettes upon no other ground” than wanting to “make a little more money” rather than an “intention...to advance the morals, or improve the health or benefit in any way the citizens of Iowa City, whether young or old.” But the heart of the defendants’ petition was its very expansive, yet (largely) historically accurate, portrayal of the discretion that the legislature had conferred on local governments to suppress or promote cigarettes. Although akin to the dissenters’ approach, the city’s went even further in arguing that:

The Legislature did not intend when it prohibited the sale of cigarettes and then only allowed their sale under certain conditions and upon the granting of a license to so arrange it that every place of business in a town should be allowed to sell cigarettes. The Legislature evidently did not intend to make it extremely convenient for everyone to purchase cigarettes without going more than a block away from home; yet such situation may very readily develop if the Council of the City has no authority or power to limit the number of licenses.... Even entirely aside from moral grounds for such limitations or if not moral, at least, grounds which took into consideration an attempt to diminish the evil of the sale and use of cigarettes, particularly by minors, the Council had a right to take into consideration the financial situation or its effect upon the town and the revenues of the town. It had the right to say, “the more cigarette licenses were issued, the larger will be the revenue, and therefore, we will issue all the cigarette permits that are asked for and not only that, we will encourage people to ask for them.” On the other hand, they had the right to consider the overhead or expense that they would incur in any additional inspection or police control that might be required to see that the law as to selling cigarettes to minors was obeyed. They had a right to figure, for instance, that one additional policeman could perform all the additional work required to keep track of fifty places where they sold cigarettes, but that he could not take care of any more than that and therefore, the granting of one, two or a dozen more would create an expense greater than the revenue derived. ... The council...had the right to consider that the more places...that were licensed to sell cigarettes, the more temptation there would be on the part of each place to sell cigarettes to minors, because the more competition there was in the sale of cigarettes, the more anxious the people selling them would be to increase their sales or at least prevent the decrease of their sales in order to be able to pay the license fee. There was therefore a direct danger here with regard to minors buying cigarettes or procuring cigarettes on account of the increase of the number of permits.

337Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 6.

338Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 41.

Ironically, the defendants, while implying that Iowa City belonged in the group that had taken the legislature up on its offer to “diminish the evil of the sale and use of cigarettes,” had in fact been integral agents of a more than decade-long tradition of freely granting and issuing permits without giving any publicly expressed thought to the consequences for the general welfare as opposed to local businessmen’s profits. Indeed, the city council’s laissez-faire policy, which entailed flooding the central business district with permits that kept downtown awash in cigarettes, had implemented one dimension of the legislature’s intent (or at least acquiescence in a foreseeable result) that the defendants’ brief had self-contradictorily misrepresented—namely, making cigarettes extremely available, accessible, and convenient to buy if local communities and the government officials they elected desired such an outcome.

Much of Ford Hopkins’ submission resisting the city council’s petition for a rehearing filed in April 1932 was devoted to hurling invective at the councilmen and their monopoly-seeking mercantile “friends,” some of it recycled from previous pleadings. Speaking “off the record,” the company’s lawyer taunted the defendants by asking why the council granted numerous permits to its “special friends” in July 1931, while the case was pending, especially if it really desired to protect the youth’s moral welfare and to limit the consumption of cigarettes: “The entire record presents a situation wherein it is preposterous and ridiculous to ask the Court to find that the appellees were acting in good faith.” In particular, Whetstone, whose three stores were in “direct competition with” Ford 339Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 34-36.

340Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Resistance to Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 18.

341Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Resistance to Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 4.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Hopkins, was scored as “one of the leaders in a movement to preserve for himself and other local merchants a virtual monopoly on the cigarette business in Iowa City...at exorbitant prices.” The sarcasm reached its peak when the company accused the city council of having suborned Alice Goza to apply for a permit: “‘poor Alice’ no doubt served her useful purpose in having her application denied, together with the application of the appellant, in order that an appearance of apparent fairness was given to the farce enacted by the appellees on September 26, 1930.” Without explaining how 51 small stores could constitute a “monopoly,” Ford Hopkins did unburden itself of the precise source of the outrage that purportedly went to the absolute core of the commonwealth: “[I]t is difficult to imagine any result more foreign to American institutions and justice than the idea that a group of municipal officers could at their whim and fancy confer or withhold the right to sell cigarettes without any measure of judicial regulation or control.” In the event, the lawyers for the city council saw no constitutional dimension implicated in the absence of a “vested right to engage in the cigarette business” and the Iowa Supreme Court apparently failed to share the cigarette price-cutting chain drug store’s sense of political abomination: on June 24, 1932, it withdrew the original opinion and granted Iowa City’s petition for a rehearing.

The city council in its brief submitted to the Court on resubmission reinforced its aggressive stance, adopting the position that even though it had refused the permit on the grounds that “too many were engaging in the business for the well being of the town,” it could nevertheless be lawful to deny a permit because the applicant was a chain store:

342Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Resistance to Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 11.
343Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Resistance to Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 16.
344Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Resistance to Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 50.
345Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Reply to Resistance to Rehearing at 9.
346Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 3; “Petition for Rehearing in Cigaret Case,” ICP-C, June 20, 1932 (2:1); “City to Get Rehearing in Cigaret Case,” ICP-C, June 24, 1932 (2:1).
347Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 76.
[1] If the council did actually refuse to grant the permit on the ground that the applicant was a foreign corporation or was what is commonly known as a chain store, yet if the council really believed that there were disadvantages to the city in this class of business in allowing it to be carried on by a foreign corporation or a chain store, such a decision, if made in good faith, would not be arbitrary in such a sense as...would justify the courts in interfering with it.348

Whatever plausibility attached to the city’s arguments in the abstract concerning possible relevant differences between locally owned and national chain stores was dissipated by the self-contradictory assertion that a permanent resident engaged in the “detrimental business” of selling cigarettes was “presumed to have the moral welfare of the residents of his city at heart....”349 Instead of explaining why such a moral businessman would be selling cigarettes at all, the defendants chose to dwell on the claim that it was “significant” that the first chain store permits refused, and, in fact, the first permits refused at all...were permits refused to a chain store which were not original permits but renewals. In other words, they had tried out the particular chain stores, the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, and after a trial, we presume of two years,...they had decided not to issue them any more and they stuck to that position. And possibly their experience with this chain store had something to do with their refusal to issue a permit to another chain store, the plaintiff in this case.... 350

This sheer speculation not only stood in sharp contrast to the defendants’ alleged preference in this context for “concrete evidence,”351 but verged on the surreal since the speculators were the defendant councilmen themselves and their lawyer, the city attorney, who had been free to put on whatever evidence they wished to shed light on their actual reasons for having refused to renew A & P’s permits. (This faux-schizophrenic approach was also on display in the claim that “[i]f the Council should be criticised [sic] at all it would seem to us that it might be criticized for issuing so many cigarette permits rather than for issuing so few. It would seem to us that they would be entitled to greater praise if they had begun

348Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 76-77.
349Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 77.
350Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 77.
351Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 77.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales to limit the number when there were only thirty-five....”\textsuperscript{352} Yet, to the extent that they testified about A & P at all, none of them offered any substantive reason for the refusal, let alone made any mention of alleged deleterious experiences with A & P.\textsuperscript{353} In light of the contemporaneous newspaper reporting about local retailers’ dissatisfaction with A & P’s lower cigarette prices, the defendants’ smokescreen speculation in their brief forfeited any claim to credibility. Apparently, although the lawyers were willing to argue to the Iowa Supreme Court that the city council was empowered to single out foreign chain stores for denials, they did not believe that they would enhance their chance of prevailing if they conceded that they had discriminated against them simply because they were outcompeting local retailers. It is unknown whether Iowa City’s counsel considered developing the argument that a city council was authorized to deny permits to chain stores on the grounds that their lower prices encouraged the consumption, especially by young people, of a “deleterious” commodity.

The same spirit of aggressive optimism about pushing the boundaries of permissible discretion also pervaded the city-defendants’ critique of Ford Hopkins’ contention that if the council were empowered to limit the number of permits, the end result might be the creation of a monopoly for a favored few. Again manifestly taking the position that cigarettes constituted a special category as a harmful commercial product, the city argued that “[w]hile we contend that in a business of this sort where the attempt is to regulate and discourage it the Council would even have a right to grant only one or two permits, yet it is not necessary that we should be right as to this in order to meet the situation in the present case” (because the existence of 51 sellers would preclude any concern about monopoly).\textsuperscript{354}

On rehearing the opinion was unanimous, but only six justices participated—the same six who had formed the majority in \textit{Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown} six weeks earlier. Hubert Utterback did not participate because his \textsuperscript{352}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 79.

\textsuperscript{353}Elsewhere in the same brief the city asserted, without a shred of evidence, that the plaintiff had “los[t] sight of the fact that the refusal to renew three permits to the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company...would indicate that there was something unsatisfactory about the way this chain store was handling the business, and that permits were refused on that ground.” Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 14. As the city well knew, the way A & P was pricing cigarettes was “unsatisfactory” to the other permit holders.

\textsuperscript{354}Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 84.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

term had come to an end on April 16 as a result of a judicial resolution of a dispute as to who was entitled to the seat vacated by Morling’s death. Why Kintzinger and Albert, who did vote in other cases decided the same day, did not participate is unclear; especially puzzling, given his investment in the majority opinion in Ford Hopkins I, is Albert’s failure to dissent.

Based on the same argument that the Court had deemed without merit in Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown, Justice Kindig quickly dismissed Ford Hopkins’ contention that the only discretion the city council had was to “decide the general policy of permitting or not permitting cigarette sales,” but that once it decided to permit sales, it was required to grant a permit to each applicant complying with the law. Proceeding to the plaintiff’s alternative argument that even if it had discretion, the council could not exercise it arbitrarily, Kindig found that, as in Bernstein, the facts in Ford Hopkins II made it unnecessary to determine whether the city council’s discretion to grant cigarette permits was absolute or limited. The principal fact—as represented by the preponderance of the testimony—that the Court had especially in mind was that the council had refused the permit not in order to discriminate against chain stores, but because it wanted to limit the total number outstanding at any time to 51 in order to police the holders better and protect minor school children in addition to 3,000 minors attending the State University of Iowa, many of whom passed the plaintiff’s attractive store front prominently located in the central downtown. That the council also denied permits to “many other stores” for the same reason also demonstrated it had “clearly acted within its discretion....”

Discussion of Ford Hopkins’ third and final contention that the council had violated its constitutional interstate commerce and due process rights prompted the Iowa Supreme Court to review its and the U.S. Supreme Court’s anti-cigarette cases going back to the 1890s (which were analyzed in detail above). The central conclusion that Kindig derived from these cases was that since it was “constitutional under the police power of the state to prohibit the sale of cigarettes entirely, it is likewise constitutional to regulate and limit the sale thereof.”

355Brown v Martin, 216 Iowa 1272 (May 15, 1933) (Kintzinger and Albert participated). In Anderson v Droge, 216 Iowa 159 (May 15, 1933), and Ransom v Mellor, 216 Iowa 197 (May 15, 1933) Albert participated as did George Claussen, who had ousted Utterback on April 16.

356Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286, 1288 (1933), reh’g denied (1933).

357Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286, 1289-91 (1933), reh ’g denied (1933).

358See above chs. 11-12.
Because the city council neither infringed on congressional power to regulate interstate commerce nor discriminated against cigarettes manufactured or sold in or imported into Iowa, the factually and legally substantial basis, grounded in the police power to protect minors’ health and morals, for setting a maximum number of permits was not arbitrary.\textsuperscript{359}

\textit{The City Council Reverses Itself and Snatches Defeat from Its Own Victorious Jaws}

Several weeks after the Iowa Supreme Court had issued its second decision in the case, Tyrrell M. Ingersoll, one of the lawyers from the Cedar Rapids firm (Wheeler, Elliott, Shuttleworth, & Ingersoll) that represented Ford Hopkins “wandered into the office” of the Des Moines firm (Clark, Byers, Hutchinson & Garber) that had co-represented the City of Iowa City.\textsuperscript{360} Charles Hutchinson, who had played such a prominent role in opposing the repeal of the cigarette ban in 1921,\textsuperscript{361} informed Iowa City’s city attorney, Will Hayek, that “Mr. Ingersoll...served a notice of intention to petition for rehearing in our famous cigarette case,” adding dryly: “I had supposed in view of the Marshalltown case and that the opinion in our case was on a rehearing that that would have satisfied the other fellows, but apparently it has not.”\textsuperscript{362}

Hutchinson’s irony notwithstanding, on June 30, just six weeks after the Supreme Court decision—“in a case which attracted national attention in legal circles”\textsuperscript{363}—had vindicated the city council’s power to deny permits, the council made its peace with Ford Hopkins by approving the latter’s application for a permit by means of a blanket resolution encompassing 31 other applicants as well. To be sure, the action was contested, two of six members opposing the entire \textsuperscript{359}Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286, 1294-95 (1933), \textit{reh’g denied} (1933).

\textsuperscript{360}Chas. Hutchinson to Will J. Hayek (June 8, 1933), in Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings (Apr. 1933 - Apr. 19, 1935), Roll No. I 13 (Iowa City Clerk’s Office).

\textsuperscript{361}See above ch. 15.

\textsuperscript{362}Chas. Hutchinson to Will J. Hayek (June 8, 1933), in Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings (Apr. 1933 - Apr. 19, 1935), Roll No. I 13 (Iowa City Clerk’s Office). The city council received and placed this letter on file. Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 16, 1933 (21:602).

\textsuperscript{363}“Three Year Legal Battle over Cigaret License for Drug Store Brought to End,” \textit{ICP-C}, July 1, 1933 (3:3-4).
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

Control of the council, on which Democrats had held a majority of 5 to 2 in 1929 and 6 to 1 in 1931, had passed to Republicans, who, having appropriated the slogan “New Deal” from President Roosevelt, in 1933 gained four of seven seats, but party composition does not appear to have generated the outcome, since, with one Republican not voting, two-thirds of members of both parties voted to grant the permit. Republican Roswell B. Ayers, a chamber of commerce member who owned a lumber yard, offered an amendment striking out Ford Hopkins from the list of applicants, but it lost because none of his colleagues would second it. Nevertheless, on the resolution itself Democrat Michael J. McGuan, a pharmacist who owned his own drug store, joined Ayers in voting Nay, while Republicans Van der Zee and James Stronks (manager of Standard Publications and one-time president of the chamber of commerce), and Democrats Edward Sybil (owner of a sheet metal works/stove store) and John P. Memler (retail grocery store owner) voted to adopt it. Sometime before the meeting Ford Hopkins had notified the council that—like the city in 1932—it would request a rehearing from the Supreme Court. On June 29, when the store’s manager, Thomas Meredith, had applied for a permit, he had appended a letter, stating through the firm’s lawyers, R. C. Davis and former Iowa City mayor Ingalls Swisher, that Ford Hopkins “would be willing to dismiss the case and pay all court costs if the council granted the company a cigaret permit.”

364 Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 30, 1933, 22:3. Two years later, with an entirely new membership except for Van der Zee, the council granted the permit unanimously. Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 21, 1935, 22:382.

365 The party affiliation for 1933 is taken from “Republicans Sweep City Election,” DI, Mar. 28, 1933 (1:5-8).

366 “Candidates Seeking Municipal Office,” DI, Mar. 28, 1931 (1:3-6, at 3:2-4 at 4); Polk’s Iowa City (Iowa) Directory: 1932, at 78 (1931) (F. E. Ayers Co.).

367 Iowa City Finance, Council Proceedings, Apr. 1933-Apr. 19, 1935, Roll No. 113 (June 30, 1933) (Iowa City City Clerk’s Office).

368 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).

369 Polk’s Iowa City (Iowa) Directory: 1932, at 348 (1931); “Republicans Sweep City Election,” Daily Iowan (Iowa City), Mar. 28, 1933 (1:5-8, at 8:5-7 at 6).

371 1920 Census of Population (HeritageQuest).

373 “Three Year Legal Battle over Cigaret License for Drug Store Brought to End,” ICP-C, July 1, 1933 (3:3-4).
threat/offer would have exerted any pressure on the city counsel is unclear: after all, the Supreme Court’s unanimous vote in Ford Hopkins Company v. City of Iowa City and the cumulative impact of that decision and Bernstein v. City of Marshalltown made it extraordinarily improbable that the Court would revisit the issue. Moreover, granting the permit would subvert the public policies underlying the decision to litigate in the first place. The city, in the view of the Press-Citizen, had permitted Ford Hopkins to deprive it of its freedom of action by dealing with its application at a time when only 33 other applications were on file or already granted: since the total of 34 fell below the limit over which the city had litigated, the council was precluded from refusing a permit on that basis. In the event, Ford Hopkins’ manager announced that the store would start selling cigarettes the following Monday.

Curiously, in spite of the deal, Ford Hopkins not only did not dismiss the case, but in July 1933 adopted a possibly even more sneering tone toward the council in its petition for rehearing than it had displayed in earlier submissions. In addition to accusing the councilmen of having had as their “real purpose...protect[ing] their political henchmen against competition in the sale of cigarettes,” the plaintiff hinted at bribery in connection with “creat[ing] a monopoly for the benefit of...friends with or without secret compensation.”

The company undertook a special effort to enhance the credibility of its star witness, Van der Zee, whom in December 1932 it had praised for not being a “political trimmer,” by inferring from his being the “only University representative” on the council that he “was really interested in the welfare of the students.” Incredibly, the lawyers appeared to be oblivious of the self-refutation they were creating by praising him for having voted to grant Ford Hopkins a permit “because he opposed the existing profiteering by maintenance of high prices by those holding permits....” How to reconcile his support for lower

---

374“Three Year Legal Battle over Cigaret License for Drug Store Brought to End,” ICP-C, July 1, 1933 (3:3-4) (erroneously stating twice that the limit was 41 instead of 51). In addition to the 31 other applications granted on June 30, the council had earlier unanimously directed the clerk to issue two permits. Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of June 2, 1933 (21:598); Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of June 16, 1933 (21:601).
376*Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City*, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Petition for Rehearing, Argument and Notice of Oral Argument at 2-3.
377*Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City*, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Reply Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 3.
378*Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City*, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Petition
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

cigarette prices, which would stimulate even greater consumption, with a concern for students’ welfare Elliott and his fellow lawyers did not stop to explain. (The city, which had earlier mockingly declared that it was “a little difficult to understand why” a university professor like Van der Zee “should be so obsessed with the idea that the sale of cigarettes in unlimited quantities would be a good thing for the students,” submitted a one-page reply, which did not even bother to hide its contempt for what it regarded as a baseless petition.)\textsuperscript{379} Moreover, the company did not even submit its petition until after the city council had granted the permit. Indeed, it called the Supreme Court’s attention to that action, explaining that the council had mooted the issuance of the writ of mandamus. Nevertheless, in addition to pointing out that the question of costs was still involved, Ford Hopkins assured the justices that “more important is the fact that the present opinion establishes a bad precedent and one wholly wrong in principle. It will lead to serious abuses. In the interest of public justice and to safeguard the rights of other applicants for permits of various kinds from city councils, the opinion should not be permitted to stand.”\textsuperscript{380}

That Lewis Ruskin was generously footing the legal bill on other firms’ behalf is so implausible—after all, Ford Hopkins was only a small chain competing against national drugs chains with hundreds of stores\textsuperscript{382}—that it raises the possibility that he was seeking to prevent other cities in Iowa from frustrating his profitable sale of cigarettes as he opened stores elsewhere. In fact, the store that Ford Hopkins opened in Cedar Rapids in 1936 was its sixteenth in Iowa and \textsuperscript{379}\textsuperscript{379} Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 78.

\textsuperscript{380}\textsuperscript{380} Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Resistance to Appellant’s Petition for Rehearing at 2. In particular, the defendants ridiculed the appellant’s having quoted “the alleged funny column of the Register,” whose author would be appropriate to quote if he were a member of the Supreme Court, but since “he has never advanced in the law so far as even being a Justice of the Peace,” they failed to see the relevance. \textit{Id}. For the quotation, see Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Petition for Rehearing, Argument and Notice of Oral Argument at 7. The column’s charge was that “[s]ince there are more than a dozen places within mashie shot of the campus where cigarettes are sold...[t]he ruling merely gives city councils a chance to...haze an occasional merchant who isn’t in the good graces.” H. S. M., “Over the Coffee,” \textit{DMR}, May 16, 1933 (16:3).

\textsuperscript{381}\textsuperscript{381} Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Petition for Rehearing, Argument and Notice of Oral Argument at 7-8.

its thirtieth overall. And while advertising themselves as “the world’s finest...druggists,” who “cater to” their customers’ health, the stores did include in their advertisements in Iowa “fresh mild smokes.” Another, albeit completely speculative possibility, is that Ford Hopkins was fronting for A & P, which might have concluded that its seemingly inexorable expansion and consolidating status as a commercial giant largely owned and controlled by one immensely rich family during a period of proliferating state-level anti-chain-store legislation would not have redounded to its benefit in further litigation. This speculation is at the very least consistent with the fact that the Cedar Rapids law firm representing Ford Hopkins was also counsel to A & P. To be sure, as soon as the Iowa legislature, joining the national trend, in 1935 enacted a Chain Store Tax Act, A & P challenged its constitutionality, securing a ruling from the U.S. Supreme Court that its graduated tax on gross receipts violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Defendant City of Iowa City, finally responding to plaintiff’s repeated taunts that the councilmen’s favored cigarette monopolizers were the real litigants footing the bill, counter-conjectured about how Ford Hopkins “alone could afford to carry on this ‘long and interminable course of litigation’ and still persist in it merely to obtain the 384MCG-G, June 1, 1933 (12:1-3).

385MCG-G, Feb. 21, 1935 (9:5-8).
387Recent Social Trends in the United States: Report of the President’s Research Committee on Social Trends 1435 (1933).
3891935 Iowa laws ch. 75, at 89. The law imposed both a per store tax rising from $5 to $155, depending on the number of stores in the chain, and a graduated gross receipts tax. Id. §§ 4(a) and (b) at 91-93.
390Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v Valentine, 12 F.Supp. 760 (S.D. Iowa 1935), aff’d, 299 US 32 (1936). The two giant drug store chains, Walgreen Co. and Liggett Drug Co., were also plaintiffs and/or intervenors in this litigation. Justices Brandeis and Cardozo dissented on the basis of their dissent in Fox v Standard Oil Co., 294 US 87 (1935), which argued that gross receipts were a sufficiently reasonable surrogate for profits as an indicator of capacity to pay to sustain a graduated gross receipts tax as a surrogate for a graduated profit tax, which was constitutional. The Iowa Supreme Court, in separate litigation, upheld both the validity of the graduated tax on the number of stores and the exemption of certain kinds of stores from the statute. Tollerton & Warfield Co. v Iowa State Board of Assessment and Review 222 Iowa 908 (1936).
391Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellant’s Resistance to Appellees’ Petition for Rehearing at 3.
Litigation over Cities’ Home-Rule Power to Prohibit Cigarette Sales

privilege of selling a few cigarettes in the City of Iowa City. Either there is a tremendous profit in the cigarette business or the appellant is a great stickler for constitutional rights, or else there is some other reason, for their using ‘every conceivable device’ to get a decision from the Supreme Court to the effect that a city council has no discretion as to the issuance of cigarette permits after it has issued one permit.” 392 Whatever the strategy underlying the effort to secure a second rehearing, however, on December 14, 1933, the Iowa Supreme Court denied the request. 393

In 1936 the city council reinstated its pre-1929 laissez-faire policy by unanimously granting two permits to A& P. 394 The council’s quondam alleged solicitude for minors’ health was invisible in its unanimous decision that year to issue a permit to the University’s Iowa Memorial Union Dining Service. 395 The council continued to grant permits unanimously to Ford Hopkins, 396 which featured cigarettes in its large newspaper advertisements 397 and remained in Iowa City until the early 1960s. 398 The city’s post-Ford Hopkins actions gave the most 392 Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933), Appellees’ Brief and Argument on Resubmission at 3.

393 Ford Hopkins Co. v City of Iowa City, 216 Iowa 1286 (1933).
394 Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 26, 1936, 23:53. The Press-Citizen’s extensive account of the meeting mentioned the permits, but offered no background information. “With the ‘City Fathers,’” ICP-C, June 27, 1936 (3:2-3). By 1959, the city council issued a permit to the Memorial Union and five university dormitories. Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 15, 1959, 34:25.
395 Iowa City City Council, Minutes of a Regular Meeting of March 6, 1936, 22:567. Unlike the minutes, the Press-Citizen characterized the action as a “renewal,” but an earlier grant was not identified in previous minutes. “With the ‘City Fathers,’” ICP-C, Mar. 7, 1936 (3:2-3).
397 E.g., Sheboygan Press, Nov. 30, 1934 (3:5-8) (charging $1.20 for a 200-cigarette carton of Lucky Strike, Chesterfield, Camel, and Old Gold).
398 1961 was the last year in which Ford Hopkins was listed in the city directory. Polk’s Iowa City (Iowa City, Iowa) Directory: 1961, at 141. In 1962, when it was no longer listed, its last address (201 E. Washington St.) was “vacant.” Polk’s Iowa City: Directory of Householders: 1962, at 127 (1963). As late as 1959 the city council issued a cigarette permit to Ford Hopkins. Iowa City City Council, Minutes of an Adjourned Meeting of June 15, 1959, 34:25. In 1948, the city council issued cigarette permits to Ford Hopkins and A & P, both of which had by then moved to other locations. “Proceedings eloquent lie to its litigational claims that its denial of permits to two chains had been motivated by a concern for the evils of unchecked cigarette sales and smoking.

In the aftermath of the Supreme Court’s rulings in Bernstein and Ford Hopkins, the Iowa attorney general issued an opinion concluding that city councils and boards of supervisors had “discretionary power” regarding the issuance of cigarette permits. Although the Court had not “squarely” decided whether that discretion was absolute or limited, local governments, the attorney general opined, might “refuse to grant a permit where such refusal is substantiated by facts which establish that the granting of such permit may be inimicable [sic] to the health or morals of the community or where such granting may hinder law enforcement.”\textsuperscript{399} And into the twenty-first century the Iowa Revenue Department’s regulations, citing these 70-year-old cases, declared that the “power to grant retail permits is discretionary with the city council or board of supervisors” (adding inaccurately, that “uniform, nondiscriminatory limits may be placed on its issuance”).\textsuperscript{400} But the existence of this ongoing discretion was a matter of indifference to the city council of Iowa City, which, like the rest of the state’s municipalities, lost the nerve to take any steps that might dampen ringing cash registers.\textsuperscript{401}

\textsuperscript{400}Iowa Administrative Code § 82.1(7)a.(2).3. (2000 [2002]).

\textsuperscript{401}See below ch. 28.
Iowa Repeals Its Unique Prohibition of Cigarette Vending Machines: 1939-63

“[I]t should be no concern of the state how cigarettes are sold.”¹

Although the period from the 1930s to 1964 may realistically be regarded in Iowa, as elsewhere in the United States, as the high point of smoking laissez-faire, when few restrictions were placed on access to or the use of cigarettes, the Iowa legislature did in fact prohibit one significant form of access that it took the cigarette oligopolists a quarter-century to dismantle. By the early 1950s the prohibition on the sale of cigarettes through vending machines enacted by the General Assembly in 1939² left Iowa as the last and only state with such a ban still in place.³ The anti-regulation forces had to struggle from 1953 to 1963 before overcoming this last bulwark of prohibitionism, which was rooted partly in the fear that vending machines would expand minors’ access to cigarettes. Ironically, just as other states were considering imposing a total cigarette vending machine ban,⁴ Iowa repealed its.

As early as 1953 bills in the House and Senate would have conferred discretion on city and town councils and county boards of supervisors to issue retail permits authorizing cigarette vending machine sales in the same locations as their existing business, but they died in committee.⁵ Four years later opponents of the ban seemed to be on the verge of repealing it. First the Senate defeated its bill 23 to 24,⁶ but voted the next day to reconsider its action after a senator ²See above ch. 19.

---

⁴These states included Maine (1963), Michigan (1964), Oregon (1951), Pennsylvania (1951), South Dakota (1961), and Utah (1963). Tobacco Merchants Association of the United States, “Restrictive Legislation Affecting Tobacco Introduced in State Legislature 1950-1963” (Oct. 1963), Bates No. 968196267/88/95/313/314/317/320. The claims that in 1961 Idaho killed in committee a bill calling for a complete ban on cigarette vending, while a similar ban was defeated by two votes in the North Dakota Assembly by Ben and Mike, “Reflections: Smoking & Health,” American Automatic Merchandiser, Dec. 1962, Bates No. 84410130/1, were not confirmed by the TMA publication.
⁵H.F. 425 (Mar. 9, 1953, by Nelson and Schroeder) and S.F. 286 (Mar. 9, 1953, by Nolan).
⁶State of Iowa: 1957: Journal of the Senate of the Fifty-Seventh General Assembly declared that he had an amendment on file that would deal with objections that legalizing cigarette vending machines would open Iowa up to syndicates “controlled by ‘undesirable elements.’” The lengthy debate in the House, which culminated in passage by a vote of 63 to 41, did not focus on gangsters, but rather on “whether it would be easier for youths to obtain cigarettes illegally from the machine than in some other way. One contention was that merchants would be better able to determine the age of a cigarette purchaser than would a machine,” whereas the bill’s supporters claimed that supervised machines out in the open would make it harder for youths to get cigarettes. The Senate then followed suit by the much smaller margin of 26 to 23, but at this point Democratic Senator Joseph Coleman—newly embarked on the first of his record-breaking 34 years in the Senate—changed his mind: although he had been a cosponsor of the Senate bill, he moved to reconsider and to request that the bill be returned from the House, to which it had been sent for concurrence in an amendment. His motion carried by a vote of 26 to 23, and after the House, which had not yet acted, had complied with the request, the Senate renewed debate. Coleman, unconcerned that Iowa was the only state that banned cigarette vending machines, felt that it should set an example, and since in his area the only proponents were backers of pinball machines and other gambling machines, he urged the bill’s defeat. Republican William Tate, a real estate and insurance businessman, was unable to understand such worries: after all, this “‘simple bill...would only permit selling cigarettes the same way candy and peanuts are sold.’” If, on the other hand, opponents’ real fear was that “‘youngsters will get cigarettes, they’re getting them anyway. Most youngsters don’t have to go any farther...than their mother’s purse.’” Consequently, opposition being no virtue, voting against the cigarette vending machine bill would not qualify for entry into heaven. Ignoring Tate’s admonition, the Senate voted to reconsider its earlier vote to pass the bill and then tabled it, thus effectively ending the measure for that session.

The economic pressure that was being brought to bear on Iowa legislators to accommodate commerce by the cigarette manufacturing industry, the stores (such as groceries and restaurants) that wanted to sell more cigarettes, and the vending machine industry was encapsulated in the fact that by 1958 nationally the number of packages of cigarettes being sold and bought weekly through 675,000 vending machines had risen to 60,750,000. The same year the Iowa attorney general opined that if a clerk had to perform some act enabling him to retain control of the machine’s dispensing process, then it was lawful to use it to sell cigarettes. The sea change that this opinion represented was conspicuous alongside an attorney general’s opinion from 1939, which stated that it would be illegal to use a machine for showing or displaying cigarettes even if an employee operated the mechanism. Nevertheless, in 1959, when repeal bills were once again filed, many Iowa legislators refused to yield, this time focusing on health issues as well. To be sure, the Senate did pass a measure by a vote of 37 to 13, and “[o]ne of the reasons given for passing the bill is that one of the largest manufacturers of vending machines is located in Des Moines but cannot sell the products in this state.” However, the two-hour debate revealed deep rifts. In addition to ongoing fears over (criminal) “syndicates,” legislators also echoed the apprehensions expressed by cities such as Dubuque and Muscatine that legalizing vending machines would reduce their revenues from permits as well as facilitate minors’ access to cigarettes. Senator Coleman, switching themes, voted against the bill because the ready availability would enable children to “get at cigarettes at an early age”\textsuperscript{22}—a remarkable insight from the man who would become the Senate’s heaviest smoker and its most strident and obdurate adversary of the victims of his and others’ secondhand smoke who demanded restrictions on smoking in the chamber.\textsuperscript{23} Republican Majority Leader, Jack Schroeder, a nonsmoker, pooh-poohed Coleman’s concern as yet another attempt to “legislate morals”: although he hoped that his children would not smoke, he also knew that: “‘You cannot take all temptations of life away from my children. They must learn through example and teaching.”\textsuperscript{24} What children would learn from the majority of adults (including parents) who smoked in a society characterized by cigarettes’ ubiquitous availability and normalcy, Schroeder did not reveal. To those justifying the bill on the grounds that it would be naive to imagine that minors were not already getting cigarettes somewhere anyway one Republican senator offered the rhetorical question: “‘But aren’t we going to make cigarettes more accessible for them?’”\textsuperscript{25} While his point may have cut both ways in the context of the debate, Waterloo Democrat Melvin Wolf underscored the vitality of the home-rule foundations of Iowa’s cigarette sales law 38 years after Governor Kendall had made it the centerpiece of the great compromise of licensure in 1921: the vending machine law was “‘permissive legislation only.’ He said cities will still control the issuance of cigaret permits and ‘do not have to give one to anyone they don’t wish to.’”\textsuperscript{26}

That keeping youths away from cigarettes may not have been a high legislative priority after all was suggested by the filing the same day by five House Democrats of a bill that grafted a lowering of the minimum age from 21 to 18 for lawful purchases of cigarettes onto the governor’s request for an increase in the cigarette tax.\textsuperscript{27} (A bill filed by two Democrats in 1957 to lower the age to 18, which died in committee, was explained as proceeding from the recognition that 18-year-olds were already buying cigarettes if they wanted to do so; its purpose was to “remove the unrealistic age requirement of 21 years which is not publicly accepted and which creates an utter disregard for law

\textsuperscript{23} See below ch. 32.

Iowa Repeals Its Unique Prohibition of Cigarette Vending Machines: 1939-63

The next day, the sponsor of the House companion vending machine bill (H.F. 87), Republican Clark McNeal, himself a businessman, called up the bill, terming it “a good businessman’s bill,” and declaring: “It would appear that we have sanctioned the sale of cigarettes in Iowa. This measure simply provides another way in which a retailer may sell them.” Two years later, in an equity action brought by cigarette vending machine manufacturers, distributors, and owners to enjoin state agencies from interfering with their use, the chief justice of the Iowa Supreme Court, disagreeing with the majority, who chipped away at the scope of the definition of an unlawful cigarette vending machine, shed light on McNeal’s distortion of the development of legislated restrictions on the sale, purchase, and availability of cigarettes in the state:

Plaintiffs concede the legislature could, within constitutional limits, prohibit sale of cigarettes to minors through an automatic vending machine. I think the legislature has the power to prevent sale of cigarettes to anyone by means of a vending machine.

...The legislature conceivably may have reasoned from evidence it deemed convincing that the use of cigarettes, especially excessive use, is harmful to the health of adults as well as minors; that the sale of cigarettes by means of vending machines would stimulate their sale and use; and it would promote the public health to prohibit this means of selling cigarettes.

Certainly anything the legislature honestly feels would be apt to promote the public health is a legitimate exercise of the police power. If the legislature, as it might have done, reasoned as above suggested, the statute is not to be held unconstitutional merely because we may think it acted unwisely. But there is no showing such reasoning would even be unwise. On the contrary, its wisdom is attested by plaintiffs’ argument that one retailer converted his loss from the sale of cigarettes into a profit of $1500 per year by use of a vending machine.

---

28H.F. 348 (Feb. 20, 1957, by Andrew Frommelt and Casey Loss). Frommelt was the former president of the Dubuque Trades and Labor Congress. State of Iowa, 1953: State of Iowa Official Register: 1953-1954, at 68 (45th No. Sherman Needham ed.). That Frommelt may have harbored a more extensive tobacco agenda was suggested by an amendment he filed (and withdrew) as a senator in 1959 that would have struck a provision from a bill reinstating mandatory revocation of a retailer’s cigarette sales permit even for the first violation of the ban on selling to minors. State of Iowa: 1959: Journal of the Senate of the Fifty-Eighth General Assembly 1262 (Apr. 30) (H.F. 266).

vending machine in question here, that they are attractive pieces of paraphernalia which add to the appearance of a place of business and “may even have some advertising value in calling attention to the availability of cigarettes on the premises.”

Following McNeal’s intervention the House engaged in “a lengthy debate over the desirability of preventing young people from purchasing cigarettes.” After one Republican representative had questioned “whether the public health is adequately safeguarded” by the bill, another, Lawrence Carstensen, a Methodist and lawyer, who had started smoking at the age of 15, administered the following lesson in cognitive dissonance to his colleagues:

“I’ve been smoking up a storm ever since. It’s ridiculous—a dirty, lousy, rotten, filthy habit—and I wish I didn’t do it. Maybe if my parents had instructed me about the evils of tobacco I wouldn’t do it, but unfortunately they weren’t alive to instruct me.

However, as long as I do it, I don’t see that it makes any difference whether I buy my cigarettes out of a machine or from some sweet little old lady behind a counter. I’m in favor of the bill.”

Tacking on a non sequitur for good measure, Carstensen confided to the world that his right to buy cigarettes had never even been questioned until he was 25, when a “nice elderly lady made me show her my driver’s license. I respect her more than any person I have ever known.”

In light of the prevailing disagreements over health and safety questions pertaining to young people, the House—at the behest of Iowa City Democrat Scott Swisher, who smoked a big black cigar during the debate—narrowly voted to send the bill back to committee for further study. When the bill finally returned to the floor six weeks later, the House defeated it by a vote of 41 to 65.
and then by an even larger margin refused to reconsider its vote. Not the least of the factors contributing to this outcome was, ironically, “pressure from cigarette companies producing the less popular brands which felt that their packages would not be offered for sale in machines.”

In tandem with action on the cigarette vending bill, the House demonstrated that privileging 18-to-20-year-olds to destroy their health and shorten their lives may have had more to do with expanding cigarette sales than young people’s civil rights: the same day that its Steering Committee advanced the measure lowering the minimum age for buying cigarettes from 21 to 18, its Constitutional Amendments Committee killed a proposed constitutional amendment to reduce the minimum voting age from 21 to 18. Despite this clear rebuff to the general entitlement of this cohort, supporters of the lower age for cigarettes trotted out a version of the same argument: If we believe that they’re old enough to kill those we deem our country’s enemies, they’re old enough to kill themselves. Democrat and bank president William Johannes—who felt that 18 was “realistic because the evidence shows that young fellows under 21 are getting cigarettes somewhere anyhow”—declared: “If they’re old enough to serve in the armed forces, they’re old enough to buy cigarettes and accept responsibility for handling them.” Apparently convinced, the House then voted by an overwhelming 95 to 8 to lower the age to 18 after defeating a proposal to make it a misdemeanor for persons under 18 to possess cigarettes. Six weeks later the Senate followed suit by a vote of 32 to 13, thus establishing the new lower legal smoking age that endured.

---

44 State of Iowa: 1959: Journal of the House of the Fifty-Eighth General Assembly 963-64 (Mar. 26) (H.F. 266, amendment by Des Moines Democrat Howard Reppert). The law then in effect made it a misdemeanor to possess only if the minor refused to disclose the source of the cigarettes.
Iowa Repeals Its Unique Prohibition of Cigarette Vending Machines: 1939-63

into the twenty-first century. Ominously, the legislature’s massive support for a lower minimum age at which cigarettes could be lawfully bought foreshadowed its ultimate abandonment of the ban on vending machine sales.

The persistent strength of the opposition to cigarette vending machines was once again on display during the 1961 legislative session at the outset of which the Iowa Supreme Court ruled that the purpose of the legislature’s 22-year-old ban was merely to support the prohibition against sales to minors; consequently, since the machines in question were not fully automatic, but required the participation of the owner in operating a remote-control device, he therefore had the same opportunity and duty to determine the age of the would-be buyer as he would in a face to face sale and the machines thus did not fall within the law’s coverage. Despite this setback, opponents of vending machine sales succeeded again in thwarting repeal. To be sure, the Senate passed a bill by a hefty margin of 38 to 9, but it died in committee in the House. Senate supporters used the Supreme Court’s recent decision as a basis for legalizing all the machines and “end[ing] the hypocrisy.” In response to one Republican who argued that the bill would enable children to get cigarettes at any time, its chief sponsor, Democrat Peter Hansen (state vice-commander of the American Legion, bank board chairman, and, most relevantly, past state president of the Iowa Retail Food Dealers, Iowa Independent Businessmen, and Associated Retailers of Iowa), “cried out, ’It’s about time we legalize lots of things that are going on in our state. You can play bingo almost anyplace and get liquor-by-the-drink too.’”

In the interim between the 1961 and 1963 legislative sessions, the automatic merchandising industry, more than 40 percent of whose gross volume was accounted for by cigarette sales, had become alarmed by the problems that the “[r]apidly growing forces in the tobacco-health-cigarette-sales-to-minors controversy” could cause. The industry saw the tobacco-health problem as “particularly difficult because there is no clearcut issue.” Because there was “just 48 1959 Iowa Laws ch. 119, at 160. Presumably for the sake of uniformity, the amended law increased from 16 to 18 the age at which it was lawful to buy and be sold tobacco other than cigarettes.

---

50 Iowa Official Register: 1961-1962, at 47 (49th No., Edward Mason ed.).

51 "Vending Machine Bill Is Approved by Senate," ADT, Apr. 21, 1961 (1:6-8).

52 "Vending Machine Bill Is Approved by Senate," ADT, Apr. 21, 1961 (1:6-8).
about as much “scientific research” against as proving the basic premise that cigarette smoking contributed to the incidence of cancer, “the entire issue will undoubtedly be fought along emotional rather than factual lines.” The problem for the industry lay not in anti-tobacco groups’ scaring adults into abstinence, but rather in making it “as difficult as possible for minors to obtain cigarettes with an ultimate objective of seriously curtailing smoking by future generations. This is the point at which the vending industry could well be seriously hurt. It is the ill-founded premise that ‘most minors purchase their cigarettes from vending machines’ that is at the heart of our problem.” The tactical response was a call for a “common front” and “sensible self-policing” by operators to remove the most conspicuous unsupervised machines and to post all machines with labels stating that it was illegal for minors to buy cigarettes.55

Against the background of this potential crisis for the cigarette vending machine industry, in 1963 Senator Hansen filed another bill to repeal the ban.56 The same arguments were deployed, opponents’ claims of racketeering pitted this time against Hansen’s feeling that about half of the court-approved remote-control machines were (presumably because of fear of prosecution) not being used.57 Following Senate passage by a vote of 36 to 12,58 “without debate” the bill “sailed through”59 the House with an impressive 83 to 19 majority.60 Repeal of the almost quarter-century prohibition61 ushered in an era of lawful cigarette vending machine sales in Iowa that has survived into the twenty-first century62—despite bills to reinstate the ban,63 calls for statewide bans in all states

56S.F. 126 (Feb. 4, 1963, by Hansen et al.).
57“Senate Approves Cigarette Vending Machines for Iowa,” ADT, Feb. 25, 1963 (1:4-5).
611963 Iowa Laws ch. 97, § 2 at 156.
62Iowa Code § 453A.36.6 (2007). In 1997 the legislature limited cigarette vending machines to locations at which “the retailer ensures that no person younger than eighteen years of age is present or permitted to enter at any time.” 1997 Iowa Laws ch. 136, at 281.
Iowa Repeals Its Unique Prohibition of Cigarette Vending Machines: 1939-63

by the Secretary of Health and Human Services\textsuperscript{64} and the Institute of Medicine,\textsuperscript{65} the agreement to a nationwide ban by the cigarette companies in the (unimplemented) 1997 Global Settlement Agreement,\textsuperscript{66} and the advent of total statewide bans in two states\textsuperscript{67} and numerous local communities.\textsuperscript{68}

\textsuperscript{65}Institute of Medicine, \textit{Growing Up Tobacco Free: Preventing Nicotine Addiction in Children and Youths} 212-14 (Barbara Lynch and Richard Bonnie eds. 1994).

\textsuperscript{66}Martha Derthick, \textit{Up in Smoke: From Legislation to Litigation in Tobacco Politics} 84 (2002).

PART V

THE INCIPIENT NATIONAL MOVEMENT TO AVOID SECONDHAND SMOKE EXPOSURE IN THE 1970S

Now that hardly any area is off-limits for smoking, the sensitive nonsmoker has a real problem. Relief depends partly on the ingenuity and resources of the patient. One man, employed in a large office, has organized the nonsmokers, and these outcasts have grouped their desks together in a corner. Some patients change jobs or even occupations, first making sure that the new position will not involve heavy exposure to smoke. College students may enroll in a school sponsored by a religious group which frowns on tobacco.¹

[M]ake no mistake about it, the antismoking zealots desparately [sic] want to bring about the death of this industry. And I can tell you here and now that this productive industry and its productive people are not about to lay [sic] down and die. We will not let them drive us off the farm and out of the factory and into the growing ranks of the unemployed. Our adversaries and their bureaucratic and legislative allies have imagination and persistence. But we have every bit as much as they do. We also have one other quality, often lacking on the other side—an abiding interest in and respect for facts and truth.²

Between the time of the Surgeon General’s discussion of involuntary smoking in 1972 and the first Surgeon General’s Report solely on secondhand smoke 14 years later, scientific understanding and citizen action increased but not necessarily in that order.³

---

Non-Smokers’ Widespread Aversion, Science, and Legislation Begin to Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly and Its Addicted Customers’ Sense of Entitlement

Passive smoking issue most dangerous industry has ever faced, greater than personal health, taxes, anything else.¹

The first feeble legislative attempts at reducing nonsmokers’ exposure to secondhand smoke in Iowa during the 1970s cannot be understood outside of the national and state contexts in which similar efforts were being undertaken. This chapter focuses on: the role played by Surgeon General Jesse Steinfeld in advocating regulatory intervention based on the initial medical-scientific alerts to the health risks linked to exposure; the struggle over the enactment in Arizona in 1973 of the first statewide legislative limitations on public smoking; and the origins of cigarette manufacturers’ campaigns to thwart such regulation. The following chapter is then devoted to the overtoweringly important Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975, which was both a model nationally and a legislative lodestar for the 1978 Iowa enactment, which, to be sure, fell far short, in terms of coverage and stringency, of Minnesota’s, which in its own right marked just the incipient stage of protection for nonsmokers because its central feature—the conferral of extraordinary discretion on owners and managers of covered public places to designate areas where smoking was permitted as an exception to the default prohibition of smoking—to a great extent subverted the statutory purpose of shielding the nonsmoking population from exposure to secondhand smoke.

A Pre-History of Scientific-Medical Understanding of and Militant Opposition to Exposure to Secondhand Tobacco Smoke

We have talked, we have pleaded and prayed, and all has had good effect, but we have borne quietly the smoke that envelopes [sic] us. Now we have ceased to permit ourselves to be smoked and from this day women will make smoking universally unpopular.²

¹T.I. ComCom [handwritten notes of Tobacco Institute Communications Committee meeting] (Apr. 10, [1973]) (remark by Horace Kornegay, president, Tobacco Institute).
²Report of the National Woman’s Christian Temperance Union: The Fortieth Annual Convention: Held in the Casino, Asbury Park, New Jersey, Oct. 31-Nov. 5th, 1913, at 274 (Eliza Ingalls, Superintendent of Anti-Narcotics).
Medical-scientific awareness of and popular aversion to the adverse health impact of nonsmokers’ inhalation of others’ tobacco smoke, as inchoate as they may have been, reach back about a century before their conventional dating in the 1970s. Surprisingly, at least as long ago as 1871, German chemists, in connection with analyzing toxins such as pyridene, picoline, and collidine in (cigar) tobacco smoke, observed the swiftly lethal consequences of exposing a pigeon to picoline fumes. Four years later, the Massachusetts State Board of Health published a report by a physician on the “deleterious effects of the concentrated fumes of tobacco” in railroad smoking cars, who, despite being familiar with the German study, in essence held that you don’t need a chemist to know which way the ill wind blows: “The bad hygienic condition of these moving fumatories must be more or less familiar to all. The fact that the air is irrespirable by most non-smokers, including the whole female sex, is sufficient to show this without the aid of chemical tests....”

To be sure, the publication, more than half a century later, by the American Journal of Public Health of an editorial with a decidedly mixed message underscored how little scientific-medical research had advanced understanding of the impact of secondhand smoke exposure:

Tobacco smoking in meetings has always...passed unnoticed. There are doubtless a number of persons who object to tobacco smoke and who would prefer to have smoking prohibited, since it is disagreeable to many persons, irritates the throats of others, and sometimes is so thick as to interfere with lantern slide demonstrations.... However, smoking is usually passed by in silence...for several reasons, the chief one being the fear of being considered a crank, while the habit is so general that one feels hopeless of making any change. ... That tobacco is a narcotic poison is...not disputed by anyone in authority. ... “Scientific evidence is hardly needed to show that to some extent the person breathing a smoke tainted atmosphere is liable to the same evils as the person who is smoking, for the experience of a non-smoker who has spent an evening in the atmosphere of a smoking concert is often that he sustains a disturbance of health similar to that sometimes

---

2Theo. Fisher, “Ventilation of Railroad Cars,” in Sixth Annual Report of the State Board of Health of Massachusetts 225-40 at 228-29 (Pub. Doc. No. 30, 1875). Interestingly, Fisher pointed out that smoking cars were a “purely American institution”: whereas in England and France smoking was forbidden in first and second class carriages, in Germany “smoking is so universal that a contrary custom prevails, and smoking is allowed everywhere, except in certain compartments” marked for nonsmokers. Id. at 228.
Non-Smokers' Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly complained of by the excessive smoker."

We do not believe this is a major point in sanitary advance, but it is certainly worth our while to consider the facts.5

Likewise, militant collective opposition to exposure to secondhand tobacco smoke was not a product of the 1970s. Ironically, legislators themselves in almost all legislatures, as detailed above, had already begun to prohibit smoking in their own workplaces early in the nineteenth century.6 Indeed, various colonial legislatures had banned tobacco smoking in their own chambers in the seventeenth century,7 at the end of which Pennsylvania enacted a law pursuant to which in Philadelphia and New Castle “no person shall presume to Smoak tobacco in the Streets, either by day or night and every person offending herein, shall forfeit for every such offence twelve pence...."8 To be sure, the prohibition was designed to foster fire prevention, as was an 1818 Massachusetts enactment of a statutory penalization of smoking or having in possession a lighted pipe or cigar on any street, lane, or passage way or on any wharf in Boston.9 More relevant, however, is that in 1881, just a year after the Massachusetts legislature had finally repealed that law,10 it enacted another making it “disorderly conduct”

5"A New View of Smoking,” AJPH 18:1285-6 (1928) (edit.) (quoting Lancet, Apr. 26, 1913 at 1181). In a compendious work on tobacco published in 1939, a German physician devoted a small section to what he called “Passive Smoking,” though the chief adverse health consequences he identified were eye irritations. Fritz Lickint, Tabak und Organismus: Handbuch der gesamten Tabakkunde 260-65 (1939).

6See above ch. 18.

7See above ch. 18.

101880 Mass. Acts ch. 38 at 36. At the time of repeal the press reported that the law was “violated so constantly by those who make as well as by those who execute the law, that its continuance on the statute books is an absurdity.” It had last been enforced 30 years earlier when abolitionists, “eager to harass” a slave-catcher trying to return two slaves to bondage, “had him arrested and fined for smoking in the streets....” “Boston’s Peculiar Law,” Bath Independent (Maine), Feb. 28, 1880 (4:3). In fact, such a warrant had been issued for the slave-catcher in November 1850. See “Hughes, the Slave-Hunter’s Account of His Mission,” Liberator (Boston), Dec. 6, 1850 (3:3-4). The following year a Smokers’ Circle was established in Boston Common: “It is a well-known fact that—while a man may enjoy the weed by inhaling the fragrant fumes of a cigar in any for anyone who smoked or had in his possession a lighted pipe, cigarette, or cigar in a town, ward, or precinct meeting or a meeting held for an election. In 1887 the Committee on Hygiene and Public Health of the Kansas House of Representatives expanded the protective scope beyond its own precincts by recommending passage of a bill prohibiting the use of cigars or tobacco in “the house of the Lord or any other place of worship.” 12 Four years later a member of the Indiana House of Representatives introduced a bill to prohibit the use of tobacco in churches, schoolrooms, and public halls.13 That public demand for protection from exposure extended to a much broader universe of public space was reflected in the passage, as detailed earlier, by the lower houses of other city in the Union—in Boston a fine is exacted from any person who presumes to smoke in the streets. Our worthy mayor, sympathizing with the oppressed consumer of the weed, has had a circle of seats arrayed in a shady grove of our beautiful park; and here scores of persons resort each afternoon and evening to inhale the bewitching weed.” “Smokers’ Circle, Boston Common,” Gleason’s Pictorial, Aug. 9, 1851, at 240. See also M. DeWolfe Howe, Boston Common: Scenes from Four Centuries 62 (1910). Despite the contemporaneous statement that by 1880 the law was a dead letter, a large collective tome on the following half-century asserted that in 1880: “People [were] given the right to smoke in public for the first time. Smokers were formerly liable to arrest on the streets and even on the Common, except in the “Smokers’ Circle.”” Edith Guerrier (comp.), “A Chronicle of Important and Interesting Events: Incidents in the Life of Boston, 1880-1930,” in Fifty Years of Boston: A Memorial Volume Issued in Commemoration of the Tercentenary of 1930, at 715-50 at 715 (Elisabeth Herlihy ed. 1932).

2153

11 An Act to Aid in Preserving Order at Elections went on to mandate that the meeting moderator or presiding officer order such person to remove the pipe, cigarette, or cigar or withdraw himself from the meeting place; if the smoker refused to do so, the moderator was required to “direct any police officers, constables, or others present, to take him from the meeting, and confine him in some convenient place until the meeting is adjourned.” The smoker was liable to forfeit $20 for each such offense. 1881 Mass. Acts ch. 27, at 597. The law for “the physical purity of elections” was designed to “prevent smoking and drinking at the polls on election days.” “The Legislature,” BDA, May 7, 1881 (1:10). The bill as reported by Committee on Election Laws did not cover cigarettes. Id.

Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

Pennsylvania, Mississippi, Alabama, and Minnesota of bills prohibiting public cigarette smoking.\(^{14}\)

Lawmakers may have been in a privileged position to protect themselves, but they constituted far from the only examples of government intervention on behalf of nonsmokers. As long ago as 1890, when the New Orleans City Council adopted an ordinance prohibiting tobacco smoking in street cars on the grounds that the “custom...is a most vile and objectionable one to the majority of our citizens,” it found that it was the only city in the United States that still “allow[ed] such a discomfort to those of its citizens who ride in the public cars.”\(^{15}\) In fact, the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth century witnessed numerous and widespread battles in the United States over the permissibility of smoking in various forms of public transportation.\(^{16}\) In upholding the constitutionality of the ordinance and the sentencing of defendant to payment of a $25 fine or 30 days’ imprisonment for each of two separate violations, the Louisiana Supreme Court ruled that:

There is no doubt of the fact that smoking in the street cars in the City of New Orleans had caused to the great majority of people using them material annoyance, inconvenience and discomfort. This is particularly so in the winter season when the cars are closed. There is not only discomfort, but positive danger to health from the contaminated air. The record establishes these facts.\(^{17}\)

The court revealed its views as not unbridgeably in advance of the Zeitgeist when it added that: “Smoking in itself is not to be condemned for any reason of public policy. It is agreeable and pleasant, almost indispensable to those who have acquired the habit, but it is distasteful and offensive, and sometimes hurtful to those who are compelled to breathe the atmosphere impregnated with tobacco

\(^{14}\)See above chs. 3-4.

\(^{15}\)State of Louisiana v Heidenhain, 7 So. 621 (La. 1897) (quoting Council of the City of New Orleans, Ordinance No. 4197 (Jan. 2, 1890)).

\(^{16}\)See above ch. 17.

\(^{17}\)State of Louisiana v Heidenhain, 7 So. 621 (La. 1897). The Prussian-born defendant, Henry Heidenhain, was a 28-year-old state assessor and a 39-year-old broker at the time of the 1870 and 1880 Population Census, respectively. He had also been a state legislator during various years between the end of the Civil War and 1884. Membership in the Louisiana House of Representatives 1812-2012, at 170, 172, 179 (rev. 2010), on http://www.legis.state.la.us/members/h1812-2012.pdf (visited Jan. 7, 2010). Heidenhain, who had been in the Union Army and is listed (together with two other lawyers) as representing himself, was by the 1880s a lawyer and some type of judge.
in close and confined places." After having abjured targeting smoking from the perspective of public policy, the Louisiana Supreme Court proceeded to certify the city council’s power to target it from the perspective of public health, under which the council had authority under Section 7 of the charter to provide for the public health. It can therefore require in public places, theaters, halls, etc., that there shall be ventilation for a supply of fresh and pure air; and in order to preserve the public peace, order and health, and under its general police authority in said Section 7, it can compel the owner of public halls and theaters to provide means to prevent fires and to supply fire escapes in case of fire. And in pursuance of the same power it can, in order to preserve pure and fresh air in crowded halls, and to prevent fire, prohibit smoking in the same.

The same authority and the same reasons apply in the prohibition of smoking in street railway cars.

It is as essential to health and to comfort to have pure air in them as in any other crowded place.

In 1891 the Woman’s Christian Temperance Union—which for several years had been campaigning for a smoking ban in waiting rooms and post offices—referring to conditions in its national headquarters city, insisted, apparently without tongue in cheek, that industrial-strength air pollution was a bagatelle compared to the aggregate impact of cigarette smokers:

The last few months there has been a great deal of commotion in Chicago in regard to the chimneys...which belch forth their great clouds of smoke to the greater polluting of the air. [P]roceedings are to be taken compelling the owner of the chimney to put a smoke consumer on the smoke-stack so that the pure air of his neighbors be no longer polluted.

Now, why all this commotion about a little carbon smoke from a few score chimneys when there are tens of thousands of lesser chimneys giving out a far more vile, obnoxious and injurious smoke, against which scarcely a protest is being made! Boys, youths, men, and, alas! even women, are to be seen on the streets...smoking their vile cigarettes, puffing clouds of abominable, acrid smoke, not into the air, but into the very face and lungs of the passer-by; and he who dares to protest is a “crank,” one who would deprive his neighbor

---

18State of Louisiana v Heidenhain, 7 So. 621-22 (La. 1897).
19State of Louisiana v Heidenhain, 7 So. 621, 622 (La. 1897).
20Minutes of the National Woman’s Christian Temperance Union at the Sixteenth Annual Meeting, Chicago, Illinois, November 8 to 13, 1889, at 164 (1889); Minutes of the National Woman’s Christian Temperance Union at the Seventeenth Annual Meeting, Atlanta, Georgia, November 14th to 18th, 1890, at 181 (1890); Minutes of the National Woman’s Christian Temperance Union at the Eighteenth Annual Meeting, Boston, Mass., November 13th to 18th, 1891, at 97 (1891).
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

of a “legitimate pleasure.”

If the smoke consumer is needed in the one case, where the smoke itself goes largely into the upper clouds to be carried away over the lake and there dispersed, it is certainly much more needed where the passer-by is compelled to inhale and suffer it....

Unsurprisingly, the WCTU did not abandon this quest for smoke-free public air. To its national convention in 1913, Eliza Ingalls, the organization’s redoubtable and irrepressible longtime Superintendent of Anti-Narcotics, reported this “plan” for dealing with the problem that “we are a narcotized people, the men from the use of tobacco, and the women from the inhalation of men’s tobacco”:

If a man smokes in the room, we will leave the room; if he smokes at the counter of a store where we are trading, we will ask that he put out the cigar or himself; if he smokes in the street car, we will insist that the law regarding smoking be enforced. ....

Too long have we smoked a “good cigar” at second hand. ... Now we will protest, drive the smoker of the species, be it man or woman[,] to the smoking den, the garage or the desert, in all kindness, as self[-]preservation is the first law of nature.

Just such a plan was embodied in a bill on which in 1915 the Legal Affairs Committee of the Massachusetts legislature held a hearing to prohibit all tobacco smoking “at all times” in public places, including in or upon common roads, streets alleys, passageways, parkways, promenades, sidewalks, platforms, waiting or resting places, seats, parks, playgrounds, wharves, docks, landings, and in all common parts, such as the entrances, porticoes, piazzas, vestibules, corridors, lobbies, hallways, stairways, elevators, waiting rooms, offices, halls[,] rooms or apartments

23The bill (H. 433), accompanied a petition submitted by Fremont LaForest Pugsley, a lawyer and prohibitionist, and 30 others, was sponsored by Representative Fred P. Greenwood of Everett, a 60-year-old retiree who had been in the House since 1911. Petition—House (File stamped No. 293, Jan. 11, 1915) (copy furnished by Massachusetts Archives); Journal of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts: 1921, at 55, 1355 (Jan. 12). In Massachusetts, citizens had (and still have) a “right of free petition” to propose legislation, on which, if the proposal is sponsored by a legislator, a committee must hold a public hearing as with every other bill. http://www.mass.gov/legis/lawmkng.htm (visited Dec. 21, 2009). For example, on Feb. 8, 1915, when the Legal Affairs Committee held the hearing on Pugsley’s H. 433, dozens of other hearings were also scheduled. “Committee Hearings for Monday,” BET, Feb. 5, 1915 (2:6).
of all building[s], structures or enclosures, and in or upon all common parts of all vehicles or conveyances of common carriers of passengers, whether upon land or water, and in all other places whatsoever used by persons in common or for public purposes: provided, nevertheless, that the smoking of tobacco is permitted in or upon private property, used entirely for private purposes, when not objected to by any lawful or rightful occupant thereof, or by any occupant of any adjoining property affected or disturbed by such smoke; and such smoking is also permitted in any separate and closed building, structure, car, cabin, room or apartment, especially designed and set apart for and appropriated entirely to smoking, and so constructed as to prevent the escape of smoke to the offense or annoyance of any person in rightful proximity to such smoking place.24

This almost unimaginably extraordinarily capacious indoor and outdoor smoking ban,25 which almost a century later has still not seen its like implemented anywhere in the United States, was a tad much even for the first speaker at the hearing, William Shaw,26 the general secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor (and later that year Prohibitionist gubernatorial candidate), who nevertheless declared: “‘A smoker has no more right to blow his secondhand, dirty smoke in my face than he has to expectorate at me. I can hit him for one thing, but in the other instance he may continue to blow noxious fumes into my face without consideration.’”27 Although Shaw deemed public smoking a public nuisance that “should be treated on a par with spitting,” he was apparently not content with his “remedy” of “‘biff[ing]’” tortfeasors. Regarding the “bill to prohibit smoking in any places except what Mr. Shaw termed...‘receptacles made for smokers’” as “a bit too broad,” he argued in favor of one whose restrictions would coincide with existing ones on spitting.\textsuperscript{28} The first fruits of such demands for statutorily imposed relief from ubiquitous exposure to tobacco smoke were achieved in 1919 and 1921 in Nebraska, North Dakota, and Utah, which enacted legislation banning smoking in eating establishments and some other enclosed public places.\textsuperscript{29}

The Rollback of Laissez-Faire and the Advent of the New Prohibitionism: Surgeon General Jesse Steinfeld’s Role in Launching the Attack on Passive Smoking

During the early 1950’s just about all of my chiefs in the National Cancer Institute smoked and in later years a series of directors of the National Cancer Institute smoked cigarettes, cigars or pipes. It is small wonder that my requests for “no smoking” in meetings, conferences and poorly ventilated areas were quickly, laughingly and overwhelmingly rejected.

Further, during the 1950’s and 1960’s I had the temerity or lack of intelligence to approach the leadership of the American Association for Cancer Research, the American College of Physicians, the American Medical Association and the American Cancer Society and to suggest the desirability of a “no smoking” rule during meetings of those organizations as a standard for the rest of the medical profession and of society. I was not successful.\textsuperscript{30}

\textsuperscript{28}“Opposed to Public Smoking,” \textit{BET}, Feb. 8, 1915 (2:2). The next day the Committee on Legal Affairs filed a unanimous report with the House opposing the petition. “No Recourse to Blue Laws,” \textit{BET}, Feb. 9, 1915 (2:2). The committee withdrew the bill. \textit{Journal of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts: 1915}, at 296, 312 (Feb. 9 and 10). Tobacco industry magazines continued to call attention to proposed measures to ban public smoking in Massachusetts. The next year a House member introduced a bill prohibiting the manufacture/sale of cigarettes and smoking in any post office or public building. “Massachusetts Anti-Cigarette Bill,” \textit{WTJ}, 43(6):4 (Feb. 7, 1916). In 1921, it reported that the Massachusetts legislature had defeated a bill banning smoking or carrying a lighted cigarette or cigar in public. “Jokesmiths Kill Anti-Smoke Bill,” \textit{Tobacco}, 71(18):1 (Mar. 3, 1921).

\textsuperscript{29}See above ch. 16 and vol. 2.

The time appears to have come in our free society for nonsmokers to assert their rights.\textsuperscript{31}

The campaign for the right of the nonsmoker to breathe pure air has upset the tobacco companies more than anything that has been done medically, educationally, scientifically, by legislation, or by government regulation. The reason for the tobacco merchants’ concern is as simple as it is important: if smoking is unacceptable social behavior—relegated to bathrooms, poolrooms, and barrooms—then the cigarette will follow the spittoon to oblivion. But so long as smoking is regarded as a private form of slow suicide or self-pollution, it will be difficult to generate the societal forces needed to combat what is, after all, a societal problem.\textsuperscript{32}

Even in the immediate wake of the individual behavioral and public health disequilibrium caused by the Surgeon General’s 1964 report, which was not concerned with the issue of involuntary smoking, resistance to exposure to others’ smoke received little or no direct scientific support.\textsuperscript{33} For example, in connection with the convening of the National Conference on Smoking and Youth that same year, the U.S. Children’s Bureau published a pamphlet directed at helping teenagers make the “very personal” decision about whether to smoke. Astonishingly, the publication, to which the Surgeon General’s Public Health Service contributed and which the Children’s Bureau reprinted as late as 1968, contained the following question and answer:

Can it harm you to breathe the smoke from other people’s cigarettes?
No. It may make your eyes tear or make you cough a bit; but it cannot harm you. The harm in smoking lies in inhaling the hot smoke from the cigarette directly into your own mouth, throat, and lungs.\textsuperscript{34}

\textsuperscript{31}Remarks by Jesse L. Steinfeld, M.D., Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service at the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health on the 1972 Report, “The Health Consequences of Smoking” at 13 (Jan. 11, 1972), Bates No. 503583252/64.

\textsuperscript{33}As late as 1967, a reputable historian mocked the refusal of William Allen White, the famed editor of the \textit{Emporia Gazette}, to allow smoking in the newspaper’s offices as “obsolete” in the same sense as Senator Carter Glass’s distrust of automobiles and Justice James McReynolds’ leaving “the Supreme Court chamber when a woman lawyer came to the bar....” Otis Graham, Jr., \textit{An Encore for Reform: The Old Progressives and the New Deal} 89 (1967).

Little wonder that for years the cigarette manufacturers never tired of hurling this embarrassing statement back at a medical-scientific establishment whose research advances in the meantime had long superseded it.\(^{35}\)

In the late 1960s scattered voices of authority began identifying cigarette smoke as a component of air pollution in urgent need of elimination. Philip Abelson, a renowned physicist and editor of Science, pointed out in an editorial in 1967 that concentrations in two of automobiles’ toxic products, carbon monoxide and nitrogen dioxide, were “tiny” compared to those found in cigarette smoke, which, moreover, included toxic agents absent from ordinary air pollution such as hydrogen cyanide; in addition, he highlighted the presence of carcinogens. While smokers themselves bore the brunt of the chief health impacts of their own smoking, Abelson concluded that “when the individual smokes in a poorly ventilated space in the presence of others, he infringes the rights of others and becomes a serious contributor to air pollution.”\(^{36}\)

By the end of the decade demands for practical, governmentally imposed suppression of such exposure in confined transportation spaces began to be raised, most prominently by Ralph Nader.\(^{37}\) Otherwise no ideological comrade, Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren Burger, after exposure to 37 smokers on a literal “red-eye” flight, lent his unique legal prestige to the campaign by writing in a letter to the head of the Federal Aviation Administration: “It is incomprehensible to me that FAA has not long ago ‘segregated’ smokers as was done on railroads as far back as 1840.”\(^{38}\) And although the administrator merely “asked airline presidents to try to restrict smoking on their planes,” a front-page article in the Wall Street Journal in January 1970 reported that long-suffering and uncomplaining nonsmokers had opened a “broad new front...in the war against tobacco.” Demonstrating more impressively still how anti-smoking positions could cut across political lines, even (nonsmoking) President Richard Nixon made his contribution by banning smoking at his press conferences (sessions that until his administration had been “traditionally smoky”). While Nader envisioned requesting state governments to prohibit or restrict smoking in hospital and railroad and bus station waiting rooms,\(^{39}\) Representative Andrew Jacobs and

\(^{37}\)See below ch. 25.

\(^{38}\)Warren Burger to John Shaffer (Dec. 18, 1969), Bates No. 980075670. The incident had occurred five years earlier.

\(^{39}\)Albert Karr, “No Smoking: Pressure Builds to Curb Smokers in Airliners, Other
Senator Mark Hatfield introduced legislation in Congress to confine smoking to specified seats on airplanes, and similar measures were filed in Illinois and Indiana. A New York State senator about to introduce such a bill declared that: "People are becoming aware of their right to have clean air to breathe, uncontaminated by clouds of tobacco smoke."

Of the more than 500 bills relating to tobacco and health that were introduced in state legislatures between 1950 and 1970, only 45 were enacted (in 24 states), of which only 36, according to the Tobacco Merchants Association of the U.S., were restrictive in nature. Sixteen of the 36 dealt with sales to minors, six to teaching about tobacco in schools, and five to other educational programs, while the remaining nine enactments pertained to smoking (namely, a 1959 Connecticut law banning it on school buses), vending machines, package labeling, study groups, and petitions or memorials.

Perhaps the first new-wave state legislative bills to propose a non-transportational smoking restriction were introduced in 1969 in Illinois by Chicago Democrat Edward Wolbank, an antique store operator, who would have required restaurants to set aside 25 percent of seats for nonsmokers and empowered cities and counties to prohibit smoking on the premises of any establishment that sold food to be consumed off the premises. The former bill (H.R. 2) was quickly dispatched by a committee “do not pass” recommendation. The cigarette oligopoly, through its disinformation and lobbying arm, the Tobacco Institute, helped kill the bill as the latter’s annual summary of state anti-tobacco legislative activity colorfully described the operation: “We encouraged the Illinois distributors to oppose this bill. As a matter of fact, it was killed by humorous comments by opponents in the House.” (Frank Welch, the TI executive vice president who was in charge of the State Activities Division from its inception in 1962 into the early 1970s and wrote these annual summaries, was academically and governmentally well-connected, having been a member of the National War Labor Board, a director of the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Cleveland Federal Reserve Bank, and dean of the agriculture schools at Mississippi State University and the University of Kentucky before being appointed assistant secretary of agriculture for federal-state relations at the outset of the Kennedy administration.) The other bill, according to the Tobacco Institute, experienced exactly the same kind of death by comical cuts. However, Wolbank, who was also the paladin of the elimination of pay toilets, refused to let his initiative die laughing. Although in March 1970 he told the press that his bill had been beaten 2 to 1 in committee and that “[s]ome people said I was 10 years ahead of my time,”\textsuperscript{49} a few weeks later he refiled it, and this time the committee recommended that it “do pass.” Then on May 13, the full House voted 53 to 44 for mandating restaurants to set aside 25 percent of seating for non-smokers, but since the Yeas fell far short of a constitutional majority of the whole membership, even feckless smoking-free but not smoke-free segregated restaurant seating remained out of reach.\textsuperscript{50} Nevertheless, the bill appears to have become less of a laughing matter for the Tobacco Institute, which laconically reported its status as having “died....”\textsuperscript{51}

On the occasion of the sixth anniversary of the issuance of the Surgeon General’s landmark 1964 report, the new (non-smoking) Surgeon General, Dr. Jesse Steinfeld, told The New York Times in January 1970 that he favored “firmer enforcement of no-smoking regulations in places and situations where smoking may involve fire risks and discomfort to nonsmokers.”\textsuperscript{52} Soon Steinfeld became the country’s most authoritative, eloquent, and outspoken advocate of public smoking bans. In September 1970, going far beyond his predecessors, he told the first National Conference of the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health in San Diego that “the time is ripe for government and voluntary groups to mount a more vigorous program on all fronts to portray cigarette smoking as what it really is—a dirty, smelly, foul chronic form of suicide....”\textsuperscript{53} As one dimension of that portrayal he announced that federal agencies were limiting smoking areas in hospitals.\textsuperscript{54}

Marking the seventh anniversary of his predecessor’s Smoking and Health on January 11, 1971, Steinfeld, at the very end of a “personal speech”\textsuperscript{55} he was required to give to the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health\textsuperscript{56} because he was not permitted to summarize the new Surgeon General’s report, which had not yet been cleared by the Office of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare or the Executive Office of the President, made a “call for a nonsmokers’ rights movement,” which that Office did not regard approvingly and which prompted the tobacco industry to name Steinfeld “‘Public Enemy Number One’”\textsuperscript{57}.

Finally, evidence is accumulating that the non-smoker may have untoward effects from the pollution his smoking neighbor forces upon him. Non-smokers have as much right to clean air and wholesome air as smokers have to their so-called right to smoke, which I would redefine as a so-called “right to pollute.” It is high time to ban smoking from all confined public places such as restaurants, theaters, airplanes, trains, and busses. It is time that we interpret the Bill of Rights for the Non-Smoker as well as the Smoker.\textsuperscript{58}

Interestingly, the lengthy account of this speech by the chief science reporter

\textsuperscript{56}The National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health was formed on July 9, 1964, under the guidance of Surgeon General Luther Terry to implement the remedial action proposed by the 1964 surgeon general’s report. Members in addition to the American Cancer Society, American Heart Association, American Public Health Association, and National Tuberculosis Association, included the U.S. Public Health Service, the Children’s Bureau, and the U.S. Office of Education. National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health (1965), Bates No. 70108714. By 1974 the membership had expanded to include many other organizations, including the American Medical Association, the U.S. Department of Defense, and the National Jogging Association. Bill of Rights for Non-Smokers at 2-3 (Jan. 11, 1974), Bates No. 502669802,3-4.

of The New York Times omitted any reference to the call for a public smoking ban, although the Washington, D.C. press turned it into headlines. Nevertheless, two weeks later, the national newspaper of record did report the announcement by the New York City Commissioner of Marine and Aviation, himself a smoker, of a smoking ban on the Staten Island ferries: “The official was said to be acting on the advice of” of Steinfeld, “who recently called for a ban on smoking in confined public places....” ( Asked by a pro-tobacco congressman whether a smoking ban on the ferry decks was “going a little too far,” Steinfeld unabashedly replied: “I wrote them a letter of congratulation.”) Although, as he later recounted, “[w]herever he spoke, Steinfeld...proposed a ban on smoking in such enclosed public places,” these recommendations that were added at the end of the annual Surgeon General reports were “regularly removed” by the Nixon administration Office of Management and Budget.

By 1971 the U.S. Public Health Service, as Steinfeld mentioned to Representative Bill Young in March in applauding the latter’s introduction of a congressional bill to require the Transportation Secretary to issue regulations designating a portion of the seating capacity only for nonsmokers on airplanes, trains, and buses in interstate commerce, was “in the process of developing an assessment of the effect of tobacco smoke from other people’s smoking on the nonsmokers....” Results of that study appeared in the 1972 Surgeon General’s report, which finally synthesized an initial scientific basis for the harm caused by nonsmokers’ involuntary exposure to tobacco smoke and thus for limiting or prohibiting such exposure. The chapter (“Public Exposure to Air Pollution from Tobacco Smoke”) was a brief (10-page) summary of “the present state of evidence concerning the effects of exposure to an atmosphere containing either tobacco smoke or its constituents.” Such knowledge as research had yielded was categorized under four major heads: (1) the extent to which cigarette smoke components contaminated the atmosphere and were absorbed by nonsmokers; (2) the effects of low levels of carbon monoxide on human health; (3) nonsmokers’ allergic and irritative reactions to cigarette smoke; and (4) the harmful effects of passive inhalation of cigarette smoke in animals.

61Smoking to Be Banned on Staten Island Ferry,” NYT, Jan. 27, 1971 (74).

First, the extent of air pollution was highlighted by the finding that “tar” and nicotine levels in sidestream smoke emanating from the cigarette’s burning cone might be significantly higher than those in mainstream smoke, which comes through the mouthpiece and might be harmful to nonsmokers. For example, three times as much benzo(a)pyrene was found in sidestream as in mainstream smoke; unsurprisingly, levels of such compounds in indoor smoky spaces were much higher than in the outside atmosphere.

Second, the carbon monoxide levels to which nonsmokers were exposed and the resulting elevated carboxyhemoglobin levels were observed to have adverse physiological and psychophysiological effects, including “alter[ing] auditory discrimination, visual acuity, and the ability to distinguish relative brightness,” as well as to be associated with impaired performance on psychomotor tests and physiological stress in heart disease patients. In summary:

The level of carbon monoxide attained in experiments using rooms filled with tobacco smoke has been shown to equal, and at times to exceed, the legal limits for maximum air pollution permitted for ambient air quality in several localities and can also exceed the occupational Threshold Limit Value for a normal work period presently in effect for the United States as a whole. The presence of such levels indicates that the effect of exposure to carbon monoxide may on occasion, depending upon the length of exposure, be sufficient to be harmful to the health of an exposed person. This would be particularly significant for people who are already suffering from chronic bronchopulmonary disease and coronary

---

Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

...heart disease.

Third, generally exposure to tobacco smoke “can contribute to the discomfort of many” people by exerting “complex pharmacologic, irritative, and allergic effects” in addition to exacerbating allergic symptoms in nonsmokers with pre-existing allergies. More specifically, inhaling tobacco smoke was found to cause bronchial constriction, mucus hypersecretion, and ciliary stasis.

Finally, the import of the animal studies, which found that particulate matter and the oxides of nitrogen adversely affected pulmonary and cardiac structure and function, was uncertain because the experimentally inflicted damage was observed “after prolonged exposure to high concentrations of cigarette smoke and the comparability of animal exposure and human exposure in smoke-filled rooms was unknown. Consequently, the report concluded that it was at the time “impossible to be certain from animal experimentation about the extent of the damage that may occur during long-term intermittent exposure to lower concentrations.”

At the outset of his prepared remarks at the press briefing on the report on January 10, 1972, Steinfeld observed that although the number of deaths clearly related to cigarette smoking far exceeded those caused by epidemics of a number of infectious diseases (such as poliomyelitis, cholera, and typhus), the measures taken by government and citizens to combat smoking had fallen far short of those to protect society from communicable diseases: “Of course, the difference is that cigarette smoking is largely a personal thing whereby the cigarette smoker harms only himself”—which he immediately modified parenthetically: “(if one assumes the non-smoker does not have equal rights, and is not subject to any harm from his cigarette-smoking neighbor).” When his commentary reached the report’s

---

73 On dogs that inhaled cigarette smoke through tracheostomas, “were ‘smoked’” for 875 days, and either died during the experiment or were “sacrificed” after day 875, see U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, The Health Consequences of Smoking: A Report to the Surgeon General: 1971, at 158 (n.d.).

As some of you may know, I have very strong feelings that we have too long neglected the rights of the non-smoker. We have exposed him to annoyance and in some cases hazard by subjecting him to other people’s smoke where he works, where he dines, and when he travels. Support for action to give this non-smoker relief is to be found in the 1972 report. Although we cannot say with certainty that exposure to tobacco smoke is causing serious illness in nonsmokers—the long term research necessary for such a finding has not yet been done—it is clear that such exposure can contribute to the discomfort of the nonsmoking individual and can produce exacerbation of allergic symptoms in those who are suffering from allergies of various other causes. There is ample proof that those who complain of discomfort in smoke-filled rooms are not disagreeable malcontents, but can have a legitimate cause for their complaint.\footnote{Steinfeld [and] Daniel Horn at 2 (Jan. 10, 1972), Bates No. 503583217/8. It is unclear whether this transcript was prepared by HEW or the cigarette companies (though the misspelling of Steinfeld’s first name suggests the latter); the last part of the parenthetical statement beginning with “and” was not included in the typescript of Steinfeld’s remarks. Remarks by Jesse L. Steinfeld, M.D., Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service at Press Briefing on 1972 Report, “The Health Consequences of Smoking” at 7 (Jan. 10, 1972), Bates No. 504830060/7. To be sure, these early tentative findings were vast understatements of the cardiovascular, cancer, and respiratory related morbidity and mortality caused by secondhand smoke exposure that scientists and physicians would eventually uncover,\footnote{Remarks by Jesse L. Steinfeld, M.D., Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service at Press Briefing on 1972 Report, “The Health Consequences of Smoking” at 7 (Jan. 10, 1972), Bates No. 504830060/7. U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, \textit{The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke: A Report of the Surgeon General} (2006).} and although Steinfeld acknowledged that the average person might not face frequent exposure to these high smoke concentrations for long periods without relief, the conditions were nevertheless dangerous enough—especially for those with pre-existing heart or chronic bronchopulmonary disease—to signal a warning.\footnote{Remarks by Jesse L. Steinfeld, M.D., Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service at Press Briefing on 1972 Report, “The Health Consequences of Smoking” at 7-8 (Jan. 10, 1972), Bates No. 504830060/7-8.} Previously investigators had not realized that the “so-called passive cigarette smoker” was exposed to such CO levels and build-ups of carboxyhemoglobin as to be associated with such harm. Their significance lay in the fact that all the findings of “all our animal experiments showing effects on the pulmonary system, that is, emphysema and chronic dysplasia, and ultimately... cancers...are similar to that of [should be “on”] the non-smokers, because the animals exposed to cigarette smoke inhaled it passively, and this is similar to that of the non-smoker exposed to the smoke by his cigarette-smoking neighbors.”

Asked at press conference whether, in addition to carbon monoxide’s impact, carcinogens in smoke also had an effect on nonsmokers, Steinfeld characterized his aforementioned statement as a “left-handed way” of trying to answer that question because the kinds of experiments performed on animals would be very difficult to—and he hoped scientists would never—do on humans. Moreover, neoplasms took a much longer time to develop than carboxyhemoglobin, which was much easier to measure than carcinogenic hydrocarbons. Nevertheless, even though science was as yet unable to quantify the impact of tobacco smoke on nonsmokers in terms of such carcinogens, the surgeon general did, in response to another question, “make a flat condemnation of the effect of smokers on non-smokers” as he had with regard to the effect of smoking on smokers. Rephrasing his declaration from 1971, he still felt that “the non-smoker should have the Bill of Rights interpreted for him,” and made his small contribution to that project by reminding the assembled that in contrast to the previous year, in 1972 smoking was banned in the very auditorium in which the press conference was taking place and in all HEW auditoriums. Ultimately, Steinfeld hoped that the report’s new data would stimulate legislative and administrative action to reduce public smoking.

Perpetuating and developing the kind of PR that shaped the industry’s reputation for having no credibility—by 1978, Brown & Williamson’s general counsel informed the company’s top brass that “[o]n crucial points in the debate, the public opinion percentage scores against the industry read like a thermometer in July. Over 90 do not believe anything we say” —a month later the Tobacco Institute’s general counsel and senior vice president charged before a wholesale grocers convention that on the basis of the chapter on secondhand smoke in the 1972 report it was necessary to conclude that “the number one public health problem is not cigarette smoking, but is the extent to which public health officials may knowingly mislead the American people.”

References:
82 J. C. Blucher Ehringhaus, Jr., Remarks Before the Annual Convention of Arkansas Grocers’ Association, Inc. at 6 (Feb. 26, 1972), Bates No. TIMN0131800/5.
The limited character of the progress toward achievement of nonsmokers’ rights was visibly on display the day after Steinfeld’s press conference at the annual meeting of the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health when Steinfeld expressed his pride in HEW Secretary Elliott Richardson’s having “taken leadership” and a “bold step” in creating nosmoking sections in HEW cafeterias and “asking supervisors...to arrange smoke-free work areas where this can be arranged without undue inconvenience.” 83 As a further sign of the not yet fully propitious times, Richardson’s ban, which covered conference rooms, auditoriums, clinics, and elevators, did not apply to lobbies, corridors, and restrooms where, allegedly, smoking did not present a “serious problem’’ because ventilation was adequate and “enforcement would be very difficult.” 84

Nevertheless, Surgeon General Steinfeld had made a unique and outstanding contribution to reconfiguring public discourse about the legitimacy of resistance to and elimination of secondhand smoke exposure. Indeed, the cigarette oligopolists ceaselessly lambasted Steinfeld and his speech of January 11, 1971 for having “created” the “so-called ‘passive smoking’ issue.” Self-interestedly suppressing all reference to millions of nonsmokers’ personal experience, in 1974 R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company grudgingly saluted Steinfeld: “[A]s a result of the 1971 speech and 1972 report, the ‘passive smoking’ issue was created. These two actions were all that anti-smoking forces needed to convince many nonsmokers that their health was also being threatened by exposure to tobacco smoke.” And the “momentum that this anti-smoking movement had gained in less than three years” was, as far as the company (and presumably the rest of the industry as well) was concerned, “alarming.” Two years later—at a time when it was chagrined to concede that during the intervening five years “campaigns to make smoking ‘socially unacceptable’ had greatly changed public attitudes, and the number of adults who agree that smoking in public should be restricted...” was increasing each year—Reynolds was still berating Steinfeld for having “created the false issue of harm to the nonsmoker in 1971.”

The cigarette manufacturers managed to camouflage their counterattack on Steinfeld as emanating from a congressional source. The occasion was a hearing on April 26, 1971, before a House Appropriations Committee subcommittee on the next fiscal year’s appropriations for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, at which Steinfeld testified. The cigarette oligopoly’s agent on the subcommittee was conservative anti-labor Missouri 90Remarkably, the Tobacco Institute’s initial public responses to Steinfeld’s speech ignored his comments on secondhand smoke exposure. Horace R Kornegay, President of the Tobacco Institute (Jan. 11, 1971), Bates No. TIMN0131735 (untitled press release); Tobacco Institute, For Simultaneous Use with 1971 Surgeon General’s Report on Smoking and Health (Jan. 25, 1971), Bates No. TIOK0000703. Even an internal newsletter omitted mention of them. Tobacco Institute Newsletter, No. 12, Jan. 18, 1971, at 1, Bates No. 1001817062.

Democrat William Raleigh Hull, Jr., who was, conveniently enough, a co-owner of Hull’s Tobacco Warehouse, a tobacco farmer, a cigarette smoker, and an unregenerate and ignorant opponent of the surgeon general’s consensus report of 1964. In an (apparently) unpublished document the Tobacco Institute provided Hull’s prompts, enabling Hull immediately to focus on Steinfeld’s January 11 speech by asking why the alleged accumulating evidence of the adverse impact of smoking on nonsmokers had not been discussed in the 1971 surgeon general’s report. Steinfeld patiently explained that it had taken many years and much research to “convince first the medical community and then the general public about the hazards of cigarette smoking vis-a-vis lung cancer, emphysema, and arteriosclerotic heart disease” for smokers; now that researchers were beginning to collect data on nonsmokers, they were discovering, for example, that children of two smoking parents had more respiratory illnesses. In addition, he mentioned that the fact that carbon monoxide in cigarette smoke had an affinity for hemoglobin 200 times greater than oxygen’s meant that several smokers in a car could generate carbon monoxide levels resulting in carboxyhemoglobin levels “high enough to interfere with driving performance and judgment.” Steinfeld alerted the committee to the existence of a preliminary report and of a whole section on smoking’s impacts on nonsmokers in the following year’s surgeon general’s report. As a parting shot he informed Hull that: “If we used the logic of the Delaney amendment [which prohibited the Food and Drug Administration from approving food additives that had been found to cause cancer in animals or humans] on areas permissible for smoking, we would ban smoking in confined public places, since practically all of our evidence on animals is from studies in the smoking chamber, which is the equivalent of a nonsmoker inhaling the smoke that the smoker puts out.”

---

95Departments of Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare Appropriations for Hull then proceeded to the next question for which the Tobacco Institute had prepped him and which it presumably hoped would plunge the surgeon general into hopeless self-contradiction—namely, concerning the aforementioned government booklet stating that breathing other people’s smoke was not harmful. Instead, Steinfeld calmly pointed out the obvious fact that scientific and medical researchers revised their views as “new knowledge accumulates. I certainly think if we were writing that statement now we would not say it in that way.” The one debating point that Hull managed to score resulted from asking Steinfeld whether he “honestly feel[s] that smoking in public places is a substantial health hazard to a normal health person.” Instead of asking Hull what “substantial” meant, he risked producing propaganda for the cigarette manufacturers by offering this answer to the vague question: “I cannot determine that at this point, nor can anyone else.” Turning to the incidence of heart disease and attacks in males in young life, he speculated that some of nonsmokers’ problem might be “due to inhalation of smoke that others have created,” and then uttered the sentence that the cigarette industry would quote endlessly: “I think we just do not have enough information to make any categorical statement other than that it is unpleasant.”

Although the reason for Steinfeld’s choice of words was unfathomable, since even the preliminary findings went far beyond “unpleasant,” the cigarette manufacturers were not content simply to broadcast their propaganda coup: instead, they turned it into yet another vehicle of disinformation in their war of subversion against the incipient anti-public smoking movement by claiming that the surgeon general’s statement constituted a recantation (even after publication of the 1972 report), and had been a response to the question about the booklet and to a question as to whether there was “any effect of smoking on 1972:Hearings Before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations House of Representatives, Part 2: Health Services and Mental Health Administration: Statement of the Assistant Secretary for Health and Scientific Affairs 61 (92d Cong., 1st Sess. 1971). Because the affinity between hemoglobin and carbon monoxide is 200 times greater than that between hemoglobin and oxygen, CO’s bonding interferes with oxygen transport to the body.

nonsmokers.”

In spite of this verbal contretemps, Steinfeld’s intervention was in no small part responsible, for example, for a report (”Anti-Smoke Movement”) on the “CBS Evening News” in March 1973 culminating in the statement that: “The conclusion in scientific journal after scientific journal: breathing what passes for air in smoke-filled rooms does the same thing to your lungs, your heart and your blood vessels as smoking cigarettes yourself.” (An enraged cigarette industry knew no better response than hurling back the pseudo-paradox that “the ‘case’ against tobacco smoking has been based almost exclusively on studies of statistics which report the comparative well-being of nonsmokers.”) In turn, these media accounts were responsible for the fact that, as Philip Morris was aware at the time, surveys revealed that as early as 1974, even before the question had become a focus of intense worldwide scientific study, 46 percent of the U.S. population (including 57 percent of non-smokers and even 30 percent of smokers) believed that environmental tobacco smoke was “probably hazardous.” By 1978—that is, precisely at the end of the initial four-year burst of nationwide state and local anti-smoking legislation—these proportions rose strongly to 58, 69, and 40 percent, respectively.

Whereas the initial 1964 surgeon general’s report on Smoking and Health (and the ongoing outpouring of studies) indisputably became the catalyst for the anti-smoking movement in the United States, and Steinfeld’s efforts in the early 1970s crucially catalyzed the anti-public smoking movement, comparatively little medical/scientific progress in studying the health impacts of involuntarily tobacco smoke exposure was achieved or disseminated to the general public during the remainder of the 1970s. For example, as late November 1975, the best 99Statement at Hearing of N.Y. City Board of Health (Apr. 18, 1974), Bates No. 503812826/34 (by attorney William Shinn appearing on behalf of Tobacco Institute).

---

100CBS Evening News (Mar. 28, 1973), Bates No. 500081603 (Radio TV Reports, Inc. transcript).

102JRN, The ETS Issue: Science and Politics (May 1987), Bates No. 2023551401 (data from Roper Surveys and Philip Morris USA). This four-page memo may have been written by John (Jack) R. Nelson, who at the time was manager of public affairs research and issues planning at Corporate Affairs, Philip Morris, Inc., the next month became director of corporate affairs planning, and in 2002 became president for operations and technology of Philip Morris, Inc. Philip Morris Glossary of Names, http://legacy.library.ucsf.edu/glossaries/pm_gloss_n.jsp

103See, e.g., the summary in U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, scientific-medical case for state intervention to protect nonsmokers from “actual harm” done by smoking in their presence that Dr. Luther Terry, the surgeon general at the time of the 1964 report, was able to come up with during a radio interview while the Washington D.C. city council was considering an ordinance to prohibit smoking in public places was that there is a certain percentage of the population where it has been very clearly demonstrated that certain persons with allergies or with chronic diseases can definitely be harmed by an inhalation of smoke of others.

I think for the vast majority of our population, however, it is not a question of proven harm, though there may be harm; it’s not as much a proven harm as it is discomfort and just not desiring to be subjected to that sort of experience.104

Consequently, while the scientific underpinnings of the battle against passive smoking stalled, large numbers of nonsmokers, unlike physicians and scientists, were not at all reticent to draw the conclusion that, if firsthand smoke caused lung cancer, obstructive lung disease, and heart disease, then sidestream smoke, which was, gram for gram, even more toxic and carcinogenic than the smoke inhaled by smokers, would too.105 Ironically, then, popular resistance to and legislated bans on secondhand exposure spiraled upwards without the benefit of continuously advancing scientific evidence—much to the amazement and annoyance of the cigarette oligopoly.

---

105 In connection with his petition in 1969/70 to ban smoking on buses, Ralph Nader, based on studies showing that children living with adults smokers had a higher incidence of respiratory and other diseases, straightforwardly asserted that “the health hazards present in tobacco smoke affect the individual who inhales the smoke whether or not the inhalation occurs as a result of the individual smoking or as a result of someone else smoking.” “Memorandum: The Inhalation of Smoke as a Hazard to the Health of Non-Smokers” at 7 (1969), Bates No. 03757217/23. In 1974, when he headed the cancer center at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, Steinfeld, in a talk at the first annual meeting of that state’s Association for Non-Smokers Rights, tentatively and speculatively suggested that, since research had not yet identified the lowest level at which substances in cigarette smoke could cause lung cancer, it was “conceivable” that a nonsmoker could be exposed to a cancer risk by being present in a smoke-filled room. Lewis Cope, “Steinfeld Cites Several Hazards of Smoke on Non-Smokers,” MT, Feb. 24, 1975 (10A:1-8 at 2).
The First Statewide Anti-Smoking Law and the Cigarette Manufacturers’ Opposition in the Early 1970s: Arizona

The campaign drew its real first blood two weeks ago. Arizona enacted a restrictive bill despite every best effort to defeat it.106

In the campaign of the non-smokers, Arizona is special for two reasons. First, it has a large population of health-conscious retirees who moved in from elsewhere to breathe clean air. Second, one of them happens to be Mrs. Betty Carnes, a crusader for nonsmokers’ rights who devotes almost full time to the cause of clean indoor air.107

[I]f there were to be a monument in this important battleground, it would have to be a statue of Mrs. Betty Carnes, her fist upraised and a squashed pack of cigarettes under her foot.108

From Arizona, the anti-smoking forces have spread their campaign rhetoric across the U.S., basing their ‘game plan’ on the example set here.

To date, over 20 states have enacted legislation to restrict or prohibit smoking in restaurants, stores, and other public places. Twenty states in slightly over two years—not a bad record, is it?109

The U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare erroneously characterized Arizona, which enacted a tobacco smoking control statute in 1973,110 as “the first state to restrict public smoking for health, rather than for fire reasons.”111 In fact, as early as 1919, Nebraska had prohibited smoking in “public

---

111 U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Smoking and Health Programs Around the World 41 (Dec. 1973), Bates No. 2501443742/88. Sixteen years later the surgeon general’s report still regarded Arizona as “the first state to restrict smoking in a number of public places, and the first to do so explicitly because smoking was a public health hazard.” U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Reducing the Health
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

eating places.” While setting forth that “smoking tobacco in any form” was “a public nuisance and dangerous to public health if done in any elevator, indoor theater, library, art museum, concert hall, or bus which is used by or open to the public”—curiously, the provision did not expressly prohibit smoking, although the bill was titled, “Prohibiting Smoking in Certain Public Areas”—the Arizona law nevertheless permitted smoking in those self-same areas “if the smoking is confined to areas designated as smoking areas.” This very restricted coverage and dysfunctional permissiveness did not prevent John Banzhaf, the pioneering anti-smoking leader of Action on Smoking and Health, from celebrating the law as “an historic first statewide legal breakthrough on behalf of America’s nonsmoking majority” and one that “can become a model law.” Although R. J. Reynolds concurred that the law was “a major breakthrough,” which quickly became “the model” for anti-smoking groups, it may have welcomed this particular statutory iteration because at the time the governor signed it the company viewed the Arizona law as “the least harmful of any of the punitive measures introduced to date” precisely because it permitted smoking in 112 1919 Neb. Laws ch. 180, § 12, at 401, 404. See above ch. 16 and vol. 2.

113 1973 Ariz. Sess. Laws ch. 122, at 715-16. This structurally self-undermining feature of the law spawned a dispute over accuracy in reporting between NBC News and the Tobacco Institute. After the former had stated that it was “illegal in Arizona to smoke in such public places as elevators, buses, libraries, museums and theaters,” the latter informed the former’s vice president for public relations that the “Arizona statute [sic] specifically provides for ‘areas designated as smoking areas’ in such facilities.” “NBC Nightly News” (Sept. 12, 1973), Bates No. LG0082339/45 (transcript); William Kloepfer, Jr. to Robert Kasmire at 2 (September 18, 1973), Bates No. LG0082339/44. NBC’s PR head incoherently replied that “I am assured that unless it has been recently amended the Arizona law states that it is illegal to smoke” in the named public places. “It does not provide for areas where smoking can take place, although it offers the option of providing for such areas if those responsible for the facilities wish to.” Robert Kasmire to William Kloepfer, Jr. (Oct. 5, 1973), Bates No. LG0082339/41.

116 [R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.], “Presentation on Smoking for Executives and Employees of Tobacco Manufacturers” at 9-10 (May 1, 1974), Bates No. 5012388969/77-8.
designated areas. That this tiny step forward also constituted a sea change was reflected in the judgment of a later surgeon general’s report that “[a]lthough not comprehensive by current [1989] standards, the law was regarded as comprehensive when passed” as witnessed by the press’s characterization of it as “sweeping.” The achievement was further diminished by the fact that smoking had largely already been banned in most of the locations covered by the statute anyway. Moreover, almost a year after the law had gone into effect, the police in Phoenix had not yet arrested anyone for having violated it. An official explained: “‘We’ve had a few complaints...but it was hard to say whether they were valid. And anyway, no one is looking out for this.’”

According to its chief sponsor, the law “would not mean people ‘would be dragged down to jail or hit with huge fines’ for smoking. Rather, it would help make smokers aware that tobacco smoke is harmful to some people.’” As late as 1979, the bill’s primary non-legislative sponsor not only knew of no one who had ever been fined, but was “‘not in favor of it.... With all the crime that is rampant today, police have more important things to do than arrest smokers. Whatever has been accomplished in the no-smoking field has been caused by smokers who never before realized they were harming other people.’”

The Arizona initiative originated in two different but interconnected personal sources. One was Betty Carnes (1905-1987), a former smoker and an internationally well-known ornithologist whose move (with her nine-year-old husband) in 1960 to Scottsdale, Arizona from New Jersey\(^{125}\) may have associated her with large numbers of middle-aged and elderly people who emigrated to the state for health reasons and in particular “seeking cures for respiratory ailments”\(^{126}\) as well as with others “here seeking clean air.”\(^{127}\) To the news media it was “[n]o wonder...that the non-smokers’ rights movement took hold” in a state to which asthmatics and older people with respiratory problems were attracted because they “welcome the dry, relatively smog-free climate around Phoenix and the state.”\(^{128}\) Spurred on by a 39-year-old close friend’s death from lung cancer,\(^{129}\) Carnes struck out on an activist career, in the course of which, as an obituary noted, she “single-handedly arranged for the first three rows of nonsmoking seats on any scheduled carrier (American Airlines, New York to Phoenix, beginning 8 August 1971), and thus began a world-wide social revolution.”\(^{130}\) The New York Times may have been exaggerating when it credited Carnes with having been “almost single-handedly responsible for Arizona’s being the first state to limit public smoking for health, rather than fire, reasons,”\(^{131}\) but the Tobacco Institute acted as if she had. For example, a few months later it explained its appeal to Lorillard for assistance on the grounds that: “We need all the help we can get in countering the aggressive activities of Mrs. Betty Carnes in her efforts to expand the coverage in the bill passed this year.”\(^{132}\) And following the 1973 session, R. J. Reynolds noted that during her three-year campaign Carnes had “personally interviewed each member of the Arizona legislature and determined their smoking habits and how they would vote on the proposed ban” in addition to having attended every legislative committee meeting in 1972 and 1973. Overall, Carnes’s efforts had “undoubtedly made the most \(^{131}\)“Arizona Curtails Smoking in Public,” \textit{NYT}, Sept. 4, 1973 (16). As noted above, Nebraska’s, Utah’s, and North Dakota’s laws had antedated Arizona’s by more than a half a century.

\(^{132}\)J. C. B. Ehringhaus and Frank Welch to Bud Bass at 3 (Nov. 9, 1973), Bates No. 85644118/20.
significant contribution” to Arizona’s anti-smoking legislation....”\textsuperscript{133} The organizational form that Carnes gave her activities was the Arizona chapter of Action on Smoking and Health (ASH)—later known as Arizonans Concerned About Smoking—which she founded in 1966 as one of the first nonsmokers’ rights groups in the United States.\textsuperscript{134}

The other person who was instrumental in securing passage of the 1973 law was Stan Turley, a self-professed “blue-nosed Mormon,” a Republican rancher who had entered the House in 1965, already in his second term served as speaker, and in 1971 introduced H.B. 28 to ban smoking only on elevators. As limited as it was, the elevator bill—which Turley regarded as one of only two “really good” things that he did in the legislature—had been several years in the making and arose in his larger environmental imagination. In 1965 or 1966 while attending a House Democratic-Republican coalition meeting at which the smoke was so thick that the ceiling was barely visible, the somewhat asthmatic Turley suddenly realized the irony inherent in the situation that the group of legislators discussing shutting down the copper smelter in Douglas because the population in the vicinity was unable to deal with the smoke was itself spewing out so much tobacco smoke that Turley smelled so bad that his wife would never let him into the house. He decided to deal with the problem by stopping smoking on the elevators. Although he failed to explain then or later how this tiny step could possibly have served that purpose, it fit within his general approach of “an inch at a time rather than jump across the river.” The connection between Turley and \textsuperscript{134}Stella Bialous and Stanton Glantz, “Tobacco Control in Arizona, 1973-1997” at 7 (1997), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/AZ1997 (incorrectly stating the group’s early name and that “[t]he 1973 state law restricted smoking in most public places, such as government buildings, health facilities, public places”). Information on the early name was provided by email from Dr. Leland Fairbanks, president, ACAS to Marc Linder (Jan. 28, 2009). As late as 1973 the group was still referred to in the press as the Arizona chapter of Action on Smoking and Health. “Senators Will Speak About Public Smoking,” Phoenix Republic, Mar. 3, 1973, Bates No. TCAL0004715. Fairbanks, however, stated that by the time he returned to Arizona in July 1970, anti-smoking activities “were referred to publicly as actions of Betty Carnes as President” of ACAS. According to Fairbanks, “early on, in the early 1970’s Betty Carnes was ACAS. She then had followers but not members.” Email from Leland Fairbanks to Marc Linder (Jan. 28, 2009). For a brief mention of the overtopping role played by Betty Carnes in persuading the legislature to act, see Richard Kluger, Ashes to Ashes at 374 (1996). Carnes was, in addition, chair of ASH’s national fund raising. Patricia McCormack, “If You Love Someone Who Smokes, Do Something!” N&O (Raleigh) (III:11), July 8, 1973, Bates No. TIMN0136397.

Carnes—whose single-minded persistence prompted Turley four decades later to call her, good-naturedly, a “nuisance” and a “pest”—came about as a result of her approaching him after she had heard about his interest in introducing legislation.\footnote{Telephone interview with Stan Turley, Mesa AZ (Jan. 24, 2009). See also interview with Stan Turley by Pam Stevenson, at 25 (Nov. 4, 2004), on http://www.cap-az.com/pdfs/oral/Interview%20with%20Stan%20Turley.pdf (visited Jan. 24, 2009).}

Rather than being a case of politics making strange bedfellows, Carnes, a wealthy Republican—her husband was vice president of American Home Products Corporation, a multi-billion-dollar pharmaceutical firm, and a longtime contributor to the Republican Party\footnote{“American Home Products Promotes Three Officials,” NYT Jan. 9, 1950 (37) (named director in 1948 and vice president in 1950); Herbert E. Carnes, Letter to Editor, AR, Sept. 5, 1977, Bates No. TCAL0005163.}—and Turley, a conservative Republican and farm, ranch, and motel owner and banker,\footnote{Stan Turley, The Kid from Sundown 130-31, 137, 139, 158-63 (2002).} exemplified how the anti-smoking movement defied congruence with liberal or leftist positions.\footnote{On Turley’s conservative politics, see Stan Turley, The Kid from Sundown 164-212 (2002). His political judgment can be gauged by his account of a three-week trip to South Africa at the invitation of the apartheid-era government: after reviewing the flora and fauna, he characterized apartheid as a “difficult system.... It appeared everyone was trying to work out appropriate changes....” Id. at 203.} It may have been easy for even a Barry Goldwater forcefully to back federal Food and Drug Administration intervention to prevent cigarette companies from “hook[ing] another generation” of children,\footnote{Barry Goldwater, “Smoke and Fire: Save the Children,” WSJ, Aug. 8, 1912 (A12). Goldwater expressly conceded that if smoking were, as the tobacco industry claimed, “a simple matter of individual rights and adult choice...I would be on their side.”} but for otherwise orthodox glorifiers of free enterprise to advocate overriding property rights and managerial prerogatives and imposing behavioral norms on customers and business owners may have required an ideological compartmentalization (‘urgent public health considerations’) to block off a slippery slope to open-ended state control. What is interesting about this early anti-passive smoking campaign is that it encompassed such rigid foes of social engineering even before science and medicine had concluded that secondhand smoke exposure was a major public health concern.\footnote{Turley’s disgust for smoking and cigarette companies appears to have been indelibly molded by an experience some years before his election to the legislature when he was hospitalized after cartridges thrown into a camp fire had exploded and pieces of the shells struck his eye. In the next bed lay a man in his thirties in a coma for three days following an accident that had killed his wife and child. While the man’s mother sat there,}
In the interim before he filed the elevator bill in 1971, Turley conducted an “experiment” by successfully banning smoking during the meetings of the House committee he chaired. By the beginning of 1970 Turley’s attitude toward public smoking was sufficiently well known that a proposal he had made in jest “requiring all smokers to wear a fitted plastic bag over their heads” was seemingly taken seriously in a letter to the editor by a man who, having recently been surrounded for 30 minutes in a hematologist’s waiting room by five people smoking cigarettes and a sixth a cigar, imagined that pursuant to Turley’s putative bill smokers “can inhale and reinhale without endangering anyone else. Why not? Think of the money they would save! Three or four cigarettes would give them the same amount of pleasure as one or two packs, meaning a savings of between $75 to $100 a year.”

When Turley finally introduced the bill in 1971, which merely applied to elevators, he and his cosponsor, Democrat Craig Davids, “were laughed off the floor.” Making it unlawful to smoke or carry lighted tobacco in a passenger elevator, the bill imposed a fine of up to $50 for a first offense and up to $100 and/or up to 90 days in jail for additional offenses. In addition to requiring the building owner or manager to post a sign with these terms, Turley required the provision of non-combustible receptacles for the disposal of lighted tobacco at the entrance to every elevator. As far as the political editor of the Arizona Republic was concerned, the bill’s only failing was that it did not “go far enough”: the ban should have been extended to all rooms in public buildings except those set aside as smoking lounges. At a House Judiciary Committee meeting two weeks later Davids explained that restricting smoking in a “confined space” was “particularly important here in Arizona because so many people are here because of respiratory problems.” Why, in the light of this worthy purpose, the protection was limited to this one location, which represented a trivial proportion of all the time that respiratorily challenged new-Arizonans spent in public confined spaces, Davids did not reveal.

Several weeks later Senate Democrat Joe Castillo, a nonsmoker who was “sick and tired of smelling smoke while trying to eat in public places,” introduced, together with five Democratic and three Republican colleagues, a bill (S.B. 166) that declared smoking in the dining area of public restaurants to be a “public nuisance and dangerous to public health.” It prohibited smoking or carrying lighted tobacco in the dining area of a public restaurant, prohibited owners and managers from permitting such smoking or from providing ash trays in dining areas, made violations misdemeanors punishable by fines ranging from $10 to $100, and required restaurant owners to post nosmoking signs stating that those convicted of violating the law would be subject to those fines. However, Castillo (who presumably sensed that he was venturing out further than a majority vote would support) also authorized the state Board of Health to adopt regulations to “permit smoking in separate dining areas...not to exceed thirty per cent of the total seating capacity when there is adequate ventilation and separation from the principal dining area.” Although Castillo and his cosponsors were not seeking to make smokers quit, but to stop the “‘contamination of other people’s air while they’re eating,’” the bill included a very forceful health-based statement of 147Minutes of Meeting, [House] Committee on Judiciary, Suffrage and Elections (Jan. 28, 1971) (copy furnished by Arizona House of Representatives Chief Clerk’s Office). Neither Betty Carnes nor anyone else who could be identified as a proponent or opponent of the bill was listed among the visitors (all of whose affiliations were named). Neither Carnes nor any other plausible proponent or opponent was listed among the visitors to the meeting of the Governmental Relations Committee, which recommended that the bill do pass. Minutes of Meeting, [House] Committee on Governmental Relations (Feb. 22, 1971) (copy furnished by Arizona House of Representatives Chief Clerk’s Office).

---

151“Senator Proposes No-Smoking Rule for Restaurants,” Star (Tucson), Feb. 10, legislative intent:

The use of tobacco for smoking purposes is being found to be increasingly dangerous, not only to the person smoking, but also to the nonsmoking person who is required to breathe such contaminated air. The most pervasive intrusion of the nonsmoker’s right to unpolluted air space is the uncontrolled smoking in public eating places. The legislature intends, by the enactment of this act, to protect the health and atmospheric environment of the nonsmoker by regulating smoking in public restaurants.\textsuperscript{152}

The Senate Public Health and Welfare Committee (which was chaired by Douglas Holsclaw, a strong anti-smoking advocate), despite the opposition of one member who felt that restaurant owners themselves should achieve the bill’s objective without legislation, recommended passage.\textsuperscript{153} That S.B. 166 did not cover bars or taverns\textsuperscript{154} failed to assuage the Rules Committee, where it died.\textsuperscript{155}

On March 9, “[j]okes, laughter, poetry and statements of outrage preceded”\textsuperscript{156} House passage of Turley and Davids’s elevator bill by a vote of 43 to 13.\textsuperscript{157} One opponent opined that the bill was “as foolish a piece of legislation as asking those who do not smoke to hold their breath during an elevator ride or take the stairs.”\textsuperscript{158} While several representatives vituperated against the bill, calling it unfair, foolish, and undeserving of consideration, Turley, surprisingly, conceded \textsuperscript{152} Senate Bill 166, § 1 (Feb. 9, 1971, by Castillo et al.).

\textsuperscript{155} Journal of the Senate: Thirtieth Legislature First Regular Session of the State of Arizona: 1971, at 1173. Turley later remarked with regard to the demise of Castillo’s bill that Republicans were not about to let a Democrat run a bill. Telephone interview with Stan Turley, Mesa, AZ (Jan. 24, 2009).

that “‘it won’t make much difference whether this bill passes or not...it might cause more understanding from some of those who use tobacco.'”\(^{159}\) Despite the large House majority, H.B. 28 died in committees in the Senate.\(^{160}\) Before the Senate Judiciary Committee Davids stated that the measure “would provide psychological leverage for the protection of nonsmokers caught in the closed space of public elevators. ‘Not too many citizens will the flout the law in the presence of others.’” Then, presumably addressing the concerns of those who eschewed law and favored voluntarism, he added: “‘I can’t conceive of any judge sending anyone to jail.’” One committee member captured the essence of this kind of hybrid measure: “‘It’s a matter of common courtesy, like a gentleman taking his hat off. Maybe we need a law to enforce it.’” But a five-member majority (including future Supreme Court Justice Sandra O’Connor) of the committee disagreed, defeating the bill.\(^{161}\) One reason that Turley reportedly encountered such strong resistance was that “[p]rophets of business disaster were convinced that if shoppers had to put out their cigarettes and favorite cigars to ride the elevators to shop on upper floors above the first floor, all businesses located above the first floor would be at tremendous economic disadvantage and possibly face financial disaster from loss of customers.”\(^{162}\)

In 1972 Castillo (and eight other senators) introduced S.B. 1109, which was virtually identical to his 1971 bill, to ban/limit smoking in restaurants.\(^{163}\) Considerable discussion in Holsclaw’s Public Health and Welfare Committee focused on “setting certain areas off rather than prohibiting smoking entirely in restaurants,” but despite Carnes’s support for the bill, the committee held S.B. 1109 rather than recommending passage.\(^{164}\) The first time that the Commerce and \(^{162}\)Email from Dr. Leland Fairbanks (pres., Arizonans Concerned About Smoke) to Marc Linder (Jan. 28, 2009).

Labor Committee (of which Castillo was a member) considered the bill, Carnes, representing Action on Smoking and Health, presented material in support of S.B. 1109, but the bill was held for a week after Dave Wynn, the lobbyist for the Hotel and Motel Association of Arizona, an ally of the tobacco industry who stated that restaurant owners opposed the bill based on “operational difficulties,” had requested an opportunity for them to appear before the committee. In the meantime it was suggested that the owners “try to find out the general public preference.” At a meeting three weeks later Castillo presented amendments to his own bill that would have eliminated coverage of small restaurants with a seating capacity of fewer than 75. The Arizona Restaurant Association opposed the bill on the grounds that, as its representative Joe Banks stated, it would be very difficult and expensive for restaurants and the state Public Health Department to enforce. Neither Carnes’s renewed advocacy nor a weakening amendment that would have excluded one-room cafes could prevent the bill’s defeat on a 4 to 3 vote.

Undaunted, though uncertain as to whether the bill would pass in 1973, Turley, now a member of the Senate—of which he became president 10 years later—remained convinced that some day the Arizona legislature would pass a law banning smoking in public places in order to prevent what was at best a public nuisance and at worst harmful to nonsmokers’ health. In the meantime, he was “furious” when someone came to his tiny office to complain about smelter smoke “and all the time he’s blowing tobacco smoke in my face.” In this regard Turley shared a perspective with many Arizonans: “Although a native, Turley, like thousands of persons who came to Arizona for health reasons, has a respiratory problem and finds at times he must leave a committee room when the smoke begins to congeal.”

---

166 Minutes, Commerce and Labor Committee, Arizona State Senate, 30th Legislature, Second Regular Session (Mar. 6, 1972) (copy furnished by Arizona Senate Resource Center).

170 Bernie Wynn, “Smoking Is Nuisance, Bill’s Sponsor Feels,” AR, Feb. 16, 1973,
The four co-sponsors of S.B. 1313 included Republicans and Democrats and smokers and nonsmokers. The most important co-sponsor was Douglas Holsclaw, the chair of the Public Health and Welfare Committee—to which the bill was assigned—who was in his mid-70s and had studied at the Harvard Medical School as well as law at the University of Arizona, in addition to operating a successful real estate business. During his seven terms in the House (beginning in 1952) and four terms in the Senate he established a record for having sponsored more than 200 bills that were enacted into law. S.B. 1313 reproduced, virtually verbatim, the aforementioned strong health-focused statement of legislative intent from Castillo’s 1971 and 1972 bills banning smoking in restaurants (which failed to survive Holsclaw’s committee in 1973).

Despite its tough and forward-looking perspective—which one contemporaneous commentator linked not to the “‘blue-noses’ or ‘prudes’ or ‘religious cranks’” who at the turn of the century regarded cigarette smoking as “‘sinful,’” but to “the same people who oppose burning trash dumps, smoke belching from smelter stacks, and oily fumes from automobile exhausts”—the bill, which, in addition to elevators, indoor movie and other theaters, libraries, art galleries, museums, concert halls, and buses, also covered restaurants and cafeterias, and made violations a misdemeanor and imposed a fine ranging between $10 and $100, nevertheless did “not prohibit” smoking in any, let alone all, of the aforementioned covered buildings (including elevators) “if the smoking is confined to areas separated from those used by the general public.” (During Senate floor debate the language “separated from those used by the general public” was struck; instead, “designated as smoking areas” was inserted.)
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

This fact did not stop R. J. Reynolds from charging that the law “prohibited smoking in any” of those places and holding up the “militant anti-smoking movement in Arizona” as a “prime example of this new era” in which legislators and regulators “at every level are on a hysterical binge of protectionism—a new ‘ism’ where people are trying to force their self-righteousness on the general public through government sanction.”

Emblematic of the kind of resistance that Turley’s bill encountered was an editorial in the Arizona Republic, which, while conceding that the health aspects were “inarguable,” found the sight of the “government’s hand” “bothersome.” The paper insisted that a “more sensible approach” would have been to “see whether private entrepreneurs—now awakened to sizable public approval of protecting nonsmokers—can demonstrate a voluntary willingness to simply accommodate requests of patrons for separate seating.” (Once the bill was passed without restaurant coverage, the newspaper was more than satisfied when two restaurants in Phoenix voluntarily set aside nonsmoking areas, thus instantiating “elective, free choice” so that no restaurant was “forced to segregate patrons, any more than patrons should be forced to patronize certain restaurants....” In fact, after the law went into effect in August an increasing number offered nosmoking sections.)

At the meeting of Holsclaw’s Public Health and Welfare Committee on March 13, after Senator John Roeder had moved to delete restaurants, cafeterias, and elevators, Turley, who was not a committee member, stated that “he had received a lot of correspondence in favor of the bill and they were not crank letters but people who really needed help with the problem.” He added that “one of the biggest problems existed in doctors offices and hospitals, but [he] did not see how this could be legislated as they were private entities” (without explaining how they differed in this regard from covered restaurants). Before voting on the motion, the committee heard Carnes and another ASH representative speak of the “urgent need” for the law and Joe Banks of the Arizona Restaurant Association assert that S.B. 1313 “would put the small restaurant owner out of business” because it “would require a tremendous effort on the part of most restaurants” to create separate areas for smokers and nonsmokers. The committee then defeated, on separate votes, the motion to strike eating places and elevators. However, it promptly did an about-face and voted to strike the lengthy, informative, and eloquent legislative intent clause; oddly, not only was there only one No vote, but it was cast by Roeder.

---

179 Cover Sheet S.B. 1313 (n.d.) (copy furnished by House Chief Clerk’s Office).

In the full Senate the stand-in for the tobacco industry apparently fared better on March 15: by a standing vote of 18 to 8 the chamber tentatively approved S.B. 1313 after having adopted a floor amendment striking out restaurant coverage authored by none other than Turley himself, “a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and a nonsmoker and teetotaler.” He explained his action on the grounds that, having had “previous experience” with a similar measure in the House, “I knew the bill would have no chance without that exclusion.... It’s not a great thing but it’s something in the right direction.” Even a Republican and smoker who supported the bill bemoaned the Senate’s having “crippled” it, while Holsclaw unsuccessfully “pleaded with his colleagues” not to exclude eating places since, after all, the “federal government is banning smoking in all its employe cafeterias because of health hazards.” Ominously, Democratic minority leader Harold Giss, according to Carnes, “got up on the floor of the Senate and puffed furiously away on his cigarette” denouncing the bill as an invasion of his personal privacy. Exactly one month later he dropped dead of a heart attack, leaving only seven smokers (whose ranks were reduced to six a few months later when yet another one succumbed to a heart attack.\footnote{188}{Arizona Curtails Smoking in Public,” \textit{NYT}, Sept. 4, 1973, (16); “Barry Farber Show” at 3 (WOR, Oct. 18, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0069236/8 (quote).} The next day the Senate passed the bill by a vote of 22 (including, this time, Sandra O’Connor) to 8, the opponents being equally divided by party.\footnote{189}{Journal of the Senate: Thirty-First Legislature First Regular Session of the State of Arizona: 1973, at 323 (Mar. 16). As passed the bill included two floor amendments offered by Turley and Holsclaw. \textit{Id.} at 802.} All eight dissenters were smokers.\footnote{190}{“Arizona Dampers Public Smoking,” \textit{Cincinnati Enquirer}, Aug. 9, 1973, Bates No. 85644122.} Speaking prematurely, on March 29, Tobacco Institute President Kornegay boasted to his board of directors with respect to anti-tobacco measures in state legislatures that “[o]ur record is still clean.”\footnote{191}{“Suggestive Statement to Be Used by Mr. Kornegay in His Report Tomorrow, March 29, 1973” (Mar. 28, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0136390.}

---

At the House Rules Committee hearing on S.B. 1313 on April 5, Carnes held up a “Smoking Kills” sign and urged the committee to protect the state’s two-thirds majority of nonsmokers.\footnote{192}{“Bill to Limit Smoking Clears Panel,” \textit{AR}, Apr. 6, 1973, Bates No. TCAL0004755. Carnes later stated that the survey she had conducted of 18,000 people in Arizona at the time the bill was introduced revealed that fewer than a fourth smoked. “Barry Farber Show” at 3 (WOR, Oct. 18, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0069236/8.} Underscoring the 80,000 cancer deaths a year caused by tobacco, Turley told the committee that the bill would “create public awareness of a real problem.”\footnote{193}{[Meeting Minutes, House] Judiciary Committee at 3 (Apr. 5, 1973) (copy furnished by Arizona House of Representatives Chief Clerk’s Office).} He also stated that “while he felt it did not go far enough, since they had to strike ‘cafeterias and restaurants’ he still felt it to be an opening wedge to the problem.”\footnote{194}{“Bill to Limit Smoking Clears Panel,” \textit{AR}, Apr. 6, 1973, Bates No. TCAL0004755.} The proposed amendment by committee chair Peter Kay, reinserting restaurant and cafeteria coverage removed in the Senate, was voted down after one member had cautioned that “‘[w]e’re liable to lose the whole bill’” if those locations were put back in.\footnote{195}{“Bill to Limit Smoking Clears Panel,” \textit{AR}, Apr. 6, 1973, Bates No. TCAL0004755.} The committee also heard from at least one opponent of the bill, Earl Cunningham, who argued that "[a]utos kill a lot more people than cigarettes, but you don’t ban autos." 196 (Apparently Cunningham was not a good listener: Turley had just stated that tobacco caused 80,000 deaths a year from cancer alone, whereas total traffic fatalities numbered 56,600 in 1972.) 197 The press account of the hearing failed to identify Cunningham, but he was the executive secretary of the Arizona Association of Tobacco and Candy Distributors, who the next year would become the cigarette oligopoly’s official lobbyist in Arizona. After the Rules Committee had recommended the bill for passage, 198 the House Health and Welfare Committee considered S.B. 1313 at its April 28 meeting, at which Carnes (her affiliation was identified as “citizen”) appealed to the members to pass it for Arizonans’ health and welfare. Before the committee voted to recommend passage, the motion by Jones and seconded by Kunasek to add coverage for restaurants, cafeterias, doctors’ offices, and hospitals carried, 199 but the full House on April 28 passed the bill by a vote of 47 to 7 200 without the additional covered locations. 201

201 Arizona’s legislative journals make it impossible to reconstruct legislative history,
Looking back, Carnes regretted that eating places had been excluded, but she recognized that many legislators believed that inclusion would have led to the bill’s defeat yet again. Her position that some part of a loaf was better than nothing was, at this critical juncture in launching the anti-passive smoking movement, difficult to criticize, but her more detailed reasoning revealed both how grateful Carnes was for even the slightest restriction on exposure to tobacco smoke and how undeveloped the understanding of the health consequences was in the early 1970s. She was willing to accept a separate section of a dining room rather than a separate room for nonsmokers because: “People would still be able to smell some smoke, but it would be a lot better than having someone blowing smoke right in your face while you are trying to eat.” How low her initial sights were set was also indicated by her claim that (in the context of continued exposure to tobacco smoke wafting from designated smoking areas and in places excluded from the law altogether) the new law put nonsmokers, who had been “second-class citizens,” “on an equal basis.” Of a piece with these views was her insistence, which would have been quite congenial at the time to some cigarette manufacturing executives, two years later that: “‘If all smokers were considerate of others...we wouldn’t have any need for these laws.'”

The large House majority cast grave doubt on the Tobacco Institute’s intelligence-gathering capacity (as well as the industry’s lobbying competence):

---

203 John Kuhn, “Get Your Ash Out of Arizona, She Said,” Hackensack Record, June 11, 1973, Bates No. TCAL0004746. Even a decade later, a physician’s (and Arizona anti-smoking activist’s) exaggerated account of the scope of voluntary compliance elided the continued exposure to smoke wafting from smoking to nonsmoking sections by asserting that when “positive peer pressure...remind[ed] a few poorly compliant individuals and facility managers from time to time as to their responsibilities under the law” they “eventually respond when they see that they will be identified as non-compliant...if they do not keep the air clean.” Leland Fairbanks, “Sidestream Smoke: A Mainstream Health Problem—The Arizona Response,” in Proceedings of the Fifth World Conference on Smoking and Health 1:519-21 at 520 (William Forbes et al. eds. 1983).

205 In its first newsletter to appear after the governor had signed the bill into law TI still headlined the news “Smoking Ban on Its Way?” TIN, No. 73, May 8, 1973, at 5, Bates... just three days earlier it had reported to R. J. Reynolds—which had asked TI to keep it informed on the progress of any bills that would prohibit or discriminate against smoking and offered “assistance in working with State Tobacco Wholesalers or others in organizing our position on any type of punitive State legislation”—that Welch, the TI’s vice president for state activities, had personally visited Arizona and “believes that this bill will not be enacted.”

At this time the Tobacco Institute took the disingenuous position for purposes of litigation that, although it was “concerned with anti-tobacco legislation anywhere it occurs, in any state,” “[w]e don’t lobby” (for example) in California because the “people in the state, the tobacco people, the distributors and their organizations, know best how to handle those matters. We do not. It would be officious of us to interject ourselves into the operation in California or any other state.”

In fact what TI did, as its president, Kornegay, testified in a deposition, was to pay the California Tobacco and Candy Distributors to hire lobbyists. (Why TI was circumspect about openly lobbying was clear: in April 1973 Welch reported that when the executive director of the California Association of Tobacco and Candy Distributors “got up to speak for us” at a legislative committee hearing on a smoking restriction bill, he was “hissed and booed....”)

At a celebration on May 4, the day the governor signed the bill (which was to go into effect on August 8), Banzhaf, the founder of ASH, lauded Arizona as the first state to “‘guarantee the rights of nonsmokers.’” Refusing to rest on their laurels, the celebrants announced that they would return to the legislature in 1974 to extend coverage to schools, restaurants, cafeterias, food markets, public meeting rooms, hospitals, doctor’s offices, waiting rooms, and interstate buses. To be sure, Turley warned against precipitous action: while agreeing that “the change in public attitudes in a few years that made the new law possible” was “‘amazing to see,’” he nevertheless urged his co-celebrants not to seize the momentum: “‘But I caution you not to go too fast in seeking too much
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

The public must be educated first. Don’t develop too much resentment by the public in seeking an expansion of this law—advice that Turley himself ignored as chief sponsor of successful and unsuccessful anti-smoking measures in 1974, 1975, 1976, and 1978.211

In a post-mortem interview on the bill’s passage in the U.S. Tobacco Journal, Cunningham both proffered various excuses for the industry’s defeat and sought to trivialize the substance of the enactment. While conceding that “the anti-smokers really got to us this time,” he noted that “we’ve been monitoring them all along but they got a lot of help from that Washington group, the National Interagency Council on smoking and health, and we just didn’t think they would muster the strength they did.” Without mentioning Turley by name, he also attributed the new law to the Mormon religion’s strictures on smoking. “There’s a good-sized Mormon segment here and when they go into government they bring their religion with them.” Cunningham then “minimized” the law’s likely impact, calling it “harassment which probably won’t have any effect on cigarette sales.”212 Philip Morris’s vice president for PR was less sanguine: a month after the governor had signed the bill, James Bowling, wondering whether “this extension of government control represents further erosion of the private citizen’s...ability to exercise freedom of choice,” told a tobacco audience that “we can expect an avalanche of this kind of proposed legislation to continue to be advocated by the anti-smoking forces,” whose arguments were “based on passion and emotion rather than valid scientific data.”213 Efforts would, he added, nevertheless be made to have the law repealed.214 R. J. Reynolds, charging that the Arizona legislature had acted “under considerable pressure from militant anti-smoking and environmentalist groups,” appeared to take some solace from the fact the law “did not ban smoking outright....”215 Revealingly, the only point that the cigarette oligopoly’s representative failed to mention was that, as Democrat 211 Turley later stated that his filing more bills did not contradict his advice in the sense that he had not regarded those bills as pushing the envelope. Telephone interview with Stan Turley, Mesa, AZ (Feb. 4, 2009).

---

Larry Bahill had stressed at the House Judiciary Committee hearing, “‘[p]eople are getting sick and tired of having smoke blown in their face and inhaling the used air of other people.’”216 Cunningham’s reaching out for scapegoats to excuse his own failure to thwart enactment was consistent with Turley’s later judgment that the tobacco industry had not taken his bill seriously because it had not been worried about the likelihood of the measure’s passage or enforcement.217

The closest Cunningham came to addressing this health issue was his announcement that “‘[w]e’re also coming out with a positive claim that will encourage people to enjoy smoking while considering the non-smokers around them.... Our hope is this sort of positive approach will get the anti-smokers off our backs.’”218 Shortly thereafter Cunningham created “cartoons depicting common sense smoker courtesy practices.” Their purpose was “to subtly tell smokers that some non-tobacco users find the habit unpleasant in confined areas such as elevators....” The coordinating director of the Coordinating Board of Tobacco Trade Associations enthusiastically reported to the cigarette manufacturers that “[s]uch a program could have far-reaching public relations possibilities for an industry currently barraged with ‘non-smoker’s rights’ legislative proposals.”219 How the CBTTA imagined reconciling this inculcation of courtesy with its plans to mobilize smokers to “protest the erosion of financial and personal freedoms being suffered by people desiring to use a legitimate product” at the very same time220 it did not explain. (Moreover, Cunningham was 217Telephone interview with Stan Turley, Mesa, AZ (Jan. 24, 2009).

219Jack Beaty to American Brands, Inc. et al., Subject: Quarterly Report at 3 (July 11, 1973), Bates No. 680517400/02. The CBTTA, a creature of the cigarette oligopolists, was formed in 1970 to strengthen the tobacco industry at the state level. Deeming the “submissiveness of the tobacco consumer to restriction after restriction and tax after tax...inexplicable,” the CBTTA concluded: “We must wage a campaign which will arouse the natural instincts of the consumer to resist unfair treatment.” Jack Beaty, Confidential Report: Prepared Especially for the Executive Committee of the Tobacco Institute Special Committee on Industrial Coordination at 1, 8 (June 30, 1971), Bates No. 03602097/8/10. Beaty’s contract with the cigarette manufacturers required him to use his “best efforts” to encourage tobacco trade associations to “recognize that their own best interests require them to oppose...the enactment of” “state and municipal legislation to discourage smoking by imposing restrictions on the promotion or sale of cigarettes.” William S. Smith [chairman of the board, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.] to Jack Beaty and Associates (Jan. 21, 1974), Bates No. 502076478.
220Jack Beaty to Earl Cunningham (May 9, 1973), Bates No. 500034469.
unsure whether the Tobacco Institute would support his initiative\textsuperscript{221} precisely because the industry lacked a uniform position on this so-called courtesy tactic. For example, during a discussion of the issue at a TI Communications Committee meeting, John Blalock, the Brown & Williamson PR director, argued both that it was “[d]angerous to preach smoking ethics” and that he “would not want to admonish smokers. They are harrassed [sic] enough.”\textsuperscript{222}

Carnes and Turley did not achieve their success as a result of some neglect or failure on the part of cigarette manufacturers to become involved in the legislative process in Arizona. The Tobacco Institute, though scarcely as well funded to lobby in the states as it would be by the late 1970s, let alone the 1980s or 1990s, was nevertheless panoptically observant. Thus as early as 1967 TI, in its annual account of “State Anti-Tobacco Legislative Activity,” noted that it had appraised more than 600 bills that it believed were or might be detrimental to the tobacco industry, none of which was enacted. The report made it clear that it was attentively monitoring developments in Arizona: “No tobacco punitive/restrictive type legislation has been introduced in past session of the Arizona Legislature, and the chief spokesman for the anti-tobacco forces, the State Health Officer, has given no indication that he will seek such legislation next year.”\textsuperscript{223}

From the 1969 report it emerged that the Tobacco Institute had engaged in lobbying in at least 21 states and New York City, though in some of them the industry appeared to be operating behind the scenes and without a formal representative.\textsuperscript{224} To be sure, at this juncture, when state legislatures had as yet passed scarcely any measures hostile to the tobacco industry, the Tobacco Institute neither was nor needed to be the much feared/admired lobbying machine that it would soon become. The low level of competence and sophistication of which TI was still capable was on display in 1969 in West Virginia, where the organization had not even heard about a certain bill because the (legislative) reporting service had not reported it to the Tobacco Institute until late in the session.\textsuperscript{225} More revelatory of the industry’s lack of lobbying prowess was the \textsuperscript{221}“Anti-Smokers: Do or Die?” \textit{USTJ}, May 17, 1973, Bates No. TCAL0004653 (edit.).

\textsuperscript{222}T.I. ComCom [Communications Committee meeting handwritten notes] (Apr. 10 [1973]), Bates No. 500081708/13/14.

2197
comment in the 1970 report about the New York State legislature, which for the previous six years, spearheaded by Republican Senator Edward Speno, had considered “a rash of anti-tobacco bills,” which “covered a wide range [sic] attack on the tobacco industry.” Only after these years of steady onslaught triggered by the surgeon general’s report in 1964 was the Tobacco Institute able to state that: “We are now well organized in Albany with competent legislative assistance, and this year we got more help from other organized groups than we have had heretofore....” Nevertheless, the bill watchers lamented that the “persistence and competency of the adversaries in the New York Legislature make the situation there difficult and pressing.”

Carnes herself stated the day after the Arizona governor had signed the bill into law that: “‘You have no idea how hard it is to fight the large restaurant and tobacco industry lobbies. They have thousands of dollars for the smoking campaigns. I had only time.’” She quickly made it clear that she would be using more of that time to lobby the legislature in 1974 for smoking bans in food stores, hospitals, and doctors’ offices. By the fall of 1973 the Tobacco Institute began preparing to thwart any such legislative expansions in Arizona. On November 9, TI general counsel J. C. B. Ehringhaus and state activities vice president Welch wrote to Lorillard’s vice president for sales requesting “assistance on evolving problems in Arizona....” After mentioning that Turley and another senator had already publicly declared that they intended to introduce a bill in 1974 to cover places not included in what the TI regarded as the “relatively mild” 1973 law, and that proposed coverage might be comprehensive or “fairly limited with better prospects of getting it enacted,” Ehringhaus and Welch revealed that they had spoken to Cunningham and Weldon Hill, the operator of two wholesale tobacco firms in Arizona, who had “agreed to start now in organizing and developing a program of resistance to this prospective proposal.” In addition they had also contacted the aforementioned Dave Wynn, the lobbyist for the Hotel and Motel Association of Arizona, and Joe Banks, the executive secretary of the Arizona Restaurant Association, who both “agreed to mobilize their forces and cooperate with the tobacco industry representatives in an aggressive campaign to prevent further restrictive legislation in the state.” The Tobacco Institute requested that Lorillard both deploy its sales representatives in this battle and contact motor carrier organizations that transported and a warehouse company that stored most of the cigarettes in Arizona to request that they offer their services to Cunningham, who would be working with TI’s “excellent lobbyist” in Arizona, Tom Sullivan.229 In spite of this meticulously planned counter-lobbying, in 1976 R. J. Reynolds mendaciously charged, in the wake of Carnes’s (partial) success in 1974, that: “Her techniques were laudable in terms of lobbying efforts in that she HAD NO ORGANIZED OPPOSITION to her crusade. For lack of that, she established a foothold in Arizona’s two legislative houses.” Even for 1975, Reynolds, suppressing the cigarette manufacturers’ overriding important role, claimed that: “Concerned citizens and local tobacco trade organizations were successful in defeating the restrictive legislation.”230

Bates No. 1002909020/79.

The enhanced efficacy of the tobacco industry lobby during the 1974 session of the Arizona legislature can be gauged by comparing the scope of the additional locations of restricted smoking in S.B. 1213 as introduced by Turley, Holmes, and another senator231 and the actual expanded scope of covered places that survived to enactment. The bill encompassed: public lecture halls; waiting rooms, restrooms, lobbies or hallways of any health care institution; public waiting rooms of health associated laboratories or facilities; any nonsmoking patient’s room; public waiting rooms of any physician, dentist, psychologist, physiotherapist, podiatrist, chiropractor, naturopath, optometrist, or optician; school buildings; beauty parlors; passenger areas of any intrastate bus, airplane, or railway coach; the public selling area of any food, drug, or department store; dining areas in hotels, restaurants, cafes, cafeterias, and theater cafes; and public waiting lines in buildings containing motor vehicle license offices. To be sure, as under the 1973 law, smoking was not prohibited in any of these places if it was confined to designated areas.232

As passed, S.B. 1213 included only lecture halls, school buildings, public waiting rooms of the offices of physicians and other 229J. C. B. Ehringhaus and Frank Welch to Buss Bass (Nov. 9, 1973), Bates No. 85644118.

health professionals, as well as waiting rooms, rest rooms, lobbies, and hallways of health care institutions.\(^{233}\) Carnes justified coverage of doctors’ offices, hospitals, and food stores on the grounds that they “‘all are places we must go—we have no choice.’”\(^{234}\) Perversely, however, patient rooms, however, were excluded.\(^{235}\)

The demise of the other smoke-free locations was sealed at a one-hour hearing before Holsclaw’s Senate Public Health and Welfare Committee on February 26,\(^{236}\) which was exposed to smoking by two pipe smokers and one cigarette smoker. The committee’s chopping up and watering down of the bill left Carnes “livid, ‘‘furious,’’ and ‘‘heartbroken,’” especially at the “joking manner in which the subject was handled.” Many of the additional locations that Turley had included in the bill were struck by close votes on motions by Republican Senator Hal Runyan, a cigarette smoker. These locations included nonsmoking patients’ rooms, beauty parlors, public selling areas of food, drug, or department stores, dining areas, passenger area of intrastate planes or railways, and waiting lines.\(^{237}\) Three days later the Senate passed the scaled-back version by a vote of 20 to 10.\(^{238}\) The significant number of smoking legislators—for example, several members of the House Health and Welfare Committee leaned back in their chairs and began smoking as soon as the bill’s supporters had left the hearing room—\(^{239}\) insured that the House Judiciary Committee rejected an amendment by Democratic Representative Elwood Bradford to include the legislative floor and committee rooms as nosmoking areas, especially since even those who favored such inclusion recognized that it would kill the bill.\(^{240}\) During \(^{237}\) Don Bolles, “Woman Crusader Against Smoking Fumes as Committee Plays It Cool,” \emph{AR}, Feb. 27, 1974, Bates No. TCAL0005168.

\(^{239}\) “No Smoking’ Signs to Cost Up to $2.50,” \emph{AR}, Apr. 4, 1974, Bates No. TCAL0005256.

debate in the House Committee of the Whole Bradford offered an amendment to segregate smokers in certain areas of the legislative chambers and committee rooms. Surrounded at his chamber desk by several of the House’s heaviest smokers, Bradford observed that nonsmoking representatives “obviously suffered sitting next to those who smoke.” Its defeat on a “surprisingly close” vote was, ironically, made possible by many of the measure’s strongest supporters, who feared that it would be a bill killer. On final passage S.B. 1213 secured an overwhelming majority of 47 to 11.

At the Tobacco Institute’s annual meeting in January 1975, President Kornegay observed that during the previous year’s state legislative sessions his organization, “with limited resources,” had been “remarkably successful, or lucky, or both” in handling about 100 bills (in addition to several times that number on the local level). Nevertheless, not only did the tobacco industry not always win, it lost “sometimes without even knowing that a measure was being considered,” although he hoped that this “knowledge gap” would be narrowed in the future. Without mentioning Arizona, Kornegay asserted that where TI was involved, its “participation made a difference in the sense that “even when a bill was enacted, it always emerged greatly watered-down. The opposition always received less than they demanded.” The reason for the oligopoly’s barrage of efforts to thwart the passage of additional restrictive legislation was set forth in a simplified example by Reynolds’ director of field sales: if such laws caused all 56 million smokers to smoke just one fewer cigarette per day, the total annualized sales loss would be $449 million.
By 1975, resistance organized by the tobacco industry thwarted further legislative action in Arizona at a time when, according to Carnes’s count, only 16 of 60 House members and six of 30 senators smoked. Turley’s vehicle in 1975, S.B. 1101 (which was co-sponsored by six senators and 14 representatives), added the public selling area of any food or drug store and the dining area in any hotel, restaurant, cafe, cafeteria, or theater cafe to the list of covered places. The bill became a symbol for the increasing disarray in which the cigarette oligopolists found themselves. President Kornegay’s summary statement to TI’s executive committee in March about the “extremely well organized anti-smoking activities” on the state legislative level vastly understated the panicky mood that was enveloping the company executives. In a memorandum to the file the next day, Arthur Stevens, Lorillard’s general counsel, described the “sense of urgency” that existed “because the situation has already become extreme”:

The most important matter considered at the meeting relates to the current epidemic-like increase in nationwide state and local smoking prohibitions. The level of activity has already passed the point where the Tobacco Institute staff is physically able to act or respond. We are desperately behind and are losing the battle—both with respect to new bills and ordinances, and also as regards strengthening amendments to existing legislation. (For example, see the attached Arizona bill.)

Stevens attached a statement of the problem by Ehringhaus and TI vice president William Kloepfer, Jr., who highlighted the proliferating “[s]ocial ostracism of smokers” effected by governmental action all over the country and the successful identification of smokers as “[s]ocial menaces” by “[s]elf-appointed spokesmen for the ‘nonsmoking majority,’ backed by well-financed health organizations.” In contrast, the Tobacco Institute, the “only defense and the only organized opposition to this drive,” was unable to “cope with the growing public acceptance of and agreement with the notion that smoking harms the nonsmoker.” Their only legislative recommendation was the articulation by the Institute of a TITX0032101/2.

249 Tobacco Institute, Minutes of the Fifty-Sixth Meeting of the Executive Committee at 3 (Mar. 13, 1975), Bates No. LG6508408/10.

“‘fall-back’ position” of providing for separate areas for smokers and nonsmokers in some public facilities and no smoking in poorly ventilated areas. But even in extremis this tentative compromise manifestly went against the grain of the industry’s inveterate take-no-prisoners’ style: “The Institute staff is aware that this is not without risk, in the sense that it could lead to passage of ‘foot-in-the door’ legislation subject to subsequent strengthening. For this reason, utmost caution would be observed.”

That Turley, Carnes, and the anti-smoking movement were “ecstatic” that the Senate Government Committee recommended that S.B. 1101 pass but with an amendment sharply curtailing coverage of restaurants and cafes may merely have been a function of Turley’s tactic of pushing for more than was achievable in order to be able to agree to a compromise that embodied the provisions for which he had really been aiming. With regard to this particular iteration of the developing law, however, Turley seemed to be adopting an end-of-history view: “‘I think this may be about as far as we can go on this.... Pretty soon, people are going to fight back.”’ And the press unpacked “people” to mean cigarette smokers who had “docilely acceded each year to the smoke-haters’ moves to expand the places where smoking is prohibited.”

Despite the account that Carnes gave the committee of a party that she and her husband had attended in a smoke-filled restaurant the fumes from which had given her husband a heart attack, coverage of eating places unraveled when several committee members and the cigarette oligopoly’s lobbyist, Ernest Hoffman—ostensibly representing local tobacco wholesalers—argued that the bill might cause enforcement problems, which Hoffman hyperbolically portrayed this way: “‘You’re going to have to create a department of enforcement which may be about as big as the Department of Public Safety,’” especially since the existing law was not being enforced. (In contrast, Carnes maintained that the law had never been designed to facilitate prosecution, but rather was a form of “‘long-term public education’” that gave nonsmokers “‘courage to tell off other people who are smoking.’”) 258  Oddly, Hoffman claimed that he had not run an “aggressive campaign to derail” S.B. 1101 because “‘it’s kind of a motherhood bill, it’s tough to argue against it.’” 259  The amendment entailed giving restaurant and cafe owners the choice of (without requiring) setting aside certain areas for nonsmokers which, if posted “no smoking,” would have the force of law. 260  If the original restaurant provision was amended because members deemed it “too severe,” the department, food, and drug store restriction encountered no such obstruction after the spokesman for the Arizona Retailers Association, interestingly focused on cigarettes’ destructiveness of non-animate objects, stated that it “wouldn’t object to being included because of burned carpeting and merchandise.” 261

254 Telephone interview with Stan Turley, Mesa, AZ (Jan. 24, 2009).

On April 1 the Senate passed S.B. 1101 by a vote of 18 to 12, with seven Democrats and five Republicans opposed, 262  but the bill’s passage in the House was less certain from the outset 263  and soon enough its planned death became certain.  By the latter part of May the Republican chairs of the House Commerce Committee and Health Committee, James Skelly, a heavy cigarette smoker, and nonsmoking Diane McCarthy, respectively, insisted that “‘you can’t legislate courtesy by enacting no-smoking bills’” and made it clear that the bill had little chance of passage.  Indeed, McCarthy, who told the press that she believed that she had the votes to kill the bill in her committee, added that it was “‘extremely doubtful’” that a public hearing would take place.  Such legislators and “tobacco industry lobbyists” argued that the successful antismoking campaigns had not only infringed on individual rights, but diminished the state’s cigarette tax revenues.  In contrast, the charge made by some of the bill’s supporters that the House Republican leaders had ordered the chairs to “squelch” S. B. 1101 “quietly” came in the wake of the cancellation of the Health Committee’s public hearing on one day’s notice, but also, and more importantly, was based on the fact that the tobacco industry had contributed $1,700 to the election campaigns of 10 of the most influential House Republicans (and one Democrat in addition to 261“Committee Adds Stores to No-Smoking Ordinance,” AR, Mar. 20 [?], 1975, Bates No. TCAL0005246.

$1,385 to seven Senate Republicans and two Democrats). The contributions to nine of the House members were officially made by Earl Cunningham, the industry’s lobbyist in 1974. To be sure, such funding did not guarantee pro-industry votes: in 1975, half of the Senate Republicans who took money nevertheless voted for S.B. 1101, including Turley himself, who received $150.264
In Turley’s case, he accepted the contribution because he never turned down money from any source (except the John Birch Society); as to what would have motivated the cigarette companies to help finance the reelection of their greatest legislative thorn in Arizona, Turley later explained that he had been friends with Cunningham and in general had liked lobbyists.265

On May 26, Mike Hendley, the president of the Tobacco, Candy Wholesalers Association of Arizona, Hoffman’s ostensible client, issued a press release, much of which the Phoenix Gazette published in the guise of an article, albeit one that contained virtually none of the paper’s own words, let alone the slightest hint of criticism or even a question. The release asserted that S.B. 1101 was emblematic of the situation of the day in which one group, bereft of “good scientific evidence,” was seeking to “make illegal a wide spread [sic] and long-standing social practice of another group of people they find annoying.” Asserting that the tobacco industry could “live with” the existing Arizona laws (which, astonishingly, the unpublished press release called “reasonable”), Hendley charged that the 1975 bill brought on a “whole new dimension” revealing that the Arizona nonsmoking movement’s real mission was not to protect the nonsmoker from the smoker, but the latter from himself. Drifting off into rhetoric redolent of canned Tobacco Institute material, he insisted that further restrictions “could ultimately negate all our freedoms.” Then, finally focusing on the immediate threat to the industry’s profitability, Hendley argued that the anti-smoking bills enacted had “already accomplished their purpose” in the sense that “Arizona leads all States in the decline of packages sold of cigarettes. For the first nine months of the...1974-75 fiscal year, some six million less packs have been sold than the previous year.” Whereas in the country as a whole sales had risen by 3 percent, Arizona recorded the greatest decline (3 percent). Finally, seeking to persuade both nonsmokers and legislators that they were beneficiaries of the significant contribution that tobacco taxes made to financing the state government, he urged them to “give clear thought to where will the monies come 264 Steven Tragash, “Antismoking Bill Expected to Die in House Panels,” AR, May 25, 1975, Bates No. TCAL0005239/40.

265 Telephone interview with Stan Turley, Mesa, AZ (Feb. 4, 2009). Given the low cost of election campaigns at the time (he spent only $1,300 on his first and often ran unopposed), Turley stated that even $150 was a significant contribution.
from if the tobacco industry were not in Arizona.”

In the event, the House committee chairs never did hold hearings—McCarthy insisted that “private enterprise” could deal with the smoking issue, whereas Carnes pointed out that business owners were afraid to ban smoking privately lest they lose customers—and thus succeeded in killing the bill. Hoffman self-congratulatorily hailed S.B. 1101’s death a “significant victory,” especially since it had been considered “a sure winner...and was done by the anti-tobacco forces to make Arizona once again the ‘model anti-smoking law’ State.” He nevertheless admonished tobacco interests not to rest on their laurels merely because they had gotten through one session “unscathed”: more bills would be introduced in 1976—a prediction with which Turley definitely agreed. And Carnes went a step further, confidently assuring the world that the public would continue to insist on the expansion of coverage of the anti-public smoking law, which would eventually be legislatively ratified.

The struggle over regulation did not even wait for the next legislative session: instead, the scene shifted to Tucson, where by August anti-smokers (and at least one council member and the mayor) were attempting to expand the city’s May 1972 ordinance, which banned smoking in public theaters, movie houses, and various auditoriums, to include department stores and sections of all eating places. The anti-smoking movement was especially strong in Tucson because many people had moved there “because of respiratory problems.” In September Hoffman reported to Ehringhaus at the Tobacco Institute that he was “deeply involved again...‘holding the fort’” at the Tucson city council before which the expanded ordinance was being raised four times a month. He emphasized that only by a tenuous 4 to 3 majority were the pro-tobacco forces able to keep tabling motions; if one vote switched, “we are in trouble. A public hearing would absolutely create a new ordinance, as I understand the Carnes’ [sic] forces are prepared to take over City Hall if that matter comes before the Council.” Against the background of this democratic groundswell for further government intervention, the only suggestion that Hoffman had for his customer was spending money on an ad campaign “to create the proper pressure on the Council.” In order to apply the proper pressure on the cigarette oligopoly, he observed that the “significance of losing here is that it would set a precedence [sic] for Phoenix to follow the same course.” Having prepared the ground, he then made an indirect pitch to renegotiate his contract: “It frankly has turned out to be a full-time effort on our part and certainly I did not bargain for this when I came aboard the tobacco band wagon.”

---

266 Tobacco, Candy Wholesalers Association of Arizona, “Smoking Bill Infringes on Basic Rights of Individuals” (May 26, 1975), Bates No. 500011146/7-8; “Crusade Against Tobacco Claimed,” PG, May 26, 1975, Bates No. TCAL0005238. Hendley claimed that the taxes amounted to about $60 million, but this sum included $18.6 million in federal excise taxes. A separate memorandum that appears to have been written in the name of the same organization made clear that only $38 million of those taxes “stayed in Arizona” and stated that “S.B. 1101 seeks to discourage an economic activity that has paid over $400 million to Arizona governments in the past ten years” and constituted the fifth largest item in Arizona’s general fund revenue. Memorandum on Senate Bill 1101 (1975), Bates No. 500011128/29-30.

270 Ernest Hoffman to Tobacco Interests, Anti-Smoking Bill in Arizona Fails (June 11, 1975), Bates No. 501791670/2.

Off this wagon Hoffman had definitely not fallen, as a memo he directed to Dowdell at R. J. Reynolds later in 1975 revealed. In commenting on an enclosed article from the previous day’s New York Times (“Warning: Cigarette Smoking May Be Hazardous to Your Social Standing”) he presented himself as a true believer, whom such anti-tobacco press accounts “frankly nauseate....” Expressing more outrage than his interlocutor at the country’s biggest cigarette manufacturer, he took the opportunity to “expouse [sic] my strong feelings again—that is, the TOBACCO INDUSTRY IS LOSING BY DEFAULT.” In seeming disbelief he insisted that: “Surely with a joint industry of some $16 billion, there must be some way we can get back to the general public with our message. ... Our national efforts are a drop in the bucket compared to what we should be doing in the industry.” And if Dowdell failed to grasp his meaning, Hoffman ominously warned that unless “our people...come up with some type” of counter-campaign, he expected that what they were witnessing “may be the beginning of the end for the industry.”

---

274Ernest Hoffman to J. C. B. Ehringhaus (Sept. 11, 1975), Bates No. 500011132/3.
275Ernie Hoffman to James Dowdell (Nov. 12, 1975), Bates No. 500011119.
Two weeks later, Hendley, the president of the state tobacco wholesalers association, sought to reinforce Hoffman’s plea for more “financial assistance” by opening his letter to Dowdell, the director of R. J. Reynolds’ state legislative relations, with the bald exclamation: “We’re in trouble in Arizona!” While differing from Hoffman in stating that he had expected a decline in the anti-smoking movement after the end of the legislative session, he sounded the alarm that “we are on the verge of having our allies crumble under the pressure of Mrs. Carnes and A.S.H.” For his troubles, Hendley received fulsome praise a few months later for defeating S.B. 1101 from Reynolds’ director of field sales, who told his association’s annual convention that without “Hendley and a few other men of courage like him” and if the association had not hired Hoffman as its lobbyist, “there is no question that you would have even more discriminatory, more restrictive laws...today” and “the segregation of smokers from non-smokers would have been more complete...in a land that was founded on the principle that men could go where they wanted to go when they wanted to.”

By mid-January 1976 the press reported that the Tucson city council was moving toward adoption of an ordinance that would ban smoking in food, drug, and department stores with 15 or more employees (supposedly because long check-out lines and crowding made smoking more offensive there) and in 70 percent of dining areas in restaurants, cafes, cafeterias, and hotels. Penalties for violations would be set at a maximum of $300 and/or six months in jail. Despite the fact that the ordinance proposed by the “zealots” was “in essence...the same one defeated last year at the State Legislature only with more severity,” Hoffman could hardly contain himself when he reported to the Tobacco Wholesalers Association that, although he had been trying to convince the restaurants, innkeepers, and liquor associations since June 1975 that if certain city councilmen were defeated, the associations would be “in trouble”—and in fact those defeats wound up giving anti-smokers a 4 to 3 majority—when he addressed them a few days before the city council vote, “for the first time, they are alarmed!” Hoffman’s pessimism was reinforced by the lack of opposition to the ordinance by the grocery or department store owners.

---

276 Mike Hendley to James Dowdell (Sept. 23, 1975), Bates No. 500011131.
279 Ernest Hoffman to Tobacco, Candy Wholesalers Association of Arizona, Subject:
Even before the council voted, R. J. Reynolds waxed indignant over the “efforts to enforce a broader ban on smoking in Tucson [which] went...far beyond anything undertaken in our country, where freedom and human rights are the cornerstone of our government.” Even in the area of tactics, the master of dirty tricks was “appalled to learn that ASH wasn’t content in hauling hundreds of senior citizens, in advanced stages of all the diseases that afflict the aged, to pack the halls when the city council met. As if that wasn’t deplorable enough, they established picket lines around Ernie Hoffman’s home and subjected his wife and daughters to an unheard-of degree of harassment and abuse. I ask you and the rest of the citizens of Arizona—was this Arizona in 1975 or Germany in 1937?”

In the meantime, Turley had introduced yet another bill (S.B. 1149, co-sponsored by four other senators and five representatives). To the Senate Government Committee hearing on February 25, Hoffman did not come to praise Arizona for holding “the distinction of leading the states in the decline in smoking,” but rather to warn senators about the millions of dollars in cigarette tax revenue that the state stood to lose if smoking continued to decline. In the event, the committee recommended the bill’s passage with an amendment striking coverage of eating places but leaving intact the smoking ban in selling areas of department, grocery, and drug stores. The timidity of Carnes’ type of advocacy was nicely encapsulated by her response that the “drastic drop” of two million dollars in state tobacco tax revenue assailed by cigarette lobbyists was “not because [sic] of the no-smoking law, but because of the education of a non-informed public, aware of the dangers of smoking.” Her unwillingness to give credence to the oligopoly’s empirically eminently plausible gloomy predictions of reductions in the number of cigarettes smoked brought about by governmentally imposed restrictions and bans on public places available for smoking, let alone to admit that that outcome was, together with protecting non-smokers from exposure to secondhand smoke, one of the anti-smoking Anti-Smoking Bill Tucson City Council (Jan. 19, 1976), Bates No. 501791681.

2209
movement’s driving forces, underscored how circumscribed its goals were precisely because it tacitly accepted smokers’ alleged freedom and autonomy and cigarette manufacturers’ right to continue to profit handsomely from hawking uniquely lethal commodities.

On the Senate floor, Republican Stephen Davis, a smoker, sought to subvert the law in its entirety by offering an amendment to eliminate its mandatory character by eliminating all existing designated no-smoking areas and, instead, conferring legal backing on any no-smoking regime that any public or private manager or owner voluntarily created. He purported to have chosen this approach to offer greater flexibility because anti-smoking advocates kept requesting the addition of new banned locations, but he also hyperbolically claimed that it was also “‘the only valid way to go if the legislature wants to continue the right to private ownership.’” Turley, who argued that the proposal would merely create confusion and more problems than it would solve, addressed Davis’s claim by stating that he would not introduce more bills in future sessions seeking additional smoke-free locations if S.B. 1149 were enacted, but vowed to return to continue his campaign with greater vigor if it failed since “[s]ome people are unable to go to public places where they should be able to go because of heavy smoking.” The Senate’s defeat of Davis’s amendment by a vote of 9 to 19 signaled the vote on final passage: the next day the Senate once again passed S.B. 1149 by a vote of 18 to 10 (with seven Democrats casting Nays). The bond between Davis and R. J. Reynolds was tight enough that a few months later Dowdell planned for him to meet corporate CEO William Hobbs and other officials during a trip to North Carolina. Although Davis’s own scheduling initially prevented the meeting from taking place, Dowdell informed Hoffman that he was hoping Davis could get back to Winston-Salem “so that some of our people may have an opportunity to let him know how much we all appreciate his outstanding support in the Arizona Senate.” Dowdell did, however, have an opportunity to speak to Davis, who reported, as Dowdell approvingly told

Hoffman, that “between the two of you you came very close to getting your permissive legislation through. Maybe it’s something you should consider introducing early in the next session. The very thought of repealing the restrictive smoking laws now on the books and leaving it up to the proprietor of an establishment to decide whether or not smoking would be permitted would, I believe, be the strongest possible deterrent to any additional legislation extending your present no-smoking laws.” Otherwise he lamented that he was unable to give Hoffman any further information about new efforts to resist passage of additional anti-smoking legislation. Emblematic of the difficulties that the Tobacco Institute was encountering was that it was not even able to “line up some qualified scientists who can speak with conviction on the passive smoking issue.”

Anti-public-smoking forces were, in the meantime, coordinating progress toward a stricter ordinance in Tucson with developments in the legislature. Holsclaw, no longer a state senator but now a member of Citizens Concerned About Smoking and Health, announced that the group had decided to ask the city council to eliminate restaurants from the proposed ordinance’s list of additional regulated places. Instead, CCASH, which had scaled back its demands in order to conform the scope of the ordinance to that of the now reduced reach of S.B. 1149, agreed to ask restaurant owners voluntarily to set aside no-smoking sections. In turn, the Southern Arizona Restaurant Association’s executive secretary proffered his “solemn promise” that every member would be asked to provide such areas. Whether anti-smokers’ willingness to acquiesce in the tobacco industry’s free enterprise circumvention of the problem of smoke exposure was a reaction to the association’s survey of restaurant customers, which revealed that fewer than half favored no-smoking sections, is unclear.

Unfazed by the Tucson Chamber of Commerce’s claims of a “constitutional right” of a business owner to determine whether to permit smoking in his establishment and of a person to smoke during his daily shopping and eating, in March a 5 to 2 majority of the Tucson city council did vote to ban smoking in grocery, drug, and department stores, but defeated coverage of eating places and reduced the maximum fine from $300 to $100. 292

Almost seven weeks after the Senate had passed S.B. 1149, the House Government Operations Committee “overwhelmingly” recommended passage of S.B. 1149 in spite of the tobacco industry’s strong opposition. Turley’s argument that “[o]ur right to breathe fresh air is superior to the right of smokers to pollute the air” apparently prevailed over Hoffman’s advocacy of “voluntary compliance” in stores. 293 Hoffman, the only witness to oppose the bill, also contradicted Carnes’s assertion that cigarette consumption in Arizona had continued to rise since enactment of the original law in 1973: while tobacco tax revenues may have risen as a result of an increase in the tax rate, consumption had dropped by 4.2 percent. 294

The bill, which had received the backing of the state-level cancer, lung, heart, and medical associations, then stalled in the House Health Committee, whose chair, Diane McCarthy, was expected, once again, to kill it, but this time she worked her legislative euthanasia by assigning it to a subcommittee to study how much it would cost store owners to post nosmoking signs. At a full committee hearing on April 29, the almost 80 tobacco industry supporters in attendance had, Hoffman, boasted, “a marked effect on the Health Committee.” However, as Hoffman also well knew, their presence was not a prerequisite for favorable action since, “unbeknownst” to the anti-smoking forces—to whom McCarthy had proclaimed that, after the subcommittee had made a few needed changes, S.B. 1149 would be returned to the full committee’s agenda—she in fact, as a political commentator put it, “sen[t] the bill to the chain-smoking buddy of the tobacco lobbyist, who has been fighting the legislation tooth and nail”: it turned out that Hoffman was not only the “close personal friend” of Republican subcommittee chair Tom Goodwin, but also his campaign manager. It was, therefore, a risible understatement for Hoffman to report to his clients that “[i]n its current sub-committee it is highly unlikely that it [S.B. 1149] will be reported out...” Moreover, he knew that he could rely on McCarthy—whose hobby horse was the threat to freedom posed by state and federal regulatory agencies, especially the Environmental Protection Agency, and who admonished corporations to “do a better job of telling citizens of the benefits of the free market system as it relates to individual welfare and freedom”—to deny that she was “‘sandbagging’” S.B. 1149 “by shutting it off to a hostile subcommittee,” though she openly admitted that she regarded the bill as unnecessary. (The Arizona Republican Party’s prioritizing the tobacco lobby above the state’s nonsmoking majority in general and McCarthy’s “complete disregard for the health and welfare of Arizona citizens” in particular prompted Carnes’ husband, a longtime contributor to the national, state, and local Republican Party, to become “so disgusted with the 297Ernest Hoffman to Members Association, Subject: Tobacco Legislation (May 6, 1976), Bates No. 501791683.

299Ernest Hoffman to Members Association, Subject: Tobacco Legislation (May 6, 1976), Bates No. 501791683.
actions of leading Republicans...in Arizona that I have decided to withdraw my financial support for the G.O.P. everywhere until there is a change in their attitude in the state.”)301

To be sure, the cigarette oligopoly’s lobbyist also knew that Goodwin and McCarthy’s unwavering allegiance to his client did not insure victory because: “The danger now lies in a floor amendment to another bill! As long as the Arizona statute Title 36 [public health and safety] is being debated...(and there are 36 bills with that title) we are vulnerable to a surprise amendment from either the Senate or House and we can expect such a move before” the legislature adjourned in early June. To his paymasters Hoffman did not conceal the fact that the real danger was majority rule: “The support for the bill is enough to pass in either House.”302

Unsurprisingly, on June 4 Goodwin’s subcommittee unanimously voted to give a “do not pass” recommendation to the bill, endorsing instead a “voluntary” program of posting nosmoking signs. Dr. Glenn Friedman, a pediatrician, pointed out at the hearing that such a regime would not work because, while it might be voluntary for smokers, it was not for nonsmokers. He was also forced to instruct the chain-smoking subcommittee chairman, who pontificated that everyone had the right to do whatever he wanted with his own body, that nonsmokers lacked the complete control over their own health that smokers possessed. Carnes did not soften these “sharp exchanges” by testifying that: “Smokers have no idea of what they do to nonsmokers. God help them for they know not what they do.”303 As the world would learn later, in the 1970s neither Carnes nor science knew either.

The danger that Hoffman had foreseen emerged on June 10, when the Senate, by a vote of 17 to 7, adopted Turley’s floor amendment to a House bill (on hospital districts) that was almost identical to S.B. 1149. Turley motivated his action on the grounds that, having been “kicked around in the House...he wanted the amendment ‘to send it back to them in a form they will understand.’” Davis, by now virtually the senator from Winston-Salem and purportedly angered by the move, asked Turley why he had not attached a $250,000 appropriation to pay for no-smoking signs in stores. In reaction to Turley’s dismissal of his question as fallacious, Davis, doubtless racking up further bonus points with R. J. Reynolds, upbraided S.B. 1149’s backers for their “outrageous behavior” and slammed his 302Ernest Hoffman to Members Association, Subject: Tobacco Legislation (May 6, 1976), Bates No. 501791683.

Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly microphone on his desk.”

In June, having insured the demise of S.B. 1149, anti-anti-smoking Republicans, including House Majority Leader Barton Barr, joined with the Arizona Retailers Association and the Retail Grocers Association of Arizona to displace legislative intervention altogether by implementing the cigarette companies’ “voluntary program” the basis of which was “simple courtesy.” The retailers’ groups rejected the bill as “an attempt to mandate by law actions that properly fall under the purview of management.... In effect management was to be deprived of its right to manage.” The “businessmen’s response to legislation that is both unnecessary and unenforceable”—the country’s first of its kind statewide voluntary program—was a sign that “says simply, ‘As a courtesy to others, thank you for not smoking.’” By 1977, McCarthy, who as chair of the House Health Committee held a hearing to conclude that the program was working, asserted that: “You can’t legislate courtesy by enacting a no smoking bill” because the “wide resentment” would foster “delight in breaking it,” whereas the “volunteer [sic] program appeals to people’s sense of manners.”

---

308 [No Author], Background Information on Voluntary “No Smoking” Program (n.d. [rec’d June 24, [1976]), Bates No. 501791686. This document stated that it had been agreed at a recent meeting of the two retailers’ organizations, Arizona ASH, and the House of Representatives that “industry would voluntarily undertake a program to discourage smoking in the retail stores in question.” The retailers’ aforementioned press release did not mention ASH involvement.

310 “In Arizona Capital: Lawmakers Balk at Smoking Bans,” Tobacco Observer, Feb. 1977, at 3, Bates No. 1000283344/6. Ironically, McCarthy and Turley agreed that “courtesy” was the key concept; what separated them was Turley’s view that it was “unfortunate we have to legislate matters of courtesy” (because the department stores were not voluntarily posting nosmoking signs). Steven Tragash, “Panel Is Appointed to
Two days after the November 1976 election Hoffman jubilantly wrote to Dowdell that: “It certainly paid off working on the political scene as we did this past summer and fall. We swept many liberal-type politicians out of office and I can see a more conservative approach to State government in the next two years. The liberal movement, without exception, were [sic] the ones sponsoring the anti-tobacco legislation in Arizona.” In fact, no progress was made in the Arizona legislature in restricting public smoking for many years (although numerous local ordinances were adopted). On a letter he had received from Hoffman in 1977 Dowdell handwrote an annotation that summed up the reversal that concerted lobbying had effectuated: “Arizona is where it started. Thanks to Hoffman, bills to further restrict smoking have been defeated in the past two legislative sessions. The battle now is in Tucson, and the ‘opinion poll’ attached is being conducted there by Ernie, who used the same tactics to defeat a Phoenix ordinance last year.” The next year brought another victory for the cigarette oligopoly over Turley’s bill that would have extended coverage to grocery, drug, and department stores and any waiting line in which people were in close contact. Turley admitted that he was “‘not under any illusions it will be easy to pass’”; he thought that he had a “‘fair chance in the Senate,’” but he doubted whether it had “‘much chance in the House where two committee chairmen have killed past attempts to kill the law.’” The bill went nowhere, and Turley stopped introducing anti-smoking bills both because he began focusing on other issues and because other legislators took up the slack. No substantive expansion of coverage occurred.

---

311 Ernest Hoffman to J. S. Dowdell (Nov. 4, 1976), Bates No. 500003827. Hoffman did add: “Now we must proceed further in trying to come up with another campaign for four candidates to replace those under recall for our [Tucson] City Council.”

313 JSD to FHC (Sept. 26, [1977]), on Ernest Hoffman to James Dowdell (Sept. 21, 1977), Bates No. 500000860.

314 S.B. 1110 (Jan. 18, 1978, by Turley). In 1977 a bill was introduced in the House to prohibit smoking in certain areas of state buildings, which had six cosponsors in the House and 12 in the Senate including Turley, but it never made it out of committee (including the Health Committee). Journal of the House of Representatives: Thirty-Third Legislature First Regular Session of the State of Arizona: 1977, at 180, 1293 (Feb. 14) (H.B. 2218 (by Rallif et al.).

until 1991, when the law was applied to state buildings, and not until the passage of Proposition 201 in 2006 did Arizona reemerge in the forefront of statewide anti-public smoking legislation, although by the early 1990s localities with 90 percent of the state’s population had already adopted smoking control ordinances.

Regardless of later legislative stagnation in Arizona, by 1975, success there had prompted enactment of similar measures in at least 20 other states. Although most shared the timidity of the Arizona law—which by this time R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company placed in the second tier of state laws (“Less Severe But Above Average Restrictions”)—in permitting huge exceptions that effectively maintained nonsmokers’ exposure to secondhand smoke, a very few went further in certain respects. For example, Massachusetts banned smoking in supermarkets outright, while Nevada uniquely permitted designation of smoking areas only “where it is possible to confine the smoke to such areas.”

319 James S. Dowdell to D. W. Grout et al. (Nov. 15, 1976), Bates No. 500656975. Dowdell was director of corporate affairs at R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.
320 Dowdell was director of corporate affairs at R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.
322 1975 Nev. Stat. ch. 326, § 3.2(b) at 462. A 1975 Washington State Board of Health regulation did outright ban smoking in several public places such as museums, concert halls, theaters, and indoor sports arenas (in all of which smoking was permitted in physically separate lobbies), hallways and waiting rooms of health care facilities, office reception areas and waiting rooms of government buildings (except the state legislature), public areas of retail stores and financial institutions, classrooms and lecture halls of schools, colleges, and universities, and public meeting rooms (except in the state legislature). Wash. Adm. Code. § 248-152-030(3)-(9) (1975). To be sure, these regulations were not enforceable and had to “depend on the willingness of the general public to abide by its provisions.....” WAC § 248-152-050 (1975).
The Battle over the New York City Ordinance

The Tobacco Institute represents our interests in opposing both state and local attempts to restrict smoking. [T]hey can...even provide expert medical and scientific witnesses to testify convincingly that there is little hazard to non-smokers.323

State legislatures were not the only bodies that intervened to restrict indoor smoke exposure. Inspired, perhaps, by the Model Ordinance Prohibiting Smoking in Public Places drafted by the National Institute of Municipal Law Officers,324 numerous cities and counties, including Arlington and Newton, Massachusetts, Duluth, Minnesota, Fort Lauderdale, St. Petersburg, and Dade County, Florida, and Culver City, Davis, Sacramento, Orange County, and San Diego, California passed nosmoking ordinances between 1973 and 1975.325

The highest profile campaign took place in New York City in 1974, when Dr. Lowell Bellin, the city health commissioner and chairman of the Board of Health, proposed “‘apartheid of smokers,’”326 not “for the comfort of nonsmokers, but for their health.”327 The proposal prohibited smoking—except in smoking areas designated by the owner—in theaters, opera houses, concert halls, restaurants, hospitals, nursing homes, museums, libraries, lecture halls, or any other enclosed spaces in which 25 or more people gathered for social, political, recreational, or religious purposes.” Only elevators were off limits to the designation of smoking areas.328 However, the “most dramatic” impact of the proposed segregation of smokers and nonsmokers in various public places, which Bellin expected to trigger considerable opposition both from outside of and on the Board itself, was 323W. R. Bauer [R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. director of field sales], (untitled speech in Arizona), Bates No. 500074962/72-3 (1976).

324NIMLO Model Ordinance Service, Vol. 1, §§ 8-1901 to 8-1911 (1981). Unfortunately, this compilation failed to state the original date of publication.
327“City May Segregate Smokers in Public,” NYT, Mar. 31, 1974 (1:5, 54:4-6).
328Max Seigel, “City Smoker-Segregation Bill May Be Eased,” NYT, Apr. 19, 1974 (42); Resolution of the Board of Health of the Department of Health of the City of New York (1974), Bates No. HK01142062.
anticipated in restaurants. Nevertheless, Vincent Sardi, the celebrated Broadway restaurateur and nonsmoking president of the Restaurant League of New York, regarded the proposal as a good idea that would not pose a major problem for the industry.329

At the end of 1972, William Kloepfer, Jr., a one-time press secretary to Vice President Richard Nixon and a senior vice president of and, since 1967, in charge since of the Tobacco Institute’s PR330—the sole product of the cigarette manufacturers’ disinformation and lobbying arm—wrote to Charles Wade, a Reynolds senior vice president, about some matters that Kloepfer believed the TI communications committee should discuss after the organization’s powerful executive committee had directed it “to come up with alternatives” to the “high-visibility ad series about smoking and health in tony magazines, on the ground it would kindle new regulatory efforts.” Kloepfer bluntly admitted that “[w]e’re very low on two major counts—scientific credibility, [sic] and the ability to generate news. Conversely, our adversaries are high on both.”331 A year later TI was manifestly seeking to raise both profiles in marshalling considerable resources in an effort to defeat the New York City measure, which was the subject of a public hearing on April 18, to which it dispatched several witnesses, including a physician, a pharmacologist, a chemist, and a lawyer, the burden of whose testimony was the lack of any evidence of the harmful effect of tobacco smoke exposure to nonsmokers.332 Interestingly, the account of the hearing in The New York Times failed to mention them at all.333 Domingo Aviado, a pharmacology professor at the University of Pennsylvania, who made a career of being a highly paid cigarette company consultant,334 revealed his mercenary bias

329“City May Segregate Smokers in Public,” NYT, Mar. 31, 1974 (1:5, 54:4-6).
330Biographical Notes William Kloepfer Jr. Senior Vice President - Public Relations (1973), Bates No.521045014.
331William Kloepfer, Jr. to Charles Wade (Dec. 29, 1972), Bates No. 500081660. This letter is in large part identical with another document, which appears to have been erroneously dated on the Legacy website because of an irrelevant handwritten date on the page. Points for Discussion (May 7, 1973), Bates No. 501470103.
332Tobacco Institute, Before the New York City Board of Health in the Matter of a Proposed Resolution Amending Article 181 of the New York City Health Code (June 1974), Bates No. 03595255.
333Max Seigel, “City Smoker-Segregation Bill May Be Eased,” NYT, Apr. 19, 1974 (42).
334A few months later, after Aviado had testified as the industry’s principal witness before the Health Board in the State of Washington, the TI president praised Aviado for having “done yeoman services for us. While we have every indication that he will by testifying, in an area remote from his expertise and without the slightest empirical evidence, that: “Since tobacco smoking first became a part of our lives, smokers and nonsmokers have co-existed with little, if any, friction, between them.” The industry’s arrogance was visibly on display in the testimony of William Shinn (of Shook, Hardy, and Bacon), one of its leading lawyers and Aviado’s handler, who allowed as: “While...there are those who would prefer to live in a non-smoking world, this prospect appears remote and impractical.”

Following the three-hour hearing, Bellin said that he was prepared to “soften” the measure, in particular with regard to its application to small restaurants, whose “valid economic concerns” prompted him to contemplate compromise: “And although the public health is paramount, we’ll try to see if we can meet both problems.” One possibility was increasing the coverage threshold from 25 to 50 persons. When the Board of Health considered the proposal a month later, it in fact unanimously approved in principle a provision merely requiring restaurants with 51 or more seats to set aside at least 20 percent of them for nonsmokers; at the same time it endorsed an absolute prohibition on smoking in supermarkets. In June the Board ultimately rejected segregated seating in restaurants altogether, but otherwise amended the Health Code largely in accordance with the previous version of the proposed resolution. Outvoted by the Board, Bellin conceded that “enforcement might be a problem,” but he hoped to “create a climate in which the smoker is uneasy” and to be able to rely on the public for help.
The Cigarette Manufacturers Are Made to See “the handwriting...on the wall”\(^\text{340}\) —and Try to Erase It

No product has ever been so thoroughly assaulted from so many respected sources as has ours. Popular indoctrination against it is widespread and steadily reinforced.

... Our credibility is weak because our motive is assumed to be personal profit.\(^\text{341}\)

From the early 1950s on the cigarette oligopolists had been preparing themselves for public disclosure of the fact that, as “Philip Morris and everyone else in the industry knew...cigarette smoke did contain cancer causing elements.”\(^\text{342}\) The manufacturers had even put forward the names of two of the ten members of the Surgeon General’s Advisory Committee on Smoking and Health\(^\text{343}\) which in 1964 published the report that produced the upheaval whose repercussions still reverberate in the twenty-first century. In sharp contrast, however, the companies were not only taken by surprise by the inexorably spreading nationwide rebellion against enforced exposure to their customers’ tobacco smoke, but even after top management had finally been persuaded by their somewhat more socially attuned subordinates and the Tobacco Institute to grasp and acknowledge the movement’s current and potential gravity, years passed before the industry was able to formulate and implement a coherent counter-strategy, albeit one that ultimately failed to thwart what became a worldwide science-based mass struggle against tobacco’s lethality. The following sections shed light on the initial stages of that evolving response.

R. J. Reynolds’ “Restrictive Smoking Activities Project”

Organized anti-tobacco forces in our country have begun a new national campaign to restrict smoking and cause a decrease in U.S. tobacco consumption. The objective of the new crusade is to convince the public that tobacco smoke is harmful to nonsmokers and,
Among the cigarette manufacturing firms R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company was especially aggressive in pushing early on for the industry to combat the anti-secondhand smoking movement. At the time and for many years Reynolds had held the largest domestic market share, which was not seized by Philip Morris until 1983.\textsuperscript{345} During the period under review (1970-82), the six largest producers accounted for 100 percent of sales, with Reynolds accounting for about one-third throughout and Philip Morris doubling its share from about one-sixth to one-third.\textsuperscript{346} During the summer of 1973, several of Reynolds’ marketing officials, having become especially concerned about the proliferation and success of anti-smoking initiatives, developed a plan to alert the company’s top executives to what they viewed as an alarming process and galvanize them and, through the Tobacco Institute, the other cigarette manufacturers, to intervene and roll that movement back. To be sure, higher management was not totally clueless, although it is unclear whether even these executives grasped the potential seriousness of the trend. For example, in mid-August, Charles B. Wade, Jr., Reynolds’ senior vice president, third highest ranking official, and “the house intellectual,”\textsuperscript{347} having seen many letters to the editor recently on “[p]assive smoking” in the \textit{Washington Post}, suggested to TI Vice President William \textsuperscript{344}R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. to Our Customers (Jan. 30, 1974), Bates No. 500016597.

\textsuperscript{345}On how Reynolds staved off losing its first-place position to Philip Morris for several years by means of “trade-loading,” which bulked up its apparent market share, but in fact merely simulated net sales, some of which constituted gross revenues that would be diminished by buy-backs of wholesalers’ unsold inventory, see Richard Kluger, \textit{Ashes to Ashes} 515 (1996).

\textsuperscript{346}In 1970 the oligopolists sold the following percentages of all cigarettes in the United States: Reynolds (31.8); American (19.3); Brown & Williamson (16.9); Philip Morris (16.8); Lorillard (8.7); Liggett (6.5); in 1982 the figures were: Reynolds (33.55); Philip Morris (32.85); Brown & Williamson (13.37); American (8.77); Lorillard (8.55); Liggett (3.17). In 1983 Philip Morris finally overtook Reynolds: their shares were 34.4 and 31.5, respectively. Irwin Kellner, “The American Cigarette Industry: A Re-examination” tab. XVII at 90 (Ph.D. diss., New School for Social Research, 1973), Bates No. 00137423/528; R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Monthly Performance Analysis—Dec. 1982 (Feb. 11, 1983), Bates No. 501261717/22; Overview of U.S. Cigarette Market (Mar. 1984), Bates No. 2500002253/8. By the first decade of the twenty-first century, the industry trended toward duopoly with Philip Morris far outdistancing Reynolds, even after the latter’s acquisition of American and Brown & Williamson.

\textsuperscript{347}Richard Kluger, \textit{Ashes to Ashes} 384 (1996).
Kloepfer: “Wouldn’t it be a good idea for us to flood the letters to the editor to such an extent that the paper would tire of the matter and stop publishing on either side! That is the only way I can think of to give less exposure to our adversaries.”

A key figure in the early counter-movement at Reynolds was Clifford Perry, Jr., of the marketing research department, who by August 1973 was working on the Restrictive Smoking Activities Project (MRD # 73-0221). On August 15, he and R. A. Blevins, the director of marketing planning, and James Dowdell, the company’s PR head, visited the Tobacco Institute with the “purpose” of emphasizing the company’s “concern over recent activities to restrict cigarette smoking” as well as of using information compiled by TI to: fashion a chronological history of such activities since the (1964) surgeon general’s report; determine how their nature and frequency had changed; determine the reasons that anti-smokers had used to affect restrictions in various situations and how these activities were initiated; and (the literal bottom line) “determine whether or not such restrictive activities have adversely effected sales or the social acceptance of smoking.” The urgent motivation for their pilgrimage to a repository of source materials was the feeling that “restrictions proposed by anti-smoking forces as a result of the ‘passive smoking’ issue could represent the most serious health threat to the cigarette industry since the 1964 Surgeon General’s Report.” The new attack’s obviously heightened significance was that “both smokers and non-smokers are now directly involved....” Moreover, a review of the Institute’s files reinforced the Reynolds employees’ concerns based on the considerable headstart that their opponents had achieved: whereas anti-smoking groups had been able to secure “extensive” publicity for this issue in the form of editorials, letters, and feature articles in almost every state in support of their position and (more importantly) to propose and “in numerous cases” to enact restrictions for “almost every type of public place,” “arguments supporting the tobacco industry’s position have appeared infrequently and are usually deemed ‘self-serving.’”

While Perry and his cohorts were launching their project, Reynolds and the

\[^{348}\text{Chas. B. Wade, Jr. to William Kloepfer (Aug. 17, 1973), Bates No. 500013908.}\]

\[^{349}\text{Clifford W. Perry, Jr. to R. A. Blevins, Re: Trip Report -- Tobacco Institute (Cigarette Smoking Restrictions) (MRD # 73-0221) (Aug. 20, 1973), Bates No. 501098314.}\]

\[^{350}\text{Clifford W. Perry, Jr. to R. A. Blevins, Jr., Re: Trip Report -- Tobacco Institute (Cigarette Smoking Restrictions) (MRD # 73-0221) (Aug. 27, 1973), Bates No. 501098310. It is unclear why this second report with somewhat different contents was written a week later.}\]
Tobacco Institute were expressing increasing perplexity and dismay about the “real set of problems” posed by smoking restrictions established by local governments, whose agendas were “[u]sually...buried in the press,” thus giving the cigarette companies little time to intervene if they even found out about the proposals. Dowdell and Frank Welch, TI vice president for state activities, had agreed in August that distributors and company sales representatives might be “two logical sources of information,” but Welch doubted the former’s dependability. However, if Reynolds encouraged its sales people to provide “reasonably full coverage,” the Institute would “try to get the other companies to do likewise.”

(In early November Reynolds did inform its field sales representatives of the “obnoxious and unwarranted smoking ban ordinances” that anti-smoking organizations, supported by local chapters of anti-tobacco private health associations, were seeking to enact, and solicited their help in ferreting out advance information in newspapers and newscasts of city councils’ consideration of such measures.)

Although Dowdell believed that the industry should inform local governments (such as Hollywood, Florida) that had passed restrictive ordinances that they were “predicated upon an absolutely false assumption” and that they should be modified to protect smokers’ and non-smokers’ rights, he despaired that “I haven’t any good ideas how at this late date the industry can mount an effective campaign to prevent the spread of smoking restrictions at the local level.” Referring to a strategy that the industry (and especially Philip Morris) in the 1970s and 1980s would successfully implement far beyond his imagination, Dowdell lamented that: “There is no way I can see to mobilize support for preemptive action by any of the State Legislative bodies. ... It doesn’t help much to defeat the issue at the state level only to find local ordinances being enacted that accomplish the same objective.” In the absence of such state-level action barring local governments from restricting smoking in public places, Dowdell saw “no alternative except to establish some form of organization that would provide the Institute with advance information on actions proposed across the nation at the local government level to discriminate against smokers. If such an early warning system could be established, and if it worked properly, the industry could have a representative present when smoking restriction laws were proposed to present the other side of the issue” (though in the case of Hollywood, even Dowdell was constrained to admit that it “could be difficult to get a sympathetic hearing” from Unmentioned in this context was the logistically far more significant fact that even if the companies were able to secure the requisite information in a timely fashion, even their oligopoly- and addiction-swollen profits were inadequate to counter the growing “agitation for ‘non-smokers rights’...by the anti-tobacco zealots and the environmentalists”\textsuperscript{354} in tens of thousands of local communities with the same effectiveness that they had traditionally deployed lobbying resources especially at the federal level and, at least with regard to tobacco taxes, also in the state legislatures (though, as passage of the Arizona anti-public smoking bill in 1973 demonstrated, the industry’s defensive lobbying on health-related legislation in the states as yet lacked potency).\textsuperscript{355}

In mid-October Perry explained to J. H. Sherrill, Jr. of the marketing research department that the smoking bans project had three phases or objectives. First, it was necessary to “\textit{convince management} that statutory smoking restrictions “can have a damaging effect on the cigarette industry” by means of a presentation (which Perry had drafted) of the history and variety of such laws and their potential effect on sales. Second, a program would have to be designed to combat these activities in 1974 in a couple of key test states. Since such a step would require management approval, nothing would be undertaken until after the first phase. And third, Reynolds and other companies would “curtail these restrictive activities throughout the country by means of an effort similar to the state tax program.”\textsuperscript{356} A few days later Perry specified to Blevins that in November the aforementioned presentation would be made to management, and that the key states might be California and Illinois.\textsuperscript{357}
Then on November 16, the same Reynolds trio that had visited the Tobacco Institute in August, returned to make a “Restrictive Smoking Activities” presentation (which had been reviewed by Reynolds management) to Kornegay and his vice presidents. Afterwards the Reynolds and TI staff discussed a program to combat such legislation, whose most important aspect was securing “a lobbyist or spokesman to act for the tobacco industry in each state.” Importantly, the Tobacco Institute was to determine the number of personnel and the resources needed for implementation (including the creation of a state-level “information feedback system”) and to present these requirements to its executive committee at the end of the month.\(^{358}\) The RJR presentation, which emphasized the threat to the “[s]ocial acceptability of tobacco products,” included, in addition to data on the growing number of anti-smoking bills in state legislatures and city councils as well as in 522 hospitals and 12 passenger railroads, model calculations on lost profits: based on the number of packs of cigarettes not smoked as a result of the ban ordered by the Washington, D.C., Transit Authority, which purportedly cost the industry $13,500 and Reynolds $4,500 a year, the company made a national projection of lost profits from bans on city transit and in movie theaters and basketball and hockey coliseums of $3,575,000, of which $1,295,000 went to Reynolds’ account. Just one fewer cigarette smoked per week would result in a total industry loss of $8.2 million with Reynolds’ share amounting to $3.0 million.\(^{359}\)

Kornegay and his staff were, according to Dowdell’s report to Wade, “so deeply impressed” by Blevins and Perry’s work that Kornegay intended to adopt their presentation for his own to the TI executive committee. The Tobacco Institute’s involvement had, according to Kornegay and his vice president Kloepfer, until that time been “minimal because of the objections” of some executive committee members, “specifically,” those of Edwin Finch, the chairman \(^{358}\) Clifford Perry, Jr. to F. H. Christopher, Jr., Re: Trip Report—“Restrictive Smoking Activities” Presentation to Tobacco Institute (MRD# 73-0221) (Nov. 28, 1973), Bates No. 50001032.

\(^{359}\) R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., “Restrictive Smoking Activities” (1973), Bates No. 501343552-67. For somewhat lengthier versions, see [Untitled] [(erroneously dated May 1973)], Bates No. 500450625; [Untitled] (Jan. 1, 1974), Bates No. 500001034. Interestingly, some months later Perry admitted to one of the higher-ups at Reynolds that “[i]t is not possible at this time to determine the effect these [restrictive smoking] measures may have had on cigarette sales.” C. W. Perry, Jr. to F. H. Christopher, Jr., Re: Restrictive Smoking Legislation (MRD# 73-0221) (Apr. 3, 1974).
and CEO of Brown & Williams. After the TI staff had pointed out the increase in the volume of anti-smoking measures submitted to state and local legislative bodies at the executive committee meeting on November 29, Kornegay stated that the Institute planned to recommend an increase in funding for state activities to the budget committee.

By the time the anti-smoking forces achieved their “major breakthrough” in Arizona, some managers at the individual cigarette companies and TI officials began to realize that the industry was facing an unprecedented threat to the acceptability, sales, and profits of cigarettes, of the existence and exigency of which they had to convince the highest corporate executives. One such lower-level advocate actually styled his letter to William S. Smith, chairman of the board of R. J. Reynolds Tobacco and of TI’s board of directors—the same letter was sent to Smith’s counterparts at the other cigarette manufacturers—“a plea for help.” John D. Kelly, the executive director of the California Association of Tobacco and Candy Distributors and the state tobacco lobbyist (and later a TI vice president), wrote to Smith in May 1974 about the “very serious problem...all over the nation” of the “rapid proliferation” of state and local laws prohibiting smoking in various public and privately owned places: “In my judgment, if we don’t do something and very quickly, these laws will have an impact on our industry that will be at least as serious and detrimental as high cigarette tax rates.”

The strategic impediment lay in the fact that the industry’s traditional lobbying tools had lost their effectiveness in combating “‘non-smokers’ rights’ bills” and were “not persuasive to most legislative bodies,” seemingly “because ‘everybody knows something is harmful’ or ‘non-smokers have the right not to breath [sic] air polluted by tobacco smokers.’” Ten years after the surgeon general’s consensus report on smoking, “we know these things are not true,” but unfortunately “the general public does not.” Far more troubling (because suggestive that the end-game was in sight) was the perception, according to a survey, “that even smokers are beginning to feel guilty about their smoking practices.” To Kelly it was “obvious...that if smokers find themselves in 360 J. S. Dowdell to C. B. Wade, Jr. (Nov. 23, 1973), Bates No. 500011034. The proposed program to identify political allies at the state and local levels would be based on recommendations made by Martin Haley, which are discussed below.

361 Tobacco Institute, Minutes of the Fifty-First Meeting of the Executive Committee at 2-3 (Nov. 29, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0006763/4-5.

362 [Anonymous], Presentation on Smoking Restrictions for Executives/Employees of Manufacturers at 8 (1974), Bates No. 501800385/94.

363 None of the letters to the others whom Kelly cc’d appears to have been included in the Legacy documents.
restaurants, public meeting rooms, theaters, etc., where they used to be able to smoke but cannot now, they probably are going to smoke less. Equally important, smokers are going to be constantly reminded and made to feel self-conscious by ‘no-smoking’ signs in these various places. I am convinced that this is the exact goal the various anti-smoking groups are seeking.” In stressing that “the industry is losing this battle and losing it rapidly,” and expressing the hope that manufacturers, “perhaps through the Tobacco Institute,” solve the problem by “creat[ing] the image with which we can counter this trend,” Kelly was careful to point out that he was “not talking about lobbying in the usual sense,” but “the reaction of the general public to our industry.” Although no reply letter has been found among the millions of documents that the cigarette companies were later forced to disgorge in litigation, the cigarette oligopoly did soon develop and implement a well-funded nationwide counterattack.

On May 19, 1973, in the wake of the passage of the Arizona law, Horace Kornegay, a lawyer and North Carolina congressman in the 1960s who was TI president from 1970 to 1981, addressed the question of the political, social, and economic consequences of antagonizing non-smokers in wide-ranging remarks at its spring meeting at yet another posh luxury resort, The Homestead, in Hot Springs, Virginia. Reflecting the startling rapidity with which anti-smokers had begun to organize, but also, no doubt, in part in an attempt to ward off potential criticism of his own inattentiveness by his bosses, Kornegay reported that his notes for his talk a year earlier had contained no warning of what had turned into the industry’s “number one problem,” which demanded the executives’ “very serious attention.” What he was willing to fault himself (and others) for was having overlooked “the strategic advantage that the passive smoking question provided for the antismoking zealots.” What their antagonists had “going for them” was, on the one hand, the “very logical, visible, direct form of air pollution,” which at the time was galvanizing the country, and, on the other, the “logic...that in conventional wisdom tobacco smoke is harmful to smokers, and therefore how can it be safe for those who inhale it involuntarily?” However, even more powerful and crucial a factor paralyzing the cigarette companies’ ability to fight back and undermine their new opponents’ attack was the 364Jack Kelly to W. S. Smith (May 8, 1974), Bates No. 500799725/6.

365The assistant to the board chairman of American Brands, the successor to the American Tobacco Company, did reply in Robert Heimann’s absence, “recogniz[ing] the potential seriousness of this problem,” and stating that he was circulating Kelly’s letter to executives. Richard Stinnette to John Kelly (May 20, 1974), Bates No. 946219020.
undisputed fact that “many find tobacco smoke in a subjective sense a profound irritation.” But it was precisely this subjectivity that made it impossible for the tobacco industry to hire scientists and physicians who could assert, as they had done with regard to studies of smoking’s impact on smokers, that they had identified statistical deficiencies or evidentiary gaps. Moreover, Kornegay himself acknowledged that not even all smokers disagreed with non-smokers.367

Though unwilling to admit that “the roof has fallen in,” Kornegay suggested that “the size of the termites in the beams” could be judged by the increasingly favorable press accounts of “the nonsmoker subject,” culminating in the appearance of 50 “bad” editorials and no “good” ones in the latter half of 1972. Worse was the introduction in 1973 of 36 bills in 20 states restricting or prohibiting public smoking both because fewer smoking-permitted places would translate into fewer cigarettes smoked and because “the more the smoker is made to feel that he is socially unacceptable, the more he may consider improving his social standing by ceasing to use tobacco.” In this context the just enacted Arizona law declaring smoking to be a public nuisance and a danger to public health might, Kornegay told his cigarette company bosses, be “relatively modest,” but “its reverberations will show 49 other legislatures that it can be done, and the only question is how many in which it will be done.” Especially worrisome was that the industry’s “traditional—and until now highly successful—responses to proposed punitive legislation are not sufficient.” As an example he mentioned that a California legislative committee chairman had said to a “tobacconist, ‘Show me one bit of evidence that the tobacco industry has yielded the slightest recognition that nonsmokers have a problem!’”368

Kornegay understood that the Tobacco Institute’s and the cigarette manufacturers’ previous lobbying methods were not up to the task of dealing with legislation being urged by a new coalition of populists, scientists, and private and governmental public health advocates, but his proposed “positive ‘handles’ to modify public reaction and oppose restrictive legislation” were not only hardly calculated to “defuse some of the initiatives we are seeing in the nonsmoker problem,” but, by focusing on “the annoyance factor,” were doomed to failure once further research revealed that exposure to tobacco smoke subjected nonsmokers to the same range of diseases as smokers. The four conclusions that the Tobacco Institute’s brainstorming came up with included the necessity of: (1) “making every effort possible within our traditional areas of operation to thwart enactment of unwarranted legislation.” Although Kornegay had just pronounced this approach inadequate, he seemed to believe that its potency would be magnified by “careful use of our new statement...on the origin and substance of the nonsmoker issue as it relates to the health aspect.” How the statement, a diatribe against (by then) former Surgeon General Steinfeld and the “doctored case of hazard to nonsmokers from tobacco smoke,” which gave short shrift even to “circumstances in which smoke can irritate any person,” would extricate the companies from their predicament Kornegay did not explain; (2) “mount[ing] a public campaign regarding smoking courtesy—a direct bid...for some understanding and recognition among those to whom smoking supposedly is personally offensive.” Although the word “supposedly” suggested that the Tobacco Institute did not even accept the sincerity of the expression of subjective perception and Kornegay admitted that the strategy was a “difficult platform,” he was confident that the campaign, in which smoking would be merely one of “many kinds of social courtesy,” would “reflect credit upon our industry”; (3) considering “endorsement of reasonable voluntary efforts to help assure the comfort of both smokers and nonsmokers and their respect for each other.” Speaking “quite bluntly,” Kornegay boldly asked his paymasters whether they did not “have a great deal more to gain than lose by complimenting [sic] such efforts when they may forestall or supplant government regulations?”; and (4) confronting the “mounting involvement of cigarette smoke as a form of air pollution” and fighting back against other industries that were “now in a position to throw the burden of environmental pollution control off their backs and onto ours.”

368 Remarks of Horace Kornegay [at Tobacco Institute Spring Meeting] at 3-5 (May 19, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0252920/2-4.

This proposal appears to have been the origin of the cigarette companies’ on-again-off-again “accommodation” strategy, which they deployed selectively into the 1990s. Neither then nor later were they ever able to explain how this verbal PR ploy could ever achieve its alleged objective, which, even by the then underdeveloped understanding of exposure, would have required precisely the types of pariah-like segregation of smokers that would have been unacceptable

---

369 Remarks of Horace Kornegay [at Tobacco Institute Spring Meeting] at 6 (May 19, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0252920/5.
371 Remarks of Horace Kornegay [at Tobacco Institute Spring Meeting] at 6-7 (May 19, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0252920/5-6.
373 See below chs. 27.
to the industry because it would, despite Kornegay’s assertion that they did not imply second-class citizenship, have taken smokers out of the socio-cultural mainstream. Thus instead of facilitating “mutually greater comfort of both smokers and nonsmokers in their social encounters” and enhancing the industry’s “credibility” by reducing some of its critics’ “antagonisms” and playing a “constructive role,” so-called accommodation would, even if implemented in the most superficial manner, merely have created the precedent for further denormalization of smoking and, based on nonsmokers’ ever so minor relief, laid the groundwork for additional calls for further-reaching separation—in other words, precisely the scenario that did play itself out and that prompted the cigarette companies to adopt an ambivalent attitude toward their own creation, which at times seemed like their only plausible strategy, and to vacillate between it and a hard-line no-concessions approach.

Philip Morris Pays a Professor to Dismiss the Dangers of Passive Smoking

Even before the Tobacco Institute had had a chance to formalize its conclusions, Helmut Wakeham, Philip Morris’s vice president for research and development and chief scientist, intervened with a terminological correction, by means of which he hoped to undermine attacks on his employer and other producers of cigarettes for injuring nonsmokers’ health. On July 3, 1973, Wakeham, who had a doctorate in chemistry from the University of California at Berkeley, wrote to Kornegay (but also to others, including Ernest Wynder, a giant of early research linking smoking to lung cancer who then later had a decades-long unacknowledged financial relationship with Philip Morris) proposing that “we avoid the use of the term passive smoking in reference to smoke exposure in enclosed spaces. We should more simply refer to ‘Effects of 374 Remarks of Horace Kornegay [at Tobacco Institute Spring Meeting] at 8 (May 19, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0252920/7.

---

376 Helmut Wakeham to Ernest Wynder (July 3, 1973), Bates No. 000259806 (“Dear Ernie”).

Tobacco Smoke on Nonsmokers.” Wakeham claimed as the basis for his coinage a “real serious error” in using “passive smoking”—namely, that the phenomenon in question was neither passive nor smoking. He asserted that the term was contradictory because “smoking applies to a deliberate act..., whereas the term passive implies being subjected to an external act....” Instead of explaining why being compelled to inhale tobacco smoke did not qualify as “smoking,” Wakeham objected to the term because it implied exposure similar to that experienced by smokers, whereas in fact “the smoker gets mainstream smoke...which differs substantially in chemical composition from sidestream smoke generated between puffs and dispersed in the surrounding atmosphere.”

(A month earlier, when his corporate colleague James Bowling had charged before the Burley Tobacco Warehouse Association in Louisville that “‘passive smoking’...is not a scientific term. It is the language of people with a social cause,” that city’s Courier-Journal editorially dismissed his objections to nonsmoker protective legislation as “‘simply too self serving to weigh heavily in any serious debate on this issue.’”) What Wakeham conveniently neglected to mention was the fact, well known since the 1960s, that sidestream smoke contained many compounds (including such carcinogens as aromatic polycyclic hydrocarbons) in much higher concentrations than did mainstream smoke. Wakeham may have failed to persuade Wynder or scientists in general to adopt his ideologically driven and deformed terminology—two years later Wynder co-authored an important article that persisted in using the anathematized term—but Kornegay welcomed the verbal fix with open arms. He also added his “feeling,” for which he admitted he lacked evidentiary proof, “that the anti-smoking groups have intentionally and perversively [sic] employed the term ‘passive smoking’ in an effort to create confusion and misunderstanding.”

To be sure, though useful, attaining hegemony over the vocabulary of the struggle over cigarettes’ undermining of nonsmokers’s health was not Wakeham’s only contribution to Philip Morris’s efforts to undermine its opponents’ burgeoning scientific research: more important at this point was his crucial role in securing money to organize a pseudo-scientific conference designed to whitewash secondhand smoke exposure. The workshop was proposed by a Swedish professor, Dr. Ragnar Rylander, who as a researcher in environmental medicine at the University of Geneva was in fact for years a secret consultant-employee of Philip Morris fraudulently pretending to be an independent scientist. On July 11 Wakeham informed Philip Morris’s general counsel, Alexander Holtzman, of the workshop, “which would put into proper light the alleged hazards to which nonsmokers are exposed in various situations involving smokers.” Wakeham strongly urged Philip Morris and the other manufacturers to finance the conference (which was to take place in the hardship location of Bermuda) to the tune of $30,000. He touted the conference, which Kornegay was “all for,” as “invaluable in putting some sense into the legislative drive to restrict smoking in public places, and the sooner the better.” Turning legislative analyst, Wakeham closed with the admonition: “Time is important! It is easier to prevent laws than to repeal them!”

Wakeham and Kornegay, however, had not reckoned with rejection by the Tobacco Institute’s Committee of Counsel, which on July 17, agreed with the (know-nothing) position taken by David Hardy, the industry’s leading trial defense lawyer, “that there were sufficient publications to support the industry position that smoking is harmless to nonsmokers. He argued that there was no need for additional support, so why should the industry run the risk of sponsoring a workshop which might find that there is a hazard to the nonsmoker.” Unwilling to acquiesce in abandonment of the project and being aware of those who disagreed with Hardy, Wakeham advised Rylander that when the latter came to New York on August 29, they would try to convince the lawyer of the workshop’s benefits. The details of the resolution of the dispute are unclear, but ultimately Philip Morris approved the financial support, which was also “cleared by the legal group.” By February 1974, a month before the workshop was scheduled to take place, Wakeham confided to the technical director of Imperial Tobacco Limited that Philip Morris hoped that it would “provide us with a document we can use to quiet some of the hysteria on the subject. Our main concern is the legislation restricting smokers now being passed in some of the local governments in the U.S.A.”

Once the workshop had taken place, Rylander informed Wakeham that he had already discussed publication of the manuscripts with the Philip Morris general counsel and Don Hoel, a lawyer from Hardy’s firm, and would engage in further discussion with them and Wakeham in the United States. Philip Morris’s puppeteering reached its high point when Wakeham informed Hoel, Holtzman, and Rylander that one of the company’s own research center employees, acting as what Wakeham himself called a “ghost writer,” had drafted a summary of the workshop for publication “over the name of Ragnar Rylander” in the “Meetings” section of the prestigious Science. Wakeham, incredibly, characterized the summary as representing “a very nice compromise between the opposing points of view on the topic” and hoped that Rylander would “find it acceptable without substantial modifications.” At the conclusion of the exoneration of 386“The primary purpose” of the Committee of Counsel, which was composed of the general counsel of the cigarette companies that financed the Tobacco Institute, was, in the words of one of them, to “circle the wagons.” United States v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 449 F. Supp. 1, 77, 78 (D.D.C. 2006).

387H. Wakeham to C. H. Goldsmith (July 20, 1973), Bates No. 1004863279.
389H. Wakeham to Max Hauserman (Sept. 12, 1973), Bates No. 1000257859
390H. Wakeham to Herbert Bentley (Feb. 26, 1974), Bates No. 1004864214/5.
391Ragnar Rylander to H. Wakeham (May 16, 1974), Bates No. 10000259703.
392H Wakeham to Don Hoel, Alex Holtzman and HW to Ragnar (Aug. 16, 1974), environmental tobacco smoke (apart from irritation of some people “for reason(s) not yet clear”) Philip Morris had inserted this transparently self-regarding laissez-faire policy judgment, which was the pay-off for the company’s having shelled out $30,000: “Within such a scientific vacuum one may legitimately question the wisdom of taking such drastic steps as the arbitrary banning or segregation of smokers in public places. Until more reliable information becomes available, the best course of action is to urge smokers to exercise appropriate courtesies and to inform them of the irritating nature smoke can have in certain circumstances for some persons.”

Being saddled with this piece of corporate pandering was too much even for Rylander, who, after having deleted it from the draft that he and two participants (who had presumably not been informed of Philip Morris’ role) had prepared and that he had amalgamated with Philip Morris’s, and after having been asked by Raymond Fagan, the company’s principal scientist, to add it, replied on October 3 that although he “sympathize[d]” with the policy statement and “opinions concerning public health administrative matters” and understood the company’s “desire especially from the lawyers’ view included [sic] in the Science article,” he regarded its inclusion as “extremely unfortunate” (for the pragmatic reason) that it “would with certainty evoke reactions from at least one, probably several participants in the workshop. They would probably by some kind of publicity try to disconnect themselves from this view and state differently. This would...mean that the whole concept behind the workshop would be endangered and the document would not represent something that was more or less completely agreed upon by individual participants.”

The apparent lack of further correspondence and the fact that in the end Science refused to publish the summary leave it unclear as to how exactly this dispute was resolved, but Philip Morris was nevertheless presumably satisfied that it had gotten what it paid for in the form of Rylander’s acquittal of secondhand smoke in his summary of the meeting (“Workshop Results”) that

Bates No. 1000260215.

393Ragnar Rylander, “Environmental Tobacco Smoke and the Non-Smoker” at 7 (n.d. [Aug. 16, 1974]), Bates No. 10000260216/22 (the estimated date of Mar. 27, 1974 on the Legacy website document is presumably mistaken since it marked the first day of the workshop).

395Raymond Fagan to Ragnar Rylander (Sept. 12, 1974), Bates No. 1004863736.

2235
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

appeared with the individual contributions in a supplement to the Scandinavian Journal of Respiratory Diseases\(^{398}\) (as well as in book form published by the University of Geneva): “[A] personal conclusion is that the risk for the development of chronic pulmonary effects due to environmental tobacco smoke exposure is non-existent among the population in general.”\(^{399}\) Indeed, Wakeham may have felt that his employer (and the rest of the industry as a free rider) had gotten its money’s worth when three years later he was able to quote this very sentence to an editorialist for the Los Angeles Times.\(^{400}\) In to the bargain Philip Morris got Rylander’s belittlement of “[a]nnoyance reactions” as self-fulfilling prophecies of ideologically biased minds: “Some people may believe that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke affects their health. In addition to dislike of the odor such beliefs may be an additional source of annoyance. These reactions are influenced by underlying attitudes, socio-economic conditions and other factors.... It is possible that such psychological influences might, in certain cases, contribute to the development of acute upper respiratory symptoms; of asthmatic origin, for example, where psychosomatic factors are known to contribute.”\(^{401}\) Even earlier Rylander’s report received some legitimacy in a setting of supreme importance to Philip Morris: in 1975, in response to a request by a Wisconsin state legislator who was advocating a House Joint Resolution to study the effects of tobacco in confined spaces for information on the effect of tobacco smoke on nonsmokers, the Wisconsin Legislative Council prepared a memorandum, which included a section summarizing three reports of panels of experts. The memo devoted more space to the conclusions of the Rylander colloquium (which was the most recent of them) than to the 1972 surgeon general’s report. To be sure, the staff member who wrote the memo was thorough \(^{400}\)Helmut Wakeham to Ernest Conine (Aug. 8, 1977), Bates No. 1000217977. In opposition to passage of the Washington Clean Indoor Air Act of 1985, Rylander was one of the “impartial experts” quoted by the Tobacco Institute in support of its claim that there was no persuasive scientific evidence that environmental tobacco smoke was a health hazard to nonsmokers. Tobacco Institute, “Analysis: Washington State Senate Bill No. 3039” at 3 (Feb. 1985), Bates No. TNWL0043571/5.

Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly enough to have noted that the conference had been supported by a grant from Fabriques de Tabac Réunies and that one participant had been a former consultant to the Council for Tobacco Research who had “recently published an article challenging the contention that cigarette smoke has been proven to cause serious diseases in the smokers themselves,” but the staffer nevertheless not only did not dismiss the Rylander publication, but melded its information in his conclusion that “tobacco smoke at levels commonly encountered in public places is distressing and physically irritating to some people.”402 Two weeks later Philip Morris and cigarette manufacturers generally got even more mileage out of the Rylander escapade when the lobbyist for the Minnesota Restaurant Association submitted the Wisconsin memo as an exhibit at a hearing on the proposed regulations to implement the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act. 403 Yet another bonus for Philip Morris was a laissez-faire policy recommendation—that two of Rylander’s Bermuda workshop cohorts (including Morton Corn, who two years later would become the administrator of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration) joined him in supporting—that “smokers be made aware of...pockets of high concentrations [of tobacco smoke] and that some people are unduly sensitive. Their smoking should then be adjusted accordingly.”404

Ramping Up the Tobacco Institute’s State Legislative Lobbying

We are meeting here today shortly after the tenth anniversary of the opening of official hostilities between our industry and the Federal Government. On January 11, 1964 the United States Public Health Service became the official spear carrier for an assortment of individuals and interests who wanted then—as they want now—to make the world safe from cigarette smoking. ...

402 Wisconsin Legislative Council Staff Memorandum, Ed Applebaum to Representative Edward Jackamonis, “The Effects of Tobacco Smoke on Nonsmokers” at 6, 7 (Nov. 17, 1975), Bates No. 500040600/5/6. The participant was Dr. Domingo Aviado, whose publications “illustrated a common tobacco industry technique to bootstrap its consultants’ work into scientific authority that is used to influence legislation and smoking policy.” His papers at tobacco company-sponsored symposia “were then cited in congressional testimony and other forums without featuring the fact that the symposium...was industry funded.” Stanton Glantz et al., The Cigarette Papers 310 (1996).

403 Exhibit 24, Health Department, MSA, MHS, 112.H.18.3(B).

At the executive committee meeting in November, we...warned that the movement [to prohibit smoking in public places] could lead to the virtual elimination of cigarette smoking.footnote{405}

The immediate consequence of Kornegay’s initiative of May 19, 1973, appears to have been the downgrading by TI’s executive committee of his “proposed ‘policy’ statement” to a “‘guideline’ statement,” which the Tobacco Institute would not issue or use as a document or release as a statement, but which was “designed to give structure to the industry’s position and to create a context in which the problem can be responded to and otherwise discussed.”footnote{406} So minimalist was this proposal that Kornegay hastened to explain to the cigarette companies’ top executives that the staff did not even intend to use the guidelines publicly per se, but merely to “treat them in proper context as part of our effort to discourage governmental efforts to prohibit smoking in various places.” Nevertheless, he needed his bosses’ approval before TI could make any use of them. The four guidelines encompassed the assertions that: (1) many “adults enjoy tobacco products”; (2) no “[v]alid scientific evidence” supported the claim that tobacco smoke harmed nonsmokers (just as science had not found that smoking harmed smokers); (3) “[f]or the comfort of smokers and nonsmokers...it is practical, sensible and traditional to provide areas in public facilities for those who wish to smoke and those who do not. In small, crowded, poorly ventilated places, smoking is inappropriate”; and (4) “[v]oluntary efforts and exercise of personal regard and consideration will assure the comfort of smokers and nonsmokers. Laws and governmental regulations, which are both intrusive on personal rights and impractical, if not impossible to enforce, are neither required nor justified.”footnote{407} The first two points represented no concession of any sort—David Hardy having suggested that his clients “not...concede anything on” the claim that smoking harmed smokersfootnote{408}—whereas the third sought to suggest (counterfactually) that public no-smoking areas were not an innovation. The final footnote{405}H[orace]R[.]K[ornegay], Statement at Annual Meeting of Tobacco Institute at 1, 3 (Jan. 31, 1974), Bates No. TIMN0136556/8.

footnote{406}Arthur Stevens to P. R. Tisch and C. H. Judge, Tobacco Institute -- Executive Committee Meeting -- July 26, 1973 (July 27, 1973), Bates No. 03769103 (Lorillard general counsel’s memorandum to company’s top executives).

footnote{407}Horace Kornegay to William S. Smith (July 30, 1973), Bates No. 501470082. For a draft of the guidelines, see [untitled] (July 17, 1973), Bates No. 680239461.

footnote{408}[Untitled handwritten notes on the TI executive committee meeting, presumably made by Arthur Stevens, Lorillard’s general counsel] (July 26, 1973), Bates No. 03769107.
point embodied the crucial issue for the cigarette oligopoly because the absence of government intervention insured the fecklessness of any such initiative and, consequently, that it would not proliferate.

The corporate heads on the TI executive committee weighed in with comments ranging from “‘Excellent’” to “‘Satisfactory.’” Philip Morris failed to respond, and only one executive, Raymond Mulligan, the CEO of Liggett & Myers, offered substantive suggestions—namely, to water down the third guideline even further by inserting “some” before “public facilities” and to change “is” to “may be” before “appropriate.” Obediently, the Tobacco Institute incorporated the dilutions of its already very thin soup.409

To be sure, by the beginning of September 1973 Kornegay had already succeeded in having a letter to the editor published in The New York Times, which, in the course of responding to a three-month-old op-ed by a psychiatrist who had opined that smokers should have both their heads and their lungs examined and sarcastically wondered why on their early trip to the grave they should be taking nonsmokers down with them,410 broadcast the claim that “[t]he key consideration is comfort. The answer lies in courtesies between those who enjoy tobacco and those who do not. Laws and further Government interventions are overreactions.”411 (Kornegay did not quote the statement of his senior vice president, Kloepfer, who some months earlier had let the cat out of the bag in a letter to Reynolds’s senior vice president, Wade, insisting that “[t]here must be a way we can remind smokers to avoid annoying the people who seem to have such a good ability to organize against them....”)412

---

409William Kloepfer, Jr. to Horace Kornegay, Memorandum: Guidelines on nonsmoker issue (Sept. 27, 1973), Bates No. TI04002517/8. A handwritten notation stated that the guidelines were to be resubmitted to the October meeting (of the executive committee), but the minutes do not reflect such a discussion, although they do mention discussion of other non-smoker matters. Tobacco Institute, Minutes of the Fiftieth Meeting of the Executive Committee (Oct. 4, 1973), Bates No. 500799274.

412William Kloepfer, Jr. to Charles Wade (Dec. 29, 1972), Bates No. 500081668/9. Kornegay failed to reconcile the assertion that smokers were “by and large courteous and considerate about smoking and its possible annoyance to others” with opposition to smoking bans in taxis, restaurants, bars, workplaces, bus and train station, or sporting events. Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay at the Tobacco Association of the United States at 10 (Mar. 1, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0154983/92. In fact, for whatever probative value smokers’ self-reporting about their own smoking behavior possessed, 36 percent of all
How the corporate PR representatives on the Tobacco Institute’s communications committee—which was in charge of reviewing and approving TI’s media plans and PR campaigns and at least as early as April 1973 had discussed passive smoking, which was “said to be the most important health problem facing the industry”—reacted to this op-ed and how the Times reacted to the cigarette industry’s lobbying for its publication are worth noting. Meeting two weeks after the op-ed attack had appeared under the provocative title, “The Community Menace,” the communications committee urged TI senior vice president William Kloepfer to “prepare and take to The New York Times personally a rebuttal, to be signed by Mr. Kornegay....” Kloepfer did in fact hand-deliver the letter to and meet personally with A. H. Raskin, for years arguably the best known mainstream labor reporter in the United States, but by now, as assistant editorial page editor, apparently reduced to schmoozing over op-ed space with the PR designee of the cigarette oligopoly, whose lucrative full-page ads in the Times—including on the day on which Kornegay’s letter appeared also bought the kind of access, as Kornegay put it, to “your fine publication” for “responsible and informed sources.” Raskin, according to Kloepfer, was “most cordial,” skimmed the piece, asked no questions, expressed interest, and stated that Kornegay would hear from Harrison Salisbury (the op-ed page editor, who as a college student and managing editor of the student smokers and 42 percent of heavy smokers, according to the 1974 Roper survey paid for by TI, admitted that indoors when other people were present they “[l]ight up without thinking about it”; 53 percent of all smokers and 48 percent of heavy smokers claimed that they looked around and then decided, asked others, or just did not smoke. Roper Organization, “A Study of Public Attitudes Toward Cigarette Smoking and the Tobacco Industry in 1974: Prepared for the Tobacco Institute, 1:49 (1974), Bates No. 85425610/89.

413United States v Philip Morris USA, Inc. 449 F.Supp. 2d 1, 81 (2006).

414Leonard Zahn [public relations counsel for Council for Tobacco Research] to H. H. Ramm and W. T. Hoyt (Apr. 23, 1973), Bates No. 10396009. At the meeting Welch “discussed the problems presented by increasing attacks on ‘second-hand smoking.’” Communications Committee Minutes at 2 (Apr. 10), Bates No. LG0233930/1.

415Communications Committee Minutes (June 26, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0124671.

419[James S. Dowdell], T.I. Communications Committee at 1 (Sept. 5, 1973), Bates No. 500081660 (handwritten meeting notes). Without indicating the context or implication, Kloepfer reported that “Raskin agreed anti-smoking people now working passive smoking issue acknowledge failure of past efforts to significantly deter smokers.”
newspaper had been expelled from the University of Minnesota for “‘deliberate and public’ defiance” of a new smoking ban in the university library).\textsuperscript{420} Although Kloepfer was annoyed that Raskin had not informed him during their tête-à-tête of the Times policy of not publishing op-ed responses to previous op-eds, he told his corporate PR overseers that he and Kornegay saw no reason for “quarreling” over the offer to publish a re-submitted piece as a 400-word letter to the editor\textsuperscript{421}—especially since the letter enjoyed the privilege of passing virtually untouched through the hands of the newspaper’s compulsively interventionist top-heavy editorial staff.\textsuperscript{422}

Another opportunity for the Tobacco Institute to try out its trivialization campaign presented itself in October, when during a radio debate with Betty Carnes Kornegay claimed that the newly enacted Arizona law had not set off any controversy “because the tobacco industry does not take the position that people ought to smoke in art galleries, on elevators, in churches, or in operating rooms, and places like that.” But, he insisted, there was absolutely nothing specific about smoking here: “there are places where it’s inappropiate to smoke. Just as it’s inappropriate to do a lot of other things, to eat or to drink, that sort of thing.” Although, as always, the point was to “accommodate the comfort of both” smokers and non-smokers, Kornegay had apparently not thought through the question as to why the logic of his preposterous categorization did not require accommodating the comfort of both eaters and non-eaters and drinkers and non-drinkers in churches and operating rooms. That his exhaustion of logic had not exhausted his stock of analogical absurdities was embarrassingly on display in his denial that smoking was addictive: “It’s a custom, a habit, it’s something that you do, you pop your fingernails, you smoke.... I smoke, I enjoy smoking.” Incipient organizational coordination took shape at the end of February 1974, when, again, under the aegis of the industry leader, Reynolds, the Tobacco Institute, the Tobacco Tax Council, the Coordinating Board of the National Association of Tobacco Distributors, and the Tobacco Growers’ Information Committee fashioned a memorandum of agreement—which, ironically, ignored Wakeham’s terminological admonition—on the “Industry Response to the Passive Smoking Issue,” which assigned responsibility to TI for “coordinating and \textsuperscript{420}“Minnesota University Suspends Student for Year for Smoking,” \textit{NYT}, Jan. 15, 1930 (1).

\textsuperscript{421}William Kloepfer, Jr. to Blalock et al. (Sept. 10, 1973), Bates No. 500003419.

\textsuperscript{422}The letter as submitted is Horace Kornegay to Kalman Seigel (Sept. 7, 1973), Bates No. 500003420.

\textsuperscript{423}“Barry Farber Show” at 4 (Oct. 18, 1973, 8:00 p.m., WOR, New York), Bates No. TIFL0518215/8 (Radio TV Reports, Inc.). directing opposition to smoking ban proposals” and directed the other associations not to initiate any action at the state or local level without first consulting and obtaining the approval of TI. The “legislative tactics” for defeating anti-smoking measures were to “follow the pattern established for tax legislation, i.e., retention of counsel or legislative lobbyist to represent industry.” Counsel would also be retained in “selected local issues of significant concern.” In accordance with previous internal tactical declarations, the organizations recognized the “need for some appropriate public accommodation between smokers and non-smokers”—if for no other reason, then because “[l]egislative councils...need examples of industry good faith.” The companies’ continued bad faith was blatantly (albeit internally and secretly) on display in the Institute’s unwillingness to do any more than trot out earlier shams such as “campaigns to stress smoking courtesy and non-smoker tolerance....” Lodged in a similar ethical price range was the plan to “counter false health hazard claims...by...exploiting government-sponsored research that exonerates tobacco smoke as potentially injurious.”

Two days later Kornegay warned the Tobacco Association of the United States that “the old antismoking bandwagon is headed backwards—down the discredited road to out-and-out Prohibition.” Smelling a conspiracy, but unwilling to identify the conspirators, he alleged that much of the movement’s “propaganda on the nonsmoker issue...serves the interests of those who would like to see cigarette smoking take the blame for the health hazard associated with air pollution. Indeed, there seems to be taking shape an unholy alliance of more than a few vested interests.” The cigarette oligopoly may not have appreciated (imaginary) conspiracies arrayed against it and aimed at suppressing the super-profitable production of lethal consumer commodities, but it was acutely attentive to identifying disparate potential allies whose assistance in delaying, if not sidetracking, anti-tobacco legislation might be bought if they could not be persuaded that they had a stake in combating the alleged “attempt to make cigarette smoking the scapegoat for the ills of air pollution and occupational hazards.”

---

424 “Memorandum of Agreement Industry Response to Passive Smoking Issue” (Feb. 27, 1974), Bates No. 500040551/2. Opaque was the solicitation of suggestions to counter anti-smoking groups’ effective use of women to support anti-tobacco legislation.

427 Remarks of Horace R. Kornegay, Pres., The Tobacco Institute, Inc., at the Tobacco...
Now here is an issue which is inherently phony and obnoxious to many more people than just those poor harassed smokers. It ought to infuriate the people who operate restaurants, hotels, motels, theatres, sports arenas, and retail stores. It ought to upset their employees. It ought to depress environmentalists, trying to clean up the atmosphere. It ought to worry union members, struggling to clean up the dust and fumes of mines and mills. And above all, it ought to give serious misgivings to those concerned about the gradual erosion of civil liberties in our land.

Our job—yours and mine—is to tell all these people that the brush fire in the tobacco fields today may burn down their barns tomorrow.\footnote{428} As speculative and difficult to mobilize as such interests might be, Kornegay knew of many others, occupying the non-vertically integrated segments of the industry, who were only all too aware that “the bell tolls”\footnote{429} for them—namely, the “people who share a common destiny...as in ‘we are all in the same boat,’” the tobacco community—farmers, warehousemen, dealers, suppliers, manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers...” With them he pleaded to lend the “weight and reach of large numbers” without which even the (rich and powerful) manufacturing corporations would be unable to fight and win alone.\footnote{430}

Three weeks later a lengthy discussion at a meeting of the TI Communications Committee—attended by two of the industry’s leading lawyers, Stanley Temko of Covington & Burling\footnote{431} and Don Hoel of Shook Hardy—resulted in the group’s advising Kornegay to notify the manufacturing corporations’ chief executives that “authorization is needed for development of a public campaign to respond to those forces who would put restraints upon public smoking.”\footnote{432} This relatively bland result masked an intense discussion, some of the fervor of which has been preserved in the notes taken by Dowdell and the memo that Wade (the committee chair) wrote to Reynolds’ CEO. After mentioning the huge and growing volume of anti-smoking bills introduced in state legislatures in 1974 and the 60 to 70 local ordinances passed, Ehringhaus, TI vice president for state activities, stressed that “[s]ocial unacceptability” was the objective pursued by all the “anti forces.” Kornegay reviewed the history of TI’s attempts to secure the cigarette manufacturers’ support for counter-actions before issuing this cri de coeur: “We must have something to combat this campaign.’
The time has come to set the record straight with the average person.” ‘The can’t be fought at the legislative level.’ ‘We call on you for help; the longer we delay, the more difficult the problem. The antis have tasted blood and they want more.”’ James Bowling, the Philip Morris PR head, agreed that management was “not sufficiently alarmed,” but speculated that the next Roper public opinion poll might cause management to “see we are being hurt and...do something about it.” If Kornegay was astutely analyzing the legislative corner into which the anti-smoking organizations had painted the companies, Ehringhaus was hardly pointing the way out with his insipid and risible call to imitate other industries by showing that the “smoking public and manufacturers are considerate, responsible groups.” After John Blalock, Brown & Williamson’s PR chief, characterized smoking bans as the “number one priority,” Arthur Stevens, Lorillard’s general counsel, cautioning that he did not think that they should “panic,” asked whether, after all, they were actually being hurt. Ehringhaus agreed, but observed that they were still in the first year and once the anti-smoking groups returned the following year, the tobacco industry had “nothing to give, to fall back on.”

Offering a broader assessment of the discussion, Wade observed that “for the first time there was unanimous agreement that the Institute, backed by the entire membership, needed to stop procrastinating and get going on the counteroffensive.” The reason that Ehringhaus believed that the problem, which he regarded as “much greater than anyone had anticipated,” could not be “solved

---

433 It is possible that Wade’s memo was in part based on Dowdell’s notes, but in places it differed; since he was also at and chaired the meeting, his version may have been independently written, but since Dowdell’s was actually made contemporaneously, it is preferred where the two are irreconcilable.

434 J. S. Dowdell, Subject: T. I. Communications Committee Meeting at [6-8] (Mar. 22, 1974), Bates No. 500081649/54-6. The illegibility of one word in the notes makes it difficult to determine whether Stevens was offering a remarkable concession or merely being facetious, but after agreeing that “[w]e do need fall back,” he added: “Perhaps we should accept [separation ?segregation?] in Greensboro auditorium.” Id. at [8].
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

by the usual legislative tactics” was that, despite the industry’s employing lobbyists and achieving some success, there was simply no way to stop the anti-tobacco groups from returning for more the following year, especially since “all have not given the lobbyists a fall-back position.” Given Reynolds’ leadership in combating the new wave of legislation, Wade was presumably expecting to score points with his boss for reporting that the representatives of Philip Morris, Brown & Williamson, and Lorillard had all “conceded that their top management may not be sufficiently alarmed.” He also emphasized the general agreement reached that although the newly legislated restrictions had not yet exerted any great impact on sales, “unless something could be developed to slow down the smoking bans, the industry could be seriously damaged in the years ahead.” In light of the overarching mood that, if left unchecked, might prompt the new anti-smoking tactics to trigger the beginning of the end-game, the committee’s timid recommendations appeared scarcely up to the task: (1) that Kornegay explain the “growing seriousness of the problem” to the executive committee and ask for “authority to start immediately to develop a counteroffensive”; and (2) that TI develop the programs needed to help deal with the state legislative problems and “to gain some degree of public understanding and support.”

Overall the impression left by that the cigarette companies’ PR chiefs was that although they had indeed sensed, before their bosses, the import of their adversaries’ skillful turn toward secondhand smoke exposure as the key to galvanizing the nonsmoking majority and overcoming the wealthy manufacturers’ traditional lobbying advantages in state legislatures, they were unable to devise any credible or plausible extra-parliamentary plans that would make any sense to anyone not blinded by unquestioning devotion to saving a lethal consumer industry and his own job. The PR managers were floundering because, while the majority of the population was beginning to recognize both that cigarette smoke was sickening them and that as a vocal majority they were not fated to continue to acquiesce in this decades-old assault, the cigarette producers were disabled from dissuading the requisite number of nonsmokers from believing their own bodies and sensory perceptions because the companies’ increasingly mendacious denials of the murderous impact of firsthand smoking had manifestly disqualified them from participating in any serious public policy debate.

Crucial to understanding the direction in which the cigarette oligopoly at this very juncture moved in order to ward off state-level smoking bans is the set of proposals that political consultant Martin Ryan Haley submitted in 1973-74.

---

435 Chas B. Wade, Jr. to W. S. Smith (Mar. 26, 1974), Bates No. 500799773-4.
436 One service that Haley performed more publicly on behalf of the cigarette oligopoly was as liaison between Philip Morris and the Vatican in arranging an exhibition of the
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

Haley, an early organizer of the so-called right to life movement, played a less visible but no less important role on behalf of tobacco companies’ right to death (of their customers) movement.\(^{437}\) The Haley connection originated in the cigarette companies’ long-term discussions about merging their Tobacco Tax Council (which lobbied against state tobacco excise taxes)\(^{438}\) into their Tobacco Institute in order to increase efficiency and reduce duplication. In response to a request in December 1972 from the TI executive committee to study the matter,\(^ {439}\) the TI/TTC study group met on March 27, 1973, at which all the company representatives agreed to ask Haley to attend the group’s next meeting to determine whether he would agree to marshalling facts to present to the TI executive committee.\(^ {440}\) A few days later Haley agreed to meet with the study group in early May.\(^ {441}\) Then on May 10, 1973, the Tobacco Tax Council Operating Committee recommended that the two groups not be formally merged. Instead, as the result of informal discussions of the TI’s and TTC’s “legislative [i.e. lobbying] functions” with an “outside consultant,” this study group recommended that each “explore the feasibility [sic] of retaining such outside consultant to make a report on improving the state legislative efforts of each \(^{437}\)As liberal Congressman Morris Udall had put it: “I think people are entitled to smoke if they wish to. The Constitution guarantees us all these great freedoms including the freedom to abuse our health and make fools of ourselves if we want to, and I do not intend to deprive people of these great freedoms.” \textit{Cigarette Labeling and Advertising—1965: Hearings Before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce House of Representatives on H.R. 2248}, at 24 (89th Cong. 1st Sess. 1965 (statement of Morris Udall).

\(^{439}\)Tobacco Institute, Minutes of the Forty-Eighth Meeting of the Executive Committee at 3 (Dec. 7, 1972), Bates No. 04209485/7; A. H. Galloway to Joseph Cullman et al. (Dec. 26, 1972), Bates No. 03680616.

\(^{440}\)EAV[assalo], TI/TTC Study Group Meeting at 1 (Mar. 27, 1973), Bates No. 501470133. Vassalo was R. J. Reynolds’ representative on the TTC; his internal memorandum appears in large part to have been self-serving and designed to enhance his importance in the eyes of his bosses, who were purportedly strongly in favor of keeping the activities of the TI and TTC entirely separate because they did not want to mix health and tax issues.

\(^{441}\)Richard Robertson [Vice President, Philip Morris] to DeBaun Bryant et al. (Mar. 30, 1973), Bates No. 680239467.

2246
A week later at the TI board of directors meeting, President Kornegay informed the assembled cigarette manufacturing executives and their lawyers that the proliferating non-smokers’ rights activities, especially proposed legislation, were “of serious concern to the Institute....” The overriding point, as far as the minutes reveal, made during the discussion was that since “there was no scientific basis for a claim that cigarette smoking caused deleterious effects to non-smokers...the issue was mainly being advanced on the basis of claimed annoyance to the non-smoker”—hardly a startling conclusion coming from the for-profit stonewallers who were still pretending to be in denial over the health consequences to smokers themselves. Later during the meeting Kornegay (who was himself a member of the study group) read the aforementioned letter about a merger, about which the ensuing discussion “emphasized that no contract had been entered into with the consultant and that all that had been authorized” was to request the consultant to “consider the question and submit a proposal for study.” This consultant was Martin Haley. On July 26 the TI executive committee, after hearing Kornegay’s presentation of Haley’s proposal to analyze the TI’s and TTC’s state legislative activities, finally agreed to authorize TI participation; all the manufacturers present concurred except Lorillard, which abstained.

In his original proposal Haley had estimated that a comprehensive report would take eight months to prepare, but nine and a half months passed before it was submitted at the end of May 1974. (Perhaps the delay was in part attributable to the memorandum that he prepared for the Tobacco Institute in March/April on the aforementioned New York City Health Department proposal to restrict public smoking.) Each numbered copy of Ryan’s report, “A State 442 DeBaun Bryant et al. to William S. Smith (May 10, 1973), Bates No. 03769163.

---

443 Tobacco Institute, Minutes of the Thirty-First Meeting of the Board of Directors at 2-3, 5 (May 19, 1973), Bates No. 03769146/7-8/9. The somewhat testy wording may have been linked to a memorandum by Lorillard’s general counsel to the company’s high executives expressing surprise that the study group had suggested retaining a consultant to consider the matter further. Arthur J. Stevens to Preston R. Tisch et al., Tobacco Tax Council-Tobacco Institute Merger (June 5, 1973), Bates No. 03769160.
Non-Smokers’ Aversion, Science, and Legislation Confront an Entrenched Oligopoly

Legislative Plan for the Tobacco Industry,” bore the warning: “HIGHLY CONFIDENTIAL Disclosure of this Report Could be Damaging.” Although the report was in part prefigured by an article that Ryan had published at the beginning of 1974 in the Harvard Business Review and appended to his report, he made it clear from the outset that, far from engaging in an academic exercise, he recommended “applying continually the axiom that the objective of a state legislative program must be helping to defend the bottom line and, whenever possible, to protect and expand markets.”

En route to recommending against the TI-TTC merger, in large part because the taxation and secondhand smoke issues had to be kept separate in some states in order to avoid the industry’s being “whipsawed by legislators who ask which issue is more important” inasmuch as they would support the cigarette companies on one or the other but not on both, Haley focused on two questions that he felt he had been asked—namely, how the industry could best “conduct its state legislative programs” and how to spend its state legislative budgets. The principal tidings that he brought the cigarette manufacturers were “the tidal wave” of state-level anti-business legislation, which was rooted in the “‘quiet revolution’ in the statehouses,” which was, in turn, based on a number of mutually reinforcing changes: a 250 percent increase in the volume of state legislation in 13 years; an increase from 24 to 43 in the number of legislatures meeting annually in the previous 10 years; an increase in the length of sessions from 60 to 120 days and an increasing number of legislatures meeting virtually year round; increasingly active interim committees between sessions; more hearings resulting from procedural changes sponsored by groups such as Common Cause; a monumental turnover in membership; a drastic decline in legislators’ age; an occupational shift from lawyers to teachers, housewives, students, and retired persons; entry of new groups such as women, blacks, youth, and Chicanos into the political system; and a breakdown in bloc voting, which made it necessary to lobby one member at a time. The overall result was that: “Starting with the Supreme Court’s one-man-one-vote ruling in 1965 accelerated by consumerism, Common Cause, and activism, the New Politics have created New Legislators, who are in the ascendency—if not already in control—in New Legislatures. These legislatures and their members are simply not business oriented. Hence, abetted by the difficulties of oil, transportation, insurance, and utilities companies, the broadest and most perilous state legislative antibusiness climate in our history is rapidly gaining momentum.”

---

Without shedding any light on whether or how these new political configurations would affect the cigarette oligopoly differently than other industries, Haley did warn his customer against “the fallacy of establishing state legislative priority according to the size of [the tobacco] market.” The reason that every state had become important was that legislation passed in small states would be conveyed to other states within weeks and not, as had been the case even 10 years earlier, over a period of years. In light of the acceleration of this interstate communication process by the national publication of state model bills, Haley would have not been surprised if some national legislative organization produced a “model non-smoker bill” later in 1974. And, most significantly, since small market states were not only important, but “just as important as a California or New York,” he was in effect urging a 50-state lobbying strategy for the Tobacco Institute. (Unbeknownst to the presentist Haley and his amnesiac customer, in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century the cigarette oligopoly had already adopted such a lobbying and litigation strategy to combat no-cigarette-sales-to-adults statutes in all states regardless of the size of cigarette sales in them precisely because statutory wording wandered from state to state from one session to the next and because litigation, especially in federal courts, automatically nationalized the precedential basis for future rounds of legislation and judicial intervention.)

Whether he fully misunderstood the flow of science, policy, culture, and history or was merely humoring and cynically milking very deep-pocketed

---

455See above Parts I-II.
customers, Haley—who must have recognized that advising the companies to prepare for the end-game would have prompted termination of a lucrative contract—urged the cigarette manufacturing executives to regard the “non-smoker campaign” as just another example of “[d]iscriminatory and otherwise adverse legislation” (such as the “pro-abortion effort,” which was personally anathema to Haley) that ran in faddish cycles. Although these cycles allegedly ran in 7 to 15-year cycles, but had become shorter in sync with the aforementioned legislative acceleration, he nevertheless alerted the Tobacco Institute to the need to expect the accelerating anti-smoking campaigns (at least 150 non-smoker bills in more than 40 states in 1975) to continue at least until 1980, but “more likely 1985.”

The real heart of Haley’s strategy-changing recommendations was financial: the tobacco executives had to eliminate the “false economy” that had misled them to dedicate only $135,000 of the Tobacco Institute’s budget to state legislation in 1973, $160,000 at the beginning of 1974, and $250,000 for that year: “Put bluntly, the dimensions and growing momentum of anti-smoking legislation will not permit such economy in 1975.” Since “the handwriting [wa]s on the wall,” he recommended that the Institute not only expand the state legislative budget to as much as one million dollars, but institute a “crash program” in the summer to put into place an adequate defense by the opening of the legislative session in January 1975. In addition, Haley pointed out that the individual cigarette companies themselves needed to commit the requisite human resources and money to develop state government relations departments befitting large corporations. (Philip Morris and R. J. Reynolds, which never fully trusted their TI hirelings, did eventually create parallel state lobbying regimes.)

At the TI executive committee meeting on July 25, after Haley had presented his analysis and recommendations, vice presidents Ehringshaus and Kloepfer summarized for the assembled corporate top brass various proposals that TI had developed in response to Haley’s report, the most consequential of which was the 456To be sure, even these pockets eventually had limited patience with Haley’s self-generous billing practices: for another project in 1991 the Tobacco Institute brusquely refused to pay some of his invoices. E.g., Martin Gleason to Martin Haley (Sept. 27, 1991), Bates No. TIMN0355060.

---

460See below ch. 26-27.
deployment of a “modest but effective organization of field representatives,” of whom two were to be in place by the end of the year and six by January 1, 1976. In addition, TI was to become an expanded source of information for expanded state activities. After discussion and questioning of Haley, the heads of the three largest firms, Reynolds, Philip Morris, and Brown & Williamson, expressed agreement with Haley’s viewpoints and the Institute’s program, while Liggett’s and Lorillard’s representatives needed more time to consider the matter.\footnote{Tobacco Institutes, Minutes of the Fifty-Third Meeting of the Executive Committee at 3-4 (July 25, 1974), Bates No. LG0508394/6-7.} In October, Kornegay reported to the executive committee that the first field representative would begin work on November 1.\footnote{Tobacco Institute, Minutes of the Fifty-Fourth Meeting of the Executive Committee at 3 (Oct. 3, 1974), Bates No. LG0406993/5.}

In accordance with Haley’s advice, if not quite so rapidly as he recommended, the Tobacco Institute’s State Activities Department legislative budget was ramped up to $842,111 in 1978 and for 1979—when “a large number of anti-smoking initiatives all over the country” were expected—advanced to $1,170,055 to reflect the opening of numerous state and area manager offices.\footnote{Tobacco Institute, Inc., Proposed Budget for 1979 (Oct. 5, 1978), Bates No. 501518801/8/9; Tobacco Institute, 1980 Budget at 29 (Oct. 31, 1979), Bates No. 2025390157/85.} Sixteen years later, Haley himself, seeking another lucrative contract with the Tobacco Institute (this time to combat congressional proposals to ban cigarette advertising), reminded its president that a “very high proportion of the Recommendations was gradually put to work...by 1975, the overall structure as we know it today was being built.”\footnote{Martin [Haley] to Samuel Chilcote (Nov. 7, 1990), Bates No. TIMN354943.}
Minnesotans who thought the smoking problem would disappear after the law was passed have been disappointed. Enactment of the law—although of great importance—was only one step in a lengthy, difficult and most educational process... [T]here is still a long road ahead. In some restaurants the no-smoking area is next to the kitchen door, is situated in a drafty spot, or consists only of two tables, but an attempt is usually made to comply with the law.

One reason for the renewed interest in an anti-public smoking law in Iowa in the mid-1970s was the enactment in June 1975 by neighboring Minnesota of a “landmark” “clean indoor air act,” which included the first modern ban on smoking in private workplaces—as early as 1866, Minnesota had enacted an “Act to Prohibit Smoking in Mills, Machine Shops, Stables, or other Buildings where notice prohibiting the same is kept posted”—and quickly became a model for other states, including Iowa, which adopted some key provisions verbatim from the Minnesota statute. Cigarette manufacturers immediately labeled the Minnesota law the “Most Severe.”

This chapter offers a detailed account of the background of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act as well as an in-depth analysis of the substance of the law, its implementing regulations, and the latter’s political-economic drafting and lobbying processes. The purpose of this chapter is twofold: first, to capture the broader national context within which anti-smoking legislation was being debated and enacted in the mid-1970s; and second, to shed light on the sources of the 1978 Iowa law, which, in large part, was adopted from the MCIAA, although the Iowa legislature failed to take over many of the more controversial and far-reaching aspects of the Minnesota law, including coverage of privately owned commercial public places, and especially restaurants. Iowa’s failure to create an administrative regulatory-enforcement framework, which, whatever its shortcomings in Minnesota, embodied the possibility not only of expanding the scope of the skeletal statute through rulemaking, but also of permanently driving the anti-public smoking campaign forward institutionally by means of the interaction between the responsible agency’s public health officials and the Association for Non-Smokers Rights, accounted, in large part, for the very slow progress in Iowa, which depended almost wholly on favorable political constellations in the state legislature, unmoored from the pressures of a legally empowered and energized corps of public health officials and an organized popular movement. These dual objectives explain why the focus of the chapter is on developments in Minnesota until the time in 1978 when the Iowa legislature was debating its public smoking law. However, since the Iowa law’s profound weaknesses propelled ongoing debate during the 1980s over amendments to strengthen it, the chapter also devotes some attention to the more stringent regulations promulgated in Minnesota in 1980, which widened still further the gap between the Iowa law and the MCIAA, which, more than ever, became the aspirational model of anti-smokers in Iowa.

Professor Edward Brandt’s Initiative

[S]moke...bothered me...a great deal. 7

---

6On anti-smoking and anti-cigarette sales legislation in Minnesota in the early twentieth century, see vol. 2.
7Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Apr. 30, 2007).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The American Lung Association, which has played the leading role in pushing for nonsmokers’ rights in Minnesota and other states, says its efforts are pro-nonsmoking, not antismoking.\(^8\)

Neither Heart nor Cancer supported the effort. It was not until many years later that they stopped allowing smoking during their board meetings. There was still smoking allowed in the Lung association until at least the 1980’s.\(^9\)

The initial impetus for passage of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, whose gestation period lasted from 1973 to 1975, came from Edward Brandt, who had recently completed a doctorate in political science,\(^10\) was an assistant professor at the College of St. Thomas in St. Paul, and had been a two-term member of the Minnesota House of Representatives (Nonpartisan Election-Conservative Caucus, i.e., a Republican, but a self-professed “liberal...on issues of economic justice”)\(^11\) representing a Minneapolis district including the University of Minnesota from 1969 to 1971.\(^12\) On the House floor he had had the “misfortune” of being forced to sit among heavy smokers.\(^13\) In fact, it was especially this exposure to smoke in the legislature in addition to other personal experience that motivated Brandt’s involvement in ANSR and efforts to secure passage of an anti-smoking law.\(^14\) As a legislator he had already demonstrated his anti-smoking bona fides by writing a letter to the Federal Highway Administration in March 1970 supporting Ralph Nader’s petition to amend the Motor Carrier Safety regulations to ban smoking on interstate buses: “I do so on the grounds that such smoking represents not only a serious nuisance but a health hazard to other occupants. Most smokers have little idea as to what acute discomfort they cause to some non-smokers, especially \(^9\) Jeanne Weigum (executive director, Association for Non-Smokers-Minnesota) to Marc Linder (Apr. 19, 2007).

---

\(^10\) Edward R. Brandt, “Confidence and Crises of Confidence in International Relations: A Case Study of West German Political Attitudes Towards the United States During the Postwar Period” (Ph.D. diss., U. Minnesota, 1970).

\(^12\) The Minnesota Legislative Manual 1971-1972, at 81, 142 (Larry Anderson ed. n.d.).

\(^13\) Telephone interview with Ed Brandt, Minneapolis (Apr. 26, 2007).

\(^14\) Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Nov. 5, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

those who may be suffering from temporary or permanent nasal difficulties of even a minor nature.” Brandt concluded by calling adoption of the amendment “a small but important step in promoting more civilized human behavior.”

As early as 1971 Brandt drafted an anti-smoking bill, but decided not to introduce it because he was not “sure...whether the public climate was strong enough at the time for its passage....” His electoral support came largely from Democrats in Northeast Minneapolis who, like Brandt himself, “were upset by the radicals who had gained control over the party apparatus. .... My announcement stated that I was running on behalf of the Humphrey Democrats and Republicans, in contrast to the radical McCarthy Democrats, who were the most radical group among students and some faculty in the university area.” A self-professed “unpaid citizen lobbyist,” Brandt may not have received the enduring public credit that he deserved for his role in instigating the Minnesota law, but those who were leading figures in the first half of the 1970s have unambiguously acknowledged his leadership. For example, Phyllis Kahn, the legislator who in 1973 introduced an anti-smoking resolution that Brandt had drafted and continued, more than any other Minnesota legislator, to be identified with anti-smoking initiatives for the next 35 years, observed that he had been “the initiator” and approached her about sponsoring his bill draft. When Brandt left Minnesota

---

15 Edward R. Brandt to Kenneth L. Pierson (Mar. 18, 1970), Bates No. 03757187. Brandt’s letter may have been prompted by an aggressive press release of the Minnesota Highway Department, which, after stating that “[i]f you are one of those bus passengers who is nauseated by smoke from cigarettes, you may be in for some relief soon,” explained to whom comments could be directed. Minnesota Highway Department, Ban on Smoking in Buses Proposed (Mar. 13, 1970), Bates No. 03757189.

16 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007); [Ed Brandt], “Highlights of the Early Years: ANSR, 1973-76” at 1 (Nov. 6, 1993) (notes that Brandt made for a talk he gave) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt).

17 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 14, 2009).

19 Telephone interview with Phyllis Kahn, Minneapolis (May 8, 2007). A comparative study of anti-smoking legislation in several states published by RAND completely misunderstood the dynamics of the passage of the MCIAA, giving all the credit to Kahn (“the driving force behind the bill was a single legislator”) and none to ANSR (the influence of the anti-smoking coalition was ranked as “absent”). Peter Jacobson, Jeffrey Wasserman, and Kristiana Raube, The Political Evolution of Anti-Smoking Legislation 58, 15 (1992). Hyman Berman, a labor historian at the University of Minnesota who sold his services to the cigarette manufacturer-defendants in the pivotal suit brought by the State of Minnesota as an alleged expert witness on the history of the public’s awareness of the dangers of tobacco smoking, erroneously testified that “the primary mover of the in 1976, the staff of the newsletter of the organization he helped create and led proclaimed that without his “tireless efforts” there would have been no organization or MCIAA.20 And Robin Derrickson, who had been with the Lung Association in Minnesota since 1972 as a respiratory therapist working with chronic lung disease patients21 and spent much time at the state legislature from 1973 to 1975 attending committee meetings, stated in 1978 simply that: “The success of nonsmokers rights legislation in Minnesota should be attributed to Ed Brandt.”22

Minnesota Indoor Air Act was representative Phyllis Kahn...she was very instrumental in arranging coalitions,...getting the advocacy groups to support the bill....” He then identified these advocacy groups as the Cancer, Lung, and Heart organizations, “plus informal groups like Committee for a Smoke-Free Society, a group headed by Jean Rosenbloom called Committee for Non-smokers Rights and things of that nature.” He failed to mention ANSR. State of Minnesota v. Philip Morris Inc., Transcript of Proceedings, Vol. 47, Pages 9095-9371 at 9307-9308 (File No. C1-94-8565, Minn. Dist. Ct 2d Jud. Dist., Mar. 25, 1998), Bates No. 525470931/1143-4. Neither Ed Brandt, ANSR president at the time of the MCIAA’s passage, nor Jeanne Weigum, its current president and a leading member since 1975, ever heard of Rosenbloom. Weigum opined: “Clearly he got his history wrong.” Email from Jeanne Weigum to Marc Linder (Nov. 16, 2009).

21. Email from Robin Derrickson to Marc Linder (Feb. 14, 2009).
22. Robin Derrickson, Untitled Typescript at 1 (Sept. 1978) (talk given at Western Lung Conference) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR). In delineating his roles, Brandt disavowed having been “the chief lobbyist. I drafted the law, found the individual chief authors [i.e., legislative sponsors], and testified before committees, but I was not the one who spent time contacting individual legislators.” In addition, “as an ex-legislator...I had more credibility and I was the one who knew what amendments I had to accept in order to give the bill its best chances.” The chief (unpaid) lobbyist, according to Brandt, was Glenna Mills Johnson, an ANSR member, whom Brandt regarded as “one of the most important of the ‘forgotten heroes.’” Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Apr. 30, 2007). Johnson was an M.F.A. student in photography at the University of Minnesota from 1974 to 1976 and received her degree in 1978. Email from Nancy Johnston, University of Minnesota, to Marc Linder (Feb. 25, 2009). Thirty-five years later Johnson’s intensity as an advocate of the MCIAA was so deeply etched in the memory of the associate administrator of the University of Minnesota Art Department that she was still unable to go to a restaurant without remembering that she owed its non-smoky air to Johnson. Telephone interview with Evonne Lindberg, Minneapolis (Feb. 24, 2009). A fellow ANSR member, Johnson’s self-proclaimed “right-hand man,” recalled her as “the mover and shaker” and “the person in the state” who initially made the law work. Telephone interview with Gerald Ratliff, St. Paul (Oct. 31, 2009). Although more than three decades later Mills had no recollection of having lobbied and stated that she had
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

The Formation of the Association for Non-Smokers Rights (ANSR) and the First Failed Legislative Initiative in 1973

Kahn says...“I’ve never been as concerned with the suicidal tendencies of smokers.... Smoking is an appropriate activity to be conducted among consenting adults in private, just like adultery, fornication or homosexuality.... My major objection is damage to the innocent public.”23

Don’t mix up anti-smoking with non-smokers’ rights. (Others have a right to smoke. You have a right to smoke-free air.)24

To be sure, Brandt hardly imagined himself to be a lone wolf: a former legislator, foreign service officer in the U.S. Information Agency, and self-conscious political scientist, he realized that no legislative goals were attainable without an organization, a movement, and a strategy. indeed, he was not even present at the founding of that organization on December 20, 1972, when seven people met under the name, as the minutes put it, “Ad Hoc Committee on Non-Smokers Rights (for lack of a better name).”25 The Respiratory Disease Association of Hennepin County (Minneapolis)—on whose letterhead the minutes were typed26 and on whose board of directors Brandt sat27—had, together never lobbied, a non-ANSR-member friend who had accompanied her on lobbying excursions did remember (when Mills asked her in 2009). Telephone interview with Glenna Mills, Oakland (Nov. 1, 2009); email from Glenna Mills to Marc Linder (Nov. 5, 2009).

23Jim Shoop, “3-Cent Tax Boost Sought on Higher-Tar Cigarettes,” Minneapolis Star, Jan. 25, 1979, Bates No. TIMN0462285/6 (quoting Rep. Phyllis Kahn). Kahn relished the phrase as evidenced by her public use of it three years earlier, when she told a public health meeting that the MCIAA “didn’t even go as far as my favorite statement about how smoking should be considered—as a practice to be engaged in only in private among consenting adults, in the same light as adultery, sodomy, and fornication.” Representative Phyllis Kahn, Speech Before Public Health Association, St. Cloud at 5-6 (Oct. 8, 1976), in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118F.8.3.(B).

24Program Perspectives,” ANSR, Fall 1982, n.p. [2].

25Ad Hoc Committee on Non-Smokers Rights, Minutes (Dec. 20, 1972) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR).

26The minutes were typed on Hennepin County RDA letterhead because Julie Shaw, the minute taker, was employed by that organization.

27Robin Derrickson, Untitled Typescript at 1 (Sept. 1978) (talk given at Western Lung Conference) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR).
with the counterpart organization in Ramsey County (St. Paul), initiated the meeting, \(^{28}\) each providing the group with a thousand dollars in start-up funding.\(^{29}\) (The National Tuberculosis and Respiratory Disease Association, which in 1960 had declared cigarette smoking to be a major cause of lung cancer and in 1968 urged its local chapters “to develop and sponsor an active program to prevent young people from becoming smokers, and to convince smokers that they should stop smoking,” changed its name to the American Lung Association in 1973.)\(^{30}\) The organization’s then-executive director, Gerald Orr, having decided to create the group because “you could do a lot more radical things” outside of the old and established lung association\(^{31}\)—one of the more radical things that could not be done at the Hennepin County association was, as Brandt noted, to “have the courage to ask its (one?) smoker in the office to quit” smoking in the office\(^{32}\)—assigned Julie Shaw, a program associate in smoking deterrence/program administrator in smoking education at Hennepin County RDA,\(^{33}\) to found it. (As early as January 1969 the organization’s board of directors had decided to create Minnesota’s first staff position of anti-smoking coordinator.)\(^{34}\) Shaw, whose staff time RDA was lending to the new group, \(^{28}\) Another attendee, Karyn Diehl, represented the Respiratory Disease Association of Ramsey County. Diehl indicated that some inter-organizational rivalry characterized the relationship between the two groups; 36 years later she still recalled one occasion on which she saw Julie Shaw, her counterpart, cutting off the bottom corner of a sheet of paper that was to be distributed to the legislature and contained the name and address of the Ramsey County group. Diehl left both the Lung Association and ANSR in 1974. Telephone interview with Karyn Diehl, St. Paul (Mar. 2 and 3, 2009).

\(^{30}\) http://breathehealthy.org/index.php/about/story

\(^{31}\) Telephone interview with Gerald Orr, Burnsville, MN (Feb. 16, 2009). Interestingly, Orr was, according to a program director at the RDA of Hennepin County at the time, a big cigar smoker. Telephone interview with Robert McNattin (Feb. 15, 2009).

\(^{32}\) Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Apr. 30, 2007).

\(^{34}\) Ant-Smoking Director,” \textit{Minneapolis Star}, Jan. 25, 1969, Bates No. TIMN0461939.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

opened the meeting by explaining RDA’s reasons for being “interested in helping to organize a citizen’s action group to work for the rights of the non-smoker....” Emblematic of the perverse prevalence of smoking at the time, Shaw listed as the first reason “to put pressure on hospitals” (and other public places) “to better control indiscriminate smoking in order to protect the health, safety and comfort of non-smokers.” In addition, RDA wanted to educate the public about tobacco smoke’s health effects on nonsmokers in enclosed environments and make smokers aware of the “appropriate and inappropriate places for smoking.” After Shaw had outlined the activities of similar groups elsewhere in the United States, those present “decided that the group must have a positive image—being ‘anti’ anything would only make progress difficult.”

Brandt decided to attend the group’s second meeting on January 9, 1973—at which the name, Association for Non-Smokers Rights, was adopted—after state Senator Mel Hansen, who two months later would introduce the first anti-smoking bill and with whom he was a member of the Lung Association-inspired outdoor air pollution-focused Metro Clean Air Committee, had told him about the new organization, whose focus on indoor tobacco smoke was of greater concern to Brandt. The agenda stated that the first item of new business would be presented by Brandt and dealt with a “bill regarding non-smokers’ rights.” Handwritten notes on the agenda (presumably by Brandt) suggested that the group’s anti-anti approach was already flourishing. A proposal for the motto of a button read: “I like smokers. I don’t like smoke.” Equally non-confrontational was the admonition: “ANSR asks you to be considerate.” Bending over backwards not to antagonize smokers was also exemplified by the formulation of one of the group’s objectives as “encourag[ing] establishment of appropriate ventilated places for those who choose to smoke.”

35 Ad Hoc Committee on Non-Smokers Rights, Minutes (Dec. 20, 1972) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR).

36 [Ed Brandt], “Highlights of the Early Years: ANSR, 1973-76” at 1 (Nov. 6, 1993) (notes that Brandt made for a talk he gave) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt); telephone interview with Ed Brandt, St. Paul (Feb. 14, 2009). Hansen, a founder of the Metro Clean Air Committee, was chairman of its policy committee in the early 1970s as well as a member of the executive board of the Hennepin County Respiratory Disease Association. The Minnesota Legislative Manual 1971-1972, at 48 (Larry Andersen ed. n.d.). MCAC supported the anti-smoking bill H.F. 2801 in 1974 because subjecting people to smoke indoors would have defeated the purpose of cleaning up outdoor air. Testimony of Metro Clean Air Committee before the Subcommittee of the House Committee on Health and Welfare Friday, Feb. 22, 1974—HF-2801, in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3.(B).

At the January 9 meeting, attended by eight members, the first questions that arose dealt with the organization’s objectives, name, and relationship to the anti-air pollution movement. With respect to the last named, Shaw, whom the first issue of ANSR’s newsletter presumably meant to praise for having “the drive of a General Motors executive,” explained that “our particular group is being formed to deal with the problem of indoor pollution resulting from cigarette smoking and as far as the Respiratory Disease Association is concerned, will come under its Smoking Deterrence Program.” In response to a suggestion that the group be called IDS for “I don’t smoke” another member stated that that name implies attacking and that we should perhaps be attacking smoke and not necessarily the smoker—a more positive approach might be easier to put across.”

As soon as Brandt suggested ANSR, the group excitedly embraced it and proceeded to formulate four major objectives: (1) educating the general public about tobacco smoke’s health and safety hazards in enclosed environments, “especially as it affects the non-smoker”; (2) insuring nonsmokers a smoke-free environment and encouraging creation of “appropriately ventilated areas for those who choose to smoke”; (3) putting “pressure on public places including health-care facilities, public meeting rooms, recreation areas and vehicles of public transportation to better control indiscriminate smoking in order to protect the health, safety and comfort of all persons”; and (4) supporting and encouraging public policies, legislation, and appropriations to promote the first three objectives. Shaw then “explained the structure of ANSR in its beginning stages” as comprising three circles: the inner core of the founding members charged with initiating action and policies and with organizing the outer circles; an intermediate second circle of key people in the community, such as media personalities, legislators, and prominent political, educational, and medical people, who would offer to help publicize and organize ANSR; and an outer circle of people who would respond to publicity drives and become “‘card-carrying’ members.” Finally, Brandt presented his resolution to be submitted to the Minnesota House of Representatives on limiting smoking in public places. Offered mainly for its “educational value,” the resolution, if it interested the community in such legislation, could help ANSR to prepare more a “meaningful” measure later.

39Association for Non-Smokers’ Rights (ANSR), Minutes at 1-2 (Jan. 9, 1973), American Lung Association of Minnesota, Association Records, 1907-1994, MHS Mss Coll., 149.B.17.12F. Of the 11 members of ANSR’s executive board during 1973-74, four were paid employees or volunteers at the Respiratory Disease Association of Hennepin and Ramsey County, five had business backgrounds, one was a professor, and one was a high
At the third meeting on January 25, Brandt reported on his legislative resolution, which Senator Hansen had tentatively agreed to introduce. Although Brandt emphasized that the resolution would have no legal effect, it would “open the door for preparation of something with legal hold.” A week later Brandt informed the group that in the House Democratic-Farmer-Labor Phyllis Kahn had agreed to sponsor his resolution, which would be co-sponsored by Jim Swanson (DFL), chair of the Health and Welfare Committee, who would hold a hearing on it. The following week Brandt related that he had approved Kahn’s making a minor change to emphasize “the environmental issue.” Promising was Kahn’s revelation to him that “the other legislators were ‘clamoring to have their names on the bill.’”

Brandt and Kahn, who had just been elected to his old seat, were, given the “vast gap between our ideological perspectives,” an odd couple, but he “knew how the legislature functioned and knew that only a bill with a chief author who was a member of the majority had any chance of passing.” Kahn, a Jew from Brooklyn, New York, with a doctorate in biophysics from Yale, in her first term representing the district that encompassed the University of Minnesota, at which she had been a research associate in genetics and cell biology before being elected, was arguably the most left-wing member of the legislature. Indeed, at least one Hennepin County Republican told Brandt that “he wished I had found another sponsor, since Phyllis was seen as belonging to the far left in those days.” Kahn’s fit for her role as chief sponsor was in part a function of the fact that until she entered the legislature she had “never really [been] bothered by other people’s cigarette smoke.... ‘I really led a very sheltered life.... I was a

---

40 ANSR Meeting Minutes at 1 (Jan. 25, 1973) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR).
41 ANSR Association for Non-Smokers Rights, Minutes (Feb. 1, 1973) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR).
42 ANSR, Minutes at 2 (Feb. 9, 1973) (copy from Ed Brandt’s papers furnished by ANSR).
43 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 14, 2009).
44 http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?ID=10302 (including link to video of interview with Kahn). Later she also received an M.P.A. from Harvard.
46 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Apr. 29, 2007).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

research scientist (in biochemical genetics and microbiology) at the University of Minnesota for 10 years and we had very strict nonsmoking rules. There are some very delicate instruments used in our work that were affected by cigarette smoke. We needed the cleanest atmosphere possible. So when I was shoved into these committee rooms at the Legislature and at DFL meetings, they were just choked with smoke. When there are 30 people in a room and half of them are smoking, you can’t find a place to sit where somebody isn’t blowing smoke in your face.”

A preview of the legislative struggle over an anti-public smoking measure was offered by the battle over smoking in the Senate itself in February. When Nicholas Coleman, the first Democratic Senate Majority Leader in 114 years—1973 marked the first time in the twentieth century that the DFL controlled the Senate, House, and governorship—a heavy smoker, and chairman of the Rules Committee, reported the committee report on the Senate’s permanent rules for the 1973 session on February 8, Rule 77 read: “No Senator or officer of the Senate, or other person, shall be permitted to smoke in the Senate Chamber. There shall be no smoking in the visitors section of the galleries.” This rule constituted a significant expansion of the rule as it had existed in 1971, which had banned smoking in the Senate chamber only during a memorial service—a rare occasion. Four days later, on February 12, DFL Senator Edward Novak, a St. Paul lawyer, former FBI investigator, and a smoker, moved to amend the Senate rules, inter alia, by reinserting the stricken words, “during the Memorial Service.” The Senate adopted the amendment, thus

48http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fuldetai.asp?ID=10107
54http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fuldetai.asp?ID=10470
55Email from (ex-Sen.) George Conzemius to Marc Linder (Mar. 23, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

reinstating smoking senators’ virtually complete freedom to inundate their nonsmoking colleagues with tobacco smoke. That Novak was one of Coleman’s “most trusted colleagues” prompted Coleman’s biographer to conjecture that the majority leader might have sensed that it would be hard to stop the rule change in committee and therefore had Novak kill it on the floor.57 Later that same day, however, Senator David Schaaf, a newly elected florist who was plagued by a cigar-smoking colleague who sat in front of him58 and in 1974 would be the Senate sponsor of ANSR’s anti-smoking bill, moved to strike the reinserted restrictive wording, and the Senate adopted his amendment, thus restoring the new ban.59

However, the struggle over clean air in the Senate chamber was not over yet.60 On April 18, Majority Leader Coleman’s motion that Rule 77 be suspended for the evening session prevailed.61 Then on May 1, the motion by cigar-smoking62 57Email from (ex-Sen.) John Milton to Marc Linder (Mar. 11, 2009).

60A newspaper article appearing on April 15 gave an account of the banning of smoking in the Senate chamber (without mentioning any date), according to which DFL Senator Ed Schrom, an ex-smoker, was the chief advocate, and the 33-28 vote was “strictly nonpartisan. It was the smokers versus the nonsmokers. Fifteen minutes later, ashtrays in the Senate chamber were picked up. Some nicotine-crazy senators resorted to chewing on unlit cigars or making frequent trips to the hallways or bathrooms to smoke. The bathrooms got so smoky that nonsmoking senators thought of requesting their own bathroom.” Peg Meier, “Nonsmokers Stand Up for Rights,” MT, Apr. 15, 1973 (1E:1-2). Oddly, Schrom voted on May 1 to suspend the rule for the remainder of the session. See below.
62Email from John Milton (ex-state senator) to Marc Linder (Mar. 7, 2009).
DFL Senator Charles “Baldy” Hansen\(^63\) that the first sentence of Rule 77 be suspended for the rest of the session received 36 affirmative votes as against only 24 negative votes (including those cast by Mel Hansen and Schaaf), but, lacking a two-thirds majority, it failed to prevail. Only five of the 24 senators who voted against suspending the no-smoking rule voted against the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act in 1975, whereas 17 voted for it (and two did not vote); in contrast, 12 of the 36 senators voting to suspend the no-smoking rule voted for the MCIAA, whereas 20 voted against it (and four did not vote). Nor can the voting pattern be accurately characterized as a caucus vote, even though a significant party-line difference was discernible: whereas almost two-thirds of the DFL voted (23-12) to suspend, just over one-half of Republicans did (13-12).\(^64\) Whatever might shed light on how and why this 36-24 vote in favor of smoking in senators’ own workplace morphed into a 36-28 vote against smoking statewide two years later\(^65\) would be even harder put to explain why the very next day, May 2, Republican Minority Leader Robert Ashbach’s identical motion prevailed.\(^66\)

\(^{63}\)Hansen, a banker and “very conservative” DFL’er—it would have been difficult for a Republican to be elected from the big “meatpacking” town of Austin—was closely allied with Victor Jude, a former senator who owned a tobacco distributorship and was a lobbyist in 1975 (see below). Typical of the low regard in which he was held was the comment by one colleague that he was “one of the worst legislators” he had ever known. Email from Robert North to Marc Linder (Mar. 14, 2009). Another remarked that Jude and Hansen were “the closest we came in my days to Chicago-style corruption....” Email from John Milton to Marc Linder (Mar. 14, 2009). In 1975 he chaired the Labor and Commerce Committee, which “many Capitol observers refer to as the ‘Forest Lawn’ of the Senate,” because its conservative stance led to the demise of so many bills. Gary Dawson, “Senate Gives Labor Bill Last Rites,” \(St. Paul Pioneer Press\), Apr. 30, 1975 (15:5-8). A reporter who covered the legislature in 1975 characterized Jude as a sleazy lobbyist, who had operated virtually directly out of Hansen’s office, where many lobbyists hung out who had business before the committee chaired by Hansen, who was close to them. Telephone interview with Steven Dornfeld, Minneapolis, Minneapolis (Mar. 13, 2009).

\(^{65}\)Journal of the Senate, State of Minnesota, Sixty-Ninth Legislature: 1975, at 2281 (May 14). Schaaf, who did not regard the setback as ominous because it suspended rather than repealed the rule, explained the suspension as a function of the end-of-session rush that generated long floor sessions, more stress, and less time for heavy smokers to leave the chamber to smoke; in turn, some anti-smokers were themselves too stressed and distracted by the press of the proceedings to argue over it. Telephone interview with David Schaaf, Roseville, MN (Mar. 8, 2009). Ed Brandt offered conjecture to the same effect. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 6, 2009).

\(^{66}\)Journal of the Senate, Sixty-Eighth Legislature, First Session, Legislature, State of
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

On March 5, Brandt’s resolution was introduced in the House and a very weak bill was introduced in both chambers. The House concurrent resolution (“relating to smoking; urging limitations on smoking in places of public resort”), which Kahn and four other representatives sponsored, did indeed embed public indoor tobacco smoking deeply in the burgeoning national environmental concerns:

WHEREAS, the legislature recognizes the fundamental right of each person to the preservation and nondegradation of the natural resources of the earth including the air; and
WHEREAS, each person has the responsibility to contribute to the protection, preservation and enhancement thereof; and
WHEREAS, industry must shut off its smoke stacks when outside pollution reaches alert levels; and
WHEREAS, studies indicate readings taken in bars, committee rooms, homes, and even hospitals have reached pollution levels far greater than alerts for industry....

Only then did the resolution recite the U.S. Public Health Service showing that smoking was detrimental to nonsmokers’ health inasmuch as it caused them “acute discomfort...and sometimes even...illness....” The practical resolution then embodied “state policy to discourage smoking in any enclosed public facility, including public buildings and vehicles used for public transportation, except for rooms or sections specifically set aside for smoking in those instances where comparable alternative facilities are available for nonsmokers.” Even if the resolution had had legal force, its use of “discourage” would still have deprived it of any real-world power to protect nonsmokers. The resolution’s timidity flowed from what Brandt decades later revealed as his own world view: “I am conservative in my views as to how quickly you can get human beings to change their behavior. That is why ANSR was very cautious in its approach and why in House Concurrent Resolution No. 7 (Mar. 5, 1973, by Phyllis Kahn (DFL), Bill Kelly (DFL), Paul McCarron (DFL), Jim Swanson (DFL), and Gerald Knickerbocker (Rep.) (copy furnished by MHS).

---

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

1973 it pushed only for a resolution. In that sense, ANSR was very patient in its approach, but not because of thoughts about pressure by lobbyists. Rather, the question was how much public support we could count on.\(^{70}\)

To compensate for the non-binding character of the resolution, Brandt and ANSR also arranged for some of the same legislators to introduce identical bills in both houses. Senate File 917, as introduced by Mel Hansen, and House File 966, as introduced by House Republican Gerald Knickerbocker (whose participation was impelled by his experience of exposure to tobacco smoke inside and outside the legislature)\(^{71}\) and four other representatives (including Kahn), simply provided that: “All public buildings, public places and public means of transportation having public areas with room for 40 or more people shall have separately designated smoking and nonsmoking sections in such areas except that separately designated areas shall not be required when more than five square feet is normally available per person.”\(^{72}\) Apart from the lack of any enforcement or penalty provision, which rendered the bill purely aspirational, the quantitative space cut-offs would have excluded vast numbers of places and left huge numbers of nonsmokers unprotected—if being surrounded by all of five square feet of floor space could be taken seriously as per se conferring any protection whatsoever from tobacco smoke on nonsmokers.

The same day ANSR complemented this legislative action with a news conference in the State Capitol Building, covered by all four television stations, which featured Representative Kahn announcing the introduction of the resolution and Dr. Charles Mayo II (grandson of the co-founder of the Mayo Clinic and a prominent Cancer Society official).\(^{73}\) Perhaps in a bid to appeal to \(^{70}\)Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Apr. 29, 2007).

\(^{71}\)Telephone interview with Gerald Knickerbocker (Apr. 26, 2007). That the House and Senate bills were identical and filed on the same day renders implausible Knickerbocker’s much later statement that he had drafted the House bill before and not in sync with Hansen.

\(^{73}\)Anonymous untitled undated handwritten draft of [Ed Brandt], “Highlights of the Early Years: ANSR, 1973-76” at 1 (Nov. 6, 1993) (notes that Brandt made for a talk he gave) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt); ANSR, “A News Conference to Announce a Resolution, Pollution Research, and Hospital Policies in Support of the Rights of the Non-corporate hierarchies, Kahn stressed that: “Along with increasing desires to protect our environment from industrial pollution, comes the realization that the air quality in the executive committee room of an industrial plant may be in even poorer condition than the air quality near its smokestacks.” She also made it clear that ANSR did “not seek to eliminate smoking,” but only “to establish the right to breathe clean air as a fundamental public right.”

In the immediate aftermath of the day’s events an average of 20 people a day became ANSR members and media exposure proliferated. In connection with its hearing on April 12, Julie Shaw submitted testimony to the Health Subcommittee of the Senate Health and Welfare Committee on S.F. 917 in her dual capacity as chairman of ANSR—which at this point already had a membership of more than 600—and as a program administrator at the Hennepin County RDA. Shaw devoted some of her testimony to medical-scientific findings that in part went beyond those of the 1972 surgeon general’s report. For example, she noted that cigarette smoke caused the “natural cleansing mechanism of the lungs to shut down. The bronchial cilia are paralyzed by high concentrations of cigarette smoke in the air.” She also quantified the prevalence of tobacco smoke-induced eye irritation among nonsmokers at 70 to 80 percent. The annual combustion into the air of 573 billion cigarettes and seven billion cigars—that is, the burning of one billion tons of tobacco—she characterized as “certainly a major pollutant in our environment!” Accurately calling the bill a “very modest first step toward remedying a major air pollution problem,” Shaw pointed out that it did not even “require the smoker to stop smoking when danger levels are reached. It only requires separation of smokers and non-smokers so that the pollutants will be somewhat diluted before they reach the non-smoker’s lungs.” As timid an initial solution as S.F. 917 was, ANSR hoped to make “stronger and more comprehensive legislation available” to the legislature in 1974.

ANSR, Testimony from the Respiratory Disease Association of Hennepin County and from the Association for Non-Smokers Rights: For the Health Sub-Committee of the Senate Health and Welfare Committee on SF 917, Relating to Regulating Smoking in Enclosed Public Places (Apr. 12, 1973) (copy furnished by ANSR). It is not clear whether
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Two weeks later the Senate Health, Welfare and Corrections Committee adopted S.F. 917 with amendments increasing the exclusion level to 10 square feet of space for nonsmokers. However, the bill failed to make it to the Senate floor before adjournment. Since Hansen was a Republican and therefore in the minority in 1973, it was clear to Brandt that legislative party politics had made it very unlikely that his bill would pass. In contrast, neither H.F. 966 nor House Concurrent Resolution 7 was considered by a committee. In retrospect the House bill’s chief sponsor, Knickerbocker, concluded that although H.F. 966 had been introduced before its time, it did help pave the way to enactment of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act two years later.

On April 15, ANSR’s public profile was enhanced by a full-page inside cover advertisement soliciting members in the television supplement to the Sunday Minneapolis Tribune, half of the cost of which was paid for by Rudy Boschwitz, a Jewish refugee from Nazi Germany and future Republican U.S. senator from Minnesota, who at the time owned Plywood Minnesota, a home improvement chain. The text, which bent over backwards to avoid attacks and to stress the objective of one big happy family of smokers and nonsmokers, focused on a nonsmoker people called Goofy George who liked smokers (except, presumably, Shaw presented this statement orally, since a week later an ANSR report noted that Hansen’s bill had been “passed through sub-committee without testimony from ANSR.” ANSR, “Progress Report: Current ANSR Activities” at 2 (Apr. 20, 1973) (copy furnished by ANSR). Shaw offered the same testimony in ANSR, Testimony from the Respiratory Disease Association of Hennepin County and from the Association for Non-Smokers Rights: For the Health & Welfare Committee of the Minnesota House of Representatives on House Concurrent Resolution #7 relating to regulating smoking in enclosed public places (Apr. 18, 1973).

78 ANSR, Legislative Summary at 1 (Bills Relating to Use of Tobacco) (n.d. [1973]) (copy furnished by ANSR).

79 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 14, 2009).

80 ANSR, Legislative Summary at 1 (Bills Relating to Use of Tobacco) (n.d. [1973]) (copy furnished by ANSR).

81 Telephone interview with Gerald Knickerbocker, Minnetonka (Apr. 26, 2007).

82 Although Boschwitz “felt lukewarm about this issue,” he paid for the ad for Brandt’s sake because they knew each other personally. Brandt’s later recollection was that the lung association paid the other half since ANSR at that point lacked the membership or funds to pay. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 16, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

About the same time both a Minnesota Poll revealing that three-fourths of respondents stated that they believed that nonsmokers had a right to a smoke-free environment and feature articles in the news media on nonsmokers’ rights reinforced interest in the group, triggering daily accessions to membership of 60 to 100. Although the Poll, covering 600 people 18 years of age and older and published on the front page of the Family section of the Minneapolis Tribune, showed that smokers, who composed 37 percent of the respondents (but 47 percent of those under 30 years of age), “answered the question [as to nonsmokers’ right to a smoke-free environment] the same way,” only 60 percent of them stated that they ever had misgivings about smoking in nonsmokers’ presence—the same proportion of smokers who replied that they had ever been bothered by other people’s smoke. An article on the same page on nonsmokers’ rights that highlighted ANSR stated that individual memberships cost one dollar and that ANSR wanted “to keep peace” between smokers and nonsmokers, for example, by recommending that well-ventilated areas be provided for smokers. As a result of this publicity, by April 20, paid (individual, family, and business) membership had reached 1,100 (including a $100 membership from the large

---

84. "Minnesota Poll: Does Smoke Annoy You? Don’t Suffer—Speak Out,” MT, Apr. 15, 1974 (1E:3-4, 4E:2) (quote); [Ed Brandt], “Highlights of the Early Years: ANSR, 1973-76” at 1 (Nov. 6, 1993) (notes that Brandt made for a talk he gave) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt); telephone interview with Ed Brandt, Minneapolis (Apr. 26, 2007). A year later, when the Minnesota Poll determined that virtually the same proportion (59 percent) of nonsmokers reported that they had been bothered by smoking, 63 percent of women but only 54 percent of men expressed that view; by age, the younger the nonsmokers the more likely they were to be bothered, ranging from 76 percent of those 18 to 25 to 40 percent of those over 65. “Minnesota Poll: Most Non-Smokers Admit that Smoking by Others Sometimes Chokes Them Up,” MT, Apr. 7, 1974, clipping in Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B).

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

retailer, Dayton-Hudson Corporation\textsuperscript{86} and a month later rose to 1,543\textsuperscript{87}—a far cry from the 10,000 members Shaw wanted to have by June 1, but still a good start for a group begun with “a couple thousand dollars of Twin Cities Easter Seal money,”\textsuperscript{88} especially when by September 15 memberships reached 4,356 representing almost 7,000 people.\textsuperscript{89} ANSR’s aspiration of expanding to 50,000 members, thus becoming Minnesota’s largest organization and positioned to “work on much needed projects for clean air in hospitals, restaurants, motels, lunch rooms, homes, etc.,” by March 1974 (marking a full year of “selling memberships”)\textsuperscript{90} would remain out of reach, in spite of its “philosophy of...quietly and patiently objecting to smoke—not the smoker,” who “may be our friend and neighbor” or family member.\textsuperscript{91}

On April 26, the day on which the Senate Health and Welfare Committee adopted S.F. 917, Democrat Willard Munger, the life-long non-smoking\textsuperscript{92} chairman of the House Environmental Preservation and Natural Resources Committee from Duluth (who had been a House member since 1955 and at his death in 1999 was its longest serving member ever)\textsuperscript{93} and four others (including Kahn, a Democratic physician and two Republicans) introduced a much more \textsuperscript{86}ANSR, “Progress Report: Current ANSR Activities” at 2 (Apr. 20, 1973) (copy furnished by ANSR). Richard Cesario, an ANSR member since March, chair of its policy committee, and elected vice-chairman of its executive board in June, was a Dayton-Hudson lawyer. \textit{ANSR} 1(2):[2] (July [1973]); ANSR, “Executive Board Roster 1973-74” at 1 (n.d.) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt). Brandt later surmised that his prior work at the Dayton-Hudson Foundation was the reason for the $100 corporate membership. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Nov. 6, 2009).

\textsuperscript{87}ANSR, “Current Activities Report” (May 21, 1973) (copy furnished by ANSR).

\textsuperscript{91}“1, 2, 3, 4, 5...Count to Ten!” \textit{ANSR} 1(3):n.p. [3] (Aug. [1973]).

\textsuperscript{92}Telephone interview with Will Munger, Jr., Duluth (Apr. 8, 2009); Patricia Lehr, Duluth (Apr. 11, 2009) (Munger’s daughter).

\textsuperscript{93}http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?ID=10443

2270
comprehensive bill (H.F. 2384), which was not only enforcible, but in one central respect was also more radical than any that would become law anywhere in the state or country for years.\textsuperscript{94} “It would, according to Brandt, “be more accurate to call Munger’s bill the Don Ternes bill.” Ternes, whom Brandt also characterized as “the key member of the Duluth chapter of ANSR,”\textsuperscript{95} was a recent college graduate from Duluth, an environmental activist, and very active in the DFL. The fact that “I couldn’t breathe” at many of the political meetings he attended was one of the main drivers of his intense interest in securing passage of a nosmoking bill in Minnesota. Unable 36 years later to state with certainty whether he had drafted the bill, Ternes was nevertheless willing to accept credit for having been its “catalyst”: he had sought out and received copies of anti-smoking laws and bills from around the country from John Banzhaf at Action on Smoking and Health (who had supported the bill that became the first statewide smoking restriction law in Arizona in 1973) and approached a number of legislators including Munger in an effort to persuade them to support anti-smoking legislation.\textsuperscript{96}

H.F. 2384’s preamble was stronger than S.F. 917’s in noting that tobacco smoking had been found to be “a significant health hazard” to nonsmokers breathing tobacco smoke-contaminated air; in view of the “significant harm to the public” caused by tobacco smoking, the bill declared Minnesota’s public policy that “there is a right to be free from tobacco smoke which transcends any right to smoke tobacco and which must, in the interest of public health, prevail over the latter whenever the two are in conflict.” More generally the bill’s purpose was to protect the nonsmoker’s health and environment “by preventing infringement on the right to be free from tobacco smoke to the maximum extent reasonably possible.”\textsuperscript{97} The scope of coverage of enclosed indoor public places “made available to the general public” included restaurants, retail stores, grocery stores, public conveyances, public school buildings, and commercial establishments. Ironically, given ANSR’s original focus on hospitals, they were subject to an exception for rooms or areas not housing nonsmoking patients “as permitted by \textsuperscript{95}Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 17, 2009). Ironically, 36 years later Ternes was unable to recall whether he had belonged to ANSR at all, though he did not dispute the possibility. Telephone interview with Don Ternes, Maplewood, MN (Apr. 15, 2009).

\textsuperscript{96}Telephone interview with Don Ternes, Maplewood, MN (Apr. 15, 2009).

\textsuperscript{97}H.F. 2384, § 1 (Apr. 26, 1973) (copy furnished by MHS).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

physicians” as well as to an exclusion of “enclosed offices not ordinarily frequented by the general public.”

The bill’s most radical provision straightforwardly prohibited smoking in all covered public places instead of conferring discretion, as was and would be universally the case in the United States for many years, on owners/managers to designate separate smoking-permitted sections. Those in charge of such public places were required to post signs outside each entrance stating that smoking was prohibited and to provide fireproof receptacles at each entrance for disposing of lighted tobacco; violators were subject to a $10 to $100 fine; and complaints could be filed with the state health department. Those responsible for covered public places (and their employees) were prohibited from willfully or knowingly permitting smoking or providing ash trays. The state board of health was charged with issuing regulations needed to carry out the law’s purposes, including the creation of a uniform citation and complaint system; with the local boards of health and county and local enforcement agencies the state board of health shared enforcement powers; the boards of health were also empowered to seek judicial injunctions for prohibiting or preventing violations. Finally, violators of any of the law’s provisions were subject to the aforementioned $10 to $100 fine.

ANSR was not certain, in Brandt’s words, “whether the public political climate was strong enough at the time” for passage of H.F. 2384—“just as I had drafted a bill in 1971 but did not introduce it for the same reason.” “The only problem with Munger’s bill,” as Brandt ironically observed decades later, “was that it had no chance of being adopted by the legislature.” Raising popular consciousness may have been one of Munger’s priorities, but in order to close the gap between aspiration and reality ANSR decided to back Munger’s bill but with significant amendments, to which Munger—who had been “Mr. Environment” in the legislature for many decades—himself agreed. In June, Shaw met with Munger to discuss proposed amendments to his bill to substitute a separation of smokers for the flat ban on smoking; Munger agreed not only to this (radical) change, but also to add a section on employee rights. In mid-June

---

93 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007).
94 Telephone interview with Dr. Harold Leppink, Boca Raton, FL (Apr. 12, 2009). Leppink had been the executive officer of St. Louis County Health Department in Duluth and worked with Munger for many years.
95 See Mark Munger, Mr. Environment: The Willard Munger Story (2009).
Brandt’s ANSR legislative committee decided that a separate back-up bill regarding only hospitals should be prepared in case Munger’s failed. Revealing an apparent division of opinion with ANSR, its executive board engaged in “considerable discussion...about whether or not this legislation was sufficiently strong to provide the results we are seeking,” but in the end decided that responsibility for legislative activities should reside with Brandt’s committee, on whose expertise and advice the board should rely.\textsuperscript{105} Brandt’s committee then decided to support Munger’s bill with the aforementioned changes, which was both “more comprehensive than any we have seen so far” and provided for enforcement.\textsuperscript{106} Oddly, Munger’s bill disappeared in the second session in 1974 and Munger became a cosponsor of ANSR’s identical House and Senate bills.\textsuperscript{107} Shaw’s departure from the RDA and ANSR in June and Brandt’s election as chairman of the executive board marked the transition from full-time lung association leadership to volunteers.\textsuperscript{108}

\textbf{ANSR’s Bill Dies in 1974}

ANSR...is a new organization...formed not to get smokers to quit but to get everyone into his own corner. ...

\textsuperscript{105}ANSR, ANSR Executive Committee Meeting Minutes at 2 (June 21, 1973) (copy furnished by ANSR).

\textsuperscript{106}ANSR, “Current Activities Report” at 2 (June 29, 1973). Julie Shaw’s report failed to make it clear to members that the original bill had been much more capacious. Julie Shaw, “Current Activities Report,” \textit{ANSR} 1(2):n.p. [2] (July [1973]). See also ANSR, “Election of ANSR Board Chairman” (July 2, 1973) (News Release) (stating that the ANSR board had approved its Legislative Committee’s proposal to “give full support” to Munger’s bill, “which will provide broad requirements for separate areas for non-smokers in all public places,...”

\textsuperscript{107}See below. In ANSR’s papers is found an undated page titled, “Amend H.F. 2384 to read as follows,” which provided, inter alia, that: “Smoking shall be prohibited in all public places, except where separate facilities are provided for smokers and non-smokers so as to protect the non-smokers’ right to breathe clean air.” Such “separate facilities” were defined as meaning “separate rooms divided from each other by a wall or a partition within a single room which will prevent smoke from filtering through to the maximum feasible extent.”

\textsuperscript{108}ANSR, “Current Activities Report” at 1 (June 29, 1973) (copy furnished by ANSR); Anonymous untitled undated handwritten draft of [Ed Brandt], “Highlights of the Early Years: ANSR, 1973-76” at 1 (Nov. 6, 1993) (notes that Brandt made for a talk he gave) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

“We want to get the puffers on one side and the breathers on the other.... All we are asking is the right to breathe somewhere, sometime. ... All we really want is for smokers to be more courteous.”

Part of the group’s activities in the Twin Cities includes a campaign to get all restaurants, where feasible, to cordon off areas for smokers and designate them as such.109

In spite of the bills’ deaths, a special ANSR legislative subcommittee chaired by Brandt intensified the group’s efforts at the Capitol during the interim until the opening of the 1974 session. The issues that the subcommittee planned to deal with included: (1) improved smoking control in hospitals and health care facilities, and food preparation and/or sales businesses; (2) creation of smoking/nonsmoking areas in public places; (3) encouraging employers to provide nonsmoking employees with “clean and healthful working environments”; and (4) prohibiting discrimination against employees who petitioned for nonsmoking working areas.110

For the 1974 session Brandt’s legislative committee, aided by friendly legislators, worked out a more comprehensive bill, which included enforcement and penalty provisions. He then asked Representative Kahn and Senator Schaaf to sponsor ANSR’s bill.111 The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act, House File 2801, introduced on January 16 by Kahn and four others,112 and Senate File 2889, introduced by Schaaf two weeks later,113 was thus based on ANSR 110ANSR, Legislative Summary at 2 (Bills Relating to Use of Tobacco) (n.d. [1973]) (copy furnished by ANSR). In October ANSR leadership bemoaned that there had been “little progress” on hospitals since the summer, but mentioned that the Minnesota Medical Association was “behind us and we can use them to help the Hospital Association Effort.” ANSR, Progress Review Minutes (Oct. 12, 1973) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt).

111Telephone interview with Ed Brandt, Minneapolis (Apr. 26, 2007); email from Ed Brandt (Apr. 29, 2007); telephone interview with David Schaaf, McGregor, MN (May 12, 2007).

112H.F. 2801 (Jan. 16, 1974, by Kahn, Swanson, Munger, Dale Erdahl (Rep.), Richard Andersen (Rep.)).

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Earlier in the month Kahn had been thrown onto the defensive, in her dual capacity as legislator and ANSR member, by Minneapolis Tribune columnist Will Jones, who had recounted his repeated encounters in downtown Minneapolis movie theaters with illegal smoking and management’s feckless attempts to put a stop to it. Jones urged nonsmokers sharing his attitude to “speak up now. Don’t wait for organizations like the Association for Non Smokers Rights to help you. The association collects money and spins wheels with surveys and makes pious noises about seeking legislation to require no-smoking areas in public places, but there’s no action.”

Two days later Kahn stressed in a letter to Jones, who had “denigrat[ed]” ANSR’s efforts, that since 1973 “we have rewritten our bill, with one eye on what other states have done and also on what is politically feasible.”

Jones’s criticism was consistent with the complaint voiced internally in October 1973 by Hugh Morgan, the chairman of ANSR’s Public Awareness Committee “that there were not enough signs of action....” In response to his felt “need for something to report on,” the group’s leaders “agreed that we may be trying to do much and we should zero in on just a few targets. There are still only a small number of activist volunteers so we must limit our priorities.” Years later Ed Brandt acknowledged that, although Will Jones became “very supportive of ANSR and the MCIAA,” at the beginning of 1974 “ANSR had existed for less than a year, so we couldn’t possibly have achieved much, in terms of concrete 115Will Jones, “After Last Night,” MT, Jan. 7, 1974 (1B:7, at 2B:7). It was already illegal (presumably in Minneapolis), according to Jones, to smoke in theaters, “except for certain approved, designated smoking areas,” public elevators, city buses, and retail stores: “If we could just get the slobs to obey the law in the places where smoking already is banned, we’d be a giant step ahead in the struggle for clean, breathable air.” Spurred on by a survey done at the Upper Midwest Hospitality Conference showing that 49 of 73 restaurant and hotel managers stated that they would support legislation separating smokers and nonsmokers, ANSR leaders agreed that “our major project” between October and December 1973 “would be to personally survey and report on the metropolitan area restaurants. The restaurants agreeing to separate smoking areas would receive free publicity in our Newsletter and ANSR members could see actual results regarding action taken by the organization.” ANSR, Progress Review Minutes (Oct. 12, 1973) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt).

---

116Phyllis Kahn to Will Jones (Jan. 9, 1974), Legislature, House, Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, in MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B).

results, by then.\textsuperscript{118}

In the meantime, the Tobacco Institute was panoptically monitoring state anti-public smoking bills. At the meeting of its executive committee on November 29, 1973, vice president and counsel Ehringhaus gave an overview,\textsuperscript{119} explaining that the first element of what the staff believed could be “the most effective program to combat” such legislation was the need to “concentrate our efforts and resources in those states in which we expect the problem to be the most acute next year, and to thereby measure the longer range effectiveness of our efforts.” At that juncture the staff identified those priority states in 1974 as California, Massachusetts, Illinois, Arizona, Connecticut, Michigan, Texas, Florida, and New York. The omission of Minnesota was presumably based on the judgment that no “prompt and authoritative information”\textsuperscript{120} from the state had alerted TI to the emergence of developing problems that should have altered the view that the 1973 bill had not posed a significant risk of passage. That the cigarette oligopoly’s intelligence network did not collect and disseminate publicly available legislative filings instantaneously was revealed by the fact that on January 17, 1974 (the day after Kahn had filed the MCIAA), Dowdell informed Wade at R.J. Reynolds that anti-public smoking bills had been introduced or were being held from 1973 in California, Indiana, Maryland, Nebraska, and South Carolina, while measures had been drafted but not yet introduced in Arizona, Illinois, and South Dakota. Moreover, in all of these states TI’s state activities department had “arranged to have industry representatives appear in opposition” to them.\textsuperscript{121} (A month later Dowdell added Minnesota to the list of 16 states in which smoking restriction bills were pending.)\textsuperscript{122} And even two weeks later, when President Kornegay addressed the Tobacco Institute’s annual meeting, he vastly (and perhaps ignorantly) understated the threat in Minnesota (where Kahn’s bill far exceeded the scope of the Arizona law) while covering himself before his assembled bosses with an assurance that TI was fully prepared and equipped to deal with the looming catastrophe:

At the executive committee meeting in November, we called attention to one aspect \textsuperscript{118}Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Nov. 15, 2009).

\textsuperscript{119}Tobacco Institute, Minutes of the Fifty-First Meeting of the Executive Committee at 2 (Nov. 29, 1973), Bates No. TIMN0013429/30.

\textsuperscript{120}[Untitled typescript of presentation at TI EC meeting] at 16, 17 (Nov. 29, 1973), Bates No. LG0312489/505/6.

\textsuperscript{121}J. S. Dowdell to C. B. Wade, Jr., Update on Smoking Ban Activities (Jan. 17, 1974), Bates No. 500061504.

\textsuperscript{122}J. S. Dowdell to C. B. Wade, Jr., Subject: Smoking Ban Legislation (Feb. 15, 1974).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

of the new agenda: Specifically, the successful efforts made in 1973 to prohibit smoking in public places. We illustrated the potential impact on sales and warned that the movement could lead to the virtual elimination of cigarette smoking.

Two months later, we can report that the threat was not understated nor underestimated. If we erred in our earlier views, it was only in our guess as to where and in what order the attack would be mounted.

For your information, measures largely similar to the Arizona bill have been introduced since January first in the legislatures of Pennsylvania, California, Washington, South Dakota, South Carolina, Nebraska, Indiana, Massachusetts, Maryland, Kansas, Minnesota and Michigan. ...

In November, we also listed nine states as prime targets for attack. Of the nine, four are now in the acute stage—that is, bills have been introduced, committee hearings held or in immediate prospect and floor action threatened. All the necessary countermeasures are being taken in these states. In non-target states where bills have been introduced, appropriate action is underway. I should warn you, however, that this effort may well cause us to call for more and more help from your sales personnel.

In accord with our assurance in November, we are attempting to get as much help as possible from the restaurant, hotel, trucking, retail and other business groups. Not surprisingly, we encounter reluctance on their parts because of fears of boycott, retaliation or whatnot. We have begun to pick some holes in those arguments and are starting to get some favorable responses. ...

So you can see these last two months have been devoted both to intense preparation for and active response to punitive legislation. ... The employment of industry spokesmen in the various states is progressing, a bit slowly sometimes because of problems which are the responsibility of the Tobacco Tax Council. These will be worked out promptly so that always industry interests will be protected. We would be less than candid, however, if we did not tell you that the disparity in expenditures in the past raises serious problems in some crucial areas. 123

The MCIAA, of which the Tobacco Institute quickly took note, 124 was shorn of the previous year’s elaborate public policy preamble, which instead merely stated the bill’s purpose as “protect[ing] the public health, comfort and environment by prohibiting smoking in public places at public meetings except in designated smoking areas”125—this last phrase revealing the crucial dilution of Munger’s bill. The regulatory scheme’s spatial scope was indicated by the definition of “public place” as encompassing “any enclosed, indoor area used by the general public or serving as a place of work, including restaurants,

---

124TIN, No. 91, at 4 (Feb. 4, 1974).
125H.F. 2801, § 1 (Jan. 16, 1974).
retail stores, offices and other commercial establishments, public conveyances, educational facilities, hospitals, nursing homes, auditoriums, arenas and meeting rooms.”

Here the crucial innovation was the introduction of general coverage of workplaces. The bill then proceeded to prohibit smoking in such places “except in designated smoking areas,” which might be designated by proprietors, state and local health boards, and local and county law enforcement officials, provided that such areas were “separate, of adequate size and with adequate ventilation” to fulfill the bill’s purpose. Anyone who smoked in violation of the prohibition was subject to a $10 to $100 fine, while the fine for proprietors who failed to enforce the prohibition ranged between $100 and $300, each day constituting a separate offense. Finally, the ANSR bill empowered state and local health boards to seek court injunctions against repeated violations.

Schaaf introduced S.F. 2889 a week after the Senate had killed Hansen’s 1973 bill S.F. 917. On January 23 the Senate as the Committee of the Whole (a procedural device used by legislative bodies to engage in freer and more informal debate) recommended that S.F. 917 be re-referred to the Health, Welfare and Corrections Committee subject to a motion by Hansen himself to amend his bill in a number of respects. First, he specified that the smoking ban on public means of transportation apply whether they were publicly or privately owned. Second, he excluded from coverage “lobbies, hallways, skyways or any other public structure used mainly as a thoroughfare.” And third, he deleted entirely the provision not requiring a no-smoking section when more than 10 square feet was available per person. The motion having prevailed and the amendment having been adopted, the Committee of the Whole then re-referred the bill to the Health, Welfare, and Corrections Committee.

As decoded by the press the following day, this opaquely worded procedure in fact meant that the Senate had killed the bill: “Majority Leader Nicholas Coleman, a cigarette smoker, called the proposal a ‘pious hope’ and said it would be unenforceable.” Brandt further explained that “a combination of senators who wanted no non-smokers rights bill and those who wanted a stronger bill” had done S.F. 917 in.

---

126 H.F. 2801, § 2(1) (Jan. 16, 1974).
127 H.F. 2801, §§ 2(2) and (3) (Jan. 16, 1974).
128 H.F. 2801, § 3(3) (Jan. 16, 1974).
131 “No-Smoking Bill Killed by Senate,” Minneapolis Star, Jan. 24, 1974 (16B:5).
By mid-February ANSR judged that passage of MCIAA looked “less than hopeful, since the house and senate can’t even agree to ban smoking in their own chambers.”\textsuperscript{133} The high point of the legislative process was the nearly hour-long hearing that the Health Subcommittee of the House Health and Welfare Committee held on February 22,\textsuperscript{134} at which former Surgeon General Jesse Steinfeld, who in the meantime had become head of the Mayo Clinic’s cancer treatment program in Rochester, Minnesota, testified in support of the bill. In her opening remarks before the subcommittee Kahn expressed the hope that H.F. 2801 was “fairly non-controversial,” declaring later that it was “a very, very mild bill” (so much so that chain-smoking House Speaker Martin Sabo “almost went on as a co-author”). Calling it a “a first step in securing a cleaner, safer environment, she bemoaned that: “For years nonsmokers have sat quietly and politely while smokers blew smoke in their faces, on their food, or fouled the air of their homes.” To be sure, her bill would not apply to those homes, in which children were exposed to smoke who were “brought up by smoking parents” and were therefore “far more prone to respiratory diseases and asthmatic attacks,” any more than it would deal with fatal fires in homes (and the concomitant increase in insurance premiums for all). Indeed, Kahn stressed that “[w]e are not seeking in this bill to eliminate smoking” without explaining how, in spite of that self-imposed restriction, it could possibly achieve its goal of “establish[ing] the right to breathe clean air as a fundamental right.” For the time being, the main beneficiaries of this right would be adults “subject to watery eyes, sore throats and sordid [sic] degrees of distastes or discomfort in smoke-filled rooms.”

Ironically, as Kahn herself recollected three years later, as she was speaking to the Health Committee in 1974, “‘three of the committee members sitting at the table were puffing away so furiously...that there was practically a smoke screen between us.’”

Finally released from the Nixon administration’s censorship, the former surgeon general was at last free, positioned on a future perch, to look back “‘with horror and amazement’” on smoking as slow-motion suicide that also imposed a “‘noxious environment’” on nonsmokers. In extraordinarily expansive terms, Steinfeld excoriated the greedy cigarette manufacturers and governments that derived revenue from taxes, without which “our[ ]...primitive, unhealthy, unintelligent era” would be “inexplicable.” Focusing on the impact of carbon monoxide on hemoglobin, he directed the legislators to recent data showing “a clear-cut physiologic and pharmacologic effect on the non-smoker who is subject to smoking products in unventilated or poorly ventilated areas.” (While noting that “[m]ost rooms are inadequately ventilated,” ironically Steinfeld pointed to the modern jet airplane as “about the only adequately ventilated public areas....”

136Larry Adcock, “Do Smokers Have a Right to Make You Sick?” Mpls, July 1977, at 24-27 at 25, Bates No. TITX0032082/3. Kahn went on to note that one of the “enormous” intervening changes had been that self-same committee’s having forbidden smoking. Id. Yet, in a film made in 1976 about the passage of a bill in Minnesota smoking was prevalent not only at committee hearings, but virtually everywhere else except in the House chamber. The First Branch of Government: From Grass Roots to Law (1976), on http://www.leg.state.mn.us/lrl/lrl.asp.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

He also mentioned a new finding that the surgeon general would probably soon publish that "the air exchange in most private and public buildings is inadequate to remove the harmful constituents of cigarette smoke within any reasonable period of time.") He sought to impress upon the subcommittee the seriousness of secondhand smoke exposure, despite the lower level than that to which smokers subjected themselves, by noting the absence of any scientific demonstration of a threshold effect for chemical carcinogens—a fact that underlay the congressional Delaney amendment’s ban on any food additive that caused cancer when fed in any amount to any animal species. Clinching his argument, the former surgeon general drove home the point that "if one applied the same reasoning to cigarette smoking," it "would be outlawed completely since no safe level has either been shown to the smoker himself or his non-smoking companions who were forced to breathe the polluted air which the smoker pours into the environment." To be sure, prompted by a question from a DFL legislator as to whether tobacco smoke harmed mainly people with certain ailments or everyone to some extent, Steinfeld was constrained to admit that "we haven’t been able to demonstrate the harm to everyone, that would have to be by inference on the basis of the fact that there are over a thousand constituents that have been identified...in cigarette smoke," some of which were "definite carcinogens in animals...." The contribution that Steinfeld, whose testimony and letters Kahn later singled out as having been “particularly useful” for passage of the MCIAA— the subcommittee’s discussion of which he regarded as ”

137 State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Health Subcommittee of the Health and Welfare Committee: February 22, 1974, House File 2801 at 2, 3 (unofficial transcript), Bates No. BYB000482. Stein stated that it was “likely” that the finding would be published in the 1975 “Health Consequences of Smoking,” but it appears not to have been included in the chapter on involuntary smoking. Despite Steinfeld’s aforementioned direct statement to the contrary and his observation that the bill’s objective was to “provide areas for the non-smoker where he can breathe air inside somewhat comparable to that which he breathes outside,” J. B. Clifford, a Republican opponent of the bill, charged that the bill prohibited smoking in restaurants, offices, and other commercial establishments “where generally the ventilation is such to keep the smoke out...and that to me is the kind of thing that the Volstad [sic] Act did....” Id. at 5.

139 Phyllis Kahn to Mildred Jeffrey (UAW) (Sept. 30, 1975), in Legislation, House,
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

giant step forward in this country—made was not limited to this testimony: he was constantly talking to people, including legislators, about the importance of enacting the bill. (Steinfeld refrained from divulging to the subcommittee a target at which he directed his blunt talk in his speech the next day at ANSR’s first annual meeting: since surveys showed that “the educated, intelligent population has largely discarded smoking,” he predicted that for “the future we will see the diseases associated with smoking restricted largely to the unintelligent and the uninformed.”)

After the subcommittee had had an opportunity to question Steinfeld, a series of restaurant and hotel representatives mounted “[m]ajor opposition” to the measure on various grounds. A spokesman for the hospitality industry argued that the bill was superfluous because, as a business that was “frankly based on...trying to please people...the Hospitality Industry will accede to the demands of the public.” It would “provide for relief in this matter voluntarily. ... Yeah, we’ll clean up the air when the public asks for it”—thus implying that no such demand had yet come forth. While calling H.F. 2801 a “fine bill,” the representative of the Minnesota and the City of Minneapolis Hotel and Restaurant

Kahn (Rep. Phyllis), Files, MSA, MHS, 118.F.8.3(B).

__State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Health Subcommittee of the Health and Welfare Committee: February 22, 1974, House File 2801 at 6 (unofficial transcript), Bates No. EXHIBBYB000482.__

__Telephone interview with Lewis Cope, Minneapolis (Mar. 12, 2009) (Minneapolis Tribune’s medicine and science reporter in 1974-75).__

__State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Health Subcommittee of the Health and Welfare Committee: February 22, 1974, House File 2801 at 8 (unofficial transcript) (Frank Dedridge), Bates No. EXHIBBYB000482.__

__Ironically, when Republican Gary Laidig asked whether, without H.F. 2801, if someone sat down near his table and began smoking and he asked the maitre d’ to stop the smoking, the latter could so, Johnson replied that the maitre d’ should ask the other people whether they “would mind moving to another table,” but he failed to explain what the next step would be if the smokers refused or how the restaurant could “do what the public wants” when “the” public makes conflicting demands. State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Health Subcommittee of the Health and Welfare Committee: February 22, 1974, House File 2801 at 10 (unofficial transcript), Bates No. EXHIBBYB000482. Chum Bohr, representing the state hotel, resort, and restaurant associations, conceded the latter point when he mentioned that “a maitre d’ finds himself in a very funny position...and we find irate patrons don’t help the hospitality business when we’re trying to do everything to please.” Id. at 12.__
Associations insisted that it did not conform to members’ feeling that “we do operate public places for the smoker and non-smoker alike.” Concretely he complained that the bill failed to define what “adequate size” or “adequate ventilation” meant, adding that whatever the latter’s meaning, it would be “very costly.” The restaurant industry hypothesized that if a majority of customers were smokers, seats in the no-smoking area would remain vacant, causing a loss of revenue to the owner and tax revenue to the municipality and state and prompting “some other state...to capitalize on it.” A member of the board of directors of the Greater Minneapolis Hotel Association who characterized his own smoking as a “nasty habit” nevertheless rejected the law outright “because frankly smoking is not illegal” and imposing restrictions on smokers was “discriminatory.” The executive vice president of the Minnesota Hotel, Resort, and Restaurant Associations, Chum Bohr, who would play a high-profile lobbying role in 1975, based his suggestion of perpetuating a “voluntary” regime on his claim that “the non-smoker rights people have done a pretty good job of discouraging many, many, many people from smoking and maybe one of these days they’ll even get me pretty well convinced because I’m leaning that way somewhat.”

This barrage of criticism caught Kahn off guard. Though she admitted that she “wasn’t quite expecting so much opposition from the hotel and restaurant people,” she was relieved that the manager of a national chain cafeteria in a Twin Cities suburb was willing to break ranks to testify briefly that his institution of a non-smoking section had been well received by smokers and nonsmokers. To be sure, he failed to address the other witnesses’ objections, but Kahn herself claimed that there was in fact no problem with “empty tables not being put to use” because “[i]f non-smokers come in and...wish to sit in the smoking section, there is nothing to prevent them from doing so. They will be aware that they are going into a smoking section, and they will have a choice of either waiting for an empty table [in the no-smoking section] or taking that table.” Continuing in this vein, which was presumably conjuring up owners’ worst nightmares of customer revolt-driven reduced profitability, she insisted that if newly arrived smoking customers found empty tables only in the nonsmoking section, “they also don’t have terribly much [sic] problem, they can just sit there and eat and not smoke and then go somewhere else for their cigarette break.” Kahn inadvertently revealed just how minimal the progress was that MCIAA might offer when, in order to refute opponents’ claims of vacant nosmoking section seats, she noted that in her experience with airplanes, those sections always filled up first, and then recounted that when six nonsmoking legislators on a recent trip had to take seats in the smoking section to sit together, they were able to make sure that no smokers sat next to any of them.¹⁵¹

---

In addition to the massively experienced propinquity of smoke in airplanes, Kahn failed to mention that the Civil Aeronautics Board regulations, which had just gone into effect on July 10, 1973, expressly required carriers to “insure that a sufficient number of seats in the ‘no-smoking’ areas of the aircraft are available to accommodate persons who wish to be seated in such areas,”¹⁵² whereas MCIAA lacked such a mandate. To be sure, it might have been possible to argue that an implication to that effect could be teased out of the bill’s requirement that “[s]moking areas shall be...of adequate size and with adequate ventilation to fulfill the purpose of this act,” which was “to protect the public health, comfort and environment by prohibiting smoking in public places and at public meetings except in designated smoking areas.”¹⁵³ Kahn did not take that position, but Thomas Berg, the subcommittee chair, offered an argument that, although it substantively worked in the diametrically opposite direction, might, by analogy, have served an anti-smoking gap-filling purpose. J. B. Clifford, a Conservative Caucus member and insurance broker,¹⁵⁴ who offered an allegedly “friendly amendment” to gut the whole bill by removing coverage of all public places, thus ¹⁵³H.F. 2801, § 2, subd. 3 and § 1 (Jan. 16, 1974).

¹⁵⁴http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?ID=10105 leaving only public meetings covered, let the cat out of the bag by complaining that “an individual isn’t going to be able to smoke at his desk if he wants to, he isn’t going to be able to smoke in his office unless it’s somehow or another magically designated. I think it’s almost harassment.” Turning more personal, he charged: “Fellas, you don’t say that I can smoke in my office. I cannot. I cannot smoke in a private office within the wording of your bill,” and then competently followed through the bill’s interlocking provisions to arrive at his Q.E.D. At this point DFL lawyer Berg intervened to chastise Clifford for his statutory literal-mindedness and offer him an administrative deus ex machina: “I can appreciate...your concern for...what the words say on the piece of paper, I have long been a believer that we should feel free to ask those kinds of questions in committee regardless of the subject matter. But it seems in this one that, possibly, some of these things could be taken care of by the Health Department with some regulations, would have to implement this as provided in here....

In the event, no one joined Clifford in voting for his killer amendment—which he announced would be offered during House floor debate—but which now lost by a vote of 6 to 1, only one Conservative Caucus (Republican) member joining five DFLers. The committee then recommended to the full committee that, unamended, H.F. 2801, pass.

Unmentioned until now, but of overriding significance in the context of those contemporaries and later scholars who claimed that that industry did not publicly oppose the bill, the press reported that, “[a] tobacco industry spokesman also voiced objection to the bill because of its intent to cut down smoking.” That 157 State of Minnesota, House of Representatives, Health Subcommittee of the Health and Welfare Committee: February 22, 1974, House File 2801 at 16 (unofficial transcript), Bates No. EXHIBBYB000482. § 3 of the bill did require the Board of Health to issue implementing rules.

159 Robert Milis, “Dr. Steinfeld Boosts Smoker Restriction Measure,” Post Bulletin (Rochester, MN), Feb. 25, 1974, Bates No. TIMN0461983. Thirty-five years later, Milis, who, after having been a reporter became a lawyer and represented Blue Cross in Minnesota litigation against the cigarette manufacturers, was no longer able to remember representative was Peter J. Lindberg, who spoke on behalf of the Northwest Tobacco and Candy Distributors Association, whose lawyer-lobbyist he had become after leaving the law office of Joseph Robbie, where, from 1964 to 1969 he had been an associate. Robbie, who was the head of the Minnesota Candy and Tobacco Distributors Association, had left most of that organization’s lobbying and other legal work to Lindberg in the second half of the 1960s after Robbie had moved from Minneapolis to Miami to form the Miami Dolphins National Football League team. After Lindberg’s non-amicable departure for another law firm and assumption of leadership of the competing Northwest Association, another lawyer in Robbie’s office, which by this time had largely shriveled to representing the tobacco distributors, took over this task, but when he left in 1974, Robbie may have been left with no one else to speak at the hearing, although he did return to Minnesota regularly. (In any event, he did not coordinate with Lindberg, to whom he had stopped speaking after the latter had left his employ with some of his distributor-members.) To be sure, whether Robbie appeared or not, he was primarily a behind-the-scenes operator, who may have been lobbying legislators in his own fashion. In the event, Robbie wanted,
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

According to Lindberg, he founded the Northwest group with some distributors who split off from Robbie’s group because of Robbie’s absenteeism. Telephone interview with Peter Lindberg, Eden Prairie, MN (Nov. 23, 2009). This account differs from but appears to be more accurate than that provided by Robbie’s (and the Minnesota Candy & Tobacco Distributors Association’s) long-time secretary, according to whom the Northwest group had existed before Lindberg’s departure and consisted of larger firms interested in price cutting; because the smaller firms in Robbie’s group had no such interest, a conflict arose. Telephone interview with Audrey Nessheim, Golden Valley, MN (Nov. 16, 2009).

161 Telephone interview with Peter Lindberg, Eden Prairie, MN (Nov. 23, 2009).

162 Telephone interview with Stephen Bergerson, Minneapolis (Nov. 16, 2009) (Robbie’s nephew, who rented space in Robbie’s law office after graduation from law
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

but was unable, to testify and asked (in vain) subcommittee chair Berg whether the subcommittee hearing could be “laid over,”

Nevertheless, and more generally, the secretary of the Minnesota Candy and Tobacco Distributors Association/Robbie’s office manager distinctly remembered 35 years later that the Tobacco Institute had helped with lobbying.

With a directness absent from any other witness’s testimony, Lindberg made it clear that the industry’s opposition was total and self-explanatory: “Obviously, we are opposed to this legislation. ... [A]s an industry, we are obviously opposed to [this] legislation. Then “setting aside the obvious economic problems to the industry,” Lindberg pointed to “an economic problem to the state as well. The tobacco tax brings in about $75 million...revenue to the state every year. This is something that could be upset by legislation affecting smoking, and its [sic] nothing to be scoffed at because it’s a major item in the state budget. And it’s an important situation.”

Lindberg was well versed in delivering such warnings: a decade earlier, at the outset of his lawyer-lobbying career on behalf of the Minnesota Candy and Tobacco Distributors Association, he had testified before another House Welfare subcommittee on a bill to label cigarette packages with warnings of possible health hazards as a means of combating the “catastrophe” that cigarette smoking had become. Then, too, his organization had opposed the bill because “it probably would hurt cigarette sales,” causing the state to lose some of its $30 million in annual tax revenue. (For good measure, back in 1965 Lindberg had thrown in the obfuscatory claim that labels would “‘have no serious bearing’” anyway since education at home was “‘the key to warning children about any health hazards.’”)

To the puzzlement of at least one subcommittee member and without further explanation, Lindberg also testified that 163

164
165
166
“constitutional questions” attended the bill in terms of discrimination regarding room size and the definition of “public place.”

Thirty-five years later Lindberg—who had been active in DFL politics and was appointed a state district court judge by the governor two months after he had testified—recalled that because MCIAA had been a “direct shot” at smoking tobacco, his member-distributors, who were “huge” enough to be able to get Philip Morris’s attention, had to testify. Indeed, he observed that it would have been “folly” for them not to do anything. Significantly, he also recalled that the “Tobacco Institute was involved” in 1974, adding that it could also have been engaged in other lobbying, for example, by telephone.

This proof that the tobacco industry was not only not inattentive and did not keep its counsel to itself, but openly testified against the MCIAA in 1974 squarely jibed with the recollections of Robin Derrickson who, as an employee of the Hennepin County Lung Association and ANSR activist, spent a great deal of time at the legislature attending committee meetings from 1973 to 1975. During these years she met three or four out-of-state tobacco lobbyists in hallways and elevators who often spoke to her; without a public presence, they were there to “hold the hands of” and “coach” restaurant and hotel representatives with regard to lobbying. Their opposition to the bill on the grounds that it was designed to cut down on smoking stuck in her memory as one of the statements that they had made to her.

The tobacco spokesperson’s objection was, to be sure, also interesting because it directly contradicted ANSR’s steadfast asseveration that it was “not in the business of convincing people to quit smoking,” but only to protect nonsmokers from secondhand smoke exposure. If in fact, as seems eminently plausible based on its repeated declarations that it sought to improve ventilation

---

169Telephone interview with Robin Derrickson, Prescott, AZ (Aug. 20, 2007). Without being able to recall names, Gene Rosenblum, a St. Paul lawyer and ANSR activist who had lobbied legislators on behalf of MCIAA, when informed that the dominant account was that the industry had been asleep, replied: “I don’t believe that.” He had known that tobacco lobbyists, including those representing cigarette sellers such as distributors and drug stores, were present. Telephone interview with Gene Rosenblum, St. Paul (Nov. 19, 2009).

in places where smokers did smoke, ANSR really did not aspire to reduce smoking, the cigarette companies nevertheless understood how the logic of the endgame would unfold, knowing that restricting the places and times their customers could smoke would inevitably reduce the number of cigarettes sold and smoked and eventually prompt many smokers to bend to social pressure. Significantly, in 1975, Stephen Bergerson, the head of the Minnesota Candy & Tobacco Distributors Association (the Joseph Robbie group that was the chief competitor of Lindberg’s), in an interview with a Tobacco Institute publication expressed the same view to which Lindberg had given voice and that was the cigarette oligopoly’s chief concern with MCIAA and all similar regulation—namely, that it was “inevitable that the law will force down tobacco sales.”

On March 15, the House Committee on Health and Welfare reported back H.F. 2801 with the same recommendation, but only with decisively weakening amendments. First, the committee radically narrowed the definition of a covered “public place” by specifying that it be “publicly owned” and then striking the reference to workplaces and all other individually identified places such as restaurants and retail stores, so that it now encompassed only “any publicly owned enclosed, indoor area used by the general public.” In accordance with this exclusion of privately owned public places, the committee then deleted “proprietors of public places” as authorized designators of smoking areas and as responsible for enforcing the law (thus leaving health boards and law enforcement as the sole agents for both actions and no one as subject to penalty for failing to enforce the nosmoking ban). The House adopted the committee report, including the re-referral to the Appropriations Committee, where the bill died.

What the Tobacco Institute Was Up To in the Meantime

In those days you were never really away from the tobacco lobbyists.

---

171See above ch. 23.

172“Stringent No-Smoke Law Failing?” TO 1(2):1, at 9 (Nov. 1976), Bates No. TI47350808/15.

173*Journal of the House of Representatives, State of Minnesota, Sixty-Eighth Session of the Legislature: 1974*, 4:6210 (Mar. 15); H.F. 2801 (first engrossment, Mar. 15, 1974) (copy furnished by MHS). In retrospect Brandt stated that he was glad that the bill with such amendments had died. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 23, 2009).

174Telephone interview with Lewis Cope, Minneapolis (Mar. 12, 2009). Cope, who had been a medicine/science reporter for the Minneapolis Tribune at the time MCIAA was Although it may be difficult to argue with success, tobacco industry lobbying in Minnesota in 1974 may not have been optimally effective. In his speech to the spring meeting of the Tobacco Institute in May, President Kornegay was unable to contain his contempt for what he pretended was nonsmokers’ newly invented make-believe complaints about breathing smoke: “A little over two years ago, few were offended or annoyed by cigarette smoke. Seldom did we hear of the nonsmoker’s allergies, or aggravated bronchitis or emphysema. ... Suddenly it seems, the nation is shaken by a frenzy of protest. Sixty percent of the country, it is said, is offended, annoyed, sickened and irritated by the cigarette smoking of the other forty percent. People with bronchial and asthmatic problems seem to be coming out of the woodwork, and cancer is alleged to threaten people who do not smoke.”

He scored the result as the filing in 1973 of 53 restrictive bills in 21 states, in which “[w]e lost in two states—Arizona and Oregon.” During the first four months of 1974, 90 such bills had surfaced in 30 states, and “[a]lready we have lost ground in four states” (including South Dakota and Nebraska, which enacted Arizona-like laws, and Arizona itself). Although “our resistance also seems to be effective in preventing passage of measures” to the extent that “we have not been routed, our losses are on the increase. And if the present trend continues unabated, we foresee more losses in more states.”

To his assembled bosses—except Philip Morris chairman Joseph F. Cullman, 3rd, to whom Kornegay wrote a fawning missive declaring that “all of us missed you very much...at the business sessions and on the golf course and tennis courts”—Kornegay bragged about the “massive legislative counter-attack” that the Tobacco Institute had mounted against this proposed legislation in 1974. He stressed, however, that they had both won and lost, “not on the merits of the case, but on the politics of the case.” By “politics” Kornegay meant that “[s]o many legislators, just like other people, really believe that smoking is harmful to the non-smoker. Our white paper and other literature giving the facts on the ‘other side’ are met, if not with scorn and ridicule, certainly with little credibility.”

---

177 Horace Kornegay to Joseph F. Cullman, 3rd (May 24, 1974), Bates No. 1002907063.

In a fleeting acknowledgment of reality, Kornegay admitted (part of) the reason for the cigarette industry’s lack of believability: “It is a simple fact that our public and political problems are only symptoms of the real malady—unchallenged research finding and unchallenged critics with advanced degrees who keep feeding the anti-smoking fires.” His response was to urge the cigarette oligopolists to buy some credentialed propaganda, that is, to “have available scientific experts to communicate with the community.”

The fact that ANSR’s bill died unceremoniously in 1974 may explain why Kornegay called no attention to Minnesota, but two weeks later, Martin Haley, in his aforementioned report to the Tobacco Institute, directed considerable criticism at lobbying in Minnesota, where it was “obvious that there are problems” largely on account of the existence of two distributors organizations, one run by lawyer Joe Robbie (Minnesota Candy and Tobacco Distributors Association with 20-30 percent of the business) and the other by Lindberg (Northwest Tobacco and Candy Distributors Association with 70-80 percent). From informants Haley had learned that even divided, “the industry is capable of being very effective on selected issues,” but that “the principal legislative work in Minnesota in the past four to six years has been carried by Lindberg in spite of and not because of any assistance that the Robbie group offered.” Although those same sources recommended that lobbyists there “should be more accountable to the industry” and the two entities should be unified, the “problem” became “more complicated” because Lindberg had been appointed to a (state district court) judgeship on May 1; consequently, unification would “perhaps” have to be effected under Lindberg’s (not yet named) successor. Haley’s sources nevertheless believed that even a local industry that was “geared up” would still have only a slight possibility of being effective enough to prohibit tax increases or achieve cuts. Three months later, on August 26, Haley told the first meeting

---

180 See above ch. 23.

181 Martin Ryan Haley & Associates, Inc., “A State Legislative Plan for the Tobacco Industry,” Appendix 13-15 (May 29, 1974), Bates No. 03682828/996-8. On Lindberg’s successor as lobbyist, James Erickson, see below this ch. Robbie had a high national profile in the tobacco industry, having been president of the Coordinating Board of Tobacco Trade Distributors. At the group’s mid-year meeting in Bermuda in September 1973, Robbie had argued that, with regard to “the zealous, unreasonable tax increase proponents and anti-smoking forces [w]e can no longer afford the luxury of being reactive when these bombs keep hitting us.... With the change in make-up of state legislatures, the day of the single lobbyist will soon be passe.... Each manufacturer should consider the state association executive as an extension of its own corporate office in that state.”
of the joint liaison committee of the Tobacco Institute and Tobacco Tax Council that “[a]s a bellweather state in the development of new legislation,” Minnesota was a “likely nominee for a strong anti-smoking drive.” The continued coexistence of the two distributors organizations prompted the committee to agree to “study developments closely.” The cigarette manufacturers, in other words, were acutely aware of the drive for and the correlative need to insure effective lobbying to thwart passage of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act.

Despite the deaths of the anti-public smoking bills in 1974, another development in Minnesota caused TI “serious distress.” In October, John Christopher Blucher Ehringhaus, Jr., the TI’s general counsel (and son of a like-named Depression-era North Carolina governor who had ties to the tobacco corporations), expressed this “distress” in a telephone call to Robbie about the first statewide no-smoking “D-Day,” which had been held on October 7. Although it may be surprising that a successful and politically well-connected millionaire businessman like Robbie, who was chairman of the CBTTA and owner of the Miami Dolphins football team, lacked the acumen to anticipate that the cigarette oligopoly would not abide any company’s or industry’s actively discouraging the purchase of its commodities, once TI spelled out the source of its ire to Robbie, he quickly informed the members of the MCTDA that Ehringhaus had been particularly concerned that the Minnesota Bankers Association helped sponsor this anti-smoking campaign. Twin City Federal Savings and Loan Association in Minneapolis even ran an advertisement suggesting that smokers refrain from smoking and deposit the money in their savings account. This is a boorish ad using the anti-smoking campaign for crass commercial purposes.

The Northwestern National Bank and First National Bank of Minneapolis were among the main sponsors of this anti-smoking campaign.

It is my suggestion that each of you send me the name of the bank where you do business. I will prepare a resolution and send a copy of it to each bank plus the Minnesota Bankers Association.

It would seem to me that the bankers have as little reason to attempt to damage the business of their tobacco clients as they would to attempt to restore the Volstead Act to bring back Prohibition.

It will also help if any of you wish to mention to your own bankers that the Bankers Association is fighting your business.

The D-Day that gave rise to this conflict was devised by Lynn R. Smith, the publisher of the Monticello Times, who at the end of 1972 published a full-page editorial in his paper, “The Tyranny of Smoking,” a manifesto that opened with this post-proletarian appeal: “Non-smokers of the world, unite. You have nothing to lose but your oppression.” Apparently overlooking the millions of children among the nonsmokers who had “long suffered in silence the stings of outrageousness by smokers,” Smith conceded that nonsmokers had “never questioned the right of consenting adults to pollute the air in the privacy of their homes,” but identified “smoking in confined public areas [a]s a different matter.” Bluntly he proclaimed: “Our interest in the entire thing is one of selfishness. The more smokers that swear off, the better off we ourselves will be.” An accomplished publicist, Smith sent off a copy of his editorial to the cigarette oligopolists’ PR agents, inviting them to submit comments that he would publish in his newspaper. His gambit provoked TI to issue a two-page scatter-shot response to his “sermon.”

---

188 Joseph Robbie (exec. dir. Minnesota Candy & Tobacco Distributors Association, Inc.) to MCTDA members (Oct. 24, 1974), Bates No. TIMN0461875. The memo was excerpted in TIN #110, Nov. 11, 1974 at 3, Bates No. 950307814/6.
190 Lynn Smith to Brown & Williamson Public Relations Dept. (Jan. 9, 1973), Bates No. 690018123.
Smith was not content to issue a manifesto. A year later, on January 7, 1974, he organized D-Day, to persuade all the smokers among the 1,700 residents of Monticello (about 40 miles from Minneapolis) to pledge not to smoke that day. Smith published the names of 253 smokers who pledged not to smoke that day and later estimated that 70 to 80 percent of them did in fact quit for the day. The widespread publicity that the event generated caught the attention of the American Cancer Society and other groups, which then organized a statewide Minnesota D-Day on October 7, 1974, which they labeled “the broadest assault on smoking in a single state in the history of the U. S.” The governor signed a proclamation declaring October 7 D-Day, numerous mayors endorsed the campaign, and supervisors in several departments at Minnesota Mutual Life Insurance Company in St. Paul banned smoking for the day. More than 475 businesses with 140,000 employees participated and a total of 400,000 pledge cards were distributed. A spot check by one newspaper at eight stores found that cigarette sales had fallen by 20 percent. Even the Tobacco Institute Newsletter was constrained to admit that the Associated Press had reported that Don’t Smoke Day had been “successful.” Internally, a Lorillard sales manager in Minnesota tried to put the best face on the mass attack on his and their livelihoods by informing corporate higher-ups that: “All reports received indicate that the D-Day activity was ineffective in that it did receive a great deal of publicity for that one day, but the following day it was business as usual. Retailers reported that the sale of cigarettes was lower that day but the volume returned the following day....” Even this apostle of good news was constrained to bring up “one effect...that may result...that could be damaging to us and the industry as a whole”—namely, “talk that this could be a quarterly event or, at the very least, an annual happening. It could also spread to other states and eventually turn into a national program.” 199 In fact, D-Day did become an annual statewide event (that Robbie’s Minnesota Candy & Tobacco Distributors Association continued to monitor for the Tobacco Institute)200 and then in 1977 the American Cancer Society’s nationwide Great American Smokeout.201

198 TIN, #109, Oct. 29, 1974, at 6, Bates No. 950307818

2294

That the cigarette manufacturers in general and Ehringhaus in particular were chastened by the Minnesota D-Day was underscored at a TI executive committee meeting on April 11, 1975, at which the organization’s officials reported to the companies’ top brass on yet another (hopeless) ad campaign to achieve the twin objectives of, as President Kornegay put it, taking the “first step on the road back to justifiable credibility for this country’s oldest industry and its principal spokesman in public affairs, The Institute” and “stop[ping] the rapidly growing nationwide movement to limit the opportunities for enjoyment of tobacco products, and to diminish the social acceptability of the use of tobacco.” For the time being, however, the Tobacco Institute’s goal was much more exploratory and preliminary—namely, discovering whether it had “the capacity to develop a more reasonable climate” and “the means to stop the continuing erosion in public opinion which is the fertile field from which so many of the unjust legislative weeds and other tribulations are growing.”202 As millions of people were finally beginning to demand protection from what they perceived to be the poisonous smoke that consumers of billions of cigarettes were spewing at them, the transparently obfuscatory ad text on which the TI was betting the alleged restoration of its masters’ and its own alleged credibility opened with: “The Way Some People talk, eat, drink, smoke, snore, stare, dress, push, whistle, sing, kiss is annoying. We need more courtesy.”203 James J. Morgan, Philip Morris’s marketing guru and later its CEO and president, wrote on the cover letter 200Audrey Nessheim (MCTDA secretary) to Nancy Parrish (TI) (Oct. 16, 1975), Bates No. TIMN0461910.

201http://www.cancer.org/docroot/subsite/greatamericans/content/History_of_Smokeout.aspx
202Statements of Horace R. Kornegay, President, and J.C.B. Ehringhaus and William Kloepfer, Senior Vice Presidents, of the Tobacco Institute, to the Institute Executive Committee, April 11, 1975, at 1-3, Bates No. LG0432811/2/3.
203Statements of Horace R. Kornegay, President, and J.C.B. Ehringhaus and William Kloepfer, Senior Vice Presidents, of the Tobacco Institute, to the Institute Executive Committee, April 11, 1975, at 9, Bates No. LG0432811/20.
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

accompanying a copy of the text: “THIS IS BAD, BAD, BAD (and dumb!).”

In case any of the cigarette company executives missed the obvious, TI Executive Vice President Kloepfer pointed out: “We have stayed completely clear of the nonsmoker health issue, deliberately choosing, as a laymen’s organization, not to make our first outing interpretable as non expert propaganda, regardless of our high level of expertise.” Among the 10 communities in which TI planned to publish these newspapers ads, in Vice President Ehringhaus’s words, “to invade the mind of the public, so to speak,” was “Minneapolis-St. Paul, where anti-cigarette sentiment was especially cultivated last year with a so-far somewhat unique ‘D-Day’, for Don’t-Smoke Day, civic observance, in which all too many local businesses and institutions took part. The presence there of one of our more public-spirited distributors, Joe Robbie, is also a factor in the choice.”

Enactment of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act in 1975

In the last analysis, the clean indoor air legislation can achieve its goal by securing the voluntary cooperation of at least the more considerate smokers, because there is no way the state of Minnesota can hire enough policemen to enforce the law effectively if smokers as a whole remain adamantly hostile. But the law at least ensures that the problem will be discussed and acted upon—not simply ignored, as was so long the case.

“We get discouraged thinking people are still doing this (smoking where they shouldn’t) despite the law. But travel to other states and you’ll see.... It’s heaven here. Even if you have to point out the law, you can. We have a utopia.”

In the aftermath of the failure in 1974 even to move MCIAA to the floor of either house—the Kahn bill died at the last committee meeting for lack of a 204Alexander Holtzman to J. T. Landry (Apr. 15, 1975), Bates No. 1005110506 (cc: J. Morgan and handwriting initialed “JJM”).

205Statements of Horace R. Kornegay, President, and J.C.B. Ehringhaus and William Kloepfer, Senior Vice Presidents, of the Tobacco Institute, to the Institute Executive Committee, April 11, 1975, at 10-11, Bates No. LG0432811/21-22.

206Statements of Horace R. Kornegay, President, and J.C.B. Ehringhaus and William Kloepfer, Senior Vice Presidents, of the Tobacco Institute, to the Institute Executive Committee, April 11, 1975, at 11-12, Bates No. LG0432811/22-23.

The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

quorum—ANSR decided to execute a tactical retreat for the next effort in 1975. (The Tobacco Institute had already reported in mid-March 1974 that the legislature’s failure to act on the “smoking segregation bill” meant that it had been killed for the session, but “[l]ocal observers expect reintroduction next year.”) As Beverly Schwartz of the Ramsey County Lung Association explained: “The restaurant owners, through their association, absolutely smashed the clean indoor bill the last time, so the next time, we’re taking restaurants out of the proposed legislation…. We don’t want to do that, but we figure that’s the only way we can get a bill passed.” Despite the fact that ANSR received more complaints about smoking in restaurants, which were “‘definitely the problem area,’” than in any other public place, Brandt omitted them from his draft of the 1975 bill based on “input” from or, “more accurately,” as a “concession” to Chum Bohr, the restaurants’ lobbyist, who was “the only staunch opponent” and had “attended ANSR meetings.” Brandt’s “strategy was to pass a bill which I thought could pass and then return to fighting for inclusion of restaurants later.”

As far as supermarkets were concerned, Schwartz pointed out that they were also “tough to crack”: one chain, for example, even had “ash trays in all the aisles.” Hospital administrators may not have been as “adamant” as restaurant owners—and for that reason presumably were not marked for exclusion from the 1975 version of MCIAA—but Brandt was flabbergasted by their lack of vigilance: “They put nonsmoking patients in the same room with smokers. They allow visitors to smoke in rooms and in lounges. They allow doctors and nurses to smoke in rooms....” (Even when the House of Delegates of the Minnesota State Medical Association in mid-1974 voted unanimously for a resolution urging hospitals to prohibit visitors and staff from smoking and expressly cited studies showing harm to nonsmokers from exposure to tobacco smoke, it excepted designated areas and patients who had their doctors’ approval.) On the other

---

209 Anonymous untitled undated handwritten draft of [Ed Brandt], “Highlights of the Early Years: ANSR, 1973-76” at 1 (Nov. 6, 1993) (notes that Brandt made for a talk he gave) (copy furnished by Ed Brandt).

213 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 18, 2009).

215 Lewis Cope, “Hospitals Urged to Ban Smoking, Sale of Tobacco,” MT, May 18, 1974 (16:2-3). The Medical Association also called on hospitals to stop the sale of hand, the results of a questionnaire that Brandt had sent to about 275 candidates during the run-up to the November legislative elections made him much more optimistic about the prospects of securing many more votes in 1975: almost 99 percent of respondents (half of whom were elected) replied that they would favor a clean indoor air law.\footnote{Bob Protzman, “Group Lights Up Attack on Smoke,” \textit{St. Paul Dispatch}, Nov. 27, 1974 (17, 18), Bates No. TIMN0462231/2. The poor quality of the scan makes it uncertain whether the number of respondents to Brandt’s survey was 190 or 100. See also “Legislators State Views of Non-Smokers’ Rights,” \textit{ANSR} 2(4):1-6 (Oct. 1974) (listing 88 candidates who answered, “Yes, I support legislation to protect the non-smoker’s right to breathe smoke-free air”). Later ANSR stated that 44 candidates of the approximately 100 who responded favorably were elected. “Time to Start Thinking Legislation,” \textit{ANSR} 2(5):n.p. [2] (Dec. 1974).}

\textit{Preliminary Battles over Smoking Inside the House Itself}

The legislative prelude to consideration of the 1975 version of MCIAA was the skirmish that Kahn initiated on January 3 when she tangled with the powerful DFL House Speaker, chain-smoking Martin Sabo, in proposing that the Rules and Procedures Subcommittee of the House Rules and Legislative Administration Committee change the House rules to ban smoking altogether in the House chamber, visitors’ section of the galleries, and House committee rooms—which the then assistant health commissioner Dr. Ellen Fifer likened to “smoke-filled tobacco as an implicit promotion of smoking. Cope spotted only five physicians smoking (pipes) among the 104 delegates during the three-hour meeting. As early as 1967, the Council of the Minnesota State Medical Association endorsed a resolution of its Pulmonary Diseases Committee going on record as being opposed to smoking in hospitals except in areas designated by the hospital administrator. “Resolution on Smoking in Hospitals,” \textit{CA: A Cancer Journal for Clinicians} 18(2):111 (Mar.-Apr. 1968). As late as 1986, ANSR reported that at one brand new hospital “[s]ome physicians have taken the stance that they will not interfere with their patients’s smoking and have routinely written the order to allow their patients to smoke in their rooms, often while recuperating from smoking-related illnesses.” In contrast, the chief of staff at another hospital planning to phase in a total smoking ban by Jan. 1, 1987 replied to those wondering what would become of nicotine addicted patients: “‘We don’t provide alcoholics with alcohol to support their addiction in the hospital. We offer them support and counseling about detoxification. The same rationale is appropriate for tobacco.’” “Hospitals Diagnose Indoor Air Problem,” \textit{ANSR}, Spring 1986, at 4. On the statutory amendment that banned smoking in hospitals, see below this ch.
incinerators”—and halls. Much as would be the case in MCIAA as enacted, under Kahn’s proposal, smoking would, in striking concessions, still have been permitted in private enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers as well as in a designated area of committee rooms, because “[p]eople seem to have nicotine fits at the thought of committee meetings without smoking.” When Kahn offered her proposal, “Sabo pointedly lighted a cigarette and began smoking.” In a prickly confrontation—journalistically captured in the headline, “She Huffs, He Puffs,” which riveted popular attention at the time and remained etched in anti-smokers’ memories more than three decades later—Kahn told Sabo while 217 Telephone interview with Ellen Fifer Green, Minneapolis (Mar. 28, 2009).

218 Two decades later the Minnesota Department of Health still “recognize[d] that it cannot eliminate smoking in an individual’s private office because of Minnesota Statutes, section 144.413, subdivision 2, even if it gives rise to complaints from people in adjacent nonsmoking areas. Only the proprietor of a public place of workplace may eliminate smoking in these areas.” A separate ventilation system would have “[i]deally” alleviated the problem of “smoke spillage” into adjacent areas, but here, too, the statute prohibited the Department from requiring such a system. The most that it was able to propose was a rule requiring that the door to a private enclosed office remain closed while smoking was occurring, which “may help minimize smoke in adjacent areas.” State of Minnesota, Minnesota Department of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Rules of the Minnesota Department of Health Relating to the Clean Indoor Air Act, Minnesota Rules, parts 4620.0050 to 4620.1500 (Mar. 24, 1994), at 18-19 (copy furnished by MDH).
219 Kahn’s two rules read as follows:

IV. Pertaining to health and comfort of members of the House, Employees, and the public.
No smoking in Chamber. No member of the House of Representatives or officer of the House, or other person, shall be permitted to smoke in the House Chamber. There shall be no smoking in the visitors’ section of the galleries.
No smoking in House committee rooms or offices or hallways. Smoking shall be prohibited in committee rooms and halls of the area of the State Capitol complex under the control of the House of Representatives or its employees or officers, but excluding private enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers. In addition, by motion and affirmative vote of any committee of the House, a designated smoking area not greater than one half of the room may be allowed during meetings of that committee.

221 E.g., telephone interview with Ed Brandt, St. Paul (Apr. 26, 2007). A legislator
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

he “was exhaling cigarette smoke with a broad grin on his face” that “she would go along with allowing smoking at the speaker’s podium ‘if that should be necessary.’”222 During the remainder of the discussion, astringently recorded in the official committee minutes, House Minority Leader Henry Savelkoul moved that the subcommittee “incorporate a provision to prevent smoking in the House Chamber,”223 but Bernard Brinkman (DFL), owner of a truck stop cum diner/liquor store,224 spoke against it. A motion to amend Savelkoul’s motion was offered by high school teacher Bruce Vento (DFL) to divide the House chamber into smoking and nonsmoking sections, prompting Savelkoul to withdraw his motion and move that the subcommittee consider certain sections of the chamber as smoking and nonsmoking areas—a motion that carried and concluded the discussion.225

Three days later Kahn’s proposed ban was rebuffed when the House Rules Committee did not even vote on it because of the obvious lack of a majority, and instead decided, after Sabo had expressed willingness to consider dividing smokers and nonsmokers in assigning seats in order to deal with “the problem smoking causes some people,” to examine the possibility of creating smoking and nonsmoking sections in the chambers. This “compromise” was suggested by 222Betty Wilson, “Legislative Smoking: She Huffs, He Puffs,” Minneapolis Star, Jan. 4, 1975 (1) (copy of clipping provided by ANSR). Rather lamely, Sabo later insisted that he had puffed to distract attention from Republicans. Telephone interview with Martin Sabo, Arlington, VA (May 14, 2007).

---

224Email from Ted Suss to Marc Linder (Mar. 3, 2009). Suss, a cosponsor of H.F. 79 and “a very good friend” of Brinkman at the time, interpreted Brinkman’s votes against H.F. 79 both when the House initially passed it and when it was returned from the Senate as those of “hard core small business.”

225Committee on Rules and Legislative Administration Subcommittee on Rules and Procedures, [Minutes] at 1-1 (Jan. 3, 1975) (copy furnished by Robbie LaFleur, Director, Minnesota Legislative Reference Library). Brinkman was not a member of the subcommittee, although he was a member of the full committee.
DFL member Bruce Vento who said, while “brushing away the clouded air rushing from the end” of Sabo’s cigarette, that “he can tolerate his puffing colleagues.” Indeed, Vento’s tolerance went so far that he opposed a ban on the grounds that it “would drive smokers out of the chambers at important times during deliberations and that such an exodus ‘wouldn’t reflect well on us.’” Vento’s advice—“If smoke bothers you, then don’t sit next to someone who smokes”—was refuted by Republican (and future governor) Arne Carlson, who pointed out that it was “impossible” to prevent the smoke from wafting from one section to another: “There are times when you can look up at the ceiling and see a haze. ... If you brought a pollution meter in there, we’d have to close the House down on certain days because of a pollution alert.” In crafting a rule implementing MCIAA later that year that certified a location within a covered public place as an “acceptable smoke-free area” if it was merely separated from a smoking-permitted area by four feet, the Health Department would be sorely in need of being reminded of this law of physics.) In contrast, Savelkoul apparently saw smoking, along with members’ reading newspapers and leaving their seats more as detracting from “decorum.” In addition to rejecting Kahn’s main proposal, her colleagues also defeated her proposed ban on smoking in hallways and offices. The Minneapolis Tribune editorially welcomed as “better than nothing” the committee’s nod in the direction of a nonsmoking section, which was a concession on the part of the House’s smoking majority.

ANSR was disgusted by smoking legislators’ selfish rigidity. One of its senior members, Beverly Schwartz, published a blunt letter in the St. Paul Pioneer Press—a newspaper overflowing with large cigarette ads—in which she proceeded from the proposition that the rights of smokers to smoke and of nonsmokers to “breathe the freshest air possible...obviously conflict at times” to 230 “The House’s Example on Smoking,” MT, Jan. 8, 1975 (4A:1-2) (edit.) The next day the newspaper confessed error for having claimed that a majority of Americans were smokers as well. “Smokers No Majority,” MT, Jan. 9, 1975 (6A:2). Later Brandt doubted that a majority of House members had smoked, though he conceded that perhaps a majority of the committee had. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 23, 2009).

charge that: “House Speaker Sabo...and the rest of the ‘can’t live without it’ smokers refuse to even consider common courtesy or the rights of their co-workers. If they can’t be considerate to people they know, then I am inclined to feel sorry for the ‘common’ people of the state who don’t even have personal contact with their state representatives.”

Anti-smokers, however, did not acquiesce in their defeat at the hands of the Rules Committee. On January 20—later on the same day after Kahn had introduced the new MCIAA—in the course of consideration of the rules for the session by the full House a smoking rule was debated. Kahn (and fellow DFL James Rice) moved to add this new rule: “No member of the House of Representatives or officer of the House, or other person, shall be permitted to smoke in the House Chamber except in designated smoking areas, confined only to the front desk and the legislative retiring room. There shall be no smoking in the visitors’ section of the galleries.” Before a roll call vote could take place, John Tomlinson, a DFL who worked as a chemical engineer at 3M Company, moved to amend Kahn’s proposed rule by including in the designated smoking areas sections 1, 2, and 6 and all of section 5 except the last three rows. After the House, by a vote of 77 to 53, had defeated what the press called an effort to create smoking and nonsmoking sections on the House floor, it also rejected Republican Maurice McCauley’s amendment to designate the last rows in each section of the House Chambers as smoking areas. Then William Kelly (DFL), not “see[ing] why any area of the chambers should be excluded,” moved to amend Kahn’s amendment to exclude the Speaker’s area from the designated smoking area. Kahn sought to defend her exclusion on the grounds that

---

233 http://www.leg.state.mn.us/legdb/fulldetail.asp?ID=10668
238 Journal of the House of Representatives, Sixty-Ninth Session of the Legislature, State of Minnesota: 1975, at 107 (Jan. 20, 1975). In addition to the Speaker’s area, the front desk included the chief clerk and deputy chief clerk. Email from Ed Brandt to Marc smoking at the speaker’s desk “would be less offensive to the sensibilities” of nonsmokers than smoking elsewhere: “You will notice...that smoke from the speaker rises directly over his head into the ventilation system.” This specious argument quickly prompted Kelly, a high school teacher, to produce a brochure that Kahn herself had distributed and to read off the names of potentially harmful chemical compounds contained in cigarette smoke: “If the other officers at the desk are allowed to smoke, these noxious compounds will go directly by the speaker on their way to the ventilating system and he would be disabled in a short period of time.”

Neither Kahn’s curious reply—that she saw “nothing wrong with justice tempered by mercy”—nor her No vote was of any avail: Kelly’s amendment passed on a vote of 89 to 34. On the final House vote of 86 to 42 in favor of Kahn’s motion as amended by Kelly’s only 67 percent of DFLers voted Yea compared to 70 percent of Republicans. The DFL’s two-thirds vote represented the lowest degree of party cohesion on any rules vote during the session. “Once the solidarity of voting with the majority on the rules had been broken,” as Brandt later pointed out, and especially after the “She Huffs, He Puffs” headline, which, by Sabo’s own account, generated “more mail than he had ever received on any other issue, including hot-button issues such as abortion, he was in no position to try to force the caucus to support him.”

---

239 “Rep. Sabo Smoked Out as House Passes Ban,” Minneapolis Star, Jan. 21, 1975 (6E:3). Brandt did not know whether Kahn’s exclusion was meant as a quid pro quo for Sabo’s sponsorship of the 1975 MCIAA, but intuited that: “At a minimum, she wasn’t taking any chances of losing support.” The difference between Kahn and Kelly was not that the latter was a stricter opponent of smoking, but that “she was wooing votes, while he wasn’t.” Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Feb. 23, 2009).

243 Edward Brandt, “Legislative Voting Behavior in Minnesota,” in Perspectives on Minnesota Government and Politics 202-22 at 211 (Millard Gieske and Edward Brandt ed. 1977). Brandt’s study, which covered only the first 30 days of the session (during which most if not all of the rules votes presumably took place), did not identify the rules votes, but the lowest degree of cohesion was 67 percent and only one vote achieved it.

244 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (Mar. 4, 2009).
The Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act of 1975

Kahn then alone moved to amend the rules to prohibit smoking “in committee rooms and working areas of the part of the State Capitol complex under the control of the House...or its employees or officers, but excluding private enclosed offices occupied exclusively by smokers. In addition, by motion and affirmative vote of any committee of the House, a designated smoking area not greater than one-half of the room may be allowed during meetings of that committee.” Apparently even this modest default rule, which could have been overridden by majority vote of any committee, was too extreme even for most supporters of Kahn’s less-indiscriminate-smoking-in-the-chamber rule: by a vote of 94 to 33 the House voted to refer it to the Rules Committee for further study.\footnote{245}

Phyllis Kahn Introduces H.F. 79

The next iteration of the Minnesota Clean Indoor Air Act (H.F. 79) was introduced by Kahn and four others on January 20,\footnote{246} one week after Governor Wendell Anderson had proclaimed January 11-17 National Education Week on Smoking\footnote{247} and Kahn and Schaaf, flanked by a British poster (“Is it fair to force your baby to smoke cigarettes?”) discouraging pregnant women from smoking, held a press conference to announce that they were sponsoring another bill to regulate smoking in public places.\footnote{248} The proclamation, which ANSR itself had developed,\footnote{249} stressed that “sidestream smoke inhaled by the non-smoker is higher in noxious compounds than the mainstream smoke inhaled by the smokers...”\footnote{250}
That two of Kahn’s cosponsors were House Speaker Martin Sabo and Republican Minority Leader Henry Savelkoul enhanced, at least in the judgment of ANSR Chairman Brandt, the bill’s prospects of passage.251 “The public,” according to Kahn, responded with outrage” to Sabo’s behavior: “Sabo’s secretary called to ask Phyllis to drop the clean air issue because of the nasty letters Sabo was receiving. The upshot was that Sabo ended up signing onto the bill as co-author. ... ‘It was very helpful to have a chain smoker supporting the bill.’”252 Brandt’s view that the “unprecedented amount of mail” that Sabo received on account of the “She Huffs, He Puffs” publicity had prompted Sabo to “decide[ ] that it was politically wise to co-sponsor the bill”253 appears considerably more plausible than Sabo’s after-the-fact insistence that he had supported Kahn’s bill in order to stave off passage of the kind of total statewide ban that the legislature enacted in 2007.254 Savelkoul, who noted that his cosponsorship would not have influenced any Republican votes because the bill “was not a caucus issue,” explained his position and involvement as a “basic philosophical thing” in the sense that “I believed basically other people have no right to interfere with the air we’re consuming.” His attitude was in part molded by the incidents that “we all had” of having had tobacco smoke blown in his face.255

The backgrounds of the two other cosponsors, both young members of the large class of DFL House members elected at the post-Watergate elections in November 1974, shed interesting light on supporters’ variegated composition. Burnham (Bud) Philbrook, a 28-year old who had lost two previous elections in non-smokers’ Bill of Rights...was passed by Congress on Jan. 11, 1974.” On the non-congressional signing ceremony in Philadelphia, see below ch. 25.

251 Ed Brandt, “Kahn-Schaaf Bill Protects Right to Smoke-Free Air,” ANSR 2(6):2 (Feb. 1975). In contrast, Bud Philbrook, one of the sponsors, took the position that since the smoking bill was not the kind of legislation that would have prompted a leader to impose party discipline, Sabo’s and Savelkoul’s sponsorship did not signify that passage was a foregone conclusion. Telephone interview with Bud Philbrook, St. Paul (Mar. 1, 2009). A news article stating that Sabo’s decision to co-author the bill was “said” to have enhanced the prospects of passage may have been an unattributed reference to Brandt.

253 Email from Ed Brandt to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007).

