Cummings, to whom Fred Miller—the former owner of a voluntarily no-smoking pizza franchise and well-respected businessman who played an important part in persuading other business owners that a ban would in no way hurt their businesses—assigned 90 percent of the credit for securing business owners’ support, was evidently driven to a statist solution by his recognition of the otherwise intractable problem of collective action. As described by Miller:

My involvement started with a call from Bob asking advice on how to reach business owners to recruit their support. This was a strange event for both of us in that we tend to be right of center when considering government’s role. We both came to the conclusion that (1) it was a serious issue that could not be solved by any approach other than regulation, (2) the overall enhancement of our citizens’ lives could be substantial and (3) the favorable response by the non-smoking public would be more beneficial to the business owners than the risk of losing the support of the smoking folks.

The 100-percent consensus that was reached among owners was possible, according to Cummings, because it was designed to last only until the ordinance was tested in court: although Cummings later denied that he or anyone else had planned to test it, owners had known that it would and “had to be tested.” If 206Richard Lewis, “Restaurant, Bar Owners Pitch Ban Compromise,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 9, 2000 (A1:6). According to Fred Miller, Cummings had owned and/or founded five “different restaurant concepts in Ames,” one of which, O’Malley & McGee’s, had, a few years earlier, been the first to go all no-smoking. Email from Fred Miller to Marc Linder (Nov. 1, 2008).

---

209Telephone interview with Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008). Miller explained owners’ attitudes as based on their intimate knowledge of the customers they risked losing and their misjudgment that potential gains would not be sufficient to overcome that loss. Email from Fred Miller to Marc Linder (Nov. 2, 2008).

210Email from Fred Miller to Marc Linder (Nov. 1, 2008).

211Telephone interview with Bob Cummings, Ames (Oct. 2, 2008). In contrast, his co-owners received legal advice that it was very likely that the ordinance would not survive a judicial challenge, then ridding themselves of the threat of a ban by securing its adoption and getting it before a court as expeditiously as possible may have been a rational strategy even for owners opposed to governmentally imposed restrictions on smoking in their businesses.

In contrast, on the anti-smoking side the obvious question was: what possible advantage could the ATTF see in agreeing to the compromise? Initially the group’s reaction was “lukewarm” because the proposal failed to achieve what had, after all, been the driving goal behind the whole movement—the complete elimination of smoking (and smoke) in restaurants. As Linda Muston, vice president of community services at Mary Greeley Medical Center and a leading ATTF member, observed: “‘Just stopping at 8:30 [p.m.] does not remove the smoke.’” Belitsos, the key figure in the group, agreed, but nevertheless added that “he may support it because it eliminated smoking in bars at least during certain times.” In the event, the two sides were to meet November 8 to discuss the proposal, which was “the first attempt at compromise of any sort” since the last round had ended in failure in early October.\footnote{212}

The kind of pressure to which the ATTF would soon be subjected was previewed on November 7, when Cathy Callaway, the first director of the Division of Tobacco Use Prevention and Control of the Iowa Public Health Department, animated by the ATTF,\footnote{213} emailed very high profile members of the anti-smoking movement in California to solicit their views of the proposed compromise:

Is it better to compromise or stand your ground and not get anything when it comes to the clean indoor air ordinance? Ames apparently has a compromise on the table and I think you have talked to this guy, Stan. His name is Bob Cummings and he appears to be leading this compromise charge. His compromise involves smoke-free places until 8:30 p.m. and only for businesses with 10% or more of their income from food. They are trying to decide whether or not to allow Bob to present at the Tobacco Task Force meeting where press will be present tomorrow. Any thoughts?\footnote{214}

\footnote{212}Richard Lewis, “Restaurant, Bar Owners Draft Compromise,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), Nov. 8, 2001 (B1:2-5, B8:5-6).

\footnote{213}Telephone interview with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 8, 2008).

\footnote{214}Email from Cathy Callaway to Elva [Yanez] and Stan [Glantz] (Nov. 7, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston).
Stanton Glantz, a (non-physician) professor of medicine at the University of California at San Francisco and phenomenally productive anti-tobacco researcher, whose prodigious outpouring of articles, based in large part on the millions of documents that cigarette companies had been judicially compelled to produce (and that Glantz himself had played a crucial role in making public), and personal activism had contributed signal to the proliferation of understanding of the dangers of secondhand smoke exposure and the passage of anti-smoking ordinances and statutes, especially in California but also nationally, replied tersely within a few minutes: “This doesn’t sound like a good idea to me. These ‘time’ compromises are very hard to make work, provide appropriate signage, remove ash trays, etc.”\textsuperscript{215} Glantz’s brief comment was remarkable both for confining its criticism to the proposal’s empirical details, thus seeming to imply that with heroic efforts this clumsy and partial ban (of smoking, but not of residual off-gassed smoke)\textsuperscript{216} might be enforcibly protective, and for eschewing a broad-based principled rejection. In contrast, the reply from Elva Yanez, the associate director of Americans for Nonsmokers’ Rights in Berkeley (which Glantz had also been instrumental in developing), a leading anti-smoking lobbying organization that specialized in promoting the adoption of local no-smoking ordinances, was absolutist and instructional, leaving no doubt whatsoever that nothing was better than this feckless compromise:

From ANR’s standpoint, it is always better to stand your ground and get nothing than to compromise and get something ineffective or worse, a tobacco industry promoted alternative such as red light green light or incentives for smokefree policies.

The compromise you outline sounds like Duluth’s ordinance, which brings us back to the idea of why its [sic] not a good idea to share other existing ordinances with your council. The folks in Duluth were quite disappointed with this compromise.

The folks in Ames should stand firm for a good policy. We’d like the [sic] see the draft language so we could better comment on how effective the original draft was. It would be better to stop the process and go back and organize a strong grassroots campaign than to end up with something bad since this would impact all other cities in Iowa for years to come. We recommend that they not introduce this compromise. I’d also recommend that ANR come out and do a policy training as soon as possible.\textsuperscript{217}

\textsuperscript{215}Email from Stan Glantz to Cathy Callaway and Elva Yanez (Nov. 7, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston).

\textsuperscript{216}For an early scientific finding of “some evidence of off gassing” of tobacco smoke vapors from the clothes of smokers or from the porous fabric on the divider walls,” see William Vaughan and S. Hammond, “Impact of ‘Designated Smoking Area’ Policy on Nicotine Vapor and Particle Concentrations in a Modern Office Building,” \textit{Journal of Air Waste Management Association} 40:1012-17 at 1015 (1990), Bates No. 2505613460/3.

\textsuperscript{217}Email from Elva Yanez to Cathy Callaway and Stan Glantz (Nov. 7, 2000) (copy
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

ATTFT had in fact been aware of events in Duluth because many of its members “were keeping abreast of various components of the process,” for example, by monitoring news media to keep track of local ordinances elsewhere; especially pertinent material was forwarded to Belitsos, who then circulated it within the group. Significantly, although the ordinance that the Duluth city council had passed on June 12, 2000, also included a provision permitting smoking in restaurants with alcoholic beverage licenses between 8:00 p.m. and 1:00 a.m. if minors under 18 were excluded from the premises during those hours, Glantz, who studied the battle in Duluth as it was unfolding and later published an analysis of it, focused not on the exposure via off-gassing, but especially faulted proponents of the ban for two “tactical errors”: (1) “fram[ing] the ordinance as a children’s health issue” rather than as a workplace health and safety issue led to restaurants’ being classified according to customers’ ages, which “in turn, led directly to the provisions relating to patron age and time of day, which made it virtually impossible to enforce the ordinance” “because [they] allowed smoking even when ‘no smoking’ signs were prominently displayed”; and (2) being “unwilling to use existing research showing that smoke-free ordinances did not affect business revenues” lest “any adverse economic events” that took place after the ordinance went into effect “would be attributed to them” “cost” members of the anti-smoking coalition “the opportunity to establish themselves as credible critics of the tobacco industry’s economic arguments.”

Yet, as Kitchell stressed years later:

I don’t think that Glantz’ criticisms applied to us. Herman Quirmbach is a member of the ISU faculty in economics. He had the Econ department chair present a comprehensive review of the literature regarding the economic impact of tobacco ordinances. From the very beginning, this information was presented in various public venues and media. Also, from the very beginning, we focused on a number of constituencies that were affected by second hand smoke. We did include children, but we included studies about all age groups. One area that we particularly focused on were the employees of establishments that allowed smoking. I presented studies about the health of employees and also cited local examples. As the director of the Ames Free Medical Clinic, I had seen numerous bar and restaurant employees who came to our clinic with regularity. That is why I became so passionately involved. Our message about both these topics was very clear and consistent.

Moreover, whereas the tobacco companies poured enormous resources into fighting a strict ban in Duluth, the reason for ATTF’s agreement to the weak

---

221 Email from Mary Kitchell to Marc Linder (Oct. 12, 2008). Another “tactical error” for which Glantz criticized the anti-smoking movement in Duluth was its “seeking to enlist the restaurant/hospitality industry as an ally in the development of the ordinance” in the hope of “avoid[ing] controversy.” Theodore Tsoukalas and Stanton Glantz, “The Duluth Clean Indoor Air Ordinance: Problems and Success in Fighting the Tobacco Industry at the Local Level in the 21st Century,” AJPH 93(8):1214-21 at 1220, 1214 (Aug. 2003). ATTF also engaged in such cooperation, to avoid not controversy, but the impossibility of passing an ordinance.

Ames ordinance was, as Belitsos underscored, straightforward: “We did not have the votes for the 100% ban. The compromise was it or nothing would have passed.” Despite the important differences between the two ordinances and the circumstances surrounding their adoption, Glantz charged that “the problematic provisions” of Duluth’s were “quickly replicated in other states, including Iowa....” The lesson that he learned from the first case was the same about which he, ANR, and ACS warned ATTF: “The Duluth experience demonstrates the importance of not accepting weak compromises at the 11th hour in negotiations in order to get something rather than nothing, hoping to revisit and fix a flawed policy later.”

On the evening of November 7 Belitsos wrote to Linda Muston (but did not fax to her until the next morning) a note accompanying a “Proposed Motion and Position Statement” bearing her name and his, which revealed that he still felt uneasy about the compromise about which he had not yet completely made up his mind: “Here it is. I’ll sleep on it & run it by a few advocates in the morning to see what they think of our position. I’ll call with changes....” After declaring that ATTF’s “vision” was to improve “our” community’s health “by eliminating second-hand smoke from all public places,” the draft frankly underscored the unsatisfactory public health consequences of the compromise:

Our current mission and proposal to the Ames City Council is to begin with a smoke-free dining ordinance. We have received tremendous public support for this restaurant ban proposal.

We appreciate the compromise proposal from the restaurant and bar owners because it represents their recognition of the importance of reducing the exposure to second-hand smoke for their patrons and employees. The 8:30 time is very troubling to us because we are opposed to any exposure to second-hand smoke in restaurants. Our original proposal was to eliminate smoking from restaurants, and this compromise does not meet this public health goal. However, we see the inclusion of bars in the compromise as a plus and view this as somewhat a tradeoff for the 8:30 green light time in restaurants.

If the Ames City Council will not adopt a total ban in restaurants, the Ames Tobacco Task Force will reluctantly support the proposed compromise but will continue to work for a total ban in the future.

---

223 Email from George Belitsos to Marc Linder (Oct. 14, 2008).
Thus as of November 8, although Belitsos had apparently not abandoned hope of still securing a majority on the council for a 24-hour-a-day restaurant ban, he no longer believed (if he ever had) that a total ban in all public places was possible with that city council as it was then constituted. The profound disappointment over the limited health benefits of the part-time ban on active smoking produced the overall dispirited tone, which even the inclusion of some bars (which did not compensate for the evening smoking period in restaurants) was unable to dispel.

When Cummings and Johansen met with ATTF on November 8, the Tribune reported that they made what they called a “one-time offer”: despite occupying what appeared to be the weaker position, Cummings allegedly stressed that “’[w]e came with our best possible offer.... We did not come to negotiate.’” In fact, participants later agreed that the owners had not confronted ATTF with an accomplished fact in the sense that many negotiations had preceded presentation of the compromise. Implausible as Cummings’ claim seemed, he argued that although “’not a perfect solution,’” the compromise nevertheless “accomplished much of what the anti-smoking forces want, which is a smoke-free environment in public places.” Even the Tribune recognized that it “could be a hard sell” since ATTF clearly wanted a total ban to eliminate the health hazards linked to secondhand smoke exposure. Yet despite having what appeared to be the upper hand, ATTF representatives “effusively praised the businessmen for their initiative.” Nevertheless, they “stopped short of accepting it” until the organization as a whole expressed its support, on which the owners insisted because they refused to present the plan to the council alone. One of the restaurant owners’ chief goals was to insure that the council did not—as it had been contemplating in September—create the worst-case scenario of a restaurant-only ban. The complicated political dynamic on the council and between the council and the two groups pushed them toward a compromise. ATTF understood that it would obtain nothing from the council if it insisted on a broad ban because it was simply unable to mobilize four votes—a dynamic of which the owners almost certainly were aware. 230 (In the latter part of October bar owners had planned to lobby those city council members they believed might be “sympathetic to rescinding...or modifying” the broad ban—“namely, Russ Cross, Steve Goodhue, Sharon Wirth and perhaps Ann Campbell.”) 231 At the same time, however, the council’s sense of growing community support for less exposure to tobacco smoke in restaurants and bars meant that the owners could not just rest on their laurels because the council would have pressured them to accept some regulation, 232 in part in reaction to pressure from the ATTF itself. 233 Whatever stringency the Ames ban possessed was irrevocably relaxed on November 8, when, as Lenwood Monte, one of two ATTF members who had negotiated with the owners, in a monumental exaggeration put it, a “breakthrough of monumental proportion was achieved.... The restaurant owners made an ‘offer that we could not refuse.’ The proposal needed only a few little ‘tweakings’ after this time to be shaped into final form. [F]rom then on...ATTF and the restaurant owners began to work together to develop a compromise that both parties could accept.” 234 Kitchell, the other ATTF negotiator, later explained the basis for her having agreed to the compromise: “I...had the gut feeling that Bob [Cummings] and Rich [Johansen]’s opposition to the original ordinance was largely based on economic fears—they really did not believe the data that these ordinances did not cause economic harm. I, on the other hand, did believe the data and was confident that their businesses would not suffer. I felt that once they saw that their businesses were not harmed, we could more easily move to an all out ban.” 235

---

228Telephone interviews with Len Monte, Ames (Oct. 2, 2008); Bob Cummings, Ames (Oct. 2, 2008); Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 1, 2008); Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008); Rich Johansen, Ames (Oct. 8, 2008) (calling negotiations on-going and “amicable”). Nevertheless, the key ATTF figure, George Belitsos, when asked outright, also denied that the group had been given a take-it-or-leave-it offer, but then in the course of his own narrative did admit that at some point the owners had put them in that situation in the sense that the group knew that if it did not accept the offer, it would be unable to secure the votes on the city council for any stricter ban. Telephone interview with George Belitsos, Ames (Oct. 10, 2008).

The severely watered-down ban that the now openly incrementalist ATTF

---

230 Telephone interview with Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008). Rich Johansen, one of the two owner-negotiators, later stated that owners had not been sure at the time whether ATTF could have secured adoption of a broader ban, but had believed that because a “backlash” had developed against such a ban, ATTF on its own had sought more “common ground.” Telephone interview with Rich Johansen, Ames (Oct. 8, 2008).
234 Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food 49 (n.d.).
235 Email from Mary Kitchell to Marc Linder (Oct. 12, 2008).
welcomed immediately caused an open breach with the American Cancer Society.\textsuperscript{236} During a conference call on November 10, a number of “angry”\textsuperscript{237} local and regional ACS officials “‘lowered the boom’” on ATTF, informing that group that it was, “in effect,...‘letting the ship sink!’”\textsuperscript{238} Of special significance was Stanton Glantz’s participation from California. His involvement was calculated to bring additional persuasive power to bear on ATTF since he had written much of the material that they had used in their campaign. Glantz uncompromisingly criticized so-called red light/green light arrangements such as the smoking/no-smoking time-share compromise to which ATTF was about to agree.\textsuperscript{239} As Glantz explained in an article he published soon thereafter: “These laws are introduced to local level policymakers (typically by restaurateurs) in places where citizens are pressing for a 100% smoke-free ordinances [sic]. Like the Accommodation Program, ‘Red Light Green Light’ laws only establish minimum restrictions and require signs be posted outside establishments saying \textsuperscript{236}George Belitsos stated that the American Lung Association and American Heart Association had joined ACS in opposition. Telephone interview with George Belitsos, Ames (Oct. 10, 2008). Mary Kitchell, while unable to recall, noted that AHA’s “level of involvement in this whole effort was minimal” and ALA had been “more involved in public education” about the consequences of secondhand smoke. Email from Mary Kitchell to Marc Linder (Oct. 12, 2008). Council members Hoffman and Campbell stated that neither ALA nor AHA nor the Iowa Department of Public Health had been involved. Email from Judie Hoffman to Marc Linder (Oct. 14, 2008). Kitchell recollected that the IDPH may not have liked the compromise, but had not spoken out against it as had Natalie Battles of the ACS before the city council. Email from Mary Kitchell to Marc Linder (Oct. 12, 2008). According to an email from a CAFE member to the Iowa City Council urging it not to adopt a time-limited smoking regime as Ames had done, this red light/green light regime had prompted the ALA, AHA, and ACS to “publicly voice[ ] their lack of support for such an ordinance.” Email from Renee Gould to Iowa City Council (Nov. 20, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Nov. 27, 2001 Special Meeting at 75, on http://www.iowa-city-/org/weblink/docview.aspx?id=8320 (visited Nov. 4, 2008).

\textsuperscript{237}Telephone interview with George Belitsos, Ames (Oct. 10, 2008).

\textsuperscript{238}Lenwood Monte, \textit{A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food} 50 (n.d.). Although Monte depicted the call as part of a physical meeting, other participants stated that everyone participated by telephone. Telephone interviews with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 1, 2008) and Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008). Unfortunately, by the time he was interviewed Belitsos had recently “purged” 10 years of records including all ATTF minutes. Email from George Belitsos to Marc Linder (Oct. 9, 2008).

\textsuperscript{239}Telephone interviews with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 1, 2008) and Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008).
whether smoking is allowed inside. These proposals have great appeal to local policymakers who feel pressured to address smoking in public places since these weak laws give the appearance of taking action without having any protective health effect. Introducing ‘Red Light, Green Light’ laws is an industry tactic aimed at delaying and weakening popular smoke-free efforts.\textsuperscript{240}

The gist of ACS’s criticisms during the conference call was that once adopted, the partial ban would not only be the best that the city of Ames would ever achieve, but that it would become an inferior model for other cities in Iowa.\textsuperscript{241} (Later Belitsos would be able to refute this claim by citing the ban adopted in 2002 by Iowa City, which, though narrower in scope, lacked the despised red light/green light feature.)\textsuperscript{242} ATTF representatives did not waver or acquiesce in these condemnations. Mary Kitchell, for example, stressed that none of the ACS critics lived in Ames or would have to work or live with the owners in various multifaceted situations. Moreover, since the Iowa Attorney General’s office had advised ATTF that any helpful changes in the state smoking law would be a long time coming, it seemed senseless to the group to do nothing now to alleviate exposure to secondhand smoke and wait, potentially many years, until anti-smoking Democrats gained control of both houses of the legislature. The central fact was that a broad ban could count on the support of only two members of the city council, Quirmbach and Hoffman. In contrast, the two bankers, Russ Cross and Steve Goodhue, though they personally hated smoking, were in principle unable to support the total ban, while Sharon Wirth and Ann Campbell “played it both ways,” but even if one of them had voted for it, the council would still have been deadlocked at 3 to 3.\textsuperscript{243} Indeed, one reason, at least in the view of \textsuperscript{241}Telephone interviews with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 1, 2008) and Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008). When Muston self-ironically recalled that “we were so conceited that we thought we could be the model for Iowa,” her irony referred not to the weakness of the ordinance, but to the fact that, because the Supreme Court soon invalidated it, the ban never became a model for any city. Council member Wirth later argued that, since ACS had known that the more stringent ban would not and the compromise would be adopted, it could retain its purist position and secure the half a loaf (although ACS never articulated such a view). Telephone interview with Sharon Wirth, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008).

\textsuperscript{242}Telephone interview with George Belitsos, Ames (Oct. 10, 2008). In contrast, ATTF member Linda Muston, who lived in Ames and Iowa City, regarded Iowa City’s ordinance as inferior to Ames’s. Telephone interview with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 8, 2008).

\textsuperscript{243}Telephone interviews with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 1, 2008) (quote) and one prominent ATTF member, that the council had unanimously voted to authorize the city attorney to draft the broad ordinance was that it—and especially Cross and Goodhue—may have believed that the courts would eventually invalidate such an ordinance anyway.\(^\text{244}\) To be sure, a council member later insisted not only that the body had thought that the ordinance was on solid legal ground and would be upheld in court, but that it had authorized the city attorney to draft a broad ban because it would have been difficult to vote against such authorization in the face of community pressure.\(^\text{245}\)

ACS’s vociferous opposition was “shocking” to ATTF not in the sense that the Cancer Society had not had a reputation for being purist radicals, but because, in Muston’s ironic words, “most of us were purist idealists and had no idea that \textit{some} good was not better than \textit{no} good!”\(^\text{246}\) After the ATTF members had thought about and rejected the ACS’s “purist” better-nothing-than-this-partial-ban denunciations,\(^\text{247}\) “an irreparable rift” erupted between the two organizations for almost a year, during which ACS withdrew its support from ATTF and “actively sought to scuttle the implementation of the Ames agreement” on the grounds that the compromise “did not go far enough...and might harm efforts being put forth \textbf{Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3, 2008).} One interesting difference between Muston’s and Kitchell’s accounts is that although both agreed that ATTF had never retreated in the face of ACS’s onslaught, Kitchell stated that members had not been torn over the decision, whereas Muston recalled the confrontation as “painful for us.” Muston opined that Wirth and Campbell had wished that the issue “would go away.” Telephone interview with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 1, 2008). Quirmbach, audibly reaching for a polite expression, noted that Campbell had failed to give a “firm commitment.” Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Oct. 31, 2008). Another former ATTF member (who declined to be quoted for attribution) characterized Wirth, the possible fourth vote, as having “waffled.” Telephone interview, Ames (Sept. 28, 2008). Not having a vote, the mayor cannot break tie-votes in Ames. The mayor does have a veto power, but, because the council has six members and the four-vote simple majority needed to pass an ordinance is the same two-thirds majority needed to repass an ordinance over a veto, the latter is rarely wielded. City of Ames Municipal Code §§ 2.6, 2.8, 2.22, on http://www.cityofames.org/attorneyweb/pdfs/Chap02.PDF (visited Oct. 14, 2008); email from Diane Voss, Ames City Clerk, to Marc Linder (Oct. 15, 2008). Even had Mayor Tedesco had a tie-breaking vote, he would, according to ATTF members, not have cast it in favor of a strict ban.

\(^\text{244}\)Telephone interview with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 1, 2008).

\(^\text{245}\)Telephone interview with Ann Campbell, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008). By 2008 Campbell was the mayor of Ames. In contrast, former council member Russ Cross stated that members had known that it was possible that the ordinance might not be judicially upheld. Telephone interview with Russ Cross, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008).

\(^\text{246}\)Email from Linda Muston to Marc Linder (Oct. 14, 2008).

\(^\text{247}\)Telephone interview with George Belitsos, Ames (Oct. 10, 2008).
in other communities.” In contrast, ATTF argued to ACS that the compromise was “an Ames solution for an Ames problem,’ and we would not comply with unreasonable requests to satisfy an unachievable goal.” Since there was nothing locally unique about Ames with regard to its bars and restaurants or the need to protect people from secondhand smoke exposure, the only relevant local circumstance was the inability to muster a majority on the city council to vote for the broad ban. However, since anti-smoking forces in Ames had been organized and cohesive enough to be able to mobilize faster than groups anywhere else in the state, and at one point, at least, all six members of the city council had voted to authorize the city attorney to draft a broad ban, the “Ames problem” may in fact have been a statewide problem that called into question the whole local control priority pursued by ACS, the other health organizations, and even ATTF.

Ultimately the principal difference between ATTF and ACS/Glantz/ANR may have been that the latter argued that if the ATTF simply lacked the votes on the city council for a strict ban, it should have withdrawn the proposed ordinance and persisted in grassroots mobilization until it secured a majority on the city council, whereas ATTF took the position that the struggle for and experience with a weaker ban would increase rather than decrease interest in a stronger ban. The ACS/Glantz/ANR position made eminent sense if its proponents believed that, because the anti-smoking movement was riding the crest of the wave of history, the advent of total smoking bans of nationwide scope was just a matter of time and, consequently, that there was no need to pare back maximalist demands. (To be sure, if stringent and capacious bans were really inevitable, it is unclear why the more radical wing of the movement should have splintered its resources opposing the incrementalist wing’s campaigns since they could hardly have slowed down the predicted inexorable progress.) Since both of these positions were (ex ante and ex post) empirically plausible and in this sense both wings may have been ‘right,’ neither should have prompted an attitude of moral superiority

---

248 Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food 50 (n.d.). Council member Steve Goodhue believed that the ACS had been “unreasonable. They likely had to draw a line given the basis of their organization. They were completely unwilling to discuss any changes to the ordinances and I think that frustrated the council, myself included.” Email from Steve Goodhue to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2008). Council member Ann Campbell also characterized ACS’s position as “unreasonable” and clearly having had no chance of passage. Telephone interview with Ann Campbell, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008).

249 Muston reported that ATTF’s “soul searching” that accompanied its response to the ACS/ANR’s attack prompted members to question whether their “ownership” of and “pride” in their approach had caused them to be so “bullheaded.” Telephone interview with regard to their competing strategies for implementing local control.\textsuperscript{250}

While noting that it was “difficult to speculate on these issues,” Mary Kitchell, one of ATTF’s leaders, later perceptively analyzed the complex factors underlying the simple political arithmetic in a way that justified the group’s local strategy, but at the same time raised the aforementioned doubts about the feasibility of local control as a statewide program for achieving an effective and comprehensive ban on public smoking:

Our view was that it would take several years to possibly budge the council into a more stringent ban, and we didn’t want to wait that long and risk that it might not even happen then. If you’re talking about changing the minds of the existing city council members, we didn’t see it happening without making some attempt to work with the opposition. Several members were very clear on that point. If you’re talking about waiting to replace the resisting city council members in a general election, I personally do not vote on single issues, and I think it would have taken exhaustive efforts to hinge a general election on this issue.\textsuperscript{251}

On November 13, the day before the council was scheduled to deal with the proposed ordinance again, ATTF agreed to the compromise because “[t]he impact of reaching a broad range of establishments is deemed significant enough to offset the value lost in late hour smoking in some businesses.”\textsuperscript{252} Natalie Battles, the group’s chairperson and the Cancer Society’s representative in it, was the only dissenter among its approximately dozen permanent members: her and ACS’s position was that the continuing permissibility of smoking during certain hours did not serve “the best interests of public health....”\textsuperscript{255} Even Quirmbach, the

with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 8, 2008).

\textsuperscript{250}Ironically, the dispute that erupted in 2008 in Iowa over whether local control was superior to a statewide ban cast ACS and other health organizations in the role of incrementalists (and state legislators led by Janet Petersen as the maximalists). See below ch. 35.

\textsuperscript{251}Email from Mary Kitchell to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2008).

\textsuperscript{252}Richard Lewis, “Anti-Smoking Forces Back Compromise,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), Nov. 14, 2000 (A1:2-5, A8:1-4) (quoting ATTF statement). Belitsos later stated that Battles had not been the only dissenter, but he was unable to recall the others, some of whom he said had left ATTF. Telephone interview with George Belitsos, Ames (Oct. 10, 2008). Battles, unable to remember with certainty anyone else who had joined her in the minority, speculated about two members, both of whom denied that they had dissented. Email from Natalie Battles to Marc Linder (Oct. 10, 2008); telephone interview with Harlan Dubansky, Tucson (Oct. 10, 2008); email from Linda Muston to Marc Linder (Oct. 12, 2008). Kitchell also recalled no one else. Email from Mary Kitchell to Marc Linder (Oct. 10, 2008). Muston stated that Battles had been the only dissenter. Telephone interview council’s “most passionate backer of a full-blown no-smoking ordinance,” concurred in the proposal because “[t]hey’ve given us something we can live with.” And although Belitsos told the Tribune that ATTF did “not expect to push for a wider ban for at least several years,” the owners nevertheless knew that the group would be coming back for a full ban. Support from bar owners, despite the fact that the 10-percent food sales threshold meant that “most free-standing taverns would be exempt,” remained “fuzzy.” Indeed, ominously, the Tribune reported that if the city council did adopt a ban ordinance, “some restaurant and bar owners have said they may fight it in court”—a prediction that prompted Mayor Tedesco to declare: “If that’s the case, what have we created? ... One hell of a mess.”
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

Tantalizingly, while Monte and Kitchell were drafting the compromise with Cummings and Johansen, these two owners mentioned to ATTF members that “they had been approached by some tobacco interests through attorneys in Des Moines,” but explained that “they had resisted and wanted to achieve a local compromise without outside influences.” Kitchell “took them at their word, realizing that the possibility of intrusion by the tobacco industry was one of their bargaining chips,” although she also “had the gut feeling that association with the tobacco companies was distasteful to them and that they wanted to achieve a solution without them.” While Cummings and Johansen were meeting with their constituencies to discuss the bilaterally drafted compromise, some of the owners, Kitchell speculated, “may have consulted with the tobacco lawyers,” but she added that she had “no proof that the cigarette companies had been financing or organizing resistance to our endeavors,” and even if they had been, “they were not very successful.”

with Linda Muston, Coralville (Oct. 8, 2008).

255 Richard Lewis, “Anti-Smoking Forces Back Compromise,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 14, 2000 (A1:2-5, A8:1-4). Quirmbach later dismissed the importance of the exemption of such pure bars on the grounds that bar owners and patrons constituted a “different culture.” Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Oct. 31, 2008).

256 Email from Mary Kitchell to Marc Linder (Oct. 12, 2008). Muston also independently referred to unconfirmed reports at the time that a tobacco industry representative had “contacted some of the restaurant owners and offered support to resist.” Like Kitchell, Muston added that “[i]n general, not many [owners] were favorably disposed to outsiders for the same reason they didn’t want an ordinance to mess with them!” Email from Linda Muston to Marc Linder (Oct. 12, 2008). Quirmbach also later reported that bar owners’ initiative had been local and not introduced by the tobacco
The day before the November 14 council meeting Mayor Tedesco stated that three days earlier he had received word of a possible compromise for bar and restaurant owners in addition to ATTF’s endorsement of it. Consequently, although the council was to consider a total ban, in fact a compromise would be “‘brought forth.’” On November 14 ATTF released a revised version of its aforementioned “Position Statement,” with which it was in part identical, but whose most sharply worded frustrations were deleted in favor of a more hopeful stance. Thus, ATTF concluded that the “impact of reaching a much broader range of establishments has value that offsets value lost in allowing late-hour smoking in some restaurants.” But even now the group was uncertain as to whether the trade-off would yield a net health benefit: “The compromise proposal may subject fewer overall to second-hand smoke than would a pure restaurant ban.” Abandoning its second thoughts and reluctance, the Task Force, in “the spirit of compromise,” supported the new proposal and encouraged its adoption by the council. Wistfully, it regarded the “compromise as a starting point as we continue to work on our vision of a smoke-free Ames.”

Quirmbach himself, for several reasons, never second-guessed the decision to compromise. First of all, after all the work that ATTF had done, he was not willing to give up on the ban merely because it was not as rigorous as he and others had hoped it would be. Second, simply withdrawing the proposal and trying to organize even more extensive grassroots support for a stricter ban was not practicable because, as a council member, it was not clear to him that the anti-smoking movement would have been able to get any ordinance at all through the council. Third, what was clear to him was that, if adherents rejected the compromise, it would be years before they would be able to try to push for a ban again. And, finally, far from fretting over or regretting the Cancer Society’s sharp attacks, Quirmbach found it politically “very useful” to have the ACS opposing the Ames coalition because it was “always good to be in the middle” (in this instance, between perfectionists at the one extreme and rigid business owners at industry.

---

258 Ames Tobacco Task Force, “Position Statement” (Nov. 11, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston). It is unclear why ATTF asserted that late-hour smoking would be allowed only in “some” restaurants. Unknown, too, is the reason for deletion from an earlier draft of an expression of concern for the health of employees in “smoke filled workplaces.” [Ames Tobacco Task Force, untitled] (For Release Monday, November 13, 2000) (copy furnished by Linda Muston).
Exposure to Thirdhand Smoke: The New Learning

Significantly, ATTF’s November 7 statement, which self-critically evaluated the stop/start smoking/nosmoking compromise, failed even to allude to the health consequences of the extended exposure to toxic and carcinogenic substances in tobacco smoke that adhered to various surfaces and off-gassed even during the so-called “red-light” no-smoking periods—a phenomenon that R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company scientists observed in 1992 (“the presence of residual nicotine desorbing from chamber surfaces”) and that later would be called “thirdhand smoke.” As early as 1993, researchers in the Indoor Environment Program at Lawrence Berkeley Laboratory studied how deposited particles from environmental tobacco smoke “may continue to emit semi-volatile chemicals into the room air for a long time” and how “[o]wing to the evaporation of deposited particles and the reemission of adsorbed chemicals, a recently used smoking site may still exhibit a certain level of ETS constituents,” odor being evidence of the evaporation and reemission. They estimated that, depending on air exchange rates, between 21.5 percent and 3 percent of the total initial mass of side stream ETS particles generated by smoking one cigarette deposited on interior surfaces, yielding, at an estimated evaporation rate of 17 percent per hour of such particles, even “more significant” indoor concentrations of chemicals.

259 Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Oct. 31, 2008).
increased ventilation reduce to very low levels exposure to lower volatility hazardous air pollutants and toxic air contaminants such as cresols, naphthalene, and polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons. Components of environmental tobacco smoke, as noted in a research paper on infants’ exposure to environmental tobacco smoke-contaminated households based in large part on studies from the 1990s, are rapidly dispersed after emission and undergo further dynamic chemical reactions. Vapour phase components deposit and are adsorbed onto walls, furniture, clothes, toys, and other objects within 10...minutes to hours after tobacco smoke has been emitted. From there they are re-emitted into the air over the course of hours to months. ETS particulate matter can deposit on surfaces within hours after smoking occurred, from where it may be re-suspended or react with vapour phase compounds. Through this dynamic behavior, ETS can contaminate house dust, carpets, walls, furniture, and other household objects for weeks and months after ETS was emitted from a cigarette.

Although the science of thirdhand tobacco smoke exposure was only about a decade old by this time, enough of this new learning had spread to allied fields that as early as October 2001 the Iowa City City Council heard from Professor

ETS components and their time scales estimated that deposition and sorption of vapors lasted tens of minutes to hours, deposition of particles lasted hours, and re-emission of sorbed vapors last hours to weeks. Joan Daisey, “Tracers for Assessing Exposure to Environmental Tobacco Smoke: What Are They Tracing?” Environmental Health Perspectives 107 (Supp. 2): 319-27, tab. 2 at 320 (May 1999), Bates No. PM3006697619/20.

G. Matt et al., “Households Contaminated by Environmental Tobacco Smoke: Sources of Infant Exposures,” TC 13:29-37 at 29 (2004). Even when “deposited tobacco smoke pollutants are not re-emitted into the air,” as the lead author of this article later observed, “they can still enter the body via dermal transfer and ingestion” (by means of touching of contaminated surfaces). Email from Georg Matt to Marc Linder (Jan. 5, 2009). In a more recent study of housing, Matt et al. discovered that non-smokers’ finger nicotine was higher in housing formerly occupied by smokers compared to housing formerly occupied by non-smokers and its levels were correlated with the dust and surface nicotine present. Georg Matt et al., “When Smokers Move Out and Non-Smokers Move In: Residential Thirdhand Smoke Pollution and Exposure,” TC (2010) doi:10.1136/tc.2010.037382 (copy provided by Georg Matt).
William Field, a lung cancer researcher in the Epidemiology Department of the Public Health College at the University of Iowa, who urged rejection of a red light/green light ordinance, that: “From my own research, I know the aerosols and attached carcinogens from cigarettes stay airborne for long periods of time. Even after depositing, the carcinogenic particles often resuspend with only minimal air movement in a room.”\textsuperscript{265}

Insidiously, the red light/green light regime could and would actually increase the exposure to tobacco smoke of non-smokers who had previously refused to frequent restaurants and bars that permitted smoking but now ate or drank in them during the non-smoking period because, as an important study from 2002 found, “re-emission of previously sorbed organic compounds may increase exposures to these compounds for a non-smoker who specifically avoids the smoking area during smoking periods but occupies the area during other periods of the day.”\textsuperscript{266}

Eight years after the Ames debate two of the leading researchers of thirdhand smoke, in response to a question as to which side had adopted the scientifically more tenable position, observed that the red light/green light regime was “pretty worthless”\textsuperscript{267} and had represented a victory for smoking advocates, respectively.\textsuperscript{268} A third cutting-edge researcher, whose “own personal feeling” was that “any measure that reduces exposures and cuts down on the times and places when people can be exposed to serious amounts of SHS is a good thing” and that direct exposure to secondhand smoke was “much more important than the sorption-desorption thing,” concluded that the partial ban “should reduce exposures by allowing some to avoid the establishments during smoking hours,”

\textsuperscript{265}Email from William Field to Iowa City Council (Oct. 16, 2001), on http://www.icgov.org (Oct. 23, 2001 special meeting correspondence). Nevertheless, when asked seven years later how long resuspension lasted, Field, who is a radon expert, not only did not know, but stated (incorrectly) that little research had been done on the subject; similarly, he did not know whether carcinogenic exposure to such resuspended particulate matter was minuscule compared to that of direct exposure to secondhand smoke. Email between Marc Linder and William Field (Oct. 20, 2008). For more recent research that measured “substantial levels” of “carcinogenic tobacco-specific nitrosamines” of a smoker’s vehicle, see Mohamad Sleiman et al., “Formation of Carcinogens Indoors by Surface-Mediated Reactions of Nicotine with Nitrous Acid, Leading to Potential Thirdhand Smoke Hazards,” \textit{PNAS} 107(15):6576-81 at 6576 (Apr. 13, 2010), on http://www.pnas.org/cgi/doi/10.1073/pnas.0912820107.

\textsuperscript{267}Email from George Matt to Marc Linder (Jan. 5, 2009)

\textsuperscript{268}Email from Jonathan Winickoff to Marc Linder (Jan. 5, 2009).
while exposures from desorption are almost certainly not as hazardous/risky (since we know that some of the nasty compounds don’t stick around).” Although, unlike some researchers, he did not believe that no doubt attached to the claim that people were “being exposed to substantially unhealthful amounts of tobacco smoke compounds via desorption in bars and restaurants, he did argue that since desorption of some hazardous compounds in secondhand smoke “can lead to concentrations of some compounds that are similar to levels that occur during smoking,” the “precautionary principle” spoke in favor of prudence.269

The Attorney General Opines that Local Control Is Not Preempted

An Attorney General’s Opinion is not the final word on the subject, but it is given respectful consideration by courts addressing the same issue.270

As arranged with the Ames City Council on October 10, Senator Johnie Hammond had requested an opinion from the attorney general as to whether local governments were empowered to adopt ordinances prohibiting smoking in certain public places. Specifically she had asked: “In view of subsection 142B.2(2) Code of Iowa, would a city ordinance enacted to prohibit smoking in any public place, as defined by subsection 142B.1(3)...be inconsistent with or conflict with Chapter 142B...?”271 Providentially (but probably not serendipitously), just an hour before the November 14 council session began at 6:00 p.m., the mayor received by fax the Iowa Attorney General’s opinion on the validity of the proposed ordinance, which concluded that it would neither be inconsistent nor conflict with chapter 142B of the Iowa Code.272

Turning first to the issue of express exemption, Assistant Attorney General Steve St. Clair concluded that the provision in section 142B.6 added in 1990 did “not constitute an express statement of legislative intent to bar municipalities from exercising home rule powers”273 because its command that the state law 269Email from Brett Singer to Marc Linder (Jan. 5, 2009).

“shall supersede any local law or regulation which is inconsistent with or conflicts with” the state law merely “reflects the same home rule principles embodied in the Iowa Constitution...and does not constitute an express statement of the general assembly’s intent to preempt.” The attorney general opinion supported this conclusion on the basis of the legislature’s having “had no difficulty expressing its intent to preempt with unmistakable clarity in other contexts”—particularly where it had prohibited local governments from adopting any ordinance even “relating to” the subject dealt with by the state statute.275

The Attorney General’s office offered a more nuanced analysis of implied preemption, which “could arise from an overt conflict between” the state law and an ordinance creating “more stringent standards for smoking in public places.” The opinion acknowledged that “[i]n a broad sense, a locality that extends the ban on smoking by prohibiting the designation of smoking areas in certain public places” would in fact be “prohibit[ing] an act permitted by a statute,” which the Iowa Supreme Court had articulated as a touchstone of the kind of local action triggering preemption. “However,” the opinion pointed out, “this expansive approach would mean that a local jurisdiction could never establish more stringent standards, which is something localities are expressly permitted to do as a general matter” by the Code’s home rule provisions. Consequently, the real test had to be “whether the local ordinance prohibits an act expressly sanctioned by state law”; but in fact chapter 142B not only did not expressly sanction smoking in designated public places, but, on the contrary, in section 142B.2(2) “envisions the active involvement of local jurisdictions in expanding the smoking prohibitions of state law.”276 Although implied preemption could also arise from the legislature’s intent to occupy the field, the fact that the Supreme Court had rarely found a statute to have met that standard reflected a “strong public policy in favor of granting local jurisdictions the flexibility they need to address local problems,” which in turn flowed from the constitutional grant of home rule. To be sure, the requirement in section 142B.6 of “uniform implementation, application, and enforcement” had to be examined to determine whether it met Supreme Court dictum that the legislature’s clear expression of intent to establish statewide uniform regulation might also express an intent to occupy the field. However, the express prohibition of inconsistent or conflicting local ordinances in section 142B.6 constituted clear legislative recognition of the permissibility of “consistent local regulation in the field.” That the legislature had not exalted the desideratum of uniformity above that of local regulation was clearly inscribed in the key section 142B.2(2), on which the opinion then focused.\textsuperscript{277}

Finally reaching the nub of the question about the effect of section 142B.2(2) posed by Hammond and the Ames City Counsel, St. Clair concluded that it “expressly recognizes the authority of local jurisdictions to pass ordinances prohibiting smoking in some public places in which state law would permit smoking. Thus, the general assembly acknowledged that localities retained the authority to establish more stringent prohibitions relating to smoking in public places than those embodied in state law.” In light of the constitutionally enshrined “robust policies favoring home rule,” the Attorney General’s office regarded the implications of section 142B.2(2) as “especially compelling.”\textsuperscript{278}

\textbf{The Ames City Council Unanimously Passes the Weak Red Light/Green Light Compromise Ban}

\textit{WHEREAS}, it is found that smoking areas have been designated in many such public places in this city; and

\textit{WHEREAS}, it is found that the designation of smoking areas in those public places has subjected persons to the harmful effects of tobacco smoke on their health, and curtailed the number of public places that can be enjoyed by persons who have an allergy or other heightened sensitivity to smoke; and

\textit{WHEREAS}, it is deemed to be in the interest of the public health and the economic welfare of the community that designation of smoking areas be prohibited in such public places that are frequented, for the most part, by residents of this city.\textsuperscript{279}

\textsuperscript{278}Office of the Attorney General State of Iowa, Docket No. 0-11-5, at 4 (Nov. 14, 2005) (2000WL 33258478 (Iowa A.G.). To be sure, given the specific wording of section 142B.2(2), the Attorney General opinion dealt only with a local government’s power to restrict the designation of smoking areas, and did not address its power, for example, to modify the statutory definition of “public place.” \textit{Id.} n. 2 at 5.

\textsuperscript{279}City of Ames, Ordinance No. 3608 (2001), reprinted in Lenwood Monte, \textit{A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food} n.p. [54] (n.d.).
Despite the support that the attorney general had just provided for the full ban, the council on November 14 unanimously voted to shrink the scope of its coverage radically. At the outset, Fred Miller announced that restaurant/bar owners and ATTF had asked him to present a compromise proposal, which embodied imperfections from the perspective of each party, which had had to make some concessions. The compromise contained the following elements:

1. Restaurants, bars and taverns shall be non-smoking from 6 AM thru 8:30 PM daily. At 8:30 PM, these establishments may designate a smoking area in compliance with state law.
   -- Bars and taverns are exempt if food sales are 10% of gross sales or less. In the case of food served on premise from outside vendors, these sales are to be included in food sales and gross sales.
   -- Should an establishment decide, on a consistent and regularly scheduled basis, to terminate food service prior to 8:30 PM, then this establishment may begin to allow smoking at the scheduled time.
   -- Outdoor seating areas will be considered as indoor areas if food is served.
2. Truckstop establishments are allowed to establish an unrestricted smoking area that is fully enclosed and has a separate ventilation system. Should the establishment later enlarge the dining area, no expansion can be made of the smoking area.
3. Bowling alleys shall be non-smoking from 6 AM through 6 PM. After 6 PM, these establishments may designate a smoking area in compliance with state law. Due to specific league play, the time to allow smoking on Thursdays is advanced to 3 PM. Bowling alleys are allowed to establish an unrestricted smoking area that is fully enclosed and has a separate ventilation system.
4. Common areas of hotels and motels shall be smoke-free.
5. A smoke-free zone of 15 feet at the main entrance/exit of all restaurants, bars, taverns, truckstops, and bowling alleys shall be maintained except where adjacent establishments preclude such zones.
6. Customers under 18 years of age are not allowed in smoking areas.
7. An ordinance developed from these guidelines shall be effective no earlier than six months following enactment. Diligent enforcement is expected.\(^\text{280}\)

Conversely, the compromise would permit smoking in: (1) bars 10 percent or less of whose total sales stemmed from food; (2) pool halls; (3) truck stops; (4) bowling alleys after 6 p.m. every night except Thursday, when smoking became permissible at 3 p.m.; and (5) establishments with on-premises live music.\(^\text{281}\)

---

\(^\text{280}\) Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 4-5 (Nov. 14, 2000) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).

Among the crowd of about 120 people in attendance\(^{282}\) at a discussion that, according to several council members, had “caused the most controversy in years over a council action,”\(^{283}\) about 20 spoke up, 80 percent of whom opposed the compromise.\(^{284}\) Only one of these opponents regarded the proposal as too weak: Nancy Battles, the Cancer Society representative, criticized it for not adequately protecting the public—including children, adults, and restaurant workers\(^{285}\)—and urged the council to revisit the full ban.\(^{286}\) In contrast, Mary Kitchell and Len Monte, the two ATTF representatives who (together with the city attorney and the two hospitality industry representatives, Bob Cummings and Rich Johansen)\(^{287}\) were serving on the Compromise Proposal working committee, stated that it was willing to “go along with the Compromise because it satisfied some of the requests of both groups.”\(^{288}\) One restaurant owner opined that he was not convinced that a non-smoking restaurant could make money. Several non-business people (including some who were apparently students from other countries) insisted that any ban constituted an impermissible restriction of freedom and would lead to totalitarianism.\(^{289}\)

The council then voted 6 to 0 to refer the compromise proposal to the city attorney for drafting as an ordinance.\(^{290}\) The council’s willingness to change course was dictated by the perception of considerable community opposition to the broad ban. The (non-voting) mayor, for example, explained that he was “‘somewhat despondent’ at [sic] the amount of harsh criticism council members received through e-mails, letter and phone messages.” And the *Des Moines
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

Register reported that despite the meeting’s “conciliatory tone..., many residents and business owners said [even] the compromise was still too far-reaching.”

Once restaurant and bar owners began pushing for a compromise, it was clear to the anti-smoking bloc on the council that it lacked the requisite four-vote majority for the broad ban. As Iowa’s first city to try to pass its own ban, Ames became a flashpoint for national anti-smoking groups and the tobacco industry seeking to bring local pressure to bear on the council. To (some) council members’ relief, the protagonists were willing to settle for a less stringent ban that enabled the council to “scrap the more controversial full ban that has deeply divided the public.” Rick Carmer, the activist restaurant owner, claimed that he would lose money by virtue of the smoking ban on his patio and around his bar, but a total ban would have been worse, and the partial ban would produce less exposure to secondhand smoke. Conciliatorily he owned that “[w]e can live with this” (but then, shortly after it had gone into force, sued to invalidate it). Carmer’s main objection, he later claimed, had not been to the substance of the ordinance, but to the process by which the compromise had been reached and “rammed down our throats” by the council. Generally speaking, owners opposed the ban because they (erroneously) feared—in large part as a result of cigarette companies’ nationwide disinformational campaigns—that they would lose money and/or were ideologically fixated on government interference with their private business decisions.

292 Email from Judie Hoffman to Marc Linder (Sept. 30, 2008).
295 “For more than a decade the tobacco industry disseminated misinformation asserting that the hospitality industry will suffer financially when smoke-free environments are instituted. Despite the fact that these claims of negative impact are unfounded, this argument has been widely accepted in the hospitality business, thanks to the relationship the tobacco industry has established with organisations whose alleged purpose is to protect the interests of businesses in the hospitality sector. This situation creates problems for public health advocates because individual restaurateurs and bar owners, having heard these claims repeatedly from organisations they trust, oppose smoke-free policies out of fear.” J. Dearlove, S. Bialous, and S. Glantz, “Tobacco Industry Manipulation of the Hospitality Industry to Maintain Smoking in Public Places,” TC 11:94-104 at 101 (2002).
296 Telephone interview with Mary Kitchell, Ames (Oct. 3), and Sharon Wirth, Ames
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

At the beginning of January 2001, the internecine conflict within the anti-smoking movement reached a new high point when the president of the Midwest board of the American Cancer Society wrote its Ames members urging them to ask their representatives on the city council to "vote down the bad ordinance" on the grounds that it would “not protect the health of the people of Ames.” In addition, without revealing what he was specifically talking about or how it could possibly succeed in light of the council’s make-up, the president declared that there was “still time to join our efforts to pass a strong ordinance” by letting the city council “know that you want Ames to have smoke-free restaurants that are truly smoke-free.”297 Believing that this “total goal was simply not achievable,” ATTF, committed as it was to accepting the most that it was able to get from the city council in the short run, saw no alternative to swallowing this “hard pill....”298

Some in Ames at this late date agreed with ACS. One physician, for example, while understanding that “a compromise might at least get things started,” insisted that “such a compromise still stinks! ... Ideally, we should pass a 24/7 smoking ban for public places and let the smokers figure out how to deal with it.”299

By the time the council was due to take up the ordinance again in January, the Ames Tribune was suffering from smoking ban fatigue: its market-knows-best and libertarian “principles” had reduced its understanding of the public health question to urging smokers at least to be “polite” because many people found smoke “irritating.” Recognizing that it had nothing coherent to say—“[w]e feel like we’re blowing smoke out of both sides of our mouths, so to speak”—it suggested that the council approve the compromise and finally move on to the many other matters the city had to consider.300

After the city attorney had refashioned the compromise proposal into yet another draft ordinance, the council met on January 23, 2001, to discuss it, making only one change (unanimously to shift the implementation date to August 1). Quirmbach called the new draft ordinance “a solution that fully and completely reflects the compromise. ‘It’s a step we all can live with.’” Although no public input was permitted, Mayor Tedesco did poll the audience: many stood up in support of the ordinance and only a few in opposition. Public comment would follow in three weeks when the ordinance’s first reading was on the agenda. In spite of the compromise, ATTF was taking no chances: as early as January 22 it distributed a flyer announcing that the city council would hold its first reading of the “compromise ordinance” on February 13 and calling on the public to show support by attending, contacting council members, or writing letters to the Tribune. Fourteen people spoke up during the public hearing on the ordinance’s first reading on February 13, half of whom supported the proposed ordinance. Two bar owners suggested that the exemption level (that is, food as a proportion of total sales) for bars be raised to 15 and 25 percent, respectively. In response to the many people who argued that the proposed ban would “restrict their general liberties,” Quirmbach pointed out that “any time the City Council passes an ordinance, it does have the effect of restricting persons’ activities.” The council then voted 6 to 0 to pass the ordinance on first reading; by a vote of 1 to 5 it rejected an amendment moved by Wirth to weaken the ban by expanding the universe of exempt bars by raising the proportion of total sales accounted for by food from 10 to 15 percent that triggered the exemption. On February 27 and March 6, the council, again unanimously, passed the proposed smoking ban on second and third reading, respectively, and thus adopted Ordinance No. 3608. That Ames on August 1 would become the first and only city in Iowa with such an additional set of local prohibitions concerned restaurant owner Carmer, who, despite the possible competitive disadvantage, predicted that the city’s businesses would survive the effects of the partial ban, which he called a “‘wishy-washy compromise.” Without explaining whether his antipathy extended to all the other public health regulations that applied to restaurants, he declared that “I just don’t like anybody interfering with our business.” (Council member Goodhue, another lukewarm supporter, later opined that because the “community was very split over this issue...the modified ordinance was a good compromise and this seemed to generate add[itional] support. I believe there were more against the ordinance when it was first introduced than when it finally passed.”)

(Oct. 5, 2008).

298Lenwood Monte, A Breath of Fresh Air: The Story of How Ames Enacted Iowa’s First-Ever City Ordinance Limiting Smoking in All Restaurants and Bars that Serve Food 65 (n.d.).

305 Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5-6 (Feb. 27, 2001) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss); Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 5 (Mar. 6, 2001) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).

The final version of the ordinance differed from the first draft in numerous crucial ways. First, smoking and designating smoking areas were prohibited in all “public places” as defined in the state law. Second, a time-of-day exemption was created for food establishments between 8:30 p.m. and 6:00 a.m., during which period designating smoking areas was once again permitted; the exemption also applied to any such establishment that stopped serving food “on a consistent and regularly scheduled basis” before 8:30 p.m. from that time until 6:00 a.m. Third, a total exemption was afforded any food establishment that was also licensed to sell alcohol if non-alcoholic food sales accounted for less than 10 percent of all of its sales. Fourth, the council exempted factories, warehouses, and similar workplaces that the general public did not usually frequent. Fifth, hotels/motels were required to “take such measures as shall be reasonably necessary and effective to keep all lobby areas, corridors and other common areas...free from any level of smoke that can be detected by the unaided human sense of smell.” Sixth, all places that came within the scope of provisions dealing with food establishments, restaurants/bars, truck stops, and bowling alleys were required to “take such measures as shall be reasonably necessary and feasible to maintain all points within fifteen feet of the main entrance and the main exit of such place free from any level of smoke that can be detected by the unaided human sense of smell.” Seventh, those in custody and control of the same places covered by the previous provision were also required to “take such measures as shall be reasonably necessary and feasible to prevent

---

308 Email from Steve Goodhue to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2008).
309 Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.101 and .102 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01).
310 Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.200 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01).
311 Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.201 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01).
312 Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.205 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01).
313 Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.300 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01).
314 Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.301 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01).
315
persons under the age of eighteen from being in any area where smoking” was allowed under the ordinance, which made it unlawful for anyone in that age group to be present where smoking was allowed.315 And eighth, outdoor seating areas were subject to the same prohibitions, provisions, and exemptions stated in all of the ordinance’s substantive sections.316

Whereas Belitsos celebrated adoption of the ordinance as “‘the first time any city in Iowa has passed an anti-smoking ordinance,’” a less than wildly enthusiastic councilman Quirmbach called it “‘a step we can all live with.’”317 Nevertheless, even Quirmbach, years later, praising local control as making it possible to balance various interests in a community, characterized the process as a whole as a pretty good exercise in democracy.318 What the remedy and recourse were for a democratic process that produced a severely deficient public health outcome, including completely unnecessary large-scale morbidity and mortality, he did not explain.

In contrast, the statewide health organizations denounced the compromise with business owners as a “‘victory for the tobacco industry.’” For example, the American Cancer Society observed that a “‘watered-down smoking ban won’t save lives’” because smoke lingered for weeks in bars and restaurants and confining smoking to certain hours made enforcement difficult. ACS’s opposition to “‘a step-by-step approach’” was based on the fact that “[m]ore people are exposed to life-threatening toxins the longer it takes a community to adapt.”320 (Ironically, ACS seemed completely unaware that its own unbending commitment to local control in lieu of a one fell-swoop statewide ban was subject to exactly the same criticism since the process of adopting ordinances in all 948 incorporated cities and towns and 99 counties would take a very long time. Indeed, the very fact that not even Ames was able to pass a strict ordinance suggested that ACS’s reliance on local control as a statewide strategy was not realistic.)\textsuperscript{321} The Cancer organization bluntly charged that “time limits are ploys used by tobacco companies to keep their products in restaurants.... ‘That should tell you right there it’s a red flag.... The only way to get a healthy environment is to ban smoking all the time.’” All these accusations left Belitos in disbelief: “‘They’re trying to give us a black eye when we should be getting credit.... It’s only a first step toward our ultimate goal of having all public places in Ames smoke-free. Instead of criticizing us, they should be complimenting us.’”\textsuperscript{322} For good measure, CAFE in Iowa City, where the city council had not even taken up the group’s draft ordinance, joined in the denunciation: one of its spokespeople, Dan Ramsey—who would later become the lobbyist for the American Lung Association of Iowa—called the Ames ordinance “‘a victory for tobacco’ because the council chose to allow smoking in restaurants between 8:30 p.m. and 6 a.m. to limit unfair competition. ‘That doesn’t protect employees.... Smoke lingers for up to two weeks.’”\textsuperscript{323}

315Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.400 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01).
316Municipal Code of the City of Ames, sect. 21A.500 (Sup #2001-2, Rev. 4-1-01). Because these outdoor areas did not fit within the definition of a “public place” as an enclosed area in the state statute, the attorney general’s office had no opinion on them other than to argue that: “‘It’s really for the local people to make the first call.’” Richard Lewis, “Attorney General: Ames Law Wouldn’t Conflict with State’s,” Tribune (Ames), Nov. 15, 2000 (A1:6, at A8:1-4 at 3-4).
319Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Apr. 19, 2008).

In contrast, Ames council member Hoffman agreed that from a public health perspective ACS was right—the problem, however, was that the anti-smoking bloc on the council simply lacked the votes to pass a stronger ordinance.\textsuperscript{324} Natalie Battles of ACS believed that Quirmbach had pushed to get a ban through the council before he left for the state legislature because he realized that its composition would turn over and a new council would be even less likely to adopt an ordinance,\textsuperscript{325} but Hoffman denied that such a consideration played any part in her or Quirmbach’s decisionmaking. Rather, they were simply “excited about moving forward on an important health issue. We both realized that you don’t always get all that you want when you are breaking new ground and it was important to get something started.”\textsuperscript{326}

Criticism of Quirmbach’s tactics was not necessarily tied to insinuations about his plans for statewide office. For example, Karla Wysocki of ACS simply concluded that he had acted prematurely: instead of rushing the ordinance to a vote, he and ATTF should have first engaged in more public education. Yet, unlike some harsh contemporaneous critics, she later admitted with alacrity that

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{321}Email from Judie Hoffman to Marc Linder (Sept. 29, 2008).
\item \textsuperscript{322}Staci Hupp, “Partial Smoking Ban Stirs Debate in Ames,” \textit{DMR}, Mar. 9, 2001 (1B) (NewsBank).
\item \textsuperscript{323}Andrew Dawson, “Coralville Considers Smoking Ordinance,” \textit{ICP-C}, Apr. 16, 2001 (3A:6-7, at 4A:3-6 at 5).
\item \textsuperscript{324}Telephone interview with Judie Hoffman, Ames (Sept. 27, 2008).
\item \textsuperscript{325}Telephone interview with Natalie Battles, ACS, Ames (Sept. 28, 2008).
\item \textsuperscript{326}Email from Judie Hoffman to Marc Linder (Sept. 28, 2008).
\end{itemize}
ACS had been “conflicted” over its decision to oppose the Ames ordinance because it recognized that the city’s experience with a partial no-smoking regime had also had its positive aspects. Indeed, Wysocki (who after having been ACS’s health promotions director for Iowa became a Midwest regional official) without any hesitance acknowledged that “we wouldn’t have gotten to where we did” with the enactment of the statewide smoking ban in 2008 without the struggles in Ames, which raised awareness of the health impact of secondhand smoke exposure and increased the demand for change in Iowa.

Undeterred by Belitsos’s experience, other cities were monitoring events in Ames. In particular in Iowa City, where in mid-2000 the Johnson County Tobacco Free Coalition had proposed a full ban, a year later the city attorney was drafting an ordinance to ban smoking in establishments less than 50 percent of whose sales stemmed from alcohol. Just how glacially slow a process the ubiquitous adoption of ordinances would be appeared undeniable as initially only a few other jurisdictions voiced interest and even they were taking their time and starting small. Anti-tobacco advocates might regard it as “only the beginning of the debate,” but, for example, Cedar Rapids was planning a ban only in taxis and limousines, while Linn County health officials’ discussion of the possibility of a ban in restaurants envisioned implementation’s taking years. And in Boone, the city’s director of policy and administration—a smoker—asserted that most residents were not eager to join the movement: even non-smokers told him that it should be up to the businesses themselves to decide.

In the state’s largest city, Des Moines, even health advocates recognized that they had to be considerably more prepared before embarking on an ordinance campaign, precisely in order to avoid the mistakes that Ames had committed in pushing quickly before having done sufficient groundwork. As far as the American Lung Association was concerned: “There are too many people who oppose the issue. You have to target the nonsmokers rather than the smokers.” The preparatory work that the organization had in mind was presumably related to nonsmokers’ attitudes and their underlying knowledge. For example, although 76 percent of Des Moines area nonsmoking residents surveyed in April 2001 regarded smoking in restaurants as a major or minor “bother,” only 18 and 14 percent, respectively, said that they would eat more often in restaurants and spend more time in bars, respectively, if smoking were prohibited there, prompting the 327 Telephone interview with Karla Wysocki, Rochester, MN (Oct. 9, 2008).

329 Kate Kompas and Lisa Livermore, “Cities Move Toward Bans on Smoking,” DMR, June 4, 2001 (1A) (NewsBank).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

Des Moines Register to conclude that they “suffer silently.” This acquiescence, the newspaper intuited, might be related to some respondents’ being more concerned about the smoke’s impact on how their food tasted than about cancer; and even when someone was expressly worried about the health consequences of secondhand smoke, “after being seated just a table or two from the smoking section of one restaurant, he did not ask for a new table or leave the restaurant.” Instead of pointing out that moving to a different table would have been useless because the smoke penetrated throughout the restaurant, the Register suggested that even nonsmokers and owners who had banned smoking in their own restaurants preferred voluntary action to state intervention. Such views would have been warmly embraced by Doni DeNucci, the executive director of the Iowa Hospitality Association, who, oddly oblivious of the myriad regulations with which her members were already obligated to comply, opined: “When you start defining how private business does business, that sets a dangerous precedent.”

Ironically, the Lung Association, instead of focusing on educating nonsmokers about the lethal consequences of exposure to secondhand smoke and persuading them to be more assertive of their public health right not to be so exposed, backed development of a dining guide to (voluntarily) smokefree restaurants as a step toward mobilizing support for more substantial measures.330

In Ames a few days before the ordinance went into effect, Attorney General Miller spoke of “a cultural war between tobacco companies and life” before highlighting the importance of a 14-hour a day smoking ban and expressing hope that the ordinance would move toward a total 24-hour ban.331 By the time the Ames ordinance went into effect on August 1, 2001,332 Belitsos proudly (but exaggeratedly) hailed it as “the first time in Iowa that an entire city will be free from tobacco smoke when eating at local restaurants....” The Register’s editorial comment that “they’re ready to pop the champagne corks in Ames,”333 would very quickly prove itself to be premature: before long Philip Morris became the chief 332The signage for restaurants (“Smoke Free Dining”), which was labeled “[s]upported by” the Iowa Tobacco Control Program and Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, bullet-pointed three aspects: (1) smoking was not allowed in restaurants from 6 a.m. to 8:30 p.m., but was allowed in designated smoking sections from 8:30 p.m. to 6 a.m.; (2) the same rules applied to outdoor seating areas; and (3) no smoking was allowed within 15 feet of entrances/exits. “New Ames City Ordinance” (n.d.) (plastic original furnished by Linda Muston).

---

celebrant. In the meantime, enforcement was largely up to owners, some of whom had originally complained that the ordinance constituted an invasion of their privacy, though, in turn, some were optimistic that their businesses would not suffer at all. 334

CAFE Attacks Red Light/Green Light for Ames and Iowa City

Anything less than a 100% ban on smoking is not a ban. A part time no smoking ordinance is useless and does not address the health issue since it takes 2 weeks for smoke to clear a closed environment. No smoking for part of the day will not help. 335

CAFE was so intent on avoiding alienating even hard-core smokers that it did not even shy away from taking umbrage at the cigarette industry’s matter-of-fact reference to it as a “local anti-smoking group”: “We are not anti-smoking—we are anti-second hand smoke.” 336 This preposterously illogical claim, which, because it was wilfully blind to the source of secondhand smoke, was either misleading or should have disqualified CAFE as a critic of others’ partial bans, might nevertheless in a hyper-literalist sense have explained its fervent opposition to red light/green light schemes as based on the impact of the lingering smoke of past smoking. 337

337 The view was widespread in CAFE circles. For example, Prof. William Field, an epidemiologist and lung cancer researcher, explained to the city council that support for an ordinance was “not anti smoking. I know many smokers who are considerate of others and do not smoke in restaurants. All we are asking is that people do not smoke while they are in the restaurant.” Email from William Field to Iowa City Council (Oct. 16, 2001), in Iowa City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Oct. 23, 2001 Correspondence at 1, on http://www.iowa-city.org/weblink/docview.aspx?id=8142 (visited Oct. 19, 2008). CAFE’s position was in part driven by its inability to act consistently with the scientific basis of its support of public smoking bans—namely, that secondhand smoke exposure kills tens of thousands of people yearly in the United States—and its disingenuousness with regard to the identity of the agents of that killing. For example, Even before the Ames ordinance went into effect a steady barrage of harsh criticism of its central time- and smoke-share feature began being fired off from Iowa City. After the CAFE draft ban had lain dormant for half a year while the council occupied itself with underage drinking, the city attorney in April 2001 furnished the council with a memorandum summarizing the CAFE draft and the Ames ordinance and posing a number of questions as to the council’s policy preferences so that it could assist her in drafting an ordinance. The second question (following one as to whether members wanted to ban smoking in all “public places” or only in restaurants) read: “Do you wish to set limitations during which times smoking is permitted (similar to the Ames ordinance), and if so, for what time periods?”

At its special work session on April 16, the council finally devoted some attention to the subject. That there was no danger that a(n imaginary) council composed exclusively of zealous anti-smokers might get carried away with radical regulation had become clear just a month earlier during discussion of an addendum to the lease renewing the lease of the bus depot to Greyhound Lines, Inc. When Steven Kanner—a member of the Iowa City Green Party, who ran a non-partisan campaign focused on neighborhood organizing, exploration of municipally owned electricity, and a living wage and was perhaps the council’s most consistently anti-smoking member—proposed a ban on smoking in the building, Dee Vanderhoef, a sometime smoker, former nurse, and self-

Project manager of Clean Air for Everyone Johnson County denounced informing smokers, who for many years violated the University of Iowa’s various smoking policies, of their violations as “bullying” on the grounds that “it serves no purpose to alienate the very population who most is in need of services.” Wilfully ignoring the fact that anti-public smoking regulation (including forcing smokers to stand outside in the rain and cold in order to smoke) is part and parcel of a program of making smoking socially unacceptable (and not of showering smokers with respect for their suicidal and homicidal addiction), she added that “common sense and grant funding dictate that CAFE Johnson County continue its course of implementing widely-accepted tobacco control best practices, none of which include adopting a militant anti-smoker stance.” Email between Marc Linder and Beth Ritter Ruback (Feb. 24-25, 2006).

Telephone interview with Karen Kubby, Iowa City (Nov. 17, 2008) (former city council member).
described conservative,\textsuperscript{341} who ultimately supported a ban in restaurants, adamantly opposed one in the bus station on grounds that restaurant and bar owners would soon seize on as their own excuse: “I think individual businesses have the choice of whether they ban smoking in their establishment.” Serving as the swing vote, Vanderhoef joined the pro-business smoking members, Champion, O’Donnell, and Lehman, to defeat the amendment by a vote of 4 to 3.\textsuperscript{342}

Shortly before the Ames ban went into effect, even Iowa City councilor Ross Wilburn, a social and youth worker\textsuperscript{343} whom his colleague Kanner later characterized as a “middle-of-the-road Democrat,”\textsuperscript{344} made it clear that he disagreed with the Ames approach based on “evidence that it takes more than 24 hours for smoke to dissipate.”\textsuperscript{345} The Ames ordinance had barely been in force two weeks when Peter Wallace, local pediatrician and CAFE spokesperson, emailed the Iowa City Council that the “red-light, green-light’ compromise” not only had not worked and would not work, but that “Ames is considering changing theirs. As far as we know, if Ames tightens their ordinance up, we would be the only city in the United States with a red light/green light compromise if we passed one. It says something that no one else has found it workable.”\textsuperscript{346} A few days later council member Vanderhoef exposed this claim about second thoughts in Ames as disinformation: “[T]here have been several comments made in our community that it’s not working well and that the Ames City Council is going to do some changing on it and I was at a meeting with Mayor Tedesco this last week and he said it’s going very well and they have no intention of doing any changing up there [and] that they’re very pleased and that their restaurant owners are delighted with the way it has been designed for them...”\textsuperscript{347}

As the Iowa City Council was beginning to consider the ordinance, anti-secondhand smoking activists intensified their attacks on Ames-like partial bans.

\textsuperscript{342}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Meeting at 64-66 (quote at 66) (Mar. 5, 2001).
\textsuperscript{343}http://www.icgov.org/default/?id=1116 (visited Oct. 24, 2008).
\textsuperscript{344}Telephone interview with Steven Kanner, Cleveland, OH (Nov. 14, 2008).
\textsuperscript{347}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 48 (Aug. 20, 2001).
One scientist who offered no basis for his legal prediction assured the council: “Draft a good ordinance that does not include red/light light green light and it will not be successfully challenged (if challenged at all).” The day before the ordinance’s first reading before the council, the Press-Citizen opened its op-ed column to dueling pieces by Dr. Peter Wallace and the CEO of the Iowa Hospitality Association. After incorrectly asserting that the proposed ordinance embodied “a complete smoking ban in restaurants”—in fact, it did not cover restaurants with 50 or fewer seats—Wallace urged the council not to “fall prey” to the tobacco industry’s tactics, the result of the successful implementation of which meant that “Big Tobacco won in Ames.” Among the Ames “ploy[s]” and “compromises” against which he warned the council were red light/green light restrictions and “encourag[ing] area bars to become part of the equation.” To be sure, Wallace was completely correct in critically commenting both that “[t]he key to successful smoke-free restaurant policies is the removal of such visual smoking cues, such as ashtrays,” and posting no-smoking signs, both of which presupposed a totally smoke-free policy, and that time-restricted smoking policies continued to endanger the health of employees and customers who worked and ate during smoking-permitted hours.

The Cigarette Oligopoly Protects Its Investment in Its 1990 Preemption Amendment: Philip Morris Litigates to Invalidate the Ames Ordinance

So Philip Morris is picking up the tab for the lawsuit filed against the city’s no-smoking ordinance. Does this change things? Well, it does make it harder to pitch this as a struggle between independent little guys and overreaching government. Not only is Philip Morris paying for the suit, but local businesses participating in the fight were recruited by attorneys fighting the case.

On September 24, less than two months after the ordinance had been in force, owners of six restaurant/bars and a truck stop, (allegedly) catching the mayor

---

349 Peter Wallace, “Residents Want Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, Nov. 27, 2001 (9A:3-7 at 3-4).
351 On the truck stop owner (Bob James), who became the first named plaintiff in the case, see Daniel Lathrop, “Opponents Hope to Cool City’s Anti-Smoking Ardor,” Tribune of Ames completely by surprise, resorted to the state court system in an effort to enjoin the partial ban on the grounds that it both was inconsistent with the state law, which permitted smoking in designated smoking areas in public places, and that it harmed ""customer good will, business relationships and profits."" In affidavits filed with the request for a temporary injunction, two of the plaintiffs asserted that they were losing $500 to $700 a week in sales and $75 to $250 a day in food sales a day, respectively. Claiming that he closed his kitchen at 3 p.m. on Fridays so that smoking could start earlier, the general manager of the People's Bar and Grill asseverated that: ""Instead of being a "no-smoking ordinance," the effect on businesses in Ames, such as ours, has turned it into a "no-eating ordinance.""

At the temporary injunction hearing on October 2, 2001, lawyer Fred Dorr, asserting that some plaintiffs had suffered large revenue losses, while others considered closing their kitchens at times to limit their losses, and charging that Ames was ""making its business owners pay the price for a social experiment,"" asked state District Judge Carl Baker to lift the ban temporarily. City Attorney John Klaus, who continued to take comfort from Attorney General Miller's opinion supporting the ordinance's validity, counter-argued that concern about public health (""[t]he balance of harm is with people (injured by) secondhand smoke'') outweighed that about a restaurant's receipts. The judge was to rule on 352 Staci Hupp, "Smoking Ordinance Triggers Lawsuit," DMR, Sept. 26, 2001 (5B) (NewsBank). The mayor's surprise is difficult to reconcile with his aforementioned statement in November about a possible suit. Unlike the mayor, the Ames Tribune had deemed litigation inevitable. ""It Was Inevitable Smoking Ban Was Headed to Court,"" Tribune (Ames), Sept. 27, 2001 (A6:1) (edit.) (referring to editorial published on Oct. 13, 2000). Council member Steve Goodhue also stated later that he had not been ""surprised the business owners challenged the suit; they told us that from day one."" Email from Steve Goodhue to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2008).

---

Belitsos shed very interesting light on the litigation by suggesting that Big Tobacco had entered the dispute because plaintiffs’ lawyer, Fred Dorr, and his Des Moines law firm, Wasker, Dorr, Wimmer & Marcouiller, lobbied for the tobacco industry. Dorr claimed that “his firm did not lobby the Legislature for tobacco interests. But he wouldn’t comment about whether it represents tobacco companies.” (Belitsos related that he had simply called Dorr’s law firm and received a straightforward Yes when he asked the person answering the telephone whether this was the attorney for Philip Morris.)

Dorr’s denial to the contrary notwithstanding, the firm, which had been the lobbyist of the by this time deceased Tobacco Institute, was lobbying for Lorillard and Brown & Williamson, and Dorr himself, who had represented R. J. Reynolds in cases in the late 1990s, had defended tobacco companies in the personal injury suit relating to smoking brought by state Representative Philip Brammer and in the suit for Medicaid reimbursement brought by the State of Iowa.

The Ames restaurant owners may have appeared to be the plaintiffs, but the fact that Wasker, Dorr, Wimmer & Marcouiller, the cigarette companies’ principal Iowa lobbyist in general and the one specifically responsible for securing passage of the preemption amendment in 1990 which formed the basis of the suit, was the plaintiffs’ lawyer should have offered a hint that more than met the eye was going on. In fact, despite the new era allegedly ushered in by the Master Settlement Agreement, Philip Morris, in a cigarette industry tradition going back to the end of the nineteenth century in Iowa, had bought itself some plaintiffs to do its litigational bidding: a hundred years earlier the puppeteer (American Tobacco Company) chose local cigarette merchants to attack the constitutionality of Iowa’s cigarette sales ban; in the twenty-first century, owners of businesses in which the cigarette oligopolist’s commodities were consumed were the puppets of choice in challenging anti-smoking ordinances. According

---

360 See above ch. 31.
361 E.g., Bates No. 82120737/41.
362 E.g., Bates No. 86330229/38.
363 See above ch. 27.
364 See above chs 11-12.
to Rick Carmer, the most high-profile opponent of the ban and one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit, owners were “approached by” Philip Morris as a result of discussions they had had with “purveyors” of cigarettes sold by these establishments who then went back to their firms.\footnote{Telephone interview with Rick Carmer, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008). Glantz understated Philip Morris’s role by uncritically following news accounts portraying the company as financing a lawsuit initiated by individual owners. M. Nixon, L. Mahmoud, and S. Glantz, “Tobacco Industry Litigation to Deter Local Public Health Ordinances: The Industry Usually Loses in Court,” TC 13:65-73 at 70 (2004). Years later the plaintiffs’ lawyer refused to answer the question as to whether the owners would have filed suit had Philip Morris not financed it. Telephone interview with Fred Dorr, West Des Moines (Oct. 14, 2008).}

Belitsos’s accusation that Dorr’s law firm lobbied for the tobacco industry may have shrunk Dorr’s comfort zone, but Philip Morris, whose “massive profits” from Marlboro, “far and away the most lethal consumer product ever produced,”\footnote{A. Hyland et al., “Happy Birthday Marlboro: The Cigarette Whose Taste Outlasts Its Customers,” TC 15:75-77 at 75 (2006).} had apparently long since inured it to embarrassment or shame, had no qualms about disclosing that it would “pick up the tab” for the suit, which the company freely admitted was not the first of its kind that it had sponsored. To be sure, such a naked admission was not tantamount to a sudden conversion to truth-telling: instead, the company claimed that it had decided to foot the bill “because ‘we believe in business owner choice.... As they made the request to us, we decided this meets our business objective.... We think that our goals are mutual....’”\footnote{Staci Hupp, “Tobacco Concern Will Back Lawsuit Against Ames,” DMR, Oct. 3, 2001 (1B:6-7). The Philip Morris official quoted was Billy Abshaw, the company’s manager of media programs.} Unspoken was such an announcement’s intimidating impact on any other cities in Iowa that might have been considering adoption of their bans. The feisty Just Eliminate Lies group—judiciously allocating $16,000 of its funding from the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Division of the Iowa Department of Public Health, which derived from the Master Settlement Agreement—had a field day placing large ads in the Ames Tribune (as well as the Register and the Iowa State University student paper)\footnote{David Grebe, “Philip Morris Involvement Unites Anti-Smoking Forces,” Tribune (Ames), Oct. 9, 2001 (A1:4-5, at A4:4-6).} headed: “Secondhand smoke kills 53,000 people a year. Apparently, that’s not enough for Philip Morris.” If the target was beyond contrition, at least the public’s contempt for the company would presumably be reinforced by reading that its “mission” in “paying for a lawsuit against the city of Ames...is to overturn a city ordinance that protects the health of Iowans and our right to breathe clean air. Obviously, they believe their profits are more important than lives.\textsuperscript{369}

Angered himself by the suit, Belitsos predicted that “there would be ‘a lot of anger’” if smoking returned to Ames’s restaurants before 8:30 p.m. Recalling that the business community itself had proposed the compromise after the Ames Tobacco Task Force had sought a complete ban, he pointed out that with more than 800 communities having adopted smoking restrictions, the plaintiffs were “‘wasting their money,’ which would be better spent on ‘advertising and improving their business.’” Although Belitsos’s advice was misleading since the vast majority of those communities were located in states in which the ordinances’ validity was not threatened by a statewide preemption law, his implicit advice that the complaining owners should not look the gift horse that his movement had granted them in the mouth was perfectly on target: “‘The alternative is 100 percent smoke-free, because that’s what we will move to in the future.’”\textsuperscript{370}

Philip Morris’s intervention nevertheless made Belitsos very pessimistic: because the hospitality industry’s proposal of a compromise had seemed to banish the specter of litigation altogether, the vision of millions of dollars’ being pumped into combating local efforts prompted him to view the ordinance’s survival as “‘doubtful.’” In contrast, Quirmbach, though “disappointed that local restaurants would allow themselves to be used by the tobacco companies” (and thus in essence to double-cross the anti-smoking forces that had been willing to cut back on their demands in order to compromise with the owners), was “‘not the least bit surprised’” by Philip Morris’s action because “[i]t’s clear to me that we’ve initiated something here in Ames that’s catching on across Iowa. The tobacco companies have a lot to lose, they make money by producing a product that kills both the user and the people around the user.... We’ve tried to do the responsible thing to protect the people who unwittingly share the same airspace. Of course, the tobacco companies see that as a risk to their products.”\textsuperscript{371} Unclear was whether it was also clear to Quirmbach that Philip Morris was protecting its long-term investment in the lobbying that had created the preemptive legislation in 1990.\textsuperscript{372}

\textsuperscript{369}Tribune (Ames), Oct. 6, 2001 (B9).

\textsuperscript{372}Quirmbach’s colleague, Judie Hoffman, the council’s other anti-smoking advocate, had been unaware that preemption laws were the cigarette companies’ chief state
Nevertheless, Philip Morris’s advent in the court room did not instill defeatism in Belitsos: instead, the anti-tobacco coalition sought an ally in Iowa State University in order to extend similar restrictions to the campus (managers of some buildings had requested exemptions from the 15-foot no-smoking zone, not to get around the ordinance, but to offer their “‘clientele’” the ability to smoke “‘so that it won’t affect our business.’”): “‘You cannot underestimate the power of the tobacco industry to manipulate the legal process and public opinion,... They have at their disposal unlimited resources, and my main concern is that it’s going to be hard for a local community to withstand the onslaught of these resources.’” Again, it was unclear whether Belitsos himself was underestimating the manipulation that Philip Morris had effected in 1990 by creating the legal basis for its lawsuit a decade later. In any event, Belitsos’s pessimism was apparently contagious: at least five other cities, including Iowa City, that had been considering a smoking ban “dropped or delayed their plans.” The one silver lining in the adversity brought on by Philip Morris’ open involvement was that the health organizations that “once called the Ames ordinance a ‘‘victory for the tobacco industry’...changed their minds.” Suddenly, in a kind of my-enemy’s-victim-is-my-ally conversion, Threase Harms-Hassoun of the American Cancer Society announced that, although Ames’s was “‘not the best ordinance we could have, it’s still a step in the right direction. It’s important to Iowa and communities who have looked to Ames for taking the lead in this.’”

ACS chose to “‘come back in’” in order to “‘rally with our coalition partners who believe that reducing people’s exposure (is an important goal).’” The real reason, as Belitsos interpreted it, was not to help the group in Ames so much as to ward off the negative impact that Philip Morris’ victory might have on efforts in other cities, eight of which had either put their initiatives on hold or backed off from them.

Judge Baker’s ruling on October 23 denying the pro-smoking parties’ motion for a temporary injunction against the ordinance prompted an overjoyed Belitsos to invoke a kind of deus ex machina for the victory over Philip Morris: “‘Oh, thank God.’” Baker found plaintiffs’ arguments “not convincing” because the business owners had failed to prove any economic damage. Belitsos’ ATTF co-chair, Andrew Goedeken, predicted that with the ordinance’s continued enforcement “in 25 years every place would be smoke-free.”

---

At the hearing on Philip Morris’s marionettes’ motion for summary judgment on December 19, argument, correctly, focused on the crucial provision in the statute under which: “Smoking areas may be designated by persons having custody or control of public places, except in places in which smoking is prohibited by the fire marshal or by other law, ordinance, or regulation.”

Reaching for a formal canon of statutory construction remote from the substance of the smoking ban, Dorr argued that the law, ordinance, or regulation in question “must have the same character or nature (as that of a fire marshall regulation),” the reason being that “a general reference in state law follows a specific reference in its meaning.” Since the Ames ordinance banning smoking in restaurants and bars entirely during some times had nothing to do with fire safety, it conflicted with and therefore was preempted by state law. In contrast, Ames City Attorney Klaus, eschewing “legal theories” and basing his interpretation on “plain English,” insisted that the “legislature wanted to make clear that...there would be no smoking where smoking would be prohibited by ‘other law’.... If the legislature intended the cities not to have this ability, they would have closed the door.”

As far as the partial ban’s alleged economic impact on restaurants was concerned, Klaus relied on a study done by an ISU economist indicating that the long-term impact would be minimal, while short-term losses were a function of the uncertainty left in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attacks rather than of the ordinance.

Iowa City Adopts an Ordinance, Too

I mean I don’t know how many ordinances we can make that affect people’s personal

---

377 David Grebe, “Tobacco Suit Wafting Through the Courts,” Tribune (Ames), Dec. 20, 2001 (B1:2-5, B8:1-5). Dorr provided no legislative history on behalf of his claim; nor, for that matter, did Klaus in opposition. In fact, the legislative history is not consistent with Philip Morris’s position. See below.
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

property but how can you not [sic] be against non smoking restaurants?

“It doesn’t matter if people think the ordinance is right or wrong, we are going to do it,” said Councilor Connie Champion.

While the Ames City Council devoted much of its attention during the fall of 2000 to a smoking ban, Iowa City’s did not even hear back from the city attorney for half a year or initiate serious consideration of a draft ordinance for an entire year. Ames was, however, not completely out of mind: on November 6, the Iowa City city attorney briefly informed the council both that Ames had “passed or almost passed an ordinance prohibiting smoking in public places, restaurant, no smoking restaurant thing,” and that the attorney general would soon issue a legal opinion on the issue, which it would be “great for us to have...before we do it.”

By the fall of 2000 it was also becoming clear that CAFE’s efforts to persuade the city councils in the neighboring towns of Coralville and North Liberty were running into resistance from councilors purporting to be concerned about interfering with the rights of business owners. And a few months later another initiative suggested that Iowa City itself may not have been a hotbed of anti-smoking militance. In the fall of 2000 parents of children who played in a soccer club in a city park expressed concern about spectators smoking next to children both because of the secondhand smoke exposure and of the involvement of “adults modeling behavior...not consistent with a health and sports message.” That parks department officials stated publicly that they were not sure that they wanted “the headache of enforcing a ban” suggested that where smoking was involved, protecting even children might spark opposition.

380Tony Robinson, “Smoking Ban Vote Expected Next Week,” DI, Nov. 9, 2001 (1A:5-6).
381Transcription of Iowa City Council Work Session at 76 (Nov. 6, 2000).
event, at its meeting in mid-February 2001, the Parks and Recreation Commission voted 5 to 3 not to ban smoking at youth athletic events in city parks. The attitude of the commission chairman, who did not “‘feel it’s in our realm to prohibit that activity,’” toward smoking, change, and Iowa City was nicely captured by his reason for declining the parks director’s offer to try to determine what other communities’ smoking park smoking policies were: “‘I’ve been in a million ballparks and I’ve never seen a no-smoking sign.... But this is Iowa City.’”

As soon as it had unanimously supported proposed changes in regulation of alcohol consumption, in April 2001 the city council decided that it was finally in a position to devote some attention to a smoking ordinance. Early in the month the city attorney sent the council a memorandum mentioning that the attorney general’s opinion gave Iowa City “considerable latitude to regulate smoking in public places” and pointing out that the ordinance that Ames had passed covered establishments with as little as 10 percent food sales but also permitted smoking from 8:30 p.m. to 6 a.m. Dilkes then requested that the council answer a number of questions to give her guidance in drafting. Working (apparently) from the Ames ordinance, she asked whether the council wanted to: (1) prohibit smoking in all public places or only in restaurants; (2) set time limits during which smoking was permitted; (3) base limitations on percentage of food sales; (4) exempt establishments that served alcohol and seated fewer than 50; (5) exempt certain kinds of establishments such as truck stops or bowling alleys; (6) prohibit minors’ presence in smoking areas; (7) prohibit smoking in outdoor seating areas; and (8) impose penalties different than those under the clean indoor air act.

At its special work session on April 16, the city council initially had little trouble limiting coverage to restaurants, but one council member succeeded in shaking up his colleagues a bit by reminding them that if secondhand smoke was dangerous to people, then the council had an obligation to protect all workers in public spaces. Apparently sensing that Kanner’s reasoning might actually prevail, Mayor Lehman tried to rush to a vote before others changed their minds, but Kanner asked for discussion. Irvin Pfab expressed support for the wide ban in principle, but not if the public were not “ready” for it. All Kanner had to do to 386 Sara Langenberg, “City Council Turns Focus on Smoking,” ICP-C, Apr. 4, 2001 (3A) (NewsBank); Sara Langenberg, “Smoking Next on Council’s Table,” ICP-C, Apr. 13, 2001 (3A) (NewsBank).

---

elicit Pfab’s agreement was to express his belief that “the majority is ready for it” because “the healthy space movement” had been going on for 30 years and had picked up steam. But when Lehman wanted to know whether anyone else was interested in considering the larger ban, even Pfab backslid, enabling Lehman to declare that restaurants alone would be covered.\textsuperscript{388} Dilkes’s question as to whether the council wanted to adopt time limitations as in the Ames ordinance prompted an instantaneous “Absolutely not” from Pfab, but Lehman’s reformulating the question as whether it was possible for a restaurant to turn into a bar after a certain hour caused sufficient disorientation to put the matter into abeyance until the council had defined a covered “restaurant,” though even at this point “carry over smoke” and the possibility that it took several days for “carsenagens [sic] to go out of the air” exercised at least Vanderhoef.\textsuperscript{389} After an extended but not compelling consideration had tentatively settled on more than 50 percent sales from food as the defining characteristic of a restaurant and acceptance of coverage of small restaurants,\textsuperscript{390} no one was willing to speak in favor of time limitations, though several members eventually wished to hear public reactions to the proposal.\textsuperscript{391} By this point, O’Donnell, who opposed regulation altogether, ironically boasted that “I think we’ve already improved a lot on what...Ames did.”\textsuperscript{392} He doubtless perceived further progress in the next decision, spearheaded by him and his two smoking colleagues (Lehman and Champion), that smoking not be banned in outdoor restaurant areas; in contrast, only Pfab saw the need for protection there as well.\textsuperscript{393} Finally, the size of the monetary penalty was disposed of quickly, especially since a representative of the non-confrontational CAFE emphasized that it did not want to be “punitive.”\textsuperscript{394} The policy directives that the council gave Dilkes to mould into an ordinance were not definitive, but they proved to be very similar to the ban that the council

\textsuperscript{389}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 62-63 (Apr. 16, 2001).

\textsuperscript{390}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 63-72 (Apr. 16, 2001).

\textsuperscript{391}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 72-73 (Apr. 16, 2001). Because the council had rejected time limitations, it deemed the Ames provision prohibiting minors from being present during smoking-permitted times moot. Id. at 74.

\textsuperscript{392}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 75 (Apr. 16, 2001).

\textsuperscript{393}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 75-77 (Apr. 16, 2001). Only on this point did City Attorney Dilkes make substantive remarks, pointing out that the distinction was similar to designating smoking and non-smoking areas and that employees would be exposed to smoke, and asking whether the policy rationale was that the smoke blew away and was “[r]ecirculated to the world....” Id. at 76-77.

\textsuperscript{394}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 78 (Apr. 16, 2001).
would adopt nine months later. At this point it embodied these elements: (1) a ban on smoking in restaurants only; (2) no time limitations; (3) a definition of “restaurants” as deriving more than 50 percent of their gross revenues from food sales; (4) coverage of all restaurants regardless of seating capacity; (5) no coverage of outdoor restaurants; and (6) penalties of $25 for the smoker and escalating penalties of $100/$250/$500 for owners and managers.\footnote{Iowa City Council Work Session, Minutes at 3 (Apr. 16, 2001). See also Sara Langenberg, “City to Draft Smoking Ordinance,” \textit{ICP-C}, Apr. 17, 2001 (1A) (NewsBank).}

The scope of coverage generated by these features, which excluded from protection anyone working or eating in an establishment less than half of the revenues of which stemmed from food (compared to less than one-tenth in Ames), was extraordinarily narrow given the absolute and growing predominance of student drinking establishments in the central downtown business district. \footnote{Ralph Wilmoth, Director of the Johnson County Public Health Department, prepared the sequence of bar density slides (emailed to Marc Linder, Feb. 9, 2006). The borders of “downtown” were S. Clinton St., E. Burlington St., S. Gilbert St., and Iowa Ave. The vast majority of the licenses were located in an even more circumscribed downtown defined by S. Capitol St., E. College St., S. Linn St., and Iowa Ave.} Since, as the manager of one of them pointed out, “most downtown establishments won’t be hurt by the ordinance because a majority of their revenue is derived from alcohol,”\footnote{Deidre Bello, “Officials Shrug Off Non-Smoking Setback,” \textit{DI}, July 17, 2001 (1:1, at 3:1-4 at 2).} CAFE’s decision to compromise in this fashion may have been driven by the desire to neutralize what might have proved to be the most virulent source of opposition to a ban, albeit at the price of continuing to expose thousands of college students (including employees) to secondhand smoke and intense peer pressure to smoke.

However, there was no surer symbol of CAFE’s enrollment in the vanguard of the national anti-smoking movement than the fact that, whereas ATTF just a half-year earlier had earned Stanton Glantz’s dismissive criticism, in May 2001 Glantz came to Iowa City, where he spoke at a CAFE-sponsored clean indoor air conference, placing his unambiguous imprimatur on its (i.e., his) strategy: “‘Iowa isn’t California right now, but it’s about like California was in 1987, just as things started to take off. These people really have their act together. They are very organized, and they will succeed.’” He “predicted a comprehensive ordinance would pass in Iowa City in the next few months” because Iowa City satisfied the
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

The requisite public education component of “aiming the message where it would be received, a core of activists and city council support.” To be sure, in his pep talk Glantz failed to reconcile the seal of approval he bestowed on CAFE with his previously published analysis of the lessons to be learned from the California experience, in particular, that: “A successful program is not simply directed at keeping kids from smoking but at protecting nonsmokers from secondhand smoke and creating environments that facilitate smokers’ decisions to cut down or quit. Most important, a successful campaign de-legitimates tobacco use....”

Nevertheless, in a grotesque clash with this precept, numerous CAFE spokespeople went out of their way to emphasize publicly that the goal of preventing secondhand smoke exposure in no way entailed any critique of smoking itself. For example, just a month earlier, Dr. Leslie Weber, a physician and prominent CAFE member, had stated at a public forum on a smoking ban in Coralville: “‘I’ve seen the effects of smoking of all kinds in my patients.... Nothing good is to be said about cancer. ... We’re not against smoking. But we are against smoking in restaurants.’” And CAFE’s spokesperson, Dr. Ballinger, disingenuously denying smokers’ agency (for the 53,000 secondhand-smoke-caused deaths that the anti-smoking movement incessantly and rightfully drove home as the basis for public smoking laws) reinforced this hands-off-the-smoker image: “‘This is not anti-smokers.... This has nothing to do with the people behind the cigarette. It’s just so people who want to go out to eat can breathe clean air.’”

Ironically, this stance, which was deeply rooted in CAFE’s anti-confrontational, non-militant organizational ethos, stood in glaring

---

400 Andrew Dawson, “Many Want Smoke,” ICP-C, Apr. 18, 2001 (1A:1).

402 Sara Langenberg, “City Council Turns Focus on Smoking,” ICP-C, Apr. 4, 2001 (3A) (NewsBank).

403 See above this chapter. CAFE programmatically refused to revise CAFE Johnson County, The Johnson County Smoke-Free Dining & Entertainment Guide (Jan. 2006), in order to point out which “smoke-free” businesses nevertheless sold cigarettes and especially which ones had been caught in stings illegally selling to minors. Email between Beth Ritter Ruback (CAFE Project Manager) and Marc Linder (Feb. 23, 24, 25, and 26, contradiction to one of Glantz’s “few simple rules for beating the tobacco industry”: “Do not be afraid of controversy; use it.”

That a considerable lack of unity and understanding still prevailed on the council regarding the ban four months after it had given the city attorney policy directions for drafting an ordinance was clearly on display at the special work session on July 30. Indeed, the incompetence and lack of seriousness of purpose exhibited by the two overt opponents of a ban, Champion and O’Donnell, were so blatant that they raised the possibility that these two smoking businesspeople were in fact engaged in the kind of intentional delay that could redound only to the benefit of the cigarette oligopoly, one of whose tactics in combating local ordinances featured delay.

The discussion was ostensibly prompted by the city attorney’s having included in the information packet for the session data that the council back in April had requested her to collect on alcohol sales of establishments with liquor licenses on the basis of which she sought the council’s direction with regard to drafting an ordinance in accordance with its last directive that such a ban exempt establishments with alcohol sales in excess of 50 percent of total sales. The city administration had sent survey letters to 83 liquor license holders; of the 49 respondents 20 stated that alcoholic beverages accounted for 50 percent or more of their total receipts (and would therefore presumably be exempt), whereas such sales fell short at the other 29 (which would presumably be covered by the smoking ban).

Memorandum from Eleanor Dilkes, City Attorney, to City Council, Re: Smoking in Restaurants (July 24, 2001), in City Council Information Packet 1 for July 30 Work Session. Dilkes provided no information about the 34 non-respondents and whether they were largely bars or restaurants. Several owners wrote qualitative comments: three stated that they had been no-smoking for years, including one who nevertheless opposed the ban because the decision should be the owner’s. Although the owner of Givanni’s, Jim Having given the council the information, Dilkes, who repeated that she felt “comfortable” drafting the ordinance “particularly in light of the Attorney General’s opinion,” explained to the members at the special work session that they now needed to tell her what to do. (In reading the following account it is necessary to bear in mind that the absence of Dee Vanderhoef, who would have cast the decisive fourth vote for a ban, put the council’s orientation at this meeting in a misleading light.) Wilburn immediately declared that he wanted to proceed with the ordinance, including the 50-percent or more provision. His decisiveness was countered by the incoherent waffling of Champion, who purported to believe that restaurants should be non-smoking (though perhaps only according to “the idea of Ames where there is non smoking up to a certain time”), but then contradicted herself by acknowledging that she did “have problems with this ordinance” because “I feel like we’re being big brother that people who own restaurants and bars ought to be able to kind of decide who comes into their restaurant, I can decide who comes into my clothing store.” In adding that she wanted “more input from the people who are really going to be affected,” she meant her fellow business owners—“people out there who’s [sic] businesses will be deathly affected by this ordinance and I guess I do have problems with that”—(and perhaps smokers), but not non-smokers who sought smoke-free environments. Wilburn then framed the controversy in the by that time nationally familiar (but nevertheless largely incoherent) terms of health versus rights (as if there were no right to health and as if there were a right to engage in homicidal activity), and declared his allegiance to the former, while emphasizing that businesses were not given the option of letting their employees not wash their hands before handling food. Champion’s irrelevant comment that the state prescribed such regulations prompted Mayor Lehman to wonder aloud whether they should not then “get the state to do this.” Undaunted, Wilburn retorted that since the state was apparently not going to do it, he as a council member was willing to do so. He also used the opportunity to reject time-limited smoking bans on the grounds that carcinogens took a certain amount of time to disappear. In his own inimitable fashion Irvin Pfab peremptorily short-circuited the discussion:

Mondanaro, did not state that the restaurant was no-smoking, he opined that the owner should make the decision and then customers could choose whether to go to a smoking or non-smoking establishment. See also Sara Langenberg, “City Council to Again Discuss Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, July 27, 2001 (3A) (NewsBank) (erroneously dated Dec. 18).

408 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 65 (July 30, 2001).
409 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 64 (July 30, 2001).
410 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 66 (July 30, 2001).
411 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 64 (July 30, 2001).
“I think it’s a health issue, case closed.” Despite Kanner’s objection to a time-limited ban because of the enforcement difficulties, Champion was concerned about restaurants that turned into bars at 8 or 9 p.m. Dilkes patiently explained that the council had already discussed and rejected time limits, but Champion insisted that she needed public input in order to evaluate an ordinance. Populist Kanner was certainly not opposed to a public hearing, but forewarned his colleagues that the “very powerful” tobacco industry would “put up front groups to look like grass root groups....” Dismissing such concerns—“[t]hat’s not what I want to hear”—Champion redundantly made clear how narrow her agenda was: “what I want to hear is how people’s businesses are going to be affect[ed].” Another thing Champion did not want to hear was Pfab’s contention that the council perhaps had an obligation to protect the public’s health: “The public can pretty much protect themselves they don’t have to go into that restaurant.”

Although Champion purported to see the eventual handwriting on the wall for public smoking, her highest priority was “thinking about some way to do this and not affect people’s businesses.” But when Kanner pointed out to her that studies showed that bans did not have a negative economic effect if there was a “level playing field,” she objected that the existence of restaurants that turned into bars and the lack of a ban in neighboring Coralville would thwart the creation of such equality. This stalemate provided the perfect opportunity for her smoking partner in delay, O’Donnell, to opine that “[i]t appears like we need some more discussion.” Pfab, in contrast, was growing impatient with a discussion that was getting long in the tooth and persisted in that view even after Lehman and Dilkes pointed out that most of the delay since CAFE’s submission of the ordinance in the fall of 2000 had resulted from the council’s preoccupation with alcohol. Wilburn, Pfab, and Kanner saw no problem with a straightforward draft based on coverage of establishments with more than 50 percent sales from food and no provision for time-limited smoking, but Champion and O’Donnell wanted to start with an ordinance containing the Ames arrangement, and although Lehman did not expressly take a position, Dilkes correctly intuited that “[l]ooks like you’ve got 3 to 3 at the moment.” (In fact, this very early constellation, augmented by the vote of the absent Vanderhoef, would remain the pattern until the ordinance’s final adoption half a year later.) Desirous of insuring that red light/green light not be the starting point of the council’s deliberations, Kanner argued for beginning with what CAFE proposed as its “strongest position” and modifying it until it was

\[412\] Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 65-66 (July 30, 2001).
\[413\] Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 67 (July 30, 2001).
\[414\] Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 68-70 (July 30, 2001).
\[415\] Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 71-72 (July 30, 2001).
“at least more acceptable to all sides....” The mayor, who apparently no longer remembered that members had had the CAFE proposal since October 2000, asked Dilkes whether they would “accomplish anything...if we got copies of that proposed ordinance, let the Council digest it and then at the next work session discuss it with you....” Although she refrained from expressly identifying her at-will employers’ individual and collective amnesia, Dilkes nevertheless offered to “run through the same list of questions I ran through with you in April”; likewise, when Lehman asked whether she might make some notes on the CAFE ordinance before giving it to the members, she agreed to give them the same memo that she had given them in April and “go through that again.”

Thus, the only upshot of the entire discussion was to request that Dilkes hand the members exactly the same two documents that she had given them 10 and four months earlier, respectively, and that manifestly the opponents had failed to study or, apparently, even to retain. The council, in the Press-Citizen’s diplomatic phraseology, had merely “retrace[d] smoking ban steps” and gone “back over that ground....” Dilkes barely concealed her impatience with the council when, a week later, she stressed that she was “again” enclosing the same materials for their information, adding that it was her understanding that it was the members’ “desire to discuss again whether you wish to proceed with the ordinance and what form you desire it to take.”

One of the opponents’ pretexts for delaying the progress of the ban appeared to be vulnerable to puncturing when Mayor Lehman announced on August 16 that he would be asking the council to request a joint meeting with the Coralville city council in order to consider collaboration to achieve the “level playing field” that “the public” was “constantly” demanding. The very same day CAFE, making sure that the Iowa City Council at its work session on August 20 would appreciate the importance that the group attached to its initiative, held a rally at which Dr. Ballinger declared that it was the council’s “duty” to “draft a strong smoke-free ordinance without compromise....

---

416Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 73-74 (July 30, 2001).
In the event, the mayor did request the council’s permission, but proponents of a ban on the council wondered whether the plan to cooperate with Coralville—whose city council had thus far failed to muster a majority in favor of a ban—might, to the contrary, prove to be an engine of still further delay. Indeed, Kanner went far beyond wondering: to the conciliatory assurance offered by Champion—who predicted a total ban in a few years, but argued that the town was not yet ready for it—that “[w]e all...know we’re going to say yes [to a ban] we just don’t know what we’re going to say yes to,” he bluntly counterposed his sense that “we’re not all going to say yes, we’ve seen across the country, the patterns are the same everywhere, the pressure comes to water down a bill, make it weaker and weaker and I see this just as part of that pattern of delaying it, talking to the neighbor who has shown that they don’t want to deal with this at the present time in any meaningful way and this is just one more excuse to not pass something strong and make it a healthier environment for the workers and for the children that go into these places.”

Kanner also specified the means of such dilution such as Philip Morris’s strategy of accommodation, including red light/green light arrangements. (Amusingly, O’Donnell, who claimed that “I’m going to end up supporting this at one time or another,” but never did, called the Ames procedure “ludicrous” because it suggested that “after 8:00 smoke doesn’t hurt you....”) As opponents insured that the discussion floundered, Wilburn and Pfab deplored the fact that the council was not even going to deal with the matters that it had asked City Attorney Dilkes to go over with the members. Kanner was willing to agree to the mayor’s suggestion of devoting a whole work session to the topic on the condition that that meeting take place very soon, but Lehman felt that since “people have smoked in restaurants for 200 years, a few days one way or the other is not critical....” In the end, the only action that a council majority took was to request that an invitation be extended to the Coralville council to discuss a smoking ban at a joint

---

423 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 54 (Aug. 20, 2001).
424 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 54 (Aug. 20, 2001).
425 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 50 (Aug. 20, 2001).
426 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 51 (Aug. 20, 2001).
427 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 55, 58, 59 (Aug. 20, 2001).
428 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 61 (Aug. 20, 2001).
meeting on September 5.\textsuperscript{429} Even before the joint meeting took place, Coralville Mayor Jim Fausett suggested that that city council might not be ready to adopt a ban like Iowa City’s; at the same time, Mayor Lehman remarked that Iowa City would forge ahead alone if necessary.\textsuperscript{430} In the event, as ban supporters had foreseen, Fausett declared during the meeting that Iowa City should proceed on its own because, although things might change, the Coralville council was not yet ready. Ironically, one of its members, John Weihe, who in fact opposed a ban, chose to attack one of his Iowa City policy-mates in pretending that he preferred an all-or-nothing approach: “‘If I were going to be supportive of it, I’d include bars and vacuum cleaner stores if it’s truly a health issue’” (alluding to O’Donnell, who owned a vacuum cleaner store in Coralville). The flagging commitment on the Coralville council can also be gauged by the attitude of one of its purported ban backers: David Jacoby argued that Coralville residents “‘would be more pro-ordinance if there were no options’”—but in fact the city already had two smoke-free establishments.\textsuperscript{431}

On September 10, 2001, the Iowa City council finally scheduled October 16 as the date for a special smoking work session the first hour of which was to be devoted to public comment (equally divided between proponents and opponents) and the second hour to council discussion.\textsuperscript{432} By the time of the meeting the legal landscape had been potentially altered by the advent of Philip Morris’s judicial challenge to the Ames ordinance, but if one of the cigarette oligopoly’s purposes in fomenting litigation was to deter other cities from adopting their own ordinances by intimidating them with the financial burden of a court defense, it missed its target in Iowa City, where CAFE held a rally in front of city hall at the conclusion of a march before the meeting.\textsuperscript{433}
The Town Hall Meeting: October 16, 2001

[It seems like the 65 percent is a number that we’ve not arrived at scientifically, maybe it’s a very good number, maybe it is not, but I think we have to start somewhere and...if it works, great.]

A standing-room only overflow audience attended the two-and-a-half hour special smoking working session on October 16 devoted entirely to the ordinance. Only a few owners spoke, but the core theme of their angry statements was questioning the justification for the city’s “taking away the rights of a business man to cater to the market” instead of letting “the market decide whether or not smoking is a good thing....” This argument was linked to the claim that CAFE had targeted restaurants “because they think they can politically get it passed...and they can’t politically get it passed against everybody else.” To try to derail this strategy the anti-ordinance group did not have to reach far to make the point that “[i]f second hand smoke is bad in restaurants it’s bad in lawyers offices, it’s bad in car garages....” (To be sure, when owners’ perpetual call for a “level playing field” was put to the test, the response, unsurprisingly, was that “I wouldn’t campaign for it [i.e., a total smoking ban] because...I don’t think it’s a function that government should be fulfilling.”)

Another restaurant owner, seething over “[w]hy...you believe that you guys are qualified to tell me how to run my business,” got more personal: after eliciting from the three smoking business owners on the council, Champion, Lehman, and O’Donnell, that he would not be permitted to smoke in their dress, luggage, and vacuum repair shops, respectively, he rhetorically asked whether they had made these decisions on their own or had consulted with the other council members.

An obliging O’Donnell offered the very market-knows-best answer for which the restaurant owners were looking: “When I had my Burger King downtown and I had my convenience store, I had many people come up to me and ask me if I would be smoke free and that’s what I base[d] my decision on.”

---

434 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 51 (Oct. 16, 2001) (Mayor Lehman), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/58.pdf.
435 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 1 (Oct. 16, 2001).
436 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 3-4 (Oct. 16, 2001) (Daryl Woodson, The Sanctuary).
437 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 6 (Oct. 16, 2001) (Kevin Perez, owner of 126).
438 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 5 (Oct. 16, 2001) (Kevin Perez).
439 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 7 (Oct. 16, 2001).
Restaurant owners’ special pleading was considerably less plausible when anti-smoking council members questioned them about public health. For example, when Wilburn asked about the imposition of public health regulation concerning food handling, one owner irrelevantly replied that “you can’t see saminila [sic], you can see and smell smoke”; but even after conceding, in extremis, that some health and safety regulation might be necessary, he sought to evade the issue by analogizing tobacco to obesity and requiring McDonald’s to “get rid of the deep fat fryers,” only to return to the mantra: “You know, there’s a point where it needs to become a market place decision, you know your [sic] not punishing tobacco companies with this, your [sic] punishing small businesses.” After pointing out that in fact Philip Morris did fear such bans lest they cause smokers to quit, Kanner asked the same owner about the health impact on non-smoking workers since the labor market did not automatically slot only smokers into workplaces subject to secondhand smoke exposure, but received only the same evasively unrealistic answer: “I would not choose to work in a meat packing plant because that’s pretty dangerous work even though I might need the job I would choose to take another position, I might choose not to work at a computer terminal all day because of the dangers of carpal tunnel syndrome.”

Following the owners a host of physicians spoke in favor of the ordinance. Dr. Miles Weinberger, the head of the Allergy and Pulmonary Division of the Pediatrics Department at the University of Iowa Hospital, noted that a strong argument could be made for extending the ban beyond restaurants and bars, “but politics is always the art of the possible and you’ve got to start somewhere. Restaurants are a logical place, it levels the playing field for all the restaurant owners....” An allergist, Dr. John Kammermeyer, underscored even the short-term health consequences by pointing out that “exposure to secondhand smoke for half an hour impairs coronary blood flow just as much as it is impaired in chronic smokers. So it has a major quick impact on the person[’]s coronary blood flow and the risk of heart disease and heart attacks.” For precisely such reasons, “if I had my druthers...I think we should have a ban in all public places....” A different perspective was offered by a pediatrician, Dr. Tom Rosenberger, who explained that banning smoking in various public places would help prevent adolescents who came as non-smoking students to Iowa City from perceiving smoking as a ubiquitously acceptable practice that would prompt them to start.

Dr. Ballinger, a CAFE spokesperson, drawing an invidious comparison with the

---

440 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 8-9 (Oct. 16, 2001) (Woodson).
441 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 14 (Oct. 16, 2001).
442 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 16 (Oct. 16, 2001).
443 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 17 (Oct. 16, 2001).
Ames ban and taking a maximalist position which not even her own group’s draft ordinance lived up to, reminded the council of the three simple components of an effective smoke-free restaurant ban: (1) coverage of all restaurants where a meal was served; (2) all-day coverage; and (3) no exemptions or compromises. She concluded her hard-hitting remarks by urging the council not to let itself be distracted into forgetting that because workers’ and customers’ health was “priceless...it shouldn’t be trivialized by comparing it to false claims without basis about loss of business revenues.”

Potentially crucial information was presented by an economics professor at the University of Iowa, John Solow, who, by focusing on the economics consequences for businesses of the smoking ban, might have fatally undermined owners’ central line of attack. To begin with, he reminded owners, who “can see only the smokers who are to leave their businesses...that there are more non-smokers who may come to their businesses and since far more people are non-smokers than smokers in the United States there’s no reason to believe that the one is going to out weight [sic] the other....” Less speculatively, he called attention to dozens of solid nation-spanning empirical studies based on objective sales tax data—and “not based on people’s fears, people’s beliefs, people’s anecdotal evidence”—showing that smoking bans had no effect at all on the restaurant business. Solow even addressed the level playing field issue associated with a ban-less Coralville by pointing to the same situation in Palo Alto/Mountain View, California, which, again, generated no impact. In the end, then, Solow concluded that “you should try to lay that to rest and go on with what the doctors say is good for the health of our citizens....” The only problem with this analysis was its failure to deal with the objection raised earlier in the evening by an owner who referred to such sales tax studies whose macro-level analysis was incapable of identifying individual restaurants that had gone out of business because their sales taxes were more than made up for by the opening of a new fast food restaurant. When Kanner reminded Solow of the point, the economist called it a “really good question” that he was unable to answer, although he did point out that a study of Madison, Wisconsin had found that more new businesses opened than closed in the wake of a ban. (In fact, a doctoral dissertation... supervised by Solow that analyzed Iowa City restaurant sales from 1999 to 2004 found that the ban had no significant effect on Iowa City restaurants or on any of five segments based on smoking policy.)\textsuperscript{448}

After more than an hour and a half of public comment\textsuperscript{449} the mayor eloquently opened council debate: “Okay guys what’s your pleasure?” Advising his colleagues that there was “no point in delaboring [sic] this discussion...if we do not have the will to move forward with this,” Lehman prompted Kanner, Champion, and Pfab to affirm their interest. But before he let them proceed, he asked the city attorney for “a brief run down on the Ames situation.”\textsuperscript{450} In a short-circuited description of the preemption issue that no one not immersed in the case could possibly have understood, Dilkes, while admitting that “there’s some language that it’s tough to figure,” nevertheless (again) assured the council that she had “gained a lot of comfort by the Attorney General’s opinion [that “there was no preemption by the State Code”] and...was comfortable with you all proceeding.”\textsuperscript{451} Nor was Dilkes alone. Kanner, for example, who was personally lobbied by Attorney General Tom Miller to support the ordinance on the grounds that preemption would not be an obstacle, felt that Miller’s personal approval and authority instilled council members with a certain sense of “safeness” in voting for an ordinance without which the whole campaign would have turned out otherwise. In addition, the city attorney herself, whom Kanner regarded as in general offering the council conservative legal advice, might well have withheld her endorsement of the lawfulness of the ordinance without the \textsuperscript{448} In particular, the crucial group of restaurants that had permitted and were required by the ordinance to ban smoking “did not lose revenue or their market share as feared by local restaurant owners.” Megan Sheffer, “Economic Evaluation of the [Impact of the] Iowa City Smoke-Free Restaurant Ordinance on [sic] the Iowa City Restaurant Industry” at 60 (Ph.D. diss. U. Iowa, 2007). Although sales rose in Coralville restaurants that permitted smoking, there was no evidence that that increase came at the expense of Iowa City restaurants. \textit{Id.} at 67. See also Megan Sheffer, John Solow, and Christopher Squier, “An Economic Evaluation of the Iowa City Smoke-Free Restaurant Ordinance,” Abstract #162207, American Public Health Association, 135th Meeting (Nov. 6, 2007), on http://apha.confex.com/apha/135am/techprogram/paper_162207.htm (visited Nov. 19, 2008).

\footnotesize

\textsuperscript{449} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 29 (Oct. 16, 2001).

\textsuperscript{450} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 30 (Oct. 16, 2001).

\textsuperscript{451} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 31 (Oct. 16, 2001).
attorney general’s opinion.

With no councilor rushing to make any proposal and Lehman himself not “know[ing] quite how to do this,” he asked Dilkes for an operating definition of a “restaurant” as contradistinguished from a bar and the members whether they wanted a 24-hour ban or the Ames red light/green light option. Noting that they had been bogged down in this same discussion since April, she explained that although she grasped their “idea” that “the more food the more important the ban, the more alcohol the less important,” she still needed to “know from you all what percentage your [sic] talking about.” Instead of a straight answer, Champion, a smoker who paid lip service to the need for a ban and confessed that the number of young people smoking in town “totally amazes me,” expressed concern for restaurants that turned into bars after a certain hour and “would be hurt by this ordinance....” Although she believed that a ban would not have a negative impact on most restaurants at all because, like her, a smoker, most people preferred non-smoking establishments, she still wanted to eliminate the adverse competitive effect of exempt bars on restaurants that “do a big bar business.....”

Putting a halt to the seemingly aimless drifting of the conversation, Pfab, out of nowhere, mentioned that at one point Champion had suggested 60 or 70 percent (food sales) as the definitional marker, the point of which at the time he had not grasped, but now he was proposing 70 percent—a figure that was 20 percentage points less inclusive than CAFE’s draft and a full 60 percentage points less encompassing than the Ames ordinance. Pfab’s suggestion immediately provoked resistance from Kanner, who argued that if the major concerns were competitive fairness to owners and health protection for workers and children, the answer was a total ban: “I think if we take that leap as a city...that puts us ahead actually...that’s something that attracts people to our city...if we’re going to attract conferences, I think we’ll get more business...being smoke free.” Urging his colleagues to assume that “leap in leadership,” he proposed making all commercial venues smoke free. Once again paying lip service to the notion that the city would eventually adopt such a broad scope, the inveterately naysaying Champion doubted that the town was ready for that step because not even CAFE thought so. Still operating in a timid mode (but about to vacillate), Pfab was sticking with politics as “the art of the possible,” which Kanner appeared to regard as malleable so that if the council would just exercise leadership, CAFE

452 Telephone interview with Steven Kanner, Cleveland, OH (Nov. 14, 2008). Kanner did not know, but assumed that Miller had also spoken to other council members.

453 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 32-33 (Oct. 16, 2001).

454 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 33-34 (Oct. 16, 2001).
“would be happy to have a total ban....” 455 Not interested in devoting precious council time to the pursuit of Kanner’s will-o’-wispish utopian idiosyncrasies, the mayor—whom Kanner later characterized as a “right-wing Republican” 456—tentatively cut short the discussion to “see how many of us are willing to exhibit the leadership and go for a 100 percent ban.” Pfab, in his inimitable style allowed as he “would if we’d do it,” thus qualifying himself as Kanner’s only backer of a ban that would have applied to all public places, including stores and bowling alleys, and prompting Lehman to declare that radical proposal stillborn (“I think perhaps we won’t spend our time discussing that”) and to steer the council back to the prosaic reality of defining restaurants by the proportion of food sales.457

Champion was delighted to water down coverage to “family restaurants,” that is, ones “where people are not drinking large amounts of alcohol...really you go there you have dinner you might have one, the maximum two glasses of wine....” Turning undisguisedly personal, she revealed that: “I love wine but I never have more than two, when I’m out at a restaurant, so I mean I might be able to be very comfortable with that and totally support it.” So long as she felt snug in her comfort zone, it was irrelevant that her proposal “may not be exactly what CAFE wants, but it’s a strong beginning....” 458 How she could possibly know how strong her ban would be when the city attorney told the council that the city had collected data only on bars with 50 percent food sales459 Champion failed to explain. Although a recent trip to Provincetown had proved to her that under a public places smoking ban even the bars were “jammed [sic] packed,” for Iowa City nothing but “small steps” would do. She succeeded in reinforcing her comfort level by prompting the owner of a restaurant/pub with live performances by local musicians to declare that “that number in that range would probably...safe [sic] us and at the other places.”460

Kanner discomforted Champion by inverting her proportions and proposing a smoking ban in any place 20 or 30 percent of whose sales stemmed from food, thus excluding only bars that sold “a few chips or something”; she opposed any law that covered bars that served bar food and thus enabled young people to drink without eating.461 The mayor then animated those who had yet to reveal their

455 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 34 (Oct. 16, 2001).
456 Telephone interview with Steven Kanner, Cleveland, OH (Nov. 14, 2008).
457 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 35 (Oct. 16, 2001).
458 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 36 (Oct. 16, 2001).
459 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 41 (Oct. 16, 2001).
460 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 36 (Oct. 16, 2001) (Woodson).
461 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 37 (Oct. 16, 2001).
position to speak up. Vanderhoef admitted that she too had not been entirely “comfortable” with 50/50, but with 70/30 “a little high,” 60/40 would be more acceptable to her. Champion’s smoking/business twin, O’Donnell, unsurprisingly supported her 70/30 arrangement, especially since it identified the only kind of restaurant he could contemplate voting to include in a ban—a place “where you go out with your family and sit down and eat.”\footnote{462}

As the debate began to flounder and founder on the shoals of arbitrary numbers shorn of a reasoned public health basis, Pfab persuaded the mayor to permit Dr. Ballinger to shed light on the origin of the 50/50 definition. Her account so transparently reflected CAFE’s past, present, and future position as drenched in non-confrontational compromise that it suggested that the group must have perceived that since it was out of the question that a majority could be found for 50/50, CAFE should start furiously back-pedaling on its principled commitment to 50/50 and portray itself as flexible and appreciative enough to accept even the stripped-down 70/30 proposal:

\begin{quote}
\hspace{1cm}[J]ust to give you a little bit of history about this whole thing where the 50 percent number came from when we initially submitted a model ordinance to you, after having thought about this, talked about this, hashed about this, argued about this for literally years we settled on the 50/50 or 51/49 number based on a couple different things. First of all we didn’t want to be seen as a group because we knew that we would become sort of the face of this ordinance. We did not want to as a group be seen as trying to single out certain types of businesses or single out other ones, we were strictly looking for something that sounded logical that if you explained to it somebody on the street. Well what is a restaurant? Well they make more of their money from food than alcohol, that it would be simple for people to understand that we specifically didn’t want to single out places like The Sanctuary or The Mill or anything like that, we didn’t want to go anywhere near that issue and also there is information in the state code where they use the 51 percent thing to define this so we thought that when we were anticipating a potential court challenge that maybe because it was defined that way and this was some of the legal advice that we had that since it was defined that way already in state code in another place that it might potentially be easier to defend.\footnote{463} \end{quote}

Seemingly more principled than CAFE, Lehman viewed 50/50 as having a “rather significant impact,” but was unsure as to whether 70/30 would “have any impact”: “But I guess the question is how restrictive do we want to be? At the same time do we want to be so nonrestrictive as to not be effective?” In contrast, Pfab liked the “compromise” he saw looming: whereas 50/50 “would cause

\footnote{462}{Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 38 (Oct. 16, 2001).}
\footnote{463}{Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 40 (Oct. 16, 2001).}
difficulty” for restaurant/bars with live music, for “the people from CAFE I understand 70 is not a problem so I think that’s a pretty decent number,” especially since “that seemed to be where the objections were when I went around in the community.” Feeling stymied in his effort to prod the council to “pick a number,” the mayor decided to resolve a linked issue first: a 24-hour ban or red light/green light? Hearing Pfab and Vanderhoef reject the latter and Champion allowed as at 70 percent she would “be willing to go to 24 hours,” Lehman declared the former chosen and resumed discussion of a percentage as if he were an auctioneer: “obviously the 50 percent is not going to fly, I hear 70 and I’ve heard 60.” Vanderhoef noted that although she “would be happy with the 50,” she offered 60 as a compromise vis-a-vis 70.64

With the council deadlocked, Pfab once again prompted Dr. Ballinger to set the members straight. This time she offered both a modest and a more radical solution:

Well it seems like the question here is trying to make the ordinance apply to as many restaurants as possible and also somehow take into accommodation or into mind those few places where sort of the hybrid [sic]. So you can do that two ways, you can either make the ordinance go 70/30 in other words..., 30 percent alcohol and that will include the true family restaurants. Or you can go really almost the opposite way and what that would end up doing would be including, any in other words that had more than...30 percent food it would be so restrictive that it would include almost any restaurant that sold very much alcohol. In other words it would include The Mill, it would include, and again I don’t want to get into this trap of singling places out but since they’re the ones that have been mentioned, any of these places that are sort of a hybrid it would include all of those, so in other words the only places would be left would be the true bars that had beer nuts and chips. In other words what Mr. Kanner said.65

Champion still wanted none of Kanner’s more inclusive definition, even though Ballinger pointed out that it “would definitely include all of these places and keep them on an even footing that the people at The Sanctuary and The Mill are concerned about.”66 The CAFE surgeon presumably saw a possible opening here to engage owners’ self-interest in expanding the scope of the ban and—disregarding her own admonition not to name names—drove the point home: “Well what would they think about having it go so far the other way that they’re not in competition with the people who have beer nuts and chips in the back but that really almost all of those places are the same, treated the same then,

64 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 41-42 (Oct. 16, 2001).
65 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 43 (Oct. 16, 2001).
66 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 43 (Oct. 16, 2001).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

Vito’s is the same, The Mill is the same, The Sanctuary is the same, The Airliner is the same, Mondo’s downtown is the same, all of those are on the exact same footing and their [sic] not competing with let’s say The Q bar, The Deadwood.”\textsuperscript{467} The only proprietor to speak up, the owner of The Sanctuary, was unmoved by Ballinger’s logic: “[I]t’s the fact that you lose that bar revenue to places where people can smoke where your food sales at that time of night are ancillary for the bar revenue, but if you take away that bar revenue your [sic] taking away a significant portion of your income.”\textsuperscript{468} CAFE’s initiative thus died, and after the city clerk had pointed out that she had recorded Champion, O’Donnell, and Pfab for 70 percent food, and Vanderhoef and Wilburn for 60 percent, the mayor resolved the issue by solomonically weighing in for 65 percent and securing the council’s agreement.\textsuperscript{469}

Just when the mayor opined that “we’ve done our job for tonight folks,”\textsuperscript{470} the city attorney had one more loose end from the catalog of questions she had posed to the council half a year earlier, when she had set forth the features in the Ames ordinance: “What about outdoor seating areas? Does it apply in outdoor seating areas?” The three smokers, Champion, Lehman, and O’Donnell, immediately stated that it was unnecessary, and when Wilburn agreed on the inscrutable grounds that “part of the issue is really just talking about ventilation systems confinement,”\textsuperscript{471} the council decided against a form of protection against secondhand smoke exposure that CAFE had not even requested.\textsuperscript{472} The concrete result of the proceedings was direction to the city attorney by the council to prepare an ordinance imposing a 24-hour a day smoking ban in restaurants defined as establishments 65 percent of whose gross receipts stemmed from food and non-alcoholic beverages but excluding outdoor service areas and not addressing establishments with separate ventilation systems; conversely, establishments more than 35 percent of whose gross receipts stemmed from the

\textsuperscript{467} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 44 (Oct. 16, 2001).
\textsuperscript{468} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 44-45 (Oct. 16, 2001) (Woodson).
\textsuperscript{469} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 45-46 (Oct. 16, 2001). Although the transcript did not identify those in support, the press reported that Vanderhoef, O’Donnell, Champion, and Wilburn did. Sara Langenberg, “Council Moves Toward Smoking Ban,” \textit{ICP-C}, Oct. 17, 2001 (1A:7, at 5A:2-4 at 4).
\textsuperscript{470} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 46 (Oct. 16, 2001).
\textsuperscript{471} Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 49-50 (Oct. 16, 2001).
\textsuperscript{472} The council also decided not to decide the question of whether to restrict minors’ presence in smoking areas. Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 46 (Oct. 16, 2001).
sale of alcoholic beverages were exempt. \textsuperscript{473} Vis-a-vis the 50/50 coverage threshold that CAFE had originally proposed in its draft ordinance more than a year earlier, the group could hardly deny that 65/35 was “‘less than we were hoping for,’” \textsuperscript{474} but finally getting a “‘number on the table’” after having worked on the project for 18 months purportedly made CAFE “‘happy.’”

First Consideration: Nov. 27, 2001

[A]ll of you have a reluctance to get involved in private enterprise and the way you get involved in it is through public safety or welfare. The question before you is really is there a public health issue here? If there’s a public health issue and the documentation’s been presented to you and you all know in your own mind whether there’s a public health issue to be addressed, then you need to ask how is that addressed? But if public health is what gives you the right, the right, maybe even the duty to be involved in the regulating of smoking in these public places then the public health issue exists regardless whether it’s a restaurant or a bar. And if there is a public health issue that mandates the City Council to become involved and to regulate this then you have to go the whole way and regulate it everywhere. If it were contamination of the water supply, I don’t think you’d be talking about well let’s regulate it in restaurants but not in bars, if you deem this to be a health issue and a contamination of the air supply, that same issue exists regardless of the percent of sales one way or the other. And I would strongly support if it’s your determination that this is a public health issue that you meet your fiduciary responsibility and go the whole way on that decision and that is protecting the entire public if that is your determination. \textsuperscript{475}

[W]e’ve had enormous[ly] more communication on this issue than any issue we’ve ever had in the eight years I’ve been on the Council. \textsuperscript{476}

At the special work session on November 12 Vanderhoef announced that she would be proposing two amendments at the public meeting the following day at which the first formal vote on the ordinance was scheduled. The first change that Vanderhoef proposed was to cover restaurants seating 50 or fewer despite the fact that the state law did not cover such small restaurants and Dilkes’s caution that the attorney general’s opinion expressly did not take a position on them. To be sure, even Dilkes was constrained to admit that Vanderhoef was making a good argument when she sought to justify the expanded coverage on the contextualized legislative history grounds that when the legislature excluded smaller restaurants it was “thinking in terms of trying to divide a very small restaurant into having [a] smoking section and a non smoking section and they decided that that wasn’t possible in such a small section. Well I think if we’re outlawing smoking section, nonsmoking section in restaurants across the board then we should.”

\textsuperscript{475}Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 31 (Nov. 27, 2001) (statement by Russ Schmeiser, part-owner of a restaurant), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/72.pdf.

\textsuperscript{476}Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 33 (Nov. 27, 2001) (Mayor Lehman).

Likewise, Vanderhoef’s preference for changing the coverage threshold from 65 percent food back to 50 percent on the grounds that it would be “the fairest thing we can do and...the most defensible thing and if we’re looking at public health then this is where to go” would have covered additional establishments. Pfab immediately declared his support for both amendments, but neither of the ban’s other backers (Kanner and Wilburn) committed himself, though non-member proponents had already stated that they would prefer a 50-percent rule.

The first consideration of the ordinance that was scheduled to take place at the November 13 meeting was, on account of what the press called the council’s “rampant” “indecisioin,” postponed for two weeks. That earlier meeting began with brief public discussion. A medical oncologist at the University Hospital succinctly refuted the cigarette companies’ accommodationist myth by pointing out, in the confrontational manner that CAFE eschewed, that: “Restaurants that allow cigarette smoking in effect, by default[,] give preference to those who smoke and care not for their own health, nor that of their children nor that of their fellow diners nor that of the people who work there.” The director of the Johnson County Public Health Department announced that the Board of Health (although it lacked a majority to recommend an ordinance to the county board of... supervisors)\textsuperscript{483} had, in the wake of CAFE’s request, approved a letter supporting smoke-free environments.\textsuperscript{484} The ubiquitous Jim Mondanaro, once again congratulating himself for having been “at the very cutting edge of making this a non-smoking community along [sic] time ago” and complaining that at some of his restaurants the self-instituted ban had been “a terrible thing for us,” urged the council to create a “level playing field.”\textsuperscript{485} And finally, Dr. Ballinger of CAFE reminded council members that the people of Iowa City wanted a smoking ban that operated 24 hours a day in restaurants (defined as deriving more than 50 percent of its receipts from food) of all sizes. At the same time she stressed that Iowa Citians had told CAFE that “they are not ready for an ordinance that covers bars and there has been no grass roots movement despite the wide publicity of our movement in the subsequent year and a half since. And so we as a group have not expanded our efforts in that direction.”\textsuperscript{486} In fact, the CAFE survey from 2000 revealed that support for smoke-free bars was hardly minuscule: 40 percent of respondents favored that protection (in addition to the 70 percent who wanted smoke-free restaurants).\textsuperscript{487}

As soon as the council moved to take up first consideration of the ordinance, Vanderhoef offered the first of the two amendments she had announced the previous evening—to include restaurants with 50 or fewer seats—which carried without a dissenting vote.\textsuperscript{488} Responding to a request by a restaurant owner,\textsuperscript{489} Champion then moved to amend the ordinance by switching the penalties for smokers who smoked in a non-smoking area ($25) and for owners who failed to post signage ($100) on the grounds that the former was “the primary criminal.” Under pressure from colleagues she agreed to equalize the two penalties at $100, but the amendment still failed by a vote of 3 to 4 because ban supporters (such as Wilburn and Kanner) deemed the penalty excessive and/or out of character with the ban as largely self-enforcing.\textsuperscript{490}

Vanderhoef then offered her second and more important amendment,
expanding coverage by increasing from 35 to 50 percent the minimum proportion of alcohol sales triggering a smoking ban. O’Donnell opened the pro-smoking attack on the amendment on the grounds of procedural fairness, but after the mayor suggested that the council vote on the amendment, but defer first consideration of the ordinance for two weeks, Champion shifted the focus of opposition to the substance of the change, in particular to her proclaimed solicitude on behalf of the financial health of owners of restaurants that became bars at night. Her chief witness was, yet again, Mondanaro, who nevertheless admitted that the council was dealing with a “tough issue.” At this point Kanner pushed the debate in two almost diametrically opposite directions. First, despite CAFE’s position that a total ban would not work, he argued that the public was ready for it. He suspected that CAFE “made a political decision not to pursue that partially in fear of, I think, the tobacco companies coming in with some large bars perhaps, or larger...food and alcohol businesses in the City fighting it. I think they’re going to fight us either way and I think it behooves us, if that’s going to happen, to go all the way. ... I think it’s a matter of us having the political will...to lead the city to that step. [W]e have 75% of the people not smoking.” Kanner’s trial balloon immediately burst when Pfab, Wilbur, and Vanderhoeif all denied that the public was ready, and Champion hypocritically declared that she would have to think about it. More revealing was Lehman’s attempt to wriggle his way out of a forthright choice: “I think there is [sic] really only two positions on this. Either you ban everything or you ban nothing. On the other hand I don’t think the public is ready to accept a ban on everything and so...I think it’s an indefensible position.” He regarded it as illogical to let people who drank get lung cancer but not those who ate, yet he considered “a single step...better than no step.” Unaware that in six and a half years he himself would experience a total statewide ban, at this point all he could imagine was that his grandchildren would probably frequent non-smoking bars. Deeming a total ban in 2001 politically impossible, Lehman was willing to proceed “incrementally” and “do what we can.” (In fact, however, the mayor almost never voted to take the first step and almost always found a reason to prefer nothing to any half-measures.)

Rebuffed in the one direction, Kanner then sent up his other trial balloon, which secured him strange bedfellows. Persuaded that any arrangement short of a full ban had to be “convoluted,” he saw the council’s goal as getting “the least

---

491 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 56-60 (Nov. 13, 2001).
492 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 60-62 (quote at 62) (Nov. 13, 2001).
493 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 63-64 (Nov. 13, 2001).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

convoluted ordinance we can.” What “struck” him in trying to discover what would help the council in reaching its number one goal of protecting restaurant and bar workers and customers was that “perhaps the red light green light or no smoking before 8:30 p.m. is something that might work better than 65% or 50%.” Admitting that he was “not an expert” (a status he immediately demonstrated) and was merely pursuing his “gut feeling,” he reasoned that whereas under the 50-percent regime perhaps half of the restaurants and bars would not be protected, the 8:30 p.m. approach would, to be sure, still leave “the problem of nicotine [sic] being in the environment[,] but still before 8:30 you don’t have the direct smoke,” which he again identified as a “strong agent for carrying that nicotine” (as if nicotine were the culprit). Because all bars and restaurants would be protected (from active smoking) until 8:30 p.m., he estimated that “at worst it’s a wash as far as protecting workers and patrons” was concerned. Moreover, Kanner insisted that red light/green light created a much brighter line for purposes of administration and enforcement than self-certified data on alcohol sales. He conceded not only that this proposal was “not the perfect answer,” but, astonishingly, that “to a certain extent” it was “probably true,” as “[p]eople say,” that red light/green light “is a cigarette industry tool to weaken any ordinance....” Nevertheless, he threw it out for consideration because it was “less convoluted and...helps us get more of a level playing field.”

His three ban co-supporters, Wilburn, Pfab, and Vanderhoef, were, as Kanner must have realized, having none of it. Vanderhoef in particular felt that the 8:30 p.m. rule “defeats a lot of the purpose of having the ordinance,” in large part because air simply did not “clean[ ] out that fast....” In contrast, the ban’s strongest opponents acknowledged that it “would certainly solve my problem with the unlevel playing field” (Champion) and had “some merit” and should be discussed (O’Donnell). Lehman, in contrast, reaching for yet another reason to do nothing, opined that: “We’re just rattling around trying to find some logical way to do an illogical act. ... But any scenario [other than a total ban] we do does not address the public health issue as a health issue. It is one of convenience. Which is going to be best as far as the bars, restaurants, whatever.”

A fascinating question is whether Kanner had thought through whether he would have been willing to join with the three pro-business smokers in order to adopt the Ames approach against the implacable opposition of his three anti-smoking allies. He offered a hint that he might have been when, right before the

494 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 64-65 (Nov. 13, 2001).
495 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 65 (Nov. 13, 2001).
496 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 68 (Nov. 13, 2001).
497 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 66 (Nov. 13, 2001).
vote on the 50/50 amendment, he asked (knowing with certainty that Pfab, Wilburn, and Vanderhoef had already rejected his proposal out of hand) whether “we had a majority that would consider this as an amendment if we defeated the 50%.” After Champion had replied that “I think I could support you,” Kanner put O’Donnell on the spot, who, like Champion, wanted to have another public meeting. Instead of disclosing his position, the mayor proposed delay so that the “huge change” that red light/green light constituted could be discussed.498 Once the 50/50 amendment had passed by a vote of 4 to 3 (Champion, O’Donnell, and Lehman opposed),499 the council agreed (by a vote of 5 to 2 (Pfab and Wilburn opposed) to the mayor’s proposal to defer first consideration until November 27.500

Two days later the Press-Citizen reported that the new version of the ordinance would reduce by about one-half the number of restaurants that allowed smoking: in addition to the 48 restaurants that already voluntarily prohibited smoking, 25 would be required to ban it, while another 25 restaurants that doubled as bars would be exempt from coverage.501 Editorially the paper accused the council of “waffling” and proposed stiffening the members’ backbone by urging them to “throw the whole thing out” and “[l]et the market decide which establishments will allow smoking....”502

On November 27, the day on which the ordinance finally came up for its first consideration before the council, the city attorney gave the members a memorandum stating that the Attorney General’s Office had informed her that, although arguments could be made to support coverage of restaurants seating 50 or fewer customers, the attorney general was of the view that “the ordinance should be kept as clean and simple as possible and that the Council maintain the ability to take advantage of favorable precedent in the Ames lawsuit and the Attorney General opinion by using the ‘public place’ definition set forth in [sic] State Code. The Attorney General notes that the City can always change the

498 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 67-68 (Nov. 13, 2001).
500 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 68-70 (Nov. 13, 2001).
501 Sara Langenberg, “Plan Cuts Smoking Options,” ICP-C, Nov. 15, 2001 (1A:2-7, 5A:2-6). The actual list, based on interviews with owners and the city attorney’s earlier survey, included 49 restaurants that were already no-smoking, 23 in which smoking would be banned, 25 that would be exempt, and eight about which accurate information was lacking. “Effects of the 50-50 Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, Nov. 15, 2001 (5A:1).
definition of public place down the road."\(^{503}\) Although Vanderhoef preferred her more comprehensive coverage, she was willing to await the Iowa Supreme Court ruling upholding the Ames ordinance before offering it again; in the meantime, she moved to amend it as suggested. Even Kanner agreed to go along based on a composite survey that he submitted showing that of 223 places with food licenses and indoor service, with certainty only six and possibly another 15 fell in the 50 seats and under category—such a small proportion that he did not think it would affect "that many people." After this amendment had carried\(^ {504}\) Vanderhoef focused on her other amendatory innovation: since there was nothing in the ordinance "that shows any movement after this point in time for decreasing the amount [sic] gross sales of food to move towards what the goal always would be in my mind[—]to take us down to all places that prepare and serve food should be smoke free," she proposed an amendment raising the alcohol share to 65 percent in two years (meaning that only establishments with a greater share of alcohol sales would be exempt).\(^ {505}\)

In the midst of the debate over this expansion of coverage discussion turned toward a proposed red light/green light amendment that Kanner had distributed that day, pursuant to which the purpose of the ordinance would, forthrightly, be (only) to "protect the public health, comfort and environment by prohibiting smoking in any food establishment/licensee between the hours of 2:00 A.M. and 9:00 P.M....." In addition, it provided that the council "will vote within two years” of the ordinance’s enactment on “whether or not the smoking ban shall be increased to a complete twenty-four hour ban.”\textsuperscript{506} Kanner’s hand-out included the following talking points in support of his proposal:

\(^{503}\)Eleanor Dilkes, City Attorney, to City Council, Re: Ordinance Regarding Smoking in Food Establishments at 1-2 (Nov. 27, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Special Meeting Nov. 27, 2001 at 176, on http://www.icgov.org.

\(^{504}\)Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 20-22 (quote at 22) (Nov. 27, 2001), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/ 72.pdf. For Kanner’s survey, based on data from Johnson County on food licenses, Johnson County Tobacco Free Coalition’s “Smoke Free Dining,” and Dilkes’s survey of 83 liquor licensees, see “Restaurants/Bars in Iowa City” (Nov. 27, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Special Meeting Nov. 27, 2001, at 182-87. According to the survey, under the proposed 50-50 ordinance, about 184 food licensees would be smoke-free, while 39 eating/drinking establishments would allow smoking. Id. at 187. Included in the amendment was another proposal made by Dilkes based on a conversation that she had had with a local business owner: it provided a temporary one-year exemption for new establishments reasonably expecting to have alcohol sales above the 50-percent level and existing establishments making a change in operation that was reasonably expected to bring about a change in the proportion of alcoholic beverage sales above 50 percent. The redlined ordinance is found in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Special Meeting Nov. 27, 2001, at 178-79.

\(^{505}\)Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 23 (Nov. 27, 2001).

1) Would like a total ban but there are not four votes;
2) If not total ban, then we work for ordinance that is least convoluted and will get us toward the following:
   • Will protect health and well-being of the most food/drink establishment workers and patrons in Iowa City;
   • Easiest to administer (both by businesses and by city)[;]
   • Creates a level playing field;
   • Will eventually lead us to a total ban on smoking.\textsuperscript{507}

However, Wilburn’s immediate declaration of opposition to red light/green light prompted Kanner to explain that he had thought that time-limited smoking would achieve his goal of no smoking faster than the 50/50 proposal, but that he was now willing to drop his proposal in favor of the 65/35 amendment because it would move the city in the right direction. Wilburn even succeeded in extracting a promise from Kanner not to raise the proposal again during the ordinance’s three readings.\textsuperscript{508}

At this point the mayor finally revealed his position, which was rejection of 50/50 or Vanderhoef’s “drastic” proposed 35 percent food/65 percent alcohol, and acceptance of 65 percent food/35 percent alcohol with the understanding of revisiting the issue after three years and considering 50/50. Lehman’s view was based on his perception of an allegedly “very unique situation in Iowa City unlike almost any city in the country[—]we have thousands of customers who are in a downtown area, unfortunately a fairly high percentage of these customers are smokers, an ordinance that prohibits smoking based on this 50 percent is going to make a significant number of these places downtown frankly out of bounds to a lot of those young folks who insist on lighting up and especially when they go with their friends.”\textsuperscript{509} The uniqueness to which Lehman was referring was difficult to discern in terms of downtown areas in general or of college towns in

\textsuperscript{506}Steven Kanner to City Council Re: Proposed Amendment to the Smoking Ordinance (Nov. 27, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Special Meeting Nov. 27, 2001, at 188.

\textsuperscript{507}Steven Kanner to City Council Re: Proposed Amendment to the Smoking Ordinance (Nov. 27, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Special Meeting Nov. 27, 2001, at 188.

\textsuperscript{508}Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 24 (Nov. 27, 2001).

\textsuperscript{509}Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 24 (Nov. 27, 2001).
particular, but he unintentionally and unknowingly provided the best reason for the more capacious ban—namely, discouraging or even preventing college students and their non-student age-cohorts from frequenting places where the normality of smoking was cultivated, reinforced, and magnified at a period in their lives when, if they did not start smoking, they probably never would later. After Champion and O’Donnell, the other two smoking businesses-people who opposed the ban, had weighed in against the amendment, it passed by a vote of 4 to 3.

Discussion then turned to the ordinance itself, Champion and O’Donnell proposing an amendment to revert to the exemption for all establishments selling 35 percent or more alcohol. After Pfaff had expressed puzzlement as to how its proponents could claim that they were moving toward smoke-free restaurants when they were in fact taking a step backward, Lehman permitted “public input” but subject to the limitation that “someone has something dramatically different to tell us that we haven’t heard before...” In fact, the only people to speak were four high-profile business owners. Mondanaro, who owned four restaurants downtown (plus a fifth in Coralville), stated that three of them were no-smoking, but that two would be affected by the 65/35 or 50/50 regime. He favored the red light/green light “compromise” that Kanner had proposed, but complained that CAFE members did not understand the compromise because they did not “have their signatures on the dotted line at banks....” He advocated on behalf of red light/green light because it enabled owners to “take care of all the people at all the restaurants 100 percent of the time until 8:30 to 9:00 at night. And then it lets...all people in the liquor business compete on a level playing field.” In contrast, he protested that after that time, when his restaurants turned into bars, he would be unable to “compete fairly” with full-time bars. Bitterly he accused the city council of blithely “talk[ing] about taking away part of my revenue seeking ability” without sitting in his seat with him and feeling his pain. Short of a total ban—which “we don’t have the initiative or guts to do”—he saw only red light/green light as being “fair” by virtue of “take[ing] everybody into account....” Seeking to undermine CAFE’s criticism of that regime’s impact on public health, he (counterfactually) insisted that “we all have been in restaurants or places where people smoke and then you go in the next day it’s not a factor.”

---

510 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 25-26 (Nov. 27, 2001).
511 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 27-28 (Nov. 27, 2001).
512 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 28-29 (Nov. 27, 2001). In spite of his verbal stance in favor of a smoking ban, Mondanaro reinstated smoking in one of his restaurants because “eliminating a segment of the market cut into revenue....” Deidre Bello, “Officials Shrug Off No-Smoking Setback,” DI, July 17, 2001 (1:1).
The owner of The Mill, a restaurant/bar also well known for its music, asserted flat out that “[w]e cannot run live music in a no smoking environment because 40 percent of our customers won’t come and neither will their friends.”\(^3\) (Despite an apparently orchestrated email campaign to the council complaining about the “disastrous effects on businesses that support the arts, specifically live music at restaurants like the Mill,”\(^4\) under the statewide smoking ban six and a half years later, live music miraculously proved to be so compatible with the absence of smoking that, as one Mill employee put it, “actually our sales have gone up” because people whose aversion to smoke had previously kept them away began frequenting the establishment.\(^5\) And as for the smokers, the owner of The Sanctuary observed that “people get used to things.”\(^6\)

As was readily foreseeable, Champion’s amendment was then defeated by a vote of 4 to 3, only her fellow smokers O’Donnell and Lehman joining her.\(^7\) Knowing that the four-member majority was about to vote in favor of the ordinance, Champion asked what they perceived as their obligation to business owners who in two months informed the council that their business had declined 40 or 50 percent: “This is not just fun and games we’re talking about, this is how people make a living, this is how they make their house payments, and they’re scared to death and I don’t know if they’re right or wrong but I do worry about it and it bothers me that I don’t hear that concern coming from this Council up here....” Rather than asking Champion whether by “this is how people make a living” she meant facilitating the exposure of hundreds or perhaps even thousands of customers and employees to secondhand smoke, some proportion of whom would become ill or die as a result, Pfab suggested going to a 100-percent ban in all places to eliminate any individual owners’ “tremendous disadvantage, while Kanner, more fancifully, mentioned the possibility of using the city’s economic development money to subsidize some of the owners until a 100-percent ban went into effect.\(^8\)

The mayor, who wanted it known that “I absolutely support the concept” of smoke-free restaurants and did not “want folks to say that I did not support

\(^3\)Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 29-30 (Nov. 27, 2001) (Keith Dempster of The Mill).
\(^4\)Email from Aaron Wolfe to Iowa City Council (Nov. 20, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Special Meeting Nov. 27, 2001, at 174. A very large volume of similar email was sent to the council at this time.
\(^5\)Telephone interview with unidentified employee at the Mill (May 19, 2009).
\(^6\)Telephone interview with Daryl Woodson, Iowa City (May 19, 2009).
\(^7\)Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 32 (Nov. 27, 2001).
\(^8\)Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 32 (Nov. 27, 2001).
regulating smoking in restaurants” because he merely deemed 50/50 “too drastic” a starting point, finally grew weary of the council’s “just batting our gums” and called the roll for the inevitable 4 to 3 vote for passage on the ordinance’s first reading.\footnote{Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 33-34 (Nov. 27, 2001).} As passed, the ordinance thus excepted establishments whose on-premises alcoholic beverage sales exceeded 50 percent of their gross receipts for on-premises consumption of food, beverages, and alcoholic beverages—a proportion that would be increased to 65 percent two years after the effective date (on March 1, 2004).\footnote{An Ordinance Amending Title 6 of the City Code by Repealing Chapter 7, Entitled “Smoking in Public Places” and Enacting a New Chapter 7, Entitled “Smoking in Food Establishments,” sect. 6-7-5 (Nov. 28, 2001), in City Council Documents, Meeting Folders 2001 (final), Info Packet of Nov. 29, 2001, at 7-8, on http://www.iowa-city/weblin/docview.aspx?id=8359 (visited Oct. 19, 2008).} The members’ fixed positions and voting patterns strongly suggested that the council would pass the ordinance by the same 4 to 3 vote on the next two considerations.\footnote{Sara Langenberg, “Smoking Ban Clears First Hurdle,” \textit{ICP-C}, Nov. 28, 2001 (1A:1-7, 5A:6).}

\textbf{Second Consideration: Dec. 11, 2001}

I understand that there’s an agenda to go to completely smoke free environment. I recently came back from Rochester, Minnesota Mayo-Clinic. The neighbor to the north the, you know, paragon of modern medical achievement. There [sic] downtown is spotless. There are a number of stores available for people to cruise through, beautiful places to sit, all of it non-smoking. I found it to be sterile. I found it to be a different sort of feeling like the hospital had encroached upon the entire place. This is a college town and people in their youth are going to have youthful indiscretions. And I’m not condoning…no one would argue the cost of second hand smoke, of alcohol, of motor vehicles, of guns, of any number of issues to public health. And if you really think that safety is the issue let us all sit back and contemplate, how safe are we? Haven’t we just been reminded of that? You could be on the wrong airplane, you could be in the wrong building, you could be in the wrong remote village in some distant land. None of us are safe. And it’s an illusion to legislate safety. My suggestion would be to look at some creative solutions. When I worked at The Mill I saw math professors, Schizophrenics, fraternity boys whooping it up together or at least coexisting in a space that they felt comfortable in. And in these times when people are hurting are we going to start to take away their options of how they should behave in public, using legal substances? … Am I doing what’s right for Iowa City to keep it a place of tolerance, a place of diversity….

\footnote{Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 58 (Dec. 11, 2001), on}
http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/75.pdf. The speaker, Lauren Hanna, was a physician who as a medical student had worked in a smoky restaurant/bar in Iowa City, whose owner, Keith Dempster, chimed in at the same meeting that even a 50/50 percent smoking ban would turn Iowa City “into another damn East Berlin.” Id. at 67-68. Ironically, cigarette smoking was as omnipresent in East Berlin as coal burning. Seven years later Dr. Hanna believed that her opposition to government interference with business owners’ public health decisions had been correct in 2001 and was still correct in 2008 after enactment of the Smokefree Air Act, which she opposed. Astonishingly, she viewed the whole issue exclusively from the perspective of what she regarded as a misguided policy of dealing with addiction, never once on her own even mentioning the central problem of involuntary exposure of nonsmokers to secondhand smoke. Telephone interview with Dr. Lauren Hanna, West Liberty, IA (Nov. 12, 2008).

Unsurprisingly, at the second consideration on December 11, all amendments, including one that would have extended the ban’s reach, and efforts to delay failed. To begin with, the two most prominent opponents, Champion and O’Donnell, pressed, once again, to delay the process. The first of three amendments sought to delay second consideration until February 2002 on the grounds that the Chamber of Commerce wanted additional time to evaluate how the ordinance would affect business. After it had been voted down 5 to 2, Champion offered a more transparently anti-regulation measure postponing the ordinance indefinitely, allegedly on account of the “business climate....” Its defeat by the same vote was followed by her attempt to exempt places that had separate rooms with separate ventilation systems. The rest of the council gave equally short shrift to this typical cigarette industry proposal, which also garnered only Champion’s and O’Donnell’s votes.

Mayor Lehman then reiterated his objections to bans based on percentages of food/alcohol because they were not logically related to the underlying public health problem. Instead, he declared that he would vote for an amendment banning smoking in any establishment that served or prepared food for on-site consumption. Pfab called it a “great idea,” but one that he would not support

524 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 44-47 (quote at 46) (Dec. 11, 2001).
525 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 47-48 (Dec. 11, 2001). Lehman’s position was purportedly linked to his perception that regulation of restaurants would lead more of them to become bars; this outcome was, in turn, unacceptable because the community’s “number one problem” was “probably...over[-]indulgence and the number of bars....” In view of the saloonification of downtown during the last quarter of the twentieth century Lehman’s declaration that drinking and bars were “not what this community’s all about” was hypocritical. Asked whether the city council’s beholdenness to commerce über alles was so exclusive that there was no chance that it would do something to reverse the trend toward the saloonification of downtown, the director of the Johnson County Public Health Department noted that: “I am not sure about the City Council’s reluctance to act. There are a couple council members who would like to take action, a couple who have clearly stated that they don’t think minors drinking in licensed facilities is a problem and that business is more important than short or long term health issues, and a couple who basically use avoidance tactics when the issue is brought up.” Email from Ralph Wilmoth to Marc Linder (Feb. 10, 2006).

526 Transcription of Iowa City Council Meeting at 48 (Dec. 11, 2001).
527 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 50 (Dec. 11, 2001).
528 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 52 (Dec. 11, 2001).
529 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 49 (Dec. 11, 2001).
530 Telephone interview with Steven Kanner, Cleveland, OH (Nov. 14, 2008).
531 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 59 (Dec. 11, 2001) (Kevin Perez). to eat in smoke-free restaurants compared to 35 percent who wanted smoke-free bars, there had been no “extraordinary uprising from the bar owners or people who are primarily frequenters of bars coming forward to ask us for that.” Specifically addressing Kanner’s question, Ballinger sought to impress on ban supporters on the council the pattern that had played itself out over and over again across the country toward the end of the municipal ordinance process.\footnote{Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 52-53 (Dec. 11, 2001). Ballinger incorrectly depicted the process in Ames: the transformation of the ordinance took place at the beginning, not the end, of the process and in direct negotiations with ATTF, not before the council. Moreover, she entirely misstated the basis of the lawsuit, which had nothing to do with exceptions or fairness, but solely with preemption. Ironically, a bar owner later corrected Ballinger. \textit{Id.} at 62 (Daryl Woodson). Even more ironically, the same owner then suggested that the council sit on the proposal until the Iowa Supreme Court upheld the validity of the Ames ordinance. \textit{Id.} at 63.}

There is uniformly a drive to have this apply across the board everywhere and then everyone says yeah that’s great. Why don’t we do that? And then to appease the people who have not had their concerns addressed, exception after exception, hardship clause, we’ll phase this in, we’ll try to make allowances for people, let’s accommodate everybody, let’s have one big umbrella and bring everybody in underneath it. Let’s try to get along and they end up having an ordinance that looks like Ames, one which is being contested right now on the basis of having so many exceptions and the lack of fairness that is perceived to the people that it applies to. ... We too want smoke free environments across the board in Iowa City however, our common sense tells us that not only can we want it, everybody else has to want it too. And right now we have information that states that people want it in restaurants. We do not have information that states, and I don’t think anybody else has been able to show it to us that they have that, that this would apply and be successful and people would ask for it today in bars.\footnote{Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 53-54 (Dec. 11, 2001).}

In other words, CAFE believed that covering bars would exceed Iowa City’s capacity for compliance/enforcement.

Kanner, who was indirectly trying to persuade CAFE to free Pfab to vote for the broader ban, pleaded with Ballinger to recognize that her comparison had gotten the relationship between Ames and Iowa City backwards: “We’re making it tougher where Ames was...making it looser....” In response Ballinger began reciting exemptions from the Ames ordinance such as bowling alleys (as if they had ever been covered in any proposed Iowa City ban) and red light/green light, and even though she soon ran up against her ignorance of the facts (“help me out here folks”), Kanner kept trying, in vain, to explain to her that the more exemptions she mentioned, the more she was making his “point,” but she failed... to grasp it even while literally swearing that “I can appreciate your point.” Knowingly or not, Wilburn cut through the misunderstanding to voice the suspicion that prevented him and Pfab from casting the deciding vote for Vanderhoef’s amendment: “We have history right here where we make a move, several exemptions get introduced. And just here tonight, just introducing it there were…three other potential amendments. And I suppose it’s a matter of trust as to what’s going to happen between…a second reading and a third reading. And that’s the point that I think is being brought up here. … And I will again add the point that when we get to a third reading, what other combinations of exemptions are going to be brought back in to make it resemble the Ames ordinance with a lot exemptions.”

To dispel Wilburn’s fears, Kanner asked Vanderhoef and Lehman whether they “intend[ed] to add more exemptions.” Though both straightforwardly denied any such intention, Lehman did manage to sow confusion by adding: “We’ve never discussed bars. And I think we need to stick with the restaurants, sort of, until…unless we want to go into bars. Even the Café folks have not been interested in pursuing that. We have talked about restaurants from day one and I think we need to conclude that and then work with bars.” In fact, what CAFE purported to support was a vote that evening on the ordinance without amendments because, as other cities had shown, the way to make all public places smoke-free was “incrementally”; if immediately afterwards the council wanted to vote on Vanderhoef’s amendment, “we will support you.”

When the mayor finally called for a vote on Vanderhoef’s amendment to expand the smoking ban to include public places that prepared or served food for on-premises consumption (thus striking the exemption for bars whose alcohol sales exceeded 50 percent of their total receipts), Pfab, who presumably supported the substance of the amendment, nevertheless balked because the importance of the change meant that the council, instead of being able to vote on the ordinance’s second consideration, would be going backward to first consideration. Perceiving a pattern of someone’s always wanting to make a change as soon as the council got close to a proposed ordinance’s passage (and echoing CAFE’s insight that “[i]f I were Philip Morris I would want to delay this ordinance because when ordinances like this are passed I would be selling fewer

---

534 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 54-55 (Dec. 11, 2001).
535 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 56 (Dec. 11, 2001).
536 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 65 (Dec. 11, 2001) (Eileen Fisher).
537 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 69-70 (Dec. 11, 2001).
cigarettes”), Pfab identified the underlying cause: “It’s what the tobacco industry always does.” Vanderhoef tried to persuade Pfab that adoption of the amendment would be the best way of achieving his goal of zero public smoking, but Pfab revealed that his real objection was the fear that despite adoption of the expansive amendment now, the ordinance might fail before its passage on third consideration, leaving anti-smokers with nothing. The surprising 4 to 3 vote against the amendment could have lent credence to Pfab’s suspicion: Lehman’s vote in the affirmative (joined by Kanner and Vanderhoef) could have been interpreted as a Trojan horse that would have exposed the ordinance to ultimate defeat if Lehman turned against it on second or third consideration. If, on the other hand, Pfab’s fear was baseless, he and the other anti-smoking advocates unnecessarily deprived the city of a vastly expanded zone of protection from secondhand smoke exposure. Pfab’s rejectionist position at this point was in large part a function of his following the lead of CAFE, which, as already noted, was both skeptical of risking the success of what it was on the verge of achieving (the 50/50 ordinance) for the sake of a speculative gain and in principle probably too timid to contemplate confronting the opposition of bar owners and their customers who would have been covered by the more comprehensive ban. In the event, on second consideration the ordinance once again passed by a vote of 4 to 3, with the three smokers (Champion, O’Donnell, and Lehman) in opposition. In a vain effort to salvage his reputation, the mayor seized the word to preempt untoward press accounts: “I want to make it very clear that I support a much stronger version...and a much fairer version then [sic] the one we just had [on] second consideration so I really don’t like reading in the papers that the mayor voted against an ordinance that would have...and I don’t think

538 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 65 (Dec. 11, 2001) (Eileen Fisher).
539 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 72-73 (Dec. 11, 2001).
540 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 74 (Dec. 11, 2001).
541 Vanderhoef later stated that she had believed at the time that Lehman had voted in good faith for her amendment because it had created the more level playing field that he wanted; consequently, in her view, if Pfab and CAFE had not misjudged the situation, Iowa City from the outset would have had a broader ban. Telephone interview with Dee Vanderhoef, Iowa City (Nov. 10, 2008).
542 In fact, Pfab—who later stated that he had not trusted Lehman, in part because the latter had lied to him several times—concluded on the basis of a review of the transcription of the meeting that his vote had been in part driven by his suspicion that Lehman might have been laying a trap. In contrast, Pfab characterized O’Donnell’s actions on the council as actuated by his not wanting to be “an obstructionist to making money” by his business friends. Telephone interview with Irvin Pfab, Iowa City (Nov. 9, 2008).
the other two council people...they're of the same opinion.”

Third and Final Consideration: Jan. 8, 2002

What we will be doing...is making more restaurants into bars. The number one problem nationally is alcohol. We bypass number one to address number two to make number one more prolific. ... We as a council are here to support business, grow the tax base and look responsibly at economic development and I don't think this addresses any of that.

I’m Jewish and when my people left Egypt a few thousand years ago I’m sure it was a significant blow to the Egyptian property holders and business owners because a lot of their work left. When the slaves were freed in the south I’m sure it was a significant blow to property holders and business owners there too cause a lot of their work left.... But there’s certain...things that’s more important maybe than business. Maybe life is more important than profit. [I]f businesses are going to be hurt by doing something that hurts other people and by being forced to stop doing something that hurts other people that’s their problem. Because you know, I mean they’re poisoning people. And if you go out of business because you’re forced to stop poisoning people, that’s a small loss.

At the council’s special work session on January 7, 2002, the day before the third and final vote on the ordinance was scheduled, opponents offered several amendments in response to the city attorney’s request that if the council intended to make changes to the ordinance, it discuss them at the work session so that she could draft the requisite provisions before the vote on January 8 in order to spare her the task of crafting the language “during the formal meeting without some time for reflection on the possible ramifications of the language chosen.”

Opponents, unsurprisingly, did offer such revisions. Straight off, O’Donnell asked whether anyone would be interested in reverting to the scheme under which smoking would be banned only in establishments deriving at least 65 percent of their sales from food. He justified the amendment by reference to the council’s obligation to businesses “to find out how this is going to affect them financially.”

---

543 Transcription of the Iowa City Council Meeting at 75 (Dec. 11, 2001) (the last two ellipses are in the transcription).

545 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 49 (Jan. 8, 2002) (statement of Richard Lutz).

He secured an expression of interest only from his smoking mate Champion and a decided rebuff from Pfab, who insisted that exposure to secondhand smoke was “still a health issue...not a business issue.” O’Donnell sought to steal Pfab’s rhetoric and turn it against him by asserting that eating was also a health issue—a dark aphorism on which Champion shed light by pointing out that it did not mean that “we...need to go out to eat to be healthy,” but that they were “talking about people’s livelihood’s [sic]...not...about a hobby, we’re talking about people who are making mortgage payments and raising children.” In response to Champion’s question as to what ban supporters had in mind “as a backup” in case businesses began failing, Pfab retorted that as soon as the pending ordinance was passed, he would back a 100 percent ban. O’Donnell illogically claimed that his 65/35 proposal “would have sent a clear message because I think we would have gotten a 7-0 vote”—despite the fact that only he and Champion championed it—whereas the 4-3 vote by which the ordinance would in fact pass “certainly isn’t a good way to start this.”

Mayor Lehman, who rejected 50/50 (or, apparently, any other food/alcohol ratio), while seeming to indicate that he might support coverage of all establishments that prepared food, was joined in earnest by Vanderhoef; Pfab promised to vote for an even broader workplace ban, but only after the 50/50 ban had been adopted. Kanner expressed interest in a 100-percent ban in all places that served or prepared food, but at the same time he confusingly echoed CAFE’s concern that “this is a typical tactic, not specific to us perhaps of [sic] individuals but the strategy is used by the tobacco industry to delay and weaken an ordinance such as the case in Ames and so CAFE is urging us to pass this and then go onto something else.”

In a literally last-minute effort O’Donnell made yet another stab at rustling up support for “red light green light,” but no one else would join him, thus leaving the ordinance substantively unchanged and prompting the Press-Citizen to conclude that the following night’s vote “may be a mere formality.” At the same time, the newspaper reminded readers, on the eve of final passage, that the effect of the ordinance when it went into force on March 1 would merely be to ban smoking in about 25 restaurants compared to the approximately 50 that had already prohibited smoking voluntarily.

547 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 44-49 (quotes at 46, 49) (Jan. 7, 2002), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/78.pdf.
548 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 48-50 (quote at 49) (Jan. 7, 2002).
549 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 52 (Jan. 7, 2002).
550 Sara Langenberg, “Smoking Ban Nears Approval,” ICP-C, Jan. 8, 2002 (1A)
The council’s third and final consideration of the ordinance took place on January 8, 2002. After Mayor Lehman had sworn his ritual oath that he “would support a total ban,” Nick Herbold, a University of Iowa student senator (who would soon be elected Student Government president) who did not smoke but attended bars “as much as I can,” registered a protest against an ordinance that would prevent people over the age of 18 who filled the bars after 9 p.m. from making “adult decisions” to be there “if they want to be exposed to smoke....” In pursuit of this self-destructive libertarian goal he deemed red light/green light such a “good compromise” that he wondered why everyone did not support it and asked council members to explain the basis of their opposition. After Vanderhoef had referred to lingering carcinogens and Kanner to the paramount concerns of workers’ health, Herbold’s request for time to respond triggered the first of Lehman’s outbursts of impatience with the issue’s continued presence on the council’s agenda after “six months and hours and hours”: “believe me...we have worn this one out.” Seizing the mayor’s reluctantly granted permission to comment, Herbold, who conceded that he was ignorant of the science of the suspension of particulate matter, nevertheless opined that red light/green light “helps the people out during the day and...lets the students relax in a non-[sterile] environment where they can, you know, really let go at night.” Skipping over an explanation of the mutual exclusivity of toxicity and sterility, Herbold sought to rebut Kanner’s proletarian agenda by disclosing the results of his telephonic survey of “all the bar employees that I know”: the smokers had said that smoke did not bother them, while the non-smokers “overwhelmingly” said that they either did not find it annoying or that when applying for the job they had understood the risk that they were taking. And a like-minded Herbold chimed in that “every job has a little bit of a risk. I worked road construction a couple summers ago and I took a lot of risks with that. And I think that was part of the job.” His closing admonition to the council to consider red light/green light resonated only with the most reactionary pro-smoking and pro-employer member, O’Donnell, who lamented that he had brought it up just the previous night and “didn’t have the support for it.”

---

552 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 40-41 (Jan. 8, 2002).
553 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 42-43 (Jan. 8, 2002), http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/80.pdf. In fairness to Herbold it should be noted that as a law student five years later he developed a much more critical position on exposure.
Following other public comments (including one by a restaurant owner who asserted that “[n]ot a single owner here has been talked to by big tobacco”), the mayor once again voiced impatience with having to listen to the public any further, especially since, as far as he (and anyone else) understood, “the Council has pretty much decided what they’re going to do.” In response to an unidentified male audience member’s interjection that the council had still not heard that what it was going to do was wrong, Lehman, reinforcing his point, observed that he agreed that the council was wrong to adopt the ordinance. Even O’Donnell, who wanted to hear more comment (from complaining owners), was compelled to agree with the mayor that the decision had been “made two readings ago.” Garnering the only applause recorded by the transcript, O’Donnell faithfully projected the empirically preposterous claims that his fellow businessmen had apparently osmotically absorbed from the cigarette oligopoly’s playbook: “We need to replace those signs as we enter Iowa City that say we’re a nuclear free zone and say welcome to Iowa City we’re closed.” By reminding the council of a fact of which they were all aware, Kanner succeeded in pushing the mayor to hear out the few people who still wanted to speak: “This is obviously something that’s touched a nerve in the community. We’ve had the most letters we’ve ever had.”

Having pro forma listened to the public, the council next heard Champion’s pro forma re-presentation of a motion to defer the ordinance’s third consideration until the Chamber of Commerce had performed an impact study. Her ideological twin, O’Donnell, “of course,” agreed to second her motion, but it lost by the same 5 to 2 vote that had defeated it a month earlier. As Lehman began to call the roll on the ordinance’s final vote, Vanderhoef revealed that she had been wrestling with the best strategy for securing adoption of her amendment to achieve “zero smoking in restaurants”:

It was suggested to me today to not support the 50/50 and announce it up front so that the others who are supporting 50/50 would be asked to make up their mind right then. What has happened as I see it from this Council is that there has been some fear in the Council that amendments would come around that would change the ordinance as the young gentleman mentioned tonight, the red light green light. We’ve talked about that several different times. We’ve talked about ventilation several times. No one seems to know for sure how everyone is going to come down. So knowing that I have supported the 50/50 from the beginning I will support 50/50. If that passes tonight as soon as it’s done I will

---

554 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 45 (Jan. 8, 2002) (Perez).
555 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 46–47 (Jan. 8, 2002).
556 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 52–53 (Jan. 8, 2002).
As soon as the ordinance, without fanfare, was adopted by a vote of 4 to 3 (O’Donnell, Champion, and Lehman, as always, opposed), Lehman announced that he would entertain a motion from any member proposing an amendment to amend the ordinance just passed to apply it to “any establishment that prepares or serves food” (or, as the mayor incorrectly paraphrased himself in the alternative, that “serve[s] prepared food”). Making sure that no one was procedurally confused, he stressed that the “ordinance we passed is passed” and thus would in no way be jeopardized by adoption of the more inclusive amendment. Pfab, whom his colleagues appeared to regard as a gadfly, immediately declared himself in favor of a prohibition in all public places and places of employment, but Lehman dismissed the suggestion as irrelevant, and even Vanderhoef felt compelled to add that she would discuss it later but not then. After Kanner (of all people) quibbled over whether the council could discuss such an amendment without notice to the public and Lehman declared, “Yes we can,” the city attorney clarified for the movant the difference between “and” and “or” and asked whether she wanted to exclude places that served only prepackaged foods such as chips and peanuts. Pfab slipped in that he wanted the more inclusive “or,” but Vanderhoef opted for covering only establishments that both prepared and served food for on-premises consumption. Even among her most plausible allies, Vanderhoef found little resonance: Pfab at first refused to second her motion (because it failed to cover restaurants with 50 or fewer seats, thus retaining the “uneven playing field”), agreeing to do so only when no one else would, while Kanner wanted to defer the matter, adding, without explanation, that if forced to vote on the spot, he would vote No. In addition to fearing that failure to support her amendment that very evening might kill it, Vanderhoef urged support for it on the grounds that owners should be put on notice that if the amendment passed, they would not have to bother with certifying their alcohol sales. Pfab, frustrated that everyone dismissed his proposal on the grounds that inclusion of small restaurants might jeopardize the ordinance’s validity, sought to get around the problem by (again) proposing a ban in all public places and places of employment, but no one was interested. Predictably, Wilburn refused to consider Vanderhoef’s proposal until he saw greater movement in the wider public for a total ban. Under pressure from the mayor to conclude the discussion, Kanner expressed a preference for a stricter ban than Vanderhoef was offering.

557 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 53 (Jan. 8, 2002).
558 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 54 (Jan. 8, 2002).
559 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 55-56 (Jan. 8, 2002).
either in the form of including all places with a food license or the more inclusive “prepare or serve” language; he might even be willing to support her amendment, but only at a deferred consideration at the next work session. Pfab’s expressed support for Kanner’s position presumably made it clear to Vanderhoef that she had at best three votes for the present (Lehman failing to disclose his position and no one pressing him to take a stance). The opportunity for seizing on whatever momentum had been built up to expand significantly coverage of the smoking ban and to protect many more people from exposure to secondhand smoke having been squandered, Vanderhoef withdrew her motion to amend and a majority agreed to put it on the next work session two weeks later.

With CAFE too timid to push beyond the “more options for smoke-free dining” that it perceived the public as supporting, the ordinance as passed simply prohibited, effective March 1, 2002, those in custody or control of public places where food was prepared or served for on-site consumption from designating any part of the establishment as a smoking area—subject to an exemption for establishments more than 50 percent of whose gross receipts for food, beverages, and alcoholic beverages sold for on-site consumption stemmed from alcoholic beverages, a proportion that was to rise to 65 percent on March 1, 2004 (by which time, however, the ordinance had been judicially invalidated), and a temporary one-year exemption for any establishment “making a change in operation which is reasonably expected to result in a change in the percentage of alcoholic beverage sales” such as to raise it above 50 percent.

At the council work session on January 22, 2002, Mayor Lehman introduced the last item with “surprise, surprise, Smoking in Restaurants Amendment,” prompting the city attorney to observe that “it’s on the agenda because you all wanted to talk about it.” Just to set the record straight, O’Donnell made no bones about the fact that he had certainly not wanted to talk about it, but forward-looking Lehman simply wanted to find out whether there (still) were “four folks on the Council who would be interested in reintroducing the smoking issue and discussing whether we want to go to a zero smoking tolerance in restaurants.”

---

560 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 57-61 (Jan. 8, 2002).
561 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 61-62 (Jan. 8, 2002); Complete Description of Council Activities at 6 (Jan. 8, 2002). Beyond Vanderhoef, Kanner, and Pfab, Lehman did not identify the fourth vote.
563 City of Iowa City,] Ordinance No. 02-4000, An Ordinance Amending Title 6 of the City Code by Repealing Chapter 7, Entitled “Smoking in Public Places” and Enacting a New Chapter 7, Entitled “Smoking in Food Establishments,” §§ 6-7-3 and 6-7-5 (Jan. 8, 2002).
The not always consistent Pfab at first allowed as “[i]f it was any further down the road I’d be happy to support it,” but after (of all people) O’Donnell had had to remind him that “[t]his is your chance” and Vanderhoef specifically asked him about zero smoking in restaurants, he suddenly said he “would be happy to support that idea.” After Vanderhoef became the second vote, Lehman asked whether there was also a third and fourth; when Kanner became the third, Vanderhoef pressed the mayor as to whether he would cast the deciding fourth vote. The mayor, however, quickly disabused her of any notion that he would keep the possibility of totally smoke-free restaurants alive:

Well no, no, I don’t want to get into the discussion if we don’t have four people who would like to get into the discussion. I feel we have been discussing this thing for a long, long time, we have been a source of great agitation to people both in favor of a smoking ban and those who opposed a smoking ban. I think it’s time to let the dust settle on this one and see what happens with it. You know I think the public and I also think from the Council’s standpoint you know enough is enough and for the time being I’m willing to proceed with what we have. I don’t think it’s a particularly good ordinance, I didn’t like it when we passed it but on the other hand we had four opportunities to change it and we chose not to so I am not interesting [sic] in discussing it further.

Not willing to give up quite yet, Vanderhoef asked him: “But you would support the zero?” Administering her a lesson in self-fulfilling prophecies, the mayor informed her that “[i]t isn’t even going to get there unless we’ve got four people that want to talk about it” and “I will not be one of the four.” Still pushing Lehman, Vanderhoef echoed: “Your [sic] not going to be?” An unrepentant Lehman replied: “I am not going to be, at this point in time we had an opportunity, we didn’t do it, I am really not interested in dragging the public through this thing for another six or eight weeks or whatever, I think we’ve, we may revisit this, I think we will at some point in time but for the time being we’ve done enough.”

No one needed to prompt O’Donnell and Champion to ally themselves with their fellow-smoking mayor and no one did ever ask the silent

---

564 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 30-31 (Jan. 22, 2002), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/85.pdf. The transcriptionist could not hear all of Vanderhoef’s words on the audio tape, but the context of what could be heard of the beginning of Vanderhoef’s statement (“Well tell us what”) and the beginning of Lehman’s fully transcribed response quoted in the text strongly suggest that Vanderhoef asked him how he would vote.

565 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 31 (Jan. 22, 2002).

566 Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 31-32 (Jan. 22, 2002).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

Wilburn, who, by failing to take a position, killed the initiative.\textsuperscript{567}

Paying, once again, lip service to a prohibition that he had opposed at almost every turn—“We do not have four folks and so that’s a discussion that may or, I’m sure it will come up in the future but I think the time now is to move forward”\textsuperscript{568}—Mayor Lehman, as the \textit{Press-Citizen} reported, executed a “switch from his position” on January 8 “when he voted against the partial ban and said a more total ban would be more acceptable.”\textsuperscript{569} (Lehman apparently did not believe that this tergiversational display had forever shredded his credibility on this issue: in January 2004, when, in the wake of judicial invalidation of the Ames and Iowa City ordinances, two legislators filed yet another bill to repeal preemption of local control of smoking, he purported to support it and predicted that its passage would be followed by another effort to ban smoking in Iowa City. He nevertheless added a caveat that, if the situation ever came to pass, it would furnish him with yet another pretext for equivocation: “‘But I feel it should be a statewide thing. That would be better for cities so they don’t have to make laws that conflict with each other.’” In case readers had not intuited the subtext, the newspaper inserted the competitive business context always uppermost in Lehman’s mind: “Coralville has not implemented a smoking ban or pursued the possibility.”\textsuperscript{570}

As the March 1, 2002 starting date of the Iowa City ban approached, many owners were busy “making changes that will enable them to get around the new law....” One of the live music establishments, for example, magnanimously conferred a twofold public health benefit on customers and workers by “promoting more alcohol specials on weeknights to draw in the alcohol consuming bar crowd,” and thus also insuring them uninterrupted access to secondhand smoke. Competitors whose lopsided alcohol sales already qualified them for an exemption without having to make menu changes did not appreciate the additions to the yes-smoking list. The owner of one well-known restaurant/bar lamented this promotion of alcohol, “‘which we have spent four years telling people not to do.'" No wonder that she declared: ""I don’t like the ordinance.""571

\textsuperscript{567}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 32 (Jan. 22, 2002). Wilburn was present, but spoke only once (and even then only very briefly) during the entire hour-long session. \textit{Id.} at 24. The minutes incorrectly stated that “[t]here were not four people to amend the smoking ordinance for a zero smoking tolerance in restaurants.” [Iowa City] Council Work Session, Jan. 22, 2002, [Minutes] at 3 (Jan. 30, 2002). In fact, there were not even four votes to discuss such an amendment.

\textsuperscript{568}Transcription of Iowa City Council Special Work Session at 32 (Jan. 22, 2002).

By the day the ban went into effect, 44 of 90 establishments licensed to serve alcohol had requested full or temporary exemptions, leaving 56 smoke-free.572 Within a few days seven more last-minute requests for exemptions were filed, in part by bars that did not even serve food and merely wanted an official piece of paper that they could post demonstrating to customers that they lawfully permitted smoking.573 (Conversely, the co-owner and employees of one restaurant posted a sign apologizing for the radical improvement in indoor air quality: "Effective March 1 smoking will no longer be permitted on our premises. We didn’t make this decision. The City Council did.")574 At this point, the total impact of the ordinance, according to CAFE, was the conversion of only about 20 formerly smoking-permitted restaurants to newly smoke-free status. Despite the fact that the law increased the number of “smoke-free dining options” by only about 25 percent and left at least 50 restaurants and bars still lawfully permitting smoking, CAFE spun the change as “huge.”575

The District Court Finds No State Preemption

“The people of Iowa have been unenthusiastic about significant anti-smoking

572 Sara Langenberg, “Restaurant Smoking Rules Go into Effect,” ICP-C, Mar. 1, 2002 (1A) (NewsBank). According to this source 10 of 44 were temporary exemptions, but later it was determined that during the ordinance’s first year of operation 17 of about 50 exemptions had been granted on a temporary basis for one year. By the first anniversary of the ordinance (Mar. 1, 2003), seven of the 17 were granted permanent exemptions, seven failed to file the requisite affidavits to retain the exemptions, and three had additional time to file. Brian Sharp, “City Smoking Law Marks 1 Year,” ICP-C, Mar. 1, 2003 (3A) (NewsBank); Vanessa Miller, “I Expect It to Destroy the Bar Business at Mondo’s and Micky’s,” ICP-C, Mar. 4, 2003 (1A) (NewsBank).

574 Sara Langenberg, “Restaurant Smoking Rules Go into Effect,” ICP-C, Mar. 1, 2002 (1A) (NewsBank)

575 Sara Langenberg, “City’s Smoke-Free List Changes,” ICP-C, Mar. 9, 2002 (1A) (NewsBank) (quoting CAFE spokesperson Eileen Fisher). According to CAFE, 85 eating establishments were smoke-free after the ordinance went into effect.
On February 13, 2002, plaintiffs having withdrawn their claim for a permanent injunction, Judge Baker issued his ruling denying plaintiffs’ motion for summary judgment, declaring both that the ordinance was neither preempted by nor inconsistent, irreconcilable, or in conflict with chapter 142B of the Iowa Code and that the City of Ames had not exceeded its constitutional or statutory home rule authority, and dismissing the case. Judge Baker’s opinion—unlike the Supreme Court’s ruling 15 months later—was a sophisticated and fine-grained effort to come to grips with the complex interaction of preemption and home rule in the context of a particular statute embedded in a particular set of public policies against the background of considerable Iowa Supreme Court precedent derived from adjudicating the same conflict arising from other statutes resting on other public policies.

Baker began the relevant part of his analysis by dealing with plaintiffs’ claim that Ames’s home rule power was preempted by state law in the form of the clean indoor air act itself:

Enforcement of this chapter shall be implemented in an equitable manner throughout the state. For the purpose of equitable and uniform implementation, application, and enforcement of state and local laws and regulations, the provisions of this chapter shall supersede any local law or regulation which is inconsistent with or conflicts with the provisions of this chapter.

Plaintiffs argued that this paragraph “must be read to mean that” the law “imposes a mandatory statewide standard of smoking prohibitions which is not subject to local variation”; they further contended that with this language the legislature “expressed its intention to preempt this area of controlling smoking in public places from local regulation....” The city’s interpretation was diametrically opposite: Ames argued that this paragraph was “an express declaration by the legislature that local ordinances are permissible as long as they are not inconsistent with or in conflict with the state law, reinforcing statutory and constitutional home rule authority.” Moreover, if the legislature had intended to prohibit cities from regulating smoking in public places, “it would have clearly said so.”

To begin with, Baker correctly rejected out of hand Philip Morris’s claim that the 1990 amendment was a statement of express preemption of local regulation: on the contrary, not only did it “not specifically prohibit local action in the area of regulating smoking in public places,” it in fact recognized “the potential existence of ‘local laws and regulations’ referring to their ‘implementation, application and enforcement’ as well as the consequences of inconsistency with state law.” In order to contrast this provision with an example of real express preemption, Baker cited a statute held by the Iowa Supreme Court to prohibit local action: “In order to provide for the uniform application of the provisions of sections 725.1 to 725.10 relating to obscene material applicable to minors within this state, it is intended that the sole and only regulation of obscene material shall be under the provisions of these sections, and no municipality, county or other governmental unit within this state shall make any law, ordinance or regulation relating to the availability of obscene materials. All such laws, ordinances or regulations, whether enacted before or after said sections, shall be or become void, unenforceable, and of no effect upon July 1, 1974.” In the face of such sheer unambiguity, the Supreme Court had no choice but to rule that the “legislature flatly stated its intention that the only regulation of obscene material be by state law and then, in unmistakably clear terms, barred local legislation on the subject.” Baker then forcefully pointed out that, since section 142B.6 neither confined smoking regulation to state law nor specified that smoking bans could not be the subject of local action, no express preemption existed.

Having dismissed the claim of express preemption, Judge Baker turned to a lengthy analysis of the two variants of implied preemption: (1) subject-wide preemption was present when the legislature covered a subject with statutes so as to demonstrate its intention to preempt the field; and (2) conflict preemption

583 Chelsea Theater Corp. v. City of Burlington, 258 NW2d 372, 373 (Iowa 1977) (citing Iowa Code § 725.9 (1974)).
resulted when an ordinance conflicted with a statute such that the ordinance prohibited an act that a statute permitted or permitted an act that a statute prohibited.\textsuperscript{585}

Plaintiffs’ contention that the legislature’s comprehensive legislation in the area of tobacco products, tobacco taxes, and smoking demonstrated its preemptive intent was undermined by the Supreme Court’s ruling that mere “extensive regulation of an area is not sufficient in the absence of a clear expression of legislative intent to preempt regulation of a field by local authorities, or a clear expression of the legislature’s desire to have uniform standards statewide.” Indeed, the Supreme Court required a “high degree of expression” of such an intention as a prerequisite of finding subject-wide preemption.\textsuperscript{586} In seeking to determine whether that requisite “high degree of expression” was present in the 1990 amendment, Baker stressed that, unlike statutes in some other cases, section 142B.6 “does not forbid local authorities from enacting law in the field regulated by chapter 142B,” and the “definite language” that the legislature used in precluding local regulation of obscene materials was distinctly absent. Moreover, the amendment failed to state specifically and definitely that the legislature intended the chapter’s provisions “to be uniform statewide standards without room for variation among local jurisdictions.” It neither ruled out local power to regulate in the same area nor “carve[d] out specific defined areas of permissible local regulation.” Of crucial significance was the fact that the phrase providing that inconsistent local ordinances would be superseded by the statute not only did not eliminate local power to adopt consistent and non-conflicting ordinances, but contemplated their existence; and since the Code itself defined such inconsistency as irreconcilability, Baker concluded that section 142B.6 lacked the “high degree of expression” required to find that the legislature intended to preempt the field of smoking bans in public places.\textsuperscript{587}

Ironically, in rejecting Philip Morris’s claim that the provision added in 1990 terminated any authority that cities might have possessed before then to regulate smoking, Baker’s conclusion (in response to plaintiffs’ request that the court consider the legislative history) that the amendment “does not place any

\textsuperscript{586}Goodell v. Humboldt County, 575 NW2d 486, 499-500 (Iowa 1998).

\textsuperscript{587}James Enterprises, Inc. v. City of Ames, Iowa, Equity No. EQ-CV040013, slip op. at 15-17 (Iowa Dist. Ct. for Story Cty, Feb. 13, 2002).
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

restriction on local governments in addition to that already in place through the home rule statute\textsuperscript{588} precisely echoed the belittling criticism voiced by the Tobacco Institute as it and other cigarette industry personnel were drafting and commenting on the preemption proposals that ultimately became the provision over which a decade later Philip Morris was litigating: “Iowa constitution already says this....”\textsuperscript{589} Baker carried this reasoning to its logical conclusion in such a rigorous manner as to render plaintiffs’ whole case empty of any substance. Pointing out that the amendment was placed in the same section (headed “Civil penalty for violation—uniform application”) with and below paragraphs dealing with enforcement, fines, and hearings, he detected a strong suggestion that the legislature intended merely to make the enforcement mechanisms uniform statewide; consequently, the amendment’s only impact was to prohibit cities from adopting ordinances imposing different fines or providing for hearings before an official other than a judicial magistrate. Then in response to plaintiffs’ claim that the legislature intended that all of the chapter’s provisions be applied uniformly statewide, Baker observed that the legislature had to be presumed to know that, pursuant to the Code, cities had the power to adopt higher or more stringent standards “unless a state law provides otherwise.” Since the “clear import of the statutory home rule provisions includes the concept that a city ordinance which is more stringent than a corresponding statute is ‘not inconsistent with a state law,’ [t]he statute must unambiguously place restrictions on the power of cities to enact higher standards.... If this is not done, the cities’ home rule authority is intact. ...The language employed in section 142B.6 does not impose such limitations.”\textsuperscript{590}

With respect to conflict-preemption, the central interpretive problem with \textsuperscript{588}James Enterprises, Inc. v. City of Ames, Iowa, Equity No. EQ-CV040013, slip op. at 18 (Iowa Dist. Ct. for Story Cty, Feb. 13, 2002).

\textsuperscript{589}Diana Avedon to Melinda Sidak (Feb. 13, 1990), Bates No. TI00301634/6. See above ch. 27. Unbeknownst to him, the Ames city attorney made a very similar argument in his appellate brief: the amendment was merely “an express declaration that local ordinances in this field are valid so long as the ordinance is not inconsistent with or in conflict with the provisions of Chapter 142B....” James Enterprises, Inc. v. City of Ames, 661 NW2d 150 (Iowa 2003), Defendant/Appellee’s Brief and Argument at 8, 2002 WL 33808796. Later Klaus opined that the basis of the Supreme Court’s opinion may have been the rule of statutory construction that a legislature cannot be presumed to have meant nothing by an amendment; consequently, the 1990 amendment cannot merely have repeated the constitutional and statutory home rule provisions. Telephone interview with John Klaus, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008).

which Judge Baker had to deal derived from tensions within the general principles of the legislature’s grant of home rule powers. The Iowa Code specifies, on the one hand, that an “exercise of a city power is not inconsistent with a state law unless it is irreconcilable with the state law,” and, on the other, that a “city...may set standards and requirements which are higher or more stringent than those imposed by state law, unless a state law provides otherwise.” The “tension,” as the Iowa Supreme Court had observed, was that “[a]ny distinction between a local ordinance that is inconsistent with state law and one that merely sets a higher standard or requirement is at best subtle.” Thus the Supreme Court had no trouble determining that “[w]hen a state law merely sets a standard, a local law setting a higher standard would not conflict with the state law and would be authorized”—so long as it did not prohibit what the statute permitted.

Baker, it seems, believed that he was dispensed from having to untangle this interpretive knot because, after mentioning two cases in which the Supreme Court had held that an ordinance’s higher standards failed to pass muster by virtue of unfaithfulness to the overall legislative scheme without drawing any concrete conclusions for the Ames case, he immediately moved on to the other prong of the city’s defense: “In addition to powers inherent in its home rule authority, the City of Ames relies on section 142B.2(2) for statutory authority to enact stricter prohibitory standards than those provided in Chapter 142B.” That crucial subsection provided that: “Smoking areas may be designated by persons having custody or control of public places, except in places in which smoking is prohibited by the fire marshall or by other law, ordinance, or regulation.” In other words, and later in detail, Baker acknowledged that only the presence of this provision saved the ordinance because otherwise its more stringent requirement would doom it on the grounds that it prohibited some act that the statute permitted (namely, designating smoking areas).

The parties disagreed sharply over the meaning of “other law, ordinance, or regulation.” Whereas the city argued that any ordinance that prohibited smoking in a public place fell within the scope of the phrase, Philip Morris insisted on a much narrower interpretation that excluded ordinances designed to control secondhand smoke for public health reasons and confined the scope exclusively to fire safety measures based on a canon of statutory construction according to which general words following an enumeration of specific words describing a legal subject comprehend only objects similar to those enumerated by the specific words. The fatal flaw in this argument Judge Baker identified in the missing element of ambiguity: since the “plain meaning” of the crucial word “other” was “different or distinct from that already mentioned; additional, or further,” and therefore the phrase meant any ordinance different from or in addition to whatever came before it (namely, a fire marshal’s prohibition), it appeared to mean what it plainly said and thus application of the special rule of statutory construction was not even needed. As examples of such other laws, ordinances, or regulations banning smoking Baker listed those governing the capitol complex buildings, correctional facilities, Iowa Communications Network classrooms, child care facilities, home food establishments, substance abuse treatment programs, salons and cosmetics schools, facilities managed by the State Historical Society, and courtrooms. He refused to accept plaintiffs’ claim that the legislature meant to preempt the relevant agencies’ power to curtail the designation of smoking areas.

592 Iowa Code § 364.3(3) (2001 and 2009).

Reactions to Baker’s decision were predictable. Council member Cross was, given the attorney general’s earlier opinion, not surprised. Far from being even the weak ban’s strongest advocate, Cross was nevertheless pleased “with the outcome because ‘[i]t is possible for those who don’t smoke to enjoy themselves and still allow smokers’ their rights—it just defines the times they can do it.’” Reacting to Judge Baker’s decision, Ames Tobacco Task Force co-chair Andrew Goedeken exclaimed a tad prematurely: “‘Big tobacco bit the dust.’” Incomprehensibly, in light of the feckless statewide law, the high school senior went on to characterize the ruling as “‘really speak[ing] volumes to the orientation of Iowa laws,’” which were “‘conducive to protecting public health.’”

---

The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

The Latest Is the Greatest: The Iowa Supreme Court Reverses

Champion/ [Y]et we’re saying it’s okay to smoke in bars the waitresses and waiters in restaurants should be protected but people who work in bars should not be. ... Pfab/ Well that’s, maybe that’s the next move.
Champion/ Well I don’t know, how do you decide who your [sic] going to protect? Pfab/ Well they used to smoke in airplanes too but they don’t anymore.... Champion/ Well they shouldn’t.
Pfab/ Well but they did for a long time, it was legal, this is legal too.600

On May 7, 2003, about 10 weeks after having heard oral argument—at which Justice James Carter “questioned whether the word ‘ordinance’ related to the Ames smoking ban” and (ominously) added that “[i]t might not justify banning smoking because the ’statute says state laws will supersede local laws”601— the Iowa Supreme Court unanimously reversed Judge Baker’s judgment.602 (Astonishingly, no amicus briefs had been filed: neither the attorney general, nor Iowa City, nor any of the health organizations, nor CAFE had sought to become a friend of the court, although they all understood that the Iowa City ordinance was also at risk.)603 The very brief opinion failed to engage Baker’s thoughtful

601 Scott Rank, “Iowa High Court Reviews Ames Smoking Ordinance,” ISD, Feb. 24, 2003, on http://www.iowastatedaily.com (visited Sept. 27, 2008). Oral argument took place at Drake University Law School. Klaus, according to another press account, argued that “designated smoking areas can exist only where cities don’t ban smoking.”

603 http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/AIndexFrm (visited Oct. 20, 2008). Belitsos “was surprised by the lack of support. Our city attorney stood alone. An amicus brief would have been appreciated.” Email from George Belitsos to Marc Linder (Oct. 28, 2008). As late as May 2001 Attorney General Miller had reiterated at a conference on clean indoor air that “‘State law does not pre-empt Iowa City and Coralville from enacting ordinances that expand state protections.... We stand ready to work with any municipality.’” Kathryn Ratliff, “Smoke-Free Leader Lauds CAFE,” ICP-C, May 25, 2001 (3A) (NewsBank) (erroneously dated Aug. 25). Asked later why the attorney general had not filed an amicus brief, the executive officer of the Iowa Attorney General’s office stated that: “Our office did provide substantial assistance to the City of Ames in preparing its brief. Our attorney who worked on that matter recalls that our opinion was cited in the city’s brief.” Asked again, he replied: “I think we felt at the time that the work we were doing with Ames was sufficient to make our views known to the court.” Email from William Roach to Marc Linder (Oct. 29, 2008). In fact, the attorney general opinion was not mentioned in the city’s main brief—or the plaintiffs’ briefs or the court’s opinion—which was only about seven pages and of poor quality. Steve St. Clair, who had written the attorney general’s opinion and felt fairly confident that the Supreme Court would affirm the district court’s sound decision, stated that one important reason for not filing an amicus brief was the fear that it might have stamped the Attorney General’s Office as partisan; in this sense the hope had been that the opinion’s mere existence would be more helpful. Telephone interview with Steve St. Clair, Des Moines (Oct. 30, 2008).

3196
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

Nevertheless, the undergraduate jurisprudences editing the University of Iowa’s student newspaper allowed as the Supreme Court justices, “[t]o their credit...correctly interpreted the law.” The editors, to their credit, recognized that “[u]nfortunately, the law itself is a mistake.” “Save Iowa City’s Smoking Ban by Contacting Legislators,” DI, May 12, 2003, on http://www.dailyiowan.com (visited Oct. 11, 2008).

“Plaintiffs’/Appellants’ Brief and Argument at 9, James Enterprises, Inc. v. City of Ames, 661 NW2d 150, 151 (Iowa 2003), 2002 WL 33808797. The Court did not expressly adopt plaintiffs’ absurd conclusion that the Ames ordinance “seeks to deprive the Hospitality Providers from [sic] what they have been historically able to do...accommodate both smokers and non-smokers...” Id. at 10.

On the morning of the day of the Iowa City City Council’s first consideration of the ordinance the Iowa City Press-Citizen opened its op-ed column to the Iowa Hospitality Association’s regurgitation of the cigarette oligopoly’s accommodationist nonsense on to which the IHA tacked the mendacious assertion that the Ames ordinance “completely” banned smoking in restaurants. Doni DeNucci, “Ban Would Hurt Restaurants,” ICP-C, Nov. 27, 2001 (9A:3-7) (also in Jessica Dumpert (Philip Morris Media Affairs), Newedge
The Court began its analysis by asserting that “[c]learly, the provision in the ordinance of the city that prohibits designated smoking areas conflicts with the provisions of section 142B.2, which allows such designation.” It then asserted its conviction that (the 1990 amendment of) section 142B.6 “supersedes the conflicting provisions of the city ordinance.” How or why section 142B.2(2), which expressly permitted ordinances to prohibit both smoking and the designation of smoking areas, conflicted with an ordinance that prohibited such designations the Court failed to explain in its rush to unveil the deus ex machina of “settled rules of interpretation,” resort to which in order to resolve a conflict between “provisions of different statutes relating to the same subject matter” was its responsibility. Thus shifting the focus from the conflict between statute and ordinance to that between statutes or between provisions within the same statute, it found such resolution in the Iowa Code’s chapter on construction of statutes, consultation of which prompted it to conclude that the language of section 142B.6 should curtail any grant of local authority that may be supplied by section 142B.2(2) for two reasons. First, that section comes later in the chapter and purports to govern everything in the chapter that comes before it. Second, it appears that section 142B.2(2) was enacted in 1987, and section 142B.6 was enacted in 1990. Iowa Code section 4.8 provides:

If statutes enacted at the same or different sessions of the legislature are irreconcilable, the statute latest in date of enactment by the general assembly prevails. If provisions of the same Act are irreconcilable, the provision listed last in the Act prevails.

608 James Enterprises, Inc. v. City of Ames, 661 NW2d 150, 153 (Iowa 2003). An analysis of decisions dealing with preemption of local anti-smoking ordinances concluded that the Iowa case was one of only two in which the “court based its decision solely on express preemption; this was probably because where state statutes clearly prohibit action, local governments do not act.” Jean O’Connor et al., “Preemption of Local Smoke-Free Air Ordinances: The Implications of Judicial Opinions for Meeting National Health Objectives,” Journal of Law, Medicine & Ethics 36(2):403-12 at 405 (Summer 2008).

Because section 142B.6 is the later enactment, its provisions should govern over any conflicting language in section 142B.2.\textsuperscript{610}

Although the Court had failed to demonstrate a conflict, let alone irreconcilability—and, as the Court later held, “to be ‘irreconcilable,’ the conflict must be unresolvable short of choosing one enactment over the other”\textsuperscript{611}—between the two sections, it was, at least to its own satisfaction, justified in stamping Q.E.D. on its reasoning.\textsuperscript{612} Ames City Attorney John Klaus drew some solace from attributing the Court’s crabbed opinion to its annoyance with the legislature for having written the statute ambiguously: not having wanted this political hot potato, the justices threw it right back at the legislature.\textsuperscript{613}

\textbf{The Legislative History of the Statutory Amendment Prohibiting the Designation of Smoking Areas in Places in which Smoking Was Already Prohibited by “the Fire Marshall or by Other Law, Ordinance, or Regulation”}

Bizarrely, given the crucial role of the ambiguous section 142B.2(2), neither the Iowa Supreme Court, nor Judge Baker, nor the parties in their briefs made any effort whatsoever to examine its legislative history.\textsuperscript{614} This lapse was all the more \textsuperscript{610}James Enterprises, Inc. v. City of Ames, 661 NW2d 150, 154 (Iowa 2003).

\textsuperscript{611}City of Davenport v. Seymour, 755 NW2d 533, 541 (Iowa 2008).

\textsuperscript{612}Although the outcome would not have changed, the Court, misled by its shoddy research, applied the wrong statutory construction rule from the code. Since the provisions allegedly in conflict were both amendments (enacted in 1987 and 1990), the Court should have applied Iowa Code § 4.11 (2001): “If amendments to the same statute are enacted at...different sessions of the general assembly, one amendment without reference to another, the amendments are to be harmonized, if possible, so that effect may be given to each. If the amendments are irreconcilable, the latest in date of enactment by the general assembly prevails.”

\textsuperscript{613}Telephone interview with John Klaus, Ames (May 23, 2008). In contrast, Assistant Attorney General Donald Stanley, who for many years has been involved in various aspects of tobacco litigation, observed that Klaus’s incompetence at oral argument, especially his inability to answer even the justices’ easy questions, may have shaped the case’s outcome. Telephone interview with Donald Stanley, Des Moines (May 19, 2008).

\textsuperscript{614}Asked why he had not briefed the question of the legislative history, Philip Morris’s lawyer responded that he had felt that he had a strong enough case based on the text of the statute, vis-à-vis which the Iowa Supreme Court did not give much weight to what individual legislators may have said about what they meant by various amendments. To surprising and unforgivable on the part of the Supreme Court, which, after all, fancied itself such a stickler for faithfully following the Code’s rules of statutory construction, one of which expressly provided that: “If a statute is ambiguous, the court, in determining the intention of the legislature, may consider among other matters... 2. The circumstances under which the statute was enacted. 3. The legislative history. ... 5. The consequences of a particular construction.”

A review of the provision’s history, which originated in 1975 and assumed its final form in 1987, reveals that Philip Morris’s contention that inclusion of the fire marshal demonstrated that the following reference to “other law, ordinance, or regulation” meant that the latter three were limited to fire safety was untenable. The first Iowa anti-smoking bill to use closely related phrasing was S.F. 106, which, when it was originally filed on February 4, 1975, was very brief and prohibited smoking in a few identified types of public buildings (such as museums, libraries, and theaters), but permitted those in custody or control of them to designate smoking areas. The much more comprehensive amended version that the Senate Human Resources Committee recommended and that appeared in the Journal of the Senate on March 12 as S-3313 limited the power of those in charge of the buildings to designate smoking areas by providing that they “may make available smoking areas adjacent to such facilities within the same structure where smoking is not prohibited by any statute, ordinance or lawful rule of this state or any of its political subdivisions....” The amended bill also added a prohibition on smoking on various common carriers, “except in those areas, not exceeding fifty percent of the passenger seating capacity, where smoking is not prohibited by any other statute, ordinance or lawful rule of the United States, this state or any of its political subdivisions....” Although an exhaustive analysis of the committee’s action is frustrated by the fact that the original committee amendment that the Legislative Service Bureau had prepared during the first week in March and from which the committee was working at its meeting on March 11 was not preserved in the Iowa State Archives, the minutes make it unambiguously clear that the reference to ordinances did not mean orders of the fire marshal. This conclusion follows from the fact that liberal Republican Senator John S. Murray—who was concerned that those in charge of local buildings not permit smoking in places which the fire marshal had deemed fire hazardous—asked about fire marshal regulations and was informed they would still be in effect. In other words, even though they were not mentioned in the committee amendment, the legal force of any smoking prohibitions issued by fire marshals would be unaffected by the bill; logically, then, the statutes, ordinances, and lawful rules newly included in the committee amendment did not embrace fire marshal regulations.

The source of this language is not documented, but it seems likely, given the Minnesota statute’s impact, as the first broad public smoking ban, on anti-smoking legislation in the mid-1970s in the United States generally and in Iowa in particular\textsuperscript{625} that the wording derived from a Minnesota bill that had been introduced by Phyllis Kahn on January 20, 1975, passed the House on March 10,\textsuperscript{626} was signed by the governor on June 2, and went into effect on August 1: “Smoking areas may be designated by proprietors or other persons in charge of public places, except in places where smoking is prohibited by the fire marshall or by other law, ordinance or regulation.”\textsuperscript{627} (Fire marshals’ ordinances banning

\textsuperscript{625}See above chs. 24-25.

\textsuperscript{627}Minnesota House of Representatives, H.F. No. 79, § 4 (Jan. 20, 1975, by Kahn et al.). The wording of the provision in the enacted law was identical except that “in which” was substituted for “where.” 1975 Minn. Laws ch. 211, § 5, at 633, 634. A similar bill that Kahn had introduced in 1974 and that had also included a provision on designating smoking areas lacked the exception for areas in which smoking was otherwise prohibited. Minnesota House of Representatives, H.F. 2801, § 2(3) (introduced Jan. 16, 1974, by Kahn et al.). This language in the Minnesota statute, which lacked the putative pre-emption provision, was held by the attorney general opinion and a district court not to pre-empt local government action to ban smoking. Minn Op. AG 62B (May 4, 2000), on http://www.ag.state.mn.us/resources/opinions/050400.htm (visited Apr. 12, 2009); Earl C. Hill Bloomington Post 550 v City of Bloomington, Order and Memorandum Denying Plaintiffs’ Motion for Temporary Injunction at 7-8 (Minn. D.C. 4th Jud. Dist., Hennepin Cty, Ct. File No. 05-3733, Mar. 25, 2005), on http://tobaccolawcenter.org/breaking+news/Order+Denying+Temporary+Injunction.pdf (visited Apr. 12, 2009). However, an administrative law judge, without substantive interpretation, ruled that a proposed regulation by the Health Department to ban smoking in office buildings except in private enclosed offices and lunchrooms/lounges and thus to prohibit owners from designating smoking areas elsewhere despite the discretion that the legislature otherwise conferred on owners to do so went beyond the statute and the agency’s statutory authority, although the proposed rule’s effect “is laudable, is supported by public opinion, represents the majority view of the advisory group and is based upon present day knowledge of second hand smoke.” State of Minnesota, Office of Administrative Hearings for the Minnesota Department of Health, In the Matter of Proposed Permanent Rules of the Minnesota Department of Health Relating to Clean Indoor Air: Report of the Administrative Law Judge, Finding of Fact 29.a (1-0900-8678-1, Aug. 2, 1994), on http://www.oah.state.mn.us/aljBase/09008678.rr1.htm. The ALJ reached the same conclusion concerning a proposed rule to ban smoking in all customer areas of retail stores despite the fact that the rule was “supported by the evidence and by most retailers.” \textit{Id.}, Finding of Fact 35.d. The question as to why the statutory provision authorizing owners’ discretion to be overridden by “regulation” did not apply to a regulation proposed to be promulgated by an agency required to “adopt rules and regulations necessary and reasonable to implement the provisions” of the act in question the ALJ neither raised nor answered. 1975 Minn. Laws
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

This identical Minnesota language then appeared in H.F. 1130 filed in January 1976 by Representative Jim Wells. That bill saw no action, but in 1976 the Senate took up S.F. 106, which, as ultimately passed by the Senate on March 3, 1976, included a provision that, as had been the case in 1975, lacked a reference to the fire marshal: “The person or persons authorized to designate smoking areas...shall not designate any area where smoking is prohibited by any other statute, ordinance, or lawful rule of the United States, this state, or any of its political subdivisions.”

The House did not consider S.F. 106, but in 1977 Wells filed H.F. 285, which was virtually identical with S.F. 106, reproduced the latter’s provision authorizing the override of discretionary designation of smoking areas, and did not refer to the fire marshal as had his H.F. 1130. After numerous unsuccessful efforts at joining Minnesota and a growing number of states by passing an anti-public smoking law, in 1978 the Iowa legislature finally passed such a bill, which from the time of its filing until its appearance in the session laws included a provision with the same language as S.F. 106: “The person or persons authorized to designate smoking areas...shall not so designate an area where smoking is prohibited by any other statute, ordinance, or lawful rule of the United States, this state, or any of its political subdivisions.”

So the law remained until the 1980s after Democrats had gained control of both houses of the legislature. As early as 1983, the chief vehicle for extending coverage was H.F. 248, further-going provisions of which were taken from the 1975 Minnesota law, including the almost verbatim adoption of the anti-preemption provision: “Smoking areas may be designated by persons having custody or control of public places, except in places where smoking is prohibited by the fire marshal or by other law, ordinance or regulation.”634 From this point forward until the statute was finally amended in 1987, inclusion of the reference to the fire marshal was invariant in all versions of the chief legislation.635 That language then remained in the Iowa Code until the statute was repealed in 2008.636

Thus the most straightforward reason for its inclusion in the Iowa statute was, as was the case with regard to some other provisions, simply that it was in the model-like Minnesota statute. It might also be plausible to speculate that the fire marshal was specified because of concern that continued omission might lead to the permissibility of the designation of fire-hazardous areas as smoking areas as a result of some overblown fear of state preemption. However, not only is there no indication that this issue was ever raised during debate, but the House Journal and Senate Journal have left no trace of any discussion at all of this provision. What is not plausible is Philip Morris’’s claim during the Ames litigation that “other law, ordinance or regulation” referred back to the fire marshal. This assertion lacked plausibility precisely because the fire marshal’s smoking prohibition had been added to the already existing “other law, ordinance or regulation,” which no one would have had any reason prior to that time to imagine as referring exclusively to fire hazards.

The Ames and Iowa City Ordinances as the First and Last Hurrah of Local Control in Iowa

“I think we made history when we did that [i.e., passed the ordinance]. We helped to get things started at the state level.”637

I think as we get used to clean air, we get increasingly annoyed by going out and having to walk through clouds of smoke. You might say that well, legislatting against, um, unpleasantness is just (mumbled) but I’d also say that public urination is not a health risk. It’s just unpleasant, and we don’t allow that. When you consider smoking, it’s not far 636 Iowa Code § 142B.2(2).

By the time the Supreme Court invalidated it, the Ames ordinance had been in effect for 21 months during which not a single citation had been issued for noncompliance at any of the 135 restaurants and (food-serving) bars.\textsuperscript{639} Consequently, post-mortem comments by the legally vanquished in Ames were dejectedly realistic, but in no way fatalistic. While recognizing that “Philip Morris has won its appeal to the Iowa Supreme Court” and a “major battle,” the co-chairmen of the ATTF presciently predicted that “[o]ne day in the not-too-distant future, all restaurants will be 100 percent free of cigarette smoke along with all public places.”\textsuperscript{640} In the meantime, however, Belitsos was acutely aware that “Iowa appears to be defying a national trend.”\textsuperscript{641} Quirmbach, who by this time was a state senator and may therefore have developed a certain pessimism about the possibilities of repealing the preemption of local control in the Iowa Senate as controlled by the tobacco-friendly Republicans in general and especially under the heavily smoking Majority Leader Stewart Iverson,\textsuperscript{642} bewailed the Supreme Court’s having taken Iowa “‘back at least 20 years’” and “‘strongly urge[d] all restaurants in Ames to continue with voluntary compliance.’”\textsuperscript{643}

\textsuperscript{638} Transcription of Special Formal Iowa City City Council Meeting at 14 (Apr. 27, 2010), on http://www.iowa-city.org/weblink/docview.aspx?id=962325 (statement by CAFE member Chris Squier concerning proposed ordinance to extend outdoor smoking ban on pedestrian mall).

\textsuperscript{639} Http://www.tobaccotaskforce.org/history.html (visited Sept. 26, 2008). This record was, to be sure, ambiguous: it could have resulted from excellent compliance or nonexistent enforcement.

\textsuperscript{641} David Grebe, “Smoking Ban Snuffed Out,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), May 7, 2003 (1A:2-5, at A8:5)

\textsuperscript{642} See above chs. 31-32.

\textsuperscript{643} David Grebe, “Smoking Ban Snuffed Out,” \textit{Tribune} (Ames), May 7, 2003 (1A:2-5, at A8:4-5). The reference to 20 years was presumably purely for rhetorical effect and did not signify any actual state of the law at any particular time. Since no city had attempted to adopt a no-smoking ordinance before the preemption provision was added in 1990 (or between 1990 and 2000), it is not clear how the legal situation could have been worse than it had been before 1990 when restaurants were incorporated into the statewide law as a quid pro quo for preemption. In contrast, some cities (including Ames) had prohibited smoking in certain city-owned buildings (such as city hall), exercising a power that any property owner had prior to and independently of the statewide clean indoor air law. In
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

In contrast, in Iowa City CAFE leaders, simply “‘maddened’” by the Supreme Court decision, saw no way out of the predicament that Philip Morris’s money had forged for the strategy that local control advocates had hoped would enable them to sidestep the cigarette companies’ overwhelming financial advantages: it would be “difficult for a grassroots group like CAFE to battle tobacco lobbyists at the Statehouse” because of their clients’ “‘hold on legislators.’” In the meantime, the group would have to focus on education in such areas as encouraging voluntary smoking bans, keeping school grounds smoke-free, and insuring that parents not smoke in their children’s presence, and terminate its efforts to request other cities (such as the college town of Grinnell, whose city council had been considering adoption of a clean indoor air ordinance to adopt bans.

For the Ames Tribune, which had supported the ordinance because it was based on a compromise between the restaurant owners and the anti-smokers, but otherwise held “basic reservations about the extent to which government ought to regulate private people making their own choices,” the predicament forced on Ames by the Supreme Court’s making the allegedly free market determine public health outcomes was perfect:

We don’t like to suck down someone else’s cigarette smoke any more than anyone. But the ideal situation would be for customer demands to dictate whether smoking is allowed. And that’s exactly what the Ames Tobacco Task Force is calling for now that the ordinance is struck down. The task force would like businesses to voluntarily continue the smoking ban. And it is urging customers to vote with their feet on where they choose to some instances city employees’ unions contested these bans on the grounds that the city governments or agencies had failed to bargain collectively with the unions before implementing them. The Tobacco Institute was, for example, monitoring developments in Waterloo. Legislative Action-Trac (June 17, 1993), Bates No. T128922786. See also Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers, Local Union No. 738 and Communications Workers of American Local 7175 v. City of Waterloo, Iowa, Case No. 4954 (Public Employment Relations Board, Dec. 2, 1994); Ottumwa Education Association v. Ottumwa Community School District, Case No. 4510 (Public Employment Relations Board, May 27, 1992).

645In Grinnell a community forum had been held and 1,300 signatures collected in support of an ordinance. The Iowa Attorney General’s Report on Secondhand Smoke 17 (May 2003), on http://www.iowaattorneygeneral.gov/images/pdfs/WebReport Versionsmoke.pdf (visited June 7, 2009).

Unlike the Tribune, Attorney General Tom Miller did not seek to make a virtue of a necessity. Instead, he immediately declared that the Court’s decision had made it “imperative” for the legislature to amend the state law to enable communities to pass ordinances protecting “Iowans’ right to breathe clean air.” Apparently still focused on local control and not yet ready to make the leap to the kind of statewide laws that he mentioned as having been passed in California, New York, and Delaware, Miller stressed that Iowa was now one of only 16 states preempting local secondhand smoke ordinances and thus making it impossible for its cities to join the 1,605 communities nationwide that had already adopted them. Bill Roach, the attorney general’s spokesman, insisted that “the ruling puts pressure on the legislature to act to ensure that Iowans can breathe clean air.” Although he did not expect the issue to be considered during the legislative special session in May, he “fully expect[ed] the issue to go on the legislature’s agenda in 2004.” To be sure, with the tobacco industry-beholden Republicans fully in control of both houses of the legislature, Roach’s expectation was, as he himself surely knew, a pious wish. Nevertheless, Senator Quirmbach announced that the Mary Greeley Medical Center, Tobacco Free Iowa, and other organizations would support efforts to educate the legislature about the need to amend the clean indoor air law’s preemption provision in order to restore Ames’s smoke-free dining ordinance.

The press, too, understood that all that the Supreme Court had accomplished was probably “toss[ing] the controversial issue into the hands of state lawmakers.” Republican House Speaker Christopher Rants certainly agreed:

---

647 “We Haven’t Seen the Last of Fight Against Smoking,” Tribune (Ames), May 8, 2003 (A6:1) (edit.).

650 Likewise, Iowa City’s Senator, Joe Bolkcom, must have understood that his call for the legislature to confer power on local government to promulgate rules to regulate clean indoor air would, under the prevailing political arithmetic, fall on Majority Leader Iverson’s tobacco money-deafened ears. Vanessa Miller, “Court Strikes Down Ames Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, May 8, 2003 (1A) (NewsBank).

“...The debate’s all going to shift from city halls to the State Capitol.... What the outcome will be, I have no idea. I guarantee bills will be filed.”652 To be sure, Rants, a rigid free-marketeer who was also an energetic executor of the tobacco industry’s agenda, was being more than a tad disingenuous about the future of anti-tobacco legislation: he had already been using his power to kill anti-smoking bills and would continue to do so until his party lost its majority in 2006.653

Ironically, the reaction of at least one of the Ames plaintiffs would not have pleased Philip Morris. Rick Carmer, co-owner of Wallaby’s and Dublin Bay, said that he would “not change much right away” because “I think people have gotten used to it.... I don’t think the ordinance is without merit.” Although he favored business owners’ making the decision, he stated that he would not be opposed to strengthening statewide anti-smoking laws because they would create a “level playing field.”654 Indeed, Carmer complied with the invalidated ordinance until the statewide law was enacted in 2008—of which he approved because people were looking for “a little clean air.”655 The fact that Carmer and owners of eight other establishments continued to act as if the ordinance were still in effect (while many more restaurants remained or became 100-percent smoke-free)656 was, in ATTF’s view, a function of the cultural change that had taken root in Ames expressing and reinforcing many residents’ increasingly deep-seated demand to be free of cigarette smoke.657 (In Iowa City, too, some restaurant owners chose to remain voluntarily smoke-free, while others immediately resumed smoking in order to “accommodate our guests’ requests.”)658 Or, as Rich Johansen, one of the owner-negotiators, who continued to comply with the ordinance, put it more opaquely: many people had “changed their eating habits.”659 Another plaintiff, who was going to allow smoking only so long as no one was eating, had allegedly joined the suit “just” because of “the principle.”

653See above ch. 31.
655Telephone interview with Rick Carmer, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008). It is unclear whether Carmer was subtly and ironically referring to the consequences of the red light/green light rule on indoor air quality.

Carmer’s self-contradictory attitude was also compatible with some restaurant owners’ behavior before the city council: they had, according to Quirmbach, wanted the council to adopt an ordinance so that they would not personally have to make the decision (and be exposed to some smoking customers’ displeasure). Another plaintiff, non-smoking Dirk Rozeboom, who “hate[d] having to come home, change my clothes and take a shower” after exposure to the smoke in his own business, five years later not only favored the statewide ban as it was going through the legislature, but knew that its implementation would not cause him to lose business.

Three days after the Supreme Court issued its opinion the Des Moines Register published an editorial objecting not to the court’s action—but to yet another example of the state legislature’s steadily reasserting its control over cities after the 1968 Municipal Home Rule Amendment to the state constitution had “supposedly released Iowa cities and towns from the iron grip of state control.” After admonishing the legislature to “back off and allow communities to decide for themselves whether they want to impose a stricter standard on smoking than the state,” the newspaper added that whether cities should in fact exercise that power was a “tougher question.” That the Register, just five years before the legislature itself imposed a much broader statewide ban than the Ames activists had ever dreamed of, not only answered its own question in the negative, but did so on the basis of anachronistic laissez-faire, would reveal how quickly nationwide trends would be engulfing Iowa:

Should they ban the use of a legal product in establishments that customers are free to patronize or shun?

The question is complicated by the plight of the hapless employee exposed to the health risk associated with secondhand smoke while waiting tables or tending bar. Civil suits and workers’ compensation actions are a better tool to deal with that issue, however, 661 Carmer unpersuasively claimed that he had become a plaintiff not on account of the substance of the ordinance, but because he had been dissatisfied with the process leading to its adoption. Telephone interview with Rick Carmer, Ames (Oct. 5, 2008).

662 Telephone interview with Herman Quirmbach, Ames (Apr. 19, 2008).

664 “Let Cities Ban Smoking (or Not),” DMR, May 10, 2003 (12A) (NewsBank) (edit.).
than a total ban on smoking.

Otherwise, this issue should be resolved in the marketplace. As long as people are free to choose to smoke, private entrepreneurs should be free to invite smokers into their establishments along with non-smokers who are willing to tolerate the odor—at the risk of driving away those customers who insist on clean air.\textsuperscript{665}

That as late as 2003 this beacon of heartland liberalism deemed permitting the free labor market to bestow emphysema, lung cancer, and heart disease on workers, who (or whose families) could then seek monetary compensation for their irreversibly destroyed health (or death) to be better social and public health policy than simply eliminating the exposure to secondhand smoke at the source was a profound sign of the times. Whether the editorial writer was embarrassed that five years later such comments were being publicly voiced only by self-interested bar owners, their right-wing legislative ideologues, and the cigarette companies is less clear.

On May 13, at the first city council meeting after the ordinance had been struck down,\textsuperscript{666} State Senator Quirmbach requested that the council resist rescinding the ordinance on the grounds that if the legislature statutorily eliminated the preemption obstacle, the ordinance would then become enforceable. Belitsos echoed this view, adding that the Iowa City City Council would also be asked to leave its ban-ordinance on the books.\textsuperscript{667} Belitsos also shared the results of an ATTF survey showing that 87 restaurants—including two whose owners had been plaintiffs—indicated that they would voluntarily continue to comply, while only seven would allow the resumption of smoking as would all the bars in Ames. Belitsos shed bright light on owners’ cigarette industry-induced false predictions of impending doom by pointing out that during the two years since adoption of the ordinance Ames had recorded a net increase of eight restaurants, suggesting a boom for the hospitality industry.\textsuperscript{668} (In a similar vein, council member Goodhue later reported his belief that “most if not all of the owners complied with the ordinance after it was repealed because they had such positive customer feedback and in many cases, their business increased.”)\textsuperscript{669} After several other speakers had urged the council to leave the ordinance on the books, Mayor \textsuperscript{665}“Let Cities Ban Smoking (or Not),” \textit{DMR}, May 10, 2003 (12A) (NewsBank).

\textsuperscript{667}Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 9-10 (May 13, 2003) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).
\textsuperscript{668}Minutes of the Regular Meeting of the Ames City Council at 10 (May 13, 2003) (copy furnished electronically by City Clerk Diane Voss).
\textsuperscript{669}Email from Steve Goodhue to Marc Linder (Oct. 13, 2008).
Tedesco had opined that retaining an unenforceable ordinance “would be a disservice to the citizens of Ames,” and City Attorney Klaus had expressed the belief that the ordinance should be repealed even though the Supreme Court’s order did not require repeal, (new) council member Riad Mahayni, a professor of community planning, related that many residents and non-residents had asked him not to vote for repeal and that the city historian had told him that he believed that the city’s code of ordinances included other unenforced ordinances. In opposition to repeal, ex-member Quirmbach mentioned that a large number of people concerned about the issue would be working hard to bring it to the top of the legislature’s agenda, although he admitted that he did not know what its priorities would be in 2004. After council member Hoffman had stated that she saw no harm in leaving the ordinance on the books, the motion to pass on first reading an ordinance to repeal the no-smoking ordinance failed by a vote of 3 to 3; of the four members remaining from 2001, the two bankers, Cross and Goodhue voted for, while Hoffman and Wirth opposed the motion. Nevertheless, the council did vote unanimously to request that the state legislature empower local governments to make decisions on smoking in public places. 670

For all its belittlement of the Ames ordinance, the Iowa City City Council lacked the gumption to retain its own ordinance on the books. As soon as the Court struck down the former, the city attorney announced that she would recommend the latter’s repeal. 671 The Iowa City Press-Citizen begged to differ: appealing to the Ames action, it argued that “sometimes one may not be legal, but they [sic] may be morally right. In the same spirit, Iowa City councilors also should resist rescinding its ordinance and instead ask for local businesses to voluntarily comply with the law.” And as for those who asserted that not repealing the ordinance was tantamount to “defacing the Iowa Constitution,” they were “primarily smoking ban opponents who see political expedience in forcing municipalities to go through the process of passing another ban later.” 672 CAFE may have gnashed its teeth at having to emulate Ames, 673 but council member Wilburn praised for his well-spokenness on this topic by businessman-mayor

Lehman, considerately thought of the potential confusion that retention of the ordinance might cause a business or people looking to move to Iowa City to operate a business. The council, insisting to the very end on distinguishing itself from any Ames-like taint, responded to the city attorney’s request for expedited action and quickly voted unanimously to repeal its ordinance.

Thoroughly consistent with this hasty disposal of the Iowa City City Council’s narrowly approved anti-smoking ban was its failure to undertake any other initiative to reduce exposure to secondhand smoke that would not have been barred by legislative preemption. For example, just a few months after repeal, council member Kanner made a mild-mannered request for the city to moderate the extent of the smoke gauntlet (formed in part by the four smoking city council members, who, in addition, threw their cigarette butts on the ground) that people were forced to endure on the city’s own land on their way into and out of the Civic Center (city hall), “which is the headquarters of our democracy. People should be able to come without hostile barriers:

A number of, of organizations and business, mostly non-profit organizations have enacted no smoking within 20 feet of the entranceway. For myself, and I think a number of people, it’s hard to go through smoke on the way to the entrance. The library has a sign, hospitals do, and I was wondering if we could ask that the Civic Center which is quite a public place and we want to be as open and as accessible as possible, if we can consider putting up some signs and asking people not to smoke within 20 feet of the entranceway.

---

675 Transcript of Iowa City City Council Meeting at 17 (June 10, 2003), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/193.pdf.
676 Complete Description of the Council Activities at 5 (June 10, 2003), on http://www.icgov.org/minutes/193.pdf (by a vote of 7 to 0). On the day that the Supreme Court issued its opinion, Johnson County Attorney J. Patrick White predicted that if the Iowa City City Council did not repeal the ordinance, “some local retailer will go to court and win quickly.” Minutes of the Informal Meeting of the Johnson County Board of Supervisors at 2 (May 7, 2003), on http://www.johnson-county.com/auditor/min2003/030507ws.htm (visited Oct. 23, 2008). That no one filed such a suit in Ames was a function of owners’ having accepted the partial ban.
677 Telephone interview with Steven Kanner, Cleveland, OH (Nov. 14, 2008); telephone interview with Karen Kubby, Iowa City (Nov. 17, 2008). Kubby, a (quondam) socialist who had been on the city council from 1989 to 2000, mentioned that during council breaks, sometimes the four-person smoking majority—Dee Vanderhoef was a sometime smoker—“met” outside.
The Two Main College Towns Adopt Anti-Smoking Ordinances: 1999-2003

... I just stepped it off, it does give you the front porch and so that gives you some room to come in from different angles at least so you don’t have to go through the smoke.679

Three members having expressed interest in talking about it, the mayor decided that it would be put on a work session agenda.680 The Press-Citizen quickly mocked the timidity:

[O]ur council is discussing posting signs, near City Hall entrances, that nicely tell smokers to step away from the door before lighting up.

Considering the overwhelming evidence of smoking’s dangers, the council ought to get tough. How about approving an ordinance banning smoking within 100 feet of a city-owned building’s entrance? ... Friendly signs at City Hall are better than no action, but a stricter policy with some serious fines—say $100 for a first offense and $200 for a second and each subsequent offense—would go a lot further in curbing such smoking.

Ticketing smokers may sound harsh, but short of hitting their pocketbooks through fines, what else can a municipality do to help them end an addiction that for almost half a century has been known to cause fatalities?681

The not so gentle press criticism manifestly failed to achieve its purpose: for many months the question was listed on the agenda as a future work session item, but it was never discussed and the city council never even bothered to exercise the power it indisputably possessed to ban smoking at the entrance to its own building until after the state legislature passed the Smokefree Air Act in 2008.682 Revealingly, when asked about the issue in 2006, the then city manager Steve Atkins purported to support a smoking ban near entrances to city-owned buildings, but wondered aloud what kind of ordinances a city council with three smokers on it would pass.683 (In contrast, as early as 2006 the Johnson County

---

680Transcription of the Iowa City City Council Meeting at 41 (Oct. 14, 2003).
682Email between Marc Linder and Marian Karr, Iowa City City Clerk (Oct. 27, 2008).
683Telephone interview with Steve Atkins (Sept. 15, 2006). To be sure, Atkins may in part have been using his indirect criticism of the council as a pretext to justify his own inaction: he not only incoherently mentioned the ban on smoking at the entrance to city hall as a solution to the problem of cigarette butt litter blocks away in downtown Iowa City, but seemed confused about what a “causal relationship” was when asked to explain what one had to do with the other. Id. Ironically, Kanner himself, while proposing the same ban, refused to consider enforcement of the city’s litter ordinance to reduce the Board of Supervisors unanimously approved a resolution prohibiting smoking and use of smokeless tobacco within 50 feet of all county building entrances and exits—the most restrictive tobacco use policy in Iowa at the time, though not far-reaching enough for at least one supervisor. The council and city manager provided an unambiguous answer when they refused for almost eight months even to post the signs required by the 2008 Smokefree Air Act at the very place about which Kanner had complained five years earlier—and when the city government, finally abandoning its unlawful intransigence, did post signs at the entrance (which failed to put anyone on notice as to where exactly smoking was prohibited), it did so only because, in response to a formal complaint about the city’s violation of the new state law, the Iowa Department of Public Health had issued a First Notice of Potential Violation and rejected City Attorney Dilkes’s risible attempt to deny liability on the basis that a tiny no-smoking sign on the building entrance—which was barely legible a few feet away—sufficed to make the city compliant with regard to the statutory duty to post signage at the entrance to the no-smoking grounds 41.6 feet away.

immense piles of butts all over the sidewalks on the grounds that he did not want to “hassle folks downtown.” Telephone interview with Steven Kanner, Iowa City (ca. 2003). During a brief period in 2001 the Iowa City police, “based on concerns from the business community,” “dusted off a rarely used littering law” to ticket people throwing cigarette butts on the pedestrian mall. Sara Langenberg, “Police Use Litter Law on Smokers,” ICP-C, Apr. 7, 2001. A few years later it was estimated that in downtown Des Moines workers spent 6,000 hours a year picking up cigarette butts. Melissa Walker, “D.M. Leaders Ready to Kick Butts,” DMR, June 12, 2007, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com.

\[685\] Eleanor Dilkes to Bonnie Mapes (director, Division of Tobacco Use Prevention and Control) (Feb. 4, 2009); Bonnie Mapes to Eleanor Dilkes (Feb. 12, 2009); email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (Feb. 24, 2009). Dilkes revealed that the city’s stonewalling was part of a larger agenda: “[T]he real issue is not one sign at the front of City Hall. If the City is required to sign this area, then presumably I should direct City staff to place signs at the entrances to the grounds of all City buildings and in particular at every point that the sidewalk leading to a City building intersects with the sidewalk in the public right-of-way and at the entrance to every parking lot to all public buildings.” In a last-ditch, but unsuccessful, effort to convince IDPH not to enforce the law’s protection of nonsmokers, Dilkes limned this parade of horribles: “My point is...to highlight how requiring the City to post one sign has the potential to require school districts, municipalities, counties, and the State to place thousands of signs on the grounds of every public building, at the entrances to all parking lots connected to a public building, at the entrances to all parking lots connected to a public building, On April 14, 2008, the day before the governor signed the statewide smoking ban bill, in the course of council discussion of city property smoking policies, Mayor Regenia Bailey expressed concern about people’s having to walk through smoke to get into smoke-free restaurants—an outcome that she (erroneously) did not think was the legislature’s intent—and was contradicted by member Champion, who insisted that her observations in Chicago and San Francisco revealed no such congregation of smokers around doors to restaurants. This cosmopolitan intelligence prompted a surprised Bailey, who was apparently unaware of the council’s prehistory of inaction and whose colleague had conveniently either lost touch with or refrained from invoking her own institutional memory, to interject: “I see people congregating outside this building that smoke.” To be sure, the mayor did not want her new-found interest in the subject to be misunderstood: “I mean, I’ve been known to enjoy a cigarette or cigar. I mean, I’m not a zealot about smoking, I just think that we need to balance the interests, and we recognize the challenges of second-hand smoke, and that particularly we don’t want kids around it.” That the mayor qua Iowa City’s political figure-head and civic role model (presumably unreflectively) paired publicly and unembarrassedly trumpeting her enjoyment of smoking two kinds of tobacco (one of which was atypical for teenage females) with solicitude for children was eerily akin to tobacco companies’ traditional stance. Yet later she knew enough to say that banning smoking in a pedestrian mall playground was “not just an air-quality issue; it’s an example issue.” Exactly which and at the intersections between sidewalks leading to public buildings and sidewalks in the public right-of-way.” Eleanor Dilkes to Bonnie Mapes (Feb. 4, 2009). To be sure, presumably Dilkes assumed that such arguments would prevail because a few months earlier they had in fact induced Mapes to amend the proposed rules to implement the Smokefree Air Act with regard to the prohibition of smoking on the public sidewalk in front of the city hall. See below ch. 36.

686 In fact, the legislature struck such outdoor no-smoking zones from the bill in order to pass the bill. See below ch. 35.

687 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session at 8 (Apr. 14, 2008), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/590.pdf.

688 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session at 5 (Apr. 14, 2008).

689 Chris Ratigan, “City May Further Limit Smoking in Public Places,” ICP-C, Aug. 22, 2008, on http://www.press-citizen.com (visited Aug. 22, 2008). Despite the playground’s alleged exemplary status, after the city had banned smoking there as part of a ban covering City plaza, it nevertheless refused to post any no-smoking signs at the playground or anywhere in the plaza itself. Instead, it posted some signs at some (but not even all) of the entry points to the plaza, several of which were not even visible to people entering the plaza—with the unsurprising result that smoking continued unabated.
“interests” Bailey intended to “balance” against protecting the vast majority of residents who did not smoke from what she belittled as the mere “challenges” of lethal exposure to secondhand smoke she saw no need to divulge, but the council’s actions would soon speak loudly enough.

In the event, Bailey’s factual dispute with Champion prompted member Mike Wright to inquire into the possibility of actually doing something, whereas Bailey was apparently prepared to continue acquiescing in the “challenges of second-hand smoke” that she had merely mentioned. (Or perhaps, in the alternative, because she did not believe that a critical mass of protection-deserving children used city hall, she instinctively leaned toward relegating mere adults to self-help in dealing with the “challenges.”) Resurrecting (unknowingly) Kanner’s five-year-old unanswered dormant question, Wright asked: “Could we move it away from the entrances of City buildings?” When his colleague Amy Correia also expressed interest in such a step, City Attorney Dilkes intervened to warn the council that she had to figure out whether “I think you can do anything more than what the State law says.” After Correia had insisted in disbelief that surely “we throughout the plaza. Many months later, after the city manager had been fired (presumably not for his belligerent refusals to post meaningful signs), the interim city manager perpetuated the tradition of refusal to act and deference to the city attorney’s opinion that the existing signs complied with (non-existent legal) requirements; novel were his erroneous claims of the presence of non-existent signs and his excuse of the need to balance “visual pollution” and smoke pollution. [City of Iowa City], Ordinance No. 08-4314: Ordinance Amending Title 6, Entitled “Public Health and Safety,” to Declare Additional Areas as Nonsmoking Places,” § I (1)(Q) (Sept. 9, 2008); email from Marc Linder to Amy Correia, Ross Wilburn, and Mike Wright Iowa City City Council members) (Dec. 13, 2008); email between Marc Linder and Michael Lombardo (Iowa City city manager) (Dec. 16, 2008); email between Marc Linder and Terry Robinson (Parks Department superintendent) (Jan. 7, 2009); email between Marc Linder and Michael Lombardo (Jan. 8, 2009); email between Marc Linder and Dale Helling and telephone interview with Dale Helling, Iowa City (Aug. 4, 2009). Only after lobbying by the businesses represented in the Downtown Association, animated by the desire to enhance “the aesthetic appeal of downtown” by ridding it of countless cigarette butts—an aesthetic mission conjoined with ridding it also of panhandlers—did the council extend the smoking ban to the whole city-owned pedestrian mall. Transcription of Special Formal Iowa City City Council Meeting at 13 (Apr. 27, 2010), on http://www.iowa-city.org/weblink/docview.aspx?id=962325 (statement by Nick Arnold of Downtown Association) (quote). The council unanimously adopted Ordinance 10-4393; Iowa City, City Council Minutes, Regular Formal Meeting (June 1, 2010), on http://www.icgov/votingresults/804.pdf. It was codified in the Iowa City City Code at § 6-10-1 (C&D), on http://www.sterlingcodifiers.com/codebook/index.php?book_id=320.

690Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session at 8 (Apr. 14, 2008).
would have the ability to say, I mean, other public, other governments have said, ‘No smoking within 20 feet of a public building,’” thus signaling that, after five years of malignant neglect of the health of non-smoking employees and users of city hall, some council members had finally woken up to the existence of a problem and a solution, Dilkes offered them a that-was-then-this-is-now admonition: “[T]hat was prior to when the State law chose to legislate on a state level, as opposed to giving municipalities the right to do that.... They’re now into...legislating about public buildings.... So I think the whole issue has kind of changed.”

Ironically, the city attorney was seemingly so intent on leaving the council with the impression that it might have been deprived of its chance to ban smoking around the doors to city hall, that she failed to inform the members that in fact the new state statute achieved the result that Kanner, Wright, and Correia desired by expressly prohibiting smoking on the “grounds of any public buildings....”

Indeed, the city attorney well knew that the city’s power to ban smoking outdoors went far beyond the grounds of public buildings. For example, on June 23, in reaction to O’Donnell’s false claim that “you clearly cannot ban [smoking in a] right-of-way,” Dilkes expressly clarified that “I think you do have the right to prohibit it in the right-of-way, but that would be a designation by you. It’s not prohibited by the statute.” In other words, by virtue of the city’s ownership of all public sidewalks (“because we have control of your right-of-ways”), the city had—and had always had—the power to ban smoking on those sidewalks.

---

691 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session at 9 (Apr. 14, 2008).
693 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 23 (June 23, 2008), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/620.pdf. The city attorney stated more generally that she agreed that the city had authority to ban smoking on city-owned land that was not the grounds of a public building. Email from Eleanor Dilkes to Marc Linder (Aug. 25, 2008).
694 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 35 (June 23, 2008).
695 Tiana Epps-Johnson, Richard Jones, and Stanton Glantz, The Stars Aligned over the Cornfields: Tobacco Industry Political Influence and Tobacco Policy Making in Iowa 1897-2009, at 131 (2009), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/IA2009/, fundamentally misunderstood the reach of preemption when they asserted that it “barred localities from passing clean indoor air laws in indoor places, but did not prohibit passing laws that made outdoor environments smokefree.” Like any property owner, cities were (and are) empowered to ban smoking on any and all of their properties whether indoor or outdoor. Similarly wrongheaded was their assertion that once SAA had repealed preemption, Iowa City became free to prohibit smoking in outdoor public places. Id. at Acknowledging and availing itself of this power, the city council audaciously prohibited smoking for three hours a year on sidewalks in front of private profit-making downtown stores “along the parade route of the University of Iowa Homecoming parade....” Even after a member of the public had explained to the city council that the city was violating the Smokefree Air Act by permitting smoking on the sidewalk in front of city hall, but also pointed out that the statute was irrelevant in the sense that the city already had “the power to ban smoking on every [public] sidewalk,” the mayor declined to address the subject and referred the speaker to the city attorney. Asked that same day why she had not advised the city council that it could ban smoking on that sidewalk by virtue of its ownership of that and all other public sidewalks, Dilkes replied that she had not because “to date it is not one of the areas they have expressed an interest in regulating.” A week before the Smokefree Air Act went into effect in 2008 the Iowa City city attorney informed the council that Ames had banned smoking in all of its city parks, but the Iowa City council chose to institute a ban only in a few parks and

---

174. In fact, it had always possessed that authority. The authors also failed to reflect on the possible constraints still impinging on local government action as a result of the fact that while SAA may have repealed the statutory preemption clause enacted in 1990, because the legislature had stripped it of the local control provision contained in the bill as introduced, it was still subject to the pertinent constitutional and codified home rule provisions.

696 [City of Iowa City], Ordinance No. 08-4314: Ordinance Amending Title 6, Entitled “Public Health and Safety,” to Declare Additional Areas as Nonsmoking Places,” § I (1)(Q) (Sept. 9, 2008).

697 Transcription of the Iowa City City Council Special Formal Meeting at 53-54 (Aug. 26, 2008) (statement by Marc Linder), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/641.pdf. In early June the city attorney issued a memorandum asserting that smoking was permitted on the sidewalk in front of city hall because “[t]he sidewalk is right-of-way, and right-of-way is not the grounds of a public building.” Eleanor Dilkes, City Attorney, to City Council, Re: Smokefree Air Act n.p. [4] (June 5, 2008). On IDPH’s rule defining “grounds of any public building” on which smoking was banned as including “an outdoor area of a public building used in connection with the building, included but not limited to a sidewalk immediately adjacent to the building,” and the changes that IDPH made in connection with the dispute in Iowa City, see below ch. 36.

698 Email from Marc Linder to Eleanor Dilkes (Aug. 26, 2008) and email from Eleanor Dilkes to Marc Linder (Aug. 27, 2008).

699 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 20 (June 23, 2008). To be sure, the ban was a park rule not written into the city code. Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 31 (Aug. 25, 2008), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/638.pdf.
then almost exclusively in areas devoted to children’s playgrounds and youth sports areas. The Iowa City council also exhibited its halfhearted and even cavalier attitude toward secondhand smoke exposure with regard to the city-owned parking ramps. When the issue was first raised, smoker O’Donnell was so disgusted that he sputtered: “And the car exhaust is probably not harmful, I mean, you could...I mean, there’s cars running in there all the time, for Pete’s sake.” (In fact, smoky bars have much denser concentrations of cancer-causing particles than city streets polluted by heavy diesel bus and truck traffic emissions.) The other major smoker, Champion—whose principal “concern” about outdoor smoking regulation downtown was that “since I own a business on Dubuque Street...I think you’re going to shift the problem...in front of my business”—raised the parking ramp issue the next time at the request of fellow-smokers who wanted to know whether they would be permitted to smoke inside their cars. Unsurprisingly, she declared on their behalf that “I don’t object to somebody going to their car and having a cigarette,” prompting the sometime cigarette-, sometime cigar-smoking Mayor Bailey to chime in: “Right...you can’t smoke to [sic] the way to the car or on the way in, but you could go to your car for your break.” In his mildest-mannered way, Wilburn punctured his three 700 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 25 (Aug. 25, 2008); [City of Iowa City,] Ordinance No. 08-4314: Ordinance Amending Title 6, Entitled “Public Health and Safety,” to Declare Additional Areas as Nonsmoking Places,” sect. I (Sept. 9, 2008), codified at Iowa City, Iowa, City Code, § 6-10-1, on http://www.sterlingcodifiers.com/codebook/index.php?book_id=320. The Parks and Recreation Commission had “recommended that smoking not be prohibited in all parks at this time but will revisit the issue after the Act has been in place for a year or so.” Eleanor Dilkes, City Attorney, to City Council, Re: Ordinance Declaring Additional Non-Smoking Areas (Aug. 20, 2008), on http://www.iowa-city.org/weblink/docview.aspx?id=169931 at 221.

---

701 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 32 (June 23, 2008).

704 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 28 (Aug. 25, 2008).

705 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 32 (Aug.
smoking colleagues’ solicitousness on behalf of their fellow-addicts: “I’m just kind of playing with scenarios that might happen, uh, I’m sitting in my car and I’ve got my windows rolled down.” Wilburn may have indirectly pointed out that the exemption for cars was irrational because, since few people would choose to smoke with the windows rolled up, the smoke would waft out into the ramp as surely as if someone were smoking outside the car in blatant violation of the ban, but his colleagues ignored his logic. Turning to the cigarette oligopoly’s playbook for repartee, O’Donnell allowed as if the car were running, “we all know that’s not harmful.” And councilor Amy Correia chose to ally herself with Champion, both finding that it was “a bit inconsistent” that “you can smoke in your car in the City parking lot here, but then you can’t smoke in your car in the City parking ramp....” This difference in rules between semi-enclosed ramps and wholly outdoor lots completely blinded them to the self-defeating contradiction of designating smoking areas in a supposedly smoke-free ramp. The next evening Wilburn renewed his objection to smoking in a vehicle in a ramp, but his colleagues, despite having been reminded by email of the illogic of their proposal, once again disregarded the objection, and Wilburn joined his colleagues in passing the ordinance unanimously.

The persistent and extensive guerrilla warfare against the regulation and prohibition of smoking and the sale of cigarettes in which the city council and administration of the City of Iowa City—which literally enjoys the reputation of being a freakish leftist enclave in the Iowa heartland—have engaged for many years underscores the risks inherent in the strategy of local control on which CAFE and various health groups relied to the detriment of the anti-smoking movement. These risks were magnified by CAFE’s rigid non-confrontationalism, which caused it to refrain from criticizing powerholders’ refusal to adopt policies and ordinances that would have conferred greater protection on nonsmokers in a 25, 2008).

706 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 33 (Aug. 25, 2008).

708 Email from Marc Linder to Regenia Bailey, Amy Correia, Matt Hayek, Ross Wilburn, and Mike Wright (Aug. 25, 2008).

709 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Formal Meeting at 44 (Aug. 26, 2008).

710 On the city attorney’s lack of interest in bringing to the city council’s attention the legal arguments in support of the council’s power to deny cigarette sales permits to pharmacies, see email between Marc Linder and Eleanor Dilkes (Jan. 27, 30, 31, and Feb. 1, 2006).
display of gratitude for whatever minimal steps that, for example, the Iowa City City Council was willing to take. This accommodationist defeatism that celebrated every minor advance—which also embodied rejection of major advances—as a “first step”\(^{711}\) and the acquiescence in the city government’s subversion of the statewide law\(^{712}\) and its own ordinances may in part have been responsible for the perpetuation of the city’s across-the-board regressive stance on dealing with the leading public health hazard in the United States.\(^{713}\)

\(^{711}\) For example, instead of criticizing the council’s aforementioned irrational decision to ban smoking in city-owned parking ramps but nevertheless to permit smoking in the cars parked there even with the windows rolled down and of advocating deletion of this nonsensical exception, one of CAFE’s leaders present at the session, Eileen Fisher, welcomed it as a “first step.”

\(^{712}\) For example, at the same meeting at which the city council made the decision about smoking in parking ramps, another prominent CAFE member (and director of the Johnson County Public Health Department, Doug Beardsley) dogmatically remarked that nothing could be done about the city’s refusal to ban smoking on the sidewalk in front of city hall because the law was written that way. In fact, after a complaint was filed about the city’s action, the Iowa Department of Public Health had to amend its own rule in order to uphold the city’s action because it recognized that under the earlier (proposed) rule the opposite outcome was prescribed. See below ch. 36.

\(^{713}\) For example, as far back as 2004 the Sioux City City Council adopted an ordinance prohibiting smoking on public property abutting land within 20 feet of a health care facility (including a doctor’s office). Sioux City Municipal Code § 19.16.050, on http://www.sioux-city.org/codemaster/Title_19/16/0050.html (visited May 12, 2006). In contrast, when the University of Iowa, at the request of several professors (including the dean of the Public Health College and nationally well-known cancer researchers), approached the Iowa City government concerning the possibility of the city’s banning smoking on certain city sidewalks that run through the university campus (on which, pursuant to the Smokefree Air Act of 2008, smoking is entirely prohibited) but are not owned by the university and on which university employees and students smoke in such large numbers as to expose nonsmokers to dense smoke clouds, the city officials expressed no interest. Dean Sue Curry et al. to Pres. Sally Mason (Sept. 8, 2008); email from Mark Braun (chief of staff to Pres. Mason) to Marc Linder (Dec. 19, 2008). On the alacrity and intense energy with which the City of Iowa City fought what had been a mandatory ban on smoking on the sidewalk in front of city hall pursuant to the rules issued by the Iowa Department of Public Health implementing the Smokefree Air Act, see below ch. 36.
2007:
The First Democratic Legislative Majority and Governor in 42 Years Enact a One Dollar Cigarette Tax Increase—but Are Unable to Repeal Preemption of Local Control, Let Alone Enact a Statewide Public Smoking Ban

“[T]his is government tinkering with my livelihood.... Small business is already highly regulated by its customers....

“If government left it alone...in a few years, I think almost all restaurants and bars would be nonsmoking anyway.... That’s just where society is heading. I definitely see us going non-smoking down the road. But it should be our decision based on what our customers want.”

“We are not pro-smoking. We are pro-choice,” said Greg [sic; should be Craig] Walter, a lobbyist for the Iowa Restaurant Association.

Darin Beck,...chairman of the Iowa Restaurant Association, spoke with legislators...about...the smoking ban bill....

“We’re not pro-smoking or anti-smoking, we’re pro-business....”

Even in 2007, when, for the first time in 42 years, Democrats controlled both the legislative and executive branches, they were unable to forge a majority for direct smoking control legislation. The resurgent Democrats who regained control of both legislative chambers at the November 2006 elections for the first time since 1992 were hardly radicals. Their leadership included an anti-abortion House Speaker (Pat Murphy) and Senate President (Jack Kibbie), a business-friendly Senate Majority Leader (Mike Gronstal) whom “[b]usiness types like...because he doesn’t believe profit is a four-letter word," and a House Majority Leader (Kevin McCarthy) who had run the brief Iowa presidential campaign of right-wing (not yet ex-) Democrat Joseph Lieberman. McCarthy’s declaration that they would “try to chart a centrist course” so as to govern “in the mainstream” sufficed to persuade the Des Moines Register’s chief political commentator that this “middle-of-the-road approach” would “drive the liberals nuts, but...could keep the Democrats in power for years.” The moderation that the party would be displaying was driven in part by the fact that the House leadership was fully aware that its “urban, left-of-center base” could not have gained a majority without the most recently added seats in the more conservative rural districts. Examples of the “balanced” approach the party would follow included not seeking to repeal the state ‘right-to-work’ (i.e., without joining the union that had organized the workplace) law and asking businesses what incentives they wanted in exchange for improved workers compensation benefits for workers. Even with regard to a cigarette tax increase, which the new Democratic governor wanted and the anti-smoking movement considered the most powerful tool for reducing smoking prevalence, Murphy and McCarthy were not sure it would “fly”: while many Democrats had favored such an increase two years earlier to balance the budget, growing tax revenues had prompted many caucus members to feel that no such tax increase was needed. Consequently, any successful push would have to be bipartisan because Democrats alone lacked the votes. Gronstal expected that the Senate would consider a cigarette tax increase, but its passage was a “tossup,” and, like Governor Chet Culver, he argued that the party viewed it “primarily as...a way to discourage teen smoking.”
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

---

7Testimony of Sandra Quilty, director of government relations and lobbyist of the American Cancer Society at a Senate Health Subcommittee hearing (Jan. 31, 2007) (audio file furnished by Rusty Martin, communications director, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff).
Statewide Ban versus Local Control

Amadeo Rossi, who owns...a non-smoking bar in Des Moines [said]...“[s]moking indoors is just not reasonable.”

Welcome to the legislature. This is a sausage making process.

As Democrats surveyed legislative prospects during the interim between the elections and the convening of the General Assembly in January 2007, anti-smoking activists, who for years had been frustrated by the Republican leadership’s bottling up their bills in committee, certainly concurred in Gronstal’s judgment that “‘lots of things are possible now that weren’t possible before.’” To be sure, agreement on exactly what those things were would be more difficult to reach, especially when even militants advised caution, as Senator Herman Quirmbach, who had spearheaded the Ames local control ordinance in 2001, did in warning the members of the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission not to grow overconfident: after all, bar owners and cigarette smokers voted too.

A particularly prickly issue arose in the anti-tobacco movement as to whether priority should be accorded repeal of the legislative preemption of local governments’ power to adopt ordinances stricter than the existing weak clean indoor air law (passage of which provision the cigarette oligopoly had secured in 1990) or enactment of a statewide ban on smoking in public places. Personally, Gronstal, like Governor Culver, favored the former, and anti-smoking health organizations echoed that opinion, though perhaps for a different reason: they feared that tobacco lobbyists would fill a statewide law with “exemptions and loopholes.” As Jane Miller, the American Lung Association of Iowa’s representative, put it: “‘If we don’t get it right, we will have a very crappy law on...”

14Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin, Communications Director, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff) (floor manager Herman Quirmbach’s closing remarks).
16See above ch. 33.
18See above ch. 27.
the books for a very long time.”

One of the leaders of Clean Air For Everyone—which had heard directly from Gronstal before the 2007 session began that “preemption would be overturned. The words he used were ‘Done Deal’”—was operating on the intelligence that there would be “[n]o change in the state law at this time except for doing away with preemption. There will be bills introduced for a new statewide law, but I don’t think they will go anywhere. Let’s hope not, because if they do they won’t be good and we won’t repeal preemption.”

More positively, CAFE’s lobbyist, Threase Harms Hassoun, self-confidently “‘guarantee[d]’” legislators that if preemption were repealed, “‘right out of the chute you would have 10 or 12 communities read to go.’” (How long it would take for the more than thousand other local governments in Iowa to pass ordinances in the continued absence of one statewide law she did not predict.)

The Iowa Tobacco Prevention Alliance, including the Lung-Heart-Cancer organizations—or the “anti-smoking crowd,” as Gronstal preferred calling it—developed an elaborate justification for what more plausibly could be regarded as an opportunistic preference for local ordinances as less amenable to the economic and political power that the cigarette manufacturers’ were able to deploy effectively at the more centralized federal and state levels. Envisioning the tobacco companies as rendered “suddenly powerless” in countless communities, the anti-tobacco health organizations did their best to make a virtue of a necessity by arguing that “[l]ocal control is at the heart of our broader goals of: 1) educating the public about the health effects caused by secondhand smoke and 2) changing attitudes and behavior of smokers in order to protect others from secondhand smoke. A powerful change process unfolds as a community debates the issue of secondhand smoke.”

---

20 Email from Eileen Fisher to Marc Linder (Jan. 12, 2007) (stating that “[w]e spoke to Senator Gronstal [sic] 2 weeks ago”). To be sure, Fisher added: “However, I have also heard that some Republicans are asking our lobbyist, which do you want most— Tobacco Tax Increase or Local Control, you are not going to get both. The upshot is we cannot take anything for granted and need to keep up our grassroots support for Local Control.”

21 Email from Eileen Fisher to Marc Linder (Jan. 15, 2007).

23 CAFE was also a member. http://www.iowatpa.org/Default.aspx?pageId=320762

24 Telephone interview with Michael Gronstal, Council Bluffs (May 17, 2008).

25 American Cancer Society et al., “Why Local Control” (n.d.), on http://www.smokefreioawa.org/Doc/PDF/Why_Local_Control_06_25_07.pdf. This text appears to be taken from the website of Americans for Nonsmokers’ Rights (which also appears as
From a somewhat more nuanced perspective, Cedar Rapids Senate Democrat Rob Hogg described the local control law as “a pilot project, of sorts,” enabling local communities to “experiment with smoking restrictions”; then, in three or five years, the legislature could revisit a statewide ban. Even Representative Janet Petersen, who over many years had demonstrated her preference for a statewide law, was having both kinds of bills drafted, though she recognized that businesses were more likely to oppose local prohibitions because of their perception of an adverse impact on their ability to compete with firms in unregulated towns nearby. Whichever approach the legislature might adopt, the Iowa Restaurant Association made it absolutely clear that it opposed any government’s telling them how to run their business.

In January, IRA set forth its eight legislative priorities, including the statewide ban and preemption repeal, both of which it rejected absolutely (along with an increase in the minimum wage, which it preferred to call the starting or training wage since allegedly “[f]ew employees continue at the minimum wage after their training period is complete [sic]”). As it had for more than two decades, the Restaurant Association took the position that “[c]urrent state law is working, no change is necessary.” Conforming to Philip Morris’s accommodationist ideology from the 1980s, IRA dismissed the ban out of hand because “[o]perators with smoking customers must continue to accommodate 29 As late as 2008, when “Philip Morris USA understands and agrees that people should be able to avoid being around secondhand smoke, particularly in places where they must go, such as public buildings, public transportation and many areas in the workplace,” it still has not abandoned its efforts to retain as much space as possible for the consumption of its lethal commodities regardless of the impact on employees and nonsmoking customers: “In many indoor public places, reasonable ways exist to respect the comfort and choices of both non-smoking and smoking adults. Business owners—particularly owners of restaurants and bars—are most familiar with how to accommodate the needs of their patrons and should have the opportunity and flexibility to determine their own smoking policy. The public can then choose whether or not to frequent places where smoking is permitted.” http://www.philipmorrisusa.com/en/cms/Responsibility/Government_Relations/Public_Place_Smoking_Restrictions/default.aspx?src=1 (visited June 21, 2008).

them in a manner consistent with the wishes of their nonsmoking patrons. If operators cannot accommodate their customers’ preferences, business will be lost.” How restaurant owners could possibly “accommodate” nonsmokers’ “preference” for not being harmed by smokers’ preference to smoke the IRA did not explain any more than it justified its own preference for lives lost over business lost. That it did operate on the basis of such a priority was clear from its support for Iowa’s existing feckless law, which “allows hospitality business owners to accommodate their clientele as they choose.”

Local control was anathema to IRA because it would allegedly “cause confusion among business owners and their customers across the state.” Indeed, IRA regarded a local control regime in particular as a “nightmare” because, as its president, Doni DeNucci, contended, the balkanization would create unfair competitive conditions in adjoining jurisdictions: “The last thing we want to see is 900 different smoking ordinances.” Senate Democrat Matt McCoy, a militant anti-smoker from Des Moines, acknowledged this point, but had a much more cogent reason for favoring a statewide approach: for state legislators local control amounted to “simply passing the buck in a very heated debate for political purposes. ‘You can say you’re for a smoking ban without actually banning any smoking…. It’s a safer bet for some politicians. It shifts the burden of making the decision to the local governments.’” However, as a “pragmatist” he realized that “sometimes you just have to take the small victories,” and if local control was all that the General Assembly would pass, he was confident that at least in the Des Moines area the “progressive communities” would quickly adopt bans.

The comprehensive anti-public smoking bill of the 2007 session was House Study Bill 24, which was proposed on January 22 by Representative Janet Petersen as chairperson of the House Commerce Committee—a position that she had requested from leadership precisely so that she would be able to push the measure with maximum freedom and authority. H.S.B. 24 was virtually identical with the capacious but stillborn H.F. 2110, which she had filed in 2006. At the end of January, Petersen and Senator McCoy, who on January 23

---

33 State of Iowa: Journal of the House: 2007, at 1:138 (Jan. 22). The study bill was recorded and assigned to the Commerce Committee on January 18. Id. at 1:24.
34 Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (Apr. 12, 2008).
35 For a detailed discussion of the bill, see above ch. 31. The main (but nevertheless trivial) change was the inclusion of a formal definition of “common area.” H.S.B. 24, § filed S.F. 36, the companion bill, positioning their initiative as a workplace safety measure—‘‘accepting an increased risk of cancer should not be a condition of employment’’—declared that they felt that they had enough support from members finally to make smoke-free bars and restaurants a reality in Iowa. Even more support was visible outside the legislature: a smoking ban was, Petersen explained, ‘‘probably the most popular request I get from people of all ages.’’ Democrat David Jacoby, a member of the subcommittee studying Petersen’s H.S.B. 24, opined that ‘‘[o]ne positive view of the statewide ban is we’re not being wimps and passing it off to the local entities....’’ He and Petersen were ready to send it to the full Commerce Committee, and even Republican subcommittee member Steven Lukan favored the statewide ban, though he still needed to determine his caucus’s position. Nevertheless, their optimism manifestly failed to infect their colleagues: Petersen’s study bill, despite her committee and subcommittee chairpersonship, never even became a House File, while McCoy, after conceding that only six senators supported a statewide ban, saw S.F. 36 die in subcommittee. In spite of the Senate bill’s

2(1). In addition, the word ‘‘appropriate’’ was deleted from the enforcement provision requiring those in custody or control of a nosmoking area to ‘‘inform persons violating this chapter of the appropriate provisions of this chapter.’’ H.F. 2110, § 8(3) (2006) and H.S.B. 24, § 8(3) (2007).

41Petersen assigned the study bill to a subcommittee consisting of herself as chair, and Jacoby and Lukan. House Journal 2007, at 1:138 (Jan. 22). Inconsistently, according to the legislative website, the study bill was reassigned on Jan. 17 to T. Olson chair, Lukan, Petersen, Van Fossen, and Wise (citing House Journal 2007, at 65, which does not mention the bill). http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=BillInfo&Service=DspHistory&key=0024H&GA=82.

swift demise, proponents, according to Senator Staci Appel (who in 2008 would floor manage a statewide bill to passage), had the votes for passage, but, knowing that the House could not pass it, chose not to go beyond local control.\textsuperscript{44}

In contrast, not all was quiet on the local preemption repeal front. At the end of January, the Register (presumably not by coincidence) released the results of an Iowa Poll showing overwhelming support for “allowing individual communities to decide whether or not to ban smoking in public places”: 75 percent (including 82 percent of nonsmokers and 43 percent of the 17 percent self-identified smokers) favored the proposal, while only 23 percent (including 50 percent of smokers and 17 percent of nonsmokers) opposed it.\textsuperscript{45} A number of such bills were filed, the chief ones being H.S.B. 89 and its identical companion, S.S.B. 1162.\textsuperscript{46} The very short study bills struck the preemption provision in the existing law, substituting for it a discretionary grant to cities, counties, and local health boards to adopt ordinances or rules to enforce “standards or requirements that are higher or more stringent than those imposed” under the public smoking statute. Non-exhaustively the study bills then specified that such ordinances/rules might: (1) limit or eliminate the exemptions in section 142B.2(1) for factories, warehouses, or similar workplaces not usually frequented by the public; (2) prohibit the designation of a smoking area; or (3) limit or eliminate the \textsuperscript{44}Telephone interview with Staci Appel, Ackworth (Apr. 12, 2008). Majority Leader Gronstal also opined that in 2007 there had been close to enough votes to pass a statewide ban in the Senate. Telephone interview with Michael Gronstal, Council Bluffs (May 17, 2008).

\textsuperscript{46}H.F. 35 (Jan. 17, by Foege), \textit{House Journal 2007}, at 1:114 (referred to Local Government Committee), and H.F. 187 (Feb. 1, by Petersen et al.), \textit{House Journal 2007}, at 1:289 (referred to Local Government Committee), were textually identical to H.S.B. 89. Moreover, both were referred to the same committee and assigned to the same subcommittee as the study bill. \textit{House Journal 2007}, at 1:304, 307 (Feb. 1). Both expired in subcommittee. As to why multiple bills with identical content were filed, a former House Speaker noted that this common phenomenon resulted from legislators’ from wanting bragging rights to authorship of the bill or not realizing that colleagues had the same plans. Email from Don Avenson to Marc Linder (June 18, 2008).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

exemptions in section 142B.2(2) relating to bars or public places consisting of a single room. 47

The Senate study bill, which anti-smoking activist and Local Government Committee chairperson Quirmbach assigned to a subcommittee of which he was chair,48 saw action first. By this point a dozen or so cities (including Grinnell, Mason City, Sioux City, and Waterloo) had expressed interest in adopting a ban on smoking in some public places.49 After Majority Leader Gronstal had expressed the opinion that local control would prevail,50 the study bill reemerged as S.F. 23651 once the Local Government Committee on a virtually party-line vote (9 to 3) approved it at its meeting on February 19, at which Attorney General Tom Miller and Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission chair Dr.
David Carlyle spoke and answered questions.52 Republican Paul McKinley, one of the three members to vote against the bill, was worried about whether the next target of government’s “tendency to want to tinker in other people’s business” would be trans fat and “‘what after that....’”53 Although the new version of the bill expanded the specific provisions that local governments had discretion to strengthen by adding posting of signs and civil penalties,54 at the same time it limited the scope of local governments’ discretion by (1) removing local health boards from the group of discretion-wielding bodies, and (2) dropping “but is not limited to” from the capacious grant (“An ordinance...may specifically include

47 H.S.B. 89 (Jan. 29, 2007, by Local Government Committee Chairperson Gaskill), Committee Chairperson Quirmbach), Senate Journal 2007, at 1:273.
48 Kreiman and Zaun were the other members. House Journal 2007, at 1:274 (Feb. 5).
49 Jonathan Roos, “Panel Backs Bill to Allow Limits on Smoking,” DMR, Feb. 20, 2007 (1A) (NewsBank).
51 S.F. 236 (Feb. 20, 2007, by Local Government Committee); Senate Journal 2007, at 1:418 (Feb. 20).
52 [Senate] Committee Minutes for Local Government, Feb. 19, 2007 (copy furnished by Senate Secretary Office); Senate Journal 2007, at 1:424 (Feb. 20). The only Republican to vote for the bill was David Hartsuch, an emergency room physician (whose conflicting medical and libertarian views on smoking would surface later). Senator Houser was present but did not vote.
53 Jonathan Roos, “Panel Backs Bill to Allow Limits on Smoking,” DMR, Feb. 20, 2007 (1A) (NewsBank).
54 [Senate] Committee Minutes for Local Government, Feb. 19, 2007 (copy furnished by Senate Secretary Office) (S.S.B. 1162, amendment 702 division B adopted unanimously).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

but is not limited to any of the following”). The committee also voted with only one Nay to amend the definition of “public place” in the clean indoor air act to exclude private residences unless they were used as child care facilities, child care homes, or health care provider locations. Within a few days of the introduction of S.F. 236, lobbyists for the Iowa Wholesale Distributors Association, the Cigar Association of America, Reynolds American, and the Iowa Restaurant Association declared against it.

The same day, February 19, House Local Government Committee chair Mary Gaskill confessed that: “It’s so divided, I’m not sure where we’re at... We’re struggling up here to get some answers, so we need to know what the people want.” House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy’s “gut” told him that “local control would have more steam,” but his 53-member Democratic caucus had not yet discussed the issue.

Two days later the committee held a public hearing on H.S.B. 89 at which anti-smoking health organizations expressed a decided preference for local control over a statewide ban on the grounds that local ordinances were both easier to enforce and less vulnerable to “crippling exceptions that tobacco-industry lobbyists could try to insert in a statewide bill.” Cathy Callaway of the American Cancer Society, former head of the Public Health Department’s Tobacco Use Prevention and Control program, and president of the Iowa Tobacco Prevention Alliance rested her advocacy of local control on the experience that states with strong statewide bans had started off with local ordinances. The best that bar owners were able to come up with was the “nanny state” mantra, while Wes Ehrecke of the Iowa Gaming Association—who, ironically, “wears a yellow ‘LiveStrong’ bracelet, demonstrating support for anti-cancer forces”—regaled the committee with tales of how “Iowa casinos have invested in high-tech ventilation equipment that can leave inside air cleaner than outside air.” Dan Ramsey of the American Lung Association pointed out that while air-moving

57http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=Dsp Report&ga=82&type=b&hbill=SF236
A few hours after the hearing, the House Local Government Committee was scheduled to discuss H.S.B. 89 at its meeting on February 21, but after both parties had caucused, Gaskill announced that the study bill "would not be considered. It most likely will be referred to another committee." Gaskill’s procedural move was prompted by the lack of votes needed to offer a clean bill resulting from the casino and legal-age-restricted bar amendments. House Minority Leader Christopher Rants interpreted Gaskill’s “unfair...’committee shopping’” as showing that she was afraid that Republicans’ amendments (including a statewide ban) would pass. Unfazed, Gaskill still expected the bill to make it to the debate floor from another committee. In the event, leadership having refused her request to refer the bill to another committee, she pressed forward under less than optimal circumstances.

Following this contretemps, the House Local Government Committee met to discuss H.S.B. 89 again on March 5. After the committee had passed the same amendments that its Senate counterpart had adopted, conservative Republican Representative and former state trooper David Tjepkes was recognized for amendment 502, of which he ultimately requested withdrawal. Since this amendment would have incorporated Petersen’s H.S.B. 24 in its entirety, Tjepkes—who in 2008 would vote against Petersen’s Smokefree Air Act three times—appeared to be an unlikely sponsor of a statewide ban on public smoking. When asked later why he had offered Petersen’s bill, Tjepkes stated that his purpose was to deal with the concern arising from the “great inequity” of different rules applying to businesses in adjacent jurisdictions. But when asked further why, if uniformity of application was his goal, he had not simply voted against the study bill and thus attempted to preserve the existing statutory preemption, which already gave him everything he wanted, rather than going to the extreme of proposing Petersen’s statewide ban on smoking which, to boot, permitted local governments to adopt ordinances and regulations more restrictive than her bill’s provisions, Tjepkes was unable to articulate a reason—thus lending support to Roger Thomas’s and Gaskill’s explanation that Tjepkes was merely trying to kill the repeal of preemption of local control. A press report that “[s]ome committee members said the statewide ban might have passed if it had come up for a vote” reinforces the suggestion, since even Democrats knew that they lacked the votes to pass such a ban, that Tjepkes’ tactic was not intended to promote passage of either bill.

62 [House] Committee Minutes for Local Government, Feb. 21, 2007 (copy furnished by Iowa House of Representatives Clerk’ Office).
64 Telephone interview with Mary Gaskill, Ottumwa (June 23, 2008).

Following this abortive but nevertheless significant effort, Representative Geri Huser, a Democrat from Altoona, the location of Prairie Meadows, a racetrack and large casino, proposed an amendment both parts of which not only ultimately killed preemption repeal in 2007, but almost succeeded in thwarting passage of a statewide ban in 2008. The explosive amendment that Huser (whose father had close ties to Prairie Meadows and whose husband was a systems analyst for Casey’s General Stores, one of the largest sellers of cigarettes in Iowa) put forward on behalf of her constituent would have exempted entirely from the clear indoor air act both bars, defined as “legal-age-restricted establishment[s]...primarily devoted to the serving of alcoholic beverages...to 67 Telephone interview with David Tjepkes, Gowrie (June 19, 2008). Similarly, when asked why he had then withdrawn the amendment, Tjepkes, unable to articulate a substantive reason, merely replied that it was a “political strategy thing”: the Republican caucus had asked him to “discontinue that conversation.” Preemption repeal was embodied in H.S.B. 24, § 11(2) and § 11(2) of Tjepkes’ amendment 502.

---

68 Telephone interview with Rep. Roger Thomas, Elkader (June 18, 2008); telephone interview with Mary Gaskill, Ottumwa (June 23, 2008).

70 Telephone interview with Rep. Roger Thomas, Elkader (June 18, 2008).

71 Telephone interview with Stacy Frelund, American Cancer Society lobbyist, Des Moines (Oct. 2, 2008).

73 The lobbyist for the Lung Association suggested that Prairie Meadows had given Huser the amendment. Telephone interview with Dan Ramsey, American Lung Association of Iowa, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

guests on the premises and in which the serving of food is incidental to the consumption of those beverages, including but not limited to taverns, nightclubs, cocktail lounges, and cabarets,” and business locations licensed for pari mutuel wagering, gambling, excursion gambling boats, and racetracks.74 Parroting Prairie Meadows’ own propaganda (“Throughout the years, our mission has remained the same: to promote economic development, agriculture, jobs, tourism and entertainment and provide financial contributions to programs and organizations that improve the quality of life for all Iowans”),75 Huser sought to justify the special exclusion by reference to its significant contributions to the state and local economy. Predicting that casinos would eventually go smokefree, she pleaded that until then local bans would competitively disadvantage state-licensed casinos vis-a-vis Indian casinos76—an argument that the president of the Iowa Gaming Association trotted out after the vote in thanking legislators for understanding the industry’s importance for the state’s economy77 and that would be repeated ad nauseam with success in 2008, by which time the casino industry’s stranglehold on the legislative process was so firm that no reason for holding the health of its 10,000 employees (1,300 of whom worked at Prairie Meadows alone)78 hostage to the alleged need to cater to some gamblers’ nicotine addiction had to be articulated other than the lack of votes to pass any kind of statewide public smoking ban without a casino exemption.79

Passage of Huser’s amendment on a non-record roll call vote of 12 to 8 (for which some of the committee’s 12 Democrats must have voted)80 revealed that the advent of Democratic control of the legislature in no way guaranteed enactment of even such a minimalist-procedural part of the anti-tobacco movement’s agenda as repeal of preemption of local control. Indeed, the exclusion from the clean indoor air law of all bars that refused admission to persons under 21 as well as of 74[House] Committee Minutes for Local Government, Mar. 5, 2007 (copy furnished by Iowa House of Representatives Clerk’s Office) (H.S.B. 89, amendment 702). The amendment would have added bars so defined and casinos (that is, business locations licensed under section 99D of the Iowa Code) to the list of businesses (such as tobacco stores) not defined as covered public places.

79See below ch. 35.

80[House] Committee Minutes for Local Government, Mar. 5, 2007 (copy furnished by Iowa House of Representatives Clerk’s Office)
the large and proliferating casino industry so severely undermined the bill’s purpose that its backers, viewing it now as a “poison pill,” were, according to the Cedar Rapids Gazette, “so excited they said they hope the bill dies.”

Democrat Roger Thomas, the study bill’s manager in committee, “moved defeat of the bill.” However, he succeeded in persuading only three of the other 11 committee Democrats to follow his course; even joined by five of the nine Republicans, Thomas’s position gained only nine supporters, who were outvoted by the eight Democrats and three Republicans who voted for the amended bill.

Chairperson Gaskill wound up voting for a bill with which she did not agree simply to get it out of committee. Some Democrats voted for what they regarded as a deeply flawed measure only because something was better than nothing—or, as Thomas put it: “I know the folks who are opposed to smoking don’t like this, but this might be as good as they get unless they get the statewide ban.” For Tyler Olson, a first-term member from Cedar Rapids (who would successfully floor manage the statewide smoking ban bill in 2008), that outcome was not good at all: “Once you exempt bars and casinos, I’m not sure what’s left....”

The strange-bedfellows politics spawned by legislative compromise bereft of principle emerged as soon as committee bill H.F. 778 (formerly H.S.B. 89) was introduced and placed on the House calendar: the very next day the American Cancer Society’s lobbyist Sandra Quilty declared against it, followed a week later by the Iowa Association of Business and Industry’s three lobbyists. This meeting of the extremes did not augur well for the bill, whose “exemptions were unacceptable to advocacy groups,” causing it to be “put on hold,” it therefore saw no action until it was rereferred to the Local Government at the end of the 2007 session.

Nevertheless, with Senate debate on that chamber’s bill not far off, the press reported that it appeared increasingly likely that the legislature, “pushing aside a dueling” statewide ban, would pass a local control bill. The problem, however, was that even if they received such powers, the governments of some of Iowa’s larger cities, such as Waterloo, Davenport, Sioux City, and Mason City, had as yet detected no interest in regulation of public smoking. And although some mayors and council members acknowledged that interest would intensify if the legislature actually conferred ordinance-making authority, their own pro-business attitudes underscored the risks of inaction associated with the local control strategy. Typical of the laissez-faire approach that would have been inimical to anti-tobacco intervention was the personal belief of Mason City’s mayor that “‘businesses ought to decide what’s appropriate for them. ... We have enough government as far as I am concerned.’”

On March 14, the day after H.F. 778 had been introduced (and the House had passed the Senate bill increasing the cigarette tax), the Senate began debating 94Thus, although the Senate did not pass the local control bill until after both chambers had passed the $1 cigarette tax increase bill, both bills proceeded through the legislature simultaneously. In that chronological sense, Gronstal’s statement that in 2007 the “anti-smoking crowd” had said that now that we have a tax increase, let’s try a “little more evolutionary step” (i.e., a local control bill), was somewhat misleading. Telephone interview with Michael Gronstal, Council Bluffs (May 17, 2008).

---

its own preemption repeal bill, S.F. 236, which, realistically, at this point was the session’s last surviving anti-public smoking measure. Republicans, who were purportedly concerned above all about uniformity, filed a number of amendments whose exemptions would have both weakened the bill and made it less uniform. First, Assistant Minority Leader Pat Ward and Mary Lundby (who introduced the first preemption amendment to the clean indoor air act in 1990) offered Huser’s amendment exempting casinos and bars. Ward, who had previously been a utility company personnel director and director of the Iowa Republican party caucus, justified the exemptions in part on the grounds that no children were present in such locations. In the special case of casinos, she claimed—obviously prepped by their owners—that gaming as Iowa’s largest tourist attraction, with 65 percent of its 20 million annual visitors traveling from other states, would be competitively disadvantaged vis-a-vis tribal and out-of-state casinos by a smoking ban. Ward did focus her advocacy primarily on the alleged adverse impact of a ban on casinos’ profits and secondarily on the alleged disemployment effects, but she could not resist interweaving strands of Republican rugged individualist anti-collectivism into the narrative: “Smoking bans should be a business decision and not a legal mandate. Customers all have a choice of where they spend their money and employees all have a choice of where they work.” Parroting one of the cigarette manufacturers’ accommodationist untruths, Ward asserted that with the new filtration systems the air on the gaming floor was better than the outdoor air. In response, floor manager Quirmbach twitted Republicans by urging them to embrace their long-held principle that the best government is that which is closest to the citizens.

95See above ch. 27.
96http://www.patward.org/about.asp
97In early February Wes Ehrecke, the president of the Iowa Gaming Association, claiming that a smoking ban would reduce casinos’ revenues and tax payments, put out the figure that 65 percent of Iowa casinos’ 20 million annual visitors came from other states. O. Kay Henderson, “Opponents Speak Out Against Smoking Ban in Bars, Restaurants,” Radio Iowa (Feb. 7, 2007), on http:///www.radioiowa.com (visited Apr. 25, 2008).
98Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin, Communications Director, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff).
In the end, the amendment lost, but only by the narrow vote of 24 to 26.101 All 20 Republicans were joined by four Democrats: Assistant Majority Leader Bill Dotzler and Tom Hancock102 (who would vote against Petersen’s statewide smoking ban bill on both floor votes in 2008), Wally Horn (who opposed smoking control as Democratic Majority Leader in the 1990s), and Dennis Black, who would vote against Petersen’s bill once.103 Since, with a 10-seat majority, Democrats could spare no more than four defections, the caucus’s cohesiveness was being tested.

Next, Brad Zaun, a former hardware store owner, tested the waters by dumping casinos and exempting only legal-age-restricted bars, insisting that a ban would be very detrimental to family-owned businesses’ bottom line. For those unimpressed by that claim he added a libertarian argument: people who did not like smoke did not have to go to such bars. And finally, in desperation, he ventured out onto the slippery slope: would the legislature next ban alcohol in bars in order to protect people from collateral damage?104 Zaun’s half a loaf proved to be marginally less attractive to wavering Democrats than Ward’s whole loaf: with defecting Democrats Hancock and Horn joined only by Davenport veterinarian Joe Seng (who would also vote once against H.F. 2212 in 2008), the amendment was defeated by a vote of 23 to 27.105

Republicans then secured what was arguably their most important victory with an amendment exempting fraternal benefit societies from the scope of covered public places offered by Minority Whip Mark Zieman, a farmer and trucking company owner. Voicing concern that the legislature would start going down the road of letting local governments control a “habit that is condoned by this body,” especially since many members of such organizations had been 102There were many “joe six packs” and bars in Hancock’s district. Email from former legislator who required anonymity to Marc Linder (June 19, 2008).

---

103Senate Journal 2008, at 412, 1000 (Feb. 27 and Apr. 8). On Horn, see above ch. 30.
104Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
105Senate Journal 2007, at 1:738-39 (Mar. 14) (S-3116); Senate Journal 2008, at 412 (Feb. 27). Zaun’s next amendment, to what he called the “scariest part of this whole bill,” would have redefined “public place” to exclude private residences because the state should not permit local governments to restrict the consumption of a legal product in one’s own home, but Quirmbach, the bill’s floor manager, pointed out that his committee had already included such a provision, and the amendment lost by a vote of 21 to 29, with only one Democrat defecting. Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin); Senate Journal 2007, at 1:739 (Mar. 14) (S-3114) (Rielly).
encouraged to smoke in the military, Zieman ran into Quirmbach’s open arms: the floor manager declared not only that everyone supported veterans and fraternal groups, but that he could not imagine that any city council would take on the Veterans of Foreign Wars or the American Legion. Consequently, he announced that he would not resist the amendment and that members were free to vote as they wished. In the event, the amendment picked up not only all 20 Republican votes, but those of 11 Democrats as well, including Quirmbach’s, though antismoking militants Joe Bolkcom and Bob Dvorsky joined 17 other members willing to risk incurring veterans’ wrath.

Zaun described his final amendment as “technical,” designed to insure that smoking would not be prohibited in public places of fewer than 250 square feet or company cars. Oddly, Quirmbach supported the amendment on the grounds that it tightened the language a bit. In fact, however, the insertion of the word “only” into the sentence stating that local ordinances “may specifically include [only] the following” five kinds of provisions in fact substantively narrowed the scope of city councils’ powers to limit or ban smoking and to enforce such actions. Quirmbach himself joined 19 other Democrats and all 20 Republicans in voting for this weakening of his own bill; once again, however, the most prominent anti-tobacco senators, Bolkcom, Connolly, and Dvorsky, did not follow the floor manager’s advice.

With the amendments disposed of, the Senate proceeded to debate the bill. Assistant Majority Leader Bolkcom supported the bill, but found the local control conversation “very strange” because the legislature was lagging behind the more than 70 percent of Iowans who were ready for smokefree bars and restaurants. His colleagues were deferring to local governments simply because they lacked the courage to enact a statewide ban. Pushing the chamber’s collective capacity for analogic reasoning, Bolkcom asked the members to imagine how “crazy” the public would consider them if, instead, they were leaving it to local governments to protect Iowans from asbestos.

---

106 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).

107 Senate Journal 2007, at 1:740 (Mar. 14) (S-3119). Michael Connolly’s surprising Yea-vote was dictated by the procedural need to be on the prevailing side in order to move to reconsider, a motion that he then withdrew. Id. at 741.

110 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
At the other end of the rhetorical spectrum, Republican Jerry Behn was unable to understand why the legislature was debating even local control since Iowa already enjoyed local control—by businesses. As to Behn’s other claim that no one forced anyone to go into businesses owned by those who permitted smoking, Assistant Majority Leader Connolly asked about those who had to work there.\textsuperscript{111} (A background article on the bill published in the \textit{Quad-City Times} just 10 days before the Senate debate offered a reality check on Republican libertarian fantasies: it quoted Rhonda Capron, a Sioux City bar owner and former president of the Iowa Hospitality Association, dismissing the argument that regulation of smoking was required in order to protect employees and customers from secondhand smoke: “‘If my employees brought that up to me, they wouldn’t have a job.... When they apply for a job here they know it’s a bar’”—and as far as Capron was concerned, “‘[s]mokin’ and drinking go together.’”\textsuperscript{112} Connolly then warned that beating Big Tobacco on the cigarette tax had not silenced the companies yet; in fact, the vote watering down the bill to exempt fraternal organizations—where many people worked and were exposed to smoke—was an example of the legislators’ having slipped on another Big Tobacco banana peel. Taking umbrage, Zaun asseverated that during his three years in the Senate he had neither been contacted by any tobacco company nor heard tell of anyone else’s having been so approached.\textsuperscript{113}

Senator Zieman, smoking veterans’ and Elks’ paladin, devised the debate’s most incoherent argument by instancing a bar in Decorah that voluntarily went smokefree and flourished: if the legislature let local government ban smoking in all bars, then the owner who made the decision to go nosmoking would lose business to the others—the unfair result of forcing them onto the same playing field. In summary, Zieman felt no inhibitions about denouncing this slippery slope to the “nannystate nannystate nannystate.”\textsuperscript{114}

Republican banker Steve Kettering and media consultant Jeff Angelo were rhetorically transfixed by trans fats as the next New York idea that would haunt Iowa, but they left it to Marshalltown Lawyer Larry McKibben to climb up into even higher flights of fantasy (which he would carry even further in 2008). The assistant minority leader sought to belittle the scientific campaign against

\begin{thebibliography}{9}
\bibitem{111}Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
\bibitem{113}Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
\bibitem{114}Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
\end{thebibliography}
smoking by casting tobacco and cigarettes as merely the latest phobic objects of irrational supersensitivity being imposed on unbelievers who simply wished to be left alone. After mock-admonishing his colleagues about the Round-up generated carcinogens in the meat served in the legislature’s cafeteria, he wondered whether cigarettes as “the evil du jour of today” would be followed by “evil corn.” Alas, there was no way to know because the Democrats would not say, but some targeted evil would remain on the agenda as long as “this crew” was running the show.¹¹⁵

In his closing remarks as S.F. 236’s floor manager, Quirmbach once again extolled the local control alternative for highlighting the value of community-level public debate for educating people about the dangers of secondhand smoke exposure at a time of growing but still not universal understanding. Portraying Behn as wanting no regulation and Bolkcom as advocating a statewide law, Quirmbach, an economics professor at Iowa State University,¹¹⁶ got carried away with his own oratory: “That puts this bill right where it ought to be—in the moderate middle ground.”¹¹⁷

In the end, the Senate passed S.F. 236 on a perfect 30 to 20 party-line vote—a pattern that in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s had never characterized votes on smoking control bills because the large number of smoking legislators confounded otherwise typical party positions.

Despite having prevailed on S.F. 236 in the Senate, by the end of the first week of April anti-smoking lobbyists had become pessimistic. On behalf of her client, CAFE, Threase Harms foresaw not only “‘a lost cause for this session’” if the bill did not progress the following week, but “‘a whole new set of obstacles’” in 2008 as an election year. Even at this late date the Iowa chapter of the American Cancer Society was ambivalent about its own legislative strategy or whether it was merely a tactic. Its director of government relations, Sandra Quilty, admitted that it preferred a statewide ban, but the organization was unable to see beyond the invariant historical paradigm that “every state that has gone smoke-free has started by first legislating at the local level.” Whereas this narrative typically was built on the premise that the mass educational component of the struggle for local control was both an end in itself and conveniently also the means to secure it, Quilty now restructured the argument by identifying the ¹¹⁵Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).

---

¹¹⁶http://www.iowasenatedemocrats.org/quirmbach/Default.htm ¹¹⁷Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 236 (Mar. 14, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
state legislators as those critically in need of public health enlightenment: “The public sentiment is overwhelmingly supportive, but there is still a lot of education to do in the Legislature on this issue. So we understand the reality and are just pushing for the local control option.” If ACS had in mind the demonstration effect on the legislators of a wave of adoptions of no-smoking ordinances across the state, Democratic Representative Donovan Olson—who objected to his colleagues’ having predetermined exemptions for local communities—cast doubt on this plan’s realism by insisting that “the impact of a local ban would be minimal, as most municipalities wouldn’t pass one.”

A few days later the Democratic leadership offered what amounted to a legislative obituary by stating that differences in exemptions between the House and Senate preemption repeal bills had made compromise unattainable and that this impasse was unlikely to be overcome during the session’s final hectic fortnight. As House Speaker Pat Murphy—who, after passage of the dollar cigarette tax increase, privately delivered the death-knell to preemption repeal for 2007 on the grounds that “we’ve done enough to the smokers in Iowa”—formulated the point of the underlying dispute in more neutral-procedural terms: “If we’re going to turn this back to the cities and local governments, shouldn’t we be giving them some of those decisions instead of taking them right off the top?” In contrast, Quirmbach continued to treat local control not as some kind of opportunistic tactical second-best, but as a goal in its own right: “This is an issue that will take a lot of education of people. We continue to build support for local control. It’s the right way to go.”

Yet one other smoking ban bill came a cropper in 2007. Anthony Menendez, a college student who was a voting member of the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission, an officer in “Just Eliminate Lies” (an innovative anti-smoking organization of Iowa teenagers, financed by tobacco settlement money appropriated by the legislature to the Public Health Department), and a legislative assistant to Representative Ako Abdul-Samad, suggested to him the need for a bill making all schools in Iowa tobacco free and then worked with bill drafters

120 Telephone interview with Dan Ramsey, director of advocacy, American Lung Association of Iowa, Des Moines (Aug. 1, 2008).

121 Todd Dorman, “Local Smoking Ban Bill Declared Dead,” WC, Apr. 12, 2007, on 122 http://www.generationiowa.com/connect/view.asp?idProfile=380 (visited June 20, 2008).

to prepare the appropriate vehicle.\textsuperscript{123} H.F. 583, filed by Abdul-Samad and 18 cosponsors (including three Republicans) at the end of February, provided that every public school district and accredited nonpublic school "shall develop rules that prohibit a person from using a cigarette or a tobacco product" in any school building or facility under the school’s control, on any school grounds (including athletic fields and parking lots), in any school vehicle, or at school-sponsored or related indoor events held off-campus.\textsuperscript{124} The bill, which applied to employees, students, and visitors, was designed to insure that all schools banned all (including chewing) tobacco use, but it lacked a penalty provision.\textsuperscript{125} With some bipartisan support it reemerged as an identically worded Education Committee bill and placed on the House debate calendar, but it was dropped off the calendar\textsuperscript{126} and rereferred to committee\textsuperscript{127} after Minority Leader Christopher Rants, through whose 527 committee tobacco companies channeled large amounts of money to the Republican party,\textsuperscript{128} had filed an obstructionist amendment. Mimicking the underlying bill, Rants’ amendment tasked the state capitol authorities with developing rules to "prohibit a person from using" cigarettes or tobacco in the same places including at "state capitol-sponsored or state capitol-related indoor events that are held off state capitol grounds."\textsuperscript{129} The bill was again scheduled for debate during the first week of April,\textsuperscript{130} but having failed to be taken up, it missed the so-called funnel deadline and lost its eligibility for further debate during the 2007 session.\textsuperscript{131}

\textsuperscript{123}Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission, Minutes at 2 (Mar. 23, 2007), on http://idph.state.ia.us/tobacco/common/pdf/032307minutes.pdf (visited June 20, 2008).
\textsuperscript{125}Jason Clayworth, "House to Debate School Tobacco Ban," \textit{DMR}, Apr. 4, 2007 (5B) (NewsBank). Seventy percent of schools had already had some rule in place.
\textsuperscript{130}Jason Clayworth, “House to Debate School Tobacco Ban,” \textit{DMR}, Apr. 4, 2007 (5B) (NewsBank).
\textsuperscript{131}Jonathan Roos and Jennifer Jacobs, “Legislative Deadline Kills Scores of Bills,”
In Lieu of a Smoking Ban: A Cigarette Tax Increase

As a cancer physician, I have tried to help many wonderful people who have suffered and died unnecessarily from cancers caused by smoking. Uniformly, these people wish they had quit at an early age, or, better yet, never have taken up the habit. Never have I had cancer patients or their loved ones say they were grateful that the price of their cigarettes was low.¹³²

Ironically, Iowa, the first state to impose a cigarette tax back in 1921,¹³³ not having raised it since 1991, had seen it fall to the eighth lowest among the states by 2007.¹³⁴ The tobacco industry had been able to rely on Republicans to prevent enactment of an increase in cigarette taxes while they were in control of the legislature, but even after incoming Democratic Governor Chet Culver had made good on a campaign pledge¹³⁵ by proposing an increase in the tax from 36 cents to $1.35—at which level “as many as 13,000 kids would not start smoking”¹³⁶ and the “Medicaid gap” between the $89 million that the state had been collecting in tobacco tax and the $301 million that it spent to treat tobacco-related illness would be significantly closed¹³⁷—his party was initially unable to achieve unity on the issue. A few days after New Year the new House Speaker, Pat Murphy, opined: “I don’t think we’ll go that high.” Instead, he suggested an increase in the range of 40 to 60 cents, contending that the dollar increase was not needed in order to achieve “the desired effect on young people.” Murphy did not reveal the basis for this alternative estimate, but he did make it clear that he was “also concerned about the competitiveness of businesses in border communities if...”

¹³³See above chs 15 and 19.
¹³⁵“$1 Cigarette Tax Expected by April 1,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Mar. 9, 2007 (10A) (NewsBank).
¹³⁶Jonathan Roos, “Culver Gets to Work on Tax Issues,” DMR, Jan. 5, 2007 (1A) (NewsBank). In contrast, according to an estimate by the American Lung Association, as a result of the tax 36,000 young Iowans would never become addicted to tobacco and more than 20,000 adults would quit smoking. Matt McCoy, “Tobacco Lobby Loses, Iowa Families Win,” DMR, Mar. 13, 2007 (6V) (NewsBank).
Iowa’s cigarette tax gets out of line with the tobacco taxes of neighboring states.” In fact, at the time, Iowa’s tax was undercut only by Missouri’s 17 cents, and even at $1.36 would still have been lower than South Dakota’s ($1.53) and Minnesota’s ($1.49). The governor publicly disagreed with Murphy’s position, while Republicans warned that their votes would be determined by whether the tax increment was used for health care rather than merely for bolstering the general state budget. Such a condition would have been welcome to those Democrats for whom the anticipated additional $134 million in tax revenue would be key to financing universal health care access. The governor, too, wanted to use the revenue to expand health insurance coverage of children and some poor people, but Murphy insisted that “I just don’t know if we have enough votes to do a buck.” Senate Majority Leader Michael Gronstal—who represented the border city of Council Bluffs—confirmed that legislators were hearing concerns about the tax impact in border towns. Ultimately, Democrats may have argued that the competitive pressure on cigarette sellers on Iowa’s western, southern, and 138Jonathan Roos, “House Speaker: $1 Cigarette Tax Unlikely,” DMR, Jan. 6, 2007 (4B) (NewsBank). The tax in Nebraska, Wisconsin, and Illinois was 64, 77, and 98 cents, respectively. A month later Murphy explained the range of 36 to 64 cents this way: the lower figure was the increase that the Senate had passed two years earlier and the higher figure would have resulted in a tax of exactly $1.00. “Iowa Press,” Iowa Public Television (Feb. 9, 2007), on http://www.iptv.org/iowapress/transcripts07.cfm (visited June 27, 2008).

---

139Jonathan Roos, “Democrats Push for Comprehensive Health Care,” DMR, Jan. 11, 2007 (4B) (NewsBank). Eventually, the Fiscal Services Division of the Legislative Services Agency estimated that the additional cigarette tax revenue generated by the increase would amount to $129.4 million in fiscal year 2008; it also estimated that demand would decrease by 19.2 percent based on the 27.5 percent price increase (generated by the $1.00 tax increase) and -0.7 elasticity. Fiscal Services Division, Legislative Services Agency, Fiscal Note: SF 128 Cigarette/Tobacco Tax Increases (Mar. 13, 2007), on http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/fiscalnotes/data/82_1023SVv2_FN.pdf (visited June 26, 2008). In fact, the estimate turned out to be very accurate: the tax increase amounted to $128.6 million. Email from Michael Lipsman, Manager, Tax Research and Program Analysis Section, Iowa Department of Revenue, to Marc Linder (June 5, 2008). It is unknown whether Republican Senator Jerry Behn made good on his bizarre bet of a pack of cigarettes that the Democrats would not raise the revenue they thought they would because smokers could buy a carton for $22.29 on line. Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin, Communications Director, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff).

eastern borders would last only a few months until buyers tired of driving long distances and resumed buying at in-state stores, but it was the rare legislator, who, like Representative Mark Kuhn, forthrightly declared during floor debate: “I don’t want Iowa to be known as a place to go to buy cheap cigarettes.”

Ultimately a group of Democratic legislators, not the least vociferous among whom was Senator Matt McCoy, rose up and collected so many of their colleagues’ signatures that a shocked leadership abandoned its timid 50-cent increase and embraced the demand for what it now recognized was a doable full dollar.

In contrast, on the Republican side, despite the consistent and almost monolithic opposition to the tax increase, a significant proportion of the (House) caucus, according to its most prominent dissident, Representative Walt Tomenga, recognized the empirically and scientifically confirmed findings of the negative consequences of smoking as well as of the negative correlation between cigarette tax increases and smoking take-up rates by teenagers and smoking prevalence rates among adults. The Republican party nevertheless voted overwhelmingly against the course of action dictated by science because they regarded smokers opposed to paying higher taxes as “our base,” who generated more contributions to the party than the general public, especially at a time when the party had lost its majority status in the legislature.

In the Senate

I think you’re way out of line here. You continue with the people way against you on this issue.... Many people feel these people are purveyors of death...and you’re standing up here all night fightin’ for ‘em.

On January 18, Senate Study Bill 1055, which called for a one-dollar increase, was presented and assigned to a three-member subcommittee of the Senate Ways and Means Committee chaired by Matt McCoy, who in his closing remarks during floor debate seven weeks later declared that he would be 141 Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio file furnished by Dean Fihr, communications director, House Speaker Pat Murphy).

---

142 Telephone interview with Matt McCoy, Des Moines (May 8, 2008).
143 Telephone interview with Walt Tomenga, Johnston, IA (July 17, 2008).
144 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin) (Michael Connolly addressing Republicans).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

back in 2008 to pass a smoking ban: “We will be a smoke-free society, there’s no doubt in my mind, in my lifetime.” A week later the subcommittee, to which committee chair Joe Bolkcom—another anti-smoking militant, who later conceptualized the tax increase as a “generational decision” on behalf of those who would never start smoking—had also appointed himself, held a hearing at which lobbyists presented predictable views: retailers complained that the higher tax would reduce sales in border cities, while health organizations welcomed the long overdue increase. Afterwards, Bolkcom and McCoy voted in favor of the dollar increase, but with the chief point of contention—how the legislature would decide to spend the revenue—the bill did not deal at all.

On the same day (January 30) that a Register Iowa Poll revealed that 67 percent of Iowans supported the dollar increase, Governor Culver in his first State of the State address to the legislature pressed the issue—one on which he had victoriously campaigned—even to the extent of “taking his own party to task on a measure he said would save lives.” Culver dwelt on the quarter of a million Iowans lacking health care coverage, noting that there was “not one legislator in this chamber...who didn’t promise to do something about this.” In order to fulfill these promises the governor proposed an additional $140 million to expand health care access and identified the one dollar cigarette tax increase as “the only responsible way to pay for it.” The initiative would, he declared, in addition, save more than 17,000 lives, “[c]reate a powerful disincentive to start smoking and help others quit,” and “[c]lose the smoke-related budget deficit. Because we have the 9th lowest tobacco tax in the country, the state’s cost of treating smoke-related illnesses is greater than our cigarette tax revenue by more than $50 million annually. This simply isn’t fair. Nonsmoking Iowans shouldn’t be expected to pay for health care costs of those who choose to smoke.” And those legislators who wanted to raise the tax by only 30 to 60 cents Culver reminded that “half-measures will only produce half the results.”

---

146 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
147 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).

Even Speaker Murphy, the skeptic whom the governor’s admonition doubtless primarily targeted, was forced to concede: “I think if we had a vote now, it would be pretty tough to vote against the guy.” At the very least, Culver’s address, as House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bolkcom recognized, “forced lawmakers concerned about the potential economic impact on cigarette retailers to weigh the costs to businesses against the public benefits....” To be sure, even this cost-benefit analysis of public health was manifestly alien to the retailers themselves as represented by the vice president of a convenience store chain in western Iowa, who pleaded: “At least look at the surrounding states and let us be somewhat lower than them so we can be aggressive about keeping our customers in Iowa.” Why the state government should not be more concerned with keeping Iowans alive and healthy he did not explain.

Bolkcom’s Senate Ways and Means Committee approved S.S.B. 1055 on February 7 by a vote of 14 to 3, all 10 Democrats being joined by four of seven Republicans after the committee, beyond retaining the dollar tax increase, had added a provision creating a health care trust fund in which all cigarette taxes had to be deposited and spent only for health care. Attorney General Tom Miller’s talk to the committee stressing that the cigarette tax was “the single most effective tool at the disposal of state leaders for discouraging smoking” made no impression on the three Republican dissenters, whose objection focused on the alleged competitive disadvantage that would be imposed on businesses in the Missouri and Mississippi river towns. Two days after the committee’s action, House Speaker Murphy began to relent: interviewed on Iowa Public Television’s “Iowa Press,” he remarked that the governor’s “compelling arguments” as well as the realization that several of Culver’s budget proposals, especially in the area of health care, were driven by the governor’s proposed tax increase meant that the first thing the House would look at was whether “we can do a dollar.” The fact that House passage would not be possible if the tax were not spent on health care....

---

The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

care seemed to create a successful congruence.

Toward the end of February, while the Senate, as Majority Leader Gronstal disclosed, was still a week away from deciding where between 62 cents and a dollar the tax would be set, the House Ways and Means Committee, despite the chamber’s leaders’ skittishness about the larger increase, went ahead and approved, albeit narrowly, on an almost, but not entirely, perfect party-line vote of 13 to 12, H.F. 346 with its one dollar increase. On a perfect party-line vote the committee did amend the bill to restrict the use to which the cigarette tax could be put to health care, substance abuse treatment and enforcement, and tobacco use prevention and control.

By the time the Senate debated the cigarette tax increase bill on March 7, numerous lobbyists had predictably declared their clients’ positions. Those in favor of the bill included (in chronological order) the American Cancer Society, Iowa Medical Society, Iowa Nurses Association, Iowa Board of Regents, Iowa Dental Association, Iowa Osteopathic Medical Association, Polk County Medical Society, Iowa Department of Human Services, School Administrators of Iowa, CAFE, and the American Lung Association, while those opposed included Reynolds American, Inc., the Iowa Wholesale Distributors Association, the Cigar Association of America, Inc., Philip Morris USA, Inc., the Iowa Retail Federation, and the Iowa Grocery Industry Association. However, that one particular group lobbied for the tax increase was surprising—labor unions, including the American Federation of State County and Municipal Employees

---

157H.F. 346 (Feb. 13, 2007, by Foege), House Journal 2007, at 1:442 (introduced); Report of [House] Committee on Ways and Means (25) (Feb. 21, 2007) (copy furnished by House Clerk’s Office); Jennifer Jacobs, “Cigarette Tax Likely to Increase, Leaders Say,” DMR, Feb. 23, 2007 (4B) (NewsBank). Democrat Huser, who was simultaneously pushing the pro-tobacco position on behalf of casinos in public smoking legislation, was the only member to defect. A few weeks later, when conservative Democrat Dawn Pettengill switched parties, Huser said: “My party may not know it sometimes, but I’m a Democrat.... They can kick me out, but I’m not leaving.” Jason Clayworth, “House’s Pettengill Switches to GOP,” DMR, May 1, 2007 (1B) (NewsBank).

158H.F. 346, amendment 202; [House] Committee Minutes for Ways and Means (Feb. 21, 2007) (copy furnished by House Clerk’s Office). On a perfect party-line vote a Republican amendment to authorize cigarette tax revenue to be used, inter alia, for Medicaid reimbursement was defeated. H.F. 346, amendment 705; [House] Committee Minutes for Ways and Means (Feb. 21, 2007) (copy furnished by House Clerk’s Office).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

Iowa Council 61 (whose lobbyist was the very first to declare for the bill), the Communication Workers of America Iowa State Council, the United Auto Workers, and the Iowa Federation of Labor (unions’ umbrella organization). Because smoking prevalence is greater within the working class population from which unions draw their members, to back the bill was “not an easy decision” for the leadership of these organizations, according to Jan Laue, IFL executive vice president and lobbyist (and a member of the Bakery, Confectionery, Tobacco Workers, and Grain Millers International Union), especially since for years they had pilloried much lower cigarette taxes as regressive because their impact was more severe on the largely lower-income strata who smoked. IFL finally switched its position and supported the higher cigarette tax in order to make a contribution to the improvement of the health of its smoking members both by encouraging them to quit smoking and by expanding health care access for lower-income Iowans by virtue of the programs that the higher tax was designed to fund—in spite of its regressive character. Similar health considerations had motivated AFSCME to switch sides as early as 2003.

Republican opposition to the tax increase during the debate centered on its impact on businesses in towns across the border from states with lower taxes as well as on allegations that the tax was merely “a ploy to increase state

\[159\] http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Matt&Service=Declarations&frame=1. Two days after Senate passage of the bill the Iowa Association of Business and Industry declared against it. The fact that two companies (Casey’s General Stores and Krause Gentle Corp. aka Kum and Go) and one association (Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Stores of Iowa) that presumably would have been among the entities most adversely affected by the tax increase listed themselves as “undecided” does not mean that they in fact did not lobby; the lobbyists for Casey’s, for example, declared against H.F. 346, while Kwik Starr declared against H.F. 346 and H.F. 555. http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=DspReport&ga=82&type=b&hbill=HF346; http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=DspReport&ga=82&type=b&hbill=HF555. Casey’s did not bother to lobby because it had a prior understanding with Majority Leader Gronstal (whose own constituency was the border city of Council Bluffs) that the increase would be limited to 60 cents so that border area retailers would not lose business. In the event, Gronstal was unable to control the caucus, and once the Senate vote had been lost, there was no sense in lobbying the House, where the outcome was a foregone conclusion. Telephone interview with knowledgeable person who demanded anonymity (2008). Interestingly, the UST, Inc. (a smokeless tobacco producer) declared for S.F. 128.

\[160\] Telephone interview with Jan Laue, Des Moines (June 27, 2008).

\[161\] Telephone interview with Marcia Nichols, AFSCME legislative/political director, Des Moines (June 27, 2008).
spending.162 In order, presumably, to test Democrats’ bona fides, Republican Larry McKibben offered an amendment that he boasted would “define debate tonight”163 by virtue of striking the whole bill and substituting for it a provision authorizing retailers to increase the minimum price they charged for cigarettes by one dollar, thus allegedly “discourag[ing] smoking without ‘growing government.’”164 Indeed, McKibben was so mesmerized by his own anti-government rhetoric that he even launched the wild accusation that “liberal Democrats” had “hidden behind the honorable efforts of anti-smoking and smoking preventing groups in order to further their desire to grow government.”165 Floor manager McCoy pointed out that the amendment would insure that the state received no revenue from the increase, but that “the retailers would make out like bandits.”166 As a result, the state would be denied the additional revenue to offset part of the cost of health care for smoking-related illness167—an irrational outcome in light of Republicans’ purported insistence on making their support for the bill contingent on insuring that all the tax revenue went to health care.168 McKibben’s amendment attacking Democrats’ effort to “grow government spending”169 was defeated on a party-line vote of 17 to 31, the only defector being Republican physician David Hartsuch.\textsuperscript{170}

Dr. Hartsuch—who later during the debate declared (in dictum, as it were) that cigarettes should be abolished, though that issue was not on the agenda, having been supplanted by his pet issue of restraining the growth of government—then offered his own amendment, which would have raised the minimum legal age for buying or smoking “‘this very dangerous drug’”\textsuperscript{171} to 21, but it lost even more decisively: only 11 Republicans supported it, while seven others joined all 30 Democrats in voting Nay.\textsuperscript{172} (When Zaun later offered a stand-alone amendment to increase the age to 21, McCoy was constrained to call it “interesting” and concede that it had “merit,” before relegating it to a discussion that should be held in another debate and successfully administering the coup de grace of nongermaneness.)\textsuperscript{173} Hartsuch destroyed any chance that his proposal might have been approved by tacking on to it a mandatory ten-dollar cigarette and tobacco product purchaser identification card, which he oddly likened to a fishing license and which the Public Health Department was prohibited from issuing to recipients of public assistance or benefits.\textsuperscript{174} Hartsuch insisted that barring them from buying (and thus allegedly also eliminating smoking) tobacco “will allow additional moneys to be used for their” food, housing, and clothing and enable them to build up a “nest egg” so they could move out of poverty.\textsuperscript{175}

McCoy sought to deflect both of the amendment’s distinct proposals. Although he personally did not favor smoking by those under 21, he pragmatically acquiesced in the country’s having established 18 as the legal age for “nearly every right except alcohol,” which “served us well.” The ban on tobacco purchases by public assistance recipients he dismissed as “very unworkable” and a “severe discriminatory practice [sic] on how individuals choose to live their lives.” Seemingly oblivious of the self-contradictions in

\textsuperscript{170}http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=BillInfo&Service=Billbook&hbill=S3078&ga=82 (S-3078); Senate Journal 2007, at 1:608 (Mar. 7).

\textsuperscript{171}Jonathan Roos, “Senate OKs Jump in Tax on Cigarettes,” DMR, Mar. 8, 2007 (1A) (NewsBank).

\textsuperscript{172}Senate Journal 2007, at 1:609 (Mar. 7).

\textsuperscript{173}Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin); Senate Journal 2007, at 1:613 (Mar. 7) (S-3085).

\textsuperscript{174}http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=BillInfo&Service=Billbook&menu=false&ga=82&hbill=S3073; Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin) (“fishing license”).

\textsuperscript{175}Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

which he was entangling himself, McCoy rejected the kind of “big brother system” envisioned by this “ill conceived amendment” because it interfered with “individuals hav[ing] the free will to do whatever they want.”

At this point—surprisingly, given the traditionally staged and rehearsed and, when opponents are challenged, evasive character of legislative colloquy—Hartsuch managed to lure McCoy into a spontaneous exchange in which the latter wound up casting himself as an anti-statist libertarian Republican. Asked by the doctor whether he perhaps did not believe that “we as a state have an obligation to see to it that those who are on public assistance are financially directed in such a way as to promote their well-being,” McCoy, insisted that one of the tenets of the abolition of the welfare system was that individuals had to do for themselves what had to be done to move from public assistance to self-sufficiency and self-reliance and that, correlatively, the government should not “start micromanaging their lives.” Boring further, Hartsuch—whose own anti-statist Republican libertarianism was at times perforated by the inescapable realities of public health that even he was unable to ignore—first secured McCoy’s immediate assent to the proposition that cigarettes were a very expensive habit, and then asked whether assistance recipients were not “in greatest need of those dollars.” McCoy promptly delivered himself of this admission: “I believe that the poor in this state have always been the group most likely to engage in activities that quite frankly are not helpful to their situation.” However, retreating to his newly found Republicanism, he stressed that since Iowa had legal gambling, liquor, and cigarettes, the state could not be managing people’s lives. This backpedaling culminated in the appropriation of one of the minority party’s shibboleths—“the bottom line is that we are not a nanny state.” Though at first sensing a trap and dismissing the question as to whether public assistance recipients and other adults had a right to smoke as irrelevant, McCoy eventually recurred to one of the cigarette oligopoly’s slogans: Hartsuch’s amendment “would take away another person’s right to engage in purchasing a product that is a legal product” and thus would be antithetical to “individual freedom and liberty.”

Even less serious or acceptable was the next amendment by Republican Mark Zieman, who mock-self-deprecatingly opined: “Two years ago floating around this chamber was (the idea that) if we could raise the tax on cigarettes $1—20 percent of the people would quit.... Now, I’m not the brightest light bulb in the

---

176 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
177 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

box, however I know if $1 makes 20 percent quit, there’s a pretty good chance $5 is going to make everybody quit.” (It is unclear whether his colleague Brad Zaun intended to supply supporting evidence for his own candidacy as dimmest bulb by charging that Democrats “obviously don’t care about kids and smoking” inasmuch as their “message tonight is if you don’t smoke, start smoking, because we want to spend your money.”) Floor manager McCoy, calculating that the 25-cent a cigarette tax would push the per pack price up to about $8.70 or somewhat above the estimated $8 a pack health-care cost, congratulated Zieman: “I think you’ve got a great idea. Unfortunately, I think it would be too big a climb.” Instead, McCoy proposed adding another dollar the following year and “eventually” arriving at eight dollars: “I like where you’re going,” but, given the failure to raise the tax for 16 years, the sudden increase would be too big a “shock,” which would not give smokers enough time to quit. This fantasy prompted Zieman to draw the conclusion that Republican choreography demanded: the bill was not about health care, but generating revenue. The overwhelming defeat inflicted on the killer amendment—even a clear majority of Republicans voted Nay—suggested that some pro-tobacco opponents may have feared that Zieman’s logic was impeccable.

Ward made Republicans’ final amendatory effort, which would have lowered the tax increase to 62 cents (making it, at 98 cents, equal to the tax in Illinois). She justified it on the dual grounds that it had a better chance of passing the House and would “relieve some of the heartburn that our colleagues have living on the border of Iowa and Illinois.” But after McCoy had countered that there

---

179Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).

181Senate Journal 2007, at 1:610 (Mar. 7) (S-3074) (8 to 40). Seven Republicans voted for and 11 against the amendment; Hatch was the only Democrat to defect.
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

were more than enough votes to pass the one dollar tax in the House,\textsuperscript{182} the amendment failed by a large margin, some Republicans (such as McKibben) presumably voting Nay because they regarded even this amount as too great.\textsuperscript{183}

The Democrats’ only amendment, offered by floor manager McCoy and adopted on a voice vote, objectively met Republicans’ complaints by mandating that the first $127,600,000 of the revenue generated by the tax and credited to the general fund be appropriated to a health care trust fund.\textsuperscript{184} To be sure, McCoy conceded that even channeling the entire cigarette tax revenue to health care, substance abuse treatment, and tobacco prevention, cessation, and control would fall far short of the estimated $301 million spent by taxpayers in Iowa annually on smoking-related illnesses under Medicaid.\textsuperscript{185}

\textsuperscript{182}Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).

\textsuperscript{183}Senate Journal 2007, at 1:613-14 (Mar. 7) (S-3084 by Ward) (11 to 37) (only one Democrat voting Aye).

\textsuperscript{184}http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=BillInfo&Service=Billbook&menu=false&ga=82&hbill=S3066; Senate Journal 2007, at 1:612 (Mar. 7) (S-3066 by McCoy). One newspaper editorially explained skepticism about the guarantee on the use of the tax revenue against the background of “the history of anti-smoking efforts”:

Iowa’s share of a huge settlement in a lawsuit brought by several states against tobacco companies was supposed to be spent for expenses like tobacco-related illnesses and anti-smoking programs. Most of it ultimately went for other things, including construction projects at the three state universities. Skeptical lawmakers are right to think the same thing might happen to the windfall a higher tobacco tax would produce.

The Senate bill and one of its counterparts in the House...address the issue by directing the new tax revenue to the Healthy Iowans Tobacco Trust, where it could be spent only for Medicare, Medicaid and anti-smoking programs. That is a good provision but far from a guarantee.

The problem is that money is fungible. If the new tax revenue is used to pay for existing health care programs, that would free up for other uses the money from the general fund now used to pay for those programs. The accounting trail would look like the tax money is going to health care when in reality it would be used elsewhere for purposes unrelated to tobacco, for instance general education.

A guarantee on the use of the money may be too much to ask. No matter how tightly written the restrictions, they can be rewritten by future legislators—which is not necessarily a bad thing, as flexibility is needed to cope with changing priorities.

\textsuperscript{185}Matt McCoy, “Tobacco Lobby Loses, Iowa Families Win,” DMR, Mar. 13, 2007
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

Following almost four hours of debate ending after midnight, the Senate passed the bill by a vote of 34 to 14, six Republicans casting Ayes and only two Democrats voting Nay.

In the House

Having lost as expected in the Senate, the cigarette industry saw its last chance in persuading some House Democrats to insist on a smaller tax increase, thus sparing its business in Iowa the fate that befell the oligopoly in Illinois: Iowans, according to RJ Reynolds Tobacco Company, “consumed 105 packs of cigarettes per capita in 2006, whereas Illinois, with a tax of 98 cents per pack, consumed only 52 packs per capita.” To encourage addicted consumers in Iowa to complain about the proposed tax increase, Reynolds set up a toll-free phone number, at which operators connected them with the offices of representatives in the Iowa legislature. Whether the operation was a success seems doubtful since an operator at the call center in Fargo, North Dakota, told the Cedar Rapids Gazette that the office had received around 200 calls since the operation began in February. This modest output may have reflected the jejune criticism voiced by the firm’s communications director that the legislature was “just trying to socially engineer the state.”

A week after the Senate’s action, which prompted House Speaker Murphy to “try to do a one dollar cigarette tax increase”—despite the fact that 12 days

The two Democrats were Hancock, whose votes against public smoking bills have already been mentioned, and Keith Kreiman, who represented a Missouri border district, some of whose tobacco merchants may have induced him to oppose the tax increase. Email from former legislator who demanded anonymity to Marc Linder (July 27, 2008). The Republicans were Boettger, Gaskill, Lundby, Noble, Putney, and Ward.

“A week after the Senate’s action, which prompted House Speaker Murphy to “try to do a one dollar cigarette tax increase”—despite the fact that 12 days

187Senate Journal 2007, at 1:614-15 (Mar. 7). The two Democrats were Hancock, whose votes against public smoking bills have already been mentioned, and Keith Kreiman, who represented a Missouri border district, some of whose tobacco merchants may have induced him to oppose the tax increase. Email from former legislator who demanded anonymity to Marc Linder (July 27, 2008). The Republicans were Boettger, Gaskill, Lundby, Noble, Putney, and Ward.

earlier an unidentified man had called his house after midnight, become upset when Murphy’s daughter told him that her father was not available, “‘shared his displeasure’” about the proposed dollar cigarette tax increase, and then angrily told her, “‘You tell him he better call me back or I’m going to rape his daughter,’”—the House engaged in an six-hour debate of its bill (now H.F. 555) for which it ultimately substituted S.F. 128, which, if passed with minor changes, McCoy predicted the Senate would accept.

Floor manager Pam Jochum, a Dubuque Democrat, opened the debate by laying out some impressive data; of especial relevance was the calculation that Iowa’s annual smoking-related health care costs of one billion dollars worked out to $8.04 per pack—far above its retail price. The toll in human life that the (modest) one-dollar tax increase, which, she admitted later in the debate in passing, Democrats might have set at a higher level had they been able to secure 51 votes for it, was projected to save was inspiring: 20,000 adults would quit smoking; 5,300 adult smokers would not die prematurely; and 12,300 children would be saved from dying prematurely from smoking.

The first Republican amendment to H.F. 555—offered by Jamie Van Fossen, a Mid American Energy Company service representative—would have struck the whole bill and substituted for it a total ban on selling or using cigarettes.

---

190 The 20-year-old smoker later arrested and charged with aiding and abetting harassment told police that he had obtained a sheet of paper at a Casey’s General Store with legislators’ names and home phone numbers that urged constituents to share their opinion of the tax increase with their representatives. M. Kittle and Mary Bragg, “Smoker Accused of Making Threats—Police Say Anger over Cigarette Tax Sparks Phone Call,” Telegraph Herald (Dubuque), Mar. 31, 2007 (A1), (Newsbank); Iowa Department of Public Safety, “DCI Makes Arrest After Threatening Phone Calls Were Made to Legislator’s Residence” (Mar. 31, 2007), on http://www.dps.state.ia.us/commis/pib/Releases/2007/03-31-2007_DCI_Arrest.htm (visited Aug. 1, 2008).

191 The audio download lasted six hours, though the press reported eight hours. “Cigarette Tax to Rise $1 a Pack,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Mar. 14, 2007 (1A) (NewsBank).

193 "$1 Cigarette Tax Expected by April 1,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Mar. 9, 2007 (10A) (NewsBank).

194 Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fihr, Communications Director, House Speaker Pat Murphy); Iowa House Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fihr, Communications Director, House Speaker Pat Murphy).

195 http://www.iowahouserepublicans.com/?page_id=63

3257
Taunting Democrats with their own logic, Van Fossen insisted that if a one-dollar tax would save lives, and if tax revenue was not the purpose of the increase, he could imagine nothing better than banning smoking completely in Iowa. For good measure he tossed in that the state of Iowa was “profiteering” more than Big Tobacco since it took 57 percent of cigarette sales. Interestingly, the bill’s rather feisty floor manager failed to engage Van Fossen’s amendment at all, instead immediately challenging its germaneness. The only response Van Fossen was ever able to elicit from Democrats occurred later in the debate when he rhetorically asked Mary Mascher whether she had supported his amendment to ban smoking. Oddly oblivious of the large and popularly accessible scientific literature on the significant non-volitional dimension of addiction that many millions of smokers contracted as children, one of the legislature’s leading anti-smoking advocates justified her opposition on the grounds that she did not think that smoking should be banned because it was a “choice” just like drinking or eating too much. Then, even more remarkably, sounding like a tobacco industry spokesperson, Mascher incorrectly instructed Van Fossen that his amendment would have been unconstitutional because cigarettes were not illegal in the United States. After Speaker Murphy had ruled this killer amendment non-germane, Van Fossen moved to suspend the rules to consider his amendment, but his motion lost by a vote of 34 to 60, nine of his fellow Republicans voting Nay, while no Democrat broke ranks.

Floor manager Jochum, again, instead of engaging its substance, challenged the germaneness of the amendment filed by Republican Steven Lukan (a tire repair technician at his family’s tire repair store, in northeast Iowa) to increase the legal age for buying, using, or being cigarettes or tobacco to 21. On the motion to suspend the rules to consider the amendment, which the Speaker had ruled non-germane, the vote of 40 to 55 was, again, largely on party lines, with four Republicans voting Nay. In contrast, Jochum did allow as an amendment by assistant minority leader Doug Struyk to exempt from the sales tax any over-the-counter smoking cessation or nicotine replacement product was “interesting”; after mentioning in passing that it might be worthy of legislative consideration later in the session, she succeeded in dispatching it by means of another non-germaneness ruling.\textsuperscript{199}

---

196 Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fiihr).

197 House Journal 2007, at 1:798-800 (H-1089) (Mar. 13). At this point, the floor manager Pam Jochum offered an amendment striking all of H.F. 555 and conforming it to read exactly as did S.F. 128. Id. at 800-805 (H-1116). One of the chief new features of S.F. 128 was the annual appropriation of the first $127.6 million from the cigarette tax to the Health Care Trust Fund. S.F. 128, § 5(1). All of the subsequent Republican amendments applied to this main amendment. After the Republican amendments had all been defeated, Jochum’s amendment was adopted on a party-line vote of 52 to 45 with only two cross-overs (Republican Tomenga and Democrat Huser). Id. at 826-27.

Minority Leader Rants, who had blocked all attempts at increasing the tax when his party controlled the House, but now conceded that an increase was “inevitable” and a “‘foregone conclusion’” offered a “‘common ground’” amendment limiting the hike to 62 cents (which would have made the tax equal to that in Illinois and which he therefore dubbed that Eastern Iowa amendment)\textsuperscript{200}: “‘Raise that tax, provide that revenue the governor and some people in this body think they need to have available to spend to balance the budget, curb youth smoking, but [do] not destroy a lot of Iowa retailers and force consumers into other areas of [sic] making those purchases.’”\textsuperscript{201} After Republican Henry Rayhons had depicted the majority party as taking advantage of poor people’s addiction in order to increase state spending, Mascher explicated the underlying principle of the tax increase: “We are counting on the revenue stream to be reduced. ... We are hoping it will decrease—that is our intent.”\textsuperscript{202} To be sure, as Republican Steven Lukan asked later in the debate without receiving an adequate response: since the governor and the majority party predicated parts of the state budget on estimated cigarette tax revenues, how would various health programs be funded if passage of a local control or statewide smoking ban bill exerted its intended effect of driving down consumption and sales further still?\textsuperscript{203} Significantly, on a non-record roll call, which permitted members to express an opinion without being called to account for it or intimidated by leadership into changing their votes as would happen on a roll call, the minority party’s chief ideolog’s amendment almost prevailed: the 47 to 49 vote revealed just how fragile \textsuperscript{199}Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fihr); House Journal 2007, at 1:808-10 (Mar. 13) (H-1157). Struyk’s motion to suspend the rules to discuss his amendment lost by a vote of 42 to 53.

\textsuperscript{200}Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fihr).

\textsuperscript{201}“Cigarette Tax to Rise $1 a Pack,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Mar. 14, 2007 (1A) (NewsBank). Rants offered the amendment on behalf of a Republican, Charles Gipp, who was absent on account of illness. Later during the debate Rants stated that his preference was a 32-cent increase. Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fihr).

\textsuperscript{202}Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fihr).

\textsuperscript{203}Iowa House Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fihr).
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

The Democrats’ majority was on this vital public health and socioeconomic issue was. Republican Scott Raecker sought to embarrass Democrats by offering an amendment that would have used the cigarette tax revenue for tobacco use prevention and control, specifically mandating, inter alia, the amount recommended by the Centers for Disease Control, $10 million for youth programs, and $5 million for enforcement of tobacco laws. This amendment, too, was defeated on a party-line vote of 44 to 52 with only one Republican defection—Representative Walt Tomenga, who had attended Graceland College, which is run by an offshoot of the tobacco-hostile Mormon church, and with whom the floor manager at the end shared her time for concluding remarks, calling him a “statesman.”

These types of amendments were accompanied by warnings that the Democrats’ bill lacked assurances that the additional cigarette tax revenue would in fact be used for the statutorily designated health care purposes because it would “flow into the ‘black hole’ of the general fund and could be used for other programs....” In response, the bill’s floor manager, Pam Jochum, while doubting that such a problem would occur, insisted that even if it did, the tax would still “accomplish some of her goals because the higher cost of smoking would discourage people from smoking.” (Her explanation paled in comparison to the radical single-purpose orientation of Dr. George Weiner, director of the Cancer Center at the University of Iowa, who, shortly before the start of the 2007 legislative session, dismissed debates over how the additional tax revenue should be spent by semi-jocularly observing that the imposition of the tax would serve its purpose even if the revenue were thrown into the river.)

After several other similar Republican amendments had been defeated by similar margins, the Democratic amendment conforming H.F. 555 to S.F. 128 was adopted and the latter formally, by unanimous consent, substituted for the former. A much briefer debate on S.F. 128 then ensued, the most important amendment to which was offered by Heaton; like Raecker’s aforementioned amendment, it, too, was met by Jochum’s assurance that her bill could meet these challenges, and was then promptly defeated on a similar vote. The debate’s unintentional comic high point was delivered by Republican Dwayne Alons, a farmer, church deacon, and retired general in the Iowa Air National Guard, who contended that the tax increase violated smokers’ due process rights because it was intended to be punitive and did punish smokers without affording them any recourse.

The 58 to 40 vote on final passage of S.F. 128 revealed that Majority Leader Murphy had been doubly wrong the previous day when he declared that he was “certain he has 51 votes and doesn’t need any help from Republicans.” In fact, only 50 Democrats voted for the bill because three Democratic women (Huser, Mertz, and Pettengill) voted with the majority of Republicans; conversely, eight Republicans furnished the 51st and seven additional superfluous votes.

212House Journal 2007, at 1:830-33 (Mar. 13) (H-1138); Iowa House Debate on H.F. 555 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fiihr). The 44 to 50 vote included Tomenga’s defecting Nay. The amendment would have required full funding of the state’s anti-tobacco program up to the level recommended by the Centers for Disease Control.
214Iowa House Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fiihr).
215House Journal 2007, at 1:833-34 (Mar. 13). To be sure, the vote as announced by the Speaker was 51 to 39 with 10 absent or not voting. Iowa House Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 13, 2007) (audio download furnished by Dean Fiihr, Communications Director, House Speaker Pat Murphy). Eight of these ten presumably availed themselves of House Rule 74 to vote within 10 minutes of the announcement of the vote.
217The eight were Baudler, Clute, Jacobs, May, Linda Miller, Tjepkes, Schickel, and Tomenga. Significantly, six of these eight Republicans (Baudler, Clute, Jacobs, May, Schickel, and Tomenga) also voted for the Smoke-Free Air Act in 2008 on the final House vote (on the conference committee compromise), accounting for two-thirds of the nine
The Democratic Legislative Majority Enacts a $1 Cigarette Tax Increase: 2007

The Impacts

At the “raucous” signing ceremony two days later Governor Culver upped the estimates of the tax increase’s impact to 40,000 youths who would not start smoking in addition to 20,000 people who would quit smoking and the prevention of 20,000 tobacco-related deaths. Enactment of the one-dollar increase, which catapulted Iowa from 42nd to 17th place among states, confirmed the validity of Senator Michael Connolly’s floor-debate declaration that “[t]onight breaks a 10-year stranglehold on the Iowa Senate by the Big Tobacco lobby right out there” —a statement whose historical accuracy was, to be sure, marred by the fact (well known to Connolly himself) that the cigarette oligopoly’s control of smoking and tobacco legislation in the Senate had in no way begun with Republican conquest of the majority at the 1996 elections and the advent to power of the wannabe Tobacco Institute vice president, Stewart Iverson. On the contrary, Connolly’s own Democratic party, especially under the proto-tobacco majority leadership of Senators Junkins, Hutchins, and Horn—the former two having formalized their allegiances by becoming cigarette company lobbyists after their departures from the Senate—had for years stymied efforts by Connolly and others even to breathe smoke-free air in the Senate itself, where, as Democratic Senator Robert Dvorsky reminded his colleagues, when he arrived in 1994, “we actually sold cigarettes in [a] machine in the back of the Iowa Senate,” thanks (as Dvorsky did not mention) to the Democratic leadership. Whatever the historical background, the tax increase demonstrated that at the very least there was one exception to the iron law of class legislative supremacy enunciated by former House Speaker and later lobbyist Don Avenson: “We always win. ... We lobbyists for economic interests always win in a capitalist Republican cross-over votes who compensated by one vote for the eight Democratic defectors. See below ch. 35.

221 See above ch. 32.
222 Iowa Senate Debate on S.F. 128 (Mar. 7, 2007) (audio download furnished by Rusty Martin).
223 See above ch. 32.
To be sure, the limits on the deterrent impact of the dollar increase and the limits of rationality in the context of addiction were not to be underestimated. Both were visibly on display in the case of Republican Representative Dan Rasmussen, who doubted that the extra $500 a year he would be spending on “cigarette taxes, sales taxes and merchant profits” would be “enough to break his habit of smoking” 20 cigarettes a day: “‘It’s very addictive, and it’s very harmful—we all know the effects.... I think most smokers will tell you they quit smoking every time they smoked their last cigarette.'” Nevertheless, Rasmussen did not urge his colleagues to raise the tax even more in order to provide the financial incentive to quit that manifestly his survival instinct had failed to give him.

In contrast, many other smokers in Iowa, apparently valuing their money more than their health or lives, did either quit or reduce the number of cigarettes they smoked in the wake of the tax increase. The biennial prevalence survey conducted on behalf of the Department of Public Health revealed not only that the prevalence of cigarette smoking had declined from 18 percent in 2006 to 14 percent in 2008, but that 32 percent of current smokers stated that they had decreased the number of cigarettes they smoked following the $1.00 tax increase in March 2007. Moreover, in the wake of the tax increase a huge drop in “cigarette packs stamped” in Iowa took place—from 253 million in FY 2006, to 228 million in FY 2007, 172 million in FY2008, and 162 million in FY 2009.

---

224 Telephone interview with Don Avenson, Oelwein (June 28, 2008).
226 G. Lutz et al., Iowa 2008 Adult Tobacco Survey fig. 1 at 7, tab. 5 at 8 (Feb. 2009), on http://www.idph.state.ia.us/tobacco/common/pdf/ATS_2008_Final_Draft.pdf. The rates in 2002 and 2004 were 23 percent and 20 percent, respectively. To be sure, even the authors were skeptical of the reliability of the data indicating a vast decline in prevalence among 18-24 year-olds (from 34.1 percent in 2006 to 6.8 percent in 2008), which may have resulted from a very small sample size. Id. at 8 n. 7. One of the co-authors estimated that using the prevalence rate of 14.8 percent for this age group associated with the upper limit of the 95 percent confidence interval would generate an overall prevalence rate of 15.4 percent (instead of 14.3 percent). Email from Mel Gonnerman to Marc Linder (Apr. 18, 2009).
227 G. Lutz et al., Iowa 2008 Adult Tobacco Survey 11 (Feb. 2009).
To be sure, although cross-border sales not reflected in these data also rose, the extent to which they compensated for the very considerable decline in in-state sales is unknown.

---

229 One year after the tax increase went into effect, a survey revealed that 35 percent of smokers in Davenport and 45 percent of smokers in Council Bluffs stated that they bought a smaller (but unquantified) percentage of their cigarettes in Iowa. Gene Lutz et al., Cigarette Purchasing in Selected Cities on Iowa’s Borders: A Multi-Phase Surveys of Smokers 27 (2009).

230 In light of the lack of such data, the claim by Cathy Callaway, chair of the Iowa Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission, that the drop in Iowa sales was quantitatively synonymous with a drop in smoking was premature. IDPH, “Cigarette Sales Drop 52 Percent, But Teens Still at Risk” (Mar. 8, 2010), on http://www.iowapolitics.com/index.iml?Article=188024 (visited May 10, 2011). Frank Chaloupka, an economics professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago who specializes in the study of the impact of tobacco taxes on consumption, observed that the drop in Iowa sales “was somewhat bigger than expected, but not completely out of line.” In the absence of hard data on cross-border sales, the “only thing one can guesstimate from is the tax paid sales in the bordering states; while these were a bit higher in MO and IL in the first year of the tax increase, they returned to normal levels soon after, so whatever increased border crossing there was, it didn’t last long. ... Only way to really get at it would be to regularly survey Iowans about their smoking behaviors and ask questions about where they buy but unless this was done in the past, it’s too late now.” Email from Frank Chaloupka to Marc Linder (May 11, 2011). On the specific question of whether the drop in in-state sales in fact should be equated with the same quantitative drop in consumption, Chaloupka noted: “Without a more complete, rigorous analysis, I can’t say that the two are exactly the same, but my sense is that the vast majority of the drop in sales reflects a real drop in consumption.... For what it’s worth, the prevalence data support the drop in sales—prevalence fell from 21.4% in 2006 to 17.2% in 2009—a 19.6% drop; our research generally finds that about half of the decline in sales comes from a drop in prevalence and the other half from a drop in consumption, so the IA numbers are roughly in line with this. Yes, there have been other states that have seen big drops in smoking in short times.” Email from Frank Chaloupka to Marc Linder (May 13, 2011).
Iowa Leaps from Outdated Designated Smoking Areas to a Comprehensive Statewide Ban—Finally, Resistantly, Barely, But Also Boldly: The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

What the hell is Janet Petersen doing?¹

In 2008, 30 years after the Iowa legislature had first passed a very weak bill placing at best minimal limitations on smoking in a limited variety of public places,² it finally joined the large and growing number of states to enact comprehensive legislation prohibiting smoking in the vast majority of indoor public places.³ Whereas other states had, since the mid-1990s, incrementally prohibited smoking outright in restaurants, workplaces, and bars,⁴ Iowa leaped directly from the feckless and obsolete 1970s regime of designated smoking areas to an across-the-board ban. As the authors of a 2004 study of nicotine and particulate matter levels in smoking and no smoking areas in hospitality venues concluded, “the identification of a ‘no smoking’ area within a larger room or space where smoking was otherwise permitted cannot be presumed to result in a significant reduction in exposure to particulate matter [more] than that occurring were an individual to remain in that area where smoking is allowed. [S]imply moving from that [smoking] part of the room to another identified with ‘no smoking’ signs resulted in an almost trivial reduction (17%) in exposure. Indeed...an individual might actually be more heavily exposed to ETS (in terms of particulate matter...) by moving from the smoking to the ‘no smoking’ area.”

¹Telephone interview with Senator Herman Quirmbach, Ames, IA (Apr. 19, 2008) (describing his astonished reaction in February 2008 to learning that Rep. Petersen was pushing a bill to strengthen the statewide anti-smoking law rather than merely to repeal preemption of local control). Quirmbach later apologized to Petersen.

²See above ch. 25.

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Nonsmoking sections, as the surgeon general’s 2006 report on involuntary exposure summarized the state of the science, do not “reduce secondhand smoke concentrations to insignificant levels.”

Although Democratic advocates of the bill that became the Smokefree Air Act had the aforementioned cumulative state experiences—as well as the hundreds of prohibitory local ordinances that had in part antedated the first statewide measures—to build on, they lacked the votes in their own caucus to secure a majority for a law that reached, let alone (with three exceptions) pushed, the limits of state control. In the absence of the comfortable majorities that, for example, the 2007 Minnesota Freedom to Breathe Act and the 2007 Smoke Free

---

5T. Cains et al., “Designated ‘No Smoking’ Areas Provide from Partial to No Protection from Environmental Tobacco Smoke,” TC 13:17-22 at 21-22 (2004). A much earlier study had characterized a 40 percent reduction in respirable suspended particles in designated no-smoking areas of restaurants as a “substantial” protection against exposure. William Lambert et al., “Environmental Tobacco Smoke Concentrations in No-Smoking and Smoking Sections of Restaurants,” AJPH 83(9):1339-41 at 1339 (Sept. 1993). A study that measured exposure in the no-smoking sections of many restaurants but did not compare it to that in the smoking sections concluded that neither ventilation nor partitions were “effective in eliminating second hand smoke in the nonsmoking sections; the concentrations remained higher than the weekly average concentrations found in the homes of smokers.” S. Hammond and Charles Perrino, “Passive Smoking in Nonsmoking Sections of 71 Indiana Restaurants,” Epidemiology 107(4):S-145-46 at 146 (July 2002).

7More than 110 local ordinances with 100 percent smoke-free provisions had been adopted in the United States before the first state law with such a provision (for restaurants) was enacted in Vermont in 1993.” U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke: A Report of the Surgeon General 578 (2006). On the Vermont law, which covered many kinds of public places but not workplaces per se, see 1993 Vermont Laws No. 46, at 77; “Vermont Passes Sweeping No-Smoking Law,” NYT, May 2, 1993 (44).

8The bill in Minnesota (S.F. 238) achieved nearly two-thirds majorities in both houses on third reading: the vote in the Senate was 41-24 and then 43-21 on repassage after the conference report; in the House the votes were 85-45 and 81-48, respectively. https://www.revisor.leg.state.mn.us/revisor/pages/search_status/status_detail.php?b=Se
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Illinois Act\(^9\)—which was enacted as introduced\(^10\)—enjoyed, Democratic legislative leaders in Iowa felt forced to dilute the bill in order to gain the requisite votes by accommodating legislators who chose to subordinate their constituents’ health to the demands of casino, bar, and restaurant owners for the smoking status quo. Thus, in addition to continuing to withhold from local governments the power to impose more stringent standards than the statewide law, the Smokefree Air Act, unlike some other states’ statutes, failed, for example, to ban smoking in casinos—tax revenues from which constituted a greater proportion of state taxes in Iowa than in Illinois, let alone Minnesota, in which no non-tribal casinos were located\(^11\)—or in the outdoor space within a specified number of feet of covered indoor public places.\(^12\)

Nevertheless, despite the narrow majorities by which the bill passed both houses, the Smokefree Air Act included three outdoor prohibitions that were either unique or on the frontier of smoking control. Its prohibition of smoking “[i]n outdoor seating or serving areas of restaurants”\(^13\) was the most explicit and broadest such statewide ban yet enacted.\(^14\) (To be sure, in 2009, a bi-partisan

---

\(^11\)See below this ch.

\(^12\)The bill that Rep. Janet Petersen initially filed was modeled on other states’ statutes (such as those of Minnesota and Illinois) that did not exclude casinos or preempt stricter local ordinances. For example, the Minnesota Freedom to Breathe Act expressly provided that it did not prohibit cities or counties “from enacting and enforcing more stringent measures to protect individuals from secondhand smoke.” Minnesota Statutes § 144.417, subd. 4 (2008). The Smoke Free Illinois Act prohibited smoking within 15 feet of any entrance to a covered public place or place of employment. 410 Illinois Compiled Statutes 80/15 (2008). In 2006 the State of Washington prohibited smoking within 25 feet of the entrances, exits, openable windows, and ventilation intakes of enclosed smoking-prohibited areas. Rev. Code of Washington § 70.160.075 (2009). On the other hand, unlike the Minnesota Freedom to Breathe Act, the Smokefree Air Act does not exclude actors in theatrical performances. Minnesota Statutes § 144.4167, subd. 9 (2008).

\(^13\)Iowa Code § 142D.3(2)(b) (2009).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

majority of 51 House members introduced a bill to repeal this ban.)15 Precedent setting was the Smokefree Air Act’s total ban on outdoor smoking on the entire campus of every private and public college and university in Iowa.16 As mysterious as its legislative origins was the fact that this astoundingly capacious prohibition—which covered such an iconic locus of smoking as on-campus tailgating at University of Iowa football games—was never discussed, let alone sought to be amended or struck, during hours of floor debate. (The discontinuity of this breathtaking/breathgiving innovation was in part bridged by the University’s failure to enforce it by means of the $50 penalty that the legislature imposed as a sanction for individual violators.)17 Equally without precedent was the potentially even more extensive smoking ban on the “grounds of any public buildings owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions....”18 Although this innovation was debated, ironically, its origin as a kind of practical joke designed by anti-regulation Republicans to embarrass Democrats (who instead chose to embrace it without realizing just how radical it was) ultimately boomeranged on its authors by making it tactically infeasible for them to kill their own creature.19 (In the end, the Iowa Department of Public Health, the agency charged with administering and enforcing the law, promulgated rules that, to the satisfaction of the legislature’s own bi-partisan Administrative Rules Review Committee, deprived the provision of much of its more far-reaching protective promise.)20

Continued Tactical Tensions Between Advocates of Local Preemption Repeal and a Statewide Ban

“I hate smoking,” said Carlson, who owns the Court Avenue Restaurant & Brewing Co. “But what I hate more is the government telling me how to run my business.”21

15H.F. 211 (Feb. 5, 2009, by Bailey et al.). For discussion, see below ch. 36.

17See below ch. 36.

19See below this ch.

20See below ch. 36.

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Following the debacle in 2007, when the Senate local preemption repeal bill was loaded down in the House with exemptions that anti-smoking health advocates rejected, anti-smoking groups’ legislative activity during the interim between the 2007 and 2008 sessions remained intense and focused on repeal of

---

23 See above ch. 34.

22 According to Brian Meyer, House Majority Leader McCarthy’s administrative assistant and chief counsel, McCarthy met with the health groups during the summer of 2007 to inform them that leadership was going to abandon preemption repeal because it could not pass without the same exemptions that would be attached to a statewide ban bill. Meyer also stated that that summer, in a first-ever discussion, after McCarthy had also explained to the Democratic caucus that leadership wanted to shift support from preemption repeal to a statewide ban, a majority backed the latter approach, but no consensus was reached (nor, as will be seen below, was any in 2008). Moreover, some members brought up the need for exemptions, such as for casinos, age-restricted (21-and-over) bars, and Veterans of Foreign Wars posts. (For example, Philip Wise stated that he needed the casino exemption, whereas Janet Petersen wanted no exemptions.) Leadership agreed to give representatives a free vote on an amendment proposing an exemption for casinos, but not on final passage. Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 12 and 14, 2008). Because some of Meyer’s statements were inconsistent with other information, he was interviewed a second time to clarify certain matters. No one else corroborated Meyer’s account of the summer 2007 caucus meeting. For example, Rep. Mary Mascher, while confirming that House Democrats caucused in the summer, not only had no recollection of such a statement by McCarthy, but stated that it made no sense inasmuch as McCarthy opened the 2008 session arguing for local control. Telephone interview with Mary Mascher, Iowa City (Sept. 13, 2008). Rep. Vicki Lensing agreed. Telephone interview, Iowa City (Sept. 14, 2008). Rep. Tyler Olson the floor manager of the bill that passed in 2008, who also attended the caucus meeting in the summer of 2007, confirmed that no such discussion had taken place. Telephone interview with Tyler Olson, Cedar Rapids (Sept. 15, 2008). Based on the contextual implausibility of Meyer’s statement and the weight of the contradictory evidence, it is concluded that Meyer, who may have conflated two different events, was wrong. When confronted with these contradictory accounts, Meyer admitted that if he made those statements, he had been wrong. Nevertheless, he insisted that toward the fall of 2007 McCarthy had already started talking to him about the need to try passing a statewide ban since local control was not working out. Why under such circumstances McCarthy continued to support local control in January 2008 Meyer was unable to explain other than by reference to such a legislative maxim as that leadership never completely drops a bill. Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (Sept. 18, 2008). McCarthy, the only legislator who failed to agree to an interview, directed Meyer to stand in for him. Far from being a typical Iowa legislative administrative assistant, Meyer, who stated at outset that he knew more about the smoking bill than McCarthy, was a political operative in his own right with significant experience in tobacco-related matters. In 2003 he was McCarthy’s deputy director in the preemption of local control\textsuperscript{24} in opposition to a statewide public smoking ban, which had made no more progress than during the years of the Republican ascendancy. To some participants at a CAFE statewide tobacco control meeting in the latter half of August it sounded as though a statewide smoking ban was being proposed, but, although Representative Janet Petersen—who had been filing such bills for years\textsuperscript{25}—was meeting with the Democratic leadership on this question, local control was “still the big push for now.” When two members of the Story County Tobacco Task Force who had attended the meeting related this development to their fellow Task Force members, Jim Hutter, a political science professor at Iowa State University, suggested that the group support a statewide ban, including local control as an “addendum” to it.\textsuperscript{26} However, Herman Quirmbach, the state senator from Ames and former city council member who had successfully argued for adoption of a partial smoking ban there in 2000-2001 (which the Iowa Supreme Court struck down in 2003),\textsuperscript{27} insisted that “shifting advocacy efforts to a statewide ban” was a “bad idea” because the votes for it were lacking, but were there for a local control bill. Moreover, he regarded it as “confusing to switch from local control to a statewide ban at this point.” Nevertheless, he appeared to leave the door slightly ajar when he added that perhaps the Minnesota and Illinois statewide bans, which would soon go into effect covering bars and casinos, might be a gauge or model for Iowa, especially if some additional Democratic seats were picked up at the next election enabling anti-smoking forces to “make more headway later.”\textsuperscript{28} (One of Quirmbach’s Ames colleagues suggested that his overprotective attitude toward a local control bill might have had more than a little to do with the fact that as chairman of the
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

\textsuperscript{24}Telephone interview with Threase Harms, CAFE Iowa lobbyist, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

\textsuperscript{25}See above ch. 31.

\textsuperscript{27}See above ch. 33.

Senate Local Government Committee he would have been the central figure in guiding any such bill to passage.) In the end, Hutter (and others on the Task Force) deferred to Quirmbach’s superior knowledge of the voting blocs in the legislature, but more generally they confirmed their allegiance to local control because, as one of the members put it, “that’s where we were at.”

In the latter part of 2007 the Lung-Heart-Cancer coalition lobbied city councils to pass symbolic measures requesting the state legislature to grant them more power to regulate smoking. The city councils of Cedar Rapids and Iowa City were already pushing legislators to repeal restrictions on their power to act in this area. In October Governor Culver made his preference clear: “I’ve been for local control all along, and I certainly think that’s a good place to start.” He was open to discussing a statewide public smoking law, but did not reveal whether he would support it. By the outset of 2008, when 18 towns and counties had passed resolutions requesting from the legislature local control over smoking bans, Cathy Callaway, the head of the Iowa Tobacco Prevention Alliance, revealing that preemption repeal was more opportunism than principle, admitted that “she would love to have a statewide smoking ban in Iowa,” but was unsure whether it had adequate support. Local governments sustained enough momentum for preemption repeal during the first weeks of the 2008 session that by February 5, 20 cities, including Ames, Iowa City, Des Moines, Coralville, Cedar Falls, Cedar Rapids, West Des Moines, and Dubuque, eight counties, including Johnson and Linn, and three county health boards had passed... supporting resolutions. Nevertheless, as Randy Yontz, the advocacy director of the American Heart Association of Iowa acknowledged, not all of these local governments would, if given the power, have actually passed anti-smoking ordinances.

Typically rigid was the organization Clean Air for Everyone, which in January 2008 informed Iowa City Representative Mary Mascher, a long-time anti-smoking Democrat, that it wanted to devote its resources to passing local control and opposed a statewide ban. Asked why this group had underestimated the strength of sentiment in the legislature for a statewide law, Mascher explained that it had been shut out for so long under the Republicans that it did not see the political possibilities. But, Mascher added, support for a statewide ban did not just begin coalescing in 2008: she recalled that two or three years earlier House Democrat Janet Petersen and her Senate colleagues Jack Hatch and Matt McCoy had held a press conference calling for statewide action. More generally, however, as Yontz stressed, all the priorities and goals of the anti-tobacco coalition had been directed at overturning preemption because history had demonstrated that proceeding directly to a statewide ban without intermediate experience with local control—only Delaware had successfully navigated that dual legislative track of simultaneously repealing local preemption and enacting a comprehensive smoke-free statewide law—was simply not doable. Kerry Wise of the American Lung Association in Iowa took an absolutist position, arguing that: ‘‘Every other state that has a strong statewide law started at the local level.’ ... She says her organization’s strategy is to let city ordinances that don’t have exemptions proliferate, and then use those to collectively springboard a statewide ban later.” Perhaps the nearest model was Illinois, which, as already noted, in 2007 passed the rigorous Illinois Smoke Free Act after having 36http://www.smokefreeiowa.org/action.cfm (visited July 5, 2008). February 5 was significantly the day on which the House Commerce Committee approved the statewide ban bill, H.F. 2212, signaling the demotion, if not demise, of local control. See below.

---

37Telephone interview with Randy Yontz, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).
38Telephone interview with Mary Mascher, Iowa City (Apr. 13, 2008).
40Telephone interview with Randy Yontz, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008
dismantled in 2005 and 2006, the local preemption provision, passage of which the tobacco companies had secured in the Illinois Clean Indoor Air Act in 1989, one year before they successfully lobbied for more comprehensive preemption in the Iowa law. As a result of this repeal (as well as of the exemption of some cities from the 1989 preemption provision), a significant number of cities, including Chicago and the state capital, Springfield, had adopted no-smoking ordinances, so that with more than half the state’s population covered by such measures by 2007, “the Illinois Legislature was ready to take on the issue at the state level.” Moreover, the very fact that not all local governments had taken advantage of their newly acquired powers to regulate smoking reinforced the momentum for a statewide law because many mayors, dissatisfied with the existing patchwork system of coverage, strongly pushed for uniformity.

In fact, although the evolution of Delaware’s anti-smoking legislation was largely asynchronous with Iowa’s and that of many other states, the principal potentially relevant political difference between the two states with regard to the simultaneous achievement of local control and a broad statewide ban—keeping in mind that Delaware’s starting point, its 1994 Clean Indoor Air Act, was much stricter and more capacious than Iowa’s 1978 law as amended in 1987 and 1990—was that from 1997 to 2004 the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation

45See above ch. 27.
47Telephone interview with Michael Grady, Springfield, director of public policy and government relations, American Cancer Society-Illinois Division (June 10, 2009).
48Apart from a World War II-era statute banning smoking in trolleys and buses, Delaware failed to enact any law of statewide applicability until the mid-1990s. 45 Del. Laws ch. 239, at 931 (Apr. 20, 1945). For many years, however, unsuccessful efforts had been made to pass a clean indoor air bill. On R. J. Reynolds’ recording the death of one such bill at the 1986 session, see P. C. Bergson to G. H. Long, Subject: Public Affairs Status Report at 2 (July 2, 1986), Bates No. 506623339/40.
49When the Delaware legislature finally did enact a Clean Indoor Air Act in 1994, it availed itself of some of the more advanced prohibitory elements that other states had provided the IMPACT Delaware Tobacco Prevention Coalition—which the state had created in 1995, with funding from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and of which the American Lung Association was the lead organization—with $1,448,505 (in addition to $424,000 contributed by the Lung, Cancer, and Heart organizations, Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, and the State of Delaware-Division of Public Health for lobbying, which private foundations are not permitted to fund).\(^5^0\) In helping to secure passage of the amendments to already adopted, but in some other respects it remained committed to a pro-tobacco past that the cigarette oligopoly had never even sought to insert into Iowa’s law. For example, the preambular legislative intent sounded as if it had been taken verbatim from a Tobacco Institute accommodationist handbook: “The General Assembly recognizes that a balance should be struck between the health concerns of nonconsumers of tobacco products and the need to minimize unwarranted governmental intrusion into and regulation of private spheres of conduct and choice with respect to the use or nonuse of tobacco products in certain designated public areas and private areas.” 69 Del. Laws ch. 287, § 2901, at 601 (1994). The legislature also enjoined the Department of Labor and State Board of Health, on which it conferred rulemaking powers, to implement this physically impossible harmonization by “balanc[ing] and accommodat[ing] the legitimate health concerns of nonsmokers with the privacy and freedom of choice concerns of users of tobacco products.” Id. § 2906(c), at 604. The heavy hand of the tobacco lobby was unmistakably visible in the CIAA’s preemption provision, which exceeded Iowa’s in its comprehensiveness and stringency: “The provisions of this Chapter shall preempt and supersede any provisions of any municipal or county ordinance or regulation on the subject of this Chapter enacted or adopted after the effective date of this Chapter.” Id. § 2908(a), at 604. On the other hand, more progressive dimensions also abounded in the Delaware law. Whereas the Iowa law prohibited smoking outright only in one public place (elevators), Delaware’s CIAA imposed such a ban in nine categories of public places including public meetings, elevators, government owned or operated mass transportation, the public indoor areas of grocery stores of more than 5,000 square feet, gymnasiums, jury waiting and deliberation rooms, courtrooms, child day-care facilities, and health care facilities (except nursing homes and other residential facilities). 69 Del. Laws ch. 287, § 2903 (a)(1)-(9), at 601, 602 (1994). Designated smoking areas were permitted in other public places, including public meetings, elevators, government owned or operated mass transportation, the public indoor areas of grocery stores of more than 5,000 square feet, gymnasiums, jury waiting and deliberation rooms, courtrooms, child day-care facilities, and health care facilities (except nursing homes and other residential facilities). 69 Del. Laws ch. 287, § 2903(b). A special rule applied to owners of food service establishments, requiring them to designate a nonsmoking area sufficient to meet customer demand and prohibiting them from determining that no such demand existed. Id. at § 2903(d)(1). The CIAA also required employers to adopt and implement a written smoking policy obligating employers to “provide a work area where no smoking occurs for each employee who requests one” as well as to provide for nonsmoking areas in employee cafeterias sufficient to meet demand. Id. at § 2903(e)(1) and (3).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

the statewide Clean Indoor Air Act of 2002, these resources were, however, in no small part required to counteract the legislative influence that accrued to the cigarette industry by virtue of the fact that five of the seven tobacco companies were incorporated in Delaware and that more than 60 percent of the state legislators (in 1995) accepted contributions from the industry. To be sure, Iowa, like most states, also received funding from RWJF, but the first grant to Tobacco-Free Iowa, in the 1990s, focused on cigarette sales, while a million-dollar grant in 2002 was designed to support local initiatives dealing with secondhand smoke. Even if this grant had not been confined to a local approach, RWJF’s
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

In general, advocacy and public health organizations have resisted efforts to seek a statewide clean indoor air law until a state has had a critical mass of local ordinances in place for some time. This position is based on the concern that, in the absence of experience with implementing such ordinances and the grassroots support they generate, the final state legislation adopted is likely to be weak and, in many cases, to preempt stronger local ordinances. Moreover, even in cases where state smoke-free laws are not preemptive, they may lead to a decrease in the enactment of local smoke-free ordinances, perhaps because local policymakers perceive that the issue of secondhand smoke protection has been adequately addressed at the state level. This concern has been borne out by experience in a number of states. The opposition to what were perceived as premature state clean indoor air laws was also based on the concern that even if a state that lacked pre-existing local ordinances succeeded in enacting a strong, nonpreemptive state law, the public would not be prepared to accept it because of the absence of the intensive public education, debate, and changes in norms that typically occur before the adoption...

According to the American Lung Association of Iowa, the basis of the million-dollar grant disappeared when the Iowa Supreme Court invalidated the Ames ordinance in 2003. Telephone interview with Kerry Wise, Des Moines (June 8, 2009). According to another person involved with the grant: “Before the Supreme Court ruling, Robert Wood Johnson pulled the grant from the Iowa chapter of the American Lung Association. They said they were consolidating all their funding efforts to concentrate on healthcare reform.” Email from Claire Celsi to Marc Linder (June 8, 2009).
of local ordinances, making it difficult to implement the law....57

Nevertheless, by 2006 the report’s large collective of scientific and medical editors and writers stressed that the path to strong statewide anti-smoking laws did not always and everywhere under all circumstances have to take local control as its point of departure:

Recent progress in enacting statewide smoke-free laws suggests that these concerns, while remaining valid in many cases, may not apply in certain situations.... Several states (e.g., Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, and Rhode Island) that had little or no prior experience with local smoke-free ordinances have recently been able to enact relatively comprehensive statewide smoke-free laws (although in most cases these laws have retained preemption provisions where these provisions were already in place). Other states (e.g., Maine, Massachusetts, and New York) that have recently enacted relatively comprehensive statewide smoke-free laws had had previous experience with local ordinances. With time, the relative success experienced by these two categories of states in implementing their laws will provide insights into the issues described above. The experiences of these states will also shed light on a related question: whether states where local clean indoor air ordinances are preempted can achieve superior public health protections by first seeking to reverse the preemptive provision and pursue local smoke-free ordinances, or by skipping this step and proceeding directly to the pursuit of a comprehensive statewide smoke-free law....58

In the event, experiences in Iowa in 2008—especially the spectacle of local control-beholden anti-smoking health organizations adamantly opposing a strong statewide ban—should have precipitated a rethinking of their rigid lockstep vision of a successful legislative strategy.

And even though many legislators were predicting that differences with the House, whose preemption repeal bill exempted bars and gambling establishments from the authorization of local governments to pass ordinances stricter than the state law, would be resolved in 2008, no one could be heard offering any hope that a majority would support passage of a stronger statewide clean indoor air act, even as neighboring Minnesota in 2007 with its Freedom to Breathe Act became the twentieth state to enact a virtual total ban on public indoor smoking.59 By 2008, according to the National Conference on State Legislatures, 22 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico prohibited smoking in all workplaces, including restaurants and bars, six states exempted bars, and three states exempted bars and restaurants that did not admit anyone under the age of 18 or 21. But the received wisdom, at least among Iowa anti-tobacco lobbyists, remained that, since most of these states had begun with local ordinances—in Minnesota and California, for example, half of the population had lived under local smoke-free ordinances before statewide bans were passed—this progression had to be followed in Iowa too. The fact that the anti-tobacco coalition figured the odds of passage of a good statewide ban bill at slim to none did not mean that some legislators did not support it. For example, Senate Assistant Majority Leader Joe Bolkcom, an anti-smoking activist, informed a constituent in mid-January that although he expected that “we have a good chance at local control,” he “wish[ed] we could get a statewide ban right now. It is long overdue.”

592007 Minn Laws ch. 82 (S.F. 238, approved May 14, 2007).

A first semi-official indication of which way the legislative winds were wafting in 2008 came a few days before the session opened from House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, who had strategically carved out a “front-burner” niche on the agenda for a smoking bill in 2008: “When you go into a legislative session without a lot of new dollars, sometimes history has shown that the legislature can get diverted on policy issues such as dove hunting or gambling... We want to make sure that we have some policy discussions that [are] actually productive, that help people and (smoking restrictions are) something that’s been generating a lot of support lately.” McCarthy saw local control as “overwhelmingly supported by the public” so that it was “just...a question of trying to find the votes.” His caucus was split between supporters of a statewide ban and preemption repeal, but he did not believe that enough legislators would support the former to pass it, whereas local control was likely to have the most votes. The only way to pass a statewide law was to grant some businesses, such as casinos, an exemption, but McCarthy stressed that “we don’t want...some sort

---

62Telephone interview with Randy Yontz (AHA), Des Moines (May 14, 2008).
63Email from Sen. Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Jan. 13, 2008).
64Email from Sen. Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Jan. 16, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

of state law that ends up looking like Swiss cheese...." 66 Leadership was acutely aware that the Smoke-Free Illinois Act, which had gone into effect on January 1, 67 covered casinos, but after having “muddled [over] that move during private meetings,” House Democrats nevertheless concluded that local control was “the best course of action” for Iowa. 68 McCarthy’s Republican counterpart, Minority Leader Christopher Rants, continued advocating imposition of his market-knows-best ideology on public health decisions: “‘[Y]ou let people run their businesses and make decisions, and the marketplace decides if it’s a good decision....’” Although he especially objected to the balkanization brought about by local ordinances and allowed as “‘[i]f you are disposed to support a smoking ban, then statewide is the only way to do it,’” 69 by the time a statewide ban came up for debate, he would not lack for objections to it as well.

As the session got underway, the governor and the anti-smoking health organizations also weighed in on the side of local control. In his Condition of the State message to the General Assembly on January 15, Culver promised that “if you send me a bill to ban smoking at the local level, I will sign it!!” 70 He also announced that he would push for it “more aggressively” in the spring. In the same spirit, Dan Ramsey of the American Lung Association of Iowa cautioned that any attempt to bypass preemption repeal in favor of a statewide ban would result either in defeat or a watered-down bill at the hands of tobacco industry lobbyists. By his count, city councils in about 20 cities, including Des Moines, had passed resolutions calling on the legislature to authorize them to institute their own smoking bans. 71

66Charlotte Eby, “Legislative Leader: Smoking Ban Discussion Likely in Upcoming Session,” MCG-G, Jan. 11, 2008, on http://www.globegazette.com (visited May 15, 2008). It is unclear when McCarthy decided to support an effort to pass a statewide ban. His administrative assistant and legal counsel Brian Meyer, who stressed that he and McCarthy were never able to understand why the Heart, Lung, and Cancer groups were so obsessed with local control, distinctly recalled driving at some point in January 2008 with McCarthy while the latter made “come to Jesus” telephone calls to anti-smoking advocates Cathy Callaway and Threase Harms on the need to rally around a statewide ban bill. Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).

67410 Illinois Compiled Statutes 82.

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

What neither the Lung Association nor any of the other pro-local control groups mentioned was that, just as some business owners preferred government to make the rules so that customers would not blame them, so, too, some city governments may have wanted the state legislature to relieve them of the responsibility—a desire that, ironically, may well have motivated some in the General Assembly to contemplate passing that accountability on to municipal officials so that instead they would be “hounded” by business owners and smokers. Moreover, some local officials, asserting to state legislators that “‘our telephones ring more than yours,’” told them: “‘You deal with it.’”72 In this sense, local governments may have been a stronger force for a statewide ban than for local control. But if the strongest argument for a ban on secondhand smoke exposure was protection of employees, which could no more be regarded as needing localized regulation than any other worker health and safety matter, then, as one Iowa journalist presciently put it at a time when prescience was required only because the Iowa legislature’s backwardness made it difficult to see the present as history: “Many parts of the country are moving toward smoking bans, and it’s only a matter of time before Iowa follows suit. ... Whether Iowa leaders decided to go halfway with a local control measure or all in with a statewide ban this year, it’s pretty much inevitable that smoking will be outlawed in Iowa’s public spaces in the coming years.”73

House Study Bill 537—Yet One More of Petersen’s Statewide Bans

At the end of the day, Iowa smokers know their days likely are numbered for enjoying a convivial cigarette and cocktail inside any public place. ... Out of curiosity, I called two of my favorite bars in states that now have bans...to see how business was with the bans. Bartenders in both places were too busy at about 3 p.m. to talk with me.74

By the second week of the session a number of bills emerged that would set

---

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

the framework for debate and reveal that a statewide ban had survived. Of overriding significance was House Study Bill 537, proposed by Commerce Committee chair Janet Petersen—who more than once had said that a statewide smoking ban was “the top issue” she heard about from voters, but who was nevertheless unsure whether it would pass in 2008—on January 22 and assigned to a subcommittee chaired by first-term Representative Tyler Olson, a lawyer from Cedar Rapids; Petersen also appointed herself and Democrat Philip Wise, a retired teacher from Keokuk, who, like McCarthy, had also been a high-ranking official in the 2004 Iowa presidential campaign of right-wing (then) Democrat Joseph Lieberman. All three Democrats were strong supporters of statewide anti-smoking legislation.

H.S.B. 537 was structured in the same way as Petersen’s 2007 statewide ban bill H.S.B. 24 (which, in turn, had been virtually identical to her H.F. 2110 of 2006), but differed in several respects. Surprisingly, the new Smokefree Air Act no longer included “Workplace Safety” in its title, although its protection of employees who, unlike most customers, were exposed to smoke many hours a day and in many instances had no practical alternative to this or similar employment, made it much trickier for pro-tobacco forces to assail the proposed law, who as a result wound up often simply evading the issue. One opponent who, at least away from the debate floor, felt no compunction about attacking the law on these very grounds, was Republican Representative David Heaton, who doubled as owner of a smoking-permitted restaurant. Charging that secondhand smoke was merely a tool used by supporters to move the bill—Heaton was so at home in the flat-earth-society-like circles he apparently traveled in as not even to be embarrassed to assert that he had information showing that exposure to secondhand smoke was not that risky—he claimed that their real motive was to leverage a workplace prohibition into a ban on smoking everywhere in Iowa.

The oddness of dropping “Workplace Safety,” which deprived Democrats of 76 House Journal 2008, at 1:90 (Jan. 22); Iowa Official Register: 2007-2008, at 69, 82. The two Republicans were Steven Lukan and Jamie Van Fossen.

78 See above chs 31 and 34.
79 Telephone interview with David Heaton, Mt. Pleasant (May 10, 2008).
one of their most effective rhetorical and propagandistic arguments, was underscored by Senate Majority Leader Michael Gronstal several months after the bill’s passage: “We tried to keep the focus of that legislation on protecting workers. It wasn’t about changing people’s behavior. Some people think that’s what it was about, but it wasn’t. It was about workers that have little choice in where they work and whether they’re going to be exposed to secondhand smoke.”80 This orientation was crucial because it disingenuously sought to divert attention from the fact that the ban was also designed to change behavior—not only in the immediate sense of requiring smokers to stop smoking in places where their freedom to do so had once been uncontested, but also in the longer term by impressing upon them society’s prioritization of the right to breathe tobacco smoke-free air over the right to smoke and disapproval of a suicidal/homicidal addiction toward the end of rendering smoking so inconvenient and contemptible that many smokers would quit. Even more extreme was the denial of textual reality by Burlington Senate Democrat Tom Courtney—a long-time United Automobile Workers local bargaining chair and production safety representative81—who insisted in the midst of the debate over the implementing rules issued by the Iowa Department of Public Health in June that the bill was all about protecting the wait staff at restaurants and bars and not about the general public.82 In the face of a bill as passed that expressly prohibited smoking in “[o]utdoor seating or serving areas of restaurants,”83 but not in such areas of bars, Courtney implausibly claimed that legislators had thought that what they were voting for was protecting wait staff and that whatever applied to restaurants applied equally to bars. In contrast, members of the general public were not meant to be protected because they could always go elsewhere.84 Nevertheless, since the movement for public smoking bans in Iowa and other states had been driven for years in no small part by customers who deeply resented exposure to tobacco smoke in restaurants, the solicitude for workers suddenly displayed by a legislature now controlled by Democrats whose leadership had made it absolutely clear to unions that there was no chance that it could secure a majority—and therefore it would not push—for repeal of the state’s arch-anti-union “right-to-work” law was odd.

The most far-reaching innovations in H.S.B. 537 vis-a-vis Petersen’s bills from 2006 and 2007 related to the coverage of outdoor areas. Cutting edge was the prohibition of smoking “[i]n outdoor seating or serving areas of restaurants and within twenty feet of such seating or serving areas.” Unique was the total ban on outdoor smoking on the grounds of all public and private educational institutions at all levels. The covered “outdoor areas” encompassed “school grounds, including parking lots, athletic fields, playgrounds, tennis courts, and any other outdoor area under the control of a public or private educational facility, including inside any vehicle located on such school grounds, and including the perimeter area of fifty feet beyond such school grounds to which the public is invited or in which the public is permitted.” In contrast, the study bill also restricted coverage by permitting “designated smoking areas...in perimeter areas at least twenty feet from any seating areas or concession stands” in outdoor sports arenas or other entertainment venues.

Although they would be exempted almost as soon as they were covered, H.S.B. 537 for the first time banned smoking in gaming facilities. A new exemption in H.S.B. 537 pertained to private employers’ vehicles “for the sole use of the driver and...not used by more than one person in the course of employment either as a driver or passenger....” Finally and importantly, the new measure made the Iowa Department of Public Health the law’s enforcer instead of local health boards. Observers expected that the bill’s repeal of preemption

---

90 H.S.B. 537, § 4(7) (2008). If the “one person” referred to by this exemption meant one person at a time, it would have subjected a non-smoking employee using the vehicle after a smoking employee to off-gassing of lingering smoke that adhered to various surfaces.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

of local control\(^{92}\) would eventually be removed.\(^{93}\)

The House Commerce Subcommittee Hearing

“Everybody needs to know, this is headed towards a smoke-free society.”\(^{94}\)

The next day, January 23, the subcommittee hearing witnessed the predictable march of statements by various groups favoring and opposing the study bill. For example, the Iowa Restaurant Association’s lobbyist Craig Walter, who as a legislator three decades earlier had had an anti-smoking moment,\(^{95}\) but now bombastically described his client’s issue as one of “self-determination,”\(^{96}\) asked rhetorically: “As long as you make it a legal product, why would you ban a business from the opportunity to get those customers in that chose to go there?” Since restaurant coverage had always been at the heart of the consumer-driven anti-smoking movement, IRA would face a very difficult struggle to retain the designated smoking areas regime, which in its virtual non-functionality owners found most congenial.\(^{97}\) In contrast, casino corporations much more realistically pursued the objective of being entirely (or partially) exempt from whatever bill was passed as they had been under some other comprehensive statewide laws.\(^{98}\)

\(^{92}\)H.S.B. 537, § 10 (2008).

\(^{95}\)See above ch. 25.

\(^{97}\)See above chs. 25-27.

\(^{98}\)New Jersey and Nevada exempted casino gaming floors, while Rhode Island required designated smoking and nonsmoking gaming areas on separate ventilation systems. 2005 N.J. Laws ch. 383, § 5(e), codified at N.J.S.A §26:3D-59 (5)(e); Nevada Rev. Stat. § 202.2483(3)(a); Gen. Laws R.I. § 23-20.10-6.1(a)-(b). Rhode Island also required pari mutual facility employers to permit employees to opt out of working in smoking areas. Id. § (e). See generally http://www.no-smoke.org/pdf/100smokefree casinos.pdf. Under the law in force until July 1, 2008, casinos in Iowa, not being exempt, were subject to the same feckless requirement as other “public places” such as restaurants (but not bars) not to designate the entire place as a smoking area. Any restaurant within a casino was subject to this requirement; whether the gaming floor itself qualified as a
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

but not, to be sure, in Delaware, Illinois, or Colorado. 99

The Gambling Industry’s Use of the Economic Impact of Other States’ Casino Smoking Bans and of Accommodation, Choice, and Air Ventilation to Support an Exemption from Any Iowa Smokefree Law

How much does a smoking ban, in the long run, damage casino revenues? There is no single answer to this question, but only more questions. 100

William Wimmer, the long-time cigarette oligopoly lobbyist, now appearing formally on behalf of the Iowa Gaming Association (whose members were 17 licensed commercial riverboat, land-based, and racetrack casinos), 101 warned of a “serious economic impact on Iowa’s economy” if gamblers were not allowed to smoke; equally important was the admonition not to destroy the “‘level playing field’” by imposing a ban on non-native-American-owned casinos that would not affect their competitors, the Indian casinos. 102 (To be sure, the tribal gaming compliance manager of the Iowa Department of Inspections and Appeals, which has entered into compacts with the three tribes operating casinos in the state, has stated that: “We believe that smoking could be an item included in the compact either on inception or during renegotiation.”) 103 Wes Ehrecke, the IGA president “public place” in its own right and therefore could not be designated a smoking area in its entirety or whether some other area outside the gaming floor could instead be designated a no-smoking area is unclear. Under the Smokefree Air Act, which went into effect on July 1, 2008, the entire casino gaming floor is exempt. In practice, according to the Iowa Racing and Gaming Commission, under the old law: “The casinos typically had areas for both. When the [new] law went into effect, it didn’t appear to change how the casinos handled the gaming floor. We do not have data to quantify this, but casinos still have areas within their gaming floor where smoking is prohibited. It is by choice (our rules do not address smoking), but all that I am familiar with have non-smoking areas on the floor.” Email from Brian Ohorilko, gaming director, IRGC to Marc Linder (June 25, 2009).

See below this ch. 99

100 Paul Girvan, “Where There’s Smoke...,” Global Gaming Business Magazine 8(6) (June 2009), on http://ggbmagazine.com

101 http://www.iowagaming.org/our_members/properties.aspx

103 Email from Steven Mandernach to Marc Linder (July 10, 2009). The regional director of National Indian Gaming Commission with jurisdiction over Iowa, who observed that in some Indian casinos the smoke was so thick that he had had to send the who had made similar claims in opposition to the local preemption repeal bill in 2007, also presented talking points, perhaps chief among which was the claim that: “Based on what has happened in Delaware, Windsor Ontario, and Australia[,] a smoking ban could cause an estimated 20-35% reductions in Iowa’s gaming tax revenue. This is based on an estimated 20 percent reduction in Delaware; and 33% in Ontario; Iowa’s commercial casinos pay an estimated $300 million in taxes, therefore 20-35 per cent equals $60-100 million in loss [sic] revenue.”\(^{106}\) (Gambling revenue for the state of Iowa for 2008 was estimated by the Legislative Services Agency at $268 million or four percent of the state budget.)\(^{107}\) It is unclear how IGA constructed this prediction,\(^{108}\) but scrutiny below of a presumably similar methodology used by the Iowa Gaming and Racing Commission, which estimated a 10-percent drop, may shed some light on the robustness of IGA’s prediction.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Integrally woven into Ehrecke’s talking points was unquestioned allegiance to cigarette manufacturers’ favored anti-regulatory market-knows-best trope: “The commercial gaming industry firmly believes that we should strive to accommodate both non-smokers and smokers alike; and advocates it should be a business decision and not a legal mandate to ban. Customers have choices of where to spend their entertainment dollars and employees have choices of where to work.” The purported basis for a claim—“Iowa casinos offer a premier...work environment”—that, coming from employers who were collectively seeking a unique exemption from a statewide smokefree workplace law, was on its face highly implausible, was, once again, accommodationism, but this time in the form of a technological deus ex machina: “the Iowa commercial gaming industry is very proactive with new filtration and ventilation systems to accommodate both smokers and non-smokers....”\(^{109}\) The industry’s credibility, which had already shrunk to the vanishing point by virtue of its self-subordination to its massively and discredited cigarette oligopoly ventriloquist,\(^{110}\) was not enhanced by its claim that “[i]t is the ongoing objective of the commercial casinos to meet or exceed acceptable indoor air quality standards as set forth in Standard 62.1 of ASHRAE guidelines,\textsuperscript{111} since three years earlier the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air-Conditioning Engineers had announced that the only effective way to protect people from the health risks associated with indoor exposure to tobacco smoke was to ban smoking.\textsuperscript{112} And in the light of ASHRAE’s conclusion that no ventilation equipment could equivalently control the health risks associated with secondhand tobacco smoke exposure\textsuperscript{113} and of the results of scientific studies of air quality in casinos, the industry’s claim that in connection with “newly-invented technology... recent tests have show the air to be better inside on the gaming floor than outside”\textsuperscript{114} was risibly preposterous.

\(106\) Wes Ehrecke, President, Iowa Gaming Association to Members of the Iowa Legislature, “Impact on Iowa’s Commercial Casinos If a Smoking Ban is Implemented” (n.d. [ca. Jan. 2008]) (emailed by Wes Ehrecke to Marc Linder (June 15, 2009)).

\(108\) Ehrecke stated that this prediction was based on a private study, which he did not identify. Telephone interview with Wes Ehrecke, West Des Moines (June 15, 2009).

\(109\) Wes Ehrecke, President, Iowa Gaming Association to Members of the Iowa Legislature, “Impact on Iowa’s Commercial Casinos if a Smoking Ban is Implemented” (n.d. [ca. Jan. 2008]) (emailed by Wes Ehrecke to Marc Linder (June 15, 2009)).

Iowa casinos’ focus on “choice” was the centerpiece of their legislative lobbying strategy of carving out an exemption for all “adult” hospitality venues to which minors under 21 were denied access and in which those 21 and over made adult choices. While hesitating to characterize establishments such as bars, restaurants, and VFW lodges as having formed an official “coalition” with the casinos, Ehrecke later indicated that the exemption that the Commerce Committee early in the legislative process had created alone for casinos, may have served to split the hospitality industry apart\textsuperscript{115}—a development that Democratic \textsuperscript{111}Wes Ehrecke, President, Iowa Gaming Association to Members of the Iowa Legislature, “Impact on Iowa’s Commercial Casinos if a Smoking Ban is Implemented” (n.d. [ca. Jan. 2008]) (emailed by Wes Ehrecke to Marc Linder (June 15, 2009)).

\textsuperscript{112}Ehrecke was aware of this development, but sought to dismiss it on the grounds that ASHRAE had been “infiltrated” by anti-smoking elements. Telephone interview with Wes Ehrecke, Des Moines (June 15, 2009). He may have been referring to the fact that, for example, Dr. Jonathan Samet, a consulting scientific editor of the 1986 and the senior scientific editor of the 2006 surgeon general’s report on involuntary smoking, whom one federal judge called an “expert with extraordinary qualifications,” had been a member of ASHRAE’s Environmental Tobacco Smoke Position Document Committee. United States v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 449 F.Supp.2d 1, 444 (D.D.C. 2006); American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air-Conditioning Engineers, Environmental Tobacco Smoke: Position Document Approved by ASHRAE Board of Directors 1 (June 30, 2005), on http://www.ashrae.org/content/ASHRAE/ASHRAE/ArticleAltFormat/20058211239_347.pdf. As late as June 2009 Ehrecke was still touting the advanced technology in the casinos’ air-handling and ventilation equipment. Telephone interview with Wes Ehrecke, Des Moines (June 15, 2009).

\textsuperscript{113}See below this ch.

\textsuperscript{114}Wes Ehrecke, President, Iowa Gaming Association to Members of the Iowa Legislature, “Impact on Iowa’s Commercial Casinos if a Smoking Ban is Implemented” (n.d. [ca. Jan. 2008]) (emailed by Wes Ehrecke to Marc Linder (June 15, 2009)).

\textsuperscript{115}Telephone interview with Wes Ehrecke, West Des Moines (June 15, 2009). Defending against bar owners’ attacks on casinos’ “big-money lobbying,” Ehrecke stated:
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Representative Geri Huser expressly confirmed.\textsuperscript{116}

These cigarette industry allies tried to shift the terms of debate away from the indisputable public health effects of smoking and toward individual businesses’ profits, the untrammeled rights of property ownership, and, now, the alleged impact on state government revenues of the alleged decline in gambling,\textsuperscript{117} but health organizations appeared at the hearing to plead on behalf of protection for bar and restaurant employees and customers. To be sure, these advocates did not go out of their way to stress that their efforts would also benefit some medically and scientifically benighted secondhand smoke exposees who proclaimed that they did not “mind the blue haze” because “[y]ou get used to it”—precisely the ignorance-based slow-motion suicide that some owners denied was at stake when the government sought to intervene: “‘It’s not a question of smoking being bad for a person. It is bad for you, and everybody knows it. My objection is that the government is trying to take away the freedom of choice currently enjoyed by me and my customers.’”\textsuperscript{118}

\textbf{The Principal Financial Group’s Crucial Role in Mobilizing Support for a Statewide Smoking Ban}

The pedestrian flow of testimony at the subcommittee hearing was interrupted by at least one surprising intervention that would have been unimaginable some years earlier and the emergence of which now strongly suggested that Iowa had finally caught up with the national and even bi-coastal debate: a representative of the Principal Financial Group (formerly Bankers Life), a global company headquartered in Des Moines and the state’s fifth largest non-governmental employer,\textsuperscript{119} “urged lawmakers to adopt a statewide ban, arguing that it would \textsuperscript{117}Telephone interview with Geri Huser, Altoona (Aug. 27, 2008). For further discussion of Huser’s position, see below this ch.

\textsuperscript{118}Even Rep. Geri Huser, at least initially one of the casinos’ staunchest supporters, later expressed skepticism of the magnitude of the losses they had predicted as resulting from a smoking ban. Telephone interview with Geri Huser, Altoona (Aug. 27, 2008).

\textsuperscript{119}Iowa Department of Administrative Services—State Accounting Enterprise, make Iowa more attractive to progressive businesses and cut down on healthcare costs.\(^\text{120}\) The workplace smoking ban that Principal itself had implemented as far back as 1987 in all of its facilities had, its chairman and CEO reported, met with an “overwhelming positive reaction” from its employees.\(^\text{121}\) Merle Pederson, the company’s vice president and counsel for government relations, explained to the subcommittee that it was interested in a smoke-free Iowa for three major reasons. First, in connection with its national employer-sponsored health insurance and wellness improvement businesses Principal knew that smoking was a major cause of increased morbidity and mortality rates, which it wanted to reduce because smoking increased health insurance claims and the cost of insurance paid by its employer-customers, which it also wanted to help them reduce. Second, as a major Iowa employer in its own right, Principal believed that public places should be smoke free because smoking was not good for business, customers, or employees. And third, because the company was interested in “Iowa’s leadership as a progressive state,” it recognized that: both neighboring states and the country as a whole were going smoke free; in order to “recruit employees here, we need Iowa to be viewed as progressive and healthy”; and “economic development efforts are improved for ‘smoke free’ places.” Finally, Pederson informed the subcommittee that Principal was supporting a statewide ban in preference to a local option approach because it: protected all employees; allowed “Iowa to be marketed as smoke free”; was supported by the public; and was superior to “clumsy and confusing” local implementation.\(^\text{122}\) Indeed, Principal, whose group life, disability, and health insurance business\(^\text{123}\)
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

\(^{121}\) Barry [Griswell] to Iowa Business Council Board Members (Feb. 8, 2008) (copy furnished by Merle Pederson).

\(^{122}\) Merle Pederson “Iowa Smoke Free” (Jan. 23, 2008) (outline of testimony at House Commerce Subcommittee hearing) (emailed to Marc Linder (Aug. 11, 2008)).

\(^{123}\) http://www.principal.com/insurance.htm (visited Aug. 1, 2008). Ironically, in the wake of the passage of the new federal health insurance law, Principal announced in 2010 that it was leaving the health insurance business (purportedly because it lacked the scale to compete in an industry expected to undergo considerable consolidation). Reed Abelson, “Insurer Cuts Health Plans as New Law Takes Hold,” NYT, Sept. 30, 2010, on was significantly affected by the prevalence of smoking among its policy holders, became so deeply invested in lobbying and mobilizing its employee grassroots advocacy program (Legislative Action Network) on behalf of a statewide ban bill—thousands of contacts were made by Principal employees to their legislators—\(124\) that the bill’s floor manager Tyler Olson stated on the House floor that Principal “is behind the bill”\(125\) and one anti-smoking health organization advocate ventured the assessment that without its extensive support the bill might not have passed.\(126\)

Principal, as Pederson himself later described the firm’s role, “was the primary business leader in coordinating business advocacy with legislators, the Governor and his staff, government agencies, other large and small businesses, and a variety of business trade associations to generate the needed votes to pull the Smoke Free Iowa Law over the line in 2008.” In 2007, as well, Principal had been “a leading business voice” in support of the one-dollar cigarette tax increase.\(127\)

The evolution of PFG’s strategy and model sheds important light on the overall maturation of plans for enactment of a ban. A draft of the company’s legislative strategy plan dated August 31, 2007, revealed how modest the company’s goals initially were with regard to the ban’s scope and timeline for action: Principal was “considering spearheading an effort to lobby passage...of a law to prohibit smoking in restaurants and lounges in the state of Iowa,” but, not expecting passage in 2008, an election year, it regarded passage as more likely in 2009. PFG was already trying to identify potential coalition partners, beginning with those groups that had been allies earlier that year in enacting the one-dollar cigarette tax increase, as well as “likely allies” among legislators. At an “appropriate time” PFG would seek additional allies by contacting major business group associations, but at this early stage its sights appeared to be set relatively low: it judged that even the Iowa Business Council merely “may be helpful” (although individual corporate members might support a ban), whereas the Greater Des Moines Partnership, Iowa Association of Business and Industry and others “will likely be neutral at best or vocal opponents....” Even the “[p]olitical call” as to whether local control was preferable to a statewide ban was still an open question, though the latter made “more sense.” And, finally, Principal was well aware that it might become necessary to “negotiate in” exemptions, casino and gaming interests being a concern. The tentativeness of the whole project was underscored by the desire not to damage the company’s prestige by going public before PFG had made sure that it had a reasonable chance of success: “We recommend that certain due diligence be conducted prior to Principal publicly announcing its plans to support such an initiative in Iowa. If after due diligence is completed there does not appear to be significant support with legislators, the business community or public health-related organizations, we should reconsider active public support/business leadership for such an initiative.”

\(125\) House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr, communications director, House Speaker Murphy).

\(127\) Email from Merle Pederson to Marc Linder (Aug. 11, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

In the late summer or early fall of 2007 Pederson met with Representative Petersen and both agreed that a statewide ban was the only way to secure an anti-public smoking law, which Principal’s senior management group had set as one of the company’s advocacy priorities. Later he also met with Governor Culver and Lieutenant Governor Patty Judge, but at that point the governor was still wedded to the same local control approach as the Cancer, Lung, and Heart organizations. Emblematic of the company’s commitment to a ban was its chairman’s discussion of the bill with House Majority Leader McCarthy. It was only after Principal officials had spoken with a number of legislators that it became clear that support for a statewide ban bill “was broader and deeper than first anticipated.”

Principal also worked through the aforementioned Iowa Business Council, an organization of the state’s twenty or so largest employers, which had become a “proactive advocacy group asserting leadership on major business policy

---

129Telephone interview with Merle Pederson, vice president, government relations, Principal Financial Group, Des Moines (Aug. 4, 2008). Pederson stated that he had met with Petersen in August 2007, but such a time frame would not be consistent with the aforementioned draft plan. Jocularly, Pederson, who was a registered lobbyist on behalf of the company, observed that the governor had “dr[u]nk the same cool-aid” as the health advocates on the politics of passing a public smoking bill.
130Email from Merle Pederson to Marc Linder (Aug. 11, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

initiatives” on which it maintained a ““big picture’ perspective.”

The Council’s interest in smoking was easy to discern: among the issues having an impact on the state’s “business climate” that the IBC studied was health care, and among the “[m]any factors affect[ing] costs that threaten the current infrastructure of the Iowa health care delivery system” were “harmful personal habit and lifestyle choices.” Among the IBC members that actively supported the anti-smoking bill were Rockwell Collins, the state’s fourth largest non-governmental employer (which Principal helped mobilize its employees), and Wellmark Blue Cross, Blue Shield. In contrast, Pederson failed to “neutralize” the Iowa Association of Business and Industry—on whose board of directors he sat—which had a larger and more heterogeneous membership, let alone to persuade it to support the bill.

Representative Philip Wise Echoes the Tobacco and Gambling Industries’ Tales of Ventilation Technology as an Air Quality Deus ex Machina in Casinos

Smoking bans [in casinos] are inevitable. When they will be issued is the question.

[House Majority Leader Kevin] McCarthy said the only reason the exception was approved for casinos...is because he could only get 42 or 43 votes for the smoking ban otherwise. He said the exception was added so the House would have 51 votes to pass the ban.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Several legislators made it clear already at this early point in the legislative process that coverage of casinos and passage of the bill were mutually incompatible. In particular Representative Wise told anti-tobacco advocates that they would have to accept the casino exemption in order to secure passage of the statewide bill. The casinos—whose lobbyist, together with the restaurants’ lobbyist, spoke “in opposition” did not spring their request for exemption as a surprise at the House Commerce subcommittee hearing nor was the exemption a done deal known beforehand; rather, everyone in the statehouse had known for a long time that the industry wanted to be exempt. Press reports were acutely alive to this development. The Cedar Rapids Gazette, for example, not only put the casino exemption in its headline, but led with the statement that “[c]asinos may be the winners in a battle to pass a statewide smoking ban....” In pointing out that both supporters and opponents agreed that passage “would be difficult without significant changes, including an exemption for casinos,” the article focused on Wise, “a former smoker and smoking ban backer,” who insisted that “[i]t’s an issue of ‘competitive fairness.... It’s not fair to put casinos at a further competitive disadvantage’” vis-a-vis smoking-unregulated Indian casinos.

What apparently was fair was to put casino workers at a health and survival disadvantage vis-a-vis those working in covered places of employment. (Some workers at some Iowa casinos were unionized; according to one union representing them, AFSCME Iowa Council 61, which supported a statewide law but took no position on the casino exemption because it was an accomplished fact, its casino members were divided on the issue: some opposed the ban because of rumors it might cause closings and job losses, while others, who hated being 139Telephone interview with Jeneane Beck, Statehouse reporter for Iowa Public Radio and Des Moines bureau chief for KUNI (May 15, 2008). Beck, who had attended the Commerce subcommittee hearing, furnished this information in lieu of a no longer extant tape. During the House floor debate on H.F. 2212, the successor to the study bill, Rep. Mary Mascher estimated that if casinos were covered, Democrats would lose about six votes and the bill would fail by a vote of 45 to 55. Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 2008, 7:28 p.m.).

141Telephone interview with Jeneane Beck, Statehouse reporter for Iowa Public Radio and Des Moines bureau chief for KUNI (May 15, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Numerous studies of secondhand smoke exposure in casinos had already revealed how abysmal air conditions there were. For example, in one study the level of serum cotinine (metabolized nicotine) in nonsmoking casino employees rose 38 percent when measured before and after their work shifts, these levels being two and three times higher, respectively, than that of a nationally representative sample of those reporting exposure to environmental tobacco smoke at work. Urinary cotinine levels of nonsmokers, according to another study, rose by 456 percent after spending four hours as customers in a casino, while that of the metabolized biomarker of uptake of the tobacco-specific lung carcinogen NNK increased by 112 percent. A study of respirable particles and carcinogens in the air at a casino and bars in Delaware before and after a statewide smoking ban went into effect revealed that “smoking indoors generally raised the short-term levels of fine particle air pollution massively” so that “[e]ven huge dilution volumes cannot overcome the high emission rates of toxic and carcinogenic pollutants generated during cigarette smoking.” In the casino, for example, the post-ban levels of respirable particles and particulate polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons plummeted to 4.6 percent and 2.3 percent, respectively, of their pre-ban levels.

---

143 Telephone interview with Marcia Nichols, legislative/field director AFSCME Iowa Council 61, Des Moines (June 24, 2009). The director of security at Prairie Meadows Racetrack and Casino, one of Iowa’s largest gambling establishments, claimed that half of its 1,500 workers smoked. Patt Johnson, “Employers Scramble to Obey Smoking law,” DMR, June 23, 2008 (4D) (NewsBank). A study in the late 1990s of 3,841 full-time casino employees at four different locations of a company found that 39.3 percent currently smoked cigarettes (and a further 6.4 percent used other tobacco products). Howard Shaffer et al., “Gambling, Drugs, Smoking and Other Health Risk Activities Among Casino Employees,” American Journal of Industrial Medicine 36:365-78, tab. X at 371 (1999). Nichols noted that casino employees surrounded by smoking customers were not themselves permitted to smoke on the job.

144 In addition to the studies cited below, an important government investigation published later is worth noting: Chandran Achutan et al., “Environmental and Biological Assessment of Environmental Tobacco Smoke Exposure Among Casino Dealers” (National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, Health Hazard Evaluation Report HETA 2005-0076, May 2009).

147 James Repace, “Respirable Particles and Carcinogens in the Air of Delaware Hospitality Venues Before and After a Smoking Ban,” Journal of Occupational and Incredibly and all too credulously for an anti-smoking militant, Wise, sounding more like a PR agent for the industry, “invited the bills’ backers to visit new casinos at Riverside and Waterloo to experience the effectiveness of the latest smoke handling equipment.”148 (A study of a smoking and a nonsmoking casino at Lake Tahoe in 2007 found that the former had air particle pollution levels 5 to 17 times higher than the latter’s.)149 Wise’s invitation was astonishing in light of the position adopted three years earlier by the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air-Conditioning Engineers—the professional organization that provides guidance for using ventilation to achieve acceptable indoor air quality and the basis for municipal building codes—putting an end to the debate, sustained by cigarette manufacturers, over the question as to whether ventilation could protect nonsmokers from the health consequences of exposure to secondhand smoke:

• At present, the only means of effectively eliminating health risk associated with indoor exposure is to ban smoking activity. ...
• No other engineering approaches, including current and advanced dilution ventilation or air cleaning technologies, have been demonstrated or should be relied upon to control health risks from ETS exposure in spaces where smoking occurs. Some engineering measures may reduce that exposure and the corresponding risk to some degree while also addressing to some extent the comfort issues of odor and some forms of irritation. ...
• Because of ASHRAE’s mission to act for the benefit of the public, it encourages elimination of smoking in the indoor environment as the optimal way to minimize ETS exposure.150

In 2006, the surgeon general’s monumental report on The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke echoed ASHRAE’s position by concluding that: “Exposures of nonsmokers to secondhand smoke cannot be controlled by air cleaning or mechanical air exchange.”
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Wise’s seal of approval also provoked this immediate response on the website comment page of the newspaper reporting his remarks: “If lawmakers visit the Riverside casino as Mr Wise recommends I doubt they will be impressed by the smoke handling equipment. My wife and I don’t frequent the casinos just because the smoke is so bad. When Riverside opened, we did stop by on the 2nd day so we could try out some of the restaurants. Even though there was no smoking in the restaurants, there was already a smoke stench everywhere in the building. We only walked around for about 10 minutes, never entering the actually gaming areas but our clothes still stunk when we left.” A more specific complaint from a casino worker to her state representative spelled out the consequences of Wise’s exemption: “I want to urge you to vote in favor of NOT allowing smoking in a casino. I work in the summer at Prairie Meadows. The smoke in there is terrible. Smokers are very rude by puffing their smoke in my face as they talk and dropping their ashes on my counter. The ‘no smoking’ area is a joke. Smoke filters into this space as well as smoking patrons. I don’t want to be a victim of second hand smoke. If the smoker must smoke, then let the law say that they can do it outside near the track but not in a confined space as the building. Please vote to STOP SMOKING IN ALL PUBLIC PLACES!!!” Wise’s whitewash was also contradicted by his colleague, Democrat Polly Bukta of Clinton. Although she had been logged by the American Cancer Society in February 2008 as “Supports casino exemption (new casino in Clinton),” in 2009 Bukta commented that, despite the advanced ventilation system, the smoke could be smelled everywhere in that casino.

Neither Democrats nor Republicans pointed out that since the mid-1990s the tobacco industry, replicating its behind-the-scenes strategy of co-opting the other segments of the hospitality industry as third parties to fight the cigarette manufacturers’ battles for them, had been successfully mobilizing the gambling industry by alleging that smoking bans reduced gambling revenue and promoting ventilation as a solution to the problem of secondhand smoke.\textsuperscript{156} Ironically, in uncritically acquiescing in or allowing himself to be manipulated by the cigarette oligopoly’s newest ploy, Wise (and his colleagues) had ignored the fact that the gambling industry itself had just in the past few years begun to see the handwriting on the wall for its smoking exceptionalism: in that sense Wise was accommodating what was increasingly a mere straw man of accommodationism.

---

155Telephone interview with Polly Bukta, Clinton (June 2, 2009).

As late as the beginning of 2005, the American Gaming Association was still aggressively pushing the cigarette oligopoly’s accommodationist line: “We believe that state-of-the-art ventilation systems...can provide a comfortable and safe environment for all our customers and employees.” AGA expressed dissatisfaction with proposed changes to ASHRAE’s air ventilation standard (which formed the starting point for many state and local building codes), which “could be interpreted to make it impossible to achieve healthy air quality levels in buildings or parts of buildings—including casinos—where patrons are allowed to smoke.” Criticizing the ASHRAE proposal for ignoring casinos’ “more sophisticated air-ventilation system” and elevated ceilings, AGA was committed to work with ASHRAE to “emphasize our support of what we see as reasonable, science-based solutions to indoor air quality...concerns.” To this end it had gathered the requisite number of signatures for a petition to prompt a vote by ASHRAE’s full membership on AGA’s proposal to establish a separate standards committee to deal with the hospitality industry’s concerns.\textsuperscript{157} This vote was the culmination of a years-long effort by the hospitality industry surrogates of the cigarette manufacturers\textsuperscript{158} to counter “bad science”\textsuperscript{159}:

In response to pressure by special-interest groups, the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air Conditioning Engineers...abandoned its longtime practical engineering approach to ventilation (Standard 62 “Ventilation for Acceptable Indoor Air Quality”) in favor of changes that would have the effect of a nationwide ban on smoking in all hospitality venues, including gaming, with the possible exception of those establishments located on native land. This zero-tolerance approach disregards the time-tested HVAC engineering technologies typically used to control exposure to tobacco smoke in gaming facilities, such as dilution ventilation, directional air flow and air cleaning. The changes to ASHRAE Standard 62 now being finalized will make it impossible to achieve acceptable air quality in buildings such as casinos that allow patrons to smoke. ...

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

“These changes are not about health,” said Elia Sterling, president of Theodor Sterling Associates Ltd. and a consultant to the AGA on indoor air issues. “They are about a social engineering strategy adopted by well-funded activist groups to denormalize smoking.”

However, the tobacco-hospitality industrial complex (energetically aided by the Iowa Gaming Association, which secured the support of the president of the Iowa ASHRAE chapter) sustained a “significant blow” on June 27, 2005, when the ASHRAE membership rejected the proposed (pro-smoking) separate standards committee by the lopsided vote of 1,000 to 4,000. The setback that the tobacco and gambling industries suffered one year later, when the surgeon general issued his aforementioned report rejecting ventilation/filtration as an adequate means of protecting nonsmokers from secondhand smoke, was so severe that even AGA apparently finally began to recognize that it had not allied itself with the winning side of a global public health battle: “There is no doubt that this report is going to strengthen the efforts of those working for comprehensive smoking bans across the country,” said Frank Fahrenkopf, AGA’s president and CEO. “The gaming industry takes the issue of indoor air quality very seriously, and the comfort and safety of our patrons and employees is our number one priority. But this report says the steps we’ve been taking simply aren’t enough. This report should cause us to take a serious look at how we deal with indoor air quality as an industry.”

By 2007 a transformation in industry attitudes became visible. In the context of proliferating coverage of casinos in ever more comprehensive statewide anti-smoking laws, Judy Patterson, the executive director of the American Gaming Association, which was “courted by the tobacco industry,” conceded that fighting them was “‘an uphill battle.’” At the same time, AGA President Fahrenkopf—who had been chairman of the Republican National Committee during both Reagan administrations and a Tobacco Institute lobbyist in 1975 before the Nevada legislature, where, in opposition to anti-smoking bills, he echoed the cigarette industry line that “[t]he claims that tobacco smoking is hazardous to the non-smokers are...just a facade disguising what is an attempt by one group of persons to write their prejudices into the law”—went even further than Patterson. By May 2007, according to the Associated Press, the gambling industry “appear[ed] to have resigned itself to the wave of anti-smoking measures being passed in big gambling states.... Although casinos in some states have been granted special status, Fahrenkopf said he didn’t expect these exemptions to last long. ‘A year or two down the road there’s not any public facility you’re going to be able to smoke a cigarette in and that includes us.’”

Why, in view of the scientific and engineering consensus that ventilation/filtration was definitively not a deus ex machina and of AGA’s dawning acknowledgment that smoke-freedom would soon engulf casinos, Wise so cavalierly prioritized the Iowa casinos’ at best short-term profits over the...
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

health of the nonsmoking 80 percent of their 22.87 million annual visitors and 9,946 employees\textsuperscript{170} is unclear. (A study, cited by the Iowa gambling industry itself, revealed that only about 20 percent of Nevada casino-goers smoked\textsuperscript{171}—more or less the same proportion as in the population at large, while a later study of Pennsylvania casinos found the same proportion, which was somewhat lower than the statewide average).\textsuperscript{172} Petersen implicitly rejected the underlying premise of the question in asserting that Wise in fact cherished no financial concern for the casinos: by “running the amendment” he was merely executing a decision made by Democrats before the committee meeting that coverage of casinos (and local control) had to be jettisoned in order to accommodate four Democratic committee members in whose districts casinos \textsuperscript{171}“State Smoking Bill Advances in House,” KWWL.com (Feb. 7, 2008), on http://www.kwwl.com/Global/story.asp?i=8189859 (visited May 12, 2008) (citing Black Hawk County Gaming Association executive director Beth Knipp citing a University of Nevada study and predicting a $60 to $100 million revenue loss for the state in Iowa). The 2006 observational study (which estimated the number of smokers based on a formula according to which smokers smoked two cigarettes for 10 minutes each per hour, thus yielding a total number of smokers three times that of those observed at any one time) found the smoking prevalence to be 21.5 percent at casinos in Las Vegas, 22.6 percent in Reno, and 17 percent at Lake Tahoe. Chris Pritsos, “The Percentage of Gamblers Who Smoke: A Study of Nevada Casinos and Other Gaming Venues” (n.d. [ca. 2006]), on http://www.no-smoke.org/pdf/nevadaeconstudy.pdf (visited Aug. 29, 2008); Chris Pritsos, Karen Pritsos, and Karen Spears, “Smoking Rates Among Gamblers at Nevada Casinos Mirror US Smoking Rates,” \textit{TC} \textbf{17}:82-85 (2008). The director of research at AGA, which “has gotten out of trying to estimate the percentage of casino patrons who smoke,” distanced himself from a 2003 newspaper article in which an AGA consultant mentioned two unidentified surveys as indicating that 35-40 percent of casino customers smoked; referring to the aforementioned Nevada study, the research director stated that “we would still argue that smoking bans at casinos do have a negative impact on business. In other words, if...only 20% of our customers smoke, this still represents a very significant part of our customer base, particularly in these very challenging economic times.” Email from Andrew Smith to Marc Linder (July 6, 2009). The consultant was cited by Clarke Canfield, “Would Smoke-Free Casino Succeed?” Oct. 10, 2003, on http://news.mainetoday.com/indepth/gambling/031010casinosmoke.shtml (visited July 6, 2009).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

were located districts in which casinos donated significant amounts of money

173 Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (Apr. 12, 2008). Although the Iowa report by Glantz et al. correctly pointed to this constraint in explaining the casino exemption, the authors also asserted that: “Additionally, Speaker of the House Pat Murphy (...Industry Contributions: $1,500) made it clear in caucus conversations at the beginning of the legislative session that he would not allow a clean indoor air law to pass the House without an exemption for casinos.” Tiana Epps-Johnson, Richard Jones, and Stanton Glantz, The Stars Aligned over the Cornfields: Tobacco Industry Political Influence and Tobacco Policy Making in Iowa 1897-2009, at 157 (2009), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/IA2009/. For this claim they cited only an interview with non-legislator Cathy Callaway (who could not have personally participated in closed caucus conversations) without revealing her source. Id. n. 14 at 178. The authors appeared not to realize that this alleged additional reason for the casino exemption was not consistent with the first reason: if the House speaker had in fact already laid down the law on this issue, it would have been superfluous for Petersen to justify accommodating four Democratic committee members’ casino-beholdenness since they all would have been aware that Speaker Murphy had given the caucus its marching orders. Additionally, a survey of leading anti-smoking caucus members found no one who could corroborate that Murphy had ever made such a statement. Typical was the observation by the bill’s House floor manager, Tyler Olson: “I do not recall the Speaker making that statement. The decision to include the casino exemption was made after a vote count revealed the bill would not pass without it.” Email from Tyler Olson to Marc Linder (May 10, 2011). Philip Wise, who had offered the amendment to exempt casinos in committee, stated: “I do not remember Speaker Murphy making such a statement in Caucus. I am not aware of Cathy Callaway’s quotation, but I do know that she was never present during Caucus. That means that her information is at best second-hand. I will assure you that the Smoke-Free Air Act would have never been debated and passed without the support of Speaker Murphy and Majority Leader McCarthy. The casino exception was placed into the bill by the three House members most involved with the legislation because that was the only way to secure 51 votes for the bill. None of those three House members preferred that such an exemption be included.” Email from Phil Wise to Marc Linder (May 20, 2011). Even the most damning judgment offered by any of these Democrats absolved Murphy of the charge. According to Iowa City Representative Mary Mascher: “[W]e did not have the votes to pass the Clean Air Act with the casinos in the bill. Too many of the casino legislators resisted and were ‘no’ votes. Pat Murphy was a casino legislator who would have been a no vote but he did not force anyone else to vote no.” Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (May 10, 2011). Finally, the authors attempted to make the existence of Murphy’s ukaz plausible by asserting that the casino industry’s claims that a smoking ban would cause the state to lose tens of millions of dollars of revenue because customers would instead go to Indian or out-of-state casinos “resonated with key legislators, particularly Speaker of the House Murphy.” Tiana Epps-Johnson, Richard Jones, and Stanton Glantz, The Stars Aligned over the Cornfields: Tobacco Industry Political Influence and Tobacco Policy Making in Iowa 1897-2009, at 160 (2009), on to local groups and projects, employed a significant number of workers, and contributed to the representatives’ campaigns. 174 (In contrast, Minority Leader Rants fancifully speculated that Majority Leader McCarthy had told the Commerce Committee to exempt casinos: since he had been able to deliver on the rest of the “garbage” on his party’s agenda such as “fair share” and taxes, he could, had he so desired, also have shoved casino coverage down his members’ throats.) 175

Five Democrats on the Commerce Committee represented counties in which casinos were located: Deborah Berry, Doris Kelley, and Bob Kressig (Black Hawk/Waterloo/Isle Casino Hotel), Paul Shomshor (Pottawattamie/Council Bluffs/Ameristar Casino Hotel, Harrah’s Council Bluffs Casino & Hotel, and Horseshoe Casino & Greyhound Park), and Wise (Lee/Ft. Madison/Catfish Bend Casino). 176 Although none of these five representatives was mentioned on the American Cancer Society’s vote count card as needing or wanting a casino exemption, two of them were recipients of campaign contributions from several casinos, which distributed large amounts of money to the Democratic leadership as well. Shomshor received $500 from Ameristar PAC on January 9, 2008 and another $300 on July 14, 2008, $500 from Harrah’s Entertainment PAC—Harrah’s also owned Horseshoe Casino—on January 8, 2008, and a total of $3,050 in 2003, 2004, and 2006 in addition to $1,000 on December 3, 2007 from Friends of Prairie Meadows (a casino located far from his district, which

http://repositories.cdlib.org/ctcre/tcpmus/IA2009/. However, neither of their two sources for this allegation even mentioned Murphy (one of them having been written in 2004). Id. nn. 46 and 320 at 180, 194. Whether the result of sloppiness or sleight-of-hand, such research methods tend to undermine the authors’ credibility.

174 Email from Rep. McKinley Bailey to Marc Linder (Mar. 16, 2008); telephone interview with Merle Pederson, government affairs, Principal Financial Group, Des Moines (Aug. 4, 2008); telephone interview with Sen. David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008). “[V]oting for business interests in their districts,” as one former House speaker (who demanded anonymity) described legislators’ behavior, “is pretty much the norm.” Email to Marc Linder (June 11, 2009).

175 Telephone interview with Christopher Rants, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).

176 Joe Benedict, “Great River Acts to Shut Down FM Riverboat,” Daily Democrat (Ft. Madison), Oct. 17, 2007, on http://www.dailydem.com; telephone interview with Brian Ohorilko, Des Moines, Director of Gaming, Iowa Gaming and Racing Commission (May 29, 2009). Kressig, while representing Black Hawk county, lived in and represented Cedar Falls, the city adjoining Waterloo. The one riverboat casino in Fort Madison (Catfish Bend) was closed in November 2007, but it had operated six months a year there and six months a year in nearby Burlington. The company (Great River Entertainment) that owned it was planning to build a land-based casino in its stead.
also gave a total of $1,000 to Senate Majority Leader Gronstal on January 13 and June 19, 2008). Kelley received $100 from Ameristar (which was located far from her district). In 2007-2008 Harrah’s gave a total of $3,000 to House Speaker Murphy and $1,000 to House Majority Leader McCarthy (as well as $2,000 to House Minority Leader Rants and $3,000 to Senate Minority Leader Wieck); in 2006 Murphy received $5,000, McCarthy $500, and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Chet Culver $10,000. (In October 2006 Harrah’s even contributed $300 to Representative Janet Petersen’s re-election campaign.) All told for 2008, Ameristar contributed at least $12,400,\(^{177}\) of which slightly more than one half went to the four Democratic legislative leaders—a total of $2,250 on January 13 and October 23 to House Speaker Murphy, $1,000 to House Majority Leader McCarthy on January 8, a total of $1,500 to Senate President Kibbie (who represented Emmetsburg, where Wild Rose Casino was located) on January 12 and October 9, and a total of $1,600 to Senate Majority Leader Gronstal (who did represent Council Bluffs) on January 13 and June 30.\(^{178}\)

\[\text{\textit{The Increasingly Precarious Foundations of Local Control and the Link to Exemption of Casinos}}\]

Do you understand why (reportedly) suddenly there is momentum for a stricter statewide smoking ban, whereas until recently the votes were not there for anything but repeal of preemption?

It is just one of those things that is hard to explain around here. How an idea becomes hot. Good legislators pushing hard is probably the best reason for action.\(^{179}\)

Representative Wise’s apologetics were all the more ironic since he warned that smoking ban advocates who rejected all exemptions were “in danger once \(^{177}\)The Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board website lists contributions totaling that amount under Ameristar, but not the $500 contribution which is listed under what Shomshor received. https://webapp.ieedb.iowa.gov/publicview/ContributionSearch.aspx#ctl00_cph1_gvList (visited May 10, 2009).

\(^{179}\)Email from Marc Linder to Sen. Joe Bolkcom (Feb. 11, 2008) and from Sen. Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 12, 2008). Republican Whip Kraig Paulsen shared Bolkcom’s sense of the unanalyzable when he called the shift in momentum from local control to statewide ban an example of a bill’s simply taking on “a life of its own.” Telephone interview with Kraig Paulsen, driving on I-80 from Cedar Rapids to Des Moines (Aug. 18, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

again of ‘allowing the ideal to destroy the good’ — a version of Voltaire’s aphorism (‘le mieux est l’ennemi du bien’) that would be used ad nauseam during floor debates as a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy to justify opposition to a more stringent law. Perhaps Wise was taking such a hard line so early in the process because he feared that ‘‘some groups are willing to get nothing in pursuit of’’ the ideal. Even Tyler Olson, who was ‘‘interested in getting something done this year,’’ agreed that, as it stood, H.S.B. 537 would probably not be able to secure 51 votes. In any event, a consensus prevailed among subcommittee members that the bill’s expansive local control provision—which, inter alia, prohibited the law from being ‘‘interpreted to prevent political subdivisions from adopting ordinances or regulations relating to smoking in places of employment, in public places, or in outdoor areas, which are more restrictive than the provisions of the’’ law—would probably not pass. Indeed, ironically, soon thereafter political intelligence began circulating that casinos themselves were responsible for the shift in momentum from local control to a statewide ban because now that they had secured an exemption from the latter, they were pushing it inasmuch as it would be much more difficult for them to obtain exemptions from numerous local governments.

Though distinct, this motive was consistent with a broader-based business opposition to local control’s balkanizing impact, especially in the Des Moines metropolitan area, where, owners feared, differing regulations in contiguous municipal jurisdictions would create untoward and uncontrollable competitive

---

185When this report surfaced on the local news of public radio stations in Iowa on February 18, Assistant Majority Leader Sen. Joe Bolkcom remarked that it was the first time that he had heard it, adding that “[t]he casinos will most likely get their preemption at either the local level or state level.” Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 18, 2008). As noted elsewhere in this chapter, Democrats had already explained to health lobbyists that even a preemption repeal bill would need the casino exemption for passage.
advantages and disadvantages. Foreseeing such consequences, bar and restaurant owners, in particular, gave Senate Majority Leader Gronstal and other Democrats “push back” on local control. Ironically, the result, Gronstal noted, was that some businesspeople who would have preferred no law, once confronted with the necessity of accepting some form of public smoking control, came to regard a statewide ban as the lesser evil.\footnote{Telephone interview with Michael Gronstal, Council Bluffs (May 17, 2008). Minority Leader Wieck also later agreed that local control’s momentum had been halted by the perception of the untoward consequences of a patchwork of ordinances. Telephone interview with Ron Wieck, Sioux City (Aug. 10, 2008).} (To be sure, at least in the restaurant and bar industry, owners’ and managers’ preference for a statewide ban over local control was, according to a survey conducted in late 2006, not overwhelming: asked whether, if smoking were to be banned in restaurants, they would prefer a state law or a local ordinance, 45 percent of respondents supported the former and 31 percent the latter, while for bars the proportions were 45 percent and 28 percent, respectively.)\footnote{Gene Lutz et al., \textit{Smoking Policies of Food-Serving Businesses in Iowa}, tab. 6 at 20 and tab. 7 at 21 (Feb. 2007), on http://www.csbs.uni.edu/dept/csbr/pdf/IDPH_Business_Tobacco-2007.pdf (based on telephone interviews with 601 randomly chosen owners/managers in Oct.-Nov. 2006). These responses refer to all respondents and not only to restaurant owners in the one case and bar owners in the other. Some outliers also emerged: for example, when asked about bans in restaurants, owners/managers of establishments with sales evenly split between food and alcohol, 27 percent favoring a statewide ban, while 33 favored local control. \textit{Id.}, tab. B at 43.} Consequently, the shift in legislative momentum from local control to state action in part reflected the Democratic leadership’s perception that ultimately the latter would face less business opposition.\footnote{Telephone interview with Walt Tomenga, Johnston, IA (July 17, 2008).} On a party-line vote the subcommittee approved moving the bill to the full Commerce Committee.\footnote{IDPH Legislative Update (Jan. 28, 2008), on http://www.idph.state.ia.us/adper/common/pdf/legis/archive/2008/080128_update.pdf (visited July 5, 2008).}

In spite of the progress of H.S.B. 537, at this point local control bills still appeared viable. On January 22, H.F. 778, which, because of its casino and bar exemptions, had been put on hold in 2007, was, together with S.F. 236, which had passed the Senate in 2007 with an exemption for fraternal organizations,\footnote{See above ch. 34.} assigned to a House Local Government subcommittee, chaired by Roger Thomas, its designated floor manager,\footnote{\textit{House Journal 2008}, at 1:86 (Jan. 22).} with the intent to strip out all three exemptions. The Iowa Department of Public Health called S.F. 236 “the bill to watch for supporters of local control," but, in the wake of the shift of momentum to Petersen’s statewide ban bill, it saw no further action. The next day, January 23, Wise filed H.F. 2054, a stripped-down ban, which also excluded casinos. To be sure, Wise’s (sole) sponsorship of the bill is difficult to reconcile with Petersen’s highly credible statement that in “running the amendment” that exempted casinos from H.S.B. 537 at the Commerce Committee hearing on February 5, Wise had not been acting out of concern for casinos’ profits, but had merely volunteered to carry out a task that some Democrat would have had to perform if the bill’s supporters’ strategy was to be implemented. H.F. 2054 simply expanded coverage under the existing feeble law by banning smoking in all restaurants on July 1, 2008, and in all bars one year later. In addition, it struck the exemption for public places with less than 250 square feet of floor space. At the same time, however, Wise’s bill for the first time would have exempted all gambling structures or excursion gambling boats. The following day it was assigned to the same subcommittee that was dealing with H.S.B. 537. Whether the vehicle for smoking control in 2008 turned out to be statewide or local, passage, as Republican Representative Walt Tomenga, a non-voting member reported to the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission on January 25, would require exemptions.

On the day of the Commerce subcommittee hearing the House Human Resources Committee proposed H.S.B. 565, a preemption repeal bill similar to S.F. 236. Petersen was also named chair of the subcommittee to which the bill was assigned, but it never even met on the bill. The day after the Commerce subcommittee meeting, Democrat Ro Foege filed a preemption repeal bill, identical to the one he had filed in 2007, which would have empowered a city, county, or local health board to enforce higher standards or stricter requirements than the weak statewide law’s; it non-exhaustively exemplified that authority to include eliminating exemptions, prohibiting the designation of smoking areas, and doing away with bar owners’ discretion not to establish any no-smoking areas. It was referred to the House Human Resources Committee and then to a subcommittee of which the quasi-ubiquitous Petersen was chair, but it was quickly overtaken by events and also progressed no further. Foege, who had quit smoking about 20 years earlier, was such a confirmed advocate of (exemptionless) local control that even after the statewide ban had gone into effect he continued to regard the former—which he conceded was just an intermediate step on the way to a statewide ban—as superior, sweeping aside both statements by other Democrats that, in order to pass, a local control bill would also have had to have included exemptions and objections that it would have taken many years for local governments to adopt ordinances. Instead, echoing the claims of the Heart-Lung-Cancer coalition and based on experiences in some other states, Foege implausibly insisted that the “domino effect” would have accelerated the process so that it would have been completed within two or three years. (In contrast, the Heart Association acknowledged, at least after the fact, that enactment of a statewide ban had relieved it of the enormous work that it would have taken to convince a thousand local government to pass anti-smoking ordinances.) As far as locally imposed exemptions were concerned, Foege found it acceptable for a city council to permit smoking in a casino.

At this juncture, in the wake of the subcommittee proceedings, local control advocates, seeing the governor and House and Senate majority leaders “on board” that’s the businesses deciding what’s best for their own business.” Charlotte Eby, “Global Warming, Smoking on Tap for Lawmakers,” MCG-G, Jan. 27, 2008, on http://www.globegazette.com (visited May 15, 2008).

See above ch. 34.

Telephone interview with Ro Foege, Mt. Vernon (Aug. 31, 2008).

Telephone interview with Ro Foege, Mt. Vernon (Aug. 31, 2008). Foege’s devotion to local control was so extreme that, asked why the statewide ban bill had supplanted it, he had no answer to what he called a “good question.” In noting that few other House members shared his strong advocacy of local control, he oddly identified McKinley Bailey as one of them despite the latter’s support for bill-killing broad exemptions.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

(but unaware of the traction that Petersen’s bill was about to gain), regarded prospects for repeal in 2008 as rather positive.\(^{204}\)

Representative Janet Petersen’s Indispensability

“The hardest thing for me to do was plug my nose and vote to take the casinos out...”\(^{205}\)

In order to understand the progress of the statewide ban bill in 2008, it is crucial to appreciate the unique individual contribution of Janet Petersen, without whose “passion” and tenacity\(^{206}\) the bill would probably not have passed\(^{207}\) or perhaps even have secured leadership’s clearance for floor debate in 2008\(^{208}\) at \(^{204}\)Telephone interview with Threase Harms, CAFE Iowa lobbyist, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

---

\(^{206}\)Telephone interview with Randy Yontz, state advocacy director, American Heart Association of Iowa, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

\(^{207}\)The House majority leader’s administrative assistant and legal counsel freely acknowledged that Petersen had been the person most responsible for passage, but added that McCarthy agreed with her 100 percent and hated smoking. Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).

\(^{208}\)Nevertheless, her commitment to the elimination of smoking had its limits: asked, after the Smokefree Air Act had gone into effect, whether a majority of the Iowa legislature might support adoption of a law similar to an ordinance just passed in San Francisco prohibiting pharmacies from selling tobacco products, Petersen replied that “[a]s a champion of smokefree air...I am not interested in banning a business from selling a product,” although she did not deny that prohibiting a health care institution such as a pharmacy from selling cigarettes reinforced the promotion of smokefree air. When asked whether she would support legislation to prohibit hospitals from selling cigarettes, she failed to respond. Petersen’s surmise that, since she was not interested, she doubted whether the initiative “would have much support from other legislators,” if empirically accurate, might help explain why the Iowa legislature has, in recent decades, been so backward on smoking and tobacco issues. Email from Janet Petersen to Marc Linder and from Marc Linder to Janet Petersen (July 31, 2008). Petersen’s position may be related to her misunderstanding that government lacks the power to ban smoking and tobacco altogether: “I wish we could eliminate it but I don’t think that’s within our jurisdiction to eliminate smoking. You know, it’s a legal product just like alcohol is a legal product....”

3309
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

a time when she herself did not know whether enough votes could be mobilized to pass it. She certainly did not secure passage singlehandedly, but she was, as McCarthy’s assistant put it, “the driving force” behind the bill, and there is no other actor of whom it can plausibly be said that he or she was indispensable. Petersen’s key advocacy was, as a former Democratic House speaker admiringly put it, “over the top.” On one occasion, at least, Petersen availed herself of the opportunity to set the historical record straight about her central role. Asked on the television program “Iowa Press” in early March how local control, for which everyone seemed to be headed, had “morphed” into a much stricter bill, she explained: “Well, I guess I probably had something to do with that because last year we weren’t able to get the local control bill out of local government [committee] in the House. And I had a statewide bill that I had been working on for the past eight years and I said I’d like a shot to run it this year and just see where the votes are. I’ve been talking to business owners in my district and talking to legislators and I thought if people keep talking about local control that I actually think we might have a better shot at a statewide ban.” Her antagonist on the program, Democratic Senator Bill Dotzler, agreed that “Janet probably did have something to do with it...."

Petersen had wanted to try to pass such a bill for years, but her efforts had been in vain in the face of the adamant opposition of Republican Majority Leader Rants, whose tobacco industry money, sluiced through his 527 organization, ... exceeded by a large margin any contributions that cigarette companies had previously handed out in Iowa.\(^{215}\) Founded by Rants in 2005, the Iowa Leadership Council, “a clear voice...for conservative principles” such as “restraining taxes,” was designed to “push back the concerted efforts” of “Democrat and ultra-liberal independent political expenditure groups.”\(^{216}\) Not only did cigarette companies such as Altria ($25,000 in 2005 and 2006), Reynolds American ($25,000 in 2005 and $40,000 in 2007), and Lorillard ($10,000 in 2005 and $5,000 in 2008) contribute plentifully, but so did the larger tobacco-industrial-retail complex, including retailers such as Casey’s General Stores ($5,000 in 2006 and $5,000 in 2008), Kum and Go ($10,000 in 2007 and through the W.A. Krause Revocable Trust $10,000 in 2006 and $5,000 in 2007), and casinos such as Ameristar in Council Bluffs ($30,000 in 2006 and $10,000 in 2007) and Harrah’s ($10,000 in 2006).\(^{217}\)

In the wake of the Democrats’ having gained control of the House at the 2006 elections, Petersen’s strategy included her appointment as chair of the Commerce Committee, in which capacity she then signaled her priorities by informing committee members that no other bill would be going anywhere until she got the statewide smoking ban through. Her committee-level power, however, would have been unavailing had she not been able to persuade House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy—who had not, until after her committee had acted, believed that a statewide ban bill could attract enough votes to pass—to let her try her bill;\(^{218}\)

---

\(^{215}\)Telephone interview with Sen. Michael Connolly, Dubuque (Apr. 29, 2008). Asked after passage of the bill whether she expected tobacco companies to become involved in the rule-making process, Sen. Appel, pointing to Rants’s 527 money, stated that they had been involved all along. Telephone interview with Staci Appel, Ackworth (Apr. 12, 2008).

\(^{217}\)Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (Apr. 12, 2008). On Petersen’s bills before 2008, see above chs 31 and 34. A later press account stating that McCarthy “could take the credit, or blame” for House passage of H.F. 2212 because, “[s]ensing support for new smoking restrictions was picking up momentum,” he “was one as she had been unable to do in 2007, when the Democratic leadership “asked her to yield to efforts to pass” a local control measure.\textsuperscript{219} Petersen also multiplied her influence by partnering with Representatives Tyler Olson and especially with Philip Wise, the latter and Petersen becoming each other’s closest friend in the legislature.\textsuperscript{220} Nor was the majority leader the only unbeliever: the anti-tobacco health organizations all opposed the statewide ban bill in 2007 and at the outset of 2008 because they feared that, since no other state had enacted a statewide ban without first having empowered local communities to pass their own anti-smoking ordinances, Iowa would wind up with a weak statewide law. Indeed, though Petersen herself in the 1990s had worked and lobbied for the American Heart Association, she was unable to persuade even that organization to focus on her statewide approach. More remarkably, even after her bill had begun to “move” in 2008, the health groups still refused to abandon their opposition\textsuperscript{221} —or, as her successor at the Heart Association put it, the organization had preferred local control even after it had been served a statewide ban “on a silver platter.”\textsuperscript{222} Speaking for many in the movement, the Cancer Society’s lobbyist later observed that “we were kind of floored” that Petersen and her supporters even thought that they had the votes to pass a bill, let alone that the bill this time around would “have legs.”\textsuperscript{223} Conversely, Petersen nourished vigorous contempt for the local control bill of 2007, which she bluntly characterized as a watered-down “hunk of
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The House Commerce Committee Meeting of February 5

[I]n the commerce committee I need twelve votes to get it out of committee and the Republicans had decided they didn’t want to play ball on this issue. So, I had to just work with my Democratic members and that was one way for me to obtain the votes to keep the bill alive. 225

The Commerce Committee meeting on H.S.B. 537 on February 5226 was the crucial step in the legislative process signaling that a statewide ban would prevail over merely authorizing local governments individually to go beyond the meager limits of the obsolete clean indoor air act. Since the Senate was considered the more activist chamber in terms of smoking regulation, the fact that even some Republicans joined Democrats on the House Commerce Committee in recommending the bill suggested that floor passage was a definite possibility. The meeting was also decisive in confirming the aforementioned predictions that passage of a statewide ban would be possible only if casinos were exempt.

The reconstruction of legislative history in Iowa, as in most states, is made difficult (if not impossible) by the lack of a stenographic transcript not only of floor debate, but also of committee hearings and meetings. And although the public can and does attend both plenary floor and committee sessions, audio only of the former has recently begun to be available live (but not archived) on the legislature’s website. Fortunately, however, in the age of www.youtube.com, an 224Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (Apr. 12, 2008). Nevertheless, before her bill made its definitive breakthrough, Petersen, according to the Lung Association’s lobbyist, promised that she would support a local control bill if it got “legs” and H.F. 2212 did not (a scenario that did not occur). Telephone interview with Dan Ramsey, ALA, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

226According to an account of the meeting by Jason Clayworth, “Bill Would Ban Smoking in, Near Public Places,” DMR, Feb. 6, 2008 (2B:1-2), the president of the Iowa Gaming Association, Wes Ehrecke, “successfully urged lawmakers…to exempt casinos….” But according to Ehrecke, who was present, neither he nor any other non-legislator was permitted to speak; he surmised that the reporter had conflated this meeting and the aforementioned January 23 subcommittee hearing. Telephone interview with Wes Ehrecke, Des Moines (June 15, 2009).
audio-video recording of most of the meeting was posted on the internet.

Laying Tracks to a Statewide Ban Jettisoning Local Control and Exempting Casinos

It is too soon to know the causes [of the decline in Illinois casino revenues]—and it doesn’t really matter. One thing is the same now as when the bill was passed last year: Smoking is hazardous. It is hazardous to the smokers, to other patrons and to employees. A decrease in revenue at casinos or elsewhere doesn’t change that. ... The smoking ban carries costs, but so does smoking.

Following a brief presentation of the study bill by Tyler Olson, who would become floor manager of H.F. 2212, Representative Wise offered his two amendments—which he had signaled in subcommittee—striking local control and exempting casinos; the basis for the latter he did not explain, but he found local control on top of a statewide ban “most amusing,” with which it was “inconsistent” in addition to being “confusing.” He thus added insult to injury in rebuffing the local control-oriented anti-tobacco groups.

(In the event, after the bill had become law without the express provision satisfying the constitutional and codified conditions for lifting the limitations on home rule, some die-hard advocates of local control did not find its absence

---

227 The nonpartisan but for-profit IowaPolitics.com posted the three-part, 30-minute video, which, however, ended before the final vote. The meeting convened at 3:20 p.m., but recessed five minutes later for 65 minutes for Democratic and Republican caucuses; during these first five minutes other bills were assigned to subcommittees and amendments to H.S.B. 537 were distributed; the meeting then reconvened at 4:30 p.m. and adjourned at 5:25 p.m. [House] Committee Minutes for Commerce (Feb. 5, 2008), on http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/ga/minutes.pdf?minutesID=3602. The Youtube videos thus appear to include about 30 of the 55 minutes devoted to H.S.B. 537.

228 “Don’t Carve Out Exemptions to State’s Smoking Ban,” Pantagraph (Bloomington), Feb. 15, 2008 (A6) (edit.) (Lexis).

229 House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sWB5mIeiTD0 (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 1)) (visited July 5, 2008).

230 A lobbyist for one of these groups reported that the elimination of local control at the Commerce Committee meeting had come out of the blue, though the anti-smoking groups had known that it would happen. Telephone interview with Threase Harms, CAFE Iowa lobbyist, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

231 Iowa Constitution art. III, § 38A; Iowa Code §§ 364.1, 364.2(3), and 364.3(3) (2007). See also above ch. 25.
amusing. Nor was such a power illogical or superfluous, as Wise had implied, especially in the wake of his casino exemption, which was precisely why especially casinos would have opposed local control. Its usefulness would, for example, become glaringly obvious in May, when the Sioux City city council began toying with adoption of an ordinance that would have banned smoking in a casino in the teeth of a law that expressly exempted it from the statewide ban.

---

232 Cindy Hadish, “Smoking Ban: ‘Awesome’ or Oppressive?” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Apr. 10, 2008 (1A:1-2, at 6A:4) (mentioning Clean Air for Everyone Johnson County as intending to continue to push for local control to strengthen the ban further). However, the example—crude attempts at evasion in Minnesota of that state’s 2007 Freedom to Breathe Act by bar owners to call all their smoking customers actors in an (exempt) stage performance—that CAFE’s lobbyist used to justify its need was inapt. Telephone interview with Threase Harms, CAFE Iowa lobbyist, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

233 Lynn Zerschling, “City May Try to Ban Smoking at Argosy,” SCJ, May 6, 2008, on http://www.siouxcityjournal.com (visited May 6, 2008). The city attorney, who conceded that “[r]easonable minds can differ and others could interpret the Act in another way,” concluded that it was “likely” that the city “has the power to adopt an ordinance forbidding smoking in areas which are not listed in the Act and [in] those areas which are exempted from the Act.” The city attorney sought to harmonize the ban with the Iowa Supreme Court precedent that an ordinance was inconsistent with, and thus preempted by, a state law when the former prohibited an act permitted by the latter by arguing that the ordinance was merely more stringent than, but not inconsistent with, the Smokefree Air Act. He reached this conclusion by stressing that the statute: (1) repealed the express preemption contained in the old law; (2) did not expressly prohibit cities from adopting smoking ordinances; (3) permitted private businesses (and local governments) in their own buildings/on their own land to prohibit smoking that is permitted by the statute; and (4) “merely exempts certain areas from its own regulation” without expressly stating that smoking shall be permitted or not regulated there. Andrew Mai, Informational Memo: Smokefree Air Act, to Sioux City City Council (Apr. 25, 2008) (copy provided by Andrew Mai). The city attorney’s memorandum was, in turn, based on an analysis furnished by the Tobacco Control Legal Consortium, which argued that the ordinance could be reconciled with the statute because it promoted the Smokefree Air Act’s underlying policy and merely increased the details of the regulation. Letter from Maggie Mahoney to Andrew Mai and Eleanor Dilkes (Apr. 22, 2008) (copy furnished by Andrew Mai). These arguments suffered from their failure to deal with any of the following crucial aspects of legislative history: (1) the House Commerce Committee struck an expansive local control provision from the study bill before passing it out of committee as H.F. 2212, the amendment in question having been filed by Rep. Wise, one of the bill’s strongest supporters, whose amendment included only one other provision—the casino exemption; (2) the Senate voted to strike the casino exemption, but both houses ultimately agreed to retain it; and (3) the main reason that the legislature decided not to pursue any local control bill (i.e., a bill that would have expressly repealed preemption of local control in Iowa Code sect. 142B and
This initiative triggered an immediate rebuff from Senate Majority Leader Michael Gronstal, who, incorrectly, stated that the legislature had not repealed “the state law that prohibits local governments from adopting smoking ordinances...so I’m not sure if they know what they’re doing up there.” Correctly, but irrelevantly, bill floor manager Tyler Olson weighed in with the thought that “it’s pretty clear that the state, at least this year, has spoken and said that we’re going to exempt the gaming floor.” Why he nevertheless expected other cities to emulate Sioux City he did not explain.\footnote{O. Kay Henderson, “Lawmakers React to Proposed Casino Smoking Ban in Sioux City,” Radio Iowa, May 7, 2008, on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited May 15, 2008). Gronstal was wrong both because the new anti-smoking law, H.F. 2212, did in fact repeal the preemption of local anti-smoking ordinances that the cigarette oligopoly had succeeded in having inserted into the old law in 1990 and the aforementioned constitutional and codified limitations on home rule did not expressly prohibit local governments from passing smoking ordinances. According to the city attorney, Governor Culver stated (on television), without offering a reason, that the city had the power to ban smoking at the casino. Email from Andrew Mai to Marc Linder (Sept. 15, 2008).} A few days later the council abandoned the effort, in part based on concerns that state law preempted it, but in part also because the casino management’s commitment to “consider setting aside a nonsmoking area on the gaming floor would make the ordinance unnecessary.” The councilman who had launched and now tabled the proposal commended management’s “efforts to meet the goal of the state law without a government mandate” by means of feckless nonsmoking areas and an absurd filtering technology that included “a new anti-smell or fragrance system.”\footnote{Lyn Zerschling, “Argosy Smoking Ban Goes Up in Smoke,” SCJ, May 10, 2008, on http://www.siouxcityjournal.com (visited May 12, 2008). The denouement prompted a casino website to ditch a quarter-century of science and out-do even Philip Morris: “The solution seems so simple, one wonders why non-smokers feel so strongly about enforcing their will upon the liberties of others when compromise can keep all parties relatively satisfied.” Tom Weston, “Sioux City Drops Proposed Casino Smoking Ban”(May 11, 2008), on http://www.onlinacasinoadvisory.com/casino-news/land/iowa-town-drops-casino-ban-1695.htm (visited May 22, 2009).}

Ignoring the deletion of local control, with which the minority party was doubtless in full agreement, Chuck Soderberg, a second-term northwest Iowa power cooperative vice president and the ranking Republican on the committee, asked Wise why he wanted to exempt casinos. Noting that the hospitality industry in other states had generally benefited from smoking bans, Wise observed that casinos were the only area in which he had been able to find any evidence of a negative economic impact; stressing that his information was “very preliminary” and “tentative,” he mentioned that casinos in eastern Iowa were picking up some business from Illinois after that state’s smoking ban (which had just gone into effect on January 1, 2008, covering casinos)—the reversal of which fate he wished to spare Iowa casinos, especially since they would also be subject to a competitive disadvantage vis-a-vis Native American casinos, which would not be covered by the law.\textsuperscript{239}
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

237House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sWB5mleITD0 (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 1)) (visited July 5, 2008). How Wise would have gotten the January Illinois data so soon is unclear; according to the Legislative Services Agency senior legislative analyst from whom Wise later requested detailed data: “Illinois and Iowa update their casino websites early in the following month, but February 5th would be pretty early for January data. Also, I am not sure I had discovered the Illinois web site as early as February 5, 2008. Rep. Wise may have just had an Illinois contact with knowledge of the situation. I am not sure of his source put [sic] it probably was not me.” Email from Jeff Robinson to Marc Linder (June 19, 2009). The press reported on February 1 that data from six of Illinois’ casinos during a 10-day period in early January revealed a 20-percent decline, but the executive director of the Illinois Casino Gaming Association expressly noted that “[w]e’re very cautious with the figures because we’ve had some bad weather the first part of the month.” That revenue had declined more than attendance suggested to him that customers were not leaving the state, but spending less time gambling: “Instead of pulling slot machine arms with a cigarette dangling out of their mouths, gamblers who smoke go outside for a puff, leaving machines and seats at card tables unused for longer periods of time.” Jake Griffin, “One Month Later Bars, Casinos Are Feeling the Ban,” Chicago Daily Herald, Feb. 1, 2008 (1) (Lexis). The press did not publish the Illinois Gaming Board’s official January data showing a 17.5 percent drop in revenues until Feb. 9, but even then the ICGA executive director emphasized that: “‘We’re not saying that the smoking (ban) is causing all of it.'” Without explaining how management had disentangled the various causes, Tom Swoik expressed the belief that “a majority of the losses” had resulted from the ban, adding that “[b]ad weather in January also probably contributed to the decline in revenue.” Adriana Colindres, “Casinos Blame Statewide Ban for Majority of Decline in Revenues,” State Journal-Register (Springfield), Feb. 9, 2008 (6) (Lexis).

The smoking ban-related causality allegedly underlying data that constituted the sole empirical basis for Wise’s precedent-setting exemption was so shaky that days after the Commerce Committee vote even the Illinois casino industry was cautioning against overinterpreting the data. For example, the vice president of a casino in Rock Island stated that “a combination of the smoking ban, harsh weather and the current state of the economy make it difficult to blame” the lower revenue on “any single factor....” As for smoking specifically, “the true picture for us is going to have to wait,” but “[e]ven then, we’ve done some things to sort of mitigate the situation by providing smoking areas for our guests, which are being used.” And a Democratic legislator who said that he would consider an exemption if some area in the casino were set aside for nonsmokers, insisted not only that more time was needed to assess the trends and determine the causes of the revenue loss, but that even if revenue declined in all of the state’s casinos, “it could be the smoking ban, or it could be the economy.... I think we’re probably going to have to wait to really see what’s happening there.”\textsuperscript{240}

In the face of all this uncertainty in Illinois itself over the meaning of the drop in revenue—two weeks after the committee’s adoption of Wise’s amendment the executive director of the ICGA still conceded that “some of the drop could be attributed to bad weather”\textsuperscript{241}—Wise neither offered nor was asked to explain why it was necessary to enact a politically explosive exemption (that would, to boot, result in the continuing exposure of millions of people to intense secondhand smoke) immediately rather than, at the very least, monitoring the impact of coverage and reassessing the situation after one year. He failed to divulge whatever data he had for the month of January, and no other legislator apparently had the incentive to criticize Wise’s amendment. Democrats, at least in the House, were too committed to the done deal to raise inconvenient and unsettling issues. (As Wise himself later put it: “In the Iowa House, the casino gaming floor exception did bring “yes” votes to the bill. I am not personally aware of any votes that it cost the bill. There were legislators in the Iowa House who also groused about the exemption and threatened to vote against the bill if the exemption was included. None of them did so.”) In contrast, Republicans, who, by and large, did not support smoking bans anywhere, cried crocodile tears for casino workers only as a pseudo-issue in order to attack Democrats’ inconsistency.

In response to Soderberg’s next question as to whether the casino issue was financial or health, Wise candidly (but self-contradictorily) admitted that it was economic: if health alone were the issue, there would be no exemptions. But neither Soderberg nor anyone else asked Wise to explain to the members the calculation demonstrating that the potential loss of an indeterminate amount of casino revenue and/or state tax revenue justified enabling the sickness and death of a certain number of casino employees and customers exposed to other customers’ secondhand smoke, and so the committee, on a strictly party-line basis, voted 13 to 9 in favor of Wise’s amendment. No one challenged Wise, but had Wise himself or any would-be critic paid as much attention to the political struggle in Illinois that had consciously, intentionally, transparently, and loudly put public health before casinos’ profits

242 Email from Phil Wise to Marc Linder (July 9, 2009).
243 House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sWB5mIeiTD0 (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 1)) (visited July 5, 2008).
244 House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sWB5mIeiTD0 (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 1)) (visited July 5, 2008); House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Qw8W3ppSCDc&feature=related (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 2)) (visited July 5, 2008). The first five Republicans to vote “passed”; after the last four had voted No, the first five changed their vote to No (Amendment 707); [House] Committee Minutes for Commerce (Feb. 5, 2008), on http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/ga/minutes.pdf?minutesID=3602. Republican Doug Struyk explained later that Republicans’ initial passing had been driven by their belief that three Democrats might vote No. Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

and government’s tax revenues as they had to January’s decline in the latter two magnitudes, they would have discovered an alternative framework for a public discourse that might have altered the course of the Iowa debate. And had Wise looked further than just across the Mississippi and examined the policy underlying the casino smoking ban implemented in Victoria, Australia in 2002, a more radical redirection of the Iowa discussion might have taken place. In Victoria the purpose of the smoking ban in gambling venues was twofold—to protect workers and customers from secondhand smoke “and as a measure to reduce the addictiveness of gambling.” In other words, the government did not view the drop in revenues as a trade-off for enhancing public health, but actually intended it as a means of reducing the losses of those afflicted with the dual addictions of smoking and gambling by disrupting—as a market research report prepared for one of the gambling firms, which commissioned the study to assess the new law’s impact on revenue and “customer satisfaction” and to provide “information regarding an explanation of ritualistic behaviour and how it manifests emotionally and physically in individuals exhibiting gambling and smoking behaviour,” put it—smoking as “a powerful reinforcement for the trance-inducing rituals associated with gambling.” These disruptions included: “Wanting to smoke a cigarette is distracting and breaks the concentration with playing the game. Awareness of expenditure (“playing the poker machine is a waste of money”) when leaving the game to having a cigarette. Tempted to go home rather than play on. Effects [sic] concentration, levels of agitation and irritability.”249 (To be sure, the firm, not sharing the government’s goal of interfering with the synergy between the two addictions, received a long laundry list of suggestions from psychologists—who informed their client that “[c]urrent research considers the behaviour of compulsive gambling and smoking nicotine within an ‘addiction model’”—on “How to Encourage...Smokers to Continue Gambling in Non-Smoking Environments” such as “[t]raining staff with the primary purpose of keeping people at the machines to play continuously,” offering free mints, gum, or hard lollies, and permitting smokers to reserve a machine while they go outside to smoke so that they were required to return to the machines.)250

245See below this ch.

Tobacco control organizations and unions representing gaming employees favored the Victoria ban because of its diminution of secondhand smoke exposure, but with smokers representing 36 percent of electronic gambling machines users but contributing 50% of the revenue,251 gambling control supporters expected that the smoking ban would help reduce excessive gambling among problem gamblers: requiring smokers to interrupt their activity to go outside to smoke might prompt them to reconsider their gambling and “an earlier withdrawal from the gambling ‘trance.’”252 Unsurprisingly, given the disproportionate share of smokers among all gamblers and problem gamblers253 and the latter’s disproportionate contribution (42 percent) to electronic gambling machine revenue,254 the fact that smokers, after the ban went into effect, did in fact spend less money on gambling because they gambled less time per hour (because they spent time on smoking breaks) and less time overall (because they left the establishment earlier),255 meant that industry revenue and government tax revenue declined in fiscal year 2003 7.6 to 10.0 percent and 8.5 percent, respectively.\(^\text{256}\) Also fostering these declines were additional policies designed to interfere with uninhibited gambling such as limiting access to cash and automated teller machines at gambling sites, requiring display of information on odds of winning, lowering maximum bet limits, and banning gambling machine advertising.

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

At least for Victoria, investigators have hypothesized that the sudden and long-term reduction in gambling machine expenditures differed from the impact of smoking bans in restaurants: whereas in the latter smokers by and large adjusted by smoking before or after eating and the advent of nonsmokers who formerly avoided smoky locales compensated for the small proportion of smokers who stopped frequenting or lingered less in restaurants, in gambling establishments “each minute away from a machine is money not spent” and nonsmokers failed to increase their expenditures.\(^\text{257}\)

Iowa, too, had witnessed the pervasive phenomenon of the dual gambling-smoking addiction. Numerous studies have revealed, for example, that the proportion of so-called problem gamblers in Iowa\(^\text{258}\) admitted to gambling treatment\(^\text{259}\) who smoked far exceeded that of the population at large: tobacco use prevalence among this subpopulation ranged between 51 and 70 percent.\(^\text{260}\) The \(^{258}\)According to the Iowa Department of Public Health, “problem gamblers,” for whom “gambling has become an addiction...like an addiction to alcohol or drugs,” “find it extremely difficult to stop gambling.” Of adult Iowans 88 percent gamble, while 3 percent are problem gamblers. http://www.1800betsoff.org/problem_gamblers.asp

\(^{259}\)In 2004 the legislature imposed a 0.5 percent tax on casinos’ adjusted gross receipts to fund such gambling treatment. Iowa Code §§ 99F(3)(c) and 135.150 (2008). Ironically, in 2008 the legislature, while excluding casinos from the statewide smoking ban, appropriated $1,690,000 from this fund to IDPH for the benefit of people with addictive disorders and specified that priority be given to those “with a dual diagnosis of substance abuse and gambling addictions....” 2008 Iowa Laws ch. 1187, § 3.

\(^{260}\)Howard Shaffer et al., The Iowa Department of Public Health Gambling Treatment
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Victorian program would have been readily available as an initiative that might have united critics of secondhand smoke exposure and the individual and family financial havoc wreaked by gambling in opposition to leaving casino smoking unregulated, but in fact only one Iowa legislator (Republican Scott Raecker) during floor debate on H.F. 2212 objected to the casino exemption in the context of this twofold “addictive disorder.”

The Origins of Iowa’s Unique Smoking Ban on the Outdoor Grounds of Public Buildings in a Republican Ambush that Boomeranged

Iowa certainly hasn’t been on the cutting edge when it comes to smoking laws.

See below this ch. (House debate of Feb. 19).

261 See below this ch. (House debate of Feb. 19).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

After raising the issue of the basis for the proposed casino exemption, Soderberg offered the Republicans’ only amendment, which added the underlined language to the following subdefinition of “public place”: “Public buildings, places of public assembly, and vehicles owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions and including the entirety of the private residence of any state employee any portion of which is open to the public.” The amendment also added the following additional outdoor area in which smoking was prohibited: “The grounds of any public buildings and places of public assembly owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions, including the grounds of a private residence of any state employee any portion of which is open to the public.”

In statehouse circles it was public knowledge that the Republican amendment (which, according to Democrats, really originated with assistant minority leader Doug Struyk, although the latter denied the allegation) was designed as a killer amendment. With the so-called Terrace Hill (governor’s mansion) amendment, Republicans intended to embarrass Governor Culver, whose wife Mari, who “was trying to kick the habit,” would not lawfully be able to smoke on the grounds of the family’s residence.

263House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Qw8W3ppSCDc&feature=related (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 2)) (visited July 5, 2008). The amended language was added to H.S.B. 537, § 2(12)(s), and inserted as § 3(2)(f).

264Telephone interview with Philip Wise, Keokuk (May 18, 2008).

266Struyk later stated that the amendment had been discussed briefly during a Republican caucus, but that it had not been his idea and that he was not sure whether it had originated with Soderberg himself or whether he had merely “run” it. As one of the caucus’s three lawyers, Struyk did go over the amendment. Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).

268O. Kay Henderson, “Statewide Smoking Ban Endorsed by Legislative Committee,” Radio Iowa (Feb. 5, 2008), on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited May 12, 2008). Republicans may not have been just guessing: after the law went into effect, Mari Culver’s failure to control her nicotine addiction did embarrass the governor. After a reporter had seen her unlawfully smoking in a state vehicle chauffeured by a state trooper, she was constrained to admit that she had violated the law. Although the trooper failed to issue her a ticket, the following day she requested and received the ticket. Tony Leys, “First Lady Admits Smoking in State Vehicle,” DMR, Nov. 21, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com (visited Nov. 21, 2008); Tony Leys, “Mari Culver Requests Ticket for Smoking,” DMR, Nov. 22, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com (visited Nov.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Telephone interview with Chuck Soderberg, Le Mars (May 16, 2008).

271 Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).

272 House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Qw8W3ppSCDc&feature=related (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 2)) (visited July 5, 2008); [House] Committee Minutes for Commerce (Feb. 5, 2008), on http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/ga/minutes.pdf?minutesID=3602 (Amendment 204). Petersen stated later that Democrats had had all of five minutes’ notice of the amendment, during which they decided to accept it. Telephone interview with Rep. Janet Petersen, Des Moines (June 6, 2008). Although the aforementioned timeline in the minutes indicated that Democrats had 65 minutes while caucusing to discuss the amendment and the YouTube video includes no caucusing or any other interruption after Soderberg offered his amendment, Rep. Wise also stated later that as soon as Soderberg brought forward the amendment, Democrats caucused and made the decision to accept it. Telephone interview with Philip Wise, Keokuk (May 18, 2008). Committee member Doug Struyk also stated that Republicans had caucused for five minutes and that Democrats had been aware that the amendment would be offered. Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).

269 Struyk freely acknowledged that embarrassment had indeed been one of the amendment’s purposes in order to point up the “hypocrisy” underlying Democrats’ selective approach to coverage. In introducing the amendment, Soderberg offered three separate reasons, the last clearly being a dig at Culver: (1) “the state really does need to lead by example”; (2) the need to protect historic buildings; and (3) in his condition of the state address the governor had said that “if you’re going to talk the talk, you need to walk the walk.” Tyler Olson, visibly unable to suppress a smirk while putting the minority party in check, announced that “I appreciate that the amendment is offered in the spirit of public health.” All Ayes and no Nays being heard on the short-form (non-roll-call) vote, the amendment carried. Struyk later insisted that Republicans had not viewed Democrats’ adoption of the amendment as a boomerang: true, his party had tried to box the majority party in by maneuvering it into voting against the expansion of coverage, but Republicans did not feel that they had been saddled with a provision that they actually opposed. Ironically, the very capaciousness of “the grounds of public buildings” language would radically broaden the outdoor coverage of the smoking ban, an outcome that could not plausibly have been Republicans’ intention and that would not have occurred had the amendment been literally confined to its original Terrace Hill target. In this sense,Struyk’s claim that the caucus had not realized that the amendment would be interpreted so expansively seems, in light of its unambiguous language, implausible. More likely, however, is Republicans’ failure to foresee that their provision would give rise to sharp and multifaceted floor debate over its meaning, a controversy over ambiguity that would be perpetuated during the drafting of the administrative rules.

For its author, however, the phrase was crystal clear. Asked later what he had meant by “grounds of public buildings,” Soderberg immediately responded that he had intended it to cover the whole outdoor area. When asked about an extreme but real situation, he readily replied that if the only building in a state park were an enclosed bathroom, then smoking would be prohibited on the park’s entire grounds. Asked, finally, whether such a capacious definition was not “pretty radical,” especially since during plenary consideration he had opposed the bill on every vote, Soderberg stressed that “the law needs to be consistent.” This pseudo-justification of consistency would later play the central part in Republicans’ pseudo-opposition to the exemption of casinos.

The third and final amendment was offered by McKinley Bailey, a 28-year-old first-term Democrat, who for five years had been a paratrooper in the 82nd Airborne Division of the U.S. Army, leading a Tactical Signals Intelligence Intercept Team in more than 120 “combat missions” in Iraq and Afghanistan. Despite the fact that the Iowa Democratic Party had contributed more than $100,000 to his election campaign, Bailey’s increasingly prominent opposition

273 Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).
274 See below ch. 36.
275 Telephone interview with Chuck Soderberg, Le Mars (May 16, 2008). Soderberg tentatively confined his capacious self-interpretation to state (as opposed to county and city) grounds, but he was presumably confused: although his amendment did expressly refer to state employees’ private residences, “the grounds of public buildings” did and does refer indiscriminately to the state and its political subdivisions.
277 On three occasions in October 2006 the party contributed a total of $107,675. https://webapp.iecdb.iowa.gov/PublicView/statewide/2006/Period_Due_Date_19-Oct/Candidates/Bailey%20McKinley__1665__scanned.pdf; https://webapp.iecdb.iowa.gov/PublicView/statewide/2006/Period_Due_Date_Fri.%20preceding%20general/Candidates/Bailey%20McKinley__1665__scanned.pdf (visited Aug. 3, 2008). Bailey’s electoral importance derived from his having been one of five newly elected members who gave Democrats control of the House; in contrast, whether he voted with the party was of distinctly lesser importance since a bill would not even have been debated if Republicans had retained the majority; what counted was who set the agenda and who decided what got debated, and Republicans would not have debated any serious labor, environmental, or similar bills. Email from former House speaker who demanded anonymity to Marc Linder (Aug. 3, 2008).

Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 15, 2008). The House Majority Leader’s administrative assistant and legal counsel stated after the end of the session that there was party discipline and might be consequences for a legislator who voted against the party on final passage (such as the inability to get his bills passed). When asked in particular about Bailey, Brian Meyer replied: “You said it, I didn’t.” Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 12, 2008). On Bailey’s persistent advocacy of a pro-smoking agenda before the Administration Rules Review Committee in 2008 and during the 2009 legislative session, see below ch. 36.

278 Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 15, 2008). The House Majority Leader’s administrative assistant and legal counsel stated after the end of the session that there was party discipline and might be consequences for a legislator who voted against the party on final passage (such as the inability to get his bills passed). When asked in particular about Bailey, Brian Meyer replied: “You said it, I didn’t.” Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 12, 2008). On Bailey’s persistent advocacy of a pro-smoking agenda before the Administration Rules Review Committee in 2008 and during the 2009 legislative session, see below ch. 36.

279 House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Qw8W3ppSCDc&feature=related (House Commerce Committee approves smoking ban (part 2)) (visited July 5, 2008); [House] Committee Minutes for Commerce (Feb. 5, 2008), on http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/ga/minutes.pdf?minutesID=3602 (Amendment 202).

280 House Commerce Committee Meeting (Feb. 5, 2008), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=17sBjOF8p68 (visited July 6, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

amended without recommendation; all 13 Democrats, joined by three Republicans, supported the measure. On February 11, the bill, now H.F. 2212, was placed on the House debate calendar. Despite the startling victory that she had just achieved, Petersen was quick to admit that the bill “isn’t perfect,’ but...the exemptions were necessary to advance the plan... ‘I would ideally like no exemptions...but I plugged my nose and voted for it, because this will protect 99 percent of Iowa’s workforce.’” Nor did tacking on the exemptions guarantee passage, which the press immediately reported was “anything but assured,” in part because a legislative majority might instead plump for local control, which itself “could collapse under the weight of business interests.” Moreover, although Governor Culver had just promised in his Condition of the State Address that he would sign preemption repeal, the most that he would say at this point was that he “would have to consider signing off on a statewide ban...”

nevertheless still gave the bill a better than 50-50 chance of passage.\textsuperscript{284}

In contrast, the Iowa Tobacco Prevention Alliance (composed of the Heart-Lung-Cancer groups and CAFE Iowa CAN), while constrained to acknowledge that H.F. 2212 was an admirable bill, was nevertheless beset with the fear that the anti-smoking movement would wind up with a half a loaf. Indeed, so concerned was ITPA that it was prepared, if the bill was saddled with additional exemptions—such as ones for ventilated public places or time carve-outs for smoking during certain hours of the day—to ask the governor to veto it.\textsuperscript{285}

At the other end of the spectrum, Jonathan Van Roekel, president of the Clinton’s Organized Bar & Restaurant Association (COBRA)—which had been established in early 2006 to respond to City of Clinton ordinances governing bar licensure and under-21 exemptions\textsuperscript{286}—was busy disseminating the disinformation that “a high percentage of businesses in California failed after the smoking ban was enacted there.” The group presumably also believed that it was promoting its plan to secure 10,000 anti-smoking bill petition signatures from food and beverage employers, workers, and customers when it alleged that an exemption from the ban—which one member called “‘legal extortion’”—was being considered that would cost owners $1,700.\textsuperscript{287}

\textbf{The Debate over the Financial Impacts of Casino Smoking Bans in Delaware and Illinois}

The [Illinois] casinos are hoping that, armed with a couple of months of dismal \textsuperscript{285}Telephone interview with Threase Harms, CAFE lobbyist, Des Moines (May 14, 2008). Nevertheless, through its lobbyists CAFE declared for the bill on Feb. 13, as did the Iowa Hospital Association, Iowa Health Systems, and AFSCME Council 61; the American Cancer Society declared for it on Feb. 20 and, the American Lung Association on Feb. 27. \url{http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=DspReport&ga=82&type=b&hbill=HF2212}.

To be sure, Wise’s remarks about a potential gambling exceptionalism to the general rule that smoking bans did not reduce hospitality industry revenues were not per se wholly implausible, though the impact of the Smoke Free Illinois Act did not mark the first instance of such allegations, and had he focused on the Delaware Clean Indoor Air Act of 2002, he would have found that not only did that state survive the temporary loss of tax revenue, but the governor, after more than three years of experience with the ban, both praised the cleaner air as its greatest benefit and pointed out that the three slot machine casinos had recorded their highest revenues ever. But even if the issue were impermissibly narrowed to the financial impact on private firms to the exclusion of the health care costs linked to the morbidity and mortality caused by secondhand smoke exposure (in addition to the pain and suffering of those whose health is ruined and lives are prematurely terminated), separating out and measuring the contributions of the various possible causes of declining revenues coincident with the implementation of a casino smoking ban would be a complex empirical undertaking. Not the least of the difficulties to be encountered would be determining: (1) what proportion of pre-ban gamblers had been smokers; (2) what proportion of those smoking customers reacted to the ban by: (a) traveling across a border to a casino in another state that did not ban smoking; (b) traveling to an in-state tribal casino that did not ban smoking; (c) ceasing to frequent casinos; or (d) continuing to gamble at the now smoke-free casinos and taking smoking breaks, which resulted in spending less time and money gambling; and (3) how many nonsmokers who had previously avoided smoky casinos began gambling there once the smoke had cleared. In the cases of Illinois or Iowa even on the fundamental first variable of the pre-ban smoking prevalence reliable data were lacking.

---

290 “State gaming officials contend that unofficial surveys show as many as 60 percent to 70 percent of gamblers smoke in Illinois casinos. Smoking critics say the figures are fiction.” E. Torriero, “Smokeless Casinos Await Fate,” CT, Jan. 1, 2008 (1) (NewsBank). According to ICGA, the “Casino Queen in East St. Louis and Jumers’ Casino in Rock Island did informal surveys on their properties.” Email from Tom Swoik to Marc Linder (June 28, 2009). A Philip Morris memorandum from the latter half of the 1990s on casinos stated that about a third of customers were “assumed to be smokers,” which was above the national average but lower than the gaming industry’s “claim” of 50-90 percent, adding: “There is no primary survey data to support either claim.” “Situation Analysis:
At the Commerce Committee meeting on February 5 Wise did not divulge the Illinois casino revenue data for January 2008 on the exclusive basis of which he had pressed to exempt casinos from H.F. 2212, but during that first month of the Smoke Free Illinois Act, the adjusted gross revenue and total admission/wagering tax of Illinois riverboat casinos had declined by 17.5 percent and 18.2 percent, respectively, compared to January 2007.\textsuperscript{291} (For all of calendar year 2008, the declines were greater—20.9 percent and 32.0 percent, respectively.)\textsuperscript{292} The Illinois casinos attributed the drop to the smoking ban, which prompted “habitual smokers” to take smoking breaks during which they did not gamble. In contrast, the Illinois Gaming Board took the position, even after the fiscal year’s end, that the “relative importance” of that factor and of the decline in the Illinois and national economies had “not yet been quantified with certainty.”\textsuperscript{293}

Not until February 27—a week after the Iowa House debate, but just in time for the Senate floor debate on H.F. 2212—in a Fiscal Note requested by Democratic Senators Appel and Dotzler, did the Legislative Services Agency report that the Iowa Racing and Gaming Commission, based on data from other states, estimated that a smoking ban would reduce adjusted gross revenue by 10 percent, which LSA calculated as translating into a decrease in gambling losses of $140.5 million and of state gambling tax revenue of $31.7 million.\textsuperscript{294}

\textsuperscript{291}Calculated according to http://www.igb.state.il.us/revreports/january2008statreport.pdf; http://www.igb.state.il.us/revreports/january2007statreport.pdf (visited June 9, 2009).

\textsuperscript{292}Illinois Gaming Board, 2008 Annual Report 14, on http://www.igb.state.il.us/annualreport/2008igb.pdf (visited June 9, 2009). The declines in casino revenues to state and local governments in Illinois from fiscal year 2007 to 2008 and 2008 to 2009 (the smoking ban went into effect in the middle of FY 2008) were the highest among all 12 states with commercial casinos—14.7 and 23.8 percent, respectively; the second highest declines were recorded by Michigan from FY 2007 to 2008 (6.9 percent) and New Jersey from FY 2008 to 2009 (14.1 percent). Lucy Dadayan, “For the First Time, a Smaller Jackpot: Trends in State Revenues from Gambling,” tab. 7 at 14 (Rockefeller Institute of Government, Fiscal Studies, Sept. 21, 2009), on http://www.rockinst.org (visited Sept. 21, 2009).

\textsuperscript{294}Fiscal Services Division, Legislative Services Agency, Fiscal Note: HF 2212 as amended by S-5013) (Feb. 27, 2008). LSA’s estimate was based on the assumptions that 25 percent of the $140 million decrease “will be lost at other gambling facilities where smoking is not banned (such as Native American casinos)” and the other 75 percent “will be expended as any other dollar of personal income by Iowans.” Id. It is unclear how this assumption can be reconciled with IGA’s claim that “an estimated 65% of patrons come LSA did not open the black box sheltering IRGC’s methodology, but later Brian Ohorilko, the Commission’s director of gaming, did: “That estimate was made to the LSA based on discussions I had with other regulators in jurisdictions that had passed a smoking ban at that time (I believe Illinois, Colorado, Delaware, Michigan because of Windsor). If my memory serves me right, the request from the LSA was made around March or so. Illinois and Colorado were in the very early stages of their ban and had limited data. From the regulators that I had polled, they all felt the ban had a negative impact on revenue of about 5-15%. They all felt that the economic situation also led to some of the declines.” Asked whether the regulators in Illinois and the other states at that time had been “able to sort out and quantify the impact of the economic recession and the impact of the smoking ban,” Ohorilko succinctly replied: “No, that was and still is the mystery.... I don’t envy the researchers quantifying the impact.”

Indeed, in response to a question as to whether he would not have expected that, since the Illinois smoking ban had gone into effect on January 1, 2008, by mid-2009 smokers who had abandoned the Illinois casinos would have begun showing up in the Iowa casinos located along the Mississippi River, he observed: “Excellent question. I’m not sure anyone really knows how any of these factors affected the year over year comparisons. I have read many articles in various gaming markets around the country making valid points for each. My only point for the next year maybe being a better indicator is that you have construction finished in Dubuque in the second half of last fiscal year, maybe the economy will settle, you would have a full fiscal year of comparison for other factors like the flood and smoking ban since some of that impact (if any) would also be seen in the first part of the most recent fiscal year.”

If even a year and a half later IRGC itself was still skeptical of its own methodology and steeped in epistemological humility regarding human ability to discern, let alone untangle, the consequences of the Illinois smoking ban, the alleged financial justification for exempting Iowa casinos from a smoking ban alleged by owners and their legislative backers in early 2008 appears to have been a very thin reed.

Much greater detail about LSA’s Fiscal Note is available because Representative Wise, who was leading Democrats’ efforts to insure casinos’ exemption on the grounds that a bill could otherwise not be passed, himself

---

295 Email between Brian Ohorilko and Marc Linder (June 17, 2009).
296 Email between Marc Linder and Brian Ohorilko (June 18, 2009).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

requested from LSA in March “additional background regarding the economic impact assumptions used to complete” the Note. Jeff Robinson, senior legislative analyst at LSA, who informed Wise that in order to determine whether a smoking ban was “likely to reduce gambling activity” at casinos, LSA had reviewed two studies (regression analyses) that had analyzed the Delaware ban’s impact on casinos, “researched the early results of the Illinois smoking ban[,] and contacted” IRGC. Referring to the Delaware study by Mandel, Alamar, and Glantz—which concluded that that state’s Clean Indoor Air Act had had no negative economic impact on casino revenues, just as smoke-free laws “do not harm restaurants, bars, or bingo parlours”—Robinson noted that it instead attributed the decline in casino revenue to an economic downturn. Of the other study, by Michael Pakko, he stated that it concluded that Delaware’s anti-smoking law had resulted in a statistically significant 14.9 percent drop in revenue. In an email 15 months later attaching this memo and responding to a telephone request for essentially the same background information that Wise had requested, Robinson summarized the memo’s projection of a 10 percent reduction in casino revenues as originally IRGC’s estimate. He then added that based on his own analysis of the Delaware data, “I think a more reasonable estimate was the 14.9% cited by Pakko.... However, it did not seem that the

---

297 Jeff Robinson to Representative Phil Wise, Subject: Economic Impact Calculations for HF 2212 (Public Indoor Smoking Ban Bill) at 1-2 (Mar. 17, 2008) (email copy provided by Robinson).

299 Jeff Robinson to Representative Phil Wise, Subject: Economic Impact Calculations for HF 2212 (Public Indoor Smoking Ban Bill) at 1-2 (Mar. 17, 2008) (email copy provided by Robinson). Robinson failed to mention that the article stressed that one of the casino companies in Delaware had stated in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing that a decrease in its management fees from a Delaware racino had been “mainly caused by inclement weather.” L. Mandel, B. Lamar, and S. Glantz, “Smoke-Free Law Did Not Affect Revenue from Gaming in Delaware,” TC 14:10-12 at 10 (2005). Oddly, Robinson referred to HF 2212 as an indoor ban bill when in fact it applies to broad outdoor swaths.

301 Jeff Robinson to Representative Phil Wise, Subject: Economic Impact Calculations for HF 2212 (Public Indoor Smoking Ban Bill) at 2 (Mar. 17, 2008) (email copy provided by Robinson).
debate and decision making would be any different at 10% than at 14.9%, so the less inflammatory 10% was chosen. With the first year’s data for [the] Illinois casino smoking ban now in, I would likely use a number between 15% and 20% now."

Since Robinson seemed to be unaware that a major controversy had erupted between Glantz and Pakko and between pro- and anti-tobacco control forces over the interpretation of the Delaware data, he was asked to explain (as he had not in the memo) why he had adopted Pakko’s approach and (implicitly) rejected Glantz’s. Robinson’s initial response was as astonishingly ad hominem as it was based on ignorance of the homines involved, despite the fact he appended links to websites on their backgrounds: “Glantz is a medical doctor working for a cancer research organization. Pakko is an economist working for the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis.” Even if these bare facts were true, it is unclear why they would have prompted a legislative analyst to let them tip the scales in favor of Pakko’s analysis. Despite the fact that the website for Glantz, which did not reflect his phenomenal productivity or the fact that his prodigious scholarship and political engagement had contributed crucially to the creation of a smokefree world, made it unambiguously clear that Glantz was not a medical doctor (but had a Ph.D. in applied mechanics), even a quick look at his webpage (even though it was more than 10 years out of date) from one of the other departments (Cardiology) of which he is a member at the University of California at San Francisco would have revealed to Robinson that Glantz was in fact an expert on statistics, who not only taught biostatistics at the University of California, but had written a textbook on biostatistics, which had gone through many editions and been translated into many languages, and another specifically on regression analysis. Robinson also seemed unaware and/or unembarrassed that he had appended as the webpage for Pakko not that of his employer, the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, but rather that of the Show-Me Institute, a right-wing, free-market, anti-government, pro-business think 302 Email from Jeff Robinson to Marc Linder (June 18, 2009).

---

304 Email from Marc Linder to Jeff Robinson (June 19, 2009).
305 Email from Jeff Robinson to Marc Linder (June 19, 2009).
306 These remarks about Robinson are not meant to cast aspersion on him (especially since he very generously devoted considerable time to explaining his methods and reasoning), but rather to use this unusual opportunity to shed light on the empirical research basis of public policy formation in the Iowa legislature.
307 http://cancer.ucsf.edu/people/glantz_stanton.php
308 http://cardiology.ucsf.edu/people/glantnew.htm
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

tank—whose staff routinely testify against smoking bans ("Forced conformity...is fundamentally un-American")\(^{309}\) and propagandize against cigarette tax increases ("Saving lives is a worthy goal, but it should not come at the price of personal freedom")\(^{310}\)—of which Pakko was a research fellow.\(^{311}\) Pakko’s crude anti-government, market-knows-best ideological basis was unmistakably on display during an interview conducted by the Bank:

> The important thing to recognize here is that when you have a smoking ban imposed by a government authority, you’re changing the nature of the businesses in the community in such a way that they could have changed themselves. So...a bar or restaurant always has the option of prohibiting smoking to begin with. And presumably if that was profitable for them to do so, they would do so. So as a starting point...the market-based outcome of business owners selecting their smoking status gives us a baseline and an imposed smoking ban on top of that can’t make anything really better off but only worse off in terms of revenues. ...

> I don’t see it as a matter of rights. I don’t think that either smokers’ or non-smokers’ desire to smoke or be away from smoke really rise to the level of rights as enshrined in our Constitution or Bill of Rights for instance. What we’re really looking at are competing sets of preferences. And when you have conflict among preferences...the free-market system is probably the most efficient way of resolving those disputes.\(^{312}\)

Pakko’s penchant for trivializing the leading actual cause of death in the United States\(^{313}\) went to the extent of characterizing the “smoking environment” in restaurants as just one of many “amenities,” including the color of table cloths, with regard to which owners competed and level-playing-field statewide smoking bans inefficiently restricted entrepreneurial freedom.\(^{314}\)

Why this kind of analytic public policy framework should have commended Pakko’s analysis to Robinson he did not reveal, but he later observed that “more important to me” was the graph he had included in the memo indicating that gambling revenues in Delaware began falling the month the ban went into effect and continued to decline for one year: “I do not believe powerful statistical methods were necessary to illustrate the smoking ban impact in Delaware.”

\(^{311}\)http://www.showmeinstitute.org/scholar/id.49/scholar_detail.asp

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Asked whether the initial decline in revenue followed by a reversal and subsequent attainment of higher levels than before the ban might not have reflected a common scenario in the hospitality industry under which, after a brief rebellion, smokers returned and nonsmokers who had avoided smoky places began frequenting newly smokefree businesses, Robinson replied: “I can speculate but in no way prove, that by May 2005 [Delaware] would have had a higher AGR [adjusted gross revenue] level without the ban then [sic] they had with it.” He then added this crucial self-reflection for public policy making: “I do not hold out my analysis as cause-and-effect. My job requires me to make conclusions on imperfect knowledge and I do the best I can. However, I am more confident in this conclusion than many I have to draw.”

With regard to the impact of the Illinois casino smoking ban, Robinson informed Wise that although only two months of data were available, Illinois “appears at least initially to be following the path of Delaware” in the sense that of the five monthly decreases (compared to the previous year) in adjusted gross revenue recorded since June 2004, two had been January-February 2008, the first two months of the ban. (He failed to mention that one of those five months was December 2007, the month before the ban began, when AGR dropped by 5.8 percent). Oddly, although Robinson then went on to concede that “additional months are needed to determine if this trend is related to the smoking ban or is perhaps due to economic, weather, or other factors,” he nevertheless concluded that the “Delaware experience and the early results from Illinois indicate that a 315 Email from Jeff Robinson to Marc Linder (June 19, 2009); Jeff Robinson to Representative Phil Wise, Subject: Economic Impact Calculations for HF 2212 (Public Indoor Smoking Ban Bill) chart 1 at 2 (Mar. 17, 2008) (email copy provided by Robinson). It is noteworthy that one major component of Delaware racinos’ profitability, net proceeds per video lottery terminal, has been in steady decline for each of the state’s three racinos from 1998 to 2009. Graphs, based on official state agency data, constructed and made available by Lucy Dadayan (June 24, 2009); http://lottery.state.de.us/vdodata/modist.asp. According to one gambling industry consultant, the figure fell from $355.74 per day in 1998 to 200.50 in 2008. Email from Paul Girvan (The Innovation Group) to Marc Linder (June 24, 2009).

316 Email between Marc Linder and Jeff Robinson (June 19, 2009).

317 Jeff Robinson to Representative Phil Wise, Subject: Economic Impact Calculations for HF 2212 (Public Indoor Smoking Ban Bill) at 3 (Mar. 17, 2008) (email copy provided by Robinson).

318 Calculated according to http://www.igb.state.il.us/revreports/somewhat higher estimate [than the 10.0 percent decline in gambling tax revenue projected by IRGC] would also be reasonable." \[319\] Moreover, contrary to Robinson’s conjecture, the impact of the Illinois ban proved to take a different course inasmuch as 18 months after the ban had gone into effect revenues continued to decline, thus strongly suggesting that the deep nationwide economic recession was a vital causal factor. But in spite of agreeing that “the decline continued, most likely due in some part to the economy,” he nevertheless expressed the opinion that the January-December 2008 Illinois data “confirm[ ] the decision to accept the Pakko analysis instead of the Glantz analysis” and “also would support using an expected AGR reduction closer to 20% instead of the 10% we used.” \[320\] Indeed, looking back, he reflected that he “would reach similar conclusions” in mid-2009 even though in March 2008 he had completed the AGR analysis probably in only 48 hours or less. \[321\]

Robinson’s adherence to his original view of the Illinois ban, despite state legislators\[321\] and scholarly\[322\] findings that the economic recession and not the smoking ban had caused the revenue decline, was as striking as his insistence that that law, whose impact, unlike Delaware’s, was embedded in the deepest economic depression since World War II, nevertheless somehow supported Pakko’s regression analysis. Yet, and even in spite of his failure to explain why Pakko’s model was superior to and generated more robust results than Glantz’s, neither side has unambiguously refuted the other’s analysis, let alone proven its own. But regardless of the ultimate outcome of this empirical controversy, what Wise and the other anti-smoking Iowa (House) Democrats ignored was the possibility of choosing the Illinois alternative of prioritizing public health over private profit and government tax revenue even in the face of calls for repeal of the Smoke Free Illinois Act after the decline in casino revenues and taxes had ceased being a prediction and had become a fiscal reality—even to the extent of deeming such a drop an irrelevancy in the light of the public health gains for

\[319\] Jeff Robinson to Representative Phil Wise, Subject: Economic Impact Calculations for HF 2212 (Public Indoor Smoking Ban Bill) at 3, 4 (Mar. 17, 2008) (email copy provided by Robinson).

\[320\] Email from Jeff Robinson to Marc Linder (June 19, 2009).

\[321\] See below this ch.

\[322\] Email from Prof. Frank Chaloupka, University of Illinois at Chicago to Marc Linder (June 20 and June 23, 2009) (referring to his report to the Illinois Department of Public Health, which examined per capita gaming revenues measures and whose “preliminary estimates show a negative, but not statistically significant effect...of the policy, after accounting for the underlying economic conditions”).
employees and customers.\textsuperscript{323} As a newspaper editorial in Dubuque, a Mississippi River city whose casinos would allegedly benefit from the Illinois casino smoking ban, observed: “Even if there is some revenue shortfall immediately following a ban, repealing it is not a smart solution. Lawmakers would be foolish to sacrifice people’s health in an attempt to recover some lost revenue.”\textsuperscript{324}

\textbf{Counterpoint: The Smoke Free Illinois Act’s Unique Total Ban on Casino Smoking}

[In my discussions with national political consultants, it’s the general belief that what the gaming industry wants—the gaming industry gets. They rarely lose. So you might focus on Illinois’ lack of exemption as the unusual feature rather than Iowa’s granting of an exemption.]\textsuperscript{325}

We were smarter.\textsuperscript{326}

One difference in intensity between the Illinois and Iowa laws that expresses the Illinois legislature’s more resolute resistance to calls for exempting casinos can be found in the preambular findings. Whereas from the time of its introduction until enactment Petersen’s bill contained only a brief and perfunctory nod to secondhand smoke and public health (“The general assembly finds that environmental tobacco smoke causes and exacerbates disease in nonsmoking adults and children. These findings are sufficient to warrant measures that regulate smoking in public places, places of employment, and outdoor areas in order to protect the public health and the health of employees”), the Smoke Free Illinois Act—which was drafted in the fall of 2006 by American Lung Association official Kathy Drea and Democratic Senator John Cullerton and enacted as drafted without changes—featured three lengthy paragraphs spelling out: the kinds of diseases and number of deaths that secondhand smoke caused; the “massive and conclusive” scientific evidence supporting these claims; and the impossibility of eliminating exposure by separating smokers and nonsmokers or high rates of ventilation. Indeed, the legislature even cited the aforementioned ASHRAE position document for the proposition that “the only means of eliminating health risks associated with indoor exposure is to eliminate all smoking activity indoors.” And finally and most centrally relevant to the issue of casinos, the legislative findings explicitly declared—without, to be sure, having the power to legislate a self-fulfilling prophecy—that “smoke-free workplace policies do not have an adverse economic impact on the hospitality industry.”

\begin{quote}

\textsuperscript{325}Email from George Eichhorn (ex-Iowa state legislator and lawyer representing bar owners who challenged Smokefree Air Act’s constitutionality) to Marc Linder (June 15, 2009).

\textsuperscript{326}Telephone interview with Illinois State Senator Terry Link, Lake Bluff, IL (July 9, 2009) (jocularly answering question as to why the Illinois legislature included casinos in its smoking ban while Iowa’s did not).

In spite (or perhaps because) of the inclusion and retention of this much more rigorous grounding of state intervention in science in the Illinois bill and statute, passage of a total smoking ban in casinos was hardly frictionless or a foregone conclusion. In this respect the Chicago Tribune’s characterization of the votes on the Smoke Free Illinois Act (34-23 in the Senate on March 29, 2007 and 73-42 on May 1, 2007 in the House) as “shockingly lopsided” ignored a number of vital considerations. First, the casino industry opposed coverage very intensely, although the executive director of the Illinois Casino Gaming Association admitted that his organization and members had failed even to come close to securing a casino exemption in 2007, primarily because it would have been difficult to exempt casinos without conferring the same status on bars and restaurants. Secondly, Senator Terry Link, the chief sponsor of Senate Bill 500, which originally contained no exemption, together with the Lung Association floated a committee amendment to delay coverage of riverboat casinos for three 328Telephone interview with Kathy Drea, Springfield (June 16, 2009).

329Email from Kathy Drea to Marc Linder (June 20, 2009).
ID=SB&LegId=28191&SessionID=51&GA=95 (visited May 27, 2009).
332“Going Smoke-Free At Last,” CT, May 4, 2007 (28).
333Telephone interview with Tom Swoik, Springfield (June 9, 2009). Iowa’s passage of the Smokefree Air Act and its enforcement and judicial aftermath revealed those difficulties, at least with regard to bars. See below this ch. and ch. 36 years\textsuperscript{334} because they believed that at the time of the Senate Executive Committee meeting on March 23 the votes were otherwise lacking to pass the bill.\textsuperscript{335} Third, the committee recommended its adoption.\textsuperscript{336} Fourth, knowing that at that juncture he could count on only 27 votes in the 59-member Senate, Link asked all eight senators with casinos in their districts whether they would vote for S.B. 500 if it exempted casinos for three years, but all of them, believing that he was begging for their votes because he was unable to secure a majority without them, said no. Fifth, seeing that it did not add to the number of Yes votes, Link then withdrew the amendment.\textsuperscript{337} Sixth, ALA and the whole anti-smoking coalition would have ditched the bill had it wound up permanently exempting casinos (as the Iowa law did), in no small part because members had become personally acquainted with numerous casino employees with whose health plight, caused by intense and long-term exposure to secondhand smoke, they had come to sympathize strongly.\textsuperscript{338} And seventh, right up until the Senate voted it was unclear whether the bill would pass.\textsuperscript{339}

But even after the legislature had passed the bill, the Illinois Casino Gaming Association persisted in efforts to secure exemptions.\textsuperscript{340} Just three weeks after both chambers had passed S.B. 500, but two months before Governor Blagojevich approved it, Senator James Clayborne, who represented a district that included the riverboat casino town of East St. Louis—which he argued would be

\textsuperscript{334}Senate Amendment 1 to S.B. 500 (Mar. 23, 2007), on http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/fulltext.asp?DocName=09500SB0500sam001&GA=95&SessionId=51&DocTypeID=SB&LegID=28191&DocNum=500&GAID=9&Session=

\textsuperscript{335}Telephone interview with Kathy Drea, ALA, Springfield (June 16, 2009). The fact that Link was a very strong supporter of casinos had nothing to do with his proposing this temporary exemption. Id. According to Senator Link, the health organizations reluctantly went along with this proposal. Telephone interview with Terry Link, Lake Bluff, IL (July 9, 2009).

\textsuperscript{337}Telephone interview with Terry Link, Lake Bluff, IL (July 9, 2009).

\textsuperscript{338}Telephone interview with Kathy Drea, ALA, Springfield (June 16, 2009).

\textsuperscript{339}Telephone interview with Michael Grady, Springfield, director of public policy and government relations, American Cancer Society-Illinois Division (June 10, 2009); telephone interview with Bunny, Springfield, Senator Terry Link’s legislative aide (June 11, 2009).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

“financially cripple[d]” by the smoking ban, which would cause the city to lose 10 percent of its annual budget funding\(^{341}\)—filed an amendment to another bill providing that, if S.B. 500 became law, casinos would be exempt for five years.\(^{342}\) After the Senate Executive Committee passed the amendment by a vote of 9 to 4,\(^{343}\) the full Senate defeated it 26 to 31.\(^{344}\) Later in 2007, another bill (which was defeated in committee) would have exempted riverboat gambling operations for five years or until the state closest to the boat banned smoking in such facilities, whichever came first.\(^{345}\) Other amendments unsuccessfully sought to achieve the same objective.\(^{346}\)

Following these failed attempts, in 2008 the cigarette manufacturers, which had acted behind the scenes in 2007,\(^{347}\) openly announced their intentions. In February, for example, the Chicago Tribune reported that: “Tobacco companies \(^{341}\)Blackwell Thomas, “Panel Oks Plan to Exempt Casinos from Smoking Ban,” Q-CT, May 30, 2009, on http://www.qctimes.com (visited June 16, 2009). At the beginning of 2008, just as the ban went into effect, East St. Louis city officials stated that the Casino Queen provided $10.5 million annually to the general fund or about half of the city’s income. E. Torriero, “Smokeless Casinos Await Fate,” CT, Jan. 1, 2008 (1) (NewsBank). Senator Link noted that the city government of Rock Island was also heavily dependent on casino tax revenues. Telephone interview with Terry Link, Lake Bluff (July 9, 2009).

\(^{342}\)Amendment 5 to S.B. 890 (May 25, 2007), on http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/fulltext.asp?DocName=09500SB0890sam005&GA=95&SessionId=51&DocTypeId=S B&LegID=29022&DocNum=0890&GAID=9&Session=

\(^{345}\)H.B. 4184 (Nov. 28, 2007, by Republican Henry Ramey) http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/BillStatus.asp?DocNum=4184&GAID=9&DocTypeId=HB&LegId=34539&SessionID=51&GA=95. The bill would also have provided for a much broader set of exemptions for establishments (including bars less than 10 percent of whose revenue came from food, gambling operations, and adult entertainment venues) that had received a smoking license from the local liquor control commission. The House Environmental Health Committee defeated the bill on Mar. 4, 2008.

\(^{346}\)E.g., Amendment 2 to H.B. 2035 (Aug. 9, 2007, by Sen. Clayborne) http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/95/HB/09500HB2035sam002.htm. Ironically, when Sen. Hendon had to take this provision out in order to pass the bill, he characterized it as “encouraging people to not go across the border who have to have a cigarette while they lose their money.” State of Illinois, 95th General Assembly, Regular Session, Senate Transcript at 13 (Sept. 18, 2007), on http://www.ilga.gov/senate/transcripts/trans95/09500096.pdf

\(^{347}\)Telephone interview with Michael Grady, Springfield, director of public policy and government relations, American Cancer Society-Illinois Division (June 10, 2009).
are dumping thousands of dollars on lawmakers in a revved up effort to chip away at the new statewide smoking ban and ward off efforts to nearly double Illinois’ cigarette tax.” Alone in the four weeks preceding the February 5 primary election “two tobacco giants,” Altria (Philip Morris) and Reynolds American, Inc., contributed $83,000 to 30 legislators, exceeding the monthly pace that the industry had given in Illinois for at least a decade.

(348) In 2006, Altria/Philip Morris contributed $347,650 to Illinois political campaigns/party PACs, while R. J. Reynolds contributed $94,000, and four gambling firms contributed a total of almost a million dollars.)

Unlike his counterparts in Iowa—where, for example, in 2005-2006 tobacco companies contributed only $11,385 to candidates and party PACs, compared to $524,250 in Illinois—John O’Connell, an ex-legislator lobbying for Reynolds, consumption of whose commodities have led to millions of deaths over the decades, unashamedly declared: “‘We’ve been the whipping boy for a number of [legislative] sessions now...so we decided this year that we are going to participate in the process more heavily.’” He was unable to resist throwing in the industry’s mantra: “‘We are still a legal industry. And it is still a legal product.’” Arthur Turner, the Democrats’ House deputy majority leader, who had voted against S.B. 500 in 2007, was, with $14,000, the biggest recipient of tobacco industry money, and voted in 2008 to move along the smoking exemption bills (which House Speaker Michael Madigan, who took $10,000 from Altria, had already “vetted”), stated that “some members now will feel more ‘comfortable’ debating smoking exemptions” who had been “afraid to vote on these issues prior to the election.”

The most serious effort to exempt casinos took place in 2008, when Republican Senate Minority Leader Frank Watson filed an amendment to Senate Bill 2707, a so-called trailer bill, designed to deal with some problems that had arisen with the original Smoke Free Illinois Act. Senate Amendment 4 would

352 Telephone interview with Michael Grady, Springfield, director of public policy and government relations, American Cancer Society-Illinois Division (June 10, 2009).

353 State of Illinois, 95th General Assembly, Regular Session, Senate Transcript at 218-have exempted the portion of a riverboat where gambling operations were conducted for five years or until the neighboring state closest to the particular riverboat banned smoking in similar places, whichever occurred first.\textsuperscript{354} After the Senate Executive Committee had recommended adoption of Watson’s amendment,\textsuperscript{355} on April 16, 2008, not coincidentally the day after Governor Culver had signed Iowa’s Smokefree Air Act, the Illinois Senate debated the amendment, whose operation Watson explained with reference to the Iowa law’s exemption for casinos. Pointing to a chart, he charged that “if you look at...what happened when the smoking ban came on [three and a half months earlier], you’ll see a huge, huge impact on revenues to this State, to the point where they’re estimating it could have a fiscal impact of a hundred and fifty million dollars to the State in taxes from the casinos....” He admitted that gambling was in a downturn “all over the country, but not to the magnitude that we are here in Illinois.” His plea, “let’s be real here,” collided with his undocumented belief that “some sixty percent of the people who go to casinos actually smoke.”\textsuperscript{356}

In the battle of the dueling “beautiful charts,” Link’s rebuttal—he strongly insisted that it “is not the smoking ban”—was empirical: there had been a downturn on all the gambling boats in all of 2007 and in 2006 in many states, including Iowa: “It’s the economy. It’s the economy.”\textsuperscript{357} (In fact, from March 2007 to March 2008 Iowa casinos’ adjusted gross revenue rose from $122 million to $130 million, while state taxes increased from $25.2 to $26.1 million; a comparison of all of 2007 and 2008 reveals that total admissions fell from 23.4

\textsuperscript{354}Senate Amendment 4 to S.B. 2707 (Apr. 11, 2008), on http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/fulltext.asp?DocName=09500SB2707sam004&GA=95&SessionId=51&DocTypeId=SB&LegId=37167&DocNum=2707&GAID=9&Session=355

\textsuperscript{356}State of Illinois, 95th General Assembly, Regular Session, Senate Transcript at 219-21 (Apr. 16, 2008), on http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/fulltext.asp?DocName=09500SB2707sam003&GA=95&SessionId=51&DocTypeId=SB&LegId=37168&DocNum=2707&GAID=9&Session=357

\textsuperscript{357}State of Illinois, 95th General Assembly, Regular Session, Senate Transcript at 221 (Apr. 16, 2008), on http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/fulltext.asp?DocName=09500SB2707sam004&GA=95&SessionId=51&DocTypeId=SB&LegId=37167&DocNum=2707&GAID=9&Session=356

3343
to 22.9 million, while adjusted gross revenue rose 1.4 percent and state taxes 1.4 percent; nevertheless, many individual casinos recorded declines in the number of admissions, adjusted gross revenues, and state taxes, the difference in large part being accounted for by the opening of a new casino in Waterloo in mid-2007.)

Link went on to argue that if the smoking ban were the cause of the decline, “Iowa, Missouri should be record numbers, because everybody from Illinois that smokes should be over in those states. They’re not. They’re not going anywhere. They can’t afford the gas or anything to get to those states. It’s the economy. Wake up. It’s not the smoking ban.”

Announcing that in “one of those moments [of] bipartisan cooperation” he was going to vote with Minority Leader Watson, who was his “leader” (but not his “boss”) that night, Democratic Assistant Majority Leader Rickey Hendon taunted the majority caucus chair: “Sincerely, I believe that...if you’re in any gambling institution, if you lose your hundred or two hundred dollars, the least we should do, Senator Link, is let ‘em have a cigarette.” After characterizing Hendon’s bipartisan comments as “incredible,” Watson, while purporting to be merely “asking for...a level playing field...with...Iowa,” revealed that the casino exemption from the Smoke Free Illinois Act, which he had voted against in 2007, was just “the first step”; “I’d like to have not only the casinos, but the...veterans, American legions, VFWs, local bars—I would include anybody that I could...."

---

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

In the end, however, the Senate handily defeated Watson’s amendment by a vote of 15 to 35.

Even when confronted later in 2008 with a decline in state casino tax revenues exceeding $100 million, Link “said he doesn’t see lawmakers taking up exemption talk for casinos until other states show much higher takes from the boats.  He thinks surrounding states could make the argument moot by going smoke-free in casinos themselves.”

Discouraged by the failure to have secured any exemptions in 2008 or 2009, even the executive director of the Illinois Casino Gaming Association conceded that no-smoking was the wave of the future.

---

363 Ryan Keith, “Riverboat Revenue Dips by $121 Million,” State Journal-Register (Springfield), Oct. 1, 2008, on http://www.wickedlocal.com/il-springfield/state/x436986266/Riverboat-revenue-dips-by-121-million (visited June 13, 2009).  Less empirically Link was quoted as having said: “‘Have them look at the national figures, in every other state, of the decline of gaming. You can smoke in all of those states and they’re having a decline. So the economy changes, you will never prove to me that the smoking ban is the effect [sic] for the decline of revenue at the riverboats.’”

Less absolutely, Link later stated that his mind would never be changed unless and until the decline continued even after the recession was over.  Telephone interview with Terry Link, Lake Bluff (July 9, 2009).

364 Telephone interview with Tom Swoik, Springfield (June 9, 2009).  Ironically, Swoik’s Iowa counterpart, President Wes Ehrecke of the Iowa Gaming Association, after rejecting the claim that (casino) campaign contributions influenced decisions, added: “A 25 percent one-year drop in Illinois gaming revenue after smoking was banned in casinos might influence lawmakers.”

James Lynch, “Gaming’s Big Bucks Always Major Player,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Feb. 1, 2009 (7A) (NewsBank).  Purportedly in order to deal with the state budget deficit, in 2010, Chicago Democratic Representative André Thapedi introduced H.B. 1850 to amend the Smoke-Free Illinois Act to exempt designated segregated ventilated smoking rooms in gaming facilities.

http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/BillStatus.asp?DocNum=1850&GAID=10&DocTypeID=HB&SessionID=76&GA=96.  After the bill’s death, he refiled it as H.B. 171 on Jan. 18, 2011.  http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/billstatus.asp?DocNum=171&GAID=11&GA=97&DocTypeID=HB&LegID=54744&SessionID=84.  However, it was superseded by H.B. 1965, introduced by Chicago Democrat Daniel Burke, which proposed to amend the Smoke-Free Illinois Act by exempting gambling facilities if smoking was not prohibited in their counterparts in the nearest neighboring state.  The House passed it on March 29, 2011, by a vote of 62 to 52, and it was still pending in the Senate in May 2011.

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

After having heard a concise account of proponents’ stubborn support of the Illinois casino smoking ban despite the alleged fiscal impact, Iowa House Republican Mike May, who had voted for the Smokefree Air Act in 2008 while joining his party in attacking the Democrats for “hypocrisy” in exempting the casinos, laughingly replied: “I appreciate the consistency of Illinois politics.”

One possible explanation of the differing legislative approaches in Illinois and Iowa was the geographical spread: the much less populous state had 17 casinos in 14 cities, whereas the larger state had only nine casinos in eight cities. Nevertheless, quantitatively, in the 58-member Illinois Senate six of the eight senators with casinos in their districts (all of whom had rejected Link’s offer of a three-year casino exemption) ultimately voted against the bill, whereas Representative Wise did not point to proportionately more in the 100-member Iowa House when he stated that “[t]here were a number of legislators from communities like Davenport, Dubuque, Des Moines, Emmetsburg, Sioux City, and Council Bluffs who made it clear that they believed they were 365Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake, IA (July 2, 2009).

368Although Link stated that in the end only one of the eight senators (Koehler representing E. Peoria) who had turned down his offer voted for the bill, it appears that Noland (Elgin did as well). Senators Haine (Alton), Lausen (Aurora), Wilhelm (Joliet), Forby (Metropolis), and Jacobs (Rock Island) voted No. http://www.ilga.gov/senate/default.asp?GA=95; http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/votehistory/95/senate/09500SB0500_03292007_073000T.pdf. Noland (and Elgin state representative Ruth Munson, who also voted for the bill) both stated that casino lobbyists never contacted them and they had never been given any information about the possibility of lost tax revenues. Rob Phillips, ““Up in Smoke?” Daily Herald (Arlington Heights), May 7, 2007, on http://www.dailyherald.com/search/printstory.asp?id=309995 (visited July 9, 2009). Ironically, Link observed that after the bill had passed, the casinos were angry with the senators who had refused his compromise and thus deprived the casinos of the three-year exemption. Telephone interview with Terry Link, Lake Bluff (July 9, 2009). In the House, Jack McGuire, who represented Joliet, the only city with two casinos (whose government expected more than $35 million in tax revenue from them in 2007) and appears to have been the only other member who voted for the bill, told a similar story: “‘It’s strictly a health issue. I’m not trying to put anyone out of business,’” McGuire said, adding later that the casinos never contacted him with their concerns regarding the legislation.” “Some Cheers, Some Boos for State Smoking Ban” May 3, 2007, on http://smokefreeillinois.org/ media/050307_State4.pdf (visited July 10, 2009). For the House members and votes, see http://www.ilga.gov/house/default.asp?GA=95; http://www.ilga.gov/legislation/votehistory/95/house/09500SB0500_05012007_020000T.pdf.

3346
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

representing the economic interests of their communities when they supported the casino gaming floor exemption.

Another factor determining why state government officials in Iowa may have reacted more sensitively to a decline in casino business volume than their Illinois counterparts (if both actually believed that a smoking ban would or did reduce gambling revenue and tax revenue) was the extent to which state government tax revenues relied on this source. Of the 16 states in which commercial casinos/racinos (i.e., racetrack casinos) generated tax revenues in fiscal year 2008, Iowa ranked ninth with $326 million, while Illinois ranked fourth with $698 million (Nevada ranking first with $925 million). But if these amounts are set in relation to total state government taxes, Iowa ranked fifth (4.7 percent), while Illinois ranked eighth (2.2 percent)—a gap that had widened during the preceding several years as the Illinois share declined and the Iowa share rose.

Moreover, the real gap was even wider because more than 15 percent of casino tax revenues in Illinois went to local governments in 2008, whereas less than 8 percent of Iowa’s did. As a result, casino tax revenues going to the state government accounted for only 1.9 percent of total Illinois state government tax revenues, whereas the corresponding share in Iowa was 4.4 percent. In addition to being more than twice as high as Illinois’ share, Iowa’s gambling tax share of total state taxes was only slightly lower than the second (Indiana, 5.5 percent), third (Mississippi, 5.2 percent), and fourth (Louisiana, 4.9 percent) ranked states (Nevada, at 16.0 percent, far outdistancing all other states).

---

369 Email from Phil Wise to Marc Linder (July 9, 2009).
370 Total state government taxes for FY 2008 are taken from http://www.census.gov/govs/statetax/08staxrank.html; casino/racino tax revenues were taken from monthly state gaming regulatory agency data and made available (together with the share calculations) by Lucy Dadayan, senior policy analyst, Rockefeller Institute of Government.
371 Lucy Dadayan, senior policy analyst, Rockefeller Institute of Government, provided the data underlying the Illinois-Iowa comparison from the following sources: http://www.igb.state.il.us/revreports; http://www.state.ia.us/irgc; http://www.census.gov/govs/www/statetax.html.
372 Calculated according to http://www.igb.state.il.us/revreports; http://www.state.ia.us/irgc; http://www.census.gov/govs/www/statetax.html. Whereas the IGB data identify the total amounts going to state and local government, these totals have to be calculated from the IRGC data by deducting the sums for city tax, county tax, and county endowment fund. Iowa Racing and Gaming Commission, Annual Report 2008, at 20, 37, on http://www.state.ia.us/irgc. For FY 2008 these three entries totaled $25,476,805 for casinos and racinos; the sums going to the state totaled $300,645,725.
373 Total state government taxes for FY 2008 are taken from http://www.census.gov/govs/statetax/08staxrank.html; casino/racino tax revenues were taken from monthly state
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

However, again, if the considerably larger local shares of total taxes are taken into account, the proportion of Iowa’s state government tax accounted for by state gambling taxes exceeded that of Indiana, Mississippi, and Louisiana, placing Iowa second behind Nevada. Lucy Dadayan et al., “From a Bonanza to a Blue Chip? Gambling Revenue to the States” at 3 (June 19, 2008), on http://www.rockinst.org/pdf/government_finance/2008-06-19-from_bonanza_to_blue_chip_gambling_revenue_to_the_states.pdf. If these states were included, Iowa would rank eleventh in total casino/racino tax revenues and eighth in casino/racino tax revenues as a share of total state taxes. The shares for Delaware, West Virginia, and Rhode Island were 7.5, 8.8, and 11.0 percent, respectively. However, since the legislature in Rhode Island appropriates the tax revenue from the lottery that goes into the general fund among the states 39 cities and towns, Rhode Island arguably should not rank above Iowa, thus leaving Iowa fourth behind Nevada, West Virginia, and Delaware. http://www.rilot.com/faqs.asp (visited June 29, 2009); http://www.wvlottery.com/videlottery/profitsgreat.aspx. Their racino tax revenues are taken from http://lottery.state.de.us/vdodatas/modist2008.asp (visited June 15, 2009); http://www.americangaming.org/Industry/factsheets/statistics_detail.cfv?id=36 (visited May 28, 2009) (overstating the taxes by not distinguishing between state and local taxes). Iowa state taxes alone in FY 2008 totaled $300 million. http://www.iowa.gov/irgc/FYTD08.pdf (visited May 30, 2009). State lottery revenue has been ignored here because consumers’ betting activity takes place elsewhere.

Significantly, of the states that had totally banned smoking in casinos, only two, Colorado\(^{376}\) and Illinois, had casinos/racinos like Iowa’s.\(^{377}\) Colorado initially exempted licensed casinos\(^{378}\) “because of their unique constitutional and statutory status in Colorado, because casino gambling has only recently become legal in Colorado, because many of the towns in which casinos are located are dependent on the revenues casinos generate, because casinos face severe competition from Indian Reservation gaming and because Colorado derives direct economic benefit from its licensed casinos.”\(^{379}\) After the state had prevailed in a suit brought by bar owners and others attacking the exemption, inter alia, on equal protection grounds, the legislature repealed the exemption.\(^{380}\) In any event,
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Colorado’s casinos generated only $88 million in tax revenues in 2008 or a mere $18 per capita. Thus, Illinois was an outlier as the only state with large tax revenues from commercial casinos to ban smoking entirely. In Iowa’s other bordering states that enacted comprehensive statewide smoking bans that did not expressly exempt casinos either only unregulated and untaxed tribal casinos were present (Minnesota, Nebraska, and Wisconsin) or a much smaller commercial casino industry (South Dakota),381 which contributed relatively minimal amounts to state tax revenues.382

Asked in mid-2009 to explain why Illinois was uniquely resolute in enacting and retaining its complete smoking ban in casino, the bill’s chief House sponsor, Democrat Karen Yarbrough, responded:

Essentially, the surgeon general’s edict that “there is no safe level of second hand smoke” was the tipping point for us coupled with the city of Chicago’s ban a few years ago. It was decided, the timing was right. Legislators in both chambers are still committed to keeping the ban in tack [sic] with no exemptions in public places and casinos. You see we feel the lives of casino workers are just as important as all other workers in restaurants, bars etc. The political will is present in Illinois to keep all workers as safe as possible from the devastating effects of second hand smoke.383

The only factor Yarbrough mentioned that distinguished Illinois from Iowa was proximity of competition in other states where smoking is permitted. Given the lack of competitive options for casino gambling for the bulk of the population in Colorado, no significant reduction in gaming revenues is anticipated.” Colorado Legislative Council Staff Fiscal Note, State Final Fiscal Note: HB07-1269 (June 7, 2007), on http://www.leg.state.co.us/clics/clics2007a/csl.nsf/fsbillcont3/872129A50239DF3487257265008381D3?Open&file=HB1269_r1.pdf.

383Email from Karen Yarbrough to Marc Linder (June 15, 2009).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

that most of Illinois’ population had already begun to experience the public health protection secured by local anti-smoking ordinances before the Smoke Free Illinois Act was debated. This experience may indeed have contributed to the legislative majority’s determination to include the nonsmokers among the casinos’ 7,711 employees and 14.64 million annual visitors384 within the class of public place protectees. And the health benefits flowing from local control were not the only dimension shaping mobilization of public support for a statewide law: the very process of having struggled for 16 years (from 1989 to 2005) to achieve repeal of preemption created considerable momentum toward passage of the comprehensive anti-smoking bill in 2007. Further stimulation arose out of 60 local coalitions that formed in 2005-2006 to press for—and that actually achieved 36—local anti-smoking ordinances in 2006;385 of special and not merely symbolic importance was the adoption of the Springfield Clean Indoor Air Ordinance of 2006 on January 17, 2006,386 by virtue of giving legislators in the state capital first-hand acquaintance with and understanding of smoke-free public places.

This broad-based wave of local enactments surprised even one of the key architects of the entire smoke-free movement in Illinois, Kathy Drea, who had worked for the American Lung Association since 1997 and became its public policy director in Illinois as well as vice president of advocacy for the entire Midwest. She and others in the movement had expected that initially perhaps only one or two cities would adopt ordinances. The unanticipatedly rapid proliferation of ordinances produced the side effect of motivating mayors and other local officials to pass the buck to the state, thus generating additional pressure for passage of statewide regulation, which was reinforced as it converged with deep grass roots support.387

To the extent that the exercise of pre-existing local control powers had been a key factor in crystallizing the requisite “political will” in Illinois to cover casinos and retain local control,388 the defeated advocates of preemption repeal 385Telephone interview with Kathy Drea, Springfield (June 16, 2009).

387Telephone interview with Kathy Drea, Springfield (June 16, 2009).
388Section 65 of the Smoke Free Illinois Act provides: “(a) Any home rule unit of local government, any non-home rule municipality, or any non-home rule county within the unincorporated territory of the county may regulate smoking in public places, but that regulation must be no less restrictive than this Act. This subsection (a) is a limitation on the concurrent exercise of home rule power under subsection (i) of Section 6 of Article über alles in Iowa could have said—though they prudently refrained from saying—of the process and outcome in Iowa: ‘We told you so.’ But an answer to the counterfactual historical question as to whether Iowa’s Smokefree Air Act would have covered casinos (and, for example, 10 or 50-foot distances outside public places) if the legislature in 2008 had expressly written local control into the new law would require an assessment not only of the probabilities of how many years it would have taken for a critical mass of larger (and smaller) cities to adopt rigorous ordinances, but also of whether the ongoing harm inflicted in the interim on the large majority of Iowans who would have continued to be unprotected by the feckless statewide clean indoor air law would have outweighed the marginal benefits that would have been generated by a somewhat more stringent Smokefree Air Act some or many years in the future.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

VII of the Illinois Constitution. (b) In addition to any regulation authorized under subsection (a) or authorized under home rule powers, any home rule unit of local government, any non-home rule municipality, or any non-home rule county within the unincorporated territory of the county may regulate smoking in any enclosed indoor area used by the public or serving as a place of work if the area does not fall within the definition of a ‘public place’ under this Act.”

Ironically, the press may have misled some people to comply with (or, alternatively, to believe that they were violating) the law by falsely reporting that “[t]he law prohibits smoking within 10 feet of an establishment....” Katie Hanson, “No Smoke, No Sweat As Ban Looms,” DI, June 30, 2008 (1:2-6, at 3:3). See also Brian Morelli, “Bars’ Longtime Patrons Fret Life After Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, June 28, 2008, on http://www.press-citizen.com (stating that a bar customer “will have to walk at least 10 feet away from the building if he wants a smoke”).

The counterfactual question could also be formulated differently: would city councils, had SAA conferred local control on them from which casinos would not have been exempt, have, for example, passed ordinances banning smoking in casinos? Apart from the fact, as mentioned above, that Democratic sponsors of H.F. 2212 had informed anti-smoking groups that a preemption repeal bill could have been passed only with the same exemptions as the statewide bill, to an optimistic Ehrecke it seemed improbable that many city councils would have risked jeopardizing, for example, the millions of dollars in grants that the casinos gave to local organizations and projects. Casinos are required by Iowa Code § 99F.6(4)(a) (2008) to “distribute at least three percent of the adjusted gross receipts for each license year for educational, civic, public, charitable, patriotic, or religious uses” and make additional non-statutorily required donations amounting to millions of dollars annually. http://www.iowagaming.org/our_members/license_holders.aspx (visited June 16, 2009); telephone interview with Wes Ehrecke, Des Moines, president, IGA and email from Wes Ehrecke to Marc Linder attaching 2008 economic impact statement indicating $35 million in charitable contributions of the former and $10 million of the latter category (June 16, 2009). In addition, Polk County, which owned
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The Run-Up to the House Floor Debate: Amendments to H.F. 2212

The no-smoking movement is a locomotive barreling down a hill. Sophisticated, progressive cities—New York, Chicago, Paris—have set the tone. The rest are sure to follow.

I doubt the no-smoking surge needs a push from the [Iowa] Legislature, but it’s about to get one. 391

Today, the danger of secondhand smoke is so well understood that it’s baffling Iowa still is debating whether to pass a statewide ban. 392

The Commerce Committee’s action on H.S.B. 537 prompted two other committees to put narrower bills on hold. 393 The very next day, February 6, the day after the press had reported that “opponents and advocates alike say there would be little need for House File 2067 if the statewide smoking ban were approved,” 394 the House Human Resources Committee’s chairperson announced that it would defer on Foege’s preemption repeal bill. 395 And the same day the Education Committee suspended discussion of H.F. 754, the 2007 bill that prohibited all tobacco use in and about schools. Which way legislative winds were blowing in the House was forecast by Majority Leader McCarthy, who Prairie Meadows Racetrack and Casino, was due to receive in 2009 $28.4 million in rent and profit sharing, while Des Moines, Altoona, and Polk County schools and charities were to receive $11 million. Dan Johnson, “Prairie Meadows Explores Second Polk County Casino,” DMR, Aug. 8, 2009, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com. Nevertheless, even in the wake of the passage of H.F. 2212, the Sioux City city council did express interest in such an ordinance. See above this ch.

392 “For Health’s Sake, Enact Smoking Ban,” DMR, Feb. 16, 2008 (14A) (NewsBank) (edit.).

393 Without explaining the basis of its judgment, IDPH skeptically stated that the bills “were supposedly put on hold to see how HSB 537 fares. It’s uncertain whether HSB 537 has the necessary votes to pass the full house.” IDPH Legislative Update (Feb. 11, 2008), on http://www.idph.state.ia.us/adper/common/pdf/legis/archive/2008/080211_update.pdf (visited July 5, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

judged that H.S.B. 537 was “the most likely to pass.”

That judgment was apparently not yet shared in the Senate, where, as a seeming last hurrah of local control, on the same day that the House Commerce Committee passed the statewide ban bill, 20 of the 30 Senate Democrats, led by Joe Bolkcom and other leading anti-smokers, filed S.F. 2096, which was virtually identical to H.S.B. 565; the Local Government Committee assigned it to a subcommittee, which became its final resting place. That same day saw nine of the same senators file another bill that was identical to H.S.B. 565, which also got no further than a State Government Committee subcommittee.

Even after H.S.B. 537 had passed the Commerce Committee, “key legislative observers and advocates” were still reported in the press to be expecting that a local control bill had “the best chance of becoming Iowa law.” The best that Kerry Wise, an American Lung Association spokesperson, could say for a strong statewide ban was that the group supported it if it restored local control, but ALA continued to favor a local control bill without exemptions, which it still deemed to have a “‘strong chance” of passing. Its strategy remained the proliferation of exemptionless local ordinances, which it would use “to collectively springboard [to] a statewide ban later.” In contrast, Iowa Restaurant Association President Doni DeNucci may not have claimed to know which bill would pass, but she did predict that “whatever emerges from Iowa lawmakers won’t be good for her 600 members and the 5,000 restaurants and bars in Iowa the association represents. ‘With the Democrats in the majority, we’re going to lose.’”

Finally, during the Democratic legislative leadership’s weekly news conference on February 7, House Majority Leader McCarthy publicly and definitively announced the new direction. Speaking of the statewide smoking ban’s having been moved out of the Commerce Committee, he remarked: “If we have the votes—and we’ll be working on that over the weekend and the first part of next week—that will be something we would try to bring up and pass in the full House....” Asked where the measure was heading, McCarthy, after calling the bill “the biggest single thing” the legislature could do for public health in Iowa, pointed out that there were “two camps in our caucus”: whereas members pushing for local control “seemed to have more momentum a couple of months ago,”

397S.F. 2096 (by Bolkcom et al.), Senate Journal 2008, at 1:169, 202 (Feb. 5 and 7).
those supporting a statewide ban “seemed to have less votes.” Now, however: “For a whole variety of reasons since the session started the statewide trend if you will has picked up a lot of support, a lot of votes.” Without revealing what any of those reasons might be, he added that, from a public health perspective, the statewide ban, even though it was not perfect because of the casino exemption, would be much better than local control—which would make less sense for business by creating competitive disadvantages for firms in adjacent localities—by virtue of covering thousands more establishments.\footnote{Statehouse Democrats Discuss Smoking, Road Use Funds, Weekly News Conference (Feb. 7, 2008), on http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=x6MxE_u4uE (visited July 8, 2008).} (Minority Leader Rants was all alone in rejecting the premise that the momentum had shifted from local control to a statewide ban in 2008: proceeding from the historically correct statement that Democrats had had trouble passing preemption repeal in 2007 because of its untoward balkanizing effects, he indulged in the wholly undocumented speculative contention that McCarthy and the Democrats had always had in mind to pass a statewide ban in 2008, but that they had prepared it in secret as a tactical surprise.)\footnote{Telephone interview with Christopher Rants, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).} Finally, in response to a question about Rants’s claim that the casino exemption would send people from bars to casinos to smoke,\footnote{Rants had asserted that the bill “‘makes a real clear point that if Iowans want to go out and have a drink and a smoke, you can’t go [to] your neighborhood bar anymore.... You’re going to have to go to a casino.’” O. Kay Henderson, “House Could Vote on Smoking Ban This Week,” Radio Iowa, Feb. 11, 2008, on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited May 12, 2008).} McCarthy insisted that it was a “red herring” because people went to casinos to gamble, not to smoke.\footnote{Charlotte Eby, “House Could Debate Smoking Ban Proposal This Week,” MCG-G, Feb. 10, 2008, on http://www.globegazette.com (visited May 12, 2008).} Gronstal was somewhat more circumspect in stating that the Senate would probably also take a look at a statewide ban too, but at the same time he made it clear that “[e]verybody needs to know, this is headed towards a smoke-free society.”\footnote{William Petroski, “Culver Supports Local Control on Smoking Bans, Endorses Boswell,” DMR, Feb. 9, 2008 (8B) (NewsBank).} In contrast, at this point the governor remained non-committal, stating only that he would take a look at a statewide ban.\footnote{As to why the momentum had shifted rather suddenly from local control to...}
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

a statewide ban,\textsuperscript{406} the pithiest answer came from Representative Wise: “Because we could” (pass a statewide bill), by which he meant that “we” anti-smoking militants had “always wanted to” and were now finally able to do so. Wise attributed his and other legislative advocates’ ability to convince leadership to support H.F. 2212 and thus to remove the stumbling block—which for years had been Republicans’ control of the legislature—to their knowledge, thanks to polling data, that the people were “out ahead” on this issue.\textsuperscript{407} Apart from this transformation in underlying public health, social, and cultural attitudes, Representative Tyler Olson later pointed to another crucial change that facilitated the different legislative approach when he observed that in many long meetings he and other Democratic legislators had explained to the Lung, Heart, and Cancer organizations, which had been very skeptical of a statewide ban, that even if a local control bill passed, the requisite majority could be mobilized only if such a measure, too, were weighed down with some of the same exemptions. Indeed, the advent of the casino exemption had led to a decline in opposition to passage of a statewide ban.\textsuperscript{408} In the end, then, anti-smoking groups relented on their rigid adherence to local control in part because their closest legislative allies had made it clear to them that precisely the open-endedness of the local processes and \textsuperscript{406} Sen. Matt McCoy rejected the premise of suddenness: he argued that the “tipping point” had already emerged in 2007 when the legislature increased the cigarette tax by one dollar. Telephone interview with Matt McCoy, Des Moines (May 8, 2008). To be sure, this perspective fails to explain why the House, after voting for that increase, was unable to pass even the Senate’s local control bill. See above ch. 34. Of the scores of legislators and lobbyists who were asked why the momentum shifted—the vast majority of whom spontaneously responded with some variant of “That’s a very good question” or “Yes, that is the question”—only Majority Leader Gronstal, repeating the word “Why?” seemed put off, nonplussed, or exasperated by the question, as if it made no sense. Didactically, he observed that when a shift took place in a legislature, there was usually not just a single reason. Since Gronstal, as mentioned in ch. 34, judged that there had been almost enough votes to pass a statewide bill in the Senate in 2007, he, like some other senators, believed that the overridingly important change that occurred in 2008 was that the consensus in the House had shifted from local control to statewide ban, for which shift he credited his counterpart McCarthy with the greatest responsibility. Telephone interview with Michael Gronstal, Council Bluffs (May 17, 2008).

\textsuperscript{407} Telephone interview with Philip Wise, Keokuk (May 18, 2008).

\textsuperscript{408} Telephone interview with Tyler Olson, Des Moines (Apr. 15, 2008). Assistant Minority Leader Doug Struyk offered a somewhat different appraisal: whereas the House had long favored a statewide ban because of the business-unfriendly balkanizing impact of local control, the crucial shift in momentum in 2008 originated in the Senate when it finally let go of local control. Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

outcomes that they had praised as the great virtues of that approach would be undercut by the centralized statehouse lobbying power of the same tobacco industry forces that the health groups had intended to circumvent in hundreds of city councils, but that would have to be overcome in order to pass a preemption repeal bill.\textsuperscript{409}

Three days after the House Commerce Committee’s action, Principal’s chairman and CEO urged each Iowa Business Council board member to support the bill when it was considered by the House the following week. In a state that was experiencing a labor shortage, Barry Griswell viewed a public smoking ban as “help[ing] employers recruit and retain talent” by virtue of its enhancing Iowa’s “image as a progressive place to do business, live and work” and its quality of life.\textsuperscript{410} Because the legislature had still not resolved the question of whether local control or a statewide ban was the superior approach, he took special pains to lay out four reasons for Principal’s clear preference for statewide action (the last of which might be especially persuasive to some employers):

\begin{itemize}
  \item It impacts all employers and customers in a uniform fashion.
  \item It will promote the entire state as a smoke free environment.
  \item It provides more efficient and effective means for public awareness and enforcement.
  \item It will enable some business owners to implement a restriction that may be unpopular for a few individuals.\textsuperscript{411}
\end{itemize}

By February 12, the nature of the amendments with which Republicans were intending to burden the bill became somewhat clearer. Rants revealed that they would exempt bars (which needed to be protected from exempt casinos to which smokers would otherwise flock) and family farm corporations and scale back the 50-foot no-smoking perimeter around public places in which smoking was prohibited. In particular the casino exemption he labeled as “‘terribly hypocritical.’” An—as events would soon prove—overconfident Majority Leader McCarthy variously predicted that these amendments would be “dead on arrival” and that they “will almost certainly never see the light of day.” His misplaced optimism rested on his judgment that since he had not had trouble mobilizing support for the bill, these new exemptions, “which would theoretically make the \textsuperscript{409}The American Heart Association’s lobbyist did not recall ever having heard that message from legislators. Telephone interview with Randy Yontz, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

\textsuperscript{410}Barry [Griswell] to Each Iowa Business Council Board Member (Feb. 8, 2008) (copy furnished by Merle Pederson).

\textsuperscript{411}Barry [Griswell] to Each Iowa Business Council Board Member (Feb. 8, 2008) (copy furnished by Merle Pederson).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

On February 12, 13, and 14, largely Republican representatives filed a total of 15 amendments, some of them rather radical and consequential. The first amendment, filed by insurance agent Lance Horbach and five other Republicans, would have exempted all agricultural real property and any structures located on it (and was voted on and defeated). They were especially incensed that, whereas the bill exempted casinos and thus exposed thousands of employees to secondhand smoke, it “took a slap at farmers” by prohibiting them from smoking in their own combines and tractors if they also had an employee who used them. Although Horbach admitted that enforcement would be difficult on farms and that it was unlikely that farmers would be fined for smoking inside tractor cabs, he feared that the law “could be unfairly used by disgruntled employees or family members who are out for revenge.” For his part, floor manager Tyler Olson agreed that in some instances it might be unlawful for farmers to permit their employees to smoke in a farm vehicle.

Much more damaging to the core purposes of the bill was the amendment filed by assistant minority leader and former Democrat Doug Struyk and five of his new party-mates that proposed to strike all exemptions except for that for private residences, replacing them with one for all “[p]ublic places, places of employment, and outdoor areas to which only individuals twenty-one years of age and older are invited and allowed entrance.” In an effort to understand the motivation underlying this proposal (which was placed out of order) a student of the bill directed the following provocative question to the amendment’s 413 The only amendment that would have expanded coverage proposed to prohibit smoking in any motor vehicle in the presence of anyone under 18, but its sole sponsor withdrew it before it was considered. H-8018 (filed Feb. 13, 2008, by Lukan); House Journal 2008, at 1:325 (Feb. 19, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

sponsors:

How does exempting bars where people only 21 and older are allowed effectuate the purpose of the Smokefree Air Act to “improve the health of Iowans”? Whose interests are you advancing? Clearly you cannot be advancing the interests of Iowans.

I dare you to spend an evening in a local establishment and not change your clothes for 24 hours. The lingering smoke on your shirt is the same crap that now remains on your lungs. Unfortunately, you cannot run your lungs through the washing machine.419

In defense of his exemption, 24-year-old Representative Matt Windschitl, a Union Pacific Railroad conductor, gunsmith, U.S. Marine Reserves member, and Iraq war veteran from western Iowa,420 evaded the overriding public health question altogether:

I am not advocating for any particular establishment in general, but for the freedoms and the rights of all Iowans. I believe it is a choice and a right to smoke or not, as it is also a choice and a right to frequent an establishment that allows smoking or not.

I believe it should be up to the individual business owner to make the choice of going smoke free. I believe it is wrong for the legislature to have an exemption for casinos and not for individual establishments that cater to the same age range of Iowans. ...

I believe I am advocating for every Iowan who cherishes their individual freedoms to govern their own personal lives.421

Representative Mike May, a resort owner and retired teacher, bluntly disclosed that he was seeking to hold hostage bar workers’ health: “I will gladly withdraw this amendment if the majority party will pull the exception for casinos.” Wholly ignoring the fact that his Republican party had for years succeeded in refusing to permit the consideration, let alone the passage, of any anti-public smoking measure, May instead accused Democrats of viewing the question as being about state revenue to which they were sacrificing the casino workers’ health.422

Republican tire repair technician Steven Lukan filed four amendments, two of which proposed to add exemptions for business owners’ private offices (H-8019) and bingo facilities (H-8020) (and were both defeated). Instead of

---

Email from Amanda Stahle to Doug Struyk et al (Feb. 18, 2008) (forwarded to Marc Linder (May 12, 2008)).

Email from Matt Windschitl to Amanda Stahle (Feb. 18, 2008) (forwarded to Marc Linder (May 12, 2008)).

Email from Mike May to Amanda Stahle (Feb. 19, 2008) (forwarded to Marc Linder (May 12, 2008)).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

responding to a question as to whether it was not likely that customers and employees would meet with employers in the latter’s offices and how such exposure to tobacco smoke would effectuate the bill’s purpose of improving Iowans’ health, the day before the House debate Lukan evasively stated to a researcher that “we should...respect the rights of business owners in Iowa to do as they wish on the property they own.”

Lukan himself withdrew the other two amendments, one of which would have reduced by one percentage point every year the percentage of actual value at which commercial property was assessed that was subject to SAA (H-8021); surprisingly, his other (quickly withdrawn) amendment proposed an innovation in tobacco control that was just beginning to be enacted in various states and cities—prohibiting smoking in motor vehicles in the presence of anyone under 18 (H-8018). Lukan had been motivated to file this last amendment, which he believed that Petersen and others had failed to include in the bill because it was modeled after comprehensive state laws that also lacked it, by his belief that children had no choice about being in the back seat of a car in which adults were smoking. He withdrew the amendment after coalitions trying to get rid of the casino exemption and to secure adoption of the 21-and-over amendment had approached him about dropping it because its adoption—which its hard-to-oppose protection of children made not unlikely—would have made it more difficult to “take down the bill” and rewrite it.

Libby Jacobs, who worked for Principal Financial Group, filed an amendment that struck various 20- and 50-foot no-smoking zones (but H-8022 was placed out of order after Tyler Olson’s similar amendment had been adopted). The radical amendment (H-8023) filed by Scott Raecker, who had a history of showing some support for anti-tobacco measures, was presumably designed to test Democrats’ bona fides by striking all exemptions (including that for casinos) except for private residences not being used as a child care facility, but it too was placed out of order.

The amendment that arguably proved to be the most contentious was filed by two zealous opponents of smoking regulation, Republicans Struyk and Cecil Dolecheck, joined by Democrat Brian Quirk. H-8024 conferred an exemption on 423 Email from Amanda Stahle to Steven Lukan and from Steven Lukan to Amanda Stahle (Feb. 18, 2008) (forwarded to Marc Linder (May 12, 2008)).

---

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

restaurants and bars at a specified time during which only people 18 or older were admitted, so long as that time was a regular, single, consecutive period of time and was conspicuously posted at entrances. The involvement of Quirk, who had fought in the U.S. Army in Panama and Iraq, been an American Legion post commander, was a lifetime member of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and was one of about six so-called six-pack blue-dog Democrats, who thwarted much of their party’s labor agenda in 2008, is worth considering. Quirk—95 percent of whose northeast Iowa constituents who had contacted him opposed the bill (and 80 percent of those did not even smoke)—had voted for the bill in the Commerce Committee after chairperson Janet Petersen had explained to him that he could raise his objections to the bill later, but when he did, she allegedly told him that she no longer needed his vote. He joined forces with Struyk and Dolecheck because he feared that the bill’s restrictions would bring about a vast reduction in bar revenues and “camaraderie.” In order to avoid such outcomes, he proposed various measures to Olson and Petersen, such as permitting smoking in private clubs and reverse local control under which localities could opt out of the law, but when they dismissed the proposals, he never filed such amendments. Interestingly, however, in spite of his ardent opposition to the bill (which he voted against on final passage), Quirk spontaneously acknowledged that the ban would eventually be perceived as a good thing because “it’s something that’s right,” and that as a nonsmoker he personally liked to go to no-smoking places. In the end, his criticism boiled down to the ban’s precipitate introduction: if only it had been phased in over time and/or through local control, he would, he asseverated, have supported it.

An even more radical amendment was filed by Republican Kraig Paulsen, a lawyer and former member of the U.S. Air Force, who felt that smoking 430 Email from a lobbyist who requested anonymity to Marc Linder (Aug. 13, 2008). The others were McKinley Bailey, Swati Dandekar, Geri Huser, Doris Kelley, and Dolores Mertz. On final passage on April 8 only Dandekar and Kelley voted for H.F. 2212.

431 Telephone interview with Brian Quirk, New Hampton (Aug. 13, 2008). Quirk asserted that during the first month or so of the new law’s operation in his district business had declined 80 percent and many bars had gone out of business, while bars that had gone no-smoking before the law went into effect had experienced no increase in business. He also claimed that employers were losing one to two hours of productivity a day as employees who drove trucks and other company vehicles had to stop and get out in order to smoke instead of smoking while driving.

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

policies were a “business matter.” H-8025 would have struck the entire bill and in its stead merely amended the existing statute to prohibit smoking in all restaurants. A much narrower but, in context, bill-killing amendment (H-8026) was filed by Carmine Boal, who would purport until the end of the session to support the bill if only the casino exemption were removed.

Floor manager Tyler Olson himself filed a bipartisan consensus amendment weakening his bill in one very important and another more marginal respect: H-8027 reduced four 20- and 50-foot outdoor no-smoking zones to only 10 feet and also excluded the Iowa Veterans Home in Marshalltown from coverage. The exclusion of the IVH was the work of Marshalltown Democrat Mark Smith, who lobbied Majority Leader McCarthy and Olson (the latter being much more hesitant). The principal basis for his support was the fact that many of the veterans had become addicted while serving their country, whose government had plied them with free or subsidized cigarettes. Yet uniquely perhaps among the legislature’s numerous advocates of exclusions, Smith “felt conflicted” about having pressed for it and troubled by having enabled this smoking; indeed, even after the law was in effect he continued to have “angst” about it daily and was audibly disconcerted when asked whether he would have voted for the exemption had he represented another district.

Another bill killer was filed by Linda Upmeyer, an assistant minority leader and cardiology nurse practitioner, whose position that the whole question of the smoking ban had more to do with property rights than health she herself recognized was “a little incongruous” for a cardiology nurse practitioner and one with which the physicians in her clinic sharply disagreed—but surely no less incongruous than being a “closet smoker.” Upmeyer’s amendment H-8033 (later ruled non-germane) would have struck the entire bill, replacing it with an annual $1,000 smoke-free establishment tax credit—“almost,” as she put it, “a 434 In contrast, co-sponsor May did actually vote for the bill on final passage.

---

435 Telephone interview with Mark Smith, Marshalltown (Aug. 21, 2008).
438 Telephone interview with Rep. Mark Smith, Marshalltown (Aug. 21, 2008). Upmeyer’s very gravelly voice was strongly suggestive of long years of smoking.
random number."  Asked the day before the bill was debated why she favored such a tax credit instead of prohibiting smoking in all public places and whether she had data showing that restaurant owners lost $1,000 a year when they banned smoking, Upmeyer evasively stated that the “incredibly hypocritical” bill wildly exaggerated the effect of the casino exemption as leaving “nearly 30,000 employees unprotected. So is this for health? The exemption is just about the economic impact.” Unknown is the economic impact of the $5,000 campaign contribution that Upmeyer received a few months later from the PAC of a company that owned two casinos.

Finally, Struyk filed two more killer amendments. H-8035, which Tyler Olson described as the cigarette companies’ chief amendment, provided that if any provision of the bill or the application of the bill to any persons or circumstances were ever held invalid, the entire law would be invalidated. H-8036 (which was placed out of order) would have struck all the exemptions (except that for private residences), replacing them with a radically more extensive exemption for all covered public places, places of employment, and other areas in which smoking was prohibited if they used “equipment consistent with the standards established by the American society of heating, refrigerating and air-conditioning engineers, a combination high-efficiency particulate air filtration, charcoal activated carbon and ultraviolet light filtration system, or other filtration system, any of which exchanges the air at least ten times per hour.” Struyk’s amendment did not point out that less than two years earlier the Surgeon General’s report on The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke had concluded that “[e]xposures of nonsmokers to secondhand smoke cannot be controlled by air cleaning or mechanical air exchange,” although “operation of a heating, ventilating, and air conditioning system can distribute secondhand smoke throughout a building.”

---

441 Email from Amanda Stahle to Linda Upmeyer and from Linda Upmeyer to Amanda Stahle (Feb. 18, 2008) (forwarded by Amanda Stahle to Marc Linder (May 12, 2008)).
442 https://webapp.iedb.iowa.gov/PublicView/statewide/2008/Period_Due_Date_19-Oct/PACs/Peninsula%20Gaming%20Employee%20PAC_9774/Peninsula%20Gaming%20Employee%20PAC_9774_B_Expenditures.pdf
443 Telephone interview with Tyler Olson, Des Moines (Apr. 15, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Once this series of Republican amendments had been filed, a somewhat more sober McCarthy allowed as “preliminarily Democrats believe there is a majority in support of the statewide ban.”\(^{447}\) In contrast, the Senate, according to Majority Leader Gronstal, had as yet reached no consensus. As far as Governor Culver was concerned, the press portrayed him as going both ways: whereas the Associated Press now reported that “he would sign a statewide ban into law if the Legislature passes it,”\(^{448}\) Radio Iowa still had him in the local control camp, but nevertheless open to a different perspective: “‘Iowa has historically been a local control state, but maybe as we have this discussion and debate...maybe we will learn that Iowans want to go further than that and that they’re ready for a statewide ban.... That is why debate is important up here.’”\(^{449}\)

In part, (House) Democrats’ hopeful attitude may have been based on “internal polling” that revealed that 80 percent of Iowans favored some kind of smoking ban.\(^{450}\) More importantly, leadership itself was surprised by the polling data’s revelation of the extent to which Iowans wanted a statewide law.\(^{451}\) One reason for such public support may have been the advertisements promoting the prohibition of smoking in bars and restaurants on which the Iowa Department of Public Health had spent $596,000. Appearing 3,140 times in newspapers and on radio and television since October, the announcements, which originally bore the tagline, “Local control now,” by February ran under the title, “Everyone has the right to breathe smoke-free air.”\(^{452}\) Found lawful by the Attorney General’s Office and the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board because they did not support any specific bill, the advertisements were nevertheless intensely obnoxious to \(^{448}\)Associated Press, “House Leaders Delay Debate on Iowa Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, Feb. 14, 2008, on http://www.press-citizen.com. It is possible that this account was erroneous. The uncertainty in the Senate, as related by Gronstal, is difficult to reconcile with his statement, reported above, that there had almost been a Senate majority to pass a statewide bill in 2007 and that the principal change in 2008 was the shift in consensus in the House.

\(^{450}\)James Lynch, “Smoking Ban Debate Snuffed Out,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Feb. 14, 2008, on http://www.gazetteonline.com. A former House speaker who demanded anonymity confirmed that House Democrats “seemed to have been able to use polling data to persuade members to go with” the statewide ban. Email to Marc Linder (Apr. 11, 2008).

\(^{451}\)Telephone interview with Sen. Matt McCoy, Des Moines (May 8, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Republicans. For example, House Minority Whip Kraig Paulsen lashed out at IDPH for “‘using taxpayer dollars to...push the Legislature around.’”

Even before 2008, however, IDPH had been gauging Iowans’ views on smoking. According to the most recent survey, conducted for the Department between April and July 2006, the overwhelming majority (93.2 percent) recognized the negative health consequences of exposure to secondhand smoke: 55.8 percent of respondents considered breathing other people’s cigarette smoke “very harmful,” while another 37.4 percent deemed it harmful, leaving only 3.2 percent and 1.9 percent to call it not very harmful and not harmful at all, respectively. And almost as many (85.4 percent) thought that people should be protected from such exposure: 32.7 percent agreed strongly and 52.7 percent agreed, while only 8.2 percent disagreed and 1.5 percent disagreed strongly.

That 26.9 percent, or more than a quarter, of Iowans felt strongly enough to have asked someone within the previous year to stop smoking in order to avoid having to breathe his smoke suggested personal concern intense enough to risk confrontation. To be sure, more specific questions about governmental smoking bans and locations generated less than quasi-universal assent. For example, when instructed that state law did not require restaurants to be smoke-free and that state law prohibited cities from adopting ordinances to prohibit smoking in them, and then asked whether that law should be retained as it was or changed, a bare majority of 52.7 percent wanted change, while 40.6 percent chose the status quo. Even among non-smokers preference for the local control option for banning smoking in restaurants reached only 60.4 percent, while 32.9 percent wanted no change; 75.7 percent of smokers, in contrast, preferred perpetuation of their freedom to expose their fellow-public diners to secondhand smoke, while only 17.4 percent were willing to accept change.

Virtually all respondents wanted to impose some limits on smoking in restaurants: almost two-thirds (64.3 percent) wanted no smoking, while 33.3 percent would allow it in some areas, and only 1.0 percent would permit it in all areas. A total ban in bars and cocktail lounges, in contrast, found much less favor: whereas only 30.3 percent supported it, 47.4 percent favored permitting smoking in some areas and 15.5 percent supported it

---

454 Gene Lutz et al., Iowa 2006 Adult Tobacco Use Survey, tab. E-9 at 122.
455 Gene Lutz et al., Iowa 2006 Adult Tobacco Use Survey, tab. E-10 at 123.
456 Gene Lutz et al., Iowa 2006 Adult Tobacco Use Survey, tab. F-1 at 131.
in all areas. Interestingly, contrary to later pronouncements by Minority Leader Rants, high levels of support for total bans were not confined to restaurants. Even higher proportions favored them in public buildings (69.2 percent), at indoor sporting events (73.5 percent), and in indoor shopping malls (76.7 percent). In contrast, virtually no one (0.5, 1.2, and 0.7 percent respectively), wanted to permit smoking in all areas at these locations, while allowing smoking in some areas secured the support of 27.6, 23.0, and 21.1 percent, respectively, of all respondents. Support for bans on smoking in outdoor public areas, however, was a distinctly minority position: while approximately equal numbers strongly agreed (10.2 percent) and disagreed (11.7 percent), twice as many disagreed (48.3 percent) as agreed (24.3 percent), yielding a 60.0 to 34.5 percent negative preference.

The heterogeneous—and to some extent self-contradictory—attitudes and policies of Iowa restaurant and bar owners/managers, which differed sharply from the general public’s preferences, were vividly on display in a contemporaneous 2006 survey. Almost four-fifths of all respondents agreed (46 percent) or strongly agreed (33 percent) that people should be protected from secondhand smoke, while 44 percent of owners/managers of establishments most of whose total sales were from alcohol disagreed. When asked for their preferred smoking policy, 12 percent of restaurateurs responded that smoking should be allowed without restriction, 33 percent not at all, and 50 percent in designated areas; among bar owners/managers, the corresponding shares were, unsurprisingly, more pro-smoking: 48 percent, 15 percent, and 28 percent, respectively. Yet, whereas 34 percent of all owners/managers of establishments, 39 percent of owners/managers of sit-down restaurants, and 65 percent of all without a liquor license had banned smoking, only 2 percent of the bar owners and 18 percent of all with liquor licenses had in fact banned smoking.

H.F. 2212 was scheduled for floor debate on February 14, but because floor manager Olson had failed to file a “‘comprehensive cleanup amendment’” time, it was not eligible for debate that day\textsuperscript{462} and wound up being delayed five days. The press generally accepted this technical explanation,\textsuperscript{463} but at least one statehouse reporter conjectured that the delay might have resulted from adherents’ failure to have mobilized the requisite 51 votes.\textsuperscript{464} Indeed, as late as a few hours before the debate on February 19, Senate Assistant Majority Leader Joe Bolkcom remarked that the House leadership—which would not allow the bill to go to the floor unless it was certain that it had enough votes for passage—was still working to get sufficient votes to debate it.\textsuperscript{465}

At his press conference on February 14 Rants correctly remarked that “[w]e have members on both sides” of the public smoking issue, but the lopsidedness of the House vote five days later would cast doubt on his further claim that “[i]t’s really not a partisan issue”\textsuperscript{466} as would Janet Petersen’s retrospective judgment that Republicans opposed H.F. 2212 because tobacco companies gave them lots of money.\textsuperscript{467} Rants’s judgment that the bill’s exclusion of casinos was a “little hypocritical” was itself more than a little hypocritical since Rants himself was opposed to supplanting business owners’ decisionmaking power over smoking at all. His kind of hypocrisy was ferreted out almost immediately by a journalist who, after Rants had announced that Republicans would propose an amendment to exempt bars that limited admission to those over 21 years of age—which, unsurprisingly many bar owners supported\textsuperscript{468}—because if the exemption was good for casinos it was good for bars (“if it’s a good idea for one it’s a good idea for all”), asked why Rants stopped at bars and did not apply the same exemption to other locations such as bowling alleys. Rants called it an “excellent question,” but apparently imagined that he was offering an equally excellent answer when he replied: “I’m in the art of the possible.”\textsuperscript{469} Ironically, he seemed oblivious of

\textsuperscript{465}Email from Sen. Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 2008).
\textsuperscript{467}Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (Apr. 12, 2008).
\textsuperscript{469}Rants Addresses Smoking Ban, Economic Stimulus Package, Press Conference, the fact that Democrats, including anti-smoking leaders Petersen and Olson, were practicing exactly the same art when they held their noses and swallowed the casino exemption—not because they supported it and not because they feared the loss of state tax revenue, but merely because it was the unfortunate price they had to pay to secure the additional votes needed for passage. Moreover, Olson publicly promised that he would be back in 2009 to repeal the exemption.\textsuperscript{470} Toward the end of his remarks on smoking Rants hinted that whereas Republicans may have prevented passage of any real smoking bans when they controlled the legislature, now that more radical legislation might actually be passed, they were willing to make one concession: “I think what Iowans are really interested in...and they talk about why can’t we ban smoking, they’re really talking about restaurants.” If the goal were that limited, he argued that it could be accomplished without drafting the bill the way Democrats had written it.\textsuperscript{471} Later, when asked directly why Republicans had not passed such a bill between 1997 and 2004, when they controlled the legislature, Rants, who stated that he hated smoking as well as drinking and gambling, admitted that the reason had been that he was opposed to interference with private property rights, although he agreed both that a significant change in attitudes toward smoking had taken place in the meantime and that not all employees who did not want to be exposed to secondhand smoke were in a position to avoid it.\textsuperscript{472}

Even on the eve of House floor debate on H.F. 2212, when local control bills had been put in abeyance, smoking opponents were still “torn” over a statewide measure, which at this point Petersen was giving “‘excellent’” chances of passing. Those still reflexively wedded to their local control strategy confessed that “they can’t wholeheartedly support” Petersen’s bill.\textsuperscript{473} This position was most strenuously adopted by the Lung Association, whose lobbyist, Dan Ramsey, self-ironically conceded that “we’re purists,” who wanted a clean bill with no exemptions. ALA, according to Ramsey, was so purist that, when Wise and

\footnotesize{Feb. 14, 2008, on http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=XyhPjWGKkGk (visited July 8, 2008).}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{472}Telephone interview with Christopher Rants, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{473}Tony Leys, “Deal on Ban Irks Opponents of Smoking,” DMR, Feb. 14, 2008 (1A:1-2).}
Petersen called the health advocacy groups to a meeting on the statewide ban, ALA became the “odd man out,” whose leadership in Chicago told Ramsey to kill the bill. ALA agreed to be neutral until the bill got out of the House and then to lobby the Senate. Eventually the Iowa attorney general called the Midwest regional office to request that it support H.F. 2212. Intriguingly, the categorical strategic and arguably even principled divide separating the Lung Association from the other anti-smoking groups in Iowa did not manifest themselves in the course of the struggle for passage of the Smoke Free Illinois Act in 2007.

According to Kathy Drea, vice president for advocacy and head of public policy for ALA of the Midwest, the organization opposed the Iowa bill because of the casino exemption, over which the health coalition ultimately broke up. In contrast, in Illinois, the coalition held solidly together on the issue of casino coverage (though it might have fissured if a time-limited exemption for casinos had proved necessary in order to pass the bill) because all members prioritized health over (tax) revenue.

The Lung Association’s militancy—it was, after all, prepared to tolerate a legislative outcome protecting no one in preference to protecting everyone except casino workers, in other words, to allow, pace Voltaire, Wise, Olson, and many others, the perfect to destroy the good—stood in breathtaking contrast to Iowa Democrats’s endlessly deployed mantra that they were willing to acquiesce in the exemption of casinos because protecting 99 percent of workers was superior to the legislative alternative of protecting 0 percent. The starkness of this absolutism was, to be sure, moderated to some considerable extent by the fact that in Illinois 0 was not the alternative since more than half the state’s residents already lived in jurisdictions covered by city and county nosmoking ordinances and the very failure to pass the desired legislation would presumably have motivated even more local coalitions to secure adoption of additional ordinances. Moreover, purism was even less of a luxury when the momentum propelling popular support of an ideal bill and the stability of a propitious statewide party-political constellation made it more than merely plausible that enactment of such a measure loomed just around the corner. In contrast, in Iowa, where 0 percent 474 Telephone interview with Dan Ramsey, American Lung Association of Iowa, Des Moines (May 14, 2008).

---

475 Telephone interview with Kathy Drea, Springfield (June 16, 2009); email from Kathy Drea to Marc Linder (June 17, 2009); see above this ch.

476 In this context it must not be forgotten that the scope of protection conferred by the Smoke Free Illinois Act was inferior to that of the Iowa Smokefree Air Act in that the former did not cover outdoor restaurants, the grounds of public buildings, or outdoor college campuses.
of the population was protected from secondhand smoke by a local ordinance, Democrats in 2007 controlled both houses of the legislature and executive for the first time in more than four decades, and the loss of either chamber or the governorship to the Republican Party (other than to Branstad) would almost certainly destroy any chance of enacting a strong or perhaps any statewide law, it is difficult to discern the public health justification for insisting that 0 percent of a loaf was better than 99.9 percent of a loaf while waiting an indeterminate number of years for 100 percent.

Ramsey observed of local controllers’ predicament: “‘It puts us in a difficult position because a lot of people say this is a good bill.’” In contrast, anti-smoking activists regarded local ordinances as “less likely to include exemptions.” Although this assessment may have been plausible—if for no other reason, then simply because casinos were located in only a minuscule proportion of Iowa cities—it ignored the probability that only a similarly minuscule proportion of local governments would pass (any, let alone exemptionless) ordinances in the near term. Another Lung Association spokesperson continued to argue that a “statewide law should be the floor, not the ceiling. Any statewide bill should also allow for local control, no exemptions. ... A preemptive state, which Iowa is now, is exactly what the tobacco industry, casinos, and bar and restaurant association wants. Without local control, there is always a chance the statewide law will be in jeopardy because of special interest politics.”

Randall Yontz of the American Heart Association was also still unwilling to forsake local control, which had “been proven to work over and over”; recounting nostalgic memories of how in other states local control smoking bans were taken statewide “after a few years when most communities have adopted restrictions,” he presumably must still have nourished hopes of more than 500 Iowa local governments’ joining the movement in short order even though barely five percent of that number had even sent noncommittal petitions to the General Assembly requesting enabling legislation.

---

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The House Debates and Passes a Diluted H.F. 2212

[F]rom a practical standpoint, “this is the vehicle that’s moving.”

I won’t sacrifice property rights for a feel good bill that does nothing after all the exemptions are passed.

And when it came...time to pull the votes together we had to make a couple of exemptions to keep the bill alive and keep it moving.

The almost five-hour House debate on February 19 was the longest and most detailed, substantive, contentious, and consequential of all the debates on H.F. 2212, fleshing out many of the principal controversies and tensions and setting the framework for further conflict and resolution. That a statewide ban bill was finally being debated on the floor at all was an almost astonishing turn of events. Asked (in real time) several hours into the floor debate why the momentum had shifted from local control, Iowa City Democrat Mary Mascher, after confirming that “[m]omentum can shift here on a dime,” mentioned numerous contributing factors: (1) many surrounding states had passed legislation; (2) the fairly lengthy experience in California had built up a record; (3) many legislators believed that a local option approach would create too many conflicts among businesses and among cities; (4) whereas many felt that local control would “take too long,” a statewide law would have an “immediate effect on all Iowans”; and (5) “[l]ots of talking, lots of lobbying, lots of grunt work on the part of our anti-smoking lobby and our anti-smoking legislators.”

Shortly before five o’clock debate began on H.F. 2212 as floor manager Tyler Olson used his opening remarks to emphasize that the bill, which covered 99 percent of workers and public places and had progenitors in 29 other states, would not only improve the health of all Iowans, but also (in his less than

---

481 Email from Assistant Minority Leader Linda Upmeyer to Amanda Stahle (Feb. 18, 2008) (forwarded to Marc Linder (May 12, 2008)).

483 Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 2008, at 8:07 p.m.).

484 Later, in responding to a question from Rep. Soderberg, Olson stated that the more accurate figure was 99.7-99.9 percent of workers and public places.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

felicitous choice of words) “hopefully get rid of those 440 Iowans that are going to die from secondhand smoke exposure...this year.” In order to preempt certain lines of attack by the bill’s opponents he reported that (1) the enactment of similar bans in Minnesota and Chicago had not resulted in mass enforcement actions; (2) many studies had revealed that rather than depressing business, bans had actually led to a rise in economic activity in bars and restaurants; and (3) the ban on smoking by farmers in their tractors would apply only if a corporate entity owned the tractor and someone other than the farmer used it (this last statement being false).

After Republicans Paulsen, Upmeyer, and Lukan had temporarily deferred on their amendments, Carmine Boal, in her tenth and last year as a legislator, offered H-8026 to strike the casino exemption. In terms of its effect on the scope of the bill’s coverage and the universe of protected people, it may not have been the most important amendment, but, given the bill’s Democratic supporters’ belief that the bill could not garner the 51 votes needed for passage without the exemption for casino owners because a small but key number of Democrats representing districts with casinos did not believe that they could afford to antagonize the casino owners, the issue remained without any doubt politically the most difficult, contentious, and crucial question for the statewide ban from the day the Commerce subcommittee held a hearing on the study bill on January 23 until H.F. 2212 was passed by both chambers on April 8 and even after the Smokefree Air Act went into effect. Boal’s rhetorically and substantively effective remarks on behalf of the amendment not only created the impression that she was a vigorous supporter of universal coverage—in fact, however, according to her party’s greatest dissident, Republicans such as Boal who claimed that the casino exemption was unfair and that they would vote for a statewide ban with no exemptions were being untruthful—but helped maneuver floor manager Olson into a predicament that was partly of his own making when he refused, despite straightforward requests from his Republican interlocutors, to explain forthrightly why he chose to forgo the opportunity to call their bluff—as he had done so successfully in the Commerce Committee two weeks earlier when Soderberg offered the amendment to ban smoking on the grounds of public buildings—even while he used virtually the same ironic introductory language with Boal that he had on February 5 ("I want to thank Representative Boal for bringing the amendment in the spirit of public health"). In fact, however, as Boal revealed shortly after the vote, protecting public health was not her goal at all; on the contrary: “My first preference is to allow private businesses the freedom to determine their smoking policy—no government involvement. At the time of my vote, 51 percent of my constituents who answered my survey agreed with this stance.” And still later Boal—who would soon call herself a “fan” of Sarah Palin—revealed even more clearly how central the sanctity of private property was to her world view:

485 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr, communications director, House Speaker Murphy). Olson admitted under questioning by Rep. Paulsen later during the debate that smoking would not be lawful in non-corporate-owned farm tractors if the farmer had an employee who used the tractor. See below.

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

I strongly believe our Constitution provides for the protection of property rights for property owners. Government should not abuse its power by taking away the rights of property owners just because a human behavior has been deemed repulsive by many. In this case the property right being forfeited is the bar and restaurant owners’ ability to decide if allowing smoking in their establishment is a good or a bad business model for them.

Proponents of the smoking ban argue that taking away the property rights of business owners is justified because smoking goes beyond being repulsive and affects others because of the damage caused by second-hand smoke.

I would argue that no one is forced to frequent or work in restaurants and bars that allow smoking. [M]y strong distaste for incrementally forfeiting personal freedoms to our government eclipses my distaste of the possibility of having someone smoke next to me in a restaurant of my choice.

Boal, who had previously excelled at taking up the cudgels for employers and against workers in reforming the state workers’ compensation law as well as against same-sex marriage, began her floor remarks by dramatically rehearsing

---

488See above this ch.
489House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19. 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
490Carmine Boal, “Exempting Casinos from Smoking Ban Permits Unfair Competitive Disadvantage,” DMR, Feb. 29, 2008 (1R) (NewsBank). This piece, which appears originally to have been a communication to Boal’s constituents, referred to the Senate debate as scheduled to take place the next week, but in fact it had already occurred.
her conversations with constituents on smoking:

You know, this issue is something that I’ve heard about for a long time in my district because my constituents have talked to me a lot about it. They said we wanted smoking banned: we’re tired of seeing it in restaurants—we don’t like it. And I said to them, I said, you know, don’t you know that that would mean that the government is getting involved in our lives more dictating to local restaurants what they can and can’t do? And don’t you know that restaurants can already ban smoking if they feel that’s in their best interests? And don’t you know that it’s possible for you to just frequent other restaurants that don’t have smoking? But they said, you know what, Representative Boal, you just don’t get it: it’s about secondhand smoke, it’s about the health of people who go to these restaurants, it’s for those workers who are trapped into [sic] these working places. We want to eat smokefree.

At this point Boal decided to ask her bar and restaurant owner-constituents their opinion on the issue and was surprised to hear that they, too, were for the ban. So she engaged them in the same dialog: “Well, don’t you know you can ban smoking if you want to? ... Why would you want me as a state legislator to make that decision for you, for your business?” And like the customer-constituents, they, too, told Boal that she just did not get it, but what she failed to understand this time round was that an individual bar owner’s decision to go smoke-free made it “very unfair” for him if the only other bar in town did not ban it because the former would have an “unfair advantage.” Consequently, Boal’s business owners swore that “[w]e want a level playing field,” which only the state could establish by means of a universally applicable statute. (The rest of the House might also be excused for not understanding this reasoning, which, after all, appeared to reject the quintessence of competitive entrepreneurial freedom.) Boal then justified her amendment on the grounds that it created that level playing field for owners and protected the health of casino employees, and attacked the casino exemption for hypocritically protecting the state’s casino tax revenue at the expense of bar and restaurant owners’ profits.

Astonishingly, Olson evaded all the issues raised by Boal; instead, as if speaking in code, he urged rejection of her amendment solely on the grounds—that he and other supporters would repeat ad nauseam—that H.F. 2212 was “about progress and really not about perfection.”

Olson’s studied evasiveness in his colloquy with the amendment’s cosponsor, Mike May, became even more strained and further eroded his credibility. Olson
The lawyer appeared to view May’s seemingly straightforward questions as just so many traps, as if he were a deponent desperately trying to divulge as little as possible to the other side lest even otherwise positive information might be twisted in unforeseeable ways that he would come to regret. May himself later explained his aggressive questioning as designed, by someone who was going to “lose anyway,” at least to point out the majority party’s inconsistencies. Thus, when May asked whether any of the 440 Iowans who died annually from secondhand smoke exposure might be casino employees, Olson did not know and would not engage in any guesstimating. Since the secondhand smoke-related state-level mortality data were not disaggregated on an occupational or industry basis, and Olson could hardly be faulted for not being able to answer, May tried to get around this problem by asking merely whether Olson knew, as May did, that the smoke in casinos was “terrible.” Instead of giving May the obvious answer, Olson, who must have been more than clever enough to see several moves ahead and where this not very consequential checkers endgame was heading, begrudged him no more than: “You’re allowed to smoke in a casino, so I would guess.” Having painfully extracted this minimalist concession, May then wanted to know why the legislature would not want to save the lives of whatever number of casino employees and customers were imperiled by secondhand smoke exposure. Manifestly committed to speaking in a pre-arranged Aesopian language, Olson refused to deviate from his circumlocution that the exemption was in the bill to insure that 99 percent of public places and workers were covered and not zero. Audibly relishing the opportunity that Olson was bestowing on him to keep his cat-and-mouse game moving ahead, May, with increased urgency, asked: “You’re not making that connection for me because I still don’t understand why.” Unwilling to budge from his semi-opaque formula, Olson repeated that “Well, I believe that 99 percent is better than zero, and with this amendment I think we end up in the final consideration with zero. ... We all have to make that decision: Is the less than 1 percent more important than the other 99?” Boring in on Olson’s refusal to disclose the missing links in his reasoning, May immediately made the next logical move: “That’s a false choice. Because today we can take care of all of those people, can’t we?” Finally cutting through the shrouded underpinnings of Olson’s argument, May asked him point blank why some people would not support the bill without the casino exemption, but even this bluntness failed to motivate Olson to speak truth to powerlessness. Instead, apparently unconcerned about his credibility rating, Olson came up with a transparent whopper that must have caused every other House member, and all reporters and various other Statehouse hangers-on to snicker: “I’m not one of those people—I can’t help ya.” In a vast understatement, May let him off the hook and then supplied the answer that Olson had intransigently refused to utter: “I suspect you know a little bit more than you’re saying to the body today, but I’ll give you that pass, you’ve done a good job and I appreciate...your bringing this bill. And I appreciate the dilemma you find yourself in. Because what we’re talking about is money and lives, isn’t it? We’re talking about revenue and lives. ... If the state treasury takes a dip or my local district casino takes a dip, then maybe that creates some political problems or pressures for me.”499

498 Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake (Aug. 18, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Horbach intensified Republicans’ pseudo-attack on the casino exemption by underscoring the extent of secondhand smoke exposure that it made possible: the Meskwaki Indian casino in his hometown of Tama (which was not subject to state jurisdiction but served as a reference point) employed 1,500 people and was visited by 5,000 customers a day 365 days a year. To be sure, Horbach, went on and on about how “unquestionable principle” had been sold out for the exemption, but his only visible interest as the representative of “Main street business” in small towns around the casinos was that the latter would be “the only place in town for smoking.” When Horbach tried to elicit from Olson the reason as to why the bill exempted casinos and whether the reason was money, Olson kept evasively repeating the mantra that 99 percent was better than 0 percent—even when Horbach observed that “there isn’t a person sitting here who doesn’t know it’s about the money.”500 One more effort by Horbach (who later surmised that Olson preferred not to reveal the real reason for the casino exemption because it would have made the bill look weak)501 to embarrass Olson into abandoning his omertà on behalf of his casino-beholden colleagues502

499House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). May speculated that Olson’s refusal to admit that he knew why some Democrats wanted the casino exemption resulted from his desire not to box his colleagues in when it came time to vote. Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake (Aug. 18, 2008).

500House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

502Matching casino locations with comments on the American Cancer Society’s vote count card about individual Democratic representatives’ positions on the casino exemption identified five members who both represented districts with casinos and expressed varying degrees of support for the exemption: Bukta (Clinton: “Supports casino exemption (new casino in clinton)”; Cohoon (Burlington: “would support casino exemption”); Frevert (Emmetsburg: “Must have casino exemption”); Huser (Altoona: “SW [statewide] with casino and bar exemption”); and Wendt (Sioux City: “Must have casino exemption”). In addition, Republican Rayhons who represented Worth county including Northwood “[w]ants casino exemption.” [American Cancer Society.] 2008 House Vote Count Card 82nd General Assembly (emailed by Stacy Frelund (Feb. 14, 2008). Wendt received a prompted “the lady from Johnson,” Mary Mascher, to lose her patience and to shout protectively on behalf of her beleaguered first-term colleague, whose only failing was to enable rather than criticize his attackers’ deceitfulness: “Point of order! Point of order! Mr. Speaker, he’s already answered the question—he’s just badgering him.” 503 (In real time Mascher explained: “I was trying to make the point that Rep. Olson had already answered the question and Rep. Horbach did not like the answer. Get over it and move on.”) 504 After Speaker Murphy had summoned the protagonists Horbach and Olson to the well and decided to permit the former to continue questioning the latter, Olson finally relented to the extent that he offered, following passage of H.F. 2212, to co-sponsor legislation with Horbach the next morning to “fix it.” Rather than pretending that Olson, who had spoken seriously—after all, no one doubted the truthfulness of his later statements that he would try to repeal the exemption in 2009—was bluffing and calling his bluff, Horbach luxuriated in vacuous rhetoric about honor and principle, 505 while perpetuating his and his party’s fraud that they were fighting for an exemptionless statewide smoking ban.

A lawyer-to-lawyer colloquy touching on a matter of potentially great consequence for the bill was initiated with Olson by Minority Whip Kraig Paulsen, who worked for a corporation in Cedar Rapids and had already filed an amendment radically limiting the bill’s coverage to restaurants. 506 Paulsen’s question (which the two purported to be trying to discuss without putting the

$250 contribution from the Argosy Casino in Sioux City on Oct. 2, 2008; Huser received $100 from Ameristar in Council Bluffs on July 15, 2008.

503House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
504Emailing during floor debates was apparently common. Republican Jamie Van Fossen was not even embarrassed to state on the floor that while “doing email” he was “kind of listening to the debate off and on.” House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
505Email from Marc Linder to Mary Mascher (Feb. 19, 2008, 6:13 p.m.); Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Feb. 19, 6:20 and 7:40 p.m.).
506House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). In the event, Democratic leadership, fearful lest debate lead to reduced coverage under SAA, refused to allow any amendments to reach the floor in 2009. See below ch. 36.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

chamber’s non-lawyers to sleep) went to the issue of whether a recent Iowa Supreme Court decision—which a dissenting judge characterized as “completely outside the mainstream of equal-protection jurisprudence” holding a difference in tax rates between land- and water-based casinos to have violated the state constitution’s equality clause because a mere difference in location did not create a rational basis on which to uphold a discriminatory tax, would apply, for example, as between banning smoking in a restaurant across the street from a casino and exempting the same franchised restaurant inside a casino from the ban. Although Paulsen admitted that he would not have predicted the decision in that case, he raised as a “serious question” whether the Iowa Supreme Court would also strike down the casino exemption in H.F. 2212. Olson—who may have feared that, in combination with Struyk’s still pending amendment to invalidate the entire statute if any individual provision were struck down, SAA might be invalidated—argued that the bill would pass constitutional muster on the rational basis test because the gambling license would distinguish the two restaurants, although he failed to explain what relationship the presence and absence of that license bore to smoking regulation.

Whither Olson balked at going, his fellow representative from Cedar Rapids, Art Staed, did not fear to tread and shed light on pro-casino Democrats’ motivations. Opposed to the exemption himself, the secondary school teacher and administrator freely acknowledged that everyone already knew that “enough”

508 Racing Association of Central Iowa v. Fitzgerald, 675 NW2d 1, 16 (2004) (Carter, J., dissenting). The U.S. Supreme Court had ruled unanimously that because a “plausible policy reason for the classification” underlay the statute, it did not violate the federal constitutional equal protection clause, and reversed the Iowa Supreme Court’s ruling that it did. Fitzgerald v. Racing Association of Central Iowa, 539 US 103, 110 (2003). See below ch. 36.

509 Racing Association of Central Iowa v. Fitzgerald, 675 NW2d 1 (2004) (reaff’g its decision regarding the Iowa equality clause in Racing Association of Central Iowa v. Fitzgerald, 648 NW2d 555 (2002)).

510 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Apprehensions about how the Iowa Supreme Court might rule may have contributed to the decision later to amend the bill to limit the casino exemption to the gambling floor. Paulsen, who later stated that the RACI decision was so bad that he believed that the Iowa Supreme Court would not apply it to the casino exemption, which would pass constitutional muster, argued that confining the exemption to the gambling floor strengthened the bill’s chances. Telephone interview with Kraig Paulsen, driving on I-80 from Cedar Rapids to Des Moines (Aug. 19, 2008).

House members would not vote for the bill without the exemption; in response to a question from Republican Ralph Watts, he also specified that these members were actuated by their interest in casinos in their districts and their concerns that a ban might injure the casinos economically. Moreover, he believed that the amendment was intended to prompt those representatives to vote against and thus to kill the bill.\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).}

In her closing remarks Boal, whose preference was vindicating owners’ private property rights over public health and who had demonstrated her pro-tobacco stance by voting against the dollar cigarette tax increase in 2007,\footnote{See above ch. 34.} uttered the debate’s most risibly fraudulent claim: “I don’t choose progress. I choose perfection.” On a non-record vote of 43 to 51, the first big killer amendment failed.\footnote{House Journal 2008, at 1:325 (Feb. 19).}

After Lukan had withdrawn his amendment banning smoking in motor vehicles in the presence of anyone under 18, Jacobs received unanimous consent to defer temporarily on her amendment to eliminate certain outdoor no-smoking zones,\footnote{Telephone interview with Libby Jacobs, West Des Moines (Aug. 16, 2008).} because, being in the minority, she knew that her proposal would not be adopted since the Democrats had the votes to secure adoption of Olson’s more modest amendment (H-8027) on the same subject, which was then immediately debated. Jacobs regarded this procedural jousting as an example of “pure partisan politics” designed to enable Democrats to “take all the credit” for the bill.\footnote{Telephone interview with Libby Jacobs, West Des Moines (Aug. 16, 2008).} Olson described the purpose of the bill’s “separation distances” as protecting people from having to run gauntlets of smoke while entering and leaving smoke-free public places and preventing smoke from blowing back through doors and windows into such buildings. In addition to making a uniform 10-foot distance out of varying 20- and 50-foot zones, the amendment also accommodated some (unidentified) people’s concerns with “overly burdensome” distances.\footnote{Telephone interview with Libby Jacobs, West Des Moines (Aug. 16, 2008).} Olson did not mention whether authorizing the formation of those gauntlets just 10 feet away from doors to smokefree buildings constituted yet another example of choosing progress over perfection or why failure to acquiesce in this imperfection would have resulted in 0 percent coverage. (In contrast, Jacobs, whose position

\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).}

\footnote{House Journal 2008, at 1:325 (Feb. 19).}

\footnote{House Journal 2008, at 1:325 (Feb. 19).}

\footnote{Telephone interview with Libby Jacobs, West Des Moines (Aug. 16, 2008).}

\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).}
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

was ultimately vindicated when, later in the session, even the 10-foot zone was struck, insisted that there was no downside to its elimination because it would have been unrealistic for people to have imagined that, so long as smoking remained legal in Iowa, they would never again have to walk through smoke.)

The exemption for the Iowa Veterans Home included in the amendment meant that the existing no-smoking rules there would remain in effect.

Jacobs, who had filed the rival amendment abolishing these zones altogether because she was concerned that they were confusing and cumbersome to people walking by while smoking who would wind up violating the law unintentionally, began questioning Olson rather sharply about the impact of his 10-foot zones. After eliciting from him that owners of covered entities would not be required to mark off these 10-foot distances, Jacobs asked how people would know where the 10-foot zones began or ended and how they would enforce the provision. Unrealistically but apparently not flippantly, Olson replied that “they could get a measuring tape out and measure it off if they wanted to.” In addition, Olson confirmed for her that where such 10-foot spaces ran into other people’s private property or streets or sidewalks, smoking in the latter areas would not be unlawful.

Representative May returned to the fray to dwell on a property owner’s responsibility 24 hours a day for any and all smoking that might take place in his 10-foot outdoor no-smoking areas regardless of whether he saw or knew about or had any control of it. (To be sure, May was so preoccupied with the issue of liability that he never bothered to delve into the crucial issue of the provision’s non-self-enforcibility and the improbability that anyone would file a complaint or be able to identify a smoking violator.) Purporting to be flabbergasted and outraged when Olson confirmed this liability (which brought with it a $100 penalty for a first violation), May, histrionically raising his voice, called it “incredible” and “unbelievable” that owners were being held to the “impossible

---

518 Telephone interview with Libby Jacobs, West Des Moines (Aug. 16, 2008). Jacobs added that it was “difficult to legislate to the lowest common denominator” in a statewide law, while admitting that constitutional and codified limitations on home rule would preclude local communities from passing ordinances imposing no-smoking zones even to deal with special local conditions. Although Jacobs focused on much more marginal and quasi-trivial oddities of people driving by in motor vehicles or walking into a no-smoking zone in order to avoid a construction obstruction while smoking, she failed to offer any reason as to why it would not have been possible to craft a provision to deal with the core area of concern—for example, being forced to run gauntlets of smoke on entering or leaving a restaurant the grounds of which extended beyond the no-smoking zone.

519 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

520 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
standard” of being 24-hour-a-day monitor of smoking outside their door: “And you [Olson] think that’s reasonable—that’s scary to me.” Although May, laughing, noted that he personally would be voting for the amendment because it was superior to a 50-foot rule, he strongly felt that “the business community out there ought to be screaming to high heaven when this thing moves tonight.” He later offered another reason for such screaming when, in the course of a choreographed Q & A with Republican Jeff Kaufmann, he stated that since at his resort in northwest Iowa he was unable to see perhaps 75 percent of the places on his grounds, he was plagued by the “scary thought” that he might have to hire someone just to enforce the 10-foot no smoking rule in order to avoid $100 a day fines.521

Sensing no doubt that they had finally latched onto some weak spot, Republicans would not let go of the issue. Representative Lukan—who later remarked that no-smoking was where the market was going anyway and that he agreed with that direction522—viewing the bill from the perspective of his family’s small tire shop, asked Olson to imagine that the shoe were on the other foot: if, lucky and successful enough to own his own law firm one day in downtown Cedar Rapids, he were “in the back workin’ hard on some legal proceedings, doin’ justice for the people,” and some client grew tired of waiting in the lobby and went outside to smoke a cigarette within the 10-foot zone, which Olson wouldn’t be aware of, and another client happened to leave and get “a little bit infuriated about this happening” and called the Linn County Public Health Department, reporting that someone had been smoking five feet in front of Olson’s law firm, the result, at least in Lukan’s fertile imagination, was that: “They’re gonna come and they’re gonna fine you a hundred dollars.”523 Olson, for the purposes of this aspect of the debate, did not need to risk revealing the existence of an embarrassing hole in his bill’s enforcement scheme by remarking on Lukan’s risibly touching faith in the agency’s instantaneous curbside enforcement service—a nightmare over which in the real post-enactment world no owner would ever have to lose sleep.524 Much more effective was his simple

521 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
523 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Although in this particular scenario it might actually have been possible to identify the smoker, in the vast majority of cases the smoker, who would be long gone before even a zealous enforcer could be on the scene, would be a stranger.
524 See below. H.F. 2212, as Lukan himself admitted after the law had gone into effect, “won’t be a hard-enforced law.” Telephone interview with Steven Lukan, New Vienna (Aug. 17, 2008).
affirmation that “I’m obviously responsible for that and if somebody is violating the statute, then I’m gonna pay the $100 fine.” Lukan’s social-psychologically acute insight, which was, as he recognized, suited not to a big city downtown’s anonymity, but to small-town and Main street Iowa, was that “when you know everybody in town, when you work with everybody in town,” the law would put many people in “awkward positions.”

Lukan did not offer Olson the opportunity to discourse on this important issue, which Olson also did not broach during his closing remarks. Had he done so, he might have pointed out that Lukan’s comment had reflected, but failed to reflect on, the coming great cultural struggle and cultural change, which the Smokefree Air Act would bring about and which, in turn, would ultimately make compliance with the law ‘second nature.’ All Lukan could see was the initial short-term interpersonal unpleasantness associated with having to inform his smoking customers that they had been deprived of their decades-old privilege to expose him and others to secondhand smoke; that his legislative colleagues had chosen him to take on the disagreeable role of initial enforcer of the new public health regime to the possible detriment of his business—though as long as his competitors did not countenance violations, it was improbable that customers would stop having their tires repaired solely because they could not smoke in the shop—and of his commercial relations and personal friendships rankled. (In fact, seven weeks after the law had gone into effect, Lukan observed that he had had to remind only a few customers to put out their cigarettes when they came into his service station, none of whom took their business elsewhere.) But unable to see the present as history, Lukan did not understand that Iowa was caught up in the same process that was sweeping the United States and much of the world at the end of which tobacco smoking and use would perhaps be regarded as a uniquely bizarre and (self-) destructive activity. If Olson and other anti-smoking legislators understood and welcomed this transformation, they presumably decided that expedience dictated legislative progress over political perfection; consequently, explaining to the General Assembly and Iowans that they were embarking on a cultural revolution might have interfered with passage of H.F. 2212. From this perspective, conducting the operation on the basis that the whole matter was, instead, legalistic and not one that might plunge society into a (fruitfully) disruptive conflict and (self-)learning experience must have been taken for granted.

Unsurprisingly, at the end of the debate, the House adopted the floor manager’s own amendment on a voice vote, thus placing out of order Jacobs’

---

525House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

related amendment, as well as Struyk’s 21-and-over and ventilation amendments and Raecker’s amendment eliminating all exemptions except that for private residences.527

The House next took up Horbach’s contentious amendment to exempt all agricultural property, buildings, and equipment from the smoking ban, which went far beyond the bill, at least as floor manager Olson had explained it in his opening remarks, insofar as it exempted corporate farms as well as buildings on non-corporate-owned farms. Explaining that his main amendment (H-8016) dealt only with corporate farms, Horbach introduced an amendment (H-8038) to it that went further,528 but then, with seeming naivete, wondered aloud whether he really needed this more expansive amendment, and with unwonted deference asked Olson as an attorney to clarify why the bill’s ban on smoking would not apply to non-corporate farmers. Olson confirmed that “if it’s a personally owned vehicle, the vehicle is not owned by the corporation, smoke away! So the reason I gave that analysis at the beginning was that the prohibition on smoking in a tractor only applies if the tractor is owned by a corporation, if the corporation has employees, and more than one employee uses the tractor.” Under questioning by Horbach, Olson also confirmed that if the farmer was a sole proprietor, had two employees, and both of them were in the tractor cab with him, he could lawfully smoke. Summing up, then, Horbach explained how comprehensive his proposed agricultural exemption would be,529 the House promptly adopted his second degree amendment, and debate returned to the main amendment.530

Horbach’s oddly deferential request for clarification from Olson was a trap: in caucus the Republicans determined ahead of time that Olson, who, ironically,
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

had been chosen to floor manage the bill because, unlike Petersen, he would be able to explain its technical details, would misinform the House about the (alleged) corporate underpinnings of the agricultural exemption,\footnote{Telephone interview with Lance Horbach, Tama (Aug. 17, 2008).} which, contrary to Olson’s claim, was narrow and not broad. (Republican Mike May, who held Olson in high regard, excused, or at least explained, Olson’s underperformance on this matter by reference to the fact that a floor manager simply cannot prepare for all questions.)\footnote{Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake (Aug. 18, 2008).} Nevertheless, Horbach did not even bother to point out Olson’s incorrect answer, which may have been a function of having been caught off-guard about one aspect of the bill rather than intentional disinformation designed to mislead potential opponents about the need for an expansion of the exemption. Whether Horbach refrained from pouncing on the misinformation with a ‘gotcha’ because he cynically regarded floor debate as “just for public show” in a system which enables both parties almost always to know in advance whether a bill would pass or for some other reason, Olson’s deconstruction was entrusted to other Republicans.\footnote{Telephone interview (Aug. 19, 2008).}

After Olson in his remarks urging the House to resist the amendment had repeated his misinformation about the limited application of the smoking ban to corporate farming, Soderberg read him the bill’s linked definitions of “place of employment” (which included “vehicles owned, leased, or provided by the employer”)\footnote{H.F. 2212, § 2 (9) (Feb. 19, 2008).} and “employer” (which embraced numerous legal forms including corporations and sole proprietorships),\footnote{H.F. 2212, § 2 (5) (Feb. 19, 2008).} and asked him to explain how this “pretty inclusive” smoking ban on farms was consistent with Olson’s understanding of the exemption as coinciding with a particular legal form of organization. Olson’s initial response was rooted in such a breathtakingly incompetent reading of the bill that it had to inspire speculation that he had become temporarily or nervously so distracted that he was blinded to its blatant incoherence: “Well, well, if a vehicle is not owned, leased, or rented by the employer, it’s not covered.” How Olson imagined, for example, that a sole proprietor would not own, lease, or rent the tractor, and what possible relevance this claim bore to corporate status remained a mystery. After eliciting from Olson 531 Telephone interview with Lance Horbach, Tama (Aug. 17, 2008).

532 Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake (Aug. 18, 2008). A Republican House leader, who also held Olson in high regard and demanded anonymity, stated as an overall impression that Olson had not prepared carefully for the debate and vigorously rejected any speculation that Olson might have been intentionally misleading the House. Telephone interview (Aug. 19, 2008).

533 Telephone interview with Lance Horbach, Tama (Aug. 17, 2008).

534 H.F. 2212, § 2 (9) (Feb. 19, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

that he did not know how farms broke down according to legal form of organization, Soderberg—who had forfeited his opportunity to point up Olson’s utter confusion by confusing the debate by exhibiting his own inability to understand the bill’s straightforwardly interlocked provisions—concluded by making the (unsubstantiated) empirical point that since a “high majority” of farms were now organized as corporations, even by Olson’s understanding the smoking ban would be broad.

Upmeyer’s focus was not the extent of the ban in agriculture, but its point: since most vehicles were driven and occupied by one person at a time, the problem was firsthand smoke not secondhand smoke exposure. When Olson tried to defend the ban even in that situation on the grounds that carcinogens could linger for as long as two weeks and therefore other users of the tractor would be exposed to them, he gifted a “Gotcha!” to Upmeyer—whose husband was a farmer—of which she failed to take maximum propagandistic advantage (“I didn’t think that far ahead”). Although she had not intended to question Olson any further, Upmeyer, seeing something of an opening, wondered how, if they were going to be “legislating to that level of secondhand smoke,” they were going to regulate smoke lingering in people’s clothes. Misunderstanding Upmeyer’s question as if it pertained to secondhand smoke on nonsmokers’ clothing (when in fact she meant smokers’ clothing), Olson dismissed that problem as taken care of by the Smokefree Air Act, which would insure that nonsmokers would largely not be exposed to secondhand smoke. Without picking up on this misunderstanding, Upmeyer nevertheless inadvertently posed an interesting question (which she lacked the presence of mind to ask Olson to answer): should someone who smoked in her car on the way to a restaurant be barred from entering the restaurant (or required to change her clothing) lest other customers be exposed to her off-gassed carcinogens? After all, as she failed to add, if the desorption from freshly smoke-infested clothing might be considerably greater 536 Despite Olson’s efforts, Soderberg was unable to grasp that the specific exemption for “[o]utdoor areas that are places of employment” narrowed the coverage of “places of employment.” H.F. 2212, §§ 4(6) and 2 (9) (Feb. 19, 2008).

537 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr, communications director, House Speaker Murphy).
538 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
539 Telephone interview with Linda Upmeyer, Garner (Aug. 18, 2008).
540 On the relatively recently discovered phenomenon of thirdhand smoke exposure, see above ch. 33.
541 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
than that from the week-old smoke adsorbed onto the interior of a tractor cab,\textsuperscript{542} why was a smoking ban in the tractor necessary when the Smokefree Air Act did not ban smoky clothing from public places, and presumably even Olson would have agreed, had Upmeyer asked him, that such a step would be too extreme?

The coherence of the discussion of farm coverage advanced somewhat as a result of the lesson in remedial bill interpretation that Minority Whip Paulsen—who experienced the whole floor discussion as “a fun debate” even though, like others, it was primarily “for public consumption”\textsuperscript{543}—administered to Olson, his fellow Cedar Rapidian and classmate (2003) at the University of Iowa Law School. At the outset advising the floor manager that “we’re corporationin’ it up here,” which he was not sure was the relevant point, Paulsen once again led Olson through the interlocking definitions and stressed that the definition of “employer” encompassed a multitude of legal forms of organization, including sole proprietorships.\textsuperscript{544} As he was soliciting Olson’s assent to what by this time must have appeared to Olson as an endgame, the floor manager irrelevantly identified the exemption for “vehicles owned, leased, or provided by a private employer that are for the sole use of the driver and are not used by more than one person in the course of employment either as a driver or passenger”\textsuperscript{545} as the basis for part of his interpretation of coverage. Following this distraction, Paulsen then drove home the point that the comprehensive definition of legal forms of organizations of employers meant that “to limit our discussion to just corporations is not correct. In fact, what we’re talking about is any business structure,” including an unregistered sole proprietorship that had a vehicle that more than one person operated. This simple, straightforward, and accurate presentation of the law, which unanswerably refuted the patently false claims that Olson had been submitting to the House about the limited nature of farm coverage, compelled Olson’s agreement, but not without a face-saving (but just as patently false) claim that he had been offering the same analysis as Paulsen all along: “Yeah, when I am using the word, you know, ‘incorporate’ we’re talking business structure, that’s right, I mean some kind of legal structure to the business.” Even this limited concession did not satisfy Paulsen, who insisted that even if there were no legal structure such as that symbolized by registration with \textsuperscript{543}Telephone interview with Kraig Paulsen, driving on I-80 from Cedar Rapids to Des Moines (Aug. 19, 2008).

\textsuperscript{544}House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

\textsuperscript{545}H.F. 2212, § 4(7) (Feb. 19, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

the secretary of state or partnership agreement, the smoking ban would also cover “just whoever [is] out farming” with a vehicle that more than one employee used. Although this extraordinarily capacious coverage was inconsistent with Olson’s repeated statements to the chamber, he immediately replied, “That’s right,” without in any way indicating that the proposition to which he had just assented was radically at odds with his previous position. In turn, Paulsen declared that all or at least the overwhelming majority of farms in Iowa would be covered: “This is far more encompassing than just those farms that are organized under some sort of corporate structure.” And, once again, Olson agreed—so long as the farmers had employees. To make sure that the whole chamber and press understood just how discontinuous the new public health regime would be with midwestern farming traditions, Assistant Minority Leader Jeffrey Kaufmann, who taught history and government at a community college, made Olson confirm that a family farmer would not be able to smoke lawfully in his own tractor in the middle of his 160-acre farm if he had a “hired hand” who also used the tractor. Ironically, Kaufmann, who had apparently not been listening carefully as Paulsen took Olson to the woodshed, compounded the confusion and (verbally) diminished the extent of the state’s regulation by adding as a further condition that the farm be incorporated—to which proviso, astonishingly, the unrepentant or incorrigible Olson assented. No wonder that a confused Des Moines Register reporter stated the next day that the “vast majority of farms would not be affected by the ban unless the farm is a corporation.”

Not until Democrat Mark Kuhn, who for 34 years had been operating and managing his family’s 770-acre grain farm, addressed the House did information seep out relevant to health conditions inside farm tractor cabs. He still remembered how thrilled he had been the first time he got into a cab that was air conditioned and kept the dust out. In that same spirit he did not want someone who had driven the tractor the previous day to leave secondhand smoke for him to breathe all day long. Pointing out that farmers sat in enclosed cabs eight to 12 or 16 hours a day and were protected by carbon filters that filtered out contaminants (including the fungicides and herbicides that they sprayed), Kuhn stressed that they did not want this exemption because “we’re concerned about our health.”

546 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
548 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr, communications director, House Speaker Murphy).

3387

All of this firsthand practical experience was lost on Republican David Heaton, a restaurant-bar owner who in previous sessions purported to be a devoted public health-oriented tobacco controller. In fact, however, as he disclosed shortly after the end of the session, he was perfectly satisfied with the existing law, which needed no change because it was working perfectly alright. Unsurprisingly, he now saw but one issue, which, in a pathos-infused crescendo, he identified as whether the legislature had the “right” to tell a person whether he chooses to smoke a cigarette on his own property, in his own machine. Forgetting, if he ever knew, that his own party whip had just explained that the ban was not limited to incorporated farms, but that it did not apply at all to a farmer who farmed all alone as a rugged individualist, Heaton insisted that “[w]e are trying to preserve the rights of these individual owners, on their incorporated farmland,.to smoke if they choose to smoke. That’s their decision. I don’t think we have any business telling them what they should do...on their own property....” Sputtering in disbelief, he criticized Democrats for failing to make their bill “more fairer.” Losing her patience with Heaton’s property rights absolutism, Mascher asked him whether he complied with OSHA rules in his restaurant. Eliciting a fuzzy answer—he did not “pack the OSHA bible and read it page by page,” but he had never received a complaint from OSHA—Mascher explained that she had asked because Heaton kept asserting that people ought to be able to do what they wanted in their own businesses, but in fact all kinds of laws protected people from various harms in his restaurant and elsewhere and now secondhand smoke was merely being added to the list of such harms from which the legislature would protect them.

This perspective failed to inform Horbach’s closing remarks. After correctly pointing to the quasi-universality of coverage—“[n]ame a farm that has a family

---

551 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). The exposure Kuhn was warning about was in fact to thirdhand tobacco smoke.
552 See above chs. 31 and 34.
553 Telephone interview with David Heaton, Mt. Pleasant (May 10, 2008).
554 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Later, Heaton expanded his freedom-to-smoke claim beyond the smoker’s property to include restaurant owners and smokers in general. While denying that he was opposed to health regulations for restaurants, he refused to “debate” the bill on the telephone. Telephone interview with David Heaton, Mt. Pleasant (May 10, 2008).
that it won’t apply to. You can’t”—he quickly returned to his party’s favored theme of “invasion of property rights,” but then segued into the coming cultural struggle. “[Y]ou’ve got to be kidding me” were the first words out of everyone’s mouth when he mentioned the smoking ban in tractors and combines. That the legislature was taking away a farmer’s right to smoke (in a cab of a vehicle that an employee also drove) defied both “common sense” and what American stood for: “On the farm. Out in the country. It’s what we are.”555

These stirring sentiments ushered in the vote on Horbach’s amendment, which would have created an exemption far transcending tractors. After Horbach and Paulsen had requested a record vote, H-8016 lost on a 50 to 50 tie vote with only one Republican (Tomenga) joining 49 Democrats to vote Nay, while four Democrats (Bailey, Huser, Mertz, and Todd Taylor) supported the amendment together with 46 Republicans.556 The reason for the failure of the amendment—which Paulsen characterized as one of only two about the vote on which there was “a little bit of drama”555—was, according to Horbach, that the Democratic leadership had “controlled” the vote: it permitted four members to “slide over,” but as soon as the total reached 50, it stopped the cross-overs to insure that it could get a “clean bill.”558

After Lukan had temporarily deferred on his amendment to exempt private offices,559 the House took up Struyk’s other highly controversial amendment, H-8024—the only other one that Paulsen regarded as having created “a little bit of drama” regarding its passage—to exempt restaurants and bars that admitted only people 18 and older, an exemption that Struyk characterized as similar to that for casinos. Olson tore into the proposal as taking a step back not only from H.F. 2212, but even from the existing law, which at least required restaurant owners to set aside some area for nonsmokers, whereas under this amendment restaurants could be all-smoking.560 In addition to focusing on the consequences for the 115,000 hospitality industry workers, Olson pointed out that families with children who ate breakfast in such establishments the next morning would be exposed to the lingering secondhand smoke. Republican Dolecheck, who did not

555House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
557Telephone interview with Kraig Paulsen, driving on I-80 from Cedar Rapids to Des Moines (Aug. 19, 2008).
558Telephone interview with Lance Horbach, Tama (Aug. 17, 2008).
560Since under the then existing law the so-called nonsmoking sections could be as small as one table and be fully exposed to all the smoke in the restaurant, Struyk’s proposal might, in some cases, not have constituted much of a step back.
like going into smoky bars, pleaded on behalf of businessmen-constituents, especially restaurant-bars in small rural towns with only one restaurant in which at some point in the evening the owner stopped serving meals anyway because his customers just wanted to drink beer. Dolecheck gullibly conveyed the assurance of one of these owners that his excellent filtration system would purify the air overnight so that by the next morning there would be no secondhand smoke in the air—“only a little bit of odor...in the fabric—you can’t get rid of that.”

In fact, as one of the leading researchers of indoor air pollutant dynamics and human exposure observed: “The smell itself likely consists of many toxic chemicals present in tobacco smoke residue. Also, there are likely to be other toxic chemicals that you can’t smell that are also present on the surfaces where smoking has occurred, and which are re-emitted into the air over time.” Moreover, a study conducted at 21 different locations in Iowa from November 2007 to January 2008 found that the levels of particulate matter—smaller than 2.5 microns in diameter—air pollution in bars, restaurants, and casinos that permitted smoking were 17 times higher than in non-smoking bars and restaurants. Full-time year-round employees breathing such smoke-polluted air in their workplaces would, on an annual basis, have experienced an exposure 2.4 times the particulate air pollution standard limit set by the Environmental Protection Agency to protect the public health.

After Davenport Democrat Elesha Gayman had made a personal plea for rejection of the amendment on behalf of her pregnant “little sister” whose employment in a bar exposed her and her child to secondhand smoke, aisle-crossing Democrat McKinley Bailey made common cause on behalf of smoking with Dolecheck. Working off what had all the markers of a jointly rehearsed script, Bailey dutifully submitted his leading questions to his Republican collaborator, whose eagerness to perform was signaled by his response—unique during the entire debate on H.F. 2212—to the Speaker’s pro forma query as to 561 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Again, both Olson and Dolecheck were in fact referring to thirdhand tobacco smoke exposure.

562 Email from Neil Klepeis to Marc Linder (Aug. 19, 2008).

563 Mark Travers, “Iowa Air Monitoring Study: December 2007 to January 2008” tab. 1 at 7 (Roswell Park Cancer Institute, Feb. 2008) (copy furnished by Mark Travers). Because the three casinos were on average 16 times larger and therefore had less than one-half of the active smoker density despite having 11 times more cigarettes burning at any given time than the 14 smoking-permitted bars and restaurants, they were only five times more polluted than the non-smoking venues (averages calculated based on date in id.).

whether he would yield to the Democrat’s questions: “I would love to.” In reply to Bailey’s question as to whether he had ever talked about the amendment to a tobacco lobbyist, who might have been the “inspiration” behind it, Dolecheck confided that: “Quite frankly, I don’t talk to tobacco lobbyists too much. I am not a smoker and I don’t really approve of it.”

Inspired to make a clean breast of his own untainted motives, Bailey confessed that “I don’t talk to tobacco lobbyists either.” After Dolecheck and Bailey—the only Democrat to “voice objections to the bill” during the debate—had assured each other that their concern was to eliminate the competitive disadvantage that the bill imposed on “the little guy” owning a small bar in a small town vis-a-vis casinos, Bailey risibly claimed in a throwaway line suggesting a vague recollection that he was, after all, amending the Smokefree Air Act, that “it also does some good things as far as public health is concerned: it would mean that smoke would be out of the air, no child in the state would have to breathe in secondhand smoke in a public place.”

Democrat Mark Smith forthrightly opposed the amendment because “people do not like the secondhand smoke” and therefore fought to keep smoking bans once they are in place—without explaining why he had neglected the interests of non-smoking residents and employees of the Iowa Veterans Home in the so-called Mark Smith amendment to exempt the Home. Debate continued with May accusing Democrats of disingenuously lecturing the chamber about the dangers of secondhand smoke while enabling it in casinos, prompting Wise to shoot back that the 18-and-over amendment would create a Mack truck-size loophole. In his closing remarks Struyk—who, though a lawyer, a little later in the debate, self-deprecatingly called himself “just a lawn man” (because he owned Struyk Turf, LLC)—tried to refute Wise’s factual statement by cynically and nonsensically blaming the bill drafter for having repealed the current law, including its mandatory provision for non-smoking areas, which would otherwise have required such areas in casinos.

The 49 to 51 record vote (requested by Struyk and Rants) once again revealed

---

565 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
566 O. Kay Henderson, “Iowa House Votes to Ban Smoking in Most Public Places,” Radio Iowa (Feb. 19, 2008) on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited May 12, 2008). Henderson incorrectly stated that “Republicans were the only ones to voice objections to the bill.”
567 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
568 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
570 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
how tenuous support for a robust law was: with seven Democrats (Bailey, Huser, Lykam, Mertz, Quirk, Schueller, and Zirkelbach) defecting to the pro-smoking position, the House failed to carve out this huge hole in the bill’s protective scheme only because of the Nays cast by five Republicans (Baudler, Clute, Jacobs, Raecker, and Tomenga) who to varying degrees on various issues had supported the bill.\footnote{House Journal 2008, at 329-30 (Feb. 19). All of these Republicans except Raecker voted for H.F. 2212 on final passage; all of these Democrats except Bailey and Zirkelbach voted against H.F. 2212. Tom Schueller had worked at John Deere & Co. for 30 years and was a UAW member. \url{http://iowahouse.org/2008/04/24/member-profile-rep-tom-schueller/#more-354} (visited Aug. 21, 2008). Ray Zirkelbach, a state prison correctional counselor, had missed the 2006 and 2007 sessions while a soldier in Iraq. \url{http://iowahouse.org/2008/04/24/member-profile-rep-ray-zirkelbach/#more-383} (visited Aug. 21, 2008). He also smoked. Telephone interview with Rep. Mark Smith (Marshalltown (Aug. 21, 2008). According to one of the Democrats voting Aye, the amendment did initially receive 51 votes, but Majority Leader McCarthy kept the voting machine open and persuaded two Democrats (whom the representative refused to identify) to change their votes to Nay. Telephone interview with House member who demanded anonymity (Aug. 27, 2008). Mertz, who indicated that situations in which the majority leader keeps the voting machine open in an effort to persuade members to change their votes were not rare under Democrats or Republicans, was unable to recall this particular event sharply, but believed that it happened. Telephone interview with Dolores Mertz, Ottosen (Sept. 3, 2008). Ironically, in contrast, McCarthy’s administrative assistant, Brian Meyer, in (mistakenly) recalling the 50 to 50 vote on McKinley’s 18-and-over amendment, remembered looking up at the board and thinking that it would pass (“someone must have changed their vote”). He emphasized how unusual it was that leadership had not known which amendments would pass or even whether the bill itself would. Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (Sept. 18, 2008).}

Democrats’ heterogeneity and internal dissension were exemplified by Dolores Mertz and Geri Huser. A representative from a rural district in northcentral Iowa since 1988 and the first woman to chair the House Agriculture Committee,\footnote{Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake (Aug. 18, 2008).} Mertz at 80 was the oldest member of the legislature and took a jaundiced view of the presence of “a lot of do-gooders” in the body. Her allegedly anti-paternalistic opposition to a smoking ban as an “infringement on rights” was prefigured by her opposition to a 1993 bill mandating the wearing of helmets by motorcyclists.\textsuperscript{574} Offended by the treatment of smokers as “second-class citizens” and willing at the very most to concede that any smoking restrictions should have started much more slowly, Mertz displayed the kind of anti-scientific ignorance that in many instances underpins hostility to tobacco control initiatives when she implausibly asserted that her internist at the Mayo Clinic had told her that he would not urge such measures because radon caused more lung cancer than cigarettes or chemicals.\textsuperscript{575}

Huser, who characterized herself as a conservative Democrat who believed that government control should not be extensive, was content to let the market determine smoking policies, which then in 10 or 15 years, she contended, would have evolved into that underlying H.F. 2212.\textsuperscript{576} Huser, who with Mertz and Pettengill (who then became a Republican) had been one of only three Democrats to vote against the $1 cigarette tax increase in 2007,\textsuperscript{577} had received $1,000 in campaign contributions in 2006 from Altria Group, Inc. a/k/a Philip Morris, more than any other individual Iowa state legislator.\textsuperscript{578} She had also attained prominence in 2007 for her aggressive representation of her constituent, Prairie Meadows race track and casino—which her father and law partner Ed Skinner had helped found\textsuperscript{579} and of whose grant advisory committee he was a member\textsuperscript{580}—in exempting casinos (and age-restricted bars) from and thus killing the bill repealing preemption of local control.\textsuperscript{581} Her consistent votes against H.F. 2212, even though casinos had been exempted before the bill reached the House floor, resulted from the break-up of the casino-bar “coalition”: after the casinos \textsuperscript{574} For Mertz’s Nay on the crucial vote on the amendment that would have made helmets mandatory, see \textit{House Journal 1993}, at 2:1676 (Apr. 26, 1993). To be sure, Iowa remains one of only two or three states without a mandatory helmet law. Marian Jones and Ronald Bayer, “Paternalism and Its Discontents: Motorcycle Helmet Laws, Libertarian Values, and Public Health,” \textit{AJPH} 97(2):208-17 (Feb. 2006).

\textsuperscript{576} Telephone interview with Geri Huser, Altoona (Aug. 27, 2008).
\textsuperscript{577} See above ch. 34.
\textsuperscript{578} http://www.iowa.gov/ethics/viewreports/vsr_contributions/2006vsr_contributions.pdf. Huser received two contributions of $250 and $750; no other legislator received more than $750.
\textsuperscript{581} See above ch. 34.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

had made a deal with the Democratic leadership to secure their own exemption, they dropped out, leaving bars and Huser to fend for themselves.\footnote{Telephone interview with Geri Huser, Altoona (Aug. 27, 2008).}

The House then took up another of Struyk’s bill-killers—the amendment that provided that if any provision (or the application of the law to any person) were held invalid, the law in its entirety would be invalidated.\footnote{Struyk’s amendment was devised to overcome Iowa Code § 4.12 (2008), which provides: “If any provision of an Act or statute or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the invalidity does not affect other provisions or applications of the Act or statute which can be given effect without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of the Act or statute are severable.”}

Struyk especially commended his proposal to supporters of the casino exemption because, without H-8035, if the casino exemption were struck down, the result would be coverage of casinos under the ban; with his amendment, the law itself would be invalidated and casinos would remain subject to the existing (toothless) law. Olson warned the chamber that such non-severability clauses could be—and in other states had been—used to “take down” public health statutes like the Smokefree Air Act.\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).}

On a non-record roll call a somewhat larger majority apparently recognized the mortal threat that this measure posed to the bill and rejected it by a vote of 43 to 53.\footnote{See above this ch.}

After Lukan had withdrawn his assessment reduction amendment,\footnote{After Lukan had withdrawn his assessment reduction amendment, attention turned to Paulsen’s amendment to strike the entire bill and, instead, merely to ban smoking in all restaurants under the then existing law. In his opening remarks on H-8025 Paulsen (a former smoker)\footnote{O. Kay Henderson, “GOP Leader: Why Was First Lady, When Caught Smoking, Being Driven by State Trooper?” Radio Iowa (Nov. 26, 2008), on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited Nov. 26, 2008).} justified his amendment on the grounds that a majority of his constituents had told him that they wanted to be able to go to a restaurant without having to inhale secondhand smoke—a modest demand that coincided with Minority Leader Rants’s view of what Iowans wanted. Paulsen also intuited that Iowans cared about being able to enter malls and businesses without being forced to run through gauntlets of smoke, but his amendment did not retain the bill’s provision creating a no-smoking zone at entrances. Nevertheless, personally Paulsen would not have supported even such minimalist} intervention as his amendment embodied because, as he later stressed, “I’m a free market, property rights guy,” whose opposition to the bill had nothing to do with fears (that he did not share) that bars would be financially ruined by the ban, but was based wholly on property rights. Indeed, if he had had his “druthers,” he would not even have called up H.F. 2212\textsuperscript{590}—precisely the kind of pro-tobacco action taken by his party leadership when it controlled the legislature.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Olson devoted but a very brief and perfunctory effort to opposing the restaurants-only ban, pointing out its obviously massive regress vis-a-vis H.F. 2212. After no other member had expressed a desire to speak on H-8025, unsurprisingly only one-third of the House favored this retrograde, last-ditch effort to stave off a thoroughgoing statewide ban: even on a non-record roll call only 33 representatives were willing to vote for Paulsen’s proposal, while 56 rejected it.\textsuperscript{591}

No debate took place on Upmeyer’s amendment (H-8033) to strike the entire bill and, instead, to confer an annual $1,000 tax credit on any establishment that voluntarily became smokefree because Tyler Olson successfully secured a ruling that it was not germane.\textsuperscript{592} However, before the speaker made that ruling, Upmeyer in her opening remarks praised her own approach as finally giving the House the chance to “remove the hypocrisy and do something straightforward and honest.” She justified the measure as helping to offset the alleged initial small loss of revenue associated with bars and restaurants’ going smoke-free. Upmeyer’s claim that she had filed the amendment at the request of students from Just Eliminate Lies whom she counter-agitated about property rights when they lobbied her to vote for H.F. 2212\textsuperscript{593} seems at best difficult to reconcile with the public personas of these hard-line anti-corporate, anti-tobacco, teenage statists.\textsuperscript{594} Similarly implausible was her insistence that they were astonished to hear that bar and restaurant owners could ban smoking voluntarily, agreed to go home and lobby them to do so, and then asked Upmeyer, for whom the smoking issue

\textsuperscript{590}Telephone interview with Kraig Paulsen, driving on I-80 between Cedar Rapids and Des Moines (Aug. 19, 2008). In the wake of the Republicans’ loss of additional House seats at the November 2008 election, the caucus voted to oust Rants as minority leader and replace him with Paulsen.

\textsuperscript{591}House Journal 2008, at 331 (Feb. 19).

\textsuperscript{592}House Journal 2008, at 333 (Feb. 19).

\textsuperscript{593}House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Upmeyer’s explanation was inconsistent with the language of her amendment in two important respects. First, the amendment did not limit the tax credit to bars and restaurants; and second, the tax credit amounted to $1,000 per year, thus extending far beyond the transition period. H-8033, §§ 1 & 2.

\textsuperscript{594}http://www.jeliowa.org centered on property rights and not on health, to file her tax credit amendment.\textsuperscript{595}

Lukan’s amendment (H-8020) to exempt bingo facilities pursued the vital social goal of insuring that casinos were not the only places in which people could gamble and smoke at the same time. Since bingo games could take place in all manner of buildings, Olson pointed out that the exemption would destroy their smoke-free status. Raecker’s opposition to yet another exemption prompted one of the evening’s lighter moments when he urged Lukan to tell the people who originated the amendment that if they refrained from smoking they would have both hands available for the game and could play multiple cards. The quick and clear voice vote against the amendment made as short shrift of H-8020 as the debate\textsuperscript{596}—even without any reference to a study finding that there was no association between smoke-free ordinances and bingo profits in Massachusetts, a conclusion that should have undermined the efforts of cigarette manufacturers to use that segment of the gambling industry as a stalking horse to avoid having to rely on their own nonexistent credibility to oppose smoking bans by shifting the issue to the allegedly linked financial declines suffered by such businesses.\textsuperscript{597}

More than three hours into the debate the House reached the last amendment, Lukan’s proposal to exempt private offices. Posing as the paladin of “literally hundreds of thousands of small business owners across the state of Iowa who feel like they’ve been kicked around by state government quite often,” Lukan pitched his initiative as being all about what it meant to own private property—namely, having some place “within your private business” that was off limits to government control and where you ought to be able to “do what you’d like”\textsuperscript{598} (especially if what you would like to do is “prevent [nicotine] withdrawal symptoms”\textsuperscript{599} regardless of the health consequences for you and your employees). Going beyond his by now tiresomely repetitive general plea not to weaken the bill’s public health benefits, Olson in his reply stressed that secondhand smoke was recirculated through ventilation systems, which did not make the air safe to breathe. In his closing remarks Lukan, again took up the cudgels for smoking \textsuperscript{595}Telephone interview with Linda Upmeyer, Garner (Aug. 18, 2008). Upmeyer, who did not know whether the JEL students did actually speak to the owners, did not purport to have changed the students’ minds.

\textsuperscript{596}House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr); \textit{House Journal 2008}, at 333 (Feb. 19).

\textsuperscript{598}House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

small businessmen, literally screaming at the top of his lungs on behalf of a (presumably lung-impaired) body shop owner with two employees who “has paid taxes for 40 years to the state of Iowa, always on time, never late, not once” and whose “legal right” to smoke the legislature was taking away. On the record roll call H-8019 was defeated by a vote of 47 to 53, which exactly coincided with the parties’ numerical strength, but hid the fact that six Republicans and six Democrats crossed over, virtually all of whom had been seen on the other side of the aisle on previous ballots. Thus, except for the floor manager’s, all amendments were defeated. That all of the minority party’s amendments lost was hardly surprising; on the contrary, the majority party’s control of a legislative body is defined as much by its capacity to defeat the other party’s obstructive amendments as to pass its own bills. As a corollary to the operating principle that leadership does not permit a bill to be debated if it is not certain that the measure will pass, normally leaders would also not permit a bill to be debated if they were unsure whether the minority’s amendments that would seriously weaken it would lose. In the case of H.F. 2212, however, as Representative Mascher observed the next day, “we had people switching votes all over the place. Leadership normally does not allow a bill to be defeated unless they know exactly what people are going to do. It seemed the longer this bill was out there the more skittish people became about supporting it. We definitely knew Olson’s amendment would pass but we were unsure about two or three of the [R]epublican amendments. Those amendments could have killed the bill and they would not have failed if it weren’t for some brave [R]epublicans.”

When debate on the bill itself finally resumed, the speech with which one of those Republicans, Walt Tomenga, his party’s most steadfast apostate on H.F. 2212, opened the discussion was also one of the most remarkable because he emphasized that this “imperfect” bill’s most important achievement would be a reduction in smoking and prevention of young people from starting to smoke in Iowa. Of the two predominant reasons for quitting and/or not starting, one, price, had been dealt with by the cigarette tax increase in 2007; the other, availability

---

600House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
601House Journal 2008, at 334 (Feb. 19). The Democrats were Bailey, Huser, Mertz, Qurik, Schueller, and Zirkelbach; the Republicans were Baudler, Drake, Jacobs, Linda Miller, Raecker, and Tomenga (of whom only Jack Drake was a newcomer to apostasy). Oddly, Lykam, who stated later that he opposed prohibiting owners from smoking in their own offices, voted against the amendment. Telephone interview with Jim Lykam, Davenport (Aug. 24, 2008).
602Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Feb. 20, 2008).
(of places to smoke), was being addressed by the statewide ban. Next, Tomenga pointed out that the reduction in smoking would have positive financial and productivity effects by reducing illness and absenteeism. Only in third and last place did Tomenga mention that the bill would improve the quality of life by reducing the effects of secondhand smoke. He thus gave voice to the understanding that the bill’s ultimate rationale was to promote the decline in smoking prevalence: locational smoking prohibitions, restricted opportunities to smoke, and overall reduced smoking all went hand in hand with reduced exposure of nonsmokers. The underlying public health strategy that Tomenga objectively ascribed to the initiative was straightforward: the most efficacious way to reduce secondhand smoke was to reduce smoking.

Party-line Republicans who had no interest in banning smoking resumed their pretense-laden attacks on the bill for its casino exemption. Northwest Iowa farmer Gary Worthan, after asking whether and being told by Olson that the shop where he had his farm trucks repaired would be covered, illogically concluded that this coverage would be “just another hole...in this bill.” Had the bill come to the floor with no exemptions, Worthan claimed, he would have been “hard pressed” to decide based on the (conflicting considerations of) health benefits, what his constituents wanted, and individual businessmen’s rights to run their businesses. But above all the casino exemption was the great spoiler, which he proceeded to explicate by reference to one of his wife’s clients who had been lobbying him for a casino smoking ban since before he entered the legislature (in 2007). This “gentleman” spent all his time in casinos: he drove 130 miles one way to work as a dealer at a casino in Council Bluffs, and then whenever he got three or four days off, he and his wife flew to Las Vegas to gamble there. At first Worthan assured his colleagues that this man was not addicted to gambling, but then expressed some doubt on that point. In any event, the bill as it was did him no good and therefore offered Worthan no reason to vote for it. Having thus revealed the micro-basis of his formulation of public policy, Worthan dredged up again his party’s rhetorical commitment to pure, consistent, all-or-nothing legislation. In contrast, he derided Democrats’ “chest pounding and self-congratulation about all the health benefits” for Iowans while they singled out one group (of full-time addicted gamblers) as unworthy of those benefits. Worthan, whose party had refused even to let an exemptionless bill be debated when they controlled the legislature, would have nothing to do with a bill just shy of universal coverage because Democrats had surrendered “the moral high ground” to casinos in 2008 as they already had in 2007 when they increased the cigarette tax in 2007 instead of enacting a 100- percent ban on cigarettes—“the one moral high ground” if they were really that bad for people, who were unable to decide for themselves (not to smoke).604

601House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

Opportunely, Democrat Mark Smith, who saw H.F. 2212 as “one of the most profound public measures” in the state’s history, intervened to lambaste Republicans’ hypocritical anti-hypocrisy laments, pointing out, for example, that many who opposed the casino exemption nevertheless voted to exempt farmers.605 The next Democrat to address the chamber, Wayne Ford of Des Moines, only the tenth African-American ever elected to the Iowa legislature,606 gave, by a wide margin, the most rabble-rousing speech members heard that evening. Recalling, in colorful language, how he had started smoking at age 17 and continued for 30 years in the quest to be a “cool black man,” the 57-year-old Ford related that people with his smoking profile took 15 years off their lives. He was also unique in slamming the cigarette corporations for having lied about their products’ lethality. And as for those who had the “nerve” to be worried about the casino exemption, he suggested that they start getting “real, very real”: the mortality caused by smoking “wasn’t about no casinos, y’all.” All fired up, he proposed that the House deal with the issue by adding an amendment that very night prohibiting gambling in Iowa. Ford was one of very few legislators who openly broke with the disingenuous pseudo-libertarian implication (and at times declaration) that protecting smokers from exposure to secondhand smoke was not designed to interfere with smokers’ right to smoke: on the contrary, he saw the battle against first- and secondhand smoking as inseparably interconnected.607

After Republican Soderberg had ludicrously charged that if “you’ve got a building, you almost need 24-hour surveillance to make sure that someone does not jeopardize the business” (presumably by smoking within 10 feet of it in the middle of the night and then being reported or even turning himself in to the police in order to cause the business a $100 penalty at the expense of a $50 penalty to himself), Representative Wise, who had ‘run’ the casino amendment in committee and now admitted that the exemptions were “perhaps too broadly drawn,” dramatically proclaimed the bill to be a “historic piece of legislation” that would become this General Assembly’s “legacy.” Because, in addition to being a pro-public health bill, it was also pro-business, pro-quality of life, and pro-life, anyone who opposed it—and the only lobbyists declaring against it were R. J. Reynolds and businesses selling cigarettes—would have to put up strawmen

604 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

605 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

607 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
to find excuses to vote No.\textsuperscript{608}

Paulsen—Olson’s soft-spoken lawyerly nemesis who viewed the bill as not being about smoking and health, but “property rights and fairness,” although in fact it was a “bullying or harassment bill” vis-a-vis small businesses\textsuperscript{609}—exceeded the 10-minute limit on remarks trying to extract from the floor manager, whom he regarded as a “true believer” in the anti-smoking campaign,\textsuperscript{610} the admission that the wording of the casino exemption (“Any property, including hotel and motel rooms, owned or operated by an entity licensed under chapter 99D or 99F”)\textsuperscript{611} literally likewise conferred an exemption on any property owned or operated by the entity licensed to operate a casino, even if it were the entity’s business office far away from the casino or an Applebee’s restaurant for which it had a franchise in another city. Olson’s purported ignorance of the casino licensing code provisions and his reluctance to discuss what appeared to be a far-fetched hypothetical situation combined to draw out the interrogation, though at least once Olson did concede that in theory the exemption might be that broad—a concession that might have prompted some of the bill’s supporters to defect over what would have emerged as an irrationally and embarrassingly expansive exemption. To be sure, Olson added that such an extended exemption was not the provision’s intent, but he did not voice any need to rectify this unintended consequence, in part, perhaps, because he stated that he was unable to understand what problem Paulsen was trying to solve. Ironically, Paulsen’s own professed ignorance of several key legal issues contributed to his failure to lead Olson socratically to an unambiguous confirmation of the answer his interrogator was seeking.\textsuperscript{612}

In the first of two potentially important colloquies fleshing out the scope of the coverage of the smoking ban on the “grounds of any public \textsuperscript{608}House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Wise listed Pfizer, John Deere, and Wal-mart as having declared for the bill through their lobbyists, but Wal-mart, a large seller of cigarettes, was not included on the legislature’s website list of lobbyists’ declarations for H.F. 2212. \texttt{http://coolice.state.legis.ia.us/CoolICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=DspReport&ga=82&type=b&hbill=HF2212} (visited Aug. 24, 2008).

\textsuperscript{609}House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr) (floor remarks made during his last speech of the debate).

\textsuperscript{610}Telephone interview with Kraig Paulsen, driving on I-80 between Cedar Rapids and Des Moines (Aug. 19, 2008).

\textsuperscript{611}H.F. 2212, § 9 (Feb. 19, 2008).

\textsuperscript{612}House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Because the exemption was ultimately confined to the gaming floor, this issue did not have to be resolved.
buildings”—which would become one of the most contested terms for definition when, following enactment, the Iowa Department of Public Health drafted the implementing rules—Raecker asked Olson whether smoking would be prohibited on the entire grounds of public golf courses because public buildings were located on them. Olson began by stating that “the issue is whether it’s defined as a public place of assembly.” Although it was true that the subsubsection of the subsection on “outdoor areas” did (at that time) ban smoking on/in “[t]he grounds of any public buildings and places of public assembly owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions, including the grounds of a private residence of any state employee any portion of which is open to the public,” clearly the “grounds of...public buildings” and “places of public assembly” were two different subcategories (which might overlap in some instances). Why Olson instinctively gravitated to the latter as the controlling issue would not become clearer until the second colloquy (with Rep. Jodi Tymeson), but at this point he was confused and confusing—so much so that while Raecker was apparently aware of Olson’s confusion and content, perhaps for tactical reasons, to let them talk past each other, Olson may not have grasped the existence of the gap between them. Olson tried to work his way back from more solidly grounded words by confirming at the outset that such buildings as the pro shop would be covered, but when Raecker pressed him about the golf course itself, his argument turned brittle: “And then the interpretation becomes, moves, I believe, to the definition of, well, when it speaks of outdoor areas and areas of public assembly, I don’t believe a golf course falls under an area of public assembly.” Olson lost touch with the provision he was supposed to be authoritatively interpreting for the House by dropping “grounds of any public buildings” from the text altogether—presumably because, as would be revealed 20 minutes later, he was so fixated on Soderberg’s (and Republicans’) original purpose of covering the governor’s mansion, that he was unable to see his way to attaching any other meaning to “public buildings” than public employees’ private residences open to the public. Though he plumped for “places of public assembly” as deciding the question at hand, it was a non sequitur in the sense that neither the syntax nor the meaning of the provision linked public assembly places to buildings; consequently, he should have either proceeded from the public building to the grounds or skipped over the building altogether and dwelt exclusively on public assembly places. That he conflated the two subcategories but nevertheless failed to elucidate what a place

613 See below ch. 36.
614 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
615 H.F. 2212, § 3(2)(f) (Feb. 19, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

of public assembly was and why it did not a apply to a golf course was strongly suggestive of his own perplexity, even while his posture as a strong floor manager—Raecker had opened his remarks by complimenting Olson on his responses to questions—precluded him from admitting his bewilderment. In the event, as soon as Olson had uttered his judgment that a golf course was not a place of public assembly, Raecker finished, as it were, Olson’s sentence by tacking on: “But it would be a grounds of public buildings.” Then, without pausing or perhaps even giving Olson time to comprehend that they had just reached diametrically opposite conclusions using different subcategories as touchstones of coverage, Raecker had Olson confirm that under the latter’s interpretation smoking was not prohibited on golf courses. The words in which the audibly harried Olson chose to couch his confirmation let loose a veritable reign of confusion: “My interpretation is that it is not covered by grounds, you know, public assembly, grounds for public assembly.” Rather than commenting on the incoherence of their exchange, Raecker (apparently without the slightest irony) expressed appreciation for his interpretation and suggested that as the bill moved to the Senate they might work on “actually” defining “public buildings” or “grounds of public buildings.” That any of their 98 colleagues, if they were actually listening to the colloquy, had been able to secure the slightest purchase on the meaning of this crucial term for the exceedingly controversial question of outdoor smoking bans seems implausible.

In the end, then, Raecker’s colloquy with floor manager Olson inadvertently did a disservice to the legislative history of “grounds of a public building” precisely because it misled the inattentive to mistake incoherence for conclusiveness; as a result, the Iowa Department of Public Health, the agency charged by the legislature with issuing the rules to administer the Smokefree Air Act, underinclusively defined the term and thus perpetuated the exposure of millions of nonsmokers to tobacco smoke in multitudes of outdoor settings.

The confusion only deepened a few minutes later when Raecker, after having delved into several unrelated exemptions, asked whether smoking was banned on a public walking path behind his house in Urbandale, which was a gathering point for people. Olson, more confidently this time, yet still without offering a

---

616House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
617Raecker elicited from Olson that the rationale for the exemptions for hotels and semi-private rooms in long-terms care facilities was avoiding issues of banning smoking in what was effectively a private residence. He rejected Raecker’s supposition that the exemption for veterans organization was based on the military’s having pushed free cigarettes on soldiers, who defended the country; rather, it derived from its lining up closely with the exemption for private clubs as well as from some House members’ strong feelings. House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
definition of the key term other than that an “assembly” meant a large number of people, stated that the path would not be converted into a “grounds for public assembly” merely by virtue of being a place where people ran into and chatted with one another. But when Raecker instanced a neighborhood picnic at a public park (at which the city had already banned smoking), Olson did concede that smoking would be banned—if the park was a place of assembly, though he still failed to define such a place.\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).}

That such a primitive social analyst as Republican Sandy Greiner, a very conservative farmer who mockingly denied that anyone was forced to work anywhere and projected her anxiety that as soon as cigarettes were banned, “[t]hey’re coming to get us” overweight people,\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).} was nevertheless able to force the articulate Olson to turn virtually tongue-tied trying to justify the exemption for limousines under private hire\footnote{H.F. 2212, § 4(7) (Feb. 19, 2008).} underscored the senselessness of some exemptions that lacked even the political expedience or salience of that for casinos. After Olson had freely repeated that he had said that carcinogens could linger for up to two weeks, the only rationale he came up with for exposing passengers to secondhand (or thirdhand) smoke was that people were “obviously choosing” to use limousines. The irony was probably lost on Olson that he was echoing Greiner’s “It’s about choices” to explain why people were not forced, but chose, to work in smoky places. But before he could try to distinguish the two situations, Greiner asked why the bill did not at the very least require smoking and nonsmoking limousines as a parallel to hotel rooms. For the first and only time during the debate Olson conceded that if the point had been raised the day before (off the floor), he might have filed an amendment “to get that defined,” thus enabling Greiner to fire back as the last word that it was then hypocritical to prohibit farmers from smoking in their tractors.\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).}!

Picking up where Raecker had left off, Republican Jodi Tymeson, a retired brigadier general and deputy commandant of the Iowa Army National Guard,\footnote{http://www.ngb.army.mil/ngbgomo/library/bio/1278.htm (visited Aug. 25, 2008).} undertook the second attempt to clarify the scope of the “grounds of any public buildings.” Olson was somewhat more forthcoming when she asked him whether state park campgrounds were covered by the ban than he had been with Raecker; in particular, he shared with the chamber the fact that the language in question had been added in committee by an amendment that was not his. Consequently, with less than full authorial competence he expressed his understanding that the

\begin{footnotes}
\item[618]House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
\item[619]House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
\item[621]House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
\end{footnotes}
“idea” behind the amendment was for the law to “get to” residences on public grounds such as the governor’s mansion and the president’s mansion at the University of Iowa. Haltingly, Olson then explained that “[w]hat we’re talking about here is...I don’t think that the language of this section changes anything in the definition of what outdoor spaces are covered, places of public assembly, and that kind of thing”—other than with regard to these special private residences on public grounds, which, unlike all other private residences, would not be exempt. On its face this interpretation was preposterous: had the Commerce Committee wanted to confine the scope of Representative Soderberg’s amendment to Terrace Hill in conformity with what everyone knew to be Republicans’ intent to embarrass the governor, Petersen and Olson could easily have reworded it. But, as Olson’s own scarcely veiled smirk revealed when he surprised Soderberg on February 5 by accepting the amendment, Democrats presumably rejoiced that it was a Republican who had expanded the scope of the outdoor ban. Whatever the majority party’s intent had been, the very wording of the amendment—which expressly made those private residences of state employees a subset of a vastly larger set of buildings—was indisputably irreconcilable with Olson’s effort to ignore the many thousands of public buildings in Iowa and their grounds and focus only on the very few private residences. Whether he actually believed what he was saying or was merely confused, he received a reprieve when General Tymeson, whether inadvertently or intentionally, returned to her question about the state park campgrounds, but this time linked coverage to “places of public assembly.” Olson immediately used the chance to escape the larger interpretive predicament into which he had maneuvered himself by trivializing the potential scope of coverage by insisting that “assembly to me means a large group of people, a large gathering of people.” When Tymeson tried to satisfy his condition by mentioning that her whole family had once been at a state park campground, Olson shut off the dialog by admitting ignorance of the size of her family but lifting the coverage threshold with the invention of a number out of the blue: “I mean [w]e’re talking hundreds of people here.” Asked a direct question by Tymeson, he finally stated that by his interpretation campgrounds were not covered. Audibly left almost wordless by Olson’s surprisingly unambiguous one word answer (“No”), the brigadier general could be heard receiving a prompt from a male voice that she should proceed to ask about state fairgrounds. Without even hurling back at Olson the fact that the state fair exceeded his numerical threshold by at least an order of magnitude, Tymeson kept urging the view that the entire fair grounds were a place of public assembly, but Olson refused to go that far or to offer any robust criteria for determining when a “place of public assembly” as a whole trumped the grounds of individual public buildings.\footnote{House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).}

In his last speech, the convivial Representative May, who admitted that “this is a difficult vote for me,” focused on a point that no one else had raised: the allegedly skimpy scientific basis for concern about outdoor exposure to secondhand smoke. “The problem,” as May pithily put it, was “we went outside. If we’d a [sic] stayed inside with this legislation, we don’t have a problem. ... But the problem is, Representative Olson,...that you don’t have any evidence of the impact of outdoor smoking. There aren’t any creditable [sic] studies. They haven’t been done. There’s no research. If there is, folks, I spent a lot of time on the computer for nothing.” The one article that he found (by three researchers at Stanford University) concluded that outdoor exposure could be damaging, but limited the risk zone to a distance of six to eight feet, whereas H.F. 2212 created obligations with which it would be difficult for businesspeople such as May to comply. “Like I [sic],” he assured the House, they wanted to protect their employees, but “this legislation goes too far too fast—it’s way ahead of the research and our ability to decide what would be safe for the citizens of Iowa.”\footnote{Mark Shwartz, “Exposure to Secondhand Smoke in Outdoor Settings a Risk, Study Finds,” Stanford News Service, on http://news-service.stanford.edu/news/2007/may9/smoking-050907.html (visited Aug. 28, 2008).}

Whether May’s googling was totally worthless or not is less relevant than the fact that what he had found was merely a summary of the article,\footnote{Neil Klepeis, Wayne Ott, and Paul Switzer, “Real-Time Measurement of Outdoor Tobacco Smoke Particles,” \textit{Journal of the Air & Waste Management Association} 57:522-34 (May 2007).} which he did not read and misdescribed. The article, as its lead author, Neil Klepeis, explained immediately after its appearance, focused on single-cigarette sources, though even then: “In a few cases, we were able to detect pollution 10 or 20 feet away from a single cigarette but the levels were generally small. If wind or air drafts carry the plume directly from the cigarette to your nose, or you are traveling directly into the plume while running, then...it would be possible for you to experience one of the highly concentrated plumes that we routinely measured within a few feet of the smoker. I too have smelled bits of smoke from a distant single smoker (more than 20 feet away).” However, more relevant to the avoidance of smoke gauntlets, which had formed the basis of the bill’s 50- and then 10-foot no-smoking zone at entrances to covered public places, was the existence in “realistic situations” of “multiple smokers,”\footnote{Email from Neil Klepeis to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007).} which, as Klepeis noted,

is a different thing. While we did not conduct controlled measurements for multiple smokers, it is reasonable to assume that the levels increase in proportion to the number of active smokers present. So even under mixed-wind conditions, a group of many smokers could generate high levels of pollution more than 20 feet away. We generally found that pollution levels decrease in proportion to the change in distance, and we measured specific average concentrations within a couple feet of a single smoker for 10-minute periods of active smoking (up to 500 micrograms per cubic meter). So it would be possible to estimate levels from a group of smokers by multiplying by the number of smokers and calculating the decrease in concentration for different distances. Roughly, if there were 10 smokers currently active, you could still experience very polluted air at a distance of 50 feet or more.

May’s claim that the article by Klepeis et al. was the first research on outdoor exposure was simply wrong. Over several years, field studies and controlled experiments had shown that “under some conditions, outdoor levels of tobacco smoke...can be as high as indoor levels of secondhand smoke....” For example,

---

628Email from Neil Klepeis to Marc Linder (May 2, 2007).

629The article’s authors merely claimed that theirs was “the first peer-reviewed publication of systematic measurements of” outdoor tobacco smoke concentrations. Neil Klepeis, Wayne Ott, and Paul Switzer, “Real-Time Measurement of Outdoor Tobacco Smoke Particles,” Journal of the Air & Waste Management Association 57:522-34 at 522 (May 2007). Previous studies included one by the California Air Resources Board at an airport, junior college, government center, office complex, and amusement park, which found at sites with many smokers outdoor nicotine levels comparable to indoor concentrations. California Environmental Protection Agency, Air Resources Board, Proposed Identification of Environmental Tobacco Smoke as a Toxic Air Contaminant Part A: Exposure Assessment, V-6 - V-17 (2005), on http://repositories.cdlib.org/context/tc/article/1194/type/pdf/viewcontent/ (visited Aug. 30, 2008). An experiment on a cruise ship at sea at 20 knots an hour revealed that outdoor tobacco smoke “in various smoking-permitted outdoor areas of the ship tripled the level of carcinogens to which nonsmokers were exposed relative to indoor and outdoor areas in which smoking did not occur, despite the strong breezes and unlimited dispersion volume. Moreover, outdoor smoking areas were contaminated with carcinogens almost to the same extent as a popular casino on board in which smoking was permitted.” James Repace, “Indoor and Outdoor Carcinogen Pollution on a Cruise Ship in the Presence and Absence of Tobacco Smoking” Presented at the 14th Annual Conference of the International Society of Exposure Analysis (Oct. 17-21, 2005) (summarized in James Repace, “Fact Sheet: Outdoor Air Pollution from Secondhand Smoke”, on http://www.repace.com (visited Aug. 30, 2008).

James Repace, a biophysicist, former senior scientist at the Environmental Protection Agency, and one of the world’s leading experts on secondhand smoke, conducted a study in 2005 at the campus of the University of Maryland at Baltimore in which he found that:

These experiments dispel the common misconception that smoking outdoors can be ignored because smoke plumes immediately dissipate into the environment. These controlled experiments with and without smokers show similar results: if a receptor such as a doorway, air intake, or an individual is surrounded by an area source—and this would include an entranceway with a group of smokers standing nearby—then regardless of which way the wind blows, the receptor is always downwind from the source. Cigarette smoke RSP [respirable particles] concentrations decline approximately inversely with distance downwind from the point source, as expected, whereas cigarette smoke PPAH [particulate polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons] concentrations decline faster, at approximately inversely as the square of this distance.

Based on these measurements, which involve a single ring of cigarettes or smokers, the smoke levels do not approach background levels for fine particles or carcinogens until about 7 meters or 23 feet from the source, which is likely to be the smoke from no more than 1 or 2 smokers. Greater numbers of smokers in the area could lead to higher concentrations, because a crowd of smokers constitute an area source, whose plumes may overlap downwind, potentially causing smoke concentrations to increase locally before dissipating at greater distances. Secondhand smoke causes a number of acute symptoms (eye, nose, and throat irritation, headaches, dizziness, and nausea) and chronic diseases (lung and nasal sinus cancer and heart disease). Students or faculty passing through the cloud of smoke would encounter detectable levels at about 7 meters (23 feet) from a smoker, and irritating levels at 4 meters (13 feet).

Availing himself of the opportunity that Speaker Murphy granted him to speak for a second time, Raecker cast himself in opposition to Olson and Wise as preferring perfection over progress: he was one of those “purists”—but one who expressly denied occupying the “moral high ground”—who were needed from time to time to stand up and say “we can do better.” His animus was directed in particular against the exclusion of casinos, which would now become an even stronger magnet to people afflicted with the dual “addictive disorder” of gambling.

---

631 James Repace, “Measurements of Outdoor Air Pollution from Secondhand Smoke on the UMBC Campus” at 9-10 (June 1, 2005), on http://www.repace.com/pdf/outdoorair.pdf (visited Aug. 30, 2008). In connection with passage by the New York City City Council of a law prohibiting smoking in 1,700 city parks and along 14 miles of city beaches, city health officials stated that “people seated within three feet of a smoker are exposed to roughly the same levels of secondhand smoke, regardless of whether they are indoors or outdoors.” Javier Hernandez, “Smoking Ban for Beaches and Parks Is Approved,” NYT, Feb. 2, 2011, on http://www.nytimes.com.
and smoking. That he was not contemptuous of the latter addiction he more than intimated in a cracking voice: “I’m a previous smoker. I know the pain and the challenge that it is for an individual to stop this habit.” But whether he would have voted against a bill that he knew would save lives if his vote had been decisive he did not reveal.632

After Olson (his tongue seemingly a respectful distance from his cheek) in his closing remarks had declared that “we had a great conversation this evening...discussing the intricacies of the bill,” especially the exemptions, and following four and three-quarter hours of debate,633 on final passage H.F. 2212 attracted 11 Republican and lost eight Democratic votes, producing a 56 to 44 outcome.634 Apart from the unique case of Ro Foege, a strong supporter of local control who registered a protest against the exemptions,635 there were no surprises among the Democratic cross-overs.636 One reason that the House passed the statewide smoking ban was that, as an astonishing sign of the times reflective of the nationwide sea change that had made it possible for H.F. 2212 to get as far as it had, only two of the 53 members of the Democratic caucus, according to the bill’s author, smoked.637 Nevertheless, the lingering hold that the tobacco industry’s meritless chief claim maintained even on some of the bill’s strong backers was embarrassingly on display in the admission by Coralville Democrat David Jacoby that “it wasn’t an easy vote” inasmuch as he saw “some validity to the arguments of those who contend that whether smoking is allowed in a business should be left to the establishment’s ownership and management...”638
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The larger number of Republican supporters was accounted for by four representatives (Gipp, Hoffman, Rayhons, and Van Fossen), who had not previously voted against the numerous Republican exemptions.639

The strong reservations harbored by some of the 11 Republicans who voted for the bill were revealed a few days later by Mike May at a bipartisan multi-639House Journal 2008, at 335 (Feb. 19). Six House Republicans (Anderson, Baudler, Clute, Jacobs, May, and Tomenga) voted for H.F. 2212 on final passage on Feb. 19, Mar. 12, and Apr. 8. Henry Rayhons, 99 percent of whose constituents wanted the best bill possible, voted Aye on Feb. 19 and Apr. 8, but voted Nay on Mar. 12 because the Senate had struck the casino exemption. He reported that once the law went into effect, it worked out excellently in his district. Telephone interview with Henry Rayhons, Garner (Aug. 23, 2008). Linda Miller, Chuck Gipp, and Jamie Van Fossen voted Aye on Feb. 19 and Mar. 12, but opposed the bill on Apr. 8. Miller a registered nurse who nevertheless wanted to permit smoking in 21-and-over bars if casinos were exempt, changed her vote after the conference committee merely retained the casino exemption. After the law went into effect she did not receive complaints from bar owners in Bettendorf, although two of her constituents were bar owners involved in the lawsuit challenging the new statute. Telephone interview with Linda Miller, Bettendorf (Aug. 24, 2008). Gipp, who purported to have personally welcomed a smoking ban in bars and restaurants enthusiastically, changed his vote once it became clear that the “unfair” casino exemption would not be struck. Telephone interview with Chuck Gipp, Decorah (Aug. 24, 2008). After voting Aye on Feb. 19, Clarence Hoffman, who stated on the floor in the last speech before Olson’s closing remarks that the overwhelming majority of his constituents supported the bill, voted Nay on Mar. 12 and Apr. 8. Hoffman had voted Aye originally because the Democratic leadership had told him that the bill would return to the House and that he could have input toward improving the bill, but once it became clear to him that his preference for permitting smoking in bars 75 percent or more of whose sales were from alcohol would not be adopted, he changed his vote. After the law had gone into effect, some bar owners in his district suffered revenue losses, while others’ business picked up. Telephone interview with Clarence Hoffman, Denison (Aug. 24, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

legislator constituent meeting. Reacting to a farmer’s comment that he regarded the bill as “ranking among the top ‘stupid legislation’” he had witnessed during his 73 years, May observed that he had voted for it, but it “just got off track.” Adopting a radically stripped-down ban position that his leader, Rants, had earlier imputed to Iowans and more than 90 percent of the House, May explained that: “I would like to see the ability to go into a restaurant, sit down and not have to worry about smoke as a family. [B]ut I think this bill extends itself way too far.” Expressing the hope that the Senate could “bring a little common sense back to it,” May sought to assuage his party’s putative rugged-individualist base without alienating the majority of voters: “But I supported the initiative to get it over with—because that’s what I think our constituents wanted us to do. But it does border on stupid.”

Only now, after House passage, did Principal Financial Group begin to believe that enactment was a possibility in 2008. Two days later, Principal’s chairman and CEO, J. Barry Griswell, Iowa’s highest paid corporate executive, published an op-ed in the Register (which 10 days later called him “the closest thing the metro area has to a celebrity chief executive” and opined that he “may well be the most powerful person in the community”) applauding the House and urging the Senate to follow suit on the grounds that “a smoking ban will enhance the state’s image as a progressive place to do business, live and work” in addition to reducing health care costs and making Iowa healthier. Specifically, Griswell—whose piece was co-signed by the presidents of AFSCME Iowa Council 61, the Iowa Medical Society, and Allied Insurance—argued that smoke-free workplaces and public areas would be “attractive to new companies, as well as established companies looking to relocate or expand.” In a follow-up the next day to an email list of “government affairs and business community thought leaders,” Merle Pederson, PFG vice president for government affairs, offered to make available Principal’s electronic internet system to “anyone...interested in doing employees grassroots communications to their Senate members....” For the “executive level grasstops messages to their Senator members” presumably more intimate forms of communication were planned along with “executive management lobby visits....”

641 Email from Merle Pederson to Marc Linder (Aug. 11, 2008).

642 S. Dinnen, “Griswell’s $11.8 Million Tops,” DMR, June 8, 2008 (1D) (NewsBank).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The Senate Passes H.F. 2212 Covering Casinos

“I want to put the casino impact into some context,” added [Republican] Sen. [David] Johnson. “You’re talking between 9,000 and 10,000 employees at the 17 state-licensed casinos and you’re talking between 22 and 25 million visitors to those 17 casinos every year. ... If you take the 17 together, they have to be the largest private-sector employer in the state. They also happen to be our most consistent source of revenue in the state treasury. It goes up a little bit every year,”

Sometime[s] things don’t seem like they actually are here.

There are very very few people that smoke anymore. I don’t even know of a smoker in this entire Senate.

Despite House passage—which surprised anti-smoking Senate Democrats—when asked whether it was a foregone conclusion that H.F. 2212 would also pass the Senate, Assistant Majority Leader Joe Bolkcom replied two days later: “No, we have work to do in the senate to pass the house bill.” That he literally meant the bill as it passed the House became clear later that same day when the center of power in the Senate, Majority Leader Gronstal, predicted that the “‘odds of something passing over here approach 100 percent.’” Without 647Email from Sen. Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 26, 2008).

648Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (remarks by Democratic Senator Dennis Black) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin, communications director, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff).

649Telephone interview with Jack Hatch, Des Moines (May 19, 2008).

650Email from Marc Linder to Joe Bolkcom (Feb. 19, 2008) and Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 21, 2008).
promising that “the House’s version would pass the Senate, he said some form of tobacco control will.” The press interpreted Gronstal’s caution to mean not that opponents had questioned the health consequences of exposure to secondhand smoke, but that they regarded some definitions as unclear or inconsistent with other provisions in the bill. One such question they raised was whether the prohibition on smoking in “‘entertainment venues where members of the general public assemble to witness entertainment events’” applied to outdoor paths inside the Iowa State Fair. Others wondered whether it covered state campgrounds, adding that it would be “‘silly’” to be permitted to build a fire but not light a cigarette next to a campfire. While acknowledging that some clarifications might be needed, Tyler Olson urged that such details not be permitted to derail achievement of the historically important ultimate goal. Conveniently, IDPH propagandized on behalf of the measure’s reasonableness by emphasizing that enforcement would focus on education rather than citations.651

On February 20, H.F. 2212 was referred to the Senate State Government Committee,652 whose chairman, Michael Connolly, a long-time anti-smoking militant, the next day assigned it to a subcommittee composed of himself, Staci Appel (chair), and Republican Mark Zieman.653 Appel, who would become the bill’s floor manager, was only in her second year in the Senate; a self-described “full-time mother” of five children and community volunteer (and Methodist Sunday School teacher in Indianola and wife of an Iowa Supreme Court justice), she had previously been a financial consultant at Merrill Lynch and USB Paine Webber.654 Unsurprisingly, the same day Connolly and Appel signed the subcommittee report recommending passage, while Zieman, complaining that the rush was preventing the public from examining it, refused.655 Connolly (mistakenly) expected the House bill to emerge from his committee without change, but he was uncertain as to what floor debate would bring, though he did express the opinion that the Senate would “pursue a statewide ban with exemptions” instead of the local control approach that it had passed in 2007.656

652 Senate Journal 2008, at 1:305 (Feb. 20).
653 Senate Journal 2008, at 1:337 (Feb. 21).
656 Ron Boshart, “Senate Ban Could Be Debated in Iowa Senate on Wednesday,”
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Gronstal himself expressed strong support for a ban at a legislative leadership press conference on February 21. Personalizing public policy, he emphasized that the bill was about worker protection by pointing out that pregnant waitresses at one of his favorite “hang-outs” in Des Moines “don’t like working in a place where they’re exposed to lots of smoke.” To be sure, the Senate majority leader’s insistence that the ban was “not about dictating personal choices” hardly captured the full complexity of the conflict: as long as the state was unwilling to prohibit smoking and tobacco altogether, and continued to regard self- and other-destructive nicotine addiction as one “personal choice” among many others that was legally permissible to exercise in some places but not in others, then it was disingenuous to deny that the legislature’s decision to have public health considerations trump the “personal choice” to smoke in restaurants did not constitute a governmental dictation. That such public smoking may have been more pervasive and inveterate than drinking alcohol while driving and may also have been regarded by more people as less irrationally dangerous (to others) presumably reinforced the publicly proclaimed perception by smokers (and their profit-seeking abettors) that government dictation or suppression of “personal choice” was indeed taking place and should have made it even more incumbent on the legislature to admit that the ban was about both protecting nonsmokers’ health and (partially) suppressing an activity that, as the statistics adduced during the floor debates revealed, had been found to be one-eighth as lethal homicidally as suicidally.658

In fact, on February 25, the State Government Committee approved the bill, recommending that it do pass with an amendment, on an almost perfect party-line vote, all Republicans voting “present.”659 Although they purported to have passed 658 With the increased estimate of deaths attributed to secondhand smoke exposure to about 50,000 in the United States the ratio rose from about one-twelfth to one-eighth. Between 2000 and 2004 total annual average smoking-attributable mortality was 443,595, of whom 49,400 died as a result of secondhand smoke exposure. B. Adhikari et al., “Smoking-Attributable Mortality, Years of Potential Life Lost, and Productivity Losses—United States, 2000-2004,” Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Review 57(45):1226-28 (Nov. 14, 2008), on http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/preview/mmwrhtml/mm5745a3.htm.

659 The amendment itself was approved on a perfect party-line vote (the nine Democrats voting yes and the six Republicans voting present), but on approval of the bill with the amendment one Democrat (Dennis Black, who ultimately voted against the bill on final floor passage) joined the Republicans in voting present. Committee Minutes for on the vote because they had not yet seen the new amendment, “[t]he real reason,” according to the American Cancer Society’s lobbyist, was they were “not sure how to vote now that the new amendment took out the casino exemption which is what many were saying is the reason they would not support the bill.”

In other words, when Democrats called their bluff, Republicans were trapped by their own mendacious rhetoric into voicelessness lest they offend their pro-tobacco base by voting Yes or unmask themselves as liars by voting No.

The amendment, offered by Appel, both watered down and strengthened the bill. The most significant weakening changes struck the 10-foot no-smoking zone at the entrance to any public place in which smoking was prohibited as well as the 10-foot no-smoking area around “outdoor seating or serving areas of restaurants,” and the 10-foot perimeter beyond school grounds, and exempted “farm tractors, farm trucks, and implements of husbandry when being used for their intended purposes,” thus permitting farmers and their employees to smoke in those vehicles. Coverage was also restricted by striking the smoking ban in “places of public assembly.” At the same time, the amendment expanded coverage by undoing the House’s controversial comprehensive exemption for casinos (“Any property, including hotel and motel rooms, owned or operated by an entity licensed under chapter 99D or 99F”) and covering “[g]ambling structures, excursion gambling boats, and racetrack enclosures.” In words that bar owners would hurl back at her, Appel justified casino coverage on the grounds that it was as important to protect those working there as anywhere else: “‘I think it was only fair—if you can’t smoke at a tavern, why should you be able to smoke at a bar at the casinos?’” Deprived of their pet pseudo-peeve, Republicans invented others. Zieman, for example, hypothesized that he could cause an owner to be ticketed by simply walking into his business with a cigarette in hand. How he could 660 Email from Stacy Frelund to Marc Linder (Feb. 26, 2008).

---

661 HF 2212.513 82; S-5013 (2008). The amendment’s definition of “farmer” included “an employee of such person while the employee is actively engaged in farming.” In addition, Appel’s amendment replaced the ban on smoking in “[o]utdoor sports arenas, stadiums, amphitheaters and other entertainment venues where members of the general public meet to witness entertainment events, except in designated smoking areas which may be established in perimeter areas at least ten feet from any seating areas or concession stands with “[t]he seating areas” of those outdoor locations without the designated smoking areas. Finally, in the enforcement and penalty sections the amendment inserted coverage of those with custody or control of outdoor areas where smoking was prohibited.
662 Whitney Woodward, “Will Casinos Be Included in Iowa’s proposed Smoking
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

possibly produce this outcome when the owner’s only relevant obligation was simply to inform him that he was violating the law. 663 Zieman failed to explain. Instead, he rushed on to the punch line: “‘Why do we as a body think it’s a business’s responsibility to regulate my bad habits?’” 664 Similarly, his fellow Republican, David Hartsuch—an emergency room physician whose nagging “basic libertarian instincts” undermined his firsthand knowledge of smoking’s lethality to the extent that he still wondered whether people should not have “a right to choose their own poison”—sought to convince his constituents that the bill’s enforcement “strategy is to turn all of these business owners into paranoid snitches who rat out those who are smoking on their premises.” 665

Back in the House, despite the fact that a week earlier “‘the political reality’” had been that “‘the casino exemption had to be in there,’” floor manager Olson expressed optimism that the Senate committee’s action striking the exemption would increase rather than reduce support for the bill: “‘A lot of representatives stood up on the floor last week and said, but for the casino exemption, they would vote for the bill. So I plan on going back through and listening to the tape and approaching those members and hopefully securing their vote.’” 666 In the event, if Olson was not speaking tongue in cheek, his hopes would soon be dashed: as anti-tobacco advocate Republican Walt Tomenga later observed of his own party-mates, not a single one of them had been speaking truthfully. 667

Despite press reporting that H.F. 2212 was “awakening a strong pro-smokers’ rights contingent,” 668 two days before the bill reached the Senate floor the Register published the results of its Iowa Poll indicating that Iowans supporting a statewide smoking ban in almost all public places outnumbered those opposed to any kind of ban. Specifically, whereas 43 percent favored a statewide ban,
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

almost one third preferred local government control, and fewer than one quarter opposed all bans.669

The day before the Senate debated H.F. 2212 Governor Dave Heineman signed into law the Nebraska Clean Indoor Air Act, which contained far fewer (indoor) exemptions than the Iowa bill even as amended by the Senate State Government Committee.670 With Iowa flanked on its western (Nebraska and South Dakota) and northern (Minnesota), and much of its eastern (Illinois) border by states with anti-public smoking laws, it was fast becoming an anomaly even in the Midwest.

On the eve of full Senate consideration of the bill, part of the press may have been reporting that because most Democrats supported it and their party held 30 of 50 seats, there was no suspense about the outcome,671 the chamber’s leadership did not share that view publicly or privately. For example, Senate President Jack Kibbie told constituents in Spencer on February 23 that his caucus was evenly split on the issue: “‘One-third doesn’t [sic] want anything done; one-third want to do the local option; and the other third want a complete ban with no exemptions.’” His personal (and, as it turned out, prescient) opinion was that the casino exemption would probably remain, but would apply only to the casino proper and not to the hotels, restaurants, and lobby, which would be smoke-free. The bill would undergo change, but Kibbie did believe that “‘we will pass a smoking ban bill before we go home this year....’”672 And as late as the afternoon of February 26, the day before floor debate, Assistant Majority Leader Joe Bolkcom observed unambiguously: “We do not have the votes at this time to pass the bill that came out of committee. We need more Dems on-board. We continue to work on this.”673 673 Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 26, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The day before the Senate debate witnessed “a frenzy of lobbying...at the Statehouse.” The quality of the arguments deployed by the “smoking rights” lobby was indicated by a Davenport bar owner who saw no reason for a ban because he doubted whether secondhand smoke was a “serious factor in causing cancer,” thus lending more than a patina of accuracy to the Lung Association lobbyist’s plaint about the unbelievable amount of “disinformation” being disseminated at the Capitol. Nevertheless, even Majority Leader Gronstal himself was not sure whether a “consensus” had coalesced yet; if he determined that one was still lacking, he would “probably wait a while.” Connolly, the State Government Committee chair, revealed that even with his party’s 30-20 majority, it was “six to eight Democrats short of passing the bill without help from Republicans,” of whom the requisite number might or might not vote for H.F. 2212.674 According to one Republican who eventually voted for H.F. 2212, since it would have been political suicide for some rural Democrats to vote for the bill, the Democratic leadership—which nevertheless froze Republicans out of the majority party’s strategizing on the bill—decided that some Republicans would have to vote for it.675 Three Democrats who would probably defect from the leadership’s position (and all of whom in fact did): Tom Hancock, Dennis Black, and Keith Kreiman. Hancock, who hated being around cigarettes, would have found it personally easy to vote for the bill, but the “loud outcry from his constituents that a statewide ban would be too much government intervention” had prompted him to be leaning against it. One of the potential Republican crossovers, Dave Mulder, said he would vote for a statewide ban with no exceptions, but not if it exempted veterans organizations (he wound up voting for it despite that exemption); another, Thurman Gaskill, had been close to voting Yes, but in the meantime was undecided and leaning toward local control. Minority Leader Wieck was definitely in no danger of supporting the bill, which he called an “‘intrusion on my personal rights,’” but since some members of his caucus did not share his viewpoint, he was monitoring their position on several other versions of a ban, including one that would exempt age-restricted bars and casinos, which Gronstal immediately dismissed as off the table, though his caucus might consider an exemption for the gambling floors of casinos.676

At 6:39 a.m. on February 27, Bolkcom observed that H.F. 2212 “will be debated if have the votes to pass it. We currently do not have the votes in the 675Telephone interview with Pat Ward, West Des Moines (Aug. 18, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

senate. We will know more later this morning on whether we will debate or not today.\textsuperscript{677} Shortly before noon the Cancer Society’s lobbyist was not counting on Republicans to pass the bill for the Democrats: “I think there are some R’s that do just want to kill the bill but I do think some do not like the casino exemption and will vote in favor of the bill. If we get the 26 Democrats votes to pass the bill, possibly 6 or more Republicans will vote for it. They are hearing from their constituents who want it to pass. I think we are getting really close and the vote will probably happen today.”\textsuperscript{678} The only point on which the protagonists agreed was that, just hours before debate, the voting dynamics were “too fluid” to predict whether a “bipartisan” strategy would be successful.\textsuperscript{679}

Even moments after the Senate had taken up H.F. 2212, Bolkcom, asked whether there was a majority for the bill, emailed in real time from the chamber that “we will find out. I think we have 25 votes,”\textsuperscript{680} adding four minutes later: “I think that we will get this done.”\textsuperscript{681} He then underscored that it was “very unusual” for leadership to have gone ahead with debate not knowing whether it had a majority.\textsuperscript{682}

The Senate floor debate, which began a little after five o’clock in the evening and, apart from two interruptions for Republican caucuses, lasted about an hour and a quarter, was both much briefer and less contentious than the House debate. In particular, oppositional senators, by and large, did not engage the floor manager in lengthy colloquies that (might have) served in the House to flesh out ambiguities in the bill’s definitions and interconnections, in part because Senator Appel manifestly lacked Representative Olson’s willingness (and/or ability) to immerse herself in the details. Indeed, whether from nervousness resulting from never having floor managed such an important bill before, lack of self-confidence, or for some other reason, even in her opening remarks Appel read her brief speech haltingly and stressed words inappropriately. The most important point that she

\textsuperscript{677}Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2008).

\textsuperscript{678}Email from Stacy Frelund, American Cancer Society, director of Field Government Relations, to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2008).

\textsuperscript{680}Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2008, 5:13 p.m.).

\textsuperscript{681}Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2008, 5:17 p.m.).

\textsuperscript{682}Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2008, 5:30 p.m.). While agreeing that it would have been very unusual and stressing that he had not been privy to Gronstal’s inner thoughts, the minority leader later expressed great doubt that the majority leader would have risked the show of weakness associated with losing a vote. Telephone interview with Ron Wieck, Sioux City (Aug. 10, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

made referred to the more than 100,000 workers in Iowa employed in the food service industry, who had a “50 percent greater chance of dying from lung cancer,” who, others suggested, could “simply seek other jobs if they don’t wish to inhale secondhand smoke while they work.” However, as Appel noted, no one should have to risk unemployment just because he or she feared the 63 carcinogens in such smoke. Appel’s glibbest and most misleading comment, which fell comfortably within the range of disingenuous denials of which anti-smoking activists availed themselves, asserted that H.F. 2212 was “not a divisive tool for discriminating against those who have chosen to smoke, but an avenue to a healthier Iowa.” It is unknown whether Appel had ever tried out her non-divisiveness lecture on those who had “chosen to smoke” (at, say, age 13) and in the intervening decades had become addicts, ostracized and banished as pitifully irrational humans to stand outside in sub-zero temperatures so that the wafting garbage products of their suicidal and homicidal addiction would not harm the 80 percent of Iowans who chose not to smoke. Presumably, the bill’s supporters found it more congenial in terms of coalition-building to deny that the law was in fact part of a larger strategy designed to discriminate against smokers in order to encourage them to quit.

Appel then explained that her amendment (S-5035), which incorporated the State Government Committee amendment, struck the House bill’s glaring exemption for casinos because “[i]n one eight-hour shift the typical casino employee will inhale the equivalent of 16 cigarettes in secondhand smoke; that makes a pack a day smoker outta everyone working in casinos even if they aren’t smokers themselves.” Appel did not explain what public health benefits would

---

683 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin, communications director, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff).

684 Contrast the refreshing frankness of a Johnson County supervisor, who stated that “part of the rationale” of a Public Health Department proposal to ban all smoking on any county property was “to make it so miserable for people that they eventually quit.” Minutes of the Informal Meeting of the Johnson County Board of Supervisors at 2 (Apr. 25, 2006), on http://www.johnson-county.com/auditor/min/060425eo.htm (visited Oct. 23, 2008).

685 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin); Senate Journal 2008, at 1:410 (Feb. 27). The scientific basis of Appel’s unsourced claim quantifying secondhand smoke exposure in terms of cigarette equivalents (which Senator McCoy repeated later for bars) is unclear. At the very end of the floor debate, Republican David Hartsuch, a physician, asked Appel for her source, but received only an unembarrassed “I’d have to get back to you on that information.” Senate Debate on H.F.
result from the amendment’s elimination of the 10-foot no-smoking zones around covered public places or its conferral of an exemption on farm vehicles being used for their intended purposes. Oddly, however, she failed to mention that her amendment went beyond the committee amendment by also adding exemptions for posts of veterans organizations and the Iowa Veterans Home. Then in a simultaneously filed amendment (S-5036) to her own amendment, Appel corrected a “drafting error” to “make sure you can smoke outside” at fairs. The second amendment also struck the exemptions for the just introduced veterans home and posts. Again, she failed to mention that this second

---

686Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin). She never did. Telephone interview with David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008). The first surgeon general’s report on passive smoking expressed considerable skepticism about the concept and its measurement. U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of Involuntary Smoking: A Report of the Surgeon General 198-200 (1986). The second surgeon general’s report on the subject two decades later did not even attempt to calculate cigarette equivalents. U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke: A Report of the Surgeon General (2006). Dr. Jonathan Samet, a consulting scientific editor of the first and the senior scientific editor of the second report, when asked whether there were any robust studies showing results along the lines asserted by Appel and McCoy, observed that “there are many reasons to avoid the cigarette equivalent idea. We set it aside in 1986.... Also, dose-response relationships may not be linear as in the example of CVD [cardiovascular disease]. The analogy may be most applicable for cancer but still not a good idea.” Email from Jonathan Samet to Marc Linder (Aug. 7, 2008). A physician-tobacco control advocate who devotes considerable effort to correcting what he considers the false claims of his erstwhile colleagues, has argued that the cigarette-equivalent approach can be useful and important, but only if the specific smoke constituent is specified because the equivalence varies depending on the component measured. Michael Siegel, “On the Dangers of Cigarette Equivalents: More Misleading Claims by Anti-Smoking Groups” (Dec. 3, 2007), on http://tobaccoanalysis.blogspot.com/2007/12/on-dangers-of-cigarette-equivalents.html (visited Aug. 8, 2008).

688Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin); Senate Journal 2008, at 1:410 (Feb. 27). It is unclear what Appel meant by a “drafting error”; the exclusion of the Iowa state fairgrounds and of county and district fairgrounds from the ban on smoking on the grounds of public buildings appears to have been new. S-5036, §§ 3(2)(e) (1) (filed Feb. 27, 2008), on http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.
amendment also added partial exemptions for the grounds of state prisons and of Iowa national guard facilities.\footnote{689}{S-5036, §§ 3(2)(e) (2) & (3) (filed Feb. 27, 2008), on http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=BillInfo&Service=Billbook&hbill=S5036&ga=82. These two provisions, which were exceptions to the ban on smoking on the grounds of public buildings, specified “that smoking on the grounds shall be limited to designated smoking areas.”}

Procedurally, before Appel’s amendment(s) could be considered, the Senate had to take up Senator Dotzler’s amendment to S-5035, to which the chamber turned following a brief Republican caucus, which Bolkcom described as devoted to “trying to figure out how to trip us up.”\footnote{690}{Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2008, at 5:31 p.m.).} S-5038 proposed adding a new exemption, which would have applied to all establishments that restricted access to persons 21 and over, provided that they posted signs at all entrances declaring both the age restriction and the absence of a smoking restriction.\footnote{691}{http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=BillInfo&Service=Billbook&hbill=S5038&ga=82} Discussion of this bill-killer, which Gronstal had already rejected, consumed about half of the entire debate time. As primitive as Dotzler’s arguments were—and, given his antediluvian goals, mindless of the public health consequences, even nimbler minds would have been hard pressed to come up with more sophisticated ones—he did contest Appel’s claim that the bill did not discriminate against smokers, albeit superficially and without recognizing that the bill’s supporters never acknowledged, let alone, engaged his position, in large part for the same reason that Appel had programmatically denied the existence of such discrimination—namely, that they possessed such overwhelmingly powerful public health arguments that it was simpler just to ignore the discrimination claim than to antagonize smokers further by adding verbal insult to physical-psychological-cultural injury and admitting the obvious fact.\footnote{692}{Asked point-blank why Appel would not admit that the bill discriminated against smokers, Dotzler suggested as a possible reason that she had taken his giving her a hard contending that his 21-and-over amendment would not apply to any covered public place except bars—in fact, as Senator Black later had to explain to Dotzler (who spent the Vietnam war in U.S. Army military intelligence with a “top secret cryptographic security clearance”), it would apply to any place with a liquor license including casinos and golf clubhouses—Dotzler grounded his proposal in the right that smokers ought to have to go to a place where they could socialize and not be treated like third-class citizens. To generate sympathy for these outcasts he instanced a state employee who had been standing outside the statehouse in a wind-exposed area in 10-degree weather “trying to have a cigarette to take care of probably a very severe medical addiction” to nicotine, which was even more addictive than cocaine. In viewing this heart-rending scene of slow-motion suicide, Dotzler was unable to shut out the thought of “how we treated her like a secondhand [sic] citizen because she had a medical condition and she couldn’t kick it.” Dotzler may never have explained how his strict apartheid regime in bars for 21-and-over nicotine addicts would come to the rescue of the state employee struggling to smoke in the cold and wind, but he did allow as no nonsmoker would ever have to be exposed to smoke in these bars since she could just read the “smoking” sign on the door and walk away. And, more importantly, given the workplace orientation of the whole bill, so could all employees because “this is America and you can choose where you want to work.” In addition to being able to “go somewheres [sic] else,” workers in Iowa were advantaged by a labor shortage in the state; and even if they did ever run into unemployment, “we got programs where they can get help and be upwardly mobile.” Dotzler even conducted a secondhand survey in his district of bar owners, who claimed that almost all of their bartenders smoked and were “alright with where they were at.” Remarkably, he passed over in silence the nonsmoking bartenders and servers, though he insisted that “the individuals that are in there—that’s their choice, they want to do it.” Here his agenda may have become somewhat more transparent as he touched upon his mother’s smoking time personally. He may have been confusing Appel with Gronstal when he added that she was personally involved in the issue because her parents had been heavy smokers. Telephone interview with Bill Dotzler, Waterloo (Aug. 20, 2008).

693Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin). Bizarrely, after having made it clear to Dotzler and the chamber that the exemption’s reach was much more capacious than Dotzler had let on, Black turned around and declared his support for the amendment as addressing all his concerns about the bill.

695Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

bar, managed by his sister, in Waterloo, where “our employees are happy with it.” His mother, however, was “very concerned about [sic] the business she worked her whole life to put together will disappear and I’m afraid that that’s gonna happen.” Finally, Dotzler reached the high point of his ten-minute peroration with his insistence that the debate was “about fairness. It’s about treating about one-fifth of Iowans with respect” — or as Dotzler later phrased it even more audaciously: “You have to respect individuals who are addicted to a legal product,” albeit a “dangerous, debilitating drug” that “society has got to get rid of.”

Presumably for similar reasons of expedience, Dotzler no more explicated the basis or nature of the “respect” that should have prompted the state to facilitate the perpetuation of smokers’ self-destructive addiction, thoughtlessly acquired when they were children, regardless of the lethal collateral impact on nonsmokers, than anti-smoking militants were willing to discuss their lack of “respect,” which underlay their strategy of discrimination, the existence of which they would not even admit.

Anti-smoking Democrats had a field day attacking Dotzler’s proposal, which Matt McCoy described as difficult for any of them to “stomach.” Senators McCoy, Appel, and Bolkcom pointed out that workers did not all have the option of quitting jobs in smoky workplaces, that regulation of workplace safety did not otherwise hinge on workers’ options and was not otherwise left up to employers’ discretion, and that secondhand smoke exposure was unsafe for adults, but none of them addressed Dotzler’s claim about discrimination, let alone admitted its existence or tried to justify it. In contrast, however, Senator Jack Hatch, without explaining how exactly his argument undergirded his opposition to the amendment, openly called for an even more blatant and powerful form of anti-smoker discrimination: pointing out that 10 percent of all medical insurance claims in the United States were attributable to smoking, he insisted that the

697 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).

698 Telephone interview with Bill Dotzler, Waterloo (Aug. 20, 2008).

699 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin). Ironically, the lawyer for the bar owners who later challenged the SAA’s constitutionality used the same argument: “I think it’s indisputable that some businesses have gone out of business and jobs have been lost due to this legislation. Unfortunately, these are jobs of people who probably don’t have a lot of options.” Email from George Eichhorn to Marc Linder (July 14, 2009).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

“right for people to smoke a deadly cigarette doesn’t give them the right” to make nonsmokers pay for treating the health consequences because the burden of such costs meant that society was unable to pay for the health care of nonsmokers. Engaging in the brutal bluntness for which his Democratic colleagues had no electoral stomach, Hatch declared that the current debate “would be a good beginning for us to decide that no longer should we be treating and paying for someone’s bad behavior that we know is a deadly disease.” In the immediate wake of this unvarnished counterblast Minority Leader Wieck announced that Republicans would caucus, as they did for three quarters of an hour.700

While the Senate was standing at ease, Assistant Majority Leader Bolkcom conveyed to a constituent his sense that three or four Democrats would vote for Dotzler’s amendment; if it passed, leadership would stop the proceedings, caucus and try to change votes. His estimate, just a few minutes before the roll call, that 25 Democrats would vote for the bill along with two Republicans who would buck their leadership revealed that counting, even within a leader’s own caucus, was not yet a science. The uncertainty as to the other party was more easily understood, since Bolkcom was aware that perhaps six or eight Republicans would also vote Nay if they knew that Democrats controlled a majority, but they would not want to buck leadership. As for the grounds for Republicans’ floor behavior, Bolkcom noted that in part they were just trying to “mess with” the majority party because, as a minority, they had nothing else going for them, while some members disliked government intervention, were being lobbied by bar owners, or wanted money from tobacco companies or casinos.701

When the proceedings resumed, Dotzler, during his closing remarks, apparently lost control of the self-discipline that had enabled him to suppress the incoherence underlying his position. To the tough questions posed by Democrats about the reality of the labor market that prevented many thousands of workers from escaping from smoky workplaces all that Dotzler could counterpose was the irrelevant question as to what would become of the rights of the many smoking bartenders.702 His profound inability to understand that the monumental public health issues at stake made a mockery of any effort to construct mirror-image demands for constitutionally protected equal “rights” to pursue “happiness”703 as

700Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
701Telephone call from Joe Bolkcom, Des Moines to Marc Linder (Feb. 27, 2008 at 6:05 to 6:25 p.m.).
702Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
703Iowa Constitution, Art I sect. 1.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

between nicotine-addicted smokers and clean air-seeking nonsmokers was spectacularly on display in his assertion: “It’s not fair to me as a person with asthma that if my friends smoke cigarettes and they want to go into this bar, I can’t go in there. Well, how’s that different in reverse?” Finally, he trivialized tobacco-related morbidity and mortality by charging that the Smokefree Air Act was “ridiculous” “in the same way” as a proposal to require NASCAR-like full harnesses, helmets, and fire suits for all vehicles in order to save lives on Iowa highways.704

That Dotzler’s bill-killing amendment, which would have radically undermined a core component of H.F. 2212 and was antithetical to the bill’s underlying scientific and public health consensus was defeated by the narrowest of margins (24 to 26) suggested just how fragile the majority was, even in the chamber reputed to be more sympathetic to a statewide ban, for joining what had become a nationwide trend toward ridding the United States of the leading cause of preventable premature death. (Indeed, Dotzler later charged that Majority Leader Gronstal just an hour before the vote had thought that the vote would be 25 to 25, but that leadership had bought off or persuaded two senators to switch their votes by promising to run their bills.)705 Especially troubling for the bill’s prospects was that seven of 30 Democrats broke ranks, of whom five represented the larger cities of Cedar Rapids (Horn), Davenport (Seng), Dubuque (Hancock), Sioux City (Warnstadt), and Waterloo (Dotzler). The amendment lost only because three of 20 Republicans, two of whom (Lundby and Mulder) were retiring after the 2008 session, had been willing to cross over.706

Although Lundby—a former smoker who in 1990 had played an important role in amending the weak clean indoor air law to preempt local governmental power to pass stricter ordinances but in 2005 was diagnosed with cervical cancer, which would soon recur and prompt a prognosis of death within one year—supported H.F. 2212, she nevertheless offered a bizarre amendment on behalf of a single (named) constituent who employed 15 in an engineering business and wanted an exemption for two separately ventilated smoking rooms through which no employee had to pass. Appel’s opposition on the grounds that ventilation did not eliminate toxic and carcinogenic substances from the air, thus rendering such an exemption unacceptable, swiftly led to the amendment’s defeat on a voice vote.
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Amendments to the amendment having been disposed of, Appel explained that S-5036 struck the exemptions for casinos, posts of veterans organizations, and the Iowa Veterans Home, but added an exemption for farm vehicles and also struck the 10-foot no-smoking zone at entrances to covered public places. Finally, in astonishing ignorance of a crucial component of the bill she was floor managing, Appel incorrectly stated that her amendment “clarifies that anything outside is exempt from the smoking ban.” In fact, huge swaths of outdoor areas—including outdoor sports arenas and entertainment venues, all school grounds and the entire campuses of all colleges and universities, and the grounds of all public buildings—remained smoke-free under the amendment. Without discussion, S-5036 was adopted by a vote of 30 to 20, the three Democratic defectors from the party line being matched by an equal number of Republicans. After adoption of the duly amended main amendment (S-5035) on a voice vote, the chamber was back on H.F. 2212.

The most aggressive attack on the bill was launched by Republican Larry McKibben of Marshalltown, who interrogated Appel as to why she had eliminated the House exemption for the Iowa Veterans Home in Marshalltown.

---

707See above ch. 27.
709Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/ Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin); Senate Journal 2008, at 1:410-11 (Feb. 27) (S-5037).
710Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/ Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
711Senate Journal 2008, at 1:411-12 (Feb. 27) (S-5036). The three Democrats were Black, Dotzler, and Hancock; the three Republicans were (the conflicted anti-government physician) Hartsuch, Lundby, and Mulder.
Although Appel knew nothing about the specific situation there, she replied that everyone, including the employees, deserved to be protected from secondhand smoke and that “[n]o ventilation system makes a difference.” Disregarding the floor manager’s assessment, McKibben claimed that by establishing airport-like sealed and ventilated areas for smoking, the IVH had created “the best of both worlds.” Instead of explaining to the chamber whether these contraptions—into which some ex-soldiers had been lugging their oxygen tanks, thus creating a grave risk of fire and explosion—totally protected nonsmokers from exposure to the smoke, he seemed to undermine his own position by stressing that most of the resident veterans were old and in “fragile health,” which he hesitantly conceded that “maybe it [smoking] doesn’t particularly help,” as he ambled on to the punch line, “Shame on you, Democrats” for cutting off the veterans cold turkey.

What McKibben did not share with his colleagues—if he had even bothered to find out for himself—was that long before 2008, but also even as the Senate was debating, the Veterans Home was internally embroiled in controversy over indiscriminate smoking in violation of state rules. Smokers, as one resident wrote in the IVH monthly paper in March 2008, “rule the roost when it comes to smoking anywhere they please.” Interestingly, as Marshalltown’s Democratic representative, Mark Smith, who had originally secured the exemption in the House, later pointed out, smoking prevalence among the Home’s employees mirrored that of the general public, while even the residents’ was only slightly higher. Although even McKibben, the smoking vets’ most belligerent paladin, in a moment of weakness mentioned the possibility of phasing in the ban at the Home, when Democrats in both chambers ultimately relented, they struck the exemption altogether instead of taking him up on the offer.

In desultory remarks apparently designed to serve no purpose other than to provide him with an extra seven or eight minutes to decide how to cast his vote, Democrat Dennis Black, without having laid a factual predicate, intoned that “[m]any among us will view this as truly a totalitarianistic act—in fact, it is probably the epitome of totalitarianism.” Heady words, indeed, for any speaker, but especially outlandish coming from a non-smoking, non-drinking Mormon, whose only use for bars was as a locus for chatting up constituents. The only discernible nexus of Black’s accusation to H.F. 2212 was the tag line that “[g]overnment should not be all things to all people”—an all-purpose market-knows-best and/or libertarian shibboleth that could just as well have applied to the legislature’s increase in the minimum wage, but that connection did not deter Black from voting for that piece of rank paternalism.

Republican emergency room surgeon David Hartsuch, who openly admitted that he was considered “ultra right” and opposed increasing the minimum wage and protecting homosexuals’ civil rights, launched the final assault on the bill, which seemed to suggest that, Houdini-like, he was no longer “tied up in knots about how to vote” because he had resolved the tension between his skepticism of state intervention and his physician’s understanding of the consequences of

---

717 Telephone interview with Mark Smith, Marshalltown (Aug. 21, 2008).
718 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
719 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
720 Telephone interview with Dennis Black, Des Moines (July 30, 2008).
721 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
722 Telephone interview with David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008).
firsthand smoking. Hartsuch began by asking Appel to explain what “legal action” meant in the provision stating that an “employee or private citizen may bring a legal action to enforce this chapter.” Once again revealing that she was not even vaguely familiar with the mechanics of H.F. 2212, all that Appel could recall was discussion about people calling the Public Health Department: “I don’t remember about a legal action.” When Hartsuch pushed further and asked whether such a legal action would be brought in a court of law, Appel was so nonplussed that initially she was unable to utter anything more than a very perplexed “Well.” After she had regained her bearings somewhat and began “guessing” that a nonsmoking employee might bring such an action if smoking were unlawfully going on at his or her workplace, Hartsuch moved on in the sentence to ask what kind of “private citizen” she envisioned as bringing an action, but succeeded in eliciting only the bewildered response: “Well, isn’t an employee a private citizen? I think it’s the same thing.” Apparently sensing from Appel’s lack of preparation that he could have some party-line fun at the expense of a floor manager (and an Iowa Supreme Court justice’s spouse) who manifestly neither had studied the bill nor, at least on the spur of the moment under the pressure of the public spotlight, was able to interpret even a very straightforward phrase, Hartsuch, who was hardly a legal scholar himself, pointed out that the provision “distinguishes an employee versus a public [sic] citizen,” but when even this confused prompt failed to trigger any response at all, he dismissed her as if she were an unprepared law student who had disgraced herself before the whole class under mild-mannered Socratic interrogation: “Okay, thank you, Senator Appel...you can sit down.” The colloquy did nothing to diminish Hartsuch’s “reputation,” as he put it, for “harassing Appel,” although he denied the charge while conceding that in general during debate “I kind of tend to go for the jugular.”

725Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin). Although his appraisal may have been biased as a party-line criticism, Hartsuch stated later that during his two years in the Senate many other floor managers had also been poorly prepared. Telephone interview with David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008). Minority Leader Wieck recalled Appel’s poor performance as floor manager, which he speculatively ascribed to a lack of preparation and conjectured members would not forget. Telephone interview with Ron Wieck, Sioux City (Aug. 10, 2008).

726Telephone interview with David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008). On Hartsuch’s earlier infamous treatment of Appel on the Senate floor, when he questioned her about her Methodist Sunday school teaching in connection with an amendment he had Having discharged his foil, Hartsuch proceeded to lose any credibility he might have had as a medical expert by claiming that the Pub Med literature review he had done over the weekend had led to his discovery that there were only eight case control studies of secondhand smoke, which revealed “at best” such a weak association with cancer and heart disease that they “call[ed] into question causality at all.”\(^{727}\) In fact, contrary to Hartsuch’s ignorant claim, two years earlier the Surgeon General’s mammoth 700-page double-columned synthesis of the state of research on The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke, which cited more than 40 case-control studies alone on the relationship between secondhand smoke exposure and lung cancer,\(^{728}\) concluded that the evidence was “sufficient to infer a causal relationship between secondhand smoke exposure and lung cancer among lifetime nonsmokers” and “increased risk of coronary heart disease morbidity and mortality....” It estimated the latter risk at 25 to 30 percent; the increased risk of cancer associated with living with a smoker was estimated at 20 to 30 percent.\(^{729}\) Asked a half-year later about his floor remarks, Hartsuch, who had no research expertise in the matter of secondhand smoke, cocksurely boasted: “My analysis of the medical literature is quite correct regarding a lack of causal link between second hand smoke and the risks sited [sic] by the Public Health Department in their very misleading advertisements. Unfortunately, liberals feel morally justified in lying about the science in order to sway public opinion to achieve their ends.” Pursuing this pooh-poohing in a favored political direction, he thought “it interesting that the Liberal establishment in Public Health would choose to go after second hand smoke which has little if any established health effect, and at the same time would ignore the established causal link between abortion and breast cancer....” In response to a question as to the discrepancies between his floor remarks and the Surgeon General’s report and whether he was accusing the physicians and scientists who authored it of lying, Hartsuch admitted that he had “not seen the Surgeon General’s report so I certainly am not calling anyone a liar [sic],” but nevertheless felt compelled to “contend that the Surgeon General position is a political position and as such is prone to following political science over natural

---

Hartsuch concluded his floor remarks by expressing his concern about the “huge avenue for litigation” and asserted, without any empirical or any other basis whatsoever, that the provision “is opening a Pandora’s box of a magnitude that is absolutely unimaginable.”

Having survived this embarrassing encounter with her composure intact, Appel in her closing remarks characterized the bill as “our way of grooming a healthier state” than the promotion of which senators had nothing better to do. The 29 to 21 vote on final passage meant that the bill secured one fewer vote than on adoption of the identical S-5036, but the composition was somewhat different: three more Democrats, or a total of six, opposed the bill, while two more Republicans or a total of five supported it. A press assessment two days before the debate that a 30-20 Democratic majority with most Democrats supporting the bill meant that there was no “suspense” about the outcome was not shared by all senators. Hartsuch, for one, believed that H.F. 2212 did represent the rare occasion when the outcome was in doubt because Dotzler’s group of eight Democrats who would vote No might bring the bill down—provided that no more than three Republicans voted Yes.

That Hartsuch himself, after having harshly attacked both the bill and its medical underpinnings, nevertheless voted for it was a function of a number of

---

731 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).

732 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 27, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file provided by Rusty Martin).

733 Senate Journal 2008, at 1:412-13 (Feb. 27). Among Democrats, whereas Black switched to Aye, Horn, Kreiman, Seng, and Warnstadt switched to Nay. The other additional Republican was Ward. Bolkcom did not know why Horn had reversed his vote. Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 28, 2008).

735 Telephone interview with David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008). Hartsuch stated that there had been much less suspense about the outcome of the final vote on Apr. 8.

736 Minority Leader Wieck confirmed that voting for a bill that a senator has spoken against was unusual. Telephone interview with Ron Wieck, Sioux City (Aug. 10, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

factors, at the core of which lay his self-understanding that he was not a “pure libertarian” because as a doctor he was not always able to agree with his non-medical belief that people should be able to choose their own poison. A fourfold irony attended his decisionmaking process: (1) even as a physician he ignorantly denied that research had demonstrated that secondhand smoke exposure was a significant risk; (2) but he did believe that a smoking ban would reduce the prevalence of smoking by virtue of making it less practical or convenient to smoke and of stamping smokers as pariahs; (3) in fact, he (again incorrectly) believed that a statewide ban would cause a greater reduction in smoking than did a cigarette tax increase; and (4) unlike even the bill’s strongest Democratic supporters, who would not even touch the issue because it undermined their (disingenuous) claim that the ban was designed to protect nonsmokers and not to alter smokers’ (alleged) right to smoke so long as it did not interfere with others’ right to breathe clean air, Hartsuch, as a doctor who did know of the ravages of smoking on smokers, welcomed above all the indirect impact of protecting nonsmokers on smokers. Moreover, unlike his rigid market-knows-best Republican colleagues and Democrats like Dotzler, after receiving numerous calls from constituents who worked on casino boats and complained that they hated being exposed to all the tobacco smoke but were trapped in their jobs, Hartsuch was persuaded that—unlike casino or bar customers, who were not forced to go into such environments—workers had no practical alternative. Despite being weighed down more by these communications than by any other and despite knowing that his rather affluent anti-tobacco constituency had weighed in three to one for the bill, when the moment for voting finally arrived, he initially voted Nay, and only after he had seen that the bill already had 28 votes for passage did he change his vote and cast a symbolic Yea. And even then, he later admitted, had his vote been decisive, he would have stayed with his No vote and explained to his constituents that he had been unable to accept the unfairness of the disparate treatment of bars and casinos.

737 Telephone interview with David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008). One synthetic study concluded that in the United States the per package cigarette tax would have to be raised by 47 percent (from 76 cents to $1.11) in order to generate the 4.5 percent decline in cigarette consumption in the total population that would be achieved by banning smoking in all workplaces. Caroline Fichtenberg and Stanton Glantz, “Effects of Smoke-Free Workplaces on Smoking Behavior: Systematic Review,” British Medical Journal 325:188-91 (July 27, 2002).

738 Telephone interview with David Hartsuch, Bettendorf (Aug. 11, 2008). Hartsuch’s Minority Leader, Wieck, who noted that Hartsuch had told him several times that he did not believe that the medical data showed a negative health impact of secondhand smoke, speculated that Hartsuch may have voted for the bill after having spoken against it because
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Senate Democrats’ “jubilation” was tempered by Gronstal’s prediction that “‘there will be compromises along the way.’” Calling passage of the Senate version of the bill “‘great news,’” House floor manager Olson immediately declared that it “‘totally changes the discussion’” because the elimination of the casino exemption meant that some of the members who on February 19 had, based on that exemption and its allegedly unfair impact on bars, voted against H.F. 2212, might change their position. One potential complication involved the Senate’s removal of the Veteran Home’s exemption, which Marshalltown Democrat Mark Smith said he “‘had worked very hard’” to secure; although he was willing to support the bill without the casino exemption, his opposition to H.F. 2212 based on its coverage of the IVH might prove to be crucial if casino coverage wound up eroding what had already been a narrow margin of victory.

The House Undermines H.F. 2212 by Authorizing Bars and Restaurants with a Liquor License to Permit Smoking Whenever They Deny Admission to People Under 21

The Restaurant Association, casinos, and the tobacco industry have really locked arms to prevent us from moving forward and I think we’ve finally been able to break through that this year.

Drinkers at Frick’s [in Davenport] say the proposed ban attacks their beer-and-a-cigarette way of life and is the action of a tyrannical government. Robert J. Waddington sits at the bar with a drink in front of him and a cigarette in his hand. He said he’s been smoking since he was 7 years old. “Is this a free country? ... Why can they tell me what I can and can’t do? I’m 82, and I’m not going to quit. If you start telling people what they can’t do, that is communism.

as a physician he may have believed that the bill would reduce the prevalence of smoking. Telephone interview with Ron Wieck, Sioux City (Aug. 10, 2008).

3433
Are you debating [the] smoking bill now? Do you have votes for casino coverage?
Yes, we are debating...it gets worse...the 21 year old bar amendment is on the floor for debate and will probably pass. ... It is a long story with lots of drama and emotion.

... Is it wrong to assume that the 51 who voted for the >21 amendment wouldn’t mind if no bill at all were passed and the law just stays the way it is?
[S]ometimes I don’t know what to think. We have some members who have gotten cold feet. While many of us were really upset about the vote today, we also know the conference committee will be made up of people who support the original House and Senate versions. We are very confident that the bar and restaurant amendment will be stripped out of the final conference committee recommendations.

How did Bailey get the 51 votes for the ammdt?
Some of our spineless democrats who got scared. They are in marginal districts and represent many small towns. They are worried about re-election.

The day after the Senate had passed a much stricter ban, House Speaker Murphy and Majority Leader McCarthy held a press conference in the course of which they assessed the new situation. Surprisingly, they offered differing evaluations without remarking on them. Murphy “frankly” admitted that the difficulties that the House had getting the bill passed even with the exemptions both made it difficult to determine the eventual outcome and would be a concern for the bill’s original supporters. Murphy’s more pessimistic account may have been colored his own personal attitude, which was much less intense than McCarthy’s: “I was always sort of a local control guy, but because the votes were there to do this, that’s where I’m at. And quite frankly I was comfortable with the House version the way it passed.” Murphy was also the sort of guy beneath whose dignity it was not to accept a $500 campaign contribution in July 2008, October 2007, and October 2006 from Altria Group, Inc. a/k/a Philip Morris.)

Email from Marc Linder to Mary Mascher and from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 12, 2008).

Email from Marc Linder to Mary Mascher (Mar. 15, 2008) and Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 16, 2008).

Democratic Leaders Address Immigration, Smoking (part 2) (Feb. 28, 2008), on http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9maC8EefFGM (visited July 30, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

In contrast, McCarthy was an ardent anti-smoker, whose statement, “[m]y personal feeling, I would outlaw smoking everywhere if I had the right,” prompted a smiling Murphy to inject: “Remember, his previous job was with the attorney general’s office suing tobacco companies.” Confirming that he had been litigation compliance counsel for governments in the national tobacco settlement agreement, McCarthy added that “I don’t have a lot of respect for Big Tobacco.” McCarthy then provided this rather upbeat perspective on the bill’s progress:

Look at where the momentum has come on this issue. It was our best guess that local control, which would mean a few hundred jurisdictions probably would move in that direction and a few hundred jurisdictions wouldn’t move in that direction, would be the state where the law would move. Local control seemed to be it. When we first started discussing it this year, it seemed to be 17 votes for a statewide ban, and then I found out there was [sic] 25 votes, and then I found out there was [sic] 40 votes. And then lo and behold we were able to actually for the first time debate a bill on the floor of the House since the mid-90s that was a statewide ban.... Major momentum.

Then after the Senate had stripped out the casino exemption and created a “new equation,” McCarthy saw this momentum continuing to build, and even though it was “emotional and tenuous” and H.F. 2212’s future was “unpredictable,” he was willing to predict that if the legislature could agree on a bill, “it would be probably one of the single biggest public health measures Iowa has ever passed.” In any event, he was confident enough that passing a local control bill as a “safety net” was, for the time being, not on the agenda. Murphy then tried to reinforce this more optimistic view by insisting that “regardless of what people believe, this is a pretty non-partisan bill,” because 10 to 14 Democrats had problems with the bill a lot of whom voted against it, while “we had [some] Republicans who were very supportive of it.”

After Murphy had offered his personal declaration in favor of a less radical approach, McCarthy intervened to paint the transformation of the historical sweep of public smoking since the 1970s as he had personally experienced it over his lifetime and as no one, in either chamber, ever presented it during the entire debate. Why this poignant panorama, which, apparently spontaneous and unrehearsed, effectively demonstrated that social developments and attitudes were malleable and even opened up the perspective of the present as history, which is crucial for motivating people to overcome passivity and fatalism, was reserved exclusively for the press, which did not report on it, is unclear (though McCarthy’s own reason may have been his and Murphy’s decision that the less they interjected themselves into the debate, the less partisan it would be):

751

Look at where our culture has changed with regard to smoking. I remember taking a tour of the state capitol as a child and [here McCarthy pointed upwards] you couldn’t see the top of the dome because there was so much smoke here. I remember visiting my mother who worked in the cardiology wing in Methodist Hospital and you walked into the waiting room and the people in the waiting room were smoking, the nurses were smoking, the secretary was smoking, the whole doctor’s office was full of smoke. I remember visiting my father [the Des Moines chief of police] at a police station as a child—you couldn’t see the ceiling because every officer smoked. That was our culture back in the 1970s. Could you imagine having that sort of occurrence now, walking into the rotunda and not being able to breathe and see the top of the dome? ... We’re recognizing that someone shouldn’t have a right to put toxic substances in my body that include arsenic. I should have a right to breathe non-toxic substances. So I think that’s the direction our culture is moving and that’s why I’m supportive of it.

752

As far as casinos were concerned, McCarthy explained that the smaller size of House districts created a different politics per district, so that “[e]ven though hardly anyone spoke on the floor of the House regarding the casino exemption,

---

751Democratic Leaders Address Immigration, Smoking (part 2) (Feb. 28, 2008), on http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9maC8EeFfGM (visited July 30, 2008). McCarthy did concisely repeat his statement during his end of session remarks: “That has been a cultural shift and I said this before, I remember coming in for a tour of the Capitol as a child and everyone in the House smoked. Everyone in the Senate smoked, and everyone in the rotunda smoked. And I remember looking up to see that wonderful dome and I really couldn’t because it was full of smoke. Who would believe that three decades later that would seem strange to look back and have that sort of environment.” House Journal 2008, at 2:2115 (Apr. 25).

752Democratic Leaders Address Immigration, Smoking (part 2) (Feb. 28, 2008), on http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9maC8EeFfGM (visited July 30, 2008). Whether Murphy’s broad smile during this part of McCarthy’s remarks was one of recognition of his own childhood is unclear.
believe me—there were a number of people that needed that in there to vote for it because their constituencies locally involve nonprofits, chambers of commerce, and businesses, and hotels, and others who form a pretty potent political force for some of these legislators locally. So that’s why that was in there to get some votes to pass it out.” But now that the Senate had altered the dynamic by covering casinos, McCarthy announced that he intended to confront those House members, including several Republicans, who had complained about the exclusion of casinos and declared that they would vote for a statewide smoking ban (although he had had them down as No votes for any ban), with the transcript of their floor statements to see whether they were people “of their word.” Whether McCarthy was merely seeking to embarrass them before the press for what he apparently took to be their disingenuousness or seriously believed that, despite the local tobacco/smoking business pressures on them that he had just cited, they could be persuaded to change their votes is unclear. The Senate’s action, however, had sufficiently buoyed House militants’ spirits that Mary Mascher imagined that “we are very close to getting the votes we need to pass the senate version. As soon as we have the 51 votes needed we will bring it up for debate and pass the bill. I think we are one or two votes short now.”

The day before the House took up the Senate version of H.F. 2212, Speaker Murphy had concluded that casino coverage lacked the 51 votes needed for adoption. With regard to the amendment to permit smoking in bars when no one under 21 was admitted, Minority Leader Rants predicted that the two chambers would have to compromise. At the same time, anti-ban forces were intensifying their message that the market and its authoritative interpreter, the business owner, know best. Iowa Restaurant Association President Doni DeNucci, still following the Philip Morris playbook, insisted on the “right” to “accommodate” both smokers and nonsmokers—and if the latter were uncomfortable with the resulting (smoky) environment, they would have to go to a smoke-free restaurant. Republican Senator Jerry Behn—a farmer with such impeccable pro-employer credentials that he was one of only eight senators to vote against increasing the 753 Democratic Leaders Address Immigration, Smoking (part 2) (Feb. 28, 2008), on http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9maC8EefFGM (visited July 30, 2008). Since there is no official verbatim transcript of floor debate, it is unclear whether McCarthy planned to have one made from audio files that the Democratic caucus creates to make sound bites available to the news media and then at some point destroys. Some of these files are cited in this chapter.

---

754 Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Feb. 29, 2008).

755 Iowa Public Radio News, WSUI (Iowa City) (Mar. 11, 2008, at 8:08 a.m.). A Democrat dismissed Rants’s comment on the grounds that “[h]e has no control over this at all.” Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 10, 2008).
minimum wage in 2007—one-upped IRA by asserting both that “the market has already solved the solution [sic]” and that workers know ahead of time that they will face smoke (and can decide to work elsewhere), just as neither they nor anyone else has to go into a restaurant. Amusingly, when a caller to the radio program on which Behn made these comments asked whether workers were entitled to retention of unemployment insurance benefits if they refused a job because the workplace was smoky, Behn did not know the answer.\footnote{The Exchange,” WSUI (Iowa City) (Mar. 11, 2008 beginning at 10:07 a.m.). On the minimum wage vote, see http://www.votesmart.org/issue_keyvote_member.php?cs_id=7586 (visited Aug. 2, 2008).}

House debate on the Senate amendment on March 12 lasted only about one hour, but was intensely contentious, in large part thanks to Representative Wise, who, throwing off all the customary shackles of legislative courtesy, with brutal bluntness accused proponents—including one in his own party—of a killer amendment of lying their heads off about its real impact. Before reaching that issue, the House dealt with a two-part amendment (H-8079) filed by Democrats Mark Smith of Marshalltown and McKinley Bailey: Smith’s proposed reinstating the exemption for the Iowa Veterans Home in Marshalltown, which the Senate version had struck from the House bill, while Bailey’s would have delayed the bill’s effective date until January 1, 2009.\footnote{For a detailed overview of the amendments, see House Democratic Research Staff, “Amendment Summary: HF 2212 Smoke Free Air Act Senate Amendment H-8054 (Mar. 11, 2008).} Smith’s sponsorship of an amendment to perpetuate smoking among ex-soldiers was ironic since he was director of special projects at the Substance Abuse Treatment Center of Central Iowa\footnote{http://iowahouse.org/2008/04/08/member-profile-rep-mark-smith/#more-359 (visited Aug. 3, 2008). Smith did, however, later support Wise’s amendment to kill the 21-and-over exemption for bars, restaurants, and casinos.} and was personally aware of complaints about smoking at the IVH, having written in the residents’ newsletter that “there are a number of people who are concerned about smoking etiquette and having more outside area that is smoke free.”\footnote{Mark Smith, “Statehouse Issues,” Stars ‘N’ Stripes: The Resident Newspaper of the Iowa Veterans Home 5(7):6 (July 2007), on http://ivh.iowa.gov/News/StarsNStripes/tabid/177/Default.aspx (visited Aug. 8, 2008).} Following bifurcation of the amendment, which floor manager Olson urged the chamber to resist, Smith’s passed 51 to 30.\footnote{House Journal 2008, at 1:614-15 (Mar. 12).} Representative Petersen then attacked the attempt to delay the law’s effective date—which Bailey, who remained procedurally confused during his hour of fame, did not even bother to explain, let alone to justify—by pointing out that delay was uncalled for inasmuch... as it had been 18 years since legislators had had a chance to debate the issue or to improve the clean indoor air act. The amendment’s fate was sealed when Minority Leader Rants rose to inform Petersen that they had finally found something they could agree on: he opposed the bill, but if it was going to go into effect, there was no reason to delay it. On a voice vote, no one having been heard to shout Aye, that part of the amendment lost.\(^\text{761}\)

In contrast, Bailey did at least make an effort to justify the debate’s principal amendment (H-8084), which was also co-sponsored by 11 other Democrats.\(^\text{762}\)

---

\(^\text{761}\)House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr, communications director, House Speaker).

\(^\text{762}\)The other Democrats were Schueller, Wendt, Ford, Zirkelbach, Thomas, Mertz, Quirk, Frevert, R. Olson, Huser, and Berry. H-8084, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/aspx/Cool-ICE/DisplayBills.htm (filed Mar. 11, 2008). Four of these co-sponsors represented three of the state’s largest cities: Deborah Berry (Waterloo); Wayne Ford and Rick Olson (Des Moines); and Roger Wendt (Sioux City). Ignoring the issue of the impact on employees as well as the larger public health issue for nonsmokers, Berry (the corporate fundraising director for a public radio station) and Wendt (a retired teacher and school administrator with a Ph.D. in education whom the American Cancer Society had recorded in February 2008 as “Must have casino exemption”) both justified their co-sponsorship on the grounds that if adults chose to go to “adult establishments” to smoke and/or when smoking was permitted, it was fair to permit them to make such an adult decision. Interestingly, later both also acknowledged that life went on under the new law without the 21-and-over amendment, although Berry had specifically hesitated to vote for the bill without the amendment. Neither had received any complaints from constituents: while Wendt was “perfectly comfortable” with the Smokefree Air Act, Berry—who had heard from some bar owners while the bill was going through the legislature—in visits to bars had observed that people were “enjoying themselves” and that no bars had closed down in Waterloo, where it was “business as usual.” Telephone interview with Deborah Berry, Waterloo (May 27, 2009); telephone interview with Roger Wendt, Sioux City (May 27, 2009); [American Cancer Society], 2008 House Vote Count Card 82nd General Assembly (emaild by Stacy Frelund Feb. 14, 2008). For the biographical details, see Iowa Official Register: 2007-2008, at 52, 80 (v. 72), on http://publications.iowa.gov/6421/3/Chapter_2_Legislative_Branch.pdf (visited May 27, 2009). Despite the absence of complaints from constituents, in 2009 Berry cosponsored Bailey’s bill (H.F. 211) that would have repealed the coverage of outdoor restaurants. See below ch. 36. Ford took a different tack, stating that he was thankful to Bailey for having given him a chance to “put more common sense” into a “hypocritical” bill, which was “unfair” to bar owners because it exempted casinos, although he, too, acknowledged that after almost a year’s operation under the new law he was unaware that any bars in Des Moines had closed. Telephone interview with Wayne Ford, Des Moines (May 27, 2009). Rick Olson, a lawyer, in addition to using the rationale for customers that, with minors denied access,
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The proposal, which Democrat David Jacoby later characterized as so “goofy” that its adoption made the whole bill “worthless,” would have added to the areas where smoking was not regulated restaurants, bars, hotels, motels, clubs, pari-mutuel racing tracks, excursion gambling boats, gambling structures, and racetracks if they both held a liquor control license for on-premises consumption and allowed “smoking only at a specified time during which only individuals twenty-one years of age or older are invited or admitted; the specified time is a regular, single, consecutive period of time; and the specified time is conspicuously posted on all major entrances of the licensed premises.” Bailey’s amendment was thus both broader and narrower than Struyk and Dolecheck’s H-8024, which had lost by a vote of 49 to 51 on February 19, and applied only to bars and restaurants, which were not formally required to hold a liquor license, but were eligible for the exemption only during times when persons under 18 were not admitted. With regard to H-8056, which Bailey and Dolecheck had filed on February 28 (but later withdrew) and was like H-8024 except that it applied to all establishments, Representative Mascher did not think that the House would go backwards and adopt it after it had already been defeated in both chambers. As to why members nevertheless kept pushing such an amendment she explained: “Some of them can’t help themselves. They have a bar owner back home who is a friend and has convinced them they will go belly up if this law passes. They don’t look at the data from other states that proves this is wrong. They think they are just trying to help a friend.” House leaders, who had found out late the night before the debate that the 21-and-over amendment would pass, regarded it as a message by its supporters to the Senate that they objected to the other chamber’s having amended the House bill, especially to the striking of the casino exemption.

adults were making a “voluntary choice,” also reflected on employees’ exposure to tobacco smoke by insisting that, given advance notice, they could choose to work elsewhere. Telephone interview with Rick Olson, Des Moines (June 2, 2009).

765See above this ch.
767Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Feb. 29, 2008).
768Email from Stacy Frelund, field government relations, American Cancer Society, to Marc Linder (Mar. 12, 2008). To be sure, this account is difficult to reconcile with Frelund’s statement that the Democrats who voted for Bailey’s amendment and were mostly from rural Iowa had “said they did not want to hurt their small town businesses...."
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

In a contemporaneous newsletter to constituents, Bailey tried to justify his 21-and-over amendment, which would have exposed everyone in participating restaurants, bars, and casinos to tobacco smoke:

Initially, a statewide smoking ban that exempted casinos passed the House. A number of Representatives, including myself, voted for the bill despite its imperfections. We hoped to see some form of ban turn into law. In order to pass the first bill, the casino exemption was necessary in order to get 51 votes. After this vote, I heard from a good number of constituents who felt that it was unfair to exempt casinos but not bars and restaurants. That is a sentiment I share.

The Senate removed the casino exemption and designated smoking areas at the Iowa Veterans Home. The bill came back to the house where it became apparent that once again we would not be able to pass a statewide ban without exempting casinos. The bill would be rejected then sent to a conference committee. Then, party leaders would put a casino exemption back into the bill. Unfortunately, most of these political decisions are beyond my control.

However, a number of Senators have taken public positions that they will not vote for a bill that provides these exemptions for casinos, because it puts the small businesses around them, which also serve food and drink at a serious competitive disadvantage. There are enough Senators who feel this way to make passage of the bill impossible. Taken on the whole, the House will not pass a ban without a casino exemption and the Senate will not pass anything with a casino exemption. This disagreement has led to a stalemate.

This was not acceptable, because an overwhelming number of you have expressed a wish for some sort of restriction. In response, I crafted an amendment that I felt was a compromise between a number of positions, which could get the votes to pass in both chambers. With this compromise, we could have a meaningful step forward on the issue. It would remove 93% of Iowa’s workers and all of Iowa’s children from exposure to second hand smoke. It offered some protection for small businesses and exempted the casinos. All the involved groups got something and it passed the house.

It is not a perfect solution. If you are a smoker who thinks you should be able to smoke in every restaurant you will not be able to anymore. If you think you should be able to go anywhere in the state without exposure to second hand smoke there will still be a few establishments in the state where that won’t be the case. The owners of bars and restaurants with liquor licenses will have to decide whether they want to allow smoking or be open to children. No one walks away from the table with everything they want and no one walks away without something they wanted. Such is the nature of compromise.769

Bailey was motivated to put a gloss on his newsletter “to the outside world”

---

Email from Stacy Frelund to Marc Linder (Mar. 12, 2008).

769 Newsletter pasted into email from McKinley Bailey to Marc Linder (Mar. 14, 2008).
in order to salvage his reputation after “I won the vote but got butchered in the press.” The day after the Senate vote (rejecting the bill as amended by H-8084) Bailey asserted that the Senate was unable to muster a majority for a bill exempting casinos “because it creates an unequal playing field” (vis-a-vis small restaurants and bars). As in the newsletter, Bailey distorted the situation in the Senate, where a majority opposed a casino exemption not because of its impact on bars, but because of its impact on the health of workers and customers in casinos. In any event, he insisted that the Senate had rejected his amendment, which “created an equal playing field...but this is all being driven by out of state activists who will take nothing before getting exactly what they want and the Senate Majority leader twisted arms until he got what he wanted.”

Bailey’s rather loose grip on political reality was further highlighted by his statement that the “out of state activists” he had in mind were “the heart lung and cancer associations but mostly C.A.F.E.” Ironically, in spite of his distaste for the role of these advocacy groups, he expressed a preference for their long-time preference, local control, “so we can ease consumers and business into this change” over a few years. Little wonder that an anti-smoking Democrat called Bailey “off the reservation on this one” and advised not to “believe anything he says. He is really in the minority in our caucus.”

After Bailey had quickly presented his argument from expedience—that the amendment was needed in order to obtain a majority for the bill—he resorted to the considerably less than forthright rhetoric that triggered Wise’s ferocious counterattack. Bailey asserted that his proposal would expand protection for workers and the public while providing some protection for small businesses. “In many communities,” according to Bailey, “the bar-restaurant is the only business in town and an important part of the community.” Indeed, he even romantically restylized such profit-seeking businesses “community centers.” Making effective use of ambiguity, Bailey swore that his amendment, which would make sure that “no child will have to spend time in a smoke-filled public place,” represented “a giant leap forward for the health of Iowa’s children.” And as for adults, H-8084 would remove smoking permanently from non-alcoholic restaurants and tens of thousands of workers from smoky workplaces.

With admirable probity, Wise forthrightly stated that, “in the interest of

---

770 Email from McKinley Bailey to Marc Linder (Mar. 14, 2008).
771 Email from McKinley Bailey to Marc Linder (Mar. 16, 2008).
772 Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 15, 2008).
773 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by Dean Fihr, communications director, House Speaker).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

honesty, of truthfulness,” his amendment (H-8088) was designed to gut and kill Bailey’s amendment, which, contrary to Bailey’s claims, was “a huge step backward” for protecting the health of children, customers, and workers, designed to gut and kill H.F. 2212. Wise’s amendment confined the exemption to the same establishments, but only if they admitted “at any time only” people 21 or over, thus mooting the exemption for practical purposes by forcing them either never to admit those under 21—a practice that would presumably have been economically injurious—or to admit them and thus to forfeit the exemption. Wise forcefully charged that it was an “absurd assertion” that an establishment could be smoking at night and nonsmoking the next morning because in fact the chemicals in tobacco smoke linger for up to two weeks (as a result of desorption of particles deposited on walls, fabrics, furniture, and other objects, rooms in which smoking is permitted are a “continuous source of exposure to toxic substances in tobacco smoke even when no smoking is currently occurring”). Consequently, such a regime would not protect anyone even during the allegedly smoke-free hours of operation, and it was therefore a “lie” that an age-restricted smoking establishment was ever nonsmoking. In short,

774 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr).

776 Presumably this deterrent would not have served its purpose with regard to bars in towns in which people under 21 were lawfully permitted in bars.

777 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr). Although there is evidence that such desorption goes on for weeks and, at decreasing levels for months, in the context of bars and restaurants in which smoking takes place daily and thus deposit/sorption of compounds is replenished daily, it is less important whether desorption takes place over weeks or months so long as the sorption/desorption process simply lasts into the next daily no-smoking period, of which, according to a leading researcher, there is “absolutely and without question” no doubt. Email from Brett Singer to Marc Linder (Jan. 5, 2009). See also above ch. 33.

778 Bundesverfassungsgericht, 1 BvR 3262/07 at 79 (July 30, 2008) (finding of the German Cancer Research Center cited in a decision by the German Federal Constitutional Court in a case dealing with the validity of the several states’ statutes with exemptions similar to those in H.F. 2212). See also U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke: A Report of the Surgeon General 87 (2006): “Volatile components such as nicotine are adsorbed and degassed by materials. As a consequence, the smell of cigarettes emanates from clothing, carpets, air conditioners, and other surfaces without the presence of active smoking, as previously deposited or adsorbed material is re-emitted by air currents.”
Bailey’s amendment was a “fraud.”

Bailey evasively responded that no one could look him in the eye and say that it was not a step forward for people not to be actively smoking for some hours or in children’s presence. (In fact, his opponents would soon point out that his proposal was a step backward compared to H.F. 2212 and even to Iowa’s then existing toothless law.) Republican David Heaton, who owned a restaurant-bar and permitted smoking in the latter, complained that supporters of H-8088 and H.F. 2212 were seeking to “take away choice” of businesspeople like himself, who could not imagine having to ban those under 21 from his establishment. (More baldly, his Republican colleague Steven Olson later called a smoking ban in bars an “‘invasion of private property rights....’”)

Republica Dolecheck, whose 18-and-older amendment had narrowly failed three weeks earlier, seemed confused in his complaint that supporters of the Wise amendment were now complaining about carcinogens in establishments eight hours after smoking had stopped and no one was breathing secondhand smoke—a position Wise characterized as a “scientific-medical absurdity.”

Wise then moved his amendment and asked for a division; an unnamed male representative from Polk County requested a record vote, but (on the audio file) the Speaker could be heard telling (presumably the clerk) that “there’s been no second,” and only after Speaker Murphy had announced the amendment’s solid defeat by a vote of 32 to 59 (with nine absent or not voting) and the debate of Bailey’s underlying amendment had resumed, did he belatedly inform the chamber that the request for a record had not been seconded and that therefore the names had not been recorded.

779 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr).

782 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr).

783 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The (non-)decision not to record the vote was contentious and continued to prompt controversy for several days. The following “condensed version” of the “[l]ong story” was provided by Democrat Mary Mascher, a strong supporter of H-8088 who had become increasingly depressed during the debate, 12 hours later:

I went to leadership and asked if we could have a record roll call on the Wise amendment. I was told no.

In our caucuses it is an unwritten rule that only leadership can determine if a record will be called on an amendment. This can be good, because it prevents members from putting up votes that could hurt them back home. It is bad because it protects members who should be held accountable.

I was furious when I was told no, we couldn’t get a record on the vote so I said fine, I will get a republican to ask for the record. I asked Walt Tomenga to ask for the record but of course I thought Walt would get someone to second it in his caucus and no one would.

So no record, just a voice vote that failed.

I had some rather heated words with my leadership today. I think the vote makes us look weak.

I know this is far from over but we missed a golden opportunity today. 784

Without the record vote, Mascher lamented, it would be “hard to hold people accountable....” 785

The next day at a press conference, when asked why there had been no record roll call on this vote, McCarthy replied that there had been no second—“an error.” When the pesky reporter pressed McCarthy as to why he had not personally seconded the request, he stated that there had been no reason to do so because leadership thought that it was “extremely, extremely likely” that the bill would go back to the Senate amended and then to a conference committee. Under those circumstances, McCarthy argued, a record vote that might not have accurately reflected where “everyone is at” would “not necessarily” have been “productive.” In addition, as Senate Majority Leader Gronstal observed, although record votes sometimes “help you identify the places where you need to go and work,” sometimes they just needlessly locked legislators who were struggling with an issue into a position. 786

784 Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 12, 2008).
785 Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 12, 2008).
786 Smoking, November Elections on Democrats’ Minds (Part 2) (Mar. 13, 2008), on After Wise’s amendment had been disposed of, the debate on Bailey’s amendment resumed. Floor manager Olson opened the attack on it by stressing that H-8084 represented a step back vis-a-vis current law inasmuch as “it gets rid of the requirement that restaurants of a certain size set aside a percentage of their seats as nonsmoking.”787 (To be sure, the existing clean indoor air law contained no such requirement other than that the percentage be > 0; Olson thus failed—as did supporters throughout the floor debates—to convey fully the feebleness of the then existing law, which, in fact, merely required a restaurant, seating more than 50, not to designate the entire restaurant a smoking area; moreover, since the law did not require a restaurant to shield nonsmokers in any way from secondhand smoke, it was virtually useless.)788 Dolecheck’s assertion that H-8084 was a “good property rights amendment, individual rights amendment” triggered another ferocious response from Wise, who characterized H-8084, which would have enabled 20 percent of the population to “dictate” to 80 percent, as “the most internally contradictory and wrongheaded amendment” of the 2008 session: “With all due respect, with all due respect! A property rights issue? An individual rights issue? Give me a break! There is not now nor has there ever been a property right to smoke around other people and other people’s children. Do not invent new rights that do not exist.” Wise then went on to administer a stern civics lesson to Dolecheck and other opponents by observing that although the Iowa House of Representatives always balanced the public good and individual liberties and “in most cases” the latter won out, “there are instances when the public good is so overwhelming that we say to the individuals: ‘You must modify the behavior for the public good.’ We know clearly that secondhand tobacco smoke rises to that level.”789 Wise’s intervention was remarkable because it objectively refuted various misleading and/or false statements by Democratic supporters that the bill was about public health and not about individual rights. Wise, who drew the parallel to earlier debates about seat belts, was the only supporter with the intellectual integrity to concede the existence of a conflict even if he failed to identify the right at stake after he had denied the existence of a http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GWkrxbUmKfI&feature=related (visited Apr. 11, 2008).

787House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html (visited Mar. 12, 2008), and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr).

789House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html) and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

property right to assault others with smoke.\textsuperscript{790}
In his closing remarks Bailey predicted that no bill would pass unless it exempted casinos; consequently, he offered the chamber the option of exempting only casinos or treating fairly other businesses that stood to lose by exempting them as well; the only nonsmoking beneficiaries of his amendment were children—he did not even bother to assert that adults would benefit.\textsuperscript{791}
The result of an initial voice vote having been unclear (though the Nays certainly sounded louder), a division was requested, but, again, not a record vote. The 21-and-over amendment prevailed by a vote of 51 to 44 (and five absent or not voting).\textsuperscript{792}  In his closing remarks on Senate amendment H-8054 Olson expressed his disappointment in the outcome of the amendments, but nevertheless urged the body to concur in order to keep the bill moving on its way to a conference committee.\textsuperscript{793}  Following a voice vote for concurrence the vote on final passage was 59 to 40: 47 (or 89 percent of) Democrats voted for and only six against H.F. 2212, while 34 (or 74 percent) Republicans voted against and only 12 for the bill.\textsuperscript{794}
Anti-smoking militants regarded the new House bill, whose passage Senator

---

\textsuperscript{790} Even if there was no judicially vindicated right to smoke in specific public places, there was for many years a virtually uncontested privilege to do so.

\textsuperscript{791} House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr).

\textsuperscript{792} House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr); House Journal 2008, at 1:616 (Mar. 12).

\textsuperscript{793} House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Mar. 12, 2008) (streaming audio on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/Audio/Audio.html and audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr).

\textsuperscript{794} House Journal 2008, at 1:617 (Mar. 12). The six Democrats were Foege, Hunter, Huser, R. Olson, Swaim, and Wenthe, of whom Ro Foege was a “purist,” who had voted against the bill on Feb. 19 because of the casino exemption and voted against it on Mar. 12 because of 21-and-over exemption. Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 12, 2008). Mertz, who voted against the bill on Feb. 19 and Apr. 8, supported it on Mar. 12 in order to protect an exemption for bar patios. Telephone interview with Dolores Mertz, Ottosen (Aug. 24, 2008). Of the six, only Huser and Wenthe voted against H.F. 2212 on final passage on Apr. 8. The 12 Republicans voting for the bill were Anderson, Baudler, Clute, Dolecheck, Gipp, Jacobs, May, Linda Miller, Schickel, Tomenga, Van Fossen, and Wiencek, of whom only Dolecheck, Gipp, Miller, and Van Fossen failed to vote for the bill on final passage on Apr. 8 and presumably voted for it on Mar. 12 because, like Bailey, they wanted to gut the bill. Lykam, a non-smoker who had a small business background and voted against the bill on Feb. 19 and Apr. 8, voted Aye on Mar. 12 only to keep it alive so that it could be amended later. Telephone interview with Jim Lykam, Davenport (Aug. 24, 2008).
Bolkcom attributed to bar owners’ intense statewide lobbying, as a “devastating blow,” in part because it would weaken even the current toothless law by rendering nonsmoking sections of restaurants unnecessary. The Lung Association’s lobbyist called the bill “pretty much useless at this point,” while Representative Petersen was sufficiently alarmed by this “step backwards” to urge supporters who might have been lulled into a false sense of inevitable victory in 2008 to start calling and emailing their legislators. The Iowa Restaurant Association had already encouraged its 650 members to do so, but President Doni DeNucci denied that its lobbyists had put “intense pressure” on the legislature. To be sure, the casino exemption put IRA, whose membership was composed of restaurants, bars, and casinos, in something of a bind, because, as its president conceded, “we wouldn’t want to oppose an exemption that would benefit one segment of the industry, but…could be to the detriment to [sic] another segment.” DeNucci perceived a similar structural problem with the 21-and-over amendment: it aided bars, but exert a negative impact on small independent restaurants in rural areas. Despite the improvement represented by the amendment, perhaps in order to avoid such internal organizational fragmentation, she stated publicly that she preferred that the bill fail regardless of whether it included H-8084—and why would she not since the current law conferred an exemption on bars and a quasi-exemption on restaurants?

Front-line legislative and lobbying advocates of the broadest possible smoking ban may have been disheartened by the House vote, but at a press conference the day after the House had adopted the 21-and-over amendment, Majority Leader McCarthy stated that he was “kind of proud”—though disappointed in the substantive outcome—of what he regarded as not a partisan debate on a “very emotional, passionate subject…on both sides.” In particular he extolled the “legitimate debate where the outcome is not necessarily determined in advance” in contrast to the typical situation in which leadership has an “exact 796 Jason Clayworth, “House Flips, Weakens Smoking Ban,” DMR, Mar. 13, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com. Whether IRA considered the $8,000 that it spent on state campaign contributions in 2007 as part of whatever pressure they did exert is unclear. Id. The total number of restaurants owned by the 650 members was in excess of 5,000. Douglas Burns, “Ban Smoking Statewide or Let Locals Decide?” Iowa Independent (Feb. 6, 2008), on http://www.iowaindependent.com (visited Aug. 1, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

vote count” and “the debates are predetermined”: “a legitimate debate where the debate is actually moving votes is something that I think is refreshing.” 799
McCarthy illustrated this unusual phenomenon of the leadership’s loss of control by reference to the 21-and-over amendment: the first time it was debated, he had been convinced that it would pass, but in fact it garnered only 47 votes; on March 12, based on his vote count he had predicted in excess of 63-65 votes, whereas in fact it received only 53 or 54. Nevertheless, given the very “narrow margins” of the vote and the way members were reacting differently based on which constituents contacted them—some representatives were hearing exclusively from anti-ban bar and restaurant owners, while others received nothing but support for an exemptionless statewide ban—McCarthy still deemed House passage of a bill without the 21-and-over amendment possible. 800

The Senate Rejects the House Amendment

What kind of pressure does the house passage of this ridiculous >21 amdmt put on conference cttee? It is a new game if we get to conference. 801

In the unlikely event that the Senate accepted the radically watered-down bill that the House had passed, the anti-smoking initiative’s fate would lie with the governor. If, however, the Senate rejected the House amendment, it would return to the House, which could either insist on its amendment or “rescind [sic] from” it; if it took the former course, the bill would then go to a conference committee. 802 The next day, March 13, the Senate took up H.F. 2212 as amended by the House in House amendment S-5087—which exempted both restaurants, bars, hotels/motels, and casinos with liquor licenses that denied access to those 801 Email from Marc Linder to Joe Bolkcom and from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Mar. 12, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

under 21 on a regular basis and also the Iowa Veterans Home—to Senate amendment H-8054, but the debate was very compressed and perfunctory. Floor manager Staci Appel argued that the House amendment went against the bill’s intent and that in particular secondhand smoke, unlike Bailey’s amendment, did not discriminate on the basis of age. After about two minutes, Minority Leader Wieck announced that Republicans would caucus, and an hour later Democrats followed suit. When the Senate finally resumed session, Appel had nothing more to say; while a handful of other senators also spoke very briefly to no great effect. Deviating from their usual minority tactics, Republicans made no effort to drag out their inevitable defeat. On a record roll call vote the Senate then voted 27 to 23 to refuse to concur in the House amendment. Of the 30 Democrats, 25 voted against the House plan; joining them were only two of 20 Republicans, including Mary Lundby, the only minority member who would later voted for the bill on final passage. Conversely, five Democrats voted Yea; three of them (Black, Dotzler, and Hancock) would later vote against passage of H.F. 2212. The inter-chamber stalemate meant that a conference committee would have to be appointed to work out the differences between the two houses.

Following the Senate’s action, both chambers’ leaders were still confident, at least for public consumption, that they could achieve a compromise, but at the same time “they acknowledged that the disagreements could end in the proposal’s death.” Senate Majority Leader Gronstal felt comfortable predicting that his chamber “would not approve an overriding exemption for bars and restaurants,” but even he found it premature to venture a prediction as to the substance of the compromise to be reached. But he was, semi-jocularly, willing to imagine a compromise—between the original House bill, which covered 99 percent of workers and the Senate bill, which covered 100 percent—encompassing 99.5 percent, which “would be kind of halfway.”

805Senate Journal 2008, at 1:619 (Mar. 13). The other Republican was retired college economics teacher Dave Mulder; the other two Democrats were Wally Horn (who as majority leader in the early 1990s opposed restrictions on smoking in the Senate chamber) and veterinarian Joe Seng.

McCarthy, his House counterpart, also felt that a compromise (of indefinite content) was within reach: “‘It’s so close, so narrow but I still think it’s still possible to get a pretty good strong bill.”

Petersen, too, remained sufficiently sanguine that she would have accepted local control as a “fallback” “[o]nly if I absolutely had to. I think the way the bill is now either the House or the Senate version is way better than local control,” under which “maybe only a handful of cities would take action....”

Carrying considerably less authority was Representative Bailey’s opinion. Nevertheless, it was impossible to gainsay his success in having secured a House majority for his 21-and-over liquor-license-linked exemption, and so the Register found his prediction of H.F. 2212’s death newsworthy and extended his fame (and infamy) somewhat beyond his allotted 15 minutes: “‘Nothing is going to happen now. I really firmly believe that.’” Whether he also regretted its demise—as logically he must have since he had purported to offer the amendment as a way of salvaging rather than killing the bill—he did not say, but the Nay he cast on the bill’s final passage three weeks later suggested otherwise. Regardless of Bailey’s hopes, the University of Iowa Comprehensive Cancer Center, whose director had testified before the legislature earlier in the year that “[a] ban on tobacco use is the best for the people of Iowa,” used the perfectly timed release, the day after the Senate’s action, of its annual Cancer in Iowa Report “to express the hope that the Iowa Legislature can salvage a statewide tobacco ban, despite conflicts between House and Senate versions....”

The Conference Committee Achieves Even More Progress by Attaining Even Less Perfection

A state lawmaker who’s been pushing for a ban on smoking in public places...[.,] Tyler Olson, a Democrat from Cedar Rapids, is co-chair of a 10-member panel trying to find a compromise on the smoking issue, but Olson was gone at the end of last week to be with his wife as she gave birth to their son....

“Most babies, you know, come out crying and screaming. He came out screaming: ‘No smoking!’ Olson says. ‘...It was kind of interesting, but the doctors loved it.”

“Legislators have told me that this is the issue they have heard the most about from their constituents in the last 10 years.”

We’re not trying to decide what you can do by yourself when you’re not affecting anyone else.

In the days immediately after House and Senate majorities had revealed the Democratic leadership’s temporary inability to prevent the chambers from being at loggerheads, staunch House rank-and-file supporters of a rigorous statewide ban were seething. As one of their number put it: “We will have to have some serious conversations about next steps in our caucus. I am so mad at some of our members right now. It could be a pretty ugly caucus. If they try to kill this bill now, all hell will break loose. I heard that is Rant[s]’s goal, so all the more reason to go to conference committee and shove it down his throat.” In the event, opponents failed to kill the bill, but they also did not get everything stuffed down their throats that the militants wanted to send hurtling their way. The latter were, however, already weighing in with the House leadership on the conference committee’s composition: “If they appoint the wrong people all hell will break out.” The anti-smokers’ prediction that the Democratic members would probably be Olson, Petersen, and Wise both represented their preference and proved to be two-thirds accurate. Whether their presence on the committee signaled a last-ditch radicalization and effort to engineer a majority after all for joining the Senate in covering casinos remained to be seen.

Several days before the House met on constituting the conference committee, House Majority Leader McCarthy had stated that leadership was “looking for lawmakers who have a history of cooperation rather than confrontation. ‘This is not a partisan issue…. It’s very passionate, but not partisan, so it’s about…picking the right mix of people.’” The consistently largely party-line voting record and Republicans’ often mendacious and vitriolic floor-debate rhetoric may have belied McCarthy’s account, but he signaled that he did not intend to use his power to select a committee that would stuff a compromise down the Republicans’ throats that lacked a floor majority: “McCarthy suggests there will have to be a true compromise rather than a ‘pure’ statewide ban on smoking in all public places. ‘It doesn’t do any good to come out with [a] perfect bill…if it gets 49 votes…. We’re going to strive to be practically perfect, but we might not be perfect in every way.’” In the event, the Republicans appointed to the committee remained partisan and uncooperative, but the Democrats—two of whom, Petersen and Olson, were themselves militants and wound up dominating the proceeding—did execute McCarthy’s compromise strategy, which manifestly weathered the militants’ storm.

The House met on March 19 for a few minutes but then stood at ease for caucuses for almost five hours before reconvening in the afternoon. Bill floor manager Olson then moved that the House insist on its version and asked for a Yes vote. No discussion ensued and the Ayes were declared as having it (there being no audible No votes). The Speaker, pursuant to the Joint Rules of the Senate and House, then announced the appointment of the House members of a conference committee to consider the differences between the House and Senate versions of H.F. 2212, consisting of Democrats Olson (chair), Petersen, and (Assistant Majority Leader) Mike Reasoner, and two Republican opponents, Cecil Dolecheck and Chuck Soderberg. The entire deliberation lasted but three minutes.

---

818Live audiocast of debate on http://www.legis.state.ia.us (Mar. 19, 2008).
820Live audiocast of debate on http://www.legis.state.ia.us (Mar. 19, 2008); House Journal 2008, at 1:710 (Mar. 19). The Republicans, as Representative Mary Mascher explained the previous day, could have moved to recede from the House version; had they done so, Olson would have asked the Democratic caucus to vote No. But, from her
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Less than three hours after the House action the Senate followed suit, leadership appointing floor manager Appel chair, along with Democrats Bolkcom (a fervent anti-smoker) and Dotzler, and Republicans Minority Leader Wiecek and Zieman, who both rejected the whole basis of the bill. Although Dotzler opposed the bill and would eventually vote against it on final passage, leadership appointed him with the understanding that he would sign the conference report.

Tyler Olson, who identified the casino exemption, the 10-foot no-smoking zone around public places, and the Veterans Home in Marshalltown, as the chief sticking points for a compromise, optimistically predicted that more people wanted a bill rather than no new law in 2008. Gronstal’s hopefulness was more tempered: “I think there are two possibilities—we will come up with a good bill or we will walk away from it.” Although he was opting for the former approach, the challenge posed for the conference committee lay in the constantly shifting consensus on the smoking ban as each exemption picked up some votes and lost others. As a result, the Senate majority leader was compelled to calibrate his own chamber’s ability to pass a compromise before letting the committee vote on its final conclusion. As a fallback position, some began bruiting the option of having the conference committee return to a local control bill. In contrast, the press reported that legislators other than the Democratic leaders were much more skeptical on the grounds that “the differences are so great that it will be difficult to find a plan that both sides may agree upon.”

At its first meeting on March 20 the conference committee accomplished nothing but temporarily substituting Philip Wise for Olson, who had returned to p.s.: “This stinks, cause a lot of us hate the House version but of course we will support it to get it into the conference committee.” Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 18, 2008). The reason that the Republicans wound up not instigating that parliamentary ploy was that they “have bigger fish to fry today. They are much more concerned about H.F. 2645 [on public employee collective bargaining].” As to why the anti-smoking Democrats did not straightforwardly move to recede from the House version and, together with their strange bedfellow pro-tobacco Republicans, secure a majority, Mascher explained that: “[Y]es we could probably get the votes to do that. But we would then have to debate the senate version and the republicans would flip on that and defeat the senate version and the bill would be dead.” Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Mar. 19, 2008).

---

Cedar Rapids for his child’s birth.\textsuperscript{825} The considerable public interest that built up about the outcome was merely intensified by the committee’s failure to convene.

During the interim before the committee reconvened, momentum for enactment of the anti-smoking initiative was reinforced by the announcement by the Iowa Department of Revenue that during the first year’s operation of the higher cigarette tax (which went into effect on March 16, 2007)\textsuperscript{826} the number of cigarettes sold in Iowa had plummeted by 36 percent from five billion to 3.2 billion. Senator Herman Quirmbach admitted that several reasons may have underlain this decline, but insisted that “‘clearly the most important is the increase in the cigarette tax.’” Buoyed by the news, he encouraged his colleagues to “repeat the ‘triumphant success’” of the one dollar tax increase by passing a statewide smoking ban: “‘We have made more progress on this terrible public health problem in one year than in decades and decades and decades of work.’”\textsuperscript{827} Although a Register columnist (with a suspect animus against the tax increase and H.F. 2212)\textsuperscript{828} collected somewhat more than anecdotal evidence that significant numbers of Iowans were buying large volumes of cigarettes in Missouri (where the tax was only 17 cents) and illegally importing them back into Iowa,\textsuperscript{829} an academic expert estimated that the largest component (almost half) of the sales decline represented “real reductions in smoking by Iowans, followed by reductions in cross-border shopping by non-Iowans who used to buy in Iowa when taxes were lower...followed by the tax avoidance described in the [Register] article and other tax avoidance....”\textsuperscript{830}

\textsuperscript{826}See above ch. 34.

\textsuperscript{828}Telephone interview with John Carlson, Des Moines (Apr. 11, 2008).

\textsuperscript{829}John Carlson, “Indeed, Cigarette Sales Went South (to Missouri),” \textit{DMR}, Apr. 6, 2006, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com (visited Apr. 8, 2008). When asked why his agency was not attempting to intercept those cigarettes illegally imported into Iowa, the director of the Iowa Department of Revenue pointed to a small decline in annual cigarette sales in Missouri as “evidence that Iowa is probably not seeing many people go to Missouri to purchase cigarettes....” Email from Mark Schuling to Marc Linder (Apr. 10, 2008).

\textsuperscript{830}Email from Prof. Frank Chaloupka, U. Illinois at Chicago, to Marc Linder (Apr. 13, 2008). Chaloupka estimated that based on a 35 percent increase in cigarette prices and the usual elasticity estimates, sales would have dropped by about 14 percent. Email from Prof. Frank Chaloupka, U. Illinois at Chicago, to Marc Linder (Apr. 11, 2008).
On April 4, interviewed on the television program “Iowa Press,” Gronstal himself declined to predict the contours of the eventual compromise between the Senate and House, but did “think it’s clear that there will be probably some pull back from the original Senate position of essentially no exceptions. So, I think there will be some exceptions but certainly nowhere near what was in the second House version or the first House version.” Gronstal’s reluctance to speculate derived in part from the “interesting equation, one you don’t often see in the legislature. On the Senate side the more exceptions you have the fewer votes you get. On the House side the more restrictive it is the fewer votes you get. So, whichever direction the conference committee goes, more exceptions or less exceptions, they lose votes in one chamber or the other. So, it really is an interesting dynamic that I’ve not seen very often in the legislature. [T]his is one kind of for the record books. I’m not sure because you go one direction and one chamber has difficulty finding the votes, you go the other direction and the other chamber [sic].”

When asked whether local control was a possible fallback position, Gronstal finally offered an expansive public policy perspective:

I believe this issue has reached a tipping point. I think it has, in fact, passed the tipping point and I think if we don’t pass something this year next year we will come back and...pass something much tougher than anything we’re considering this year. I think the public mood on smoking has dramatically changed just in the last year. A year ago oh local control is fine, let’s let a few communities figure this out. And then after four or five years and what may be something statewide, between last year and this year it just moved dramatically and it’s time to stop smoking.

And on the morning of the day on which the conference committee met, Gronstal reinforced and extended these insights in a radio interview: “The amazing observation I have is that a year ago [there was a] very broad deep consensus: ‘Let’s do [a] local control effort.’” But during the intervening year the mood had changed “pretty dramatically” to: “‘Let’s not fool around with local control. Let’s not have a patchwork quilt of different rules and regulations around the state: Let’s do something statewide.’ I suspect in another year the mood will continue to be stronger and stronger against smoking.” In contrast, Rants was standing pat in opposition to a ban, but insisted that he would not ask

---

When the conference committee finally convened on April 7 to deal with the inter-chamber “stalemate”\footnote{Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fihr) (term used by Sen. Joe Bolkcom).} and reached a compromise among the six Democrats (the four Republicans voting against the outcome),\footnote{On Democratic Senator Dotzler’s formal agreement despite his substantive disagreement, see below this ch.} neither the proceedings themselves nor the result was surprising. Although the meeting was open to the public, only legislators were permitted to speak, and press accounts were sparse.\footnote{Asked how the conference committee meeting had gone, committee member Senator Joe Bolkcom wasted no words but also shed no light: “It went well.” Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Apr. 8, 2008).} The description by Iowa Restaurant Association President Doni DeNucci may not have been that of an objective attendee, but, since her frustration over the result for her members did not prompt her to exempt her Republican paladins (or Senator Dotzler) from her criticism, her account, though not fully reflective of the proceeding’s nuances, did capture some of its desultory, if not chaotic, features: “The meeting lasted until around 7 pm, but that is deceiving because they didn’t start until 5:20 pm, and every five minutes either the house or the senate was voting so half the committee would get up and walk out. There was no agenda, no procedure outline, the co-chairs Sen. Appel and Rep. Olson did not seem to know how to proceed or what to do. Mostly the committee members spoke the same rhetoric for the media that that [sic] did on their respective chamber floors.”\footnote{Email from Doni DeNucci to Marc Linder (Apr. 9, 2008) (responding to a question emailed a few minutes earlier asking whether members had said anything interesting or surprising).}

Staci Appel, the bill’s Senate floor manager and committee chair, self-deprecatingly and truthfully admitted at the outset of the session—which ran from start to finish about 65 minutes minus several interruptions for floor votes—that “I’m not sure about the procedure.” This understatement of her level of ignorance of the rules governing the conduct of a conference committee meeting applied to several of her colleagues as well; only occasionally did the Republican opposition, vainly seeking to stop the majority steamroller, inject knowledge of the pertinent rules. After the meandering discussion had begun with Republican

\footnote{The Smokefree Air Act of 2008}
Soderberg’s programmatic but unexplicated and incoherent declaration that any exemptions had to be consistent across the board “so that we don’t put any person or any business at a disadvantage,” Republicans, led by Senate Minority Leader Ron Wieck, a State Farm insurance agent for 35 years, demanded to know whether there was any truth to rumors that the Democrats had been meeting informally “behind the scenes” for three weeks making decisions and—as Democratic Senator Dotzler, who believed his colleagues that there had been no “secret meetings” but had also heard the same rumors, put it—a “deal.” After Appel had gamely denied that there had been any “formal meetings or anything,” though she acknowledged that “informal discussions with all kinds of members” had taken place to see in what directions they wanted to go, and concluded that “concerns” having been adequately “aired,” the committee should proceed to “content,” House floor manager Tyler Olson offered some recommendations to “get the conversation started,” which Republicans doubtless imagined to be the very agreement worked out at the very meetings whose existence Appel had just denied. Olson’s list included: (1) “split[ting] the difference” on casinos by limiting the exemption to smoking on the gaming floor; (2) dropping the 10-foot rule, which the House version had contained but the Senate version had dropped; (3) keeping the Senate tractor exemption; (4) the status quo in prisons; (5) keeping the Senate’s clarified language concerning fair grounds; (6) moving back the bill’s effective date to December 31, 2008, as a way of addressing some concerns about the full casino exemption or the House restricted-age exemption; and (7) keeping the House exemption for the Veterans Home in Marshalltown. The Democratic leadership’s judgment of the bill’s prospects was presumably faithfully indicated by the fact that every one of Olson’s recommendations weakened rather than strengthened the Smokefree Air Act.

Olson argued that his proposed ban on smoking in casino bars and restaurants

---

838 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fihr).

840 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fihr). Assistant Minority Leader Struyk later repeated the same complaint. Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).

841 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fihr). Dotzler later took credit for having eliminated the 10-foot rule in conference, while admitting that Petersen had rejected his other proposals on the grounds that there was “no satisfying” him. Telephone interview with Bill Dotzler, Waterloo (Aug. 20, 2008). In contrast, the Smokefree Illinois Act, which had gone into effect in 2008, included a 15-foot non-smoking zone at entrances to and exits from buildings in which smoking was prohibited. 30 ILCS/sect. 70 (2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

would get rid of the issue of the competitive disadvantage stemming from a total casino exemption about which bar owners had complained. Soderberg indirectly attacked this conclusion by asking whether it assumed that alcohol would not also be served on the gambling floor, but Olson and Bolkcom sought to evade the criticism by stating that Olson’s proposal did not address that issue, which was outside the scope of the conference report.842 (In fact, as Democratic Representative Polly Bukta of Clinton later remarked of the new casino in her city, smoking took place in the bar that was built right on the gambling floor.)843 No one, however, raised the public health issue, which was not the export of alcohol from bars and restaurants to the gambling floor, but the “secondhand smoke wafting over from the casino”844 into the restaurants. In case anyone needed to be reminded that it was precisely the farcical designated smoking areas regime that had prompted mass demands for the Smokefree Air Act in the first place, a study in Nevada casinos operating under the arrangement proposed by Olson845 revealed that “‘the open air floor plan of casinos creates a shared air space, resulting in secondhand smoke migrating from the gaming floor into the restaurants’” such that “three-quarters of them contained air pollution levels exceeding the...EPA’s recommendation for indoor air quality....”846

As asked by Petersen, the bill’s chief sponsor, about the rationale for changing the enactment date—which had apparently not been discussed previously847—Olson mentioned the lead time for the transition in order to deal with the negative economic impact about which bar owners had complained.

---

842 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
843 Telephone interview with Polly Bukta, Clinton, June 2, 2009).
847 Whitney Woodward, “Democrats: No Plan to Delay Smoking Ban Enactment Date,” WC, Apr. 12, 2008, on http://www.wcfcourier.com (visited July 23, 2008). Olson’s support for this proposal was surprising in light of Senator McCoy’s revelation of the tobacco lobby’s “secret plan” to delay enforcement until January 2009 so that it could get a second shot at amending the law to fight for exemptions for 21-and-over clubs. Not only was there, McCoy (correctly and incorrectly) predicted, no chance that such an amendment would succeed, but the legislature would repeal the casino exemption. Telephone interview with Matt McCoy, Des Moines (May 8, 2008).
With barely suppressed sarcasm Wieck asked for some help in understanding what an owner would use this time for—perhaps finding a new business plan, product, or consumer? After underscoring that the bill’s purpose was to protect workers from being “assaulted” by carcinogenic secondhand smoke, Bolkmann unresponsively admitted that bar owners had “legitimate concerns” (without identifying them) and asserted, again without explanation, that whereas a six-month delay was acceptable, one or two years was not. At this point Petersen—who, interestingly, later referred to herself and her allies on the one hand and opponents on the other as occupying “extremes”—remarked that she would hate to see the effective date pushed back beyond July 1, but, ironically, urged the committee, if it decided that it wanted a “longer stretch,” not to set it on New Year’s Eve, because, although she had never smoked, she assumed “people are probably going to puff away that night before the next day when their New Year’s resolution kicks in.”

Republican representative, farmer, and smoker Cecil Dolecheck then elaborated a justification for his preference for committee adoption of the House’s exemption for establishments denying admission to anyone under 21. Dolecheck praised the provision “get[ting] us to the same place where the State of Iowa becomes nonsmoking, but we bring private enterprise along with us so we don’t disenfranchise them and make them angry at us as legislators...for forcing them to do something.” The amendment prevented restaurant owners from feeling “oppressed” or being forced out of business by prompting them to declare their businesses no-smoking because they would not kick out families and children, but they would be able to make the decision as to what was best for them. To be sure, Dolecheck failed to explain how or why an owner would feel less angry because he had made the key entrepreneurial decision when Dolecheck himself conceded that—given the alleged profit-maximizing constraints—the proprietor was “not really going to have a choice.” Rather than engage Dolecheck’s self-contradictory argument, Olson attacked its empirical

---

849 House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Feb. 19, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr, communications director, House Speaker Pat Murphy).
underpinning by insisting that exempting over-21 establishments would not get Iowa to the same point.\textsuperscript{850}

As Soderberg and Olson were thrashing out the interpretive details of the exemption of fairgrounds, almost half an hour into the meeting, Petersen finally bestowed procedural enlightenment on the committee by reading Joint Rule 13.3: “The authority of the first conference committee shall cover only issues related to provisions of the bill and amendments to the bill which were adopted by either the senate or the house of representatives and on which the senate and house of representatives differed.” Applying the rule, she then concluded that because the House had accepted the Senate amendment on fairgrounds, it was not a point on which the chambers differed. More generally, she pointed out that there were not many points on which they did differ. Apparently reluctant to rely on the collective reading comprehension of the committee—whose members included three assistant majority leaders, a minority whip, and a minority leader, and had served in the legislature for a total of 70 years—Bolkcom asked Patty Funaro, the long-time Legislative Services Agency bill drafter, one of whose subject areas was tobacco and who was attending the entire conference committee meeting anyway—\textsuperscript{851}—to clarify the situation. \textsuperscript{852} After Funaro had confirmed that Petersen’s interpretation was correct, Petersen proceeded to enumerate the provisions on which the two chambers had differed as well as those that the committee had discussed even though the houses agreed on them: they differed only on casinos and the Veterans Home; they did not differ on the 10-foot rule, tractors, prisons, or fairgrounds. In addition, Petersen called the bill’s effective date a “gray area,” apparently because the House had debated and voted down a different date, but this interpretation was surely incorrect. No sooner had Petersen narrowed the debatable provisions to casinos and the Veterans Home than Olson expressed a desire to discuss the effective date because “it relates to the differences” without offering any justification as to how such a basis fit within Joint Rule 13.3. Clearly within that rule was, as Dolecheck quickly pointed out, the House provision on age-restricted establishments, which was such a huge, dysfunctional, and spectacularly well-known exemption that the failure by Petersen—no one less than the bill’s \textit{spiritus rector}—to mention it (together with her momentary misrecollection that the House had agreed with the Senate on the exemption for \textsuperscript{850}Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fihr).

\textsuperscript{851}Telephone interview with Patty Funaro, Des Moines (July 21, 2008).

\textsuperscript{852}It is not unusual for legislators to call on bill drafters, who have to know the rules as well as legislators, for such assistance. Email from former House Speaker Don Avenson to Marc Linder (July 23, 2008).
Second legislative session, 80th General Assembly, 2007

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

...underscored the slapdash if not chaotic procedure. Ironically, this disorganization may have constituted the strongest refutation of Republicans’ accusations that Democrats had finalized the outcome in secret ex parte meetings.

The discussable issues having apparently been sorted out, Olson once again proposed splitting the casino exemption “down the middle.” (Olson in fact exaggerated: as the Iowa Racing and Gaming Commission later pointed out, “some casinos have a central bar in the middle of the gaming floor, and...those would allow smoking since they don’t have any ceilings or walls around them.” Unenclosed restaurants on the gaming floor would also be exempt.) Seeing the endgame looming because he was deprived by arithmetic of any possibility of thwarting the majority party’s will, Wieck sought to delay the inevitable by raising the eminently reasonable procedural concern with reliance on individual members’ personal memories of how the two chambers’ versions differed and proposing that the committee staff compare the two and compile a list of the issues on which they clearly differed. Petersen’s response that, since their staffs had already pulled that information together for anyone who had requested it, there was no reason to delay the discussion, could, in light of Democrats’ palpable confusion as to how the two versions of the bill differed, have been interpreted as a subtle critique of staff’s incompetence, but presumably she did not so mean it and Wieck failed to comment on the unintended irony. Instead, Olson made a formal motion to exempt the gaming floor and the Veterans Home as well as to delay the enactment date to January 1, 2009. Dolecheck opposed it as inequitable, while Zieman specified that as far as many bars in rural Iowa were concerned that would be put out of business the proposal amounted to “hang me slow or hang me fast.” Then Dotzler killed any hope that Republicans cherished that he would turn on his caucus leadership. While agreeing with the minority party that the bill was flawed—he had voted for the House bill and favored the over-21 exemption, but accepted the committee’s proposed compromises—he also recognized “why I’m on this committee”: because over two-thirds of Senate Democrats preferred a stronger bill than he did, “I made a commitment to the majority leader that I wouldn’t be an obstructionist on this committee... And if I voted with the opposition I could stop the work that you’re doing right now.

---

853 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
854 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
And it’s not my intent to do that.” Instead, he would vote against the conference committee report on the Senate floor. Among the few additional exemptions that he believed were still needed was one for construction workers operating cranes in a cab a hundred feet high who took their lunch and even a “urinal bottle” up there. Dotzler was already looking forward to a second conference committee, which would be free to visit this issue and all others. Sensing an opportunity, Dolecheck gave voice to Republicans’ pipe dream that Dotzler would vote against the report, which would then be rejected, opening the way for the same members to be reappointed to a second conference committee, which would then thresh out all the issues.856

For Wieck, apparently dead-set on restoring a kind of pristine ruthless rugged individualism unknown even to the nineteenth century, “[t]his is all about people’s rights....” The rights-holders whom the Republican Senate minority leader had in mind were, in the first instance, business owners and, secondly, consumers, who should have the right to decide “what door they want to walk through and what environment that [sic] they want to frequent.”857 Workers and their rights Wieck did not even bother mentioning. He may, however, have been opaquely and dismissively alluding to workers’ right not to be sickened and killed by secondhand smoke at work when he expressed his disappointment that “this is the beginning of many many rights that the nanny government will push down the throats of the people of Iowa and the businesspeople in Iowa.” Wieck’s and Republicans’ incoherence was on display in his further plaint that business owners “pay their taxes to the state of Iowa, they follow the laws, they do what society asks them to do and I think they ought to have the right to be able to decide what goes on, as long as it’s legal, inside the walls of their business.”858 Most restaurant owners presumably follow the law by washing plates and utensils in between uses by different customers rather than offering a filthy environment in which generations of customers would drink from disgustingly unhygienic unwashed glasses coated with their predecessors’ saliva. If owners 856 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Dolecheck’s fantasy was doubly unrealistic: if Dotzler had breached his commitment to the majority leader, Gronstal would not have reappointed him to a second committee.

857 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

accept society’s mandates in this area of public health, why did Wieck suddenly perceive the collapse of the republican form of government in applying the same principle to the far greater health hazard emanating from toxic and carcinogenic cigarette smoke?

After reasonably raising the procedural issue of whether the change in the enactment date was properly included in the motion since the chambers had not differed on the matter, Soderberg returned to the wholly fabricated issue that Republicans never tired of flogging—that it was apparently not as important to protect the health of casino workers. For the first and last time during all the legislative debates a Democrat finally confronted this lie directly instead of dancing around it with cliches about “progress over perfection.” On at least this one occasion, Petersen, who had not taken part in the House floor debates, heatedly told Soderberg, “I take offense to your comments,” and recounted that when the bill had come to the Commerce Committee, “I didn’t want to exempt casinos,” but the exemption originated in the necessity of finding the votes to get the bill out of committee. She then hurled the hypocrisy accusation back at Republicans by reminding them that: “I’ve brought this bill forth for the past eight years and under your party’s leadership not once did the bill get out of a committee or a committee chairman’s desk drawer.” Petersen went on to reveal that after the Senate had removed the casino exemption, she went back and listened to the tape of the House debate in order to identify those who had stated that they wanted a “completely clean bill” and to determine whether the bill’s proponents could get 51 votes if casinos were covered: “I went back to people in your party that said that they would vote for the bill if it was a completely clean bill” and asked them whether they would vote for the bill if the casino exemption were struck: “I do not have one person say they would vote for the bill.”

No Republican having come forward to undertake the fruitless mission of trying to refute Petersen’s charge of hypocrisy, Dolecheck then asked for a “ruling” from Funaro as to whether they could include a different enactment date in the motion than that to which the Senate and House had already agreed. Olson began to argue that while they could ask for unanimous consent to consult, Funaro could not “bind the committee,” when Dolecheck drew out the consequences of proposing a new enactment date: “If we’re gonna follow the rules like we talked about doing,” then the committee needed a ruling on whether it was permissible to change a provision on which the two houses did not differ, and “if we’re gonna start allowing other things that weren’t in either one of the bills, then let’s open it up.” This prospect was apparently too unsettling for

---

859Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
Assistant Minority Leader Reasoner, who, finally speaking up, moved to strike the effective date from Olson’s motion.\textsuperscript{860} Seeing that his initiative—which Rants later denounced as a hypocritical move to keep bar owners and customers from being angry on election day\textsuperscript{861}—had outlived its welcome, Olson stated that he was amenable to that motion, which then carried on a voice vote.\textsuperscript{862}

After Olson had moved his now truncated motion, he responded to Soderberg’s (rhetorical) question as to why the exemption covered the casino floor only and whether it was designed to protect state revenue with yet another recitation of the unspecific image of “progress over perfection.” Soderberg’s expression of disappointment that the bill was concerned only with the state’s—to the exclusion of private businesses’—revenues and Wieck’s demand for an answer to Soderberg’s question prompted a frustrated Bolkcom to mix his idioms: “We’re trying to split hairs between what we think can get 26 votes in the Senate and 51 votes in the House.” Wieck, suffering from the double debility of never having articulated a reasoned counter-position and of lacking the votes to prevail, manifestly unchastened by the history lesson that Petersen had tried to teach the Republicans, and suddenly discovering his heart for the Iowa proletariat, retreated to an amended version of his party’s tired, tiresome, hypocritical, and mendacious mantra: “So the workers that are working on the casino floor don’t count.” Summoning up his last reserves of patience (“Senator Wieck, I think we’re going in circles”), Bolkcom tried one last time to talk sense to nonsense: not only did he think that those workers counted, but in 2009 some of the anti-smoking advocates in the room would return together with casino floor workers to “get after us to finish our work on this issue.” Bolkcom also sarcastically expressed surprise that he had not heard Wieck, who had been talking about owners and consumers, “say a word about workers until now.” Continuing in the same ironic vein after Wieck had repeated his mendacious claim that the majority party had all of a sudden decided that it was important to protect all workers in Iowa except those in casinos, Bolkcom assured Wieck that “[o]ur work is not done until we provide protections like you want to for those workers.”\textsuperscript{863}

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item[860] Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
\item[862] Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).
\item[863] Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr). Wieck’s later admission that, given Republicans’ emphasis on individual rights (of business owners to determine whether to allow smoking and of smokers to
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Wieck and his fellow Republicans having exhausted their meager repertoire of vacuous obstructionist rhetoric, both the Senate and House members of the committee voted 3 to 2 in favor of Olson’s amendment.864

In the immediate aftermath of the committee’s action, Gronstal appeared to turn somewhat less optimistic. Declaring that a majority vote “‘is not guaranteed,’” he added that the Senate would not vote on the compromise until he believed that he had the needed majority.865 On the morning of the floor vote, his House counterpart, McCarthy, stated that since support for the bill was only “tepid,” the compromise “could yet die.... ‘It’s going to be very, very close. I don’t know if we’re going to have the votes or not.’” Since H.F. 2212 did not have the requisite 51 votes within his 53-member caucus, passage hinged on Republican support. If those Republican votes were not forthcoming and the House did not adopt the report, McCarthy noted, the legislature would reappoint a committee in order to try to reach agreement.866

Although apparently not requesting specific freedom to offer toxins in the atmosphere beyond the many already generated by the cigarette smoke they demanded the continued right to force their nonsmoking customers to breathe, business groups declared that they would urge their membership to lobby against the compromise. In particular, restaurant owners were already nostalgic for the short-lived House provision that would have allowed smoking in places that prohibited admission to those under 21. In a reaction bordering on chutzpah, the casino industry, whose unique exemption had caused such an uproar among rival industries, was allegedly “only slightly more pleased” than the restaurant owners.867 Casino owners’ “mixed emotions” resulted, on the one hand, from

864 Conference Committee Meeting on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 7, 2008) (audio file provided by Dean Fiihr).

866 Jason Clayworth, “House Leader: Smoking Compromise Could Fail,” DMR, Apr. 8, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com. If a conference committee failed to reach agreement, its members were required to be discharged immediately and a new one had to be appointed. Joint Rules of the Senate and House 13.7 (Sen. Concurrent Res. 3, 2008). A second committee’s authority “shall cover free conference during which the committee has authority to propose amendments to any portion of the bill” so long as they were within the bill’s subject matter. Id. Rule 13.8.

867 James Lynch, “Legislators Agree on Limited Smoking Ban,” Gazette (Cedar
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

their discontent with having been deprived of total control over where they would permit smoking, and, on the other, from gratification that smoking would continue to be permitted on the gambling floor, which was “the most critical portion.”

Whereas bar owners complained that the bill conferred a competitively intolerable advantage on casinos, the latter, in turn, purported to prefer the over 21 age restriction or a provision making smoking rules a business decision instead of a mandate.

On the morning of April 8, before the House or Senate brought up the conference committee report, Brian Froehlich, owner of a bar in the small eastern Iowa town of Wilton and spokesperson of the newly formed Iowa Bar Owners Coalition, sent all the state legislators (and cc’d Doni DeNucci of the IRA) a brief email expressing his disgust with and outrage over the conference committee meeting, which he had attended. While in the statehouse to lobby against bar coverage, he availed himself of press coverage to boast that he would not enforce the ban in his bar: “My people—I take care of my people,” 70 percent of whom smoked. Froehlich also proposed to his own members that they file a suit charging discrimination vis-a-vis exempt casinos. With the “state...already hurting for money,” he envisioned an action for damages as bringing the state government to its financial knees. The bathetic plaint was rooted in a child-like understanding of law: whereas Froehlich saw fit to run his life by the state flag motto (“Our liberties we prize and our rights we will maintain”), he sarcastically wondered whether his addressees’ flag said: “Your rights are controlled by us and your liberties mean nothing so get over it.” Although he purported to “have been in this fight since the beginning,” Froehlich had manifestly given little thought to the impossibility of societal life without regulation and to the attendant loss of the liberty to drive a couple of thousand pounds of metal through a red light at 120 miles an hour or to serve beer in unwashed glasses in order to avoid profit-reducing costs. The rights and liberties that he had in mind presumably reduced to the one point that he claimed the conference committee was supposed to decline—“the future of smoking in Iowa....” To be sure, the conference committee’s charge did not even remotely extend to the question of universal prohibition, but Froehlich, though neither a meteorologist nor any other kind of scientist, may nevertheless have intuited which way the public health winds were blowing and that such a generalized ban would inevitably be propelled onto the agenda by passage of H.F. 2212 regardless of whether casinos were temporarily exempted.

Email from Brian F[roehlich] to Ray Zirkelbach et al., Apr. 8, 2008 (forwarded from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder, Apr. 8, 2008).

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The House Narrowly Approves the Conference Committee Compromise

This is the strongest bill that can pass the House. ... This is it.

Under the Senate and House Joint Rules, a conference committee “report of agreement is debateable, but cannot be amended.” Consequently, any and all amendments recommended by a bill were automatically adopted by a chamber in adopting a report. Once a chamber adopted a report, “there shall be no more debate, and the bill shall immediately be placed on its final passage.”

Following a prayer and the pledge of allegiance, House proceedings on April 8 opened propitiously with the filing by Democrat Marcella Frevert of a petition by 66 of her constituents in northwestern Iowa favoring H.F. 2212. Toward noon, with Speaker Murphy in the chair, the House took up consideration of the conference committee report, which surprisingly—given the bill’s monumentality and contentiousness—lasted little more than 20 minutes. Given his own disingenuous refusal to disclose the open secret as to why some members of his caucus were insisting on an exemption for casinos and failure even to inform the House accurately about the scope of the coverage of farms and the grounds of public buildings, Tyler Olson, chair of the House committee delegation, seemed to lack standing to dish out such praise, but he nevertheless celebrated the “transparent” process that had brought about this historic piece of legislation. As far as the committee’s compromise was concerned, he pointed out that it had dealt to some extent with bar owners’ concerns by eliminating the 10-foot no-smoking buffer zone outside covered public places. (Olson did not make it clear that this concession to bar owners would not only perpetuate the gauntlets of secondhand smoke that nonsmokers had been forced to run to enter buildings since indoor smoking bans had prompted smokers to stand right next to entrances smoking, but, would, since the House Commerce Committee had struck the grant of local control, also prevent local communities from passing ordinances to prohibit such smoking in privately owned outdoor areas.) The committee had also relieved bar owners of the perceived competitive disadvantage by banning smoking in casino bars. Overall, Olson declared, the bill covered 99.9 percent of public places and 99.9 percent of workers in Iowa.876

---

872 Email from Brian Froehlich to Ray Zirkelbach et al., Apr. 8, 2008 (forwarded from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder, Apr. 8, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The two House Republicans who had refused to sign the committee report outlined their objections. Dolecheck urged rejection on the grounds that the bill as embodied in the report could be very detrimental to small bars and restaurants in rural Iowa. By his lights, bar owners should have the right to determine what clientele they wanted—keeping in mind that some of his constituents had told him that 75 to 80 percent of their clientele smoked, although they did not like the smoking—and to post the bar accordingly. He was especially partial to the legal age-restricted approach that the Senate had rejected. Soderberg argued that, on account of the exemptions, the legislature was not even protecting Iowans’ health. Nor was he having any of Olson’s claim that the ban on smoking in casino bars eliminated bar owners’ competitive disadvantage: since drinking alcohol and eating would still be lawful on the gambling floor, the bill de facto exempted casino bars and restaurants.877

McKinley Bailey, who had been one of the most prominent Democratic defectors to the pro-tobacco forces, complained that the report provided an exemption for casinos owned by out-of-state corporations, but not for mom-and-pop Iowa bars. Philip Wise, a former smoker both of whose parents’ lives had been shortened by tobacco, predicted that the 2008 session would be defined more by H.F. 2212—which he called one of the most significant public health measures in the state’s history—than any other. He admonished his fence-sitting colleagues who allegedly could not abide less than a perfect exemptionless bill that the choice at this point was between protecting the health of the overwhelming majority of Iowans and doing nothing (which latter was precisely what these legislators apparently wanted). The “real philosophical problem with paying homage to casinos,” underscored by Republican Mike May, who deemed the bill much better than the one that the House had originally sent to the Senate, was only exacerbated after Olson had conceded that smoking would be permitted in a casino bar or restaurant if gambling machines were present in it. In his closing remarks Olson introduced the new and interesting argument that such high-profile Iowa employers as Principal Financial Group and Rockwell Collins were pushing for passage of H.F. 2212 because of its importance for their efforts to recruit workers to and retain them in Iowa.878

---

Because a less threatening “non-record roll call was requested”879—both parties favored an unrecorded vote because they feared that recording might prompt a few members to vote against the leadership’s position880—the party composition of the 52 to 48 vote is not known.881 Much attention was paid not only to the closeness and highly unusual uncertainty of the vote on the conference committee report, but also the means by which the 51st vote was obtained. As the Aye votes became stalled at 50 on the large vote board, but the voting machine remained open, Majority Leader McCarthy patrolled his caucus’s seats looking for a prospective convert.882 This procedure prompted Rants to wonder: “I’m just curious what the going rate is for a legislator today.” McCarthy finally lighted upon Paul Bell, a former 31-year policeman and president of the statewide Drug Awareness and Resistance Education (DARE) association. McCarthy later stated that he had simply asked Bell to vote for the report: “I patted Bell’s back

880Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).
882Petersen, the bill’s chief sponsor, confirmed both that McCarthy had had to walk around the chamber persuading a couple of members to vote for it and that the outcome had been unclear until the vote went up on the board. Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (Apr. 12, 2008). Republican Lance Horbach, who opposed the bill, stated that the voting machine had stayed open for 15 or 20 minutes while McCarthy was looking for the 51st vote. Telephone interview with Lance Horbach, Tama (Aug. 17, 2008).
and said: ‘Could you put up your yes vote?’ Calling this account only half right, Bell himself later insisted that although he did change his vote from No to Yes, he had already decided to do so before McCarthy spoke to him. The casino exemption, which he regarded as unfair to small bar owners, had caused him to struggle with his vote until his daughter, who was also his clerk, persuaded him that “you have to start somewhere”; he had already concluded that in this matter something was better than nothing by the time McCarthy came by and merely asked him whether he was comfortable with his No vote. Bell agreed that this vote had been one of the rare ones on which leadership had not known in advance what the outcome would be. McCarthy’s administrative assistant and legal counsel, Brian Meyer, without mentioning any possible quid pro quo, admitted that the majority leader had had to ask for a favor to secure the deciding vote.

For good measure McCarthy also secured a 52nd vote in the person of Kurt Swaim, a lawyer and Judiciary Committee chair representing a rural district in southern Iowa along the Missouri border. Swaim, who had voted against H.F. 2212 in February and March because he preferred local control despite knowing that some local governments might not adopt anti-smoking ordinances and that it might be a long time before a large number of local governments got around to passing them, changed his vote at the literal last minute when it became apparent both that the choice was between this bill and no bill and that passage depended on his vote in particular. The reason that this constellation of events became apparent to him was, to be sure, that “leadership” alighted on him when it went around scaring up that last vote. The reward that he earned for his efforts was a sign posted at a bar in his small town thanking “Kurt Swaim and his communist friends” for the ban.

Just a few minutes after McCarthy had succeeded in coralling the deciding vote(s), Representative Mary Mascher observed: “A little tense getting to the 51 but we did it.” Looking back, May characterized the “really close” vote as one 884Telephone interview with Paul Bell, Newton (Aug. 1, 2008).

885Telephone interview with Brian Meyer, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).
886Telephone interview with Kurt Swaim, Bloomfield (Sept. 4, 2008). Swaim insisted that leadership had used the same kinds of substantive arguments made during floor debate, rather than promises or disciplinary threats, to persuade him to vote Aye.
887Email from Mary Mascher to Marc Linder (Apr. 8, 2008). Republican Assistant Minority Leader Struyk agreed that suspense had attended the outcome because the votes of two or three fence-sitters in both parties had been in doubt who had been vacillating for weeks. Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008).
example of the “consternation” that it might not pass after all. 888

Once a majority, albeit a narrow one, for the conference committee compromise had been established, the vote on final passage of H.F. 2212 attracted two more representatives. The 54 to 45 vote 889—Republican Linda Upmeyer, the lone member not voting, stated afterward that she had intended to vote No, “but had problems with her voting machine” 890—approximated the Democrats’ 53 to 47 control of the House, but only by coincidence. Without the nine Republican cross-overs 891 to compensate for the eight Democratic defectors, 892 the bill, as McCarthy had correctly predicted earlier that morning, would not have passed. In the event, 45 (or 83 percent) of 53 Democrats voted for H.F. 2212, while 37 (or 80 percent) of 46 (voting) Republicans voted against it. Thus, while the vote was far from party-line, the Republican party’s traditionally overwhelmingly pro-tobacco and pro-smoking orientation was as unmistakable as Democrats’ antistance. Ominously for any efforts to strengthen (or, for that matter, to resist repealing parts of) the Smoke-Free Air Act during the 2009-2010 session, however, whereas all eight Democratic opponents were re-elected in November 2008, four of the nine Republican supporters retired and one was defeated. 893

In a post-mortem on “Iowa Press” a few days after the governor had signed H.F. 2212 into law, McCarthy and Rants presented diametrically opposed political prognoses. Whereas Rants spoke his lines from the antediluvian cigarette company playbook that pretended that smoking was a normal activity deserving of societal protection and respect, denial of which would cost Democrats votes among the middle and working class, McCarthy, with considerable passion, stressed that Iowa was entering the new public health and cultural world that much of the United States (and de facto if not de jure Iowa itself) had already created. Hypocritically perpetuating the exposure to secondhand smoke of all workers, customers, and visitors in all other venues, Rants pretended that Republicans would have been willing to override the business decisions of thousands of small restaurant owners:

888 Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake (Aug. 18, 2008).
891 Anderson, Baudler, Clute, Jacobs, May, Rayhons, Schickel, Tomenga, and Wiencek.
892 Bailey, Huser, Lykam, Mertz, Quirk, Schueller, Thomas, and Wenthe.
893 Clute, Jacobs, Schickel, and Tomenga were not candidates, while Wiencek lost her race.
I think they [Democrats] overplayed their hand. I think most Iowans, in fact, if you were to put up a bill that said we’re going to ban smoking from restaurants, going to your Applebee’s or TGI Friday’s or whatever, that bill probably would have gotten 90 votes in the House, maybe 95 votes in the House but they overplayed their hand. I get an e-mail every week from a Vietnam veteran who, as he says, he [sic] paid for his membership at the VFW in blood and he can’t go in there and smoke any more. We have gone too far. We tell private business owners you can’t smoke in your own office in your building even if you are the only employee. I’ve got a UAW worker, lifelong democrat who has now become a republican over this issue, wants to run for the general assembly. I think it’s symptomatic of where the democrats have lost touch with frankly middle class Iowans and blue collar Iowans, not just in terms of sort of their tax and spending issues but this is part of their larger social agenda, they just got carried away. And I think frankly that’s going to cause them some problems at the ballot box.\footnote{Iowa Press, No. 3533, on http://www.iptv.org/iowapress/transcript_detail.cfm?ipShowNum=3533 (Apr. 18, 2008) (visited July 11, 2008).}

In contrast, McCarthy argued that the his party had caught the wave of the future:

Every single survey that I’ve seen both our internals and those public surveys that have been put in the news show that it is [sic] overwhelmingly popular movement to smoke free places. I have a right as a citizen of this state not to have smoke and cancer causing chemicals including arsenic put in my body. And this has been a cultural shift. And I’ve said this before but I remember visiting the Capitol for a tour as a child and it was culturally acceptable that everyone could smoke in the House, in the Senate, in the Capitol rotunda and I couldn't see the dome when I looked up there. And I remember that. I remember visiting my mother at a hospital where she worked and everyone in the waiting area smoked, the nurses smoked, the doctors smoked and it was acceptable. That has changed. And we have moved to where the majority of states are moving, to smoke free places, not a perfect bill but it was designed to get the votes for passage but we used various conferences we attend with our colleagues from other states. Those states have enacted legislation similar to this, it becomes more and more popular and then people wonder why did we ever wait to do this.\footnote{Iowa Press, No. 3533, on http://www.iptv.org/iowapress/transcript_detail.cfm?ipShowNum=3533 (Apr. 18, 2008) (visited July 11, 2008).}

Rants concluded with the mendacious mantra that his party had been chanting for the previous ten weeks: “Why is it okay to smoke in a casino? ... That is the hypocritical nature of this bill in that we have decided to protect people, that you can’t smoke in a bar but we’re going to let you smoke in a casino. Nobody can explain that one to me.”\footnote{Iowa Press, No. 3533, on http://www.iptv.org/iowapress/transcript_detail.cfm?ipShowNum=3533 (Apr. 18, 2008) (visited July 11, 2008).}
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

was that there was nothing to explain because pro-smoking Republicans had fabricated the entire hypocrisy myth: (most) anti-smoking Democrats detested the casino exemption, acquiesced in it only out of expedience in order to garner enough votes to pass some bill, and had repeatedly announced that they intended to try repeal the exemption the following year. Asked about the accuracy of Republicans’ constant attacks on Democrats’ alleged hypocrisy, when they were fully aware that the militants were forced to acquiesce in the casino exemption as the price for passing any bill, at least one Republican, Assistant Minority Leader Doug Struyk, surprisingly acknowledged the cynicism underlying these baseless charges: “This is politics...and a lot of angles are played.” In contrast, the pro-tobacco Republican leadership had for years prevented the passage of any anti-smoking bill and voted against it at every turn in 2008, while hypocritically charging Democrats with hypocrisy.

The Senate Narrowly Approves the Conference Committee Compromise

“It’s like a tsunami,” Craig Walter, who represents the Iowa Restaurant Association, observed as the Senate took up the bill. “It hits you and you’re part of it.”

Was 26-24 as close as it looked or was it always clear you’d get 26? If not, what did you have to do to get those last votes?

It was extremely close. We just hoped that a couple of people would at the end of the debate see the value of the bill.

The Senate had its anti-smoking “purists,” but, according to Jack Hatch, after he had reminded his Democratic colleagues in caucus that “we can lose it,” the party coalesced. As the vote on the conference report and final passage demonstrated, not all caucus members held together, but those who defected were definitely not “purists.” Rep. Pam Jochum asked Rants “point blank” whether the rumor was true: “He said ‘no’ and that he’s had no conversations with any of their lobbyists or officials. If nothing else, he knows the rumor is out there.” Email from Pam Jochum to Marc Linder (Apr. 9, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

When consideration resumed, a succession of largely Republican opponents rose to lambaste the bill with a series of narrow-gauge arguments that evaded the realities of public health. For Zieman the issue was the personal rights of and fairness toward owners and smokers. He was willing to concede that the public has a right to clean air, “but we also have the right to walk away from it”—the key was taking “personal responsibility.” To launch his incoherent fantasy world of atomistic monads, Zieman proclaimed: “Okay, this state is a smoke-free state, but every business owner could declare that they’re not a smoke-free environment and post it...and then hoping that everybody learned enough in school to be able to read what the message is on the entrance of the building. That gives you the right to decide whether you want to go in or out of the building....” Zieman’s utopia may not have been smoke-free, but, by and large, it would merely have perpetuated the reality of secondhand

---

900 Telephone interview with Jack Hatch, Des Moines (May, 19, 2008). As the vote on the conference report and final passage demonstrated, not all caucus members held together, but those who defected were definitely not “purists.”

901 Rep. Pam Jochum asked Rants “point blank” whether the rumor was true: “He said ‘no’ and that he’s had no conversations with any of their lobbyists or officials. If nothing else, he knows the rumor is out there.” Email from Pam Jochum to Marc Linder (Apr. 9, 2008).

902 Senate Journal 2008, at 1:999 (Apr. 8); Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin, communications director, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff). Later Wieck stated that no suspense attended the outcome of the debate regardless of how close the vote. Telephone interview with Ron Wieck, Sioux City (Aug. 10, 2008).

903 Presumably Zieman meant that people have the right to walk away from unclean air and go somewhere to breathe clean air; however, it is possible that he meant that people have the right to expose themselves to secondhand smoke and risk illness and disease. Although Zieman’s oratorical style was even sloppier than that of most of his colleagues, in this particular case both interpretations probably reduce to the same point.

904 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

smoke exposure in Iowa under the 30-year reign of the feckless clean indoor air law.

Following Zieman’s comedic opening, a Democratic opponent of the bill managed to insert himself into the queue of Republican denouncers. As a Mormon—who even cited his religion’s Word of Wisdom and its prohibition of smoking and drinking—and a natural resources analyst with a master’s degree in natural resources economics who billed himself as an “advocate for Iowa’s environment,” Dennis Black appeared to be an improbable candidate for ally of the pro-tobacco forces. The 26-year legislative veteran himself noted that since he really did not like smoking, and since a casino, which, under the conference committee compromise, would be privileged to permit its customers to smoke while gambling, was located in his district, he might have been expected to support H.F. 2212, but in fact he was leaning towards voting against it. The attempted grounding of his incongruous decision in moral philosophy was hardly surprising in light of his opening remark that he thought that the day’s conversation would be “even more philosophical” and already reminded him of the “tone” and “quiet” of the chamber’s death penalty debate. Convinced that “[g]ood debate can change minds,” he made his contribution by explaining that the aforementioned Mormon injunction against smoking was “never an issue with me as it relates to other people because people do what they do because they have free agency.” Presumably Black did not bring the same radical laissez-faire approach to bear on his efforts to “clean up Iowa’s air and water”: it seems implausible that he would have acquiesced in free agency run wild vis-à-vis those wishing to defecate in a city’s water supply or burn toxic chemicals downtown. Why he was willing to make an exception for the generation at close indoor quarters of the toxic and carcinogenic garbage products of highly profitable tobacco commodities he did not explain. Instead, he posed several questions to Appel concerning the applicability of the ban to certain locations not expressly mentioned in H.F. 2212. In response to Appel’s answer that a public employee would be prohibited from smoking on a tractor while mowing a public right of way, Black insisted that such a result went beyond the legislature’s intent. However, in spite of the fact that Appel then responded that smoking would be permitted in an unwalled park shelter and on a boat on a lake in a public park,

905Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
907Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin). Later Black stated that this particular debate had not changed votes. Telephone interview with Dennis Black, Des Moines (July 30, 2008).
Black nevertheless made an Olympic-class jump to the conclusion that, because he believed so much in what the United States was about as it related to the wars that had been fought and the people who had lost their lives for the preservation of democracy, “[w]e are approaching totalitarianism without question” and passing the conference committee report “makes us all criminals just waiting to be arrested” (a conclusion made possible by Black’s ignorance of the Smokefree Air Act, which was not criminal and did not provide for arrest). To be sure, asked about his totalitarianism charge, he later conceded that it had been a “spontaneous knee-jerk statement” that in retrospect he should perhaps not have made, but that nevertheless correctly denoted the government’s taking away a right of the people. However, he recognized how deeply “inconsistent” his position was when he realized that his hypothetical support for a ban without the discriminatory exemptions to which he objected would have generated even greater “totalitarianism.”

After brief comments by Democrat Matt McCoy stressing the political fact of life that half a loaf was better than nothing, Republican Brad Zaun, a hardware store owner from the Des Moines suburb of Urbandale, resumed his party’s freedom-loving assault on protecting nonsmokers from assault by carcinogenic secondhand smoke. The only sense that Zaun was apparently able to discern in the whole initiative was that the legislature was “addicted to gambling revenue”; though he bridled at the casino exemption, he “might even have went [sic] along with” it if only the Democrats had accepted the 21-and-over bar exemption. In the event, he took the opportunity to vent his resentments at “big government [which] knows best.” In particular, his lamentations focused on the Senate’s passage just the day before of a bill that (non-mandatory) provided health care coverage for tens of thousands of children by raising the income limits of eligible parents. Deserted by even most of his own caucus, Zaun was one of only six senators to vote No. Laconically excoriating the beginning of the end of the world—“[w]e got socialized medicine yesterday”—he envisioned the next outrage as the bill’s ban on smoking in day care homes, which would prohibit 910 Telephone interview with Dennis Black, Des Moines (July 30, 2008).

---

912 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).

“grandma and grandpa” from smoking in their own home while watching their grandchildren. Having dismissed “government intrusion” in principle, Zaun handily identified an already existing substitute for it: “We have local control right now. ... All Iowans have two feet underneath their body and they get to figure out where to patronize what business.”

The next Republican focused his attack on enforcement. In response to farmer David Johnson’s question as to whether additional money had been appropriated to enable the Public Health Department to hire enforcement agents, Appel replied that the smoking ban would be self-enforcing in Iowa. As astonishing as was her mistaken belief that the bill she was managing criminalized smoking, it paled beside her touchingly platitudinous image of Iowa’s apparently uniquely law-abiding population: “People here in Iowa do not on purpose do criminal activity, especially like this to be smoking.”

With Larry McKibben, a lawyer from Marshalltown, a high point in the Republican onslaught was reached. A non-smoker who frequented smoking bars, he freely conceded that “it doesn’t bother me that I inhaled a little smoke and...I probably shortened my lifetime [sic] by a few hours every time I go” there, but “frankly I don’t care—something’s gonna get me at some point in time, probably \[\text{Verbatim Appel repeated this shibboleth shortly after passage. Telephone interview with Staci Appel, Ackworth (Apr. 12, 2008). It is unknown whether, after the law went into effect, Appel bothered to put herself in a position personally to experience hundreds of violations committed knowingly, intentionally, and belligerently by smokers whose scofflawdom was made possible by a lack of enforcement. Appel’s performance as floor manager was emblematic of the make-believe and substantively uninformative character of the debate as a whole. For example, when Senator Zaun read aloud a provision—which surely did not, as litigators love to oraculize, “speak for itself”—under which an employee whose “employer allows smoking does not waive or surrender any legal rights the employee may have against the employer or any other person” and asked Appel to explain what it meant, she preposterously replied: “I think it states exactly what it means as you read it.” That Zaun did not even bother to point out (and seemingly did not even notice) the nonsensical nature of Appel’s statement merely completed the charade. Later, when Sen. Johnson asked Appel whether the casino exemption violated the guarantee of equality in the state bill of rights, instead of explaining why the suggestion made a mockery of the legislature’s power to make rational distinctions, she proudly, triumphantly, and evasively repeated the vacuous saw: “We make the laws, we do not interpret the laws.” Later, when Republican Paul McKinley asked Appel whether expediency had driven the conference committee report, she self-contradictorily replied: “I don’t believe it’s expediency—we needed 26 votes in the Senate and we needed 51 votes in the House.” Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty).}

my weight....” Instead of reflecting on whether it was appropriate for such a fatalistic dare-devil to be making public health policy for Iowa, McKibben mocked the nanny-state Democrats’ alleged attitude: “To heck with the Neanderthals in the rest of the state who don’t know what’s good for them.” Implausibly claiming that “I would vote for a 100% ban,” he targeted the unfairness associated with the death penalty that the ban would allegedly impose on hundreds and hundreds of small businesses because the exemption would “herd” into casinos “smokers who have this disease we have no cure for....” In an inspired explosion of madcap fantasy, McKibben envisioned the need to fund an expansion of Gamblers Anonymous to deal with all the factory workers who, instead of having a beer and a cigarette when they got off the line, would now be pulling one-armed bandits “because we drove every single smoker in the state of Iowa to all 17 casinos.” And despite the inordinate amount of debate time in both houses allotted to the bill over a period of almost two months, McKibben implausibly insisted that “[t]hese are the outcomes you get when you rush crap through the legislature.” No wonder that Democratic assistant majority leader Jack Hatch confessed that he “got lost at about two minutes into” McKibben’s speech.

Masterfully combining incoherence and oral illiteracy, James Hahn, a Republican real estate and insurance salesman from Muscatine, regaled the chamber with an email that legislators had received allegedly embodying a study published in the British Medical Journal that found that “secondhand smoke is 2.6 [sic] safer than the occupational workplace.” While his colleagues were doubtless still scratching their heads over yet another piece of tobacco-industry financed and peddled obfuscation, Hahn went on to boast about his fund of oncological wisdom: “I know what lung cancer is all about, and I’m especially concerned that we don’t have some other way to blame lung cancer on anything except smoking, especially secondhand smoke.” Picking up the disinformational cigarette company playbook of yesteryear, he insisted that “we’re barking up the wrong tree” because mildew, mold, pet dander, and chemicals in fabrics and carpets in houses “all add up too.”

Democrat Dotzler, a non-smoker who boasted of having “a kind of a

---

916Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
917Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
919Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
920Dotzler stated on television that he did not smoke, but a blogger claimed that she
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

science background” while generously admitting that he did not consider himself a “true scientist,” spoke for more than 20 minutes during which he purported to support almost all of the conference committee report because he did not believe that anyone should have the right to inflict damage on others. Confusingly and confusedly, however, at the same time, he attacked the bill’s (alleged) underlying premise that exposure to carcinogens in smoke had to be driven down to zero: such a standard, he argued, would then have to be applied to other substances, such as herbicides and pesticides, but he did not think that legislators had the will-power to ban all substances that spread carcinogenic agents. His own plan aspired to the vastly more modest goal of protecting only children, while treating businesses fairly and people (i.e., adult smokers and nonsmokers) equally. Preventing smokers’ relegation to second-class citizenship entailed, for example, exposing nonsmokers to the secondhand smoke of statehouse workers and visitors rather than banning smoking on the grounds of public buildings as well as permitting restaurant customers to smoke in an outdoor seating area, which nonsmokers could presumably use only at their peril. Dotzler’s argument for equality boiled down to equating nonsmokers’ right to socialize in a smoke-free environment with smokers’ right to socialize while smoking a “legal product” in a smoke-filled environment regardless of the health consequences for nonsmokers and “not be forced to stay in their house because somebody else’s right trumps theirs.” In the end, his proposal was tantamount to voluntary apartheid as between smoking and nonsmoking customers with no consideration of the impact on employees: “I think we can put a sign on the door that says ‘No Smoking,’ and if you have an issue with smoking you don’t have to go into that establishment and that takes care of everybody’s problem that has an issue with secondhand smoke ‘cause they don’t have to go into that facility.” 922 Dotzler’s approach thus would essentially have retained Iowa’s existing toothless law. 923
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Toward the end of the debate, two Democratic supporters weighed in. Joe Bolkcom, returning from the men’s rest room where, however, he had “heard everything,” wanted to “back up to about 50,000 feet” and talk about tobacco as a unique cause of disease and mortality in Iowa. Bolkcom sought to make it clear to the chamber that secondhand smoke had to be treated as an occupational pollutant subject to the same principles for which “we have decided for a long time that we don’t let employers expose their employees to things that can kill them.” He attached special importance to the proposed law precisely because the Occupational Safety and Health Act/Administration had not been attending to problems in such “new workplaces” as restaurants, bars, and bowling alleys to which H.F. 2212 would apply. Moreover, contrary to opponents’ claims, in the real world of work, if a hundred thousand workers decided one day that they were tired of their smoke-exposed jobs and workplaces, they would not all be able to find alternate employment. In a final conciliatory gesture to senators such as Dotzler, Bolkcom—who acknowledged that there was “nothing too scientific about” the conference committee report, which was merely designed to secure the requisite number of votes in each house—conceded that there were problems with the imperfect bill (such as coverage of crane operators) on which he and they could work after passage. 924

In a speech that oddly melded the coolly dispassionate with the intensely personal, Majority Leader Gronstal repeatedly urged what was presumably his target audience of fence-sitters that H.F. 2212 was as good a bill as could be passed, that throwing away the coverage of 95,000 workers because 5,000

922 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
Dotzler had already offered this proposal—that people who were “bothered by that smoke...can choose not to go in there—a month earlier on a television news program.
cfm?id=1897.

923 Dotzler’s preference for toothlessness and his contempt for the smoking ban were nicely captured by his comment a month earlier with regard to reporting smokers who violated the law that “I don’t think that’s what our country should be about, that we’re iptv.org/iowapress/transcript_detail.cfm?ipShowNum=3527 (visited Apr. 18, 2008);

924 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
remained unprotected made no sense, and that expecting a better bill to emerge from a second conference committee triggered by voting down the current version contradicted all legislative experience. Then invoking his parents, who had both died of cancer, Gronstal expressed the wish that the legislature had passed the bill 50 years earlier because neither had been able to witness his political career. Lest his audience resent him for self-absorption, he quickly observed that the bill was not about him and his family and self-mockingly added that as conservative Republicans his parents might even have voted against him. Stressing the dimension that Republicans’ monomaniacal focus on bar owners’ alleged right to make public health decisions and smokers’ alleged right to smoke regardless of the public health consequences, Gronstal closed with an appeal to instantiate workers’ right to a safe workplace.925

Becoming the only senator to speak twice, Dotzler sought to deflect and deflate his fellow Democrats’ workplace orientation by implying that the bill was perfectionist, after all, because it imposed zero tolerance for tobacco smoke in contrast to permissible levels for chemicals under OSHA—a message that he immediately contradicted by asserting that OSHA “isn’t tough enough.” Seeking to refurbish his own credibility tarnished by his insistence on a 21-and-over proposal that would perpetuate infliction of secondhand smoke exposure on bar workers, Dotzler irrelevantly pleaded: “I fought my whole life for working men and women in this state.” Ironically, in this particular fight he appeared to be pleading for employees’ right to smoke in bars, regardless of the health consequences for customers, when he cited letters he had received from cigarette-addicted workers that taverns (and outdoor painting) were the only places they could work.926

The final Republican speaker, assistant minority leader and media consultant Jeff Angelo, chiding Democrats for regarding the 10,641 casino workers as an “acceptable level of casualties in our war on smoking,” pretended that his party was champing at the bit to cover casinos if only the report were voted down and a second conference committee appointed. At the same time, he inconsistently charged that it was unrealistic to expect that, given the importance of casino revenue for the state budget, casinos’ influence would wane, thus permitting the legislature to repeal the exemption in 2009.927

In an emotional appeal, floor manager Appel used her closing remarks to 925Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin). It is unclear why, with Iowa’s labor force at well over a million, Gronstal used the figure of 100,000.

926Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).

927Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
invoke her grandmother, a lifelong nonsmoker who had died of secondhand smoke exposure before the age of 60 and thus never lived to see her grow up or her children. In a voice audibly cracking, Appel challenged her colleagues to do anything better with their votes than to save the lives of workers and constituents.928

The 26 to 24 vote adopting the conference committee report was as close as possible.929 Only one Republican “maverick” (Lundby)930 joined Democrats in favor, while five Democrats (Black, Dotzler, Hancock, Bill Heckroth, and Keith Kreiman) crossed over to join the pro-tobacco Republicans. Heckroth, a financial consultant, who did vote for H.F. 2212 on February 27 when it lacked the casino exemption, voted against the report because of the casino exemption, even though he believed that the result would be a tie vote and probable death of the bill—he later stated that he had preferred its death to passage with the casino exemption intact,931 while Kreiman, a Lutheran church Sunday School teacher, in addition much preferred local control.932 On final passage of H.F. 2212, two more Republicans (Noble and Ward) joined Lundby, while the same five Democrats defected again, producing a 28 to 22 vote.933 Ward’s vote was dictated by her perception that most of her constituents were progressive, educated, did not want to be exposed to secondhand smoke, and accepted regulation.934 The memory of 928Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin). Appel did not identify the source(s) of the secondhand smoke that killed her grandmother.

---

929Senate Journal 2008, at 1:999-1000 (Apr. 8).
930Lundby, according to Dotzler, had even stopped attending Republican caucus meetings, referring to her party-mates as “‘assholes.’” Telephone interview with Bill Dotzler, Waterloo (Aug. 20, 2008).
931Telephone interview with Bill Heckroth, Waverly (Aug. 4, 2008).
932http://www.iowasenatedemocrats.org/heckroth/Default.htm; http://www.iowasenatedemocrats.org/kreiman/Default.htm. To be sure, Kreiman’s claim about unfairness was inconsistent with his vote against passage of H.F. 2212 on Feb. 27, when it included no casino exemption. He denied that his votes had in any way been influenced by the fact that his district bordered on Missouri or the possibility that some constituents might cross the border to frequent bars or restaurants. Telephone interview with Keith Kreiman, Bloomfield, IA (July 27, 2008).
933Senate Journal 2008, at 1:1000-1001 (Apr. 8). Lundby, Noble, and Ward had also voted for H.F. 2212 on Feb. 27. Former state patrol officer Larry Noble stated later that he had voted against the conference committee report because he wanted a bill with no exemptions; he then voted for the bill on final passage because it was the best bill he could get. Telephone interview with Larry Noble, Ankeny (Aug. 4, 2008).
934Telephone interview with Pat Ward, West Des Moines (Aug. 18, 2008). Ward stated that she had voted against the conference report because she was hoping for his heavy-smoking parents who had died of cancer, reinforced by the pent-up pressure of many years of failure to pass comprehensive anti-smoking legislation at the hands of the cigarette oligopoly, burst forth in an extraordinary display of personal emotion by Majority Leader Gronstal, who, on the verge of crying, prefaced his routine motion to adjourn with “For Mom and Dad.”
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

Some Supporters’ Reactions to Passage of H.F. 2212

You take a half a loaf of bread and you move on down the road. That’s what we do in politics.

Joyful tears appeared to be less prevalent among some anti-smoking lobbying groups. For example, the president of the Iowa Tobacco Prevention Alliance, Cathy Callaway, deemed the compromise, in spite of the casino exemption, “acceptable,” but vowed to continue pressing for greater rigor. With something less than grace and historical accuracy, a lobbyist for the American Cancer Society, one of the health advocacy groups applauding passage, declared that the “push to get a statewide smoking ban has lasted eight years”—thus suppressing the fact that during all but the last few weeks of those eight years it had been so preoccupied with local control that it had not been supporting Janet Petersen’s lonely push. Similarly distorted in the disappearing act that it performed on Petersen and her agency and the inflated stature it conferred on his co-leader was the account issued by House Speaker Murphy in his “Inside the Iowa Legislature” for that week: “When the legislative session began, I suspected that we might have the votes to give local communities the option to enact smoking restrictions tougher than state law. Sometime in February it became apparent that there was support for a broader measure to protect public health. Much of the credit for the ban goes to House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, an attorney who worked in the nation’s capitol [sic] fighting big tobacco continued negotiation.

936 Senate Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file provided by Rusty Martin).
companies on behalf of public health interests, prior to his election to the Legislature.\textsuperscript{940}

One organization that did not propagate these distortions was the Heart Association, whose advocacy director, Randy Yontz, was, at least after the fact, ecstatic about the new law and praised Petersen—who had formerly occupied his position—for having stuck to her guns. Asked what lesson could be learned from the passage of H.F. 2212, Yontz, with a measure of humility, replied: “Never predict what can be accomplished.” His probity was also capacious enough to enable him to acknowledge that although the local control coalition had misjudged history, the Democratic leadership, which had boldly made history, nevertheless gave the health organizations the credit for passing the bill.\textsuperscript{941}

The key to understanding the advent in Iowa of the nationwide wave of comprehensive and effective anti-smoking enactments after so many years of failure was, as backers and enemies agreed, the change and legislators’ perception of change in public opinion, which Representative Wise characterized as a “‘massive cultural shift’”:

“It would have been utterly impossible to do this in the past because of the culture of this place,” Wise said, gesturing to the House chamber. “It’s an example of the elected officials being behind the public. We wouldn’t have considered this even a half dozen years ago.”

Make that two years—before Democrats took control of the Capitol, according to Rep. Janet Petersen....\textsuperscript{942}

To be sure, the seismic repercussions were neither instantaneous nor all-encompassing. As soon as the day after the final passage of H.F. 2212, legislative Democrats were constrained to announce their plan to cut the Public Health Department’s anti-smoking advertising budget by $590,000 “in an attempt to calm...
Republican anger” over the same amount of money that IDPH had spent for ads promoting a ban on smoking in bars and restaurants that Republicans claimed constituted an improper use of state revenue by an administrative agency to put pressure on the legislature. The cuts, which would cause a reduction in assistance to Iowans trying to quit smoking and in the number of “Just Eliminate Lies” anti-tobacco ads, were part of a larger two million dollar budget bill cut in funding for smoking prevention programs.

The Smokefree Air Act’s Nationally Unique, Most Radical, and Least Noticed Provision of Unknown Provenience: The Total Indoor and Outdoor Smoking Ban on All Public and Private College and University Campuses

“You’ll never find an academic who’ll allow his Ph.D. students to do a study on secondhand smoke outside.... And I know a lot of lu-lu academics.”

Iowa City is full of doctors and athletes—of course this smoking ban is not going to have any effect on that city. OK? Ames the same way.

The Smokefree Air Act’s most startling prohibition, which was also discontinuous with regulation in Iowa or elsewhere, has not been discussed yet because, startlingly, the legislature itself never discussed it—in the House Commerce Committee, during floor debates in either chamber, or in the conference committee. Petersen’s House study bill opened up new vistas for limiting outdoor exposure to secondhand smoke by prohibiting smoking “[o]n schools, may have been based on a misunderstanding that an amendment, expressly extending coverage to school campuses or grounds, sorority and fraternity houses and grounds, and private, parochial, and church schools and grounds, had passed, when in fact it failed by a vote of 6 to 26. Senate Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Forty-Seventh Session...1931, at 731 (Mar. 17); “Income Tax Accorded a Hearing in Senate,” NSJ, Mar. 17, 1931 (7:1-2); “Smoking Bill Moves Up Minus Amendment,” NSJ, Mar. 18, 1931 (1:7); “Find Demand for No Smoking Bill So It Is Revived,” NSJ, Mar. 12, 1931 (17:1-2) (noting that no senator pointed out that the bill did not refer to grounds). Alternatively, some senators contended that “appurtenances” applied to the university and stadium. “Senate Approves No-Smoking Bill by 24 to 7 Vote,” NSJ, Mar. 21, 1931 (15:1). Before final passage the Senate defeated an amendment confining its applicability to people connected with those institutions (though no such amendment appeared in Senate Journal). “Senate Votes Ban on College Smoking,” OW-H, Mar. 18, 1931 (1:7). Attacks on smoking, especially at the state university, “kept the senate in an uproar....” “Smoker Measure Back on Floor,” BDS, Mar. 17, 1931 (9:7). Unlike SAA, it was intended not to limit secondhand smoke exposure, but to deter young people from smoking. At a public hearing held by the Senate Education Committee, the head of the Lancaster County Federated Women’s Clubs testified that “at the University of Nebraska, ridicule and scoffing made it impossible for a boy to attend without smoking” or “for a girl to go out with a group of students and not smoke cigarettes.” “Women Ask Ban, School Smoking, but Bill Tabled,” OW-H, Mar. 12, 1931 (25:5). The introducer, Republican Senator C. Johnson, claimed that advocates of his bill numbered more than 50,000 voters. Pointing out that the University of Nebraska chancellor had explained to the legislators that no regulation prevented smoking, Democrat Henry Pedersen urged passage on the grounds that university authorities should be given the opportunity to “‘combat the smoking evil on the campus.’” The lengthy debate focused on the controversy over student control and efforts to legislate morals and habits and taxpayers’ right to say what was done at the university. “Would Prohibit Campus Smoking,” BDS, Mar. 11, 1931 (1:5); “Find Demand for No Smoking Bill So It Is Revived,” NSJ, Mar. 12, 1931 (17:1). One of the chief objections to the bill was its enforcement at the university football stadium, although senators themselves were certain that the stadium was covered. “Ban Is Proposed in Nebraska on Smoking at Grid,” REG, Mar. 18, 1931 (1:4); “Find Demand for No Smoking Bill So It Is Revived,” NSJ, Mar. 12, 1931 (17:1-2). For House discussion, see “Bans Smokes and Gin at Schools,” BDS, Apr. 16, 1931 (1:3). The House indefinitely postponed the bill after the Miscellaneous Subjects Committee had recommended putting it on general file with amendment. House Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Forty-Seventh Session...1931, at 1193 (Apr. 17), 1682 (Index); Senate Journal of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: Forty-Seventh Session...1931, at 1443 (May 2).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

school grounds, including parking lots, athletic fields, playgrounds, tennis courts, and any other outdoor area under the control of a public or private educational facility, including any vehicle located on such school grounds, and including the perimeter area of fifty feet beyond such school grounds to which the public is invited or in which the public is permitted.”

This provision was enacted intact except for the 50-foot perimeter, which the legislature eliminated together with several other such outdoor no-smoking zones.

That such a radical spatial expansion of the law’s prohibitory scope had slipped through without any public discussion or scrutiny at all was especially intriguing in the light of the results of opinion surveys commissioned by IDPH. They revealed that the proportion of Iowa adults who said that smoking should not be allowed in outdoor public places had reached 40 percent in 2002, fallen to 31 percent in 2004, and then risen somewhat to 35 percent in 2006 and 36 percent in 2008. (The corresponding figures for current smokers were 16, 5, 11, and 9 percent, respectively.) The finding that only little more than one third of respondents supported outdoor bans—compared, for example, to the two thirds who favored not allowing smoking in indoor dining areas of restaurants—was not in itself so interesting as the fact that, although by 2008 a roughly equivalent 39 percent of adults (up from 27 percent in 2004 and 32 percent in 2006) said that smoking should not be allowed in bars and cocktail lounges, legislative discussion of that locational ban had been virtually omnipresent. (To be sure, since the survey question did not ask specifically about outdoor college and university campuses, it is not known whether more or fewer adults would have expressed support for banning smoking there than in other, unspecified, outdoor public places.)

Curiously, shortly after the bill was passed neither Petersen, nor Olson,

---

948 Iowa Code § 142D.3(2)(d).
949 Gene Lutz et al., Iowa 2009 Tobacco Control Progress Report fig. 17 at 31 (Jan. 2010).
950 Gene Lutz et al., Iowa 2009 Tobacco Control Progress Report fig. 14 at 28 (Jan. 2010). The corresponding figure for current smokers in 2008 was 30 percent.
951 Gene Lutz et al., Iowa 2009 Tobacco Control Progress Report fig. 15 at 29 (Jan. 2010). The corresponding figure for current smokers was 8 percent.
952 Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (Apr. 12, 2008). Indeed, when asked more specifically about the provision, Petersen confused it with Republicans’ amendment to ban smoking on the grounds of public buildings. After realizing her error, she guessed that it was taken from “the model legislation I received,” but the bill drafter stated that it had not been. Email between Janet Petersen and Marc Linder Apr. 14, 2008.
953 Olson, who also incorrectly recalled that it had been taken from other states’ laws,
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

nor the Legislative Services Agency bill drafter was able to reconstruct the provenience of this remarkable provision, which prohibited smoking everywhere, indoors and outdoors, on all private and public college and university campuses and appears not to have been adopted from any other state’s statute or regulation. Finally, the Board of Regents’ lobbyist also did not know how or why the total campus smoking ban came to be included in H.S.B. 537, but, he reported, the Regents had been aware of its presence and consequences from the beginning and never asked him to lobby against it; in particular, they understood and did not object that as a state law it would be enforceable by monetary penalties.

Remarkably, a number of legislators who were deeply engaged in the debate over the bill had not even understood that H.F. 2212 contained such a ban. Most prominently, Michael Connolly, the Senate’s most passionate and long-standing anti-smoking militant, who, in addition, chaired the committee that recommended passage, was, even two weeks after the governor had signed it, unaware that it banned smoking on college campuses. Senator Joe Bolkcom, another antitobacco stalwart, knew that the ban covered public colleges and universities, but did not think that their private counterparts were included. And more than a month after the law had gone into effect, Senator Hartsuch, who had exhibited such passion about the bill during debate, was unaware that it included such a provision.

Some legislators, especially Republicans who opposed the bill, did know about the outdoor campus ban, but never raised the issue on the floor.
Democratic Senator Bill Dotzler later stated that tons of email had been received from campuses against the provision and that he had raised the issue of the total ban on smoking on college and university campuses, in particular at the University of Iowa football stadium, in the Democratic caucus, but had been told that the ban would not be enforced. Republican Whip Kraig Paulsen from Cedar Rapids, who was acutely aware of the provision as the bill was going through the legislature, nevertheless, even seven weeks after the law had gone into effect, incorrectly believed that it did not apply to private colleges or to dormitory rooms at public colleges. Paulsen recalled a meeting before the bill’s passage at which University of Iowa President Sally Mason told Minority Leader Rants that the university was going to go smoke-free anyway. Paulsen also reported that Mason had been “visibly agitated” when told that the university’s athletic department had mollified a big donor from Cedar Rapids who had complained, in disbelief, that he would no longer be able to smoke in his recreational vehicle in the tail-gating area next to the football stadium by assuring him: “We’re not gonna enforce it.” Right-wing Republican Representative Linda Upmeyer not only was aware of the provision while the bill, which she opposed, was being debated, but distinctly recalled one informal discussion among her colleagues in which one jocularly suggested that Iowa State University students might unlawfully smoke en masse at the football game at the University of Iowa football stadium. Republican Representative David Heaton had to be corrected at an Administrative Rules Review Committee meeting when he stated that, as he read the rule, smoking was prohibited immediately adjacent to the football stadium on the University of Iowa campus unless those in custody/control permitted it. (The rules drafter explained to him that the scope of the smoking ban on school grounds was broader than that on the grounds of public buildings.) That the University of Iowa administration itself did not immediately grasp the fundamental difference between a proposed university rule that the university had publicly announced would not be enforced and a state law backed up by a $50 penalty became clear when the co-chair of the group charged with putting the ban into place stated that the main steps in the implementation grounds of educational facilities would apply to colleges and universities. Telephone interview with Chuck Soderberg, Le Mars (Mar. 16, 2008). Telephone interview with Bill Dotzler, Waterloo (Aug. 20, 2008). Telephone interview with Kraig Paulsen, driving on I-80 from Cedar Rapids to Des Moines (Aug. 19, 2008). Telephone interview with Linda Upmeyer, Garner (Aug. 18, 2008). Administrative Rules Review Committee meeting (June 11, 2008) (audio tape provided by ARRC Legal Counsel Joseph Royce).
process would remain the same. The misunderstanding and ignorance surrounding the campus bans may have reached their high points at Iowa’s richest and most prestigious private college, Grinnell, whose president, Russell Osgood, a former law professor no less, incorrectly asserted after the House and Senate had passed H.F. 2212 in February that: ‘‘If the state makes something applicable in public places, we wouldn’t have to follow it.... This is the home for about 900 students; they aren’t public buildings.’ Osgood said that since Grinnell is a private college, any such state law would only affect the college if it explicitly gave money to the college to implement any similar regulation. The misunderstanding and ignorance surrounding the campus bans may have reached their high points at Iowa’s richest and most prestigious private college, Grinnell, whose president, Russell Osgood, a former law professor no less, incorrectly asserted after the House and Senate had passed H.F. 2212 in February that: ‘‘If the state makes something applicable in public places, we wouldn’t have to follow it.... This is the home for about 900 students; they aren’t public buildings.’ Osgood said that since Grinnell is a private college, any such state law would only affect the college if it explicitly gave money to the college to implement any similar regulation. Despite the lack of debate on the outdoor campus ban—or, perhaps, precisely because many legislators had been unaware of what they had approved—already two weeks after the governor had signed the bill into law, the press was mistakenly lumping college campuses together with parks as places in which the new law’s applicability was unclear. The press was hardly alone. No less an authority than House floor manager Olson erroneously told a radio news program that, like local governments, universities and community colleges were empowered to create more stringent rules on their campuses. In fact, however, whereas H.F. 2212 expressly prohibited smoking everywhere indoors and in the outdoor areas of schools and educational facilities, leaving those institutions nowhere else to ban smoking, the new law did not expressly ban smoking in all outdoor areas owned by municipalities. Consequently, although Olson correctly observed that local governments had always had the authority to prohibit smoking, for example, in building-less parks that they owned—a ban that the law’s prohibition of smoking on the “grounds of any public buildings” did not impose—his aforementioned remark about institutions of higher education was wrong, either because the legislature, by virtue of imposing a total ban on campuses, afforded them no opportunity to do more or because he, too, was mistakenly lumping them together with “grounds of any public buildings.”

---

967 Iowa Public Radio News (May 12, 2008) (audio file made available by the interviewer, Jeanene Beck). A few weeks later, when IDPH issued its draft rules, which empowered those in control of exempt outdoor areas of public buildings to declare them nonsmoking, Senate Minority Leader Wieck protested that “the intent of the bill was not to leave it up to local governments.”’’ IDPH, Rule 641—153.2 (May 29, 2008); Jason Both a public radio interviewer and the president of the University of Iowa subscribed to Olson’s error—if they did not pick it up from him. Immediately after relating Olson’s view, the interviewer stated that: “In fact, the University of Iowa is moving ahead with a campuswide smoking ban that even included the parking lot of Kinnick Stadium.” President Sally Mason then added that “even if the state’s definition of public grounds would allow smoking on some parts of the campus,” it was unlikely that she would change the school’s smoking policy.\(^{968}\) Like Olson, Mason and the interviewer manifestly did not understand that a separate provision in H.F. 2212 governing schools and educational facilities covered the University of Iowa, whose campus could not have become totally smoking-free based solely on the mandate imposed by the “grounds of any public buildings” provision.\(^{969}\) The university’s own policy would have been implemented on July 1, 2009 and would also have prohibited smoking everywhere on campus indoors and outdoors.\(^{970}\) The difference was that the \(^{968}\) Iowa Public Radio News (May 12, 2008) (audio file made available by the interviewer, Jeanene Beck). Mason did allow herself some wiggle room, for example, with regard to the university golf course: “Let’s see what the legal experts say and whether we have any leeway and whether we have enough demand or outcry that we want to make any exceptions at all. Right now I’m not thinking about any exceptions and that’s not the direction we’re heading.”

\(^{969}\) Even when Mason apparently did understand that the university was governed by a special statutory provision, her understanding of the weight of public attitudes toward smoking was bizarre. Interviewed on public television on May 9, she was asked by a reporter, who was misinformed, whether the university would exercise the discretion that the law conferred on it to permit smoking in and around its football stadium and at tailgating. Although she correctly replied that she did not think that the university had such discretion, she added in a throwaway line: “I think our fans would be happy” (if the university did permit such smoking). Iowa Press, Iowa Public Television, #3536 (May 9, 2008). It is difficult to imagine that a biologist actually believed that (all) the “fans,” the vast majority of whom, if they were even remotely similar to Iowans in general, did not smoke, would have been “happy” to continue to be exposed to carcinogenic smoke. When apprised of the president’s statement, her senior associate stated: “I don’t think she meant that, and I’m sorry she said it. More like ‘some fans’ would be happy, but some would not—I agree with you.” Email from Jonathan Carlson to Marc Linder (May 9, 2008).

\(^{970}\) Smoking Policy Review Committee, “Final Recommendations” (University of Iowa, Nov. 16, 2006); email from President Sally Mason to The UI Community (Subject: Smoke-free Campus) (Feb. 4, 2008).
The Smokefree Air Act of 2008

The university’s policy was merely “aspirational” and, unlike the state law, did not impose monetary penalties on violating smokers or—much more importantly—on the university itself for failing to enforce its own policy.\footnote{971}{Erin Jordan and Mason Kerns, “U of I Set to Ban Smoking on Campus by July 2009,” \textit{DMR}, Feb. 5, 2008 (1A:1). The University of Iowa spokesperson stated that “[t]he intent is not to say to our police department, “Go get ’em”... The emphasis is on civility and respect. We hope people will honor that.” \textit{Id.} The spokesperson confirmed that he had been quoted accurately. Email from Steve Parrott to Marc Linder (Feb. 6, 2008).}
Administrative Rules for, Bar Owners’ Unsuccessful Constitutional Challenge to, Enforcement of, and Abortive Efforts to Amend the Smokefree Air Act

In places like New York City or California where bans have been in place for years, new customers flowed into the smoke-free bars. But in the sparsely populated and aging small towns of much of rural Iowa, there isn’t a non-smoking effete professional demographic around to slide in and replace the hardened blue collar smokers.¹

Like but even more so than most laws, Iowa’s Smokefree Air Act did not begin its life the moment a majority of both houses of the legislature solemnly agreed on its text. Not only did an administrative agency have to draft rules to define crucial terms in order to administer and enforce it, but the enforcement agents and the public had to be educated as to where the law prohibited smoking, what rights nonsmokers now had to smokefree air, who was responsible for enforcement, and what the consequences of noncompliance were. In light of the possibility that a relatively small but belligerent proportion of the affected population composed of smoking tobacco addicts might engage in individual or organized violation of the public smoking ban, the question of the optimum enforcement approach, especially at the outset, assumed great importance. In the event, this issue was raised most explosively in discrete areas of the state by bar owners who concertedly and publicly violated the new law in a (misguided and unsuccessful) effort to provoke its judicial invalidation.

The Governor Approves—But Some Others Don’t

“Gov. Culver ain’t nothing but a communist.... He...raised (the tax) $1 a pack on cigarettes, then allowed cigarettes to be banned in the bars.”²

“Pretty soon, they’ll be telling us that we can’t (smoke) in our own home, or in our yard, or with our children. We might as well move to Germany or China....”³

²“Smokers Bemoan Ban, Light Up Last Time in Bars,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), July 1, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank) (quoting a bar customer in Cedar Rapids).

No sooner had the Senate passed the bill than the governor’s spokesperson announced that he looked forward to signing the bill. In the meantime, however, the debate—merging at times into post-mortems—continued unabated, the local press finding no shortage of point/counterpoint. Republican Gary Worthan from Storm Lake, who had voted against the bill, allowed as he had “no problem with a smoking ban in public places...where people are forced to go to do business, like a courthouse.” But, revealing that he had learned nothing about public health from 10 weeks of intense discussion, he insisted that “‘when it comes to restaurants, bars and those kind of things, we’re just stepping on people’s toes here....’” One of his bar owner-constituents revealed just how brittle that view was by conceding that “‘inhaling secondhand smoke can kill a person,’” while lamenting that “‘from a business standpoint I think it will damper [sic] the crowd.’” In Iowa City one owner of numerous restaurants and bars that had purportedly been nonsmoking for 10 years called the bill’s passage “‘the greatest news that could possibly come,’” adding, in disbelief, that Iowa as a state had held on to its public smoking regime for as long as it had. (To be sure, this pseudo-anti-smoking enthusiast did not share with the press the fact that he had bought a cigarette sales permit for his organic food store cum bakery, soup and salad bar.) Another optimistic bar owner confided that “‘smoking costs a lot of (quotating Diana Schumacher, Clinton bar owner).

[4]In fact, Mondanaro had played a reactionary role in opposing passage of a no-smoking ordinance in Iowa City in 2001-2002; see above ch. 33.

[5]Shortly after he had opened this store he disclosed to a stranger that he had bought a cigarette permit and cigarettes, but had not yet decided whether to sell them. When asked why he would even consider selling in, of all places, an organic food store commodities that kill half their long-term consumers, he pleaded that he hated cigarettes, but that he did not want to give up even one sale to supermarkets or convenience stores. Interview of Jim Mondanaro at Bread Garden & Market, Iowa City (Mar. 1, 2008, 5:00-5:15 p.m.). Later, after being told that if he sold cigarettes his store would face a picket and boycott, and that his state representative, Mary Mascher, wanted to speak to him, he ultimately relented and promised not to sell cigarettes. He did not renew the permit when it expired a few months later. Information from Iowa City City Clerk’s office (Sept. 3, 2008).

Shawn Gude, “Culver Signs Smoke Ban,” DI, Apr. 16, 2008 (1A:1-4, at 3A:3) (quoting Marty Christensen, co-owner of The Mill). On the previous owner’s tale to the city council in 2001 that live music was not possible without smoking, see above ch. 33.

Telephone interview with Bill Dotzler, Waterloo (Aug. 20, 2008).
necessary to retain a lawyer to seek an injunction against the law.\textsuperscript{15}

Anti-smoking advocates packed into the statehouse rotunda on April 15 to cheer Governor Chester Culver wildly before, while, and after he signed H.F. 2212 into law. On what all present agreed with him was “a monumental day,” no one audibly took umbrage at his puzzling concession—given all the enormous health benefits that he listed as resulting from the new law—that “I understand there are compelling arguments against this bill.” Before the governor took the podium, Dan Ramsey, the programs director and lobbyist for the American Lung Association of Iowa, had spoken for many in affirming that the day and the law had been “a long time coming.” The governor sounded the same theme when, dating efforts in Iowa back to an anti-public smoking bill that legislator Jim Wells (who was briefly feted at the ceremony) had filed in 1975, he noted that “33 years is a long time to wait.” It was very unlikely that the governor was impolitically alluding to the health organizations’ initial opposition to the statewide bill enactment of which they were now passionately applauding when he called the anti-smoking law “a tough, tough issue, very difficult.” The governor may have thanked Senator Lundby and Representative Tomenga and “many other Republicans” for their bipartisan efforts,\textsuperscript{16} but Senate Minority Leader Ron Wieck was having none of the signing ceremony’s good cheer as he continued to press his party’s jeremiad against creeping nannyism: “‘This is a bad, bad, bad day for Iowa as far as I’m concerned.’”\textsuperscript{17}

Among those who shared Wieck’s assessment some hoped that it would not even be necessary to wait until next year: “Even before Culver signed the smoking ban and passed out souvenir pens, there was grumbling from critics who vowed to seek changes in the law in the final days before the session adjourns.” Senate Democrat Bill Dotzler, claiming that “many people didn’t realize the extent of the smoking ban,” still held out hope for “‘some clarification.’” To be sure, his desire appeared to founder immediately on the implacable opposition of his majority leader, Gronstal, who insisted that “all sides” had understood the law. In particular, after jocularly suggesting that anyone in Des Moines who wanted to smoke under a roof be invited to do so on the balcony behind the Senate chamber, Gronstal made it absolutely clear that he would stop the smoking, even though that move, taken together with the new ban on smoking on the grounds of public buildings, meant that anyone using the Statehouse would have to go to a sidewalk to smoke.

Gronstal’s assurance to the contrary notwithstanding, the scope of the statutorily covered “public places” was already being contested. Some legislators asserted that their own handiwork had left it an open question whether, for example, smoking would be prohibited in parks, on boats on park lakes, and on the entire grounds of university campuses. Dotzler worried that under “the grounds of public buildings” definition no one would be permitted to smoke in “a park with any kind of building on it.” In particular, he divined that the law would prevent those reserving public park campsites or cabins from smoking around a campfire, even though he did not believe that it was legislature’s intent to do so. Astonishingly, Senate floor manager Staci Appel, who, as noted above, when asked by a colleague to explain the meaning of a provision, unhelpfully replied that the legislature made but did not interpret the law, agreed with Dotzler that “clarification may be needed.”

Some Bar Owners Feel Freedom Move Under Their Feet and the Iowa Constitution Tumbling Down

“You’re taking away the rights of the bar owners. It’s communism.”

Senate Minority Leader Paul McKinley...said he’s a reformed smoker who’s opposed to smoking, but what most bothered him is how the new law has affected businesses, including his wife’s.

---

21 See above ch. 27.
“We have absolutely trampled over individuals’ freedom to do as they wish with their private property.... We have told them, you cannot have anybody in your place of business (smoking).”

During the House debate a week earlier, floor manager Tyler Olson had responded with a mock surprise “Really?” when Republican Mike May observed that “folks out there are already thinking about how we can get around this.” By the time of the governor’s signing ceremony the circumvention charade was already in full swing. Dozens of bar and restaurant owners, according to the Register, were “looking for loopholes, even though some state officials say the attempts are futile.” Two of the subterfuges they favored were turning their businesses into private clubs and creating a “retail smoking [sic; should be tobacco] store in the middle of their bar.” One bar owner in a small town in southern Iowa—photographed by the newspaper assiduously ministering to her own nicotine addiction—who purported to be “researching” the former ploy, had apparently led an almost hermetically sheltered ethico-moral life from whose perspective coverage of bars and exemption of casinos was “the stupidest, most unfair thing I’ve ever seen.” Her research, according to Lynn Walding, the administrator of the Alcoholic Beverages Division, would do her precious little good since “Iowa’s legislation is written so tightly that loopholes will be extremely difficult to find.” In this regard he instanced: private clubs, which qualified for an exemption only if they had no employees and had been granted federal tax exemption status; and retail tobacco stores, which qualified for an exemption only if the smoke did not infiltrate into smoking-prohibited areas. Walding, like some other state officials, described this type of hyperactive resentment as “just the knee-jerk reaction to change,” which would fade away as smokers once again accommodated what they were in various phases of understanding was the inevitability of sequentially more stringent societal restrictions of their self- and other-destructive addiction.

---

24Lynn Campbell, “Legislative Leaders Say Gas Tax Hike Unlikely in ‘09 Session,” IowaPolitics.com, Dec. 9, 2008, on http://www.iowapolitics.com/index.iml?Article=143149. When asked about a county attorney who refused to enforce the Smokefree Air Act until it applied to all businesses, McKinley opined: “I think each one of those officeholders has to judge whether they’re doing the right thing. I would not pass judgment on them one way or the other.” In contrast, House Minority Leader Kraig Paulsen stated: “The law’s the law and a county attorney, especially, has taken an oath to uphold the law....” Jennifer Jacobs, “Dissent Dilutes Iowa’s Smoking Ban,” DMR, Jan. 7, 2009 (A1) (NewsBank).

25Iowa House Debate on H.F. 2212 (Apr. 8, 2008) (audio file furnished by Dean Fiihr, Communications Director, House Speaker Pat Murphy).

In the meantime, in the process of casting about for a lawyer, bar owner Brian Froehlich of the IBOC appeared to have been tutored by the Philip Morris playbook: “It’s got nothing to do with smoking anymore... This is a rights issue.”27 At the same time, Jonathan Van Roekel, a former bar owner who by this time co-owned Mr. G’s Frozen Pizza in Clinton28 and was president of COBRA, swore that he and his members were bitter-enders who would not let their rights be violated: he was gearing up to collect enough money “to fight the new law all the way to the Supreme Court.” Polly Bukta, the Democratic House member from Clinton, cautioned that bar owners would eventually see that they had overestimated the impact of the ban, which would work out in Iowa “because it has in other states.”29 Van Roekel, however, was having none of it. He was convinced that the Iowa legislature’s agenda was obviously “anti-small business, anti-grassroots, anti-bars, and anti-restaurants and that’s kind of been shown.” Because they were savers, investors, risk-takers, entrepreneurs, employers, and tax payers, “by God it should be our right to make our choice, make [sic] choice that we feel would best benefit our businesses.” He took special umbrage at the legislature’s usurping their entrepreneurial role by thinking it was so market-savvy that it could predict that the elimination of smoking would cause sales to go up: “because I tell you what, if I thought that eliminating smoking...would increase my profit by one percent, I would have done it 20 years ago.”30 Van Roekel did not reveal whether he would have eliminated smoking 20 years earlier if he had thought that the cleaner air would have increased his employees’ health by one or even 100 percent.31 (In fact, Van Roekel, donning his other hat as 31 Likewise, Norma Duncan, the wife of another high-profile bar-owning scofflaw, Larry Duncan, in asserting that the “government has got to realize they cannot save us from ourselves,” overlooked the health of the nonsmokers among their bar’s 42 employees and numerous customers. Christinia Crippes, “Otis Campbell’s Owner Keeps Fighting,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Jan. 9, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank). On the number of employees, see Affidavit of Larry A. Duncan at 3-4, Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill, Civ. Action Case No. 3:08-CV-138 (S.D. Iowa, Oct. 28, 2008).

---

oncologist, alleged that no studies had shown that workplace exposure to secondhand smoke increased the incidence of cancer.\(^32\) In contrast, Froehlich—who was both an amateur scientific pollster who knew that IDPH’s data showing that 80 percent of Iowans were opposed to smoking were wrong\(^33\) and self-interestedly ignorant of the empirical refutation and statutory abolition more than a century earlier of the specious Adam Smithian employer claims and judicial rulings that workers freely assumed the risks of hazardous employments\(^34\)—made it clear that that whole line of questioning was made moot by the workings of the free labor market: “[E]mployees who face second-hand smoke know the environment they face when they apply for a job at a bar.”\(^35\) To be sure, this perspective raised the question, in light of Froehlich’s assertion at the Administrative Rules Review Committee meeting in June that H.F. 2212 was not about the general public, but only about employees’ health,\(^36\) as to whether the Smokefree Air Act was supposed to protect anyone at all.

By the last week in April, when COBRA and IBOC met in Clinton to merge their efforts to overturn the law,\(^37\) the chairwoman of the Republican county committee showed up to urge Iowans to vote out of office those who had voted for H.F. 2212.\(^38\) Van Roekel had visions of collecting enough money to hire “the ‘best constitutional attorney’” in Iowa, while Froehlich imagined that the legislature’s vote had woken a “sleeping giant,” though that colossus’s heroically noble goal was merely “‘to make this state a better place to own a bar.’”\(^39\) By early June, Froehlich and his fellow “advocates of public smoking” were insisting that smoking was “‘just a catalyst,’” which had finally galvanized rights-starved Iowans into grasping that “‘every day and every session they take something else away from us.’”

Having latched onto and begun cultivating a group of resentful and disaffected small business owners on whose behalf they allegedly had tried to kill the Smokefree Air Act, Republicans would not let go. For example, at a meeting in Burlington, Representative Thomas Sands, who boasted that he had voted against H.F. 2212 every time it came up, (incorrectly) warned them that the Administrative Rules Review Committee might “tweak[ ]” vague provisions (of the as yet unreleased regulations) stricter; if it did not, he was not sure that the law was enforcible. The committee has no power to amend a statute, but it also has no power to amend administrative rules, though it is authorized (by a two-thirds vote) to delay a rule’s effective date until the adjournment of the next general assembly. Iowa Code § 17.8(9) (2008).

By the end of May, Van Roekel, abjuring his status as a one-issue candidate, declaring himself the spokesman for small business, and promising to try to put an end to “the increasing amount of legislation ‘that has been shoved down our throats,’” became the Republican nominee to unseat Clinton House Democrat Polly Bukta, who had supported the ban bill. The Des Moines Register quickly uncovered his criminal past: in 1996 he was “convicted of a felony for driving while intoxicated”—his third such offense—and sentenced to five years in prison, but served his time in a halfway house. Van Roekel may have believed that it did not reflect on his ability to be a legislator, but House Majority Leader McCarthy had a partisan field day with the news: “‘I know the Republican Party has been...looking for a different breed of legislative candidate for this fall’s election, but I didn’t think they’d resort to recruiting convicted felons.’” Even Minority Leader Rants felt blindsided, not having been aware of the convictions before Van Roekel’s nomination and still unsure as to how voters clintonherald.com (July 16, 2008) (quoting Iowa City bar owner Marty Maynes).

41 Christina Crippes, “Bar Owners Joining Forces,” Hawk-Eye (Burlington), Apr. 30, 2008, on http://www.thehawkeye.com (visited July 16, 2008). The news account was itself confused, stating that Sands had said that ARRC might make the legislation itself stricter. The committee has no power to amend a statute, but it also has no power to amend administrative rules, though it is authorized (by a two-thirds vote) to delay a rule’s effective date until the adjournment of the next general assembly. Iowa Code § 17.8(9) (2008).

would react to the news.\textsuperscript{43} (It is unclear whether a high positive correlation obtains between bar ownership and drunken driving, but Van Roekel’s fellow freedom fighter, Froehlich, in 2007 pleaded guilty to OWI, was fined $1,250, and sentenced to 92 days’ jail, 90 of which were suspended, and 18 months’ probation from which he was not discharged until October 2008.)\textsuperscript{44}

Saying that she understood why some bar and restaurant owners were upset, a contrite Bukta was running scared: “If I did hurt any business, I’m terribly sorry.” Explaning that she had actually preferred casino coverage, but that the legislative process created a dilemma for her that she believed her constituents would appreciate, Bukta—at least recognizing that no matter what the pro-smoking Republicans claimed, they were in fact one-issue candidates—did not think that the Smokefree Air Act “would be the issue in the campaign. ... If people take a look at my whole voting record, I don’t think they would vote just for or against me on this one issue.”\textsuperscript{45} Democrat Cindy Winckler of Davenport, opposed by Joe Sturgis,\textsuperscript{46} owner of the Rusty Nail, was not apologetic: in the end she voted for what by her lights did “the most good for the most people. ‘It was in no way an effort to trample on people’s right to smoke. It’s about breathing clean air.’” Republican Sturgis, another barkeep who in his spare time had mastered oncology, was not at all reluctant to share the fruits of his learning with untutored Iowans: “I don’t think there is any scientific proof that I’ve read to prove that secondhand smoke causes cancer.... Basically, it’s a virus. Some people get it and some people don’t.”\textsuperscript{47} Whether the electorate was passing judgment on the Smokefree Air Act or not, in November, Bukta trounced Van Roekel 8,351 to 4,834 (36.7 percent), while Winckler crushed Sturgis 7,645 to 3,370 (30.6 percent).\textsuperscript{48} (Bar-owning Republicans were not the only ones unsuccessfully to campaign against incumbent Democrats on the issue of the smoking ban. Senator Thomas Courtney, who favored a “complete and total”

\textsuperscript{43}Jason Clayworth, “Candidate for House Has Felony Conviction,” \textit{DMR}, May 31, 2008 (B1) (ProQuest). For other problems that Van Roekel had with the legal system, see “What Court Documents Show,” \textit{DMR}, Oct. 5, 2008 (A10) (ProQuest).

\textsuperscript{44}http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/TIndexFrm (Case 07701 OWCR036739 (Muscatine County) (visited July 17, 2009). The fine was reduced to $625 for a temporary restricted license.

\textsuperscript{46}For biographical information, see http://www.demwebs.com/smoke/leaders.html (visited July 7, 2009).

\textsuperscript{48}http://www.sos.state.ia.us/elections/results/2008GeneralResults.html ban, received about 60 percent of the vote against a Republican challenger who supported the law’s repeal.\(^{49}\)

Unable to contain their glee over Republicans’ desperation-driven misjudgment, the Democratic legislative leaders encouraged the Republican party to make their day. Senate Majority Leader Gronstal could only “‘hope that Republicans run against us, because they think the 80 percent of the population that doesn’t smoke would buy into their arguments that smokers deserve public smoking.’” House Majority Leader McCarthy went a step further, predicting that by election time even voters upset by the ban would have adjusted to it: “‘I want to see a candidate come up in October with a mailer and say, “Vote for me, I’ll get smoking back.” They’d be laughed out of town.’”\(^{50}\)

Another group of disgruntled bar (and perhaps other business) owners stylizing themselves a bulwark of all Iowans’ constitutional rights was Iowans for Equal Rights—organized by one Randy Stanford, who (or whose wife) owned a tavern in Des Moines—which was established to collect money to hire a lawyer to contest the new law’s validity. Like other bar owners in this movement, he swore allegiance to a childish image of statutes with universal coverage: “‘They didn’t put a smoking ban into effect. You can’t have a smoking ban if you have exemptions.... You can’t have it both ways. If you find that smoking or breathing second-hand smoke is bad for 99 percent of the population but OK for the other 1 percent, there’s just no common sense there. ... If they want to have a true smoking ban, then there should be no exemptions.’” Where Stanford had picked up his notion of “true” laws he failed to reveal. How, for example, thousands of labor protective laws in the United States that excluded/exempted huge numbers of workers/employers had nevertheless all managed to remain on the statute books was not even a question for him. Realistically, he recognized that invalidating the law itself was a pipe dream: “‘There’s nothing I can do about the ban. No one has been able to overturn it in any state where they’ve tried, so why try?’”\(^{51}\) So, like his fellow anti-ban bar owners, Stanford, too, at this point was focused on just getting the casino exemption overturned, which he regarded as hurting bars. However, he was unable even to state the basis of that exemption correctly: nowhere did Democrats claim that exposing casino employees or gamblers to secondhand smoke was “OK”\(^{52}\): on the contrary, from the very moment in which Representative Wise presented his amendment in the House Commerce Committee he admitted that the exemption had nothing to do with protecting the health of those in the casinos, but was, rather, designed to protect revenues.\(^{53}\) In other words, the exemption served some extraneous purpose, which was at odds with the bill’s purpose (just as various labor-protective laws excluded farmworkers in order to protect farm employers).\(^{54}\) Oddly, Stanford did not even believe that overall bar revenues would decline as a result of the ban, though some bars might close.\(^{55}\)

---

Later, however, Iowans for Equal Rights, while denying that it either was affiliated with any tobacco company or accepted donations from “Big Tobacco,” propagated the cigarette manufacturers’ quarter-century-old voluntary (that is, non-governmenteally imposed) program of pseudo-“accommodation” showering “hospitality” on non-smokers and smokers alike.\(^{56}\) (That IER was in fact nothing but a pro-smoking group was strongly confirmed by its heavy reliance on its “consultant” Norman E. Kjono, a leading member of FORCES [Fight Ordinances and Restrictions to Control and Eliminate Smoking] International.)\(^{57}\)

\(^{53}\)See above ch. 35.

example, when its leaders met with the IDPH director on October 7, 2008, the group’s president, the owner of a bowling alley in Council Bluffs, who insisted that in eight years no one had ever complained to him about smoking,\(^5\) expressly declared that “small business owners must be able to accommodate every customer they can to keep their doors open.”\(^6\) In this reincarnation of the tobacco industry’s goal of retaining as much free space for smoking as possible in the face of increasingly adverse public opinion and government intervention, Iowans for Equal Rights advocated on behalf of “members of the small business community coming together to define smoking rules” and—yet another cigarette oligopoly fraud—"genuine Indoor Air Quality." Considerably more discontinuous with its earlier position, but in unmistakable conformity with its pro-tobacco stance, the group suddenly not only abandoned its campaign to repeal the casino exemption—to the point of expressing its concern that the American Lung Association of Iowa was trying to persuade the legislature to extend the ban to casinos—but executed an about-face and now began to “support casinos in their efforts to stop the removal of their exemption for gaming floors” and, for good measure, “oppose[d] any efforts to remove current exemptions...for any other business such as farming, limousine services, and heavy equipment” as well as the smoking ban on outdoor restaurant patios. 60 Little wonder that by the end of July IBOC, in a pot-kettle duel, announced that: “We have distanced ourselves from Iowans for Equal Rights. We believe their motives are self serving and do not coincide with our objectives.” 61

The bar owners’ bathetic struggle reached another high point on September 8 when prominent scofflaw Larry Duncan, who had “recently made headlines across the state by blatantly refusing to abide by the new state law,” announced the formation of Freedom Fighters for All Citizens of Iowa, whose goal was “urging Iowa residents to vote against state politicians who supported” that law. Far from seeking assistance in avoiding his own self-inflicted legal problems, he swore that “‘[t]his meeting is not about Larry Duncan. ... It’s about everybody that sits in this room who believes in the Constitution.’” How his group was “standing up for the rights of all Iowa residents” by virtue of advocating for 60Iowans for Equal Rights, “About Us” (n.d.), on http://www.iowansforequalrights.org (visited Sept. 8, 2008). Indicative of the group’s incompetence to evaluate the Public Health Department’s rules, against which it vituperated ad nauseam, but of no further interest here, was its gross inability even to understand the interlocking relationships of several regulatory definitions/statutory uses of such terms as “entrance” and “grounds of public buildings,” which misled it to assert that the latter definition “eliminates patio or outdoor smoking for bars.....” See also Marilea David to Thomas Newton, Re: Definitions of “public place,” “grounds,” “entrance” and other terms (Aug. 11, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH). On the version posted on the group’s website, this letter is labeled “Iowa Department of Public Health Inquiry No. 5”; http://www.iowansforequalrights.org/five.pdf (visited Aug. 14, 2009). This public comment was one of eight submitted by several members of Iowans for Equal Rights, which appear in fact to have been written by one person, who may not have been any of the signatories. Mapes correctly responded that there was no conflict between “public place” and “public building,” the latter being a specific category of the former. Bonnie Mapes to Marilea David (Nov. 24, 2008), on http://www.iowansforequalrights.org/pdf/IER%20Response%20to%20Health%20Department%20Communications0001.pdf (visited Aug. 14, 2009).

business owners’ “right to decide whether to allow smoking” when “80 percent of Iowans were in favor of the ban” he failed to explain.62 How Duncan would have reacted to the revelation that the 1857 constitutional convention which wrote his beloved constitution had unanimously adopted a resolution, offered by one of the state’s leading alcohol prohibitionists, prohibiting smoking in the convention chamber is amusing to imagine.)63 His professed selflessness to the contrary notwithstanding, his hometown newspaper reported that “Duncan started the Freedom Fighters [t]o raise money for legal costs....”64 That Duncan was pursuing a non-existent constitutional right was visibly on display in “Our Mission Statement,” which proclaimed that the organization was “dedicated to...upholding the Iowa Constitution and seeing that all citizens are treated fairly and equally with no exceptions or immunities.”65 That Duncan’s objective was not establishing parity between bars and casinos, but the resumption of unimpeded smoking in public places was inscribed in “Our Goal”: “We want to preserve our individual liberties that our forefathers envisioned and that only our Creator can take away. We will not quit! HF2212 must be repealed as it infringes on our individual liberties. The state of Iowa...is interfering with the interstate commerce of a legal agricultural product.” With that tobacco-loving God on his side, “Larry knew he could raise an army to challenge the constitutionality of this new law. It was a way to unite the voices of all citizens of Iowa, a common bond for a common good for Iowa.” Within a year Duncan’s Freedom Fighters allegedly numbered several thousand and held hundreds of meetings.66

Not that all bar owners were feverishly hatching plans to evade the law. On the contrary, some welcomed it. In Iowa City, for example, several viewed it positively as increasing sales in the long run; others regarded it as sales-neutral or as a cost-saver in terms of reducing maintenance costs from cigarette burns or damages to equipment caused by smoke; another echoed sentiments voiced by many business owners over the years who “embrace[d]” the law because it made 62 Nick Bergin, “Smoking Ban Sparks Activists,” Hawkeye (Burlington), Sept. 9, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank).

63 See above ch. 18.
64 Christinia Crippes, “Otis Campbell’s Owner Keeps Fighting,” Hawk Eye (Burlington) Jan. 9, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).
mandatory what they had been trying to accomplish voluntarily.67

The Iowa Department of Public Health’s Proposed and Final Rules

[Johnson County Supervisor Terrence] Neuzil...said that he is in support of the smoking ban, but doesn’t want employees to be standing on a public sidewalk smoking, since he doesn’t like this image. [Supervisor Pat] Harney asked who was going to clean up cigarette butts, since it is a dirty job. He said that if they are going to designate a smoking area, they have to make the employees accountable for cleaning up the area.

[Supervisor Mike] Lehman said...that they also have to respect the rights of individuals who are addicted to tobacco.... [Public Health Department Director Ralph] Wilmoth reiterated that there is no safe level of exposure to tobacco smoke. Neuzil said he is just saying that there needs to be a place for people who are addicted. Wilmoth said that they have cessation programs which is the preferred choice to help people get beyond this addiction.68

[B]ut a little common sense here now and then don’t hurt a thing.69

The legislature conferred extensive administrative and enforcement powers on the Iowa Department of Public Health:

This chapter shall be enforced by the department of public health or the department’s designee. The department of public health shall adopt rules to administer this chapter, including rules regarding enforcement. The department of public health shall provide information regarding the provisions of this chapter and related compliance issues to employers, owners, operators, managers, and other persons having custody or control of a public place, place of employment, area declared a nonsmoking place pursuant to section 142D.5, or outdoor area where smoking is prohibited, and the general public via the department's internet site.70

IDPH’s release on June 2 of the initial 13-page draft of its implementing rules (in time for the Administrative Rules Review Committee and State Board of Health meetings on June 11) had been preceded by a flurry of interagency 69Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (June 11, 2008) (audio tape provided by ARRC Legal Counsel Joseph Royce) (remark of Senate President Jack Kibbie).

70H.F. 2212, § 8(1)/Iowa Code §142D.8(1) (2009).
activity, especially in collaboration with the Attorney General’s Office, which drafted the rules together with IDPH. The AG and IDPH appear to have focused attention on a relatively small number of especially contentious issues, some of which were on the agenda and/or discussed at the Smokefree Air Act Implementation Discussion held under the auspices of the Division of Tobacco Use Prevention and Control on May 6. Division Director Bonnie Mapes informed invited officials from the Alcoholic Beverages Division, Professional Licensing Division, Iowa State Fair, Secretary of State, Iowa State University, the Departments of Revenue, Natural Resources, Economic Development, Public Safety, Human Services, Inspections and Appeals, Administrative Services, and Elder Affairs, and the bill drafter from the Legislative Services Agency that the meeting was designed to “solicit questions, concerns and suggested definitions or clarifications about specific stipulations of the law (in writing, if possible) so we can add these to the list of issues that need to be addressed as the rule is developed. Finally, if you are aware of any state or federal laws, rules or regulations which might conflict with language in the Smokefree Air Act, please bring these to our attention, as well.” (Not included in this invitation but in attendance at the meeting were representatives of the State University of Iowa and University of Northern Iowa as well as several non-state officials such as an attorney from the legal department of the City of Des Moines and the Iowa League of Cities lobbyist). The agenda for the two-hour meeting allotted 15 minutes to a progress report (including a review of the proposed enforcement process), 10 minutes to requirements of agencies that issued business licenses, 20 minutes to the involvement of agencies performing inspections, and 30 minutes to the definition of “grounds of any public buildings...under control of the state...,” in addition to 40 minutes to agencies’ presentation of additional matters for further clarification. The very fact that one-fourth of the entire meeting was to be devoted to defining “grounds of public buildings” suggested how thorny the determination of the extensiveness of this part of the Act’s outdoor smoking ban was, which both was nationally unique and originated in a kind of legislative practical joke or bluff that backfired on its Republican sponsors.

71 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Patricia Funaro et al. (May 1, 2008) (forwarded by recipient to Marc Linder).
72 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Patricia Funaro et al. (May 1, 2008).
73 See below for mention of their roles.
74 Iowa Department of Public Health, Smokefree Air Act Implementation Discussion May 6 [2008], Agenda (attached to email from Bonnie Mapes to Patricia Funaro et al. May 1, 2008).
75 See above ch. 35.
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers' Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

One issue that was not on the agenda but was discussed involved the scope of the provision banning smoking on “school grounds, including parking lots, athletic fields, playgrounds, tennis courts, and any other outdoor area under the control of a public or private educational facility, including inside any vehicle located on such school grounds” and in particular whether it applied to college and university campuses. (A set of surviving notes taken by an IDPH official did not list it among the “3 big issues”—namely, bars vs restaurants, infiltration, and grounds—but more than one-third of his notes were devoted to this subject.)

Among the divergent views expressed by attendees the argument was voiced that if “school” included a state university, it would be the only such use of the word in the Iowa Code, in which it otherwise meant exclusively kindergarten through high school. On the other hand, the opinion was also expressed that since the provision used both “school” and “educational facility,” it would be hard to differentiate between K to 12 and universities. A representative of the University of Northern Iowa, who was concerned that the assembled officials were underestimating the (volume of) complaints that the law would generate, was concerned about the butt disposal and environmental issues and worried about the university’s turning into a “bad neighbor” by pushing (smokers and) the problem across the street (and off campus).

The day after the meeting Mapes discussed the issue with someone whom she had not invited to the meeting who later summarized their conversation and added some policy context for interpreting the statutory provision:

77 [Aaron Swanson], SAA Meeting n.p. [at 2] (May 6, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH).
78 Email from Jonathan Carlson to Marc Linder (Sept. 10, 2008). Carlson, a law professor who was senior associate to the president of the University of Iowa and co-chair of its smoking policy implementation team, represented it at the meeting. The university’s commitment to a thoroughgoing implementation of the law can be gauged by its having chosen as chief implementer someone who stated that he was not interested in reducing the number of places where people were lawfully permitted to smoke and that he had opposed the university’s proposed campuswide smoking ban policy before it was preempted by the statewide law. Telephone interview with Jonathan Carlson, Iowa City (Aug. 22, 2008).
79 [Aaron Swanson], SAA Meeting n.p. [at 3] (May 6, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH).
80 [Aaron Swanson], SAA Meeting n.p. [at 4] (May 6, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH). One of the less weighty issues raised by a University of Iowa representative was whether the president’s residence was to be posted. Id. Moreover, the statute expressly covered such a public building and legislators expressly mentioned the UI president’s house as covered. See above ch. 35.
[Y]ou mentioned that [she] interpreted sect. 3(2)(d), which prohibits smoking on “school grounds, including parking lots, athletic fields, playgrounds, tennis courts, and any other outdoor area under the control of a public or private educational facility, including inside any vehicle located on such school grounds,” to cover only elementary and secondary schools, but not colleges and universities. You also mentioned that public colleges and universities would be covered under (2)(e), which prohibits smoking on “the grounds of any public buildings owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions…” I mentioned to you that I had spoken to a number of legislators about this very issue and they had all said that the legislature intended to cover colleges and universities under sect. 3(2)(d). You replied that I should send you any information I had on legislative intent on this issue. I just spoke to Senator Matt McCoy, who, as I’m sure you know, was one of the legislators who was most instrumental in securing passage of HF 2212; Sen. McCoy stated unambiguously that the legislature intended sect. 3(2)(d) to include private and public colleges and universities. ... [H]e have [sic; should be “gave”] me a list of other legislators, including senators Appel and Connolly, who would corroborate his statement. ...

Even apart from this issue of intent, it would—since numerous studies show that if people don’t begin smoking by the age of 19 or 20, it’s very unlikely that they ever will—make no public health sense for the legislature to exclude private colleges and universities from the outdoor no-smoking ban. Moreover, since even you would agree that sect. 3(2)(d) covers private elementary and secondary schools, there would have been no reason for the legislature to doubt that it lacked the power to cover private colleges/universities.

Finally, the fact that the existing law, sect 142B.1(3), uses the term “educational facility” in a way that clearly includes colleges/universities is powerful evidence that it does not have a less comprehensive scope under new ch. 142D, which is so much broader.81

81Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (May 8, 2008). Mapes quibbled with the use of the word “interpret,” but opaquely confirmed the accuracy of the view attributed to her: “I did not say that I interpreted section 3(2)(d), to cover only elementary and secondary schools, but not colleges and universities. I am not a lawyer or a legislative analyst and I, myself, am not interpreting any sections of the law. What I did say to you was that in our meetings with representatives from several institutions, including representatives from the universities, there has not been unanimity of opinion about the interpretation of that section.” Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (May 8, 2008). It was unclear why Mapes believed that (governmental) regulatees’ opinions as to whether they were covered by the statute were relevant to determining statutory meaning and/or legislative intent.
Informed later that same day that H.F. 2212’s chief sponsor, Janet Petersen, had not only agreed with McCoy that section 3(2)(d) covered colleges and universities, but that she would be in touch with IDPH about the issue, Mapes forwarded the information to the Attorney General’s office. Although the time for IDPH to publish its proposed rules was fast approaching, the interpretive contest over the word “school” and the dispute over the new law’s sweep had still not been resolved by May 22, when Tom Newton, the IDPH director, in the course of discussing on a radio broadcast what he described as the huge task his agency was facing in writing the rules for the Smokefree Air Act during a short period of time, revealed that, despite his claim that the legislation was “very explicit,” one gray area of legislative intent was “schools”: because some people were saying that the term meant only grade and high schools, IDPH was talking to the bill drafters in order to be able to define the scope of coverage. Nevertheless, with the legislature’s Administrative Rules Review Committee scheduled to meet and consider IDPH’s proposed rules in less than three weeks, the principal administrator of the University of Iowa’s smoking policy stated that “[w]e’ve made the decision to go forward with our campus-wide ban, regardless of how the law is interpreted,” although he suspected that the agency rules would interpret the school and educational facility provision to cover universities, and the University of Iowa had informed the IDPH that it would prefer that outcome.

As late as the day on which IDPH released its proposed rules, the state’s foremost newspaper reflected and reinforced public confusion: once again conflating coverage under the school/public or private educational facility provision and that under the grounds of public buildings provision (or perhaps ignoring the former altogether), the Des Moines Register reported that a narrow interpretation of the latter “could prevent the health department from enforcing the ban in areas of the U of I, such as Hubbard Park, on which no buildings sit.” Consequently, the university was purportedly “still unsure whether the statewide ban covers the entire campus....” In fact, such uncertainty would have been appropriate only if IDPH defined “school”/“educational facility” to exclude 82 Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (May 8, 2008).

---

83 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (May 9, 2008).
84 “The Exchange,” Iowa Public Radio, WSUI, Iowa City (May 22, 2008, 10 a.m.). Newton also mentioned “grounds of any public buildings” as a unique feature of the Iowa law, which could designate a large or small area.
85 Email from Jonathan Carlson to Marc Linder (May 23, 2008).
Administrative Rules for Barkeepers’ Challenge to Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

In the event, the agency’s draft rules released on June 2 did in fact adopt the broad interpretation87: “‘School’ and ‘public or private educational facility’ means a public school and a nonpublic school as defined in Iowa Code section 280.2, a community college as defined in Iowa Code section 260C.2, an accredited private institution as defined in Iowa Code section 261.9, and an institution governed by the board of regents pursuant to Iowa Code section 262.7.”88 The decisive circumstance prompting rejection of the narrower K-12 interpretation was, according to Mapes, a clarification of the legislature’s intent89 based on contacts with “[s]pecific legislators involved with the legislation,” such as Petersen, as well as Olson and Wise.90

IDPH’s recognition of the enforceability of the smoking ban on the entire indoor and outdoor campus of every college and university in the state was of vital importance not only to those institutions’ scores of thousands of students and employees (as well as their alumni and visitors and patients at the University of Iowa Hospitals and Clinics), but, since Iowa was pioneering in this area, also to higher education throughout the country as a model. Nevertheless, despite its unprecedentedness, this aspect of the law, which the legislature never debated,91 also never attained the public salience that several other statutory provisions generated, which form the focus of the following account.

Because the legislature had defined numerous terms in the Smokefree Air Act with operationally sufficient specificity, IDPH was able to adopt them verbatim. Among the terms left undefined by the law, however, two definitions proposed by the agency proved to be especially contentious—“grounds of any public universities.

87 As ARRC itself pointed out: “the school grounds restriction is very broad and would appear to include the entire campus; there is nothing in the Act that indicates that the term ‘school’ is limited to K-12 or public schools.” Iowa General Assembly, Administrative Rules Review Committee, Rules Digest, June 2008, at 1, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/lsadocs/ARR/ARRDigest/2008/ADJAR011.PDF. ARRC repeated this note in connection with the rules’ next appearance on its agenda. Iowa General Assembly, Administrative Rules Review Committee, Rules Digest, Oct. 2008, at 4, on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/lsadocs/ARR/ARRDigest/2009/ADJAR002.PDF
89Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Sept. 11, 2008) (not identifying the source of the clarification).
90Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Sept. 15, 2008). Because she failed to “keep notes on every contact I had with legislators about the rules as we were drafting them,” Mapes said that she was unable to state which specific issues she discussed each time. Id.
91See above ch. 35.
buildings” and that part of “bar” which specified “the serving of food is only incidental to the consumption” of alcoholic beverages without fleshing out “incidental.”92 The former stimulated considerable controversy among many state and especially local government entities that owned those public buildings and would be liable for enforcing the smoking bans on their grounds; by and large IDPH afforded them the accommodations they requested. In contrast, the latter—on which hinged whether outdoor smoking would be prohibited as in restaurants—ignited intense and explosive opposition from numerous bar owners (and a few of their legislative representatives), whose noisy resistance did not prompt IDPH to modify its original definition.

Resolving legislative intent with regard to college and university campuses was a straightforward task compared to figuring out what “[t]he grounds of any public buildings owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions”93 was designed to cover. Analysis was complicated by the quasi-prankish genesis of the provision as an amendment to Petersen’s study bill, which Republicans hoped would directly embarrass the governor, indirectly embarrass Democrats, and/or even contribute to the bill’s demise. Ferreting out legislative intent was further impeded by the fact that the floor discussion—especially in the House, where the amendment originated—was confused and/or disingenuous: because Soderberg, the Republican who offered the amendment, neither made an effort to clarify what he meant to cover beyond the grounds of the governor’s mansion (on which Governor Culver’s wife would be prohibited from smoking) nor could afford to taint his party’s self-cultivated image as protector of Iowans’ liberties, while anti-smoking Democrats, though apparently grateful that it was Republicans who had broken non-smoking ground on which the majority party had feared to tread outdoors, were manifestly unwilling to antagonize, even further, scores of thousands of smokers by taking responsibility for imposing a ban on smoking in outdoor areas on public land that might rival the universal ban on college campuses that slipped through without any fanfare, floor debate failed to produce any clarification of the scope of coverage.94

By May, when IDPH was forced to struggle with answering questions from the public and drafting a definition for its rules, House floor manager Olson weighed in with his perspective, which, while hardly authoritative, was nevertheless more straightforward than his evasive remarks on the House floor had been. Expressing confidence that the definition would be “reasonable and practical,” he assured a public radio audience that: “We’re not talking about not being able to smoke in an entire state park or in [sic] a state campground. What we’re talking about is not being able to smoke in a building on public grounds and then some kind of defined perimeter around it which would be then the public grounds determination.” How he knew that the legislature intended to protect everyone everywhere on the University of Iowa campus (which, at 1,900 acres, is larger than many parks) from exposure to secondhand smoke, but did not intend to protect children at picnic tables or on trails in parks, he did not reveal. Mapes, who was formally in charge of the rulemaking process, also took pains to reassure people “looking at the law thinking it probably covers a lot more than it may end up covering.” Why the text of the law would persuade readers that it prohibited smoking in more places than IDPH had apparently already determined to be covered she no more explained than why that part of the rulemaking process was catering to the small minority of smokers.

94See above ch. 35.

In the event, the department’s draft rules defined “Grounds of any public building” to mean “an outdoor area of a public building that is used in connection with the building, including but not limited to a sidewalk immediately adjacent to the building; a sitting or standing area immediately adjacent to the building; a patio; a deck; a curtilage or courtyard; a swimming or wading pool; or a beach, or any other outdoor area as designated by the person having custody or control of the public building.” The rule then went on to confer discretion on this person “to exclude from the designated grounds of any public building a parking lot, the course of play at a golf course, a hiking trail, locations of an individual campsite or campfire, or a lake, river, or other body of water.”

Interestingly, IDPH held the May 6 meeting “before we developed any definitions.” At that meeting the Iowa League of Cities, a “couple of major universities,” and the Iowa Department of Natural Resources “expressed concern” about the scope of the statutory term “grounds of any public buildings.” For example, the League asked whether it would include an entire (government-owned) golf course, since most golf courses had a clubhouse and/or restrooms, or an entire park, including all of its trails and campsites, since parks often had shelter houses, lodges and restrooms. The nature of the League’s concern was 99Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Aug. 20, 2009).

---

crucial: “Our view was that governmental entities might find it very difficult to enforce the smoking ban in these locations.” In other words, cities’ concern was not driven by the desire to implement the legislature’s intent to protect nonsmokers from secondhand smoke exposure in certain outdoor areas, but by their own enforcement, resource, and budgetary priorities, and perhaps as well by fear of alienating smokers and/or law enforcement agents, who might not have wanted to confront violators. In the event, “[i]n response, the Dept. of Public Health included a definition of the phrase...in its rules.”

Asked about the statutory warrant for permitting those in control of buildings to exempt, for example, a golf course, the bill’s chief sponsor and driving force, Janet Petersen, devised the justification that it had been discussed during floor debate. Although it is true that the House did have a colloquy on golf courses, Petersen suppressed—if she was ever aware of and remembered—the information that that point, raised by Representative Raecker with Olson, was, as analyzed in detail earlier, left hanging without any resolution whatsoever, Raecker asserting that a golf course was covered as the grounds of a public building, and Olson denying that it was a “place[ ] of public assembly” (a term that did not even survive in the final bill text). Raecker not only confirmed this account, but charged that if the rule was written more “liberally,” it did not correspond to the wording of the statute. Confronted with the fact that Olson had never engaged, let alone contradicted, Raecker’s interpretation, and asked whether this ambiguous legislative history justified IDPH in authorizing local governments to exempt golf courses, neither Petersen, nor Wise, nor Connolly ever responded.

100 Terry Timmins and Jessica Harder, “Workshop Presentation: Where There’s Smoke...Workshop on Iowa’s New Smokefree Air Act” at 7 (Iowa League of Cities, n.d.
Conference/Handouts/WhereTheresSmokeHO.pdf (visited Aug. 20, 2009). According to the author of these remarks, who had attended the meeting, it was not clear whether IDPH would have provided a definition if no one had raised concerns. Telephone interview with Jessica Harder, Des Moines (Aug. 20, 2009). Mapes stated that a definition would have been “needed” even if no one had raised issues because the Act did not define the term.
Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Aug. 20, 2009).

101 Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (June 6, 2008). She also mentioned hiking trails and parking lots. Remarkably, a representative of the Alcoholic Beverages Division at the May 6 IDPH meeting expressed a preference for including parking lots in the ban on the grounds of “public perception.” [Aaron Swanson], SAA

102 See above ch. 35.

103 Telephone interview with Scott Raecker, Des Moines (June 7, 2008).

104 Email from Marc Linder to Janet Petersen (June 6 and 7, 2008). Petersen, Wise,
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

The definition as a whole went a long way toward accommodating the Iowa League of Cities, whose members’ divergent views—some supported local control while others preferred statewide regulation so that city officials would not appear as the “bas guys”—had deprived the organization of the unity that effective legislative lobbying required. Consequently, the “imperfect statute” that the legislature enacted left the League with a final opportunity to fashion a sufficiently uniform position on the basis of which to seek a more favorable outcome from the rules writing process. In view of the different “kind of climate” that prevailed in various cities, depending in large part on the size of the city, the lowest common denominator that members were able to achieve focused on flexibility.105 Indeed, that key notion was raised by a representative of the League at the May 6 IDPH meeting, who requested the agency not to “rule too broadly” and to give cities “flexibility” with regard to parks and golf courses.106

Early on in the process ILC’s governmental affairs counsel submitted to IDPH its comments on the smoking ban rules. The League was concerned that the “undefined term” would have “great impacts on the way cities are required to enforce these laws [sic], and it needs clarification.” As an example of such impacts, ILC mentioned parks, beaches, golf courses “or other outdoor areas not mentioned specifically in the law if there happens to be a ‘public building’ somewhere on those properties.”107 Cities, in other words, were concerned only with limiting their obligations under the new law to the apparent exclusion of the resulting health consequences for nonsmokers. The League’s proposed “solution” was a definition that included “the area immediately adjacent to a public building in which occupants of the building or members of the public could be expected to congregate in connection with the purpose or use of the building, and includes that area immediately adjacent to a public building, which if used for smoking and Connolly also failed to respond to the account of Raecker’s and Soderberg’s broad interpretation of “grounds of any public building.” Email from Marc Linder to Janet Petersen (June 7, 2008).

105 Telephone interview with Jessica Harder, government affairs counsel, Iowa League of Cities, Des Moines (Aug. 12, 2009).

107 Iowa League of Cities, “Comments: Rulemaking HF2212 statewide smoking ban” at 1 (Apr. 8, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH). Although the comments themselves were dated April 8, 2008, the email from Jessica Harder (ILC) to Brent Saron (IDPH) to which they were attached was dated May 9, 2008. It seems unlikely that organizations would have been providing comments on agency rules even before the governor had signed the bill into law. The author later was unable to explain the discrepancy. Telephone interview with Jessica Harder, Des Moines (Aug. 12, 2009).
would cause smoke to infiltrate the building through doors or windows.” The virtue of this language was its creation of “needed flexibility for cities.” The “flexibility” that use of the term “congregate” would have granted cities governments would also have diminished the number of nonsmokers entitled to a smokefree walk from the outer perimeter of the grounds of public buildings into the buildings inasmuch as individual people (or even groups) walking would not have been congregating. The League’s proposal deprived nonsmokers of considerable protection from secondhand smoke exposure outdoors that IDPH’s draft definition provided precisely because it ignored the purpose of such outdoor protection. Instead, it erroneously treated the “grounds of any public building” ban as serving merely to prevent smoke from wafting into public buildings. Also expressive of “flexibility” was the conferral of a significant dose of local control: those cities that “wanted to strengthen the smoking ban in areas otherwise exempt from the prohibitions of smoking” could simply pass ordinances banning smoking in parks or on golf courses. Interestingly, rather than disposing of the issue in its own proposal, the ILC merely posed the question as to whether, if the grounds of a public building encompassed “public rights of way, like sidewalks or streets,” they were “exempt from the ban....”

While IDPH draft accommodated the League of Cities by empowering governments to exempt not only golf courses, but parking lots, hiking trails, campsites, and various bodies of water, it did not adopt the restrictive
"congregate" or "infiltrate" language that would have diluted protection for nonsmokers. Moreover, by failing to address expressly the issue of "public rights of way, like sidewalks," but by including "sidewalks immediately adjacent to the building" in the draft rules, IDPH implicitly answered the ILC’s question: they were not exempt—until the Department reversed its position later in the rulemaking process.

As far as the sub-definition of "bar" was concerned, IDPH defined the "serving of food [is only] incidental to the consumption of alcoholic beverages" to mean "food preparation that is limited to the service of ice, pre-packaged snack foods, popcorn, peanuts, and the reheating of commercially prepared foods that do not require assembly, such as frozen pizza, pre-packages sandwiches, or other prepackaged, ready-to-serve products." This definitional focus on the type of food preparation rather than the proportion of total bar revenue accounted for by food—"[a]n establishment which prepares food on site is considered a restaurant for the purposes of the Smokefree Air Act, even if that establishment has a liquor license"—did not faze some bar owners, but the uproar that it provoked among some bar owners would manifest itself at the Administrative Rules Review Committee meeting on June 11.

111 IDPH also did not fully accommodate the League regarding another definition. ILC was concerned that the statutory requirement (§ 6(3)) that owners "shall clearly and conspicuously post in and at every entrance."

One draft rule that seriously weakened the Smokefree Air Act—and that, astonishingly, prompted little comment—dealt with the enforcement obligations of those in control of smoking-prohibited places. The statute itself provided that they “shall inform persons violating this chapter of the provisions of this chapter.” The proposed IDPH rule reconfigured this aspect of the enforcement process thus:

An employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of a place where smoking is prohibited under 2008 Iowa Acts, House File 2212 shall inform any individual smoking in a place where smoking is prohibited that the individual is violating the Smokefree Air Act and shall request that the individual stop smoking immediately.

a. If the individual refuses to stop smoking, the employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of the place where smoking is prohibited should discontinue service to that individual.

b. If the individual refuses to stop smoking, the employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of the place where smoking is prohibited may request that the individual leave the area where smoking is prohibited.

c. If the individual refuses to leave the area where smoking is prohibited, the employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of the place where smoking is prohibited may notify the state or local law enforcement agency with jurisdiction over the area where smoking is prohibited.

A critique of the regulation together with a request that the Administrative Rules Review Committee discuss the matter and urge IDPH to strengthen the enforcement process was sent to Petersen, the bill’s chief sponsor, and the committee’s co-chairs, Philip Wise and Michael Connolly:

[T]he draft rules that the IDPH posted on its website on May 29…seriously weaken the overall enforcement process. The only direct enforcement obligation that the draft rules impose on owners et al. is to tell violating smokers that they are violating the law and to request that they stop smoking immediately. If smokers refuse to stop smoking or ignore the owner’s request, the owner has no obligation to take any further steps to insure compliance—she is not even required to notify law enforcement. ...

This hands-off approach is deeply flawed: not only is it an open invitation to collusion between smokers and owners to defeat the smoking ban, but it throws the whole social-psychological burden of enforcement on individual members of the public to confront belligerent smokers by reporting the violation to law enforcement in the face of owners’ passivity. Although involvement by the public would be welcome, many people are very reluctant to become informers even when they can do so anonymously. In contrast, owners (e.g. of bars) perform quasi-law enforcement functions vis-a-vis customers et al. on a regular basis and are accustomed and expected by the public to do so.\textsuperscript{117}

---

The following day Mapes was asked: “Did IDPH make it merely discretionary (rather than mandatory) for an owner to notify law enforcement if someone refused to comply with a request to stop smoking where it was prohibited because IDPH believed that it lacked the authority to make it mandatory—or for some other reason?”\textsuperscript{118} Her response—that “[t]he only instances in which we were able to use the word “shall” instead of “may” or “should” are for those stipulations stated explicitly in the legislation”\textsuperscript{119}—prompted the further question: “By that logic, where are the ‘stipulations stated explicitly in the legislation’ authorizing IDPH” to authorize local governments to exempt parking lots, golf courses, and hiking trails? In addition, Mapes was asked whether a bar owner would be complying with his obligations under the new law if, after telling belligerent smokers that smoking was unlawful and requesting that they stop immediately, he did nothing further in response to their continued smoking.\textsuperscript{120} At this point the director of the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control division shifted into that’s-over-my-pay-grade mode: “This is not my logic. This is the AG’s determination.”\textsuperscript{121} One final effort to elicit a substantive response—“It doesn’t matter whether it’s yours or theirs—the point is whether that’s the only possible interpretation of the law and whether the narrow interpretation makes enforcement much more difficult than the legislature envisioned”\textsuperscript{122}—failed: “Then I suggest you ask the bill sponsors about whether they share your concerns.”\textsuperscript{123}

\textsuperscript{117}Email from Marc Linder to Janet Petersen, Philip Wise, and Michael Connolly (June 3, 2008).

\textsuperscript{118}Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (June 4, 2008).

\textsuperscript{119}Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (June 5, 2008). Interestingly, although Jonathan Carlson, the University of Iowa’s representative at the meeting on May 6, 2008, took the position that the university would be complying with its statutory obligation if one of its agents told a violator to stop smoking and then walked away after the violator indicated that he would not comply, he reported the day after the meeting that Mapes seemed to believe that owners might have more of an obligation and that IDPH might use its authority to motivate owners to enforce more thoroughly by issuing civil citations. Telephone interview with Jonathan Carlson, Iowa City (May 7, 2008).

\textsuperscript{120}Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (June 5, 2008).

\textsuperscript{121}Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (June 5, 2008).

\textsuperscript{122}Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (June 5, 2008).

\textsuperscript{123}Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (June 5, 2008).
Two days later bill sponsor Wise responded to the aforementioned critique:

I have spent a significant amount of time pursuing the enforcement issue with Legal Counsel for the ARRC, the Department of Public Health, the office of the Attorney General, and with Rep. Petersen. Following is my conclusion.

While I don’t personally disagree with your concerns about the owner’s relatively limited role in enforcement, that is what we passed. The rules that indicate the owner “shall” do something are based upon statute. The rules that indicate the owner “may” do something, in other words discretionary in nature, are beyond what we passed into law. It would be inappropriate, therefore, to mandate through administrative rules that the owner discontinue service, require the offending party to leave the area, or notify law enforcement. To do so would require a future General Assembly to amend the statute to include those mandatory activities on the part of the owner.124

Two days before the scheduled ARRC meeting a final effort, based on administrative law, was made to persuade Wise to revise his narrow view of an administrative agency’s powers of statutory interpretation:

Section 8(1) of the new statute provides that: “The department of public health shall adopt rules to administer this chapter, including rules regarding enforcement.”

This legislative mandate to the DPH to adopt rules to administer this chapter, including rules regarding enforcement CANNOT mean that DPH has power only to issue rules that are totally identical to the words of the statute. If that were the case, there would be absolutely no point in delegating power to the agency to issue enforcement rules because those rules would already exist in the words of the statute. Therefore, it must be the case that the legislature delegated DPH some power to issue rules that TO SOME EXTENT go beyond the words of the statute in order to enforce the law. The only question is: TO WHAT EXTENT?

We already know that the DPH believes that it has some power to deviate from the precise words of the statute because three of its draft enforcement rules do just that:

153.5(4)
a. If the individual refuses to stop smoking, the employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of the place where smoking is prohibited should discontinue service to that individual.
b. If the individual refuses to stop smoking, the employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of the place where smoking is prohibited may request that the individual leave the area where smoking is prohibited.
c. If the individual refuses to leave the area where smoking is prohibited, the employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of the place where smoking is prohibited may notify the state or local law enforcement agency with jurisdiction over the area where smoking is prohibited.”

124Email from Phil Wise to Marc Linder (June 7, 2008).
There is absolutely nothing in the statute that says a building owner should stop serving a violating smoker. There is absolutely nothing in the statute that says a building owner has discretion to request the smoker to leave the smoking-prohibited area. There is absolutely nothing in the statute that says a building owner may call law enforcement.

Nevertheless, DPH added these discretionary rules and apparently you agree that DPH has the power to do so even though the statute makes no reference to such actions by owners.

Moreover, whereas the statute merely says that “An owner, operator, manager, or other person having custody or control of a public place, place of employment, area declared a nonsmoking place pursuant to section 142D.5, or outdoor area regulated under this chapter shall inform persons violating this chapter of the provisions of this chapter,” the draft rules, 153.5(4), say: “An employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of a place where smoking is prohibited under 2008 Iowa Acts, House File 2212 shall inform any individual smoking in a place where smoking is prohibited that the individual is violating the Smokefree Air Act and shall request that the individual stop smoking immediately.”

The statute does NOT say that an owner must request a smoker to stop smoking at all, let alone immediately. Yet DPH believes—and presumably so do you—that it has the discretion to interpret the statute to empower it to deviate from the words of the statute in order to enforce the law by making explicit what is implicit in the law by requiring owners to tell violators to stop smoking immediately.

The question therefore is: Once you’ve agreed that, despite the absence of any statutory mention of such action, the DPH has the power to tell a building owner that s/he has the AUTHORITY to call law enforcement when a recalcitrant smoker refuses to stop smoking, is it absolutely clear under administrative law that DPH would be going too far by telling the building owner that s/he has the DUTY to call law enforcement?

There is a strong basis for concluding that DPH would NOT be going too far. First, DPH is not going beyond the words of the statute in requiring, for example, a person, on whom the statute does not impose any duty, to do something. Thus, if the DPH had drafted a rule requiring all the other customers of a restaurant/bar observing a violation to call law enforcement, many people would probably conclude that the statute did not confer that much power on the agency. Second, the statute does impose a duty on building owners to inform violators of the statute—is requiring owners to call law enforcement so much further removed from the words of the statute than requiring owners to tell violators to stop smoking immediately that it is absolutely clear that DPH has no power to do so?

In order to answer this question, consider draft rule 153.5(1):

“The employer, owner, operator, manager, or person having custody or control of a place where smoking is prohibited under 2008 Iowa Acts, House File 2212 shall: a. Not permit smoking in a public place, place of employment, outdoor area where smoking is prohibited, or an area declared nonsmoking pursuant to 2008 Iowa Acts, House File 2212, section 5.”

Does the statute literally say that an owner of a public place “shall not permit smoking in a public place...where smoking is prohibited”? The statute says (sect. 3(1)) “a person shall not smoke in...public places,” but does it literally say that the owner shall not permit it? If it doesn’t, DPH reasonably concluded that enforcement would be impossible without inferring that the statute meant it even [though] the statute didn’t say it in so many words. If the statute does say it, then why wouldn’t DPH be authorized to issue an enforcement rule requiring an owner who “shall not permit smoking” to call law enforcement after a noncompliant smoker has refused to stop smoking? After all, if the owner, after telling the violator to stop smoking immediately and being told by the violator that he won’t stop smoking, merely shrugged his shoulders, gave up, and did absolutely nothing more—as the draft rules now would permit him to do—wouldn’t the owner be violating his duty not to permit smoking? Isn’t calling law enforcement the very least that the owner would have to do to comply with his duty not to permit smoking? 125
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

Wise failed to respond, and the only modification in the entire set of rules that the IDPH made in the wake of the June 11 ARRC meeting126 was to strike the aforementioned anomalous “should” in favor of “may discontinue service to that individual.”127 The most revealing commentary on this regulatory distortion of the enforcement process came from the highest legislative authority, Janet Petersen herself, who, in acknowledging that law enforcement was not perfect, explained that “we” had decided not to anger business owners by requiring them to call the police.128 In contrast, neighboring Minnesota was apparently less concerned about alienating them: its Clean Indoor Air Act of 2007 provided that the owner “shall makes reasonable efforts to prevent smoking...by...asking any person who smokes in an area where smoking is prohibited to refrain from smoking and, if the person does not refrain from smoking after being asked to do so, asking the person to leave. If the person refuses to leave, the proprietor, person, or entity in charge shall handle the situation consistent with lawful 125 Email from Marc Linder to Philip Wise (June 9, 2008). In any event wrong was the public comment by a lawyer-bar and grill owner that the Act was not written for an owner to “notify any local enforcement agencies, since there are none that would have jurisdiction over the issue.” Mark Mershon to Iowa Department of Public Health (July 1, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH).

126 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (July 1, 2008).

128 Telephone interview with Janet Petersen, Des Moines (June 6, 2008). Remarkably, at one of IDPH’s public hearings on the rules Douglas Beardsley, the director of the Johnson County Health Department, urged the agency to convert “may” to “shall” in the rules governing business owners’ obligations. Iowa Department of Public Health, Public Hearing for Amendments to Proposed Rules to the Smokefree Air Act (Aug. 20, 2008) (based on notes taken at the Iowa City site).
methods for handling other persons acting in a disorderly manner or as a trespasser.\textsuperscript{129}

Perhaps even more destructive of enforcement\textsuperscript{130} and blatantly incompatible

\footnotesize
\textsuperscript{129}Minnesota Code, § 144.416(a)(2) (2008). As early as 1993, the Vermont public smoking law (which did not cover workplaces as such), required proprietors of covered public places to ask those who persisted in unlawfully smoking to leave the premises.
1993 Vermont Laws No. 46, § 2, at 77, 78.

\textsuperscript{130}Front-line enforcement was further undermined by what was apparently a gap in the law. IDPH Rule 641—153.8(2) provides that “[a] peace officer may issue a citation in lieu of arrest pursuant to Iowa Code chapter 805 against a person who smokes in an area where smoking is prohibited....” However, the police, according to a county attorney and a police chief, with regard to such a civil offense lack the power, which they have in criminal matters, to require violators to identify themselves. Consequently, if violators refuse to present ID, the police cannot issue citations because they would not be able to identify the violators. Email from Charles Green, University of Iowa, Chief of Police, to Marc Linder (Sept. 8, 2008); telephone interview with Janet Lyness, Johnson County Prosecutor, Iowa City (Sept. 9, 2008). Minnesota avoided this problem by making unlawful smoking a petty misdemeanor. Minnesota Code § 144.417(2)(b) (2008). Two and a half months after the law went into effect, IDPH was aware of only one jurisdiction (Polk county) that had actually issued citations to smokers. Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Sept. 15, 2008). Seven months after the Iowa Attorney General’s Office had undertaken to answer questions concerning this gap, it responded: “1. Can it really be the case that, when a police officer personally observes someone committing a civil offense for which the police are empowered to issue a citation and which carries a $50 civil money penalty, the alleged violator is free to thwart the issuance of the citation simply by refusing to identify himself?” “Yes. The legislature has chosen to make this offense a civil citation. This is not the case of ‘a citation in lieu of arrest.’ In fact, it is similar to the provision of 453A.3 which also makes the citation given to a juvenile caught smoking a civil citation.” “2. Can the police lawfully issue, as the new idph rule 153.8(2) states, a ‘citation in lieu of arrest’ to someone whom they have no authority to arrest in the first place?” “No.” “Do the attached subsections of iowa code sect. 805.1 suggest a problem? The Minnesota public smoking law makes unlawful smoking a petty misdemeanor—does the iowa legislature need to amend the smokefree air act along similar lines to avoid the problem that the police in iowa city/johnson county have raised, or is there some interpretation of 805.8(c) that avoids the civil/criminal problem?” “The iowa legislature could amend the statute to provide for a criminal citation, using the Minnesota law as a model, or in some other manner.” Email from Donn Stanley, Special Assistant Attorney General to Marc Linder (Apr. 13, 2009). It is noteworthy that a police sergeant and a former police detective in the Iowa City area who did not want to be identified stated that, regardless of what the aforementioned legal authorities had opined, a police officer who really wanted to issue a civil citation could find lawful means for requiring a smoking-law violator to identify him- or herself. The UI Police did not appear to have experienced such difficulties in with (as Wise put it) “what we passed” was IDPH’s rule dealing with the imposition of monetary penalties on those in control of smoking-prohibited places who failed to comply with their obligations. The statute itself provides that:

A person who owns, operates, manages, or otherwise has custody or control of a public place, place of employment, area declared a nonsmoking place pursuant to section 142D.5, or outdoor area regulated under this chapter and who fails to comply with this chapter shall pay a civil penalty as follows:

a. For a first violation, a monetary penalty not to exceed one hundred dollars.

b. For a second violation within one year, a monetary penalty not to exceed two hundred dollars.

c. For each violation in excess of a second violation within one year, a monetary penalty not to exceed five hundred dollars for each additional violation.\(^{131}\)

In spite of this unambiguous statutory penalty scheme, the IDPH rules provided that if IDPH determined that a complaint against a non-smoking place was credible: For the first complaint the IDPH “shall” issue a written notice of violation to the owner, including “educational materials about how to comply” and “information on whom to contact for further information and assistance for compliance”\(^{132}\); for the second complaint in one year, the IDPH “shall” issue a second notice of violation, and in addition “may authorize one or more public agencies to conduct a compliance check” and “may” pursue civil penalties or “may refer the complaint to the appropriate authority for enforcement of the civil penalties”\(^{133}\); and for the third and further complaints of a violation within one year the IDPH “shall” issue a subsequent notice of violation and “authorize one or more public agencies to conduct a compliance check,” and, in addition, “may” pursue civil penalties or “may refer the complaint to the appropriate authority for enforcement of the civil penalties.”\(^{134}\)

An hour before the Smokefree Air Act and the administrative rules went into effect Wise, Connolly, Petersen, and Olson were asked: “Where in the statute did the legislature authorize IDPH to give violators free passes by abolishing the mandatory monetary penalties in favor of education? Why did the ARRC not object to this clear ultra vires action by the agency in violation of the statutory \(^{132}\) Rule 641—153.8(8)(a) (July 1, 2008).

\(^{133}\) Rule 641—153.8(8)(b) (July 1, 2008).

\(^{134}\) Rule 641—153.8(8)(c) (July 1, 2008).
I have consulted with Legal Counsel to the Administrative Rules Review Committee regarding your concerns with the enforcement of the statewide smoking ban. It is fair to conclude that Counsel is not troubled by the enforcement method being proposed. To quote from his memo to me, “The Department does not levy fines . . . H.F. 2212, provides in part: ‘Judicial magistrates shall hear and determine violations of this chapter.’ Fines will be imposed by the courts, not the Department of Public Health. This means that the Department must institute a court action to impose a fine.”

Counsel further opines, “To me, this rule seems like an attempt to educate the public and encourage voluntary compliance prior to the costly process of seeking judicial adjudication of a violation.”

These administrative rule have been “filed emergency” and are in force. There is a lengthy public input process. I would invite you to participate in one of those public hearings. Following that process, final rules will come before the ARRC. That will occur sometime this fall. I would further invite you to attend that ARRC meeting.

Following the adoption of final rules, the subsequent avenue available to the public is to petition the 2009 General Assembly to amend the statute. I suspect there will be several bills filed to do that.

On June 11, nine days after IDPH had published the draft rules on its website, the Administrative Rules Review Committee (a 10-member bipartisan legislative body, appointed by the speaker of the House and Senate majority leader, which selectively reviews rules proposed or already in effect) met to review them merely on an informal and informational basis since they had been neither filed nor published. ARRC is empowered to refer a rule at the next legislative session to the two aforementioned officers, who are then required to refer it to the appropriate standing committee. ARRC’s referral may be accompanied by a recommendation to overcome the rule statutorily. If ARRC objects to a rule on 135 Email from Marc Linder to Philip Wise, Michael Connolly, Janet Petersen, and Tyler Olson (June 30, 2008).

---

136 Phil Wise to Marc Linder (July 3, 2008).
137 Iowa Code §§ 17A.8(1) and (6) (2008). At this time the committee was composed of six Democrats and four Republicans.
the grounds that it is unreasonable, arbitrary, capricious, or otherwise beyond the agency’s delegated authority, the Committee is required to file the objection with the administrative code editor; after such filing, the agency then bears the burden of proof in any judicial review or enforcement action. Finally, ARRC is also authorized, by a two-thirds majority of its members, to delay the rule’s effective date until adjournment of the legislative regular session.\textsuperscript{142}

At the June 11 ARRC meeting IDPH official Barb Nervig reported that the drafting process had included: a review of the administrative rules of six or seven other states with comprehensive anti-smoking laws; involvement of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; the aforementioned meeting on May 6 with 43 participants (including representatives of the three state universities); and consideration of more than 300 public comments. The transparency of the process was underscored by the extended 66-day public comment period scheduled to last until August 6. Unsurprisingly, Nervig stressed that the department would seek to secure compliance primarily through education. Where the “pretty prescriptive” legislation—indicated by the fact that half the rules were taken directly from the statute—needed clarification, IDPH provided definitions; the two that Nervig highlighted were the aforementioned “grounds of any public buildings,” which had generated questions before and after the definition’s promulgation, and the incidentalness of serving food to the consumption of alcoholic beverages as a boundary marker between a “bar” and a “restaurant.”\textsuperscript{143} The second definition, keyed as it was to the determination of whether smoking was permitted in outdoor seating/serving areas, unleashed especially intense and angry reactions from bar owners.

The bar debate, which took up the lion’s share of the discussion, got underway when Republican Representative David Heaton, an opponent of the bill, asked whether the statute specifically stated that smoking was permitted in an outdoor bar.\textsuperscript{144} Nervig referred the question to the principal drafter of the rules, Assistant Attorney General Matt Gannon—intriguingly, Philip Morris had been one of his clients when he was a lawyer at the Washington, D.C. corporate law firm of Arnold & Porter\textsuperscript{145}—whose negative answer was misleading insofar

\textsuperscript{141}Iowa Code §§ 17A.8(8) and 17A.4(5)(a) (2008).
\textsuperscript{142}Iowa Code §§ 17A.8(9) (2008). In this case the legislature is required to take action either disapproving or refusing to disapprove the rule.
\textsuperscript{143}Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (June 11, 2008) (audio tape provided by Joe Royce, legal counsel).
\textsuperscript{144}Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (June 11, 2008) (audio tape provided by Joe Royce, legal counsel).
\textsuperscript{145}After graduation from the University of Iowa Law School in 1998 and until 2007 as the law specifically provided that smoking was prohibited in “[o]utdoor seating or serving areas of restaurants.”

Burlington Democrat Thomas Courtney, the Senate Majority Whip, who lamented that the law could mean the difference between life and death for some small bar owners, launched an attack on the irrational health consequences of the bar-restaurant distinction, which he imagined was rooted in the rules. When, for example, he noted that wait staff who had to deliver beer or pizza to an outdoor patio would not be protected from exposure to secondhand smoke, Nervig pointed out that the statute generated that outcome. As for shifting to a different criterion—percentage of sales—Gannon stated that experience in other states had proven that it was incredibly difficult to enforce and draw clear lines. (But the fact that Gannon was constrained to admit that he and his colleagues did not know the answer to Heaton’s question as to whether smoking would be permitted on the patio of a restaurant or bar that served only alcohol on the patio indicated that line-drawing was not so easy under the IDPH rule either.) Courtney’s commonsensical point that whether they served pre-packaged or prepared food, wait staff who had to take it to outdoor tables would be equally exposed to secondhand smoke prompted Nervig to respond that taverns with food were essentially the equivalent of restaurants with a liquor license, both of which together accounted for about 56 percent of the relevant establishments. Courtney then tried to cut the Gordian knot by proposing that a restaurant be defined as a place where the wait staff went among the tables and a tavern as one with a food service door where customers picked up the food so that the wait staff would not have to be exposed to the smoke. Nervig’s jocular response that under those circumstances she could see a lot of pick-up windows being built proved, as Courtney was quick to note, his whole point—that no wait staff would be breathing secondhand smoke. It was left to Senate President Jack Kibbie to lament that the legislature itself had not gone into what he called the hamburger versus pizza issue.\textsuperscript{147} In fact, IDPH’s basis for rejecting food as a set proportion of sales as the criterion distinguishing bars from restaurants was more complex than Gannon may have known at the time.\textsuperscript{148} On July 2, the day after the law and the emergency rules (including the aforementioned definition of “incidental”) had gone into effect,\textsuperscript{149} Mapes exchanged emails headed “Dram Shop” with various IDPH, AG, and ABD officials noting that: “There may be a way to use reports that bars must make to their ‘dram shop’ insurance carriers to support a percentage of sales definition. ... This would still take some additional resources to manage, but not nearly as much as if we had to set up a system entirely from scratch.” Adding that she was still working with ABD on the issue and that she would have more detailed information in the near future, she cautioned that “[t]his isn’t ready to share outside our group at this point. It might not pan out.”\textsuperscript{150} The next day IDPH’s legislative liaison emailed Mapes and the recipients of the previous emails that Republican Representative Lance Horbach had called her to “discuss the definition of bar and restaurant and provide his public input. He supports using percentage of sale and suggested using the dram shop insurance requirement. He’s an insurance agent in his other life and say that bars are provided annual audits to maintain their policy and suggests we base our enforcement on these annual audits. It was a good discussion and he admitted their [sic] are issues with the way the statute is written but asked us to consider his comments as we go through the rulemaking process.”\textsuperscript{151} Horbach, a self\textsuperscript{147} Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (June 11, 2008) (audio tape provided by ARRC legal counsel Joseph Royce).

\textsuperscript{148} The pro-smoking group Choose Freedom for Iowa argued in a letter to ARRC that the rule was “contrary to the statute” because it used a type-of-food test stood instead of the statute’s “incidental to the consumption of alcoholic beverages” test. George Eichhorn to Michael Connolly (Oct. 8, 2008).

\textsuperscript{149} Mapes stated that IDPH had filed emergency rules because “drafting and approval of Rules normally takes 120 days, but IDPH has only 10 weeks from the time the law was signed until it goes into effect on July 1.” Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission, Meeting Minutes (May 30, 2008), on http://www.idph.state.ia.us/tobacco/common/pdf/053008minutes.pdf (visited Aug. 15, 2009).

\textsuperscript{150} Email from Bonnie Mapes to Brent Saron, Lynh Patterson, Matt Gannon, Tom Newton (July 2, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH). Four minutes earlier an ABD official had emailed her: “Sounds like the majority of them have to do this, so we might be able to use their reports for their insurance classification as the basis of an application system for bars that wish to [allow smoking outdoors?].” Email from Jim Kuhlman to Bonnie Mapes (July 2, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH) (copy lacked end of email).

\textsuperscript{151} Email from Lynh Patterson to Bonnie Mapes et al. (July 3, 2008) (copy furnished professed “property rights guy” who noted that the legislature had never discussed its intent with regard to “incidental,” later stated that in his telephone conversation with IDPH, the agency had admitted that it had overstepped its authority in writing this rule and was willing to listen to arguments for changing it.\textsuperscript{152}

On the same day that Mapes sent the aforementioned email the Iowa Restaurant Association submitted a request to the agency that it carry out a regulatory analysis of the rules.\textsuperscript{153} By the time IDPH published the regulatory analysis later that summer, it explained its reasons for not having adopted a percentage of sales definition as its way of satisfying the statutory requirement that it provide a “description of any alternative methods for achieving the purpose of the proposed rule that were seriously considered by the agency and the reasons why they were rejected in favor of the proposed rule.”\textsuperscript{154} IDPH “did seriously consider alternatives” to its aforementioned definitions of the undefined statutory terms “bar” and “serving of food [only] incidental to the consumption of alcoholic beverages.” The latter definition, focused as it was on very rudimentary food preparation, was based on “Department of Inspections and Appeals criteria for the ‘Tavern without food preparation’ designation ‘check-off’ on food service license applications.”\textsuperscript{155} (As early as the end of May Mapes had mentioned at a Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission meeting “a few...definitions which have the potential for controversy, including the definition of a bar versus a restaurant.... To define a bar, the Rules utilize a classification that the Department of Inspections and Appeals includes as a check-off on their food service license applications titled “Tavern with no food preparation” that limits service of food to bar snacks and pre-packaged, commercially prepared foods.”)\textsuperscript{156} Without citing any such statutes, the Regulatory Analysis stated that the use of already existing food service or liquor license criteria was a common method used by state smokefree workplace laws to distinguish bars from restaurants, whereas Iowa lacked any liquor license type that differentiated between establishments

\begin{thebibliography}{99}
\bibitem{} Telephone interview with Lance Horbach, Tama (Aug. 16, 2009).
\end{thebibliography}
administrative rules for, barkeepers’ challenge to, enforcement of smokefree air act

whose food sales were incidental to alcohol sales and full-service restaurants with liquor licenses. idph admitted, again without citing any state statutes, that “the annual percentage of food sales compared to alcohol sales” was another common method used to distinguish bars and restaurants, food sales typically being limited to a maximum of 20-25 percent of total sales.\textsuperscript{157}

the department considered this method, but concluded that it was not a “practical or effective option in iowa” for four reasons. first, those states (which, again, idph did not identify) that used this percentage of sales method either had already had a system for gathering the requisite financial data from bars before they passed their smokefree workplace laws or created it as part of such legislation together with the necessary funding. in contrast, the state of iowa lacked such a system, and although some cities did have ordinances requiring liquor licensees to submit financial records, the collection methods were not uniform. similarly, although all liquor licensees had to maintain dram shop insurance and many insurers required them to submit liquor sales records, these requirements were also not uniform. second, developing and implementing such a statewide collection and audit system could not have been completed before the act’s effective date and the legislature appropriated no funds for such a project. third, a percentage of sales criterion would impose considerable reporting and recordkeeping burdens on liquor licensees, which would be exacerbated by the need for recertification. and fourth, a percentage of sales-based enforcement system would be more “cumbersome and intrusive,” especially since law enforcement officers would not be able during an on-site inspection to determine whether the establishment was a bar or a restaurant; consequently, enforcement “would be more difficult, complex, and confusing for business owners and for the public.”\textsuperscript{158}

\textsuperscript{157}public health department [641], “regulatory analysis,” \textit{lab} 31(6):644-56 at 654 (sept. 10, 2008). the smoke free illinois act, 410 ilcs 82/10, for example, used 10 percent as the boundary marker, but not for the same purpose as the iowa law, which appeared to be unique in banning smoking in outdoor restaurants. the florida law used 10 percent to define exempt stand-alone bars. florida statutes §§ 386.203(11) and 386.2045(4) (2008).

\textsuperscript{158}public health department [641], “regulatory analysis,” \textit{lab} 31(6):644-56 at 654-55 (sept. 10, 2008). the third and fourth reasons adduced by idph, if empirically sound, might have weakened a counter-proposal that the agency should have issued a rule setting a maximum proportion (for example, 10 percent) of total sales accounted for by food; then, if a complaint were filed against the bar for patio smoking, the bar owner would have borne the burden of producing data showing that the bar’s food sales fell below the regulatory threshold and that it was therefore exempt. idph would not have had to collect statewide data, and individual bar owners, who could be presumed to know what

3533
Representative Horbach, who harbored no doubt whatsoever that IDPH had chosen the type-of-food-preparation criterion over percentage-of-sales precisely because it (correctly) believed that it would result in fewer outdoor patios’ being legally available for smoking, discredited these arguments as IDPH’s “blowing smoke.” He insisted that the data were readily available because all bars and restaurants rang up alcohol and food charges separately on their cash registers. Moreover, all companies writing dram shop insurance policies collected such data, using them to require higher premiums of establishments with the highest proportion of alcohol and the lowest proportion of food sales on the grounds that their customers were more likely to become drunk and engage in acts the injurious consequences of which might be charged back to the insured bars.159 (Asked about Horbach’s claims, Mapes observed: “As far as I am aware, no state agency collects any information on percentage of food versus alcohol sales—and we did research this. I am not aware of how the individual businesses’ cash registers work.”)160 In contrast, Senator Courtney, who observed that legislators had not given thought to any fixed percentage of sales because they believed that they were passing a bill that banned smoking indoors and only in “major eateries”

---

159 Telephone interview with Lance Horbach, Tama (Aug. 16, 2009).
160 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Aug. 17, 2009). In response to bar owners’ self-generous proposal that 51-percent food sales be the trigger for patio smoking bans Mapes had previously stated that it “wouldn’t work because there’s ‘no system across the state for us to collect that information.’” Jennifer Jacobs, “Panel Rejects Challenge of Smoking Rule,” DMR, Dec. 10, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com. According to the ABD official in charge of the Division’s alcohol regulatory matters and drafting its regulations: “I can’t believe that any one person has information about the configuration of cash registers in approximately 5,000 on-premises licensees. In the Proposed Decision, Plaza Pantry, the City of Des Moines asked an auditor from Revenue & Finance to audit the sales to determine whether the licensee was compliant with a local ordinances requiring a specified ratio of alcohol and non-alcohol sales. The auditor found that the licensee had to enter each sale by hand, leaving it to the person making the sale to enter the type of sale. Additionally, tobacco and alcohol sales were recorded in one category. Granted, Plaza Pantry was an off-premises account, but I can’t believe recordkeeping to be much different in on-premises establishments. Insurance companies retain auditors on staff to audit the books and records of on-premises licensees in an effort to get an honest ‘take’ on the amount of alcohol sold in an establishment. The ratio of alcohol to food sales is just one of several rating criteria used by the companies and each company has a different rating scale. The information obtained by the insurance companies is considered proprietary information and generally not available to anyone outside the company.” Email from Judy Seib to Lynn Walding forwarded to Marc Linder (Aug. 19, 2009).
outdoors, expressed the opinion that IDPH officials honestly felt that the percentage-of-sales data were not trackable with the resources available to the agency."

Potentially the most consequential intervention at the session was the angry appearance of Representative McKinley Bailey (the only legislator present who was not an ARRC member), who had morphed into pro-smoking bar owners’ savior. Unequivocally, Bailey declared that in his mind and those of all of the score of legislators to whom he had spoken about the definition of a bar: “This is an absolute perversion of the legislative intent.” He related that when he had tried to persuade other legislators to vote against the bill, they told him that people would be able to smoke on patios. Consequently, these rules made liars out of him and others, who in addition had told bar owners to go ahead and build patios. As far as he was concerned, a bar was a place where more beer and liquor were sold than food—the commonsense definition for which he and others had voted. Not only was the department’s definition plain wrong, but, Bailey asserted, a number of legislators had stated that they would not have voted for the bill if they had known that IDPH would issue such a rule. In contrast, Republican committee member Linda Upmeyer, a hard-line opponent of H.F. 2212, stated that the rules were “exactly what” Olson, Mascher, and Petersen “told the Republican caucus it [the law] was going to look like.”

Bailey did not announce the next step on his action agenda, but, based on his performance at the ARRC meeting, rumors began circulating that he might be organizing a group to fight for a 21-and-over amendment in 2009, and on the eve of the law’s going into effect he declared that he would urge revision, if possible in a special session. (Even before the law went into effect, House Minority Leader Christopher Rants had predicted that a concerted effort to repeal casino coverage would be successful in 2009, but that at the same time an attempt would be made to add an exemption such as for age-restricted bars.) For the benefit of the ARRC members and the assembled news media—whose 161 Telephone interview with Thomas Courtney, Burlington (Aug. 16, 2009).

162 On Bailey’s activities regarding H.F. 2212 while the legislature was considering it, see above ch. 35.
163 Administrative Rules Review Committee meeting (June 11, 2008) (audio tape provided by ARRC legal counsel Joseph Royce).
166 Telephone interview with Christopher Rants, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).
characterization of these tirades as mere requests for “some wiggle room in implementing new rules” did not quite capture their tone—some irate bar owners denounced the proposed definition, asserting, for example, that it was ludicrous to classify a bar, three to six percent of whose sales stemmed from food, as a restaurant. Other bar owners in attendance went off on various tangents. Joe Sturgis, the amateur oncologist who doubled as owner of the Rusty Nail in Davenport, now turned seer as well, predicting not only that the new law would “crucify” a lot of people, but also that gasoline would cost five dollars a gallon by July 1. Bill Duncan, the owner of a Fort Madison bar, 90 percent of whose customers allegedly smoked, accused the authorities of the mean-spirited act of forcing him to commit financial suicide. In particular, he purported to be scared of the scheme that permitted citizens to police the law, thus turning people against people.

Bar owners, in the words of a summary prepared by the Legislative Services Agency staff, contended that “during the legislative process they were assured that outdoor smoking at bars was protected. They further stated that the percentage of business from food sales is very small and that using [a] percentage as a basis of the definition of bar is the appropriate measure. Department representatives...noted that use of a percentage would greatly expand the availability of the exemption. Committee members supported the position of the bar operators, contending that legislators understood that generally speaking the outdoor areas of a bar were not going to be subject to the smoking ban. Members urged the Department to revise the definition to exclude bars that provided a limited food service.” However, because ARRC reviewed the proposal only for informational purposes, it took no formal action.

IDPH’s policy-making body, the Iowa State Board of Health, which is empowered to adopt regulations, was scheduled to adopt the emergency rules on June 11 following the ARRC meeting, but as a result of the monumental floods devastating the state, the meeting was cancelled.

As the July 1 effective date of the Smokefree Air Act approached, COBRA’s leaders appeared to be losing their tenuous purchase on politico-jurisprudential reality. Agreeing with pro-smoking forces in other states that were “‘coming to a wall’” in litigation, Jonathan Van Roekel declared that COBRA had “decided to forgo attempting to gain a level playing field at the state level and intend to create a unified front against smoking bans by taking the fight nationwide and declaring the matter a personal property rights issue.” Van Roekel, who now added federal constitutional law to his multiple areas of expertise—he intended to attend law school to specialize in constitutional law—envisioned oral argument before the U.S. Supreme Court (which had “issued previous rulings siding with property owners regarding personal property rights issues”) at which COBRA’s lawyers would intone: “‘They cannot tell you what you can and cannot do with your own personal property, within reason.’” Perhaps in order to distinguish his fantasy from that of capitalists opposed to wage and hour and safety and health regulations, he reverted to his unique oncological insights: “currently, studies have not shown a positive link between secondhand smoke exposure and cancer in a work-related environment.” Imagining how well spent the “millions of dollars” would be that COBRA and its counterparts in other states would have to raise for this Supreme Court litigation, Van Roekel fantasized that “if information attesting to that [lack of evidence of the aforementioned link] can be introduced into a court of law, it would remove the foundation of the smoking ban argument and the ban would be overturned.”

The June 11 Board of Health meeting that had been cancelled was rescheduled for June 27. The previous day, House Speaker Pro Tempore Polly Bukta, who had been apologizing to bar owners in an effort to ward off Jonathan Van Roekel’s challenge for her Clinton seat, sent an email (“Importance: High”) to IDPH Director Newton in her newly fashioned capacity as her bar-owning constituents’ advocate:

Please make it clear for the bar owners who serve food, and wish to use the patio they have gone to the expense of building in preparation for the ban on smoking what they can do and cannot do. Rather than using the terms ‘packaged food,’ or ‘incidental’, why not make it a percentage of profits from food? I, and many of the bar owners in my district[,] have NO problem with going smoke free, but feel that they are being put at an unfair advantage [sic] because they have a grill and so [sic] some sandwich making on site. A bar next door or in very close vicinity may smoke on their patio because they serve only packaged food. Why differentiate between those with packaged food or food cooked on site when the food will be consumed in an outdoor area which the law said can be used to smoke? There will be no smoking where the food is prepared. We made the law. We must be fair to those whom we have subjected to obeying the law. I believe that the definition [sic] between what is a restaurant and what is a bar is ambiguous and outdated, and should be cleared up at the next Rules meeting. Please be reasonable and considerate of those business owners who are willing to abide by the law, and allow them to stay in business.

\footnote{172}{Http://www.demwebs.com/smoke/leaders.html (visited July 7, 2009).}

Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

An hour later Newton replied to her pleading. Rather than pointing to the inconsistency between Bukta’s acceptance of responsibility for having made the law and her ignorance of the fact that it was that law that used “incidental,” he merely informed her that her comments would be entered into the public record and added that IDPH recognized that there might be a need to amend the rules based on the public comments.

On June 27, two days after House Minority Leader Rants had encouraged IDPH to “get off its rear end,” the Board held an electronic meeting, at which it unanimously adopted and filed emergency the IDPH’s rules, whose effective date of July 1 coincided with the Act’s. To be sure, the process had not yet run its course because the Department was also proceeding with the adoption of rules 175 Email from Polly Bukta to Tom Newton (June 26, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH).

176 Email from Tom Newton to Polly Bukta (June 26, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH). Bukta’s public comment as logged by IDPH later that day was somewhat different: “Please clear up the ambiguity of the definition of a bar and a restaurant by exchanging the words food as an incidental or packaged to a percentage of food served to qualify the establishment as a restaurnat [sic] or bar. Iowans’ health would still be protected if food cooked on site were served on the patios, (which, by the way, bar owners have gone to considerable expense to build) because it would be a choice to eat outdoors [sic] with smoking, or indoors where there would be no smoke. I don’t agree with this fine line drawn on packaged food, or food cooked on site, and maybe that could be changed.” Polly Bukta (June 26, 2008), in IDPH, “SAA-Rules Comments” at 30-31 (CD provided by IDPH). Bukta was the only legislator whose public comment on the rules itself was logged.

by means of the non-emergency standard rule-making process as ARRC chair Senator Michael Connolly reminded Iowans, following the completion of public hearings in August the agency could still revise the rules.

Those five regional public hearings took place on August 20, 21, and 22 through the Iowa Communications Network originating on each date in one of five cities (Iowa City, Waterloo, Des Moines, Council Bluffs, and Sioux City); the hearings were also accessible for teleconferencing participation in fixed locations in several cities and towns in each region (totaling 27). The hearings’ potential usefulness for calling attention to problems with the rules was in large part subverted by the fact that, despite Bonnie Mapes’s repeated announcements and sharp admonitions by ARRC members Representative Wise (who was retiring from the legislature) and Senator Courtney (a longtime United Auto Workers member who faced a Republican opponent for re-election who supported repeal of the law)—both of whom were participating from Burlington—the bulk of critical comments pertained not to the rules, which 180 Jason Clayworth, “Smoking Ban Near, But Rules Aren’t Set,” DMR, June 25, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com. IDPH announced that it would consider all written comments received through August 22, 2008, the day on which the last of five regional public hearings were scheduled. IAB 31(3):312-13 (July 30, 2008) (ARC 6990B).

---

182 A certain sterility resulted from Mapes’s rule, enunciated at the outset, that she would not respond to comments and that no debate (between speakers) was allowed. Iowa Department of Public Health, Public Hearing for Amendments to Proposed Rules to the Smokefree Air Act (Aug. 20, 2008) (based on notes taken at the Iowa City site).
183 See above this ch. Later Courtney welcomed revocation of Larry Duncan’s liquor license: “This is a great day for restaurant and bar owners in our community who are playing by the rules.” William Petroski, “Bar Loses Liquor License over Smoking Ban,” DMR, Apr. 9, 2009, on http://m.desmoinesregister.com/news.jsp?key=442386&rc=ln (visited Aug. 15, 2009).
were the only subject of the hearings, but to the Act itself, over which IDPH had no jurisdiction. Wise may have been “frustrated” because 90 percent of speakers did not talk about the rules, but leaders of the bar-owner rebellion reveled in repeating their already well-known denunciations such as Larry Duncan’s that Iowans, without any input, had had the ban rammed down their throats. Ironically, however, whatever articulateness and legitimacy the heroically outraged bar owners such as Duncan and Joe Sturgis may have lacked for their claims that the whole law was unconstitutional was more than compensated for by Wise (one of the bill’s strongest supporters) and Courtney, who echoed the arguments of some other attending bar owners—and thus parted company with some non-bar-owning nonsmokers who commented that patios should be smokefree—that the rules regarding smoking on outdoor patios had gone further than the statute and urged the Department to take a hard look at the rule governing this particular location. Mapes, who had strictly complied with her own rule against commenting, offered what was by far the most interesting comment—but only during an informal one-on-one conversation at the Iowa City Public Library with the microphone turned off—in observing that the inconvenience of having to walk long distances to smoke and the resulting nonsmoking was a good outcome of the smoking ban, but that the agency did not want to appear coercive.

185 Quite a few of the off-topic comments stemmed not from bar owners, but enraged and inarticulate smokers who, inter alia, denounced “cigarette Nazis.” Iowa Department of Public Health, Public Hearing for Amendments to Proposed Rules to the Smokefree Air Act (Aug. 20, 2008) (based on notes taken at the Iowa City site).

186 Iowa Department of Public Health, Public Hearing for Amendments to Proposed Rules to the Smokefree Air Act (Aug. 20, 2008) (based on notes taken at the Iowa City site).

187 Iowa Department of Public Health, Public Hearing for Amendments to Proposed Rules to the Smokefree Air Act (Aug. 20, 2008) (based on notes taken at the Iowa City site). When asked later whether his concern had related to IDPH’s use of type of food preparation rather than a percentage of sales as the criterion, Wise replied: “The legislature did not indicate that a percentage of food revenue or of liquor revenue should be used. In fact, the IDPH looked at that issue and determined that it would be impossible to implement such a formula. That is why the IDPH focused on the food preparation issue.” Email from Phil Wise to Marc Linder (Aug. 17, 2009). Wise and Courtney would have taken the position that the legislature did not authorize IDPH to ban smoking altogether on bar patios. Some attendees urged IDPH to create a distance rule to deal with this problem, but since the legislature had deleted both a 50- and a 10-foot distance ban from H.F. 2212, the agency’s power to impose one would have been dubious. See above ch. 35.

188 Interview with Bonnie Mapes, Iowa City Public Library (Aug. 20, 2008, 11:15
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

Though comparable to Wise and Courtney’s estimate of the proportion of irrelevant comments made at the public hearings, it was nevertheless astonishing that, in the course of the rule-making process, of the 1,090 public comments that IDPH received on its website between June 2 and September 30, 2008, only 125, or little more than one-tenth, specifically concerned the rules. Of these, 36 were general comments in support of the rules (many of which were cheer-leading animated by health organizations such as the American Cancer Society). Of the 70 that dealt with specific provisions in the rules, almost half (30) dealt with serving of food incidental to the consumption of alcoholic beverages (12 of which focused on the issue of food sales as a percentage of total bar sales); the only other provision to garner double-digit comments was the size of nosmoking signs required for vehicles (15); five comments each were submitted on the “grounds of any public building” and notices of violation.189 In contrast to the 41 pages of rules-related comments, the 358 pages of off-point emails were replete with obscene personal attacks (“You fucking fascists”), political nonsense (“This is the most communistic law I have ever known of in Iowa”), and historical nonsense (“Keep in mind the only society that banned smoking was Natzie Germany”), that Senator Courtney, based on his having smoked 35-40 years earlier, interpreted as revealing the hold that tobacco had on smokers.190

On October 13, the day before ARRC was scheduled to discuss the IDPH rules, the agency announced its proposals to amend them. Although the Department yielded no ground to bar owners on the most explosive issue—the definition of “bar”—it did make two concessions with regard to enforcement procedures about which their lawyers had been complaining. First, the amended rule inserted “potential” into “written notice of violation” (153.8(8)(a)); and second, it made the description of agency actions after third and subsequent complaints consistent with that of those after second complaints (153.8 (8)(c)). The latter change in particular weakened enforcement. In response to many complaints from employers, IDPH significantly reduced the size of no-smoking signs required for vehicles (153.5(1)(e)). In order to preempt opponents’

189IDPH, “Iowa Smokefree Air Act: Summary of Administrative Rule Comments, June 2-September 30, 2008,” on http://www.iowasmokefreeair.gov/common/pdf/comment_summary.pdf (visited Aug. 16, 2009). To be sure, only very few comments on the meaning of “incidental” were concrete and practical. See e.g., IDPH, “SAA-Rules Comments” at 20-21 (CD provided by IDPH) 190IDPH, “SAA-Non-Rules Comments” at 210, 177, 287 (CD provided by IDPH) (two of these three commenters identified themselves).

191Telephone interview with Thomas Courtney, Burlington (Aug. 16, 2009).
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

(baseless) claims that “public buildings” in the statutory term “grounds of any public buildings owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions” could confusingly comprehend privately owned buildings that were “public places,” IDPH added a definition of a “public building” as an “enclosed area owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions” (153.2). The only change that did not constitute a concession to owners of public places and/or employers and possibly strengthened enforcement was authorizing complainants to file anonymously (153.8(5)). Once the Department had refused to accommodate bar owners on the definition of “bar” and thus on the scope of lawful patio smoking—thus remitting them to legislative recourse—the most contentious issue facing the agency was the definition of “grounds of any public buildings,” which IDPH proposed amending by excluding “a sidewalk in the public right-of-way” (153.2).

How and why this particular proposal came to the forefront sheds interesting light on the way the Iowa Department of Public Health formulated public policy by writing a definitional rule dispositively interpreting the scope of the legislature’s intent to interdict smoking on the grounds of state and local government buildings. In order to understand this amendment, it is necessary to go back to a complaint that was filed under the first version of the rules against the City of Iowa City for its failure to post no-smoking signs on the sidewalk in front of city hall. Iowa’s expansive and unique state law prohibited smoking in a number of “outdoor areas” including “[t]he grounds of any public buildings owned, leased, or operated by or under the control of the state government or its political subdivisions....” The IDPH emergency rules, which went into effect on July 1, defined such grounds, in pertinent part, to mean “an outdoor area of a public building that is used in connection with the building, including but not limited to a sidewalk immediately adjacent to the building....” Because the sidewalk in front of Iowa City city hall satisfied these definitional criteria, the city government was violating the Smokefree Air Act by failing to post no-smoking signs “at every entrance” to this smoking-prohibited outdoor area.\footnote{H.F. 2212 § 6(3) (2008)/Iowa Code § 142D.6(3) (2008).} Far from being unexpected, the omission by the city government, which enjoyed an undeserved reputation as a radical foe of smoking, was consistent with a history of and contemporaneous disregard for protecting nonsmokers from secondhand smoke.\footnote{See above ch. 33.}

192IDPH, “Proposed Amendments to Smokefree Air Act Administrative Rules” (Oct. 13, 2008). The exclusion of sidewalks in the public right-of-way was also inserted into the definition of “entrance.” Anonymity was recommended by other departments that did act on anonymous complaints, which are an especially important aspect of enforcement regarding employees who wished to deal with workplace matters. Fred Love, “Public Health Proposes Smoking Ban Amendments,” WC, Oct. 15, 2008, on http://www.wcfcourier.com/articles/2008/10/15/news/breaking_news/doc48f5c37c6f920333790763.txt (visited Aug. 23, 2009).

Nor was the failure to post inadvertent. On June 5, the city attorney had issued a memorandum to the city council, city manager, and lesser city officials summarizing the Smokefree Air Act’s direct applicability to cities and answering questions that city staff had posed. In response to a question as to whether it was lawful to “smoke on the sidewalk in front of City Hall,” the attorney asserted without explanation: “Yes. The sidewalk is right-of-way, and right-of-way is not the grounds of a public building.”\footnote{Eleanor Dilkes to City Council et al., Re: Smokefree Air Act n.p. [at 3] (June 5, 2008) (copy furnished by Iowa City Legal Dept).} To be sure, the city attorney was well aware, as she observed in correcting a city councillor’s false claim to the contrary, “you do have the right to prohibit it in the right-of-way, but that would be a designation by you. It’s not prohibited by the statute.” In other words, by virtue of the city’s ownership of all public sidewalks (“because we have control of your right-of-ways”), the city had—and had always had—the power to ban smoking on those sidewalks. The Iowa League of Cities issued a special report in July on SAA, which, being in part based on the Iowa City city attorney’s memorandum, under this section if a sign is posted conforming to the provisions of section 142D.6.” H.F. 2212 § 5(2) (2008)/Iowa Code §142D.5(2) (2009). If city plaza had been such an exempt area, the city council would not have had to adopt an ordinance prohibiting smoking on the eastern half of the plaza; all it would have had to do was post the requisite signs and the Act would have applied. The city council had to adopt an ordinance precisely because the area was neither covered nor exempt by the state law, thus permitting the city to subject its own land to its own local law. To be sure, the ordinance mistakenly states that “[p]ursuant to HF 2212, section 5..., the city declares the following areas to be smoke free places,” and then enumerates numerous such places including part of city plaza. Iowa City, Iowa, City Code § 6-10-1.C (Sept. 9, 2008), on http://www.sterlingcodifiers.com/codebook/index.php?book_id=320. However, if the city’s power to ban smoking in city plaza had derived from the Act, then presumably the city would have lacked the power to impose on smokers a civil penalty of $100, $200, and $500, for first, second, and third and additional offenses, respectively, as opposed to the Act’s flat $50 penalty. Id. § 6-10-2.
Administrative Rules for Barkeepers’ Challenge to Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

The city attorney’s confusion may also explain why she (falsely) believed that the city was required to comply with the Act’s signage requirements in city plaza, when in fact it was subject to no such requirements. The Iowa League of Cities lawyer-lobbyist, who had never reflected on these interconnections, found this analysis persuasive. Telephone interview with Jessica Harder, Des Moines (Aug. 20, 2009). Section 5(1) also generated a counterintuitive result in light of repeated assurances by legislators that the bill did not apply to private residences: because the latter were expressly exempt, their owners could subject them to coverage by posting the requisite signage. The director of the Division of Tobacco Use Prevention and Control confirmed this outcome: “If a homeowner posted a Smoke-free Air Act sign in their own home and someone smoked in their home, they would then have the responsibilities of any proprietor—inform the smoker they need to stop or leave and then call the police if the person doesn’t comply. Law enforcement has the authority to issue citations to individual smokers.” Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Sept. 24, 2009).

198 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 23 (June 23, 2008), on http://www.icgov.org/transcriptions/620.pdf. The city attorney stated more generally that she agreed that the city had authority to ban smoking on city-owned land that was not the grounds of a public building. Email from Eleanor Dilkes to Marc Linder (Aug. 25, 2008).

199 Transcription of Iowa City City Council Special Work Session Meeting at 35 (June 23, 2008).
adopted her position with respect to smoking on a sidewalk in front of city hall. However, some of the state’s larger cities did ban smoking on sidewalks in front of city-owned buildings, and the Iowa State Association of Counties issued a guide in which it furnished this answer, appropriately ignoring the issue of a right-of-way, to a question as to whether it was lawful to smoke on the sidewalk.
in front of a county courthouse: “Maybe. The test is whether the sidewalk is immediately adjacent to, and used in connection with, the public building. If so, then the sidewalk constitutes ‘the grounds of a public building’ and smoking is prohibited.”

After the assistant city attorney had peremptorily refused to discuss the lawfulness of the city government’s not posting no-smoking signs on the sidewalk in front of city hall with a city resident, the latter contacted an official of the IDPH Division of Tobacco Use Prevention and Control, who stated that the “grounds of any public buildings” included public sidewalks and characterized the issue of right-of-way as irrelevant. At the city council special formal meeting on August 26 the same resident addressed the city council at the conclusion of the Community Comment:

I want to inform the Council that the City is currently in violation of the Smoke-Free Air Act. I’ve discussed this with the State Department of Public Health, which encouraged me to file a complaint against the City, but before doing so, I wanted to discuss the matter with you and hope that you would correct the situation and we don’t have to go through the complaint process. As you know, the, um, Smoke-Free Air Act which went into effect on July 1st banned smoking on the grounds of any public buildings. The Department of Public Health issued regulations on emergency basis, defining that term, grounds of public buildings as “an outdoor area of a public area that is used in connection with the building, including but not limited to,” and then the key terms here, “a sidewalk immediately adjacent to the building” and then lists a number of other areas which aren’t of concern right now. Uh, some of these others, uh, the City has discretion, uh, to exempt. It doesn’t have, uh, discretion to exempt sidewalks. On June 5th the City Attorney issued a memo and appended to the memo, uh, was a series of questions and answers. Two of those questions and answers were: can a person lawfully smoke on a sidewalk in front of City

---

203 Discussion with Sue Dulek, Iowa City city hall (ca. Aug. 22, 2008).

204 Telephone interview with Aaron Swanson, Des Moines (Aug. 25, 2008). Early the next morning Swanson emailed that although neither the Smokefree Air Act nor its administrative rules defined “sidewalk,” “one can use the definition of ‘sidewalk’ as written in Iowa Code Section 321.1 for the purposes of defining it in the Smokefree Air Act.” Email from Aaron Swanson to Marc Linder (Aug. 26, 2008). Iowa Code § 321.1(72) (2008) defined a sidewalk as “that portion of a street between the curb lines, or the lateral lines of a roadway, and the adjacent property lines intended for the use of pedestrians.” Iowa City, City Code, § 9-1-1 is identical.
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

Hall. The answer that the City Attorney gave was: yes, because it’s a right-of-way and a right-of-way is not on the grounds of public buildings. On the other hand, a person cannot smoke, going to the other question, on the quote, this is the language in the question itself, “internal” sidewalk, for example, sidewalk, uh, leading to a parking lot because those sidewalks are immediately adjacent to and used in connection with the, uh, the public building. Now, unfortunately for this memorandum for the City, the term “sidewalk” has only one meaning. The Iowa Code has defined a sidewalk at Section 321.1, Subsection 72, and the Iowa Code of Ordinances has adopted exactly the same definition at Section 9-1-1, and this is a walk that runs from the curb line to the property line for pedestrian use. I checked a large number of leading dictionaries. Every single American English dictionary has the same definition, and more importantly, has only one definition. There is only one definition of a sidewalk, and that’s a paved path or walk for pedestrian…for pedestrians on the side of a street or road. Okay? Now, the Iowa Department of Public Health, which I contacted about this, says that this issue of right-of-way is totally irrelevant and that Section 321.1, Subsection 72, which I just cited to you, can be used as the definition for the rules, and keep in mind, please, that the Iowa Department of Health has primary jurisdiction over the, uh, administration of this statute. Now, in no fewer than 67 sections of the Iowa City Code of Ordinances is the term “sidewalk” used. Every single one of them, all of them, are consistent with the definition of sidewalk that I just gave you that’s in this State code, and is in the Iowa City Code of Ordinances. Uh, not a single one of them is consistent with the, uh, definition that the City Attorney has given with regard to “internal” sidewalks. As you can imagine from your own, uh, experience, a house owner is obligated to clear the ice and snow from the sidewalk [but] has absolutely no obligation to clear the paths, um, to the, uh, back patio from the back door. So, the City Attorney, um, is actually referring to what the rest of the, uh, world has called “walkways.” They’re not sidewalks. They’re walkways. Walkways are not addressed in the term sidewalk, uh, although smoking surely is banned on them. They are not sidewalks; by arbitrarily defining sidewalks, uh, as, uh, walkways, internal walkways, and declaring that the sidewalks that the, uh, Department of Public Health means, uh, are not covered, the City Attorney has completely turned the, uh, that part of the rule on its head. I’ve surveyed a large number of other large cities in Iowa and uh, many of them for example, Davenport, Dubuque, Des Moines, have already banned smoking on sidewalks in front of City Hall.

[Mayor] Bailey: …begin to conclude your remarks, please.

Linder: Don’t tase’ me, bro, don’t tase’ me…um, if the City Attorney’s definition were used, that would mean for example that the Public Library where the sidewalk comes up within a couple of feet of the front door of those sliding doors on Linn Street, people could smoke within a couple of feet of that door, and that clearly can’t be the purpose of the statute, especially since, uh, up until this time, there’s signs up on the doors saying that you can’t smoke within 20 feet. Now, as the…as you, Mayor, said recently, it’s not just about exposure to second-hand smoke, it’s about setting example, and surely we want to set an example, uh, in front of City Hall, and by the way, you can forget about everything I’ve just said, because it doesn’t matter whether the, um, the interpretation I’ve just given you is correct or not, because as the City Attorney has already told you, and as you’re [sic; should be “you’ve”] already done in preliminarily voting on this ordinance, you have the power to ban smoking on every sidewalk. You’ve just gone ahead and voted to ban it.
on...on the sidewalk in front of profit-making, cash register ringing stores on Clinton Street. Well, if you ban it there, you certainly have the power to ban it, uh, in front of your own building. In any case, even apart from that, there’s no doubt that the sidewalk is covered, and this is just a misinterpretation, and I would appreciate your correcting this.... [City Attorney] Dilkes: ...I don’t think Professor Linder and I have a disagreement on what sidewalk means. We have a disagreement on what “used in connection with a public building” means. 205

After the meeting the city resident asked the city attorney, who had admitted the previous day that the city did have the authority to ban smoking on city-owned land that was not the grounds of a public building, 206 a number of questions by email:

You heard my comments to the city council this evening on Iowa City’s being out of compliance with the Smokefree Air Act by virtue of permitting smoking on the sidewalk used in connection with and immediately adjacent to city hall.

Do you have any basis for reading “sidewalk” out of the IDPH rule other than that adduced in your June 5 memo—namely, that “[t]he sidewalk is a right-of-way, and right-of-way is not the grounds of a public building”? Isn’t virtually every sidewalk around a government bldg a right of way? In that respect isn’t the sidewalk on Washington St in front of city hall thoroughly typical of sidewalks in general and of those in front of city halls and other government bldgs in particular? And isn’t the Iowa Attorney General’s office, which drafted the rules, to be presumed to be aware of what a sidewalk is? If so, what authorizes you to read the term out of the rule (in such a general way as to nullify it, if other cities adopted your approach, statewide) and to substitute for it “‘internal’ sidewalks”?

Please keep in mind that my comments also refer to other city buildings, including and especially the public library, where the sidewalk runs barely a few feet away from the front doors on Linn St. [A]lthough this issue is distinct, why haven’t you advised the city council that, even apart from the “grounds of any public buildings” provision, it can also ban smoking on the sidewalk in front of city hall on the same basis that you advised the council it has for banning smoking in front of privately owned stores on Clinton St—namely, that the city owns the sidewalks? 207

206 Email from Marc Linder to Eleanor Dilkes (Aug. 20, 2008) and Eleanor Dilkes to Marc Linder (Aug. 25, 2008).

207 Email from Marc Linder to Eleanor Dilkes (and Mike Wright, Amy Correia, Regenia Bailey, Matt Hayek, and Ross Wilburn [the other two city councillors not having
The city attorney replied that:

My opinion is that sidewalks that are located in the public right-of-way (public sidewalks) are not part of the “grounds” of a public building. Public rights of way are not an “area of a public building.” Rather, they are those areas of the streets and sidewalks between the adjacent property lines that are dedicated to public use. The public sidewalk that surrounds City Hall is not part of the City Hall property. The City could not use the sidewalk to expand City Hall, could not restrict the public from walking on the sidewalk and could not sell the sidewalk without first going through the public process of vacating the rights of the public to use the sidewalk. The line of demarcation between the grounds of City Hall and the public sidewalk is as clear as that between the private property and the sidewalk in front of a house. The owner of the house might use the sidewalk but that does not make it part of his property.

This opinion is consistent with that of the Iowa League of Cities.

Finally, you asked why I have not advised the City Council that they could ban smoking on the sidewalk in front of City Hall. I have advised the Council that although the statute does not prohibit smoking on public rights-of-way they have the authority to designate City right-of-way as nonsmoking. Indeed, the ordinance that received first reading last night includes right-of-way. I have not specifically discussed the sidewalk in front of City Hall with the Council because to date it is not one of the areas they have expressed an interest in regulating.\(^\text{208}\)

The resident then asked IDPH and an assistant attorney general who had drafted the agency’s rules whether the appended city attorney’s straightforward statement that the sidewalk was not part of the grounds of city hall sufficed as a basis for a complaint or whether it was necessary to “go through the formality of recording the date and time of my observation of someone smoking on that sidewalk?”\(^\text{209}\) Mapes then queried her co-recipients: “Who is going to reply to this one? Matt, what do you think about the City’s argument? It might help us in our response to him.”\(^\text{210}\) The next day one of Mapes’s subordinates sent this concise and ambiguous response: “The complaint process is intended to find and respond to violations of the law, not to interpret disagreements with how the law is applied. If you see what you believe is a violation of the Smokefree Air Act, please submit a complaint....”\(^\text{211}\) With admirable prescience the would-be \(^{208}\)Email from Eleanor Dilkes to Marc Linder (Aug. 27, 2008).

\(^{209}\)Email from Marc Linder to Matt Gannon, Bonnie Mapes, Brent Saron, Aaron Swanson, and Jeremy Whitaker (Aug. 27, 2008).

\(^{210}\)Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder, Matt Gannon, Brent Saron, Aaron Swanson, and Jeremy Whitaker (Aug. 28, 2008).

\(^{211}\)Email from Aaron Swanson to Marc Linder (Aug. 29, 2008).
complainant asked: “Does your response mean that the idph has not yet decided whether the city attorney’s interpretation is wrong. Idph isn’t intending to delete “sidewalk” from its definition of “grounds of any public bldgs” is it?”  And then later the same day he asked: “The city attorney has thrown down the gauntlet with her interpretation claiming that the idph sidewalk rule is on its face invalid—why not just deal with it directly?” Having received no reply to any of these questions, the resident filed the complaint, which, in order to deal with the ambiguity of IDPH’s initial response, included a report of observation of actual smoking on the sidewalk in addition to the lack of signs.

Not having received any information about the agency’s action on the complaint for more than a month, the Iowa City resident first pointed out to Mapes and her subordinates that “[a]ccording to your website, ‘The Iowa Department of Public Health, Division of Tobacco Use Prevention & Control will notify the proprietor of the public place or place of employment and/or coordinate a site visit within 15 days after receipt of a complaint,’” and then asked: Did IDPH notify the city/coordinate site visit? What is the next step and when will it happen?

The next day, IDPH official Brent Saron replied: “What sidewalk in particular did you observe the people smoking? Was it the sidewalk that runs parallel to Washington Street? Or did you observe people smoking on the sidewalk that leads directly to the doorway entrance to city hall?” These irrelevant questions prompted the following response:

There is no walkway leading directly to the door (which would not be a “sidewalk”); they were smoking on the only sidewalk there—the one that runs parallel to Washington street. If there were a walkway as you asked about running from the sidewalk to the door, it would be perpendicular and not “adjacent” to the public bldg. ...

Why is the nature of this sidewalk relevant? You and I both know what this complaint is really about: the city attorney of iowa city has interpreted your rule out of existence on a statewide basis by claiming that no sidewalk that is a right of way (and that means virtually every public sidewalk) can be part of the grounds of a public bldg. Why can’t idph deal with this question directly and resolve it in principle for all the state’s thousands of sidewalks immediately adjacent to public bldgs?

---

212 Email from Marc Linder to Aaron Swanson (Aug. 29, 2008).
213 Email from Marc Linder to Aaron Swanson (Aug. 29, 2008).
214 Confirmation receipt from IowaSmokefreeAir.gov, in public_complaint@iowasmokefreeair.gov to Marc Linder (Aug. 29, 2008).
215 Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes, Aaron Swanson, Brent Saron, Matt Gannon, and Jeremy Whitaker (Sept. 30, 2008).
216 Email from Brent Saron to Marc Linder (Oct. 1, 2008).
217 Email from Marc Linder to Brent Saron (Oct. 1, 2008).
After failing to acknowledge let alone respond to these questions or several reminder-emails for more than a week, on October 10, Saron finally sent this astonishing response:

[B]ased upon your original complaint, I assumed you were referring to the sidewalk that runs parallel to Washington (that spans between Van Buren and Gilbert Streets). I spoke with the Iowa City Attorney’s Office to verify whether or not this area is included within their “grounds,” and they confirmed that this area is not within the prohibition described in 142D.3(2)(e).

Thank you for your attentiveness, and your efforts to make us aware of potential violations.

IDPH’s almost humorous “Case Closed” announcement triggered this critique, which was also copied to the leading legislative supporters of H.F. 2212 and the Attorney General’s Office:

Let me get this straight: You the enforcement agency have totally farmed out interpretation of your OWN rules to the entities you’re charged with regulating? If a customer at a local restaurant complains about smoking and the owner claims that it’s an exempt casino, instead of investigating you leave it up to the owner to “confirm” that it’s an exempt casino and that’s the end of the complaint? Does the department of labor instead of interpreting its own regulations leave it up to complained-about employers to “confirm” that they are exempt from the minimum wage law? Does the dept of justice leave it up to general motors to “confirm” that it’s not covered by the antitrust laws?

If you decide to become an enforcement agency, you will actually have to deal with the substance of the city attorney’s excuse that a sidewalk is not a sidewalk. a public sidewalk (running from curb to property line in front of a public building) is the only definition of “sidewalk” in the iowa code or the iowa city code of ordinances. “adjacent” does NOT mean perpendicular. If the idph rule defining grounds of public buildings had

---

218 Email from Marc Linder to Brent Saron (Oct. 1, 6, and 9, 2008); email from Brent Saron to Marc Linder (Oct. 9, 2008) (claiming his computer had misplaced the emails).

219 Email from Brent Saron to Marc Linder (Oct. 10, 2008). It is not clear whether Saron incorrectly stated in this email that he had already spoken to the Iowa City Attorney’s Office or whether the email quoted below was manufactured to simulate a record (albeit an inconsistent one), but on Oct. 13 the Iowa City assistant city attorney emailed Saron that it was her understanding that a complaint had been filed about smoking on the sidewalk in front of city hall, adding: “It is the City’s position that the Act does not prohibit smoking on this sidewalk because it is not part of the ‘grounds’ of a public building.” Email from Sue Dulek to Brent Saron, Oct. 13, 2008 (copy furnished by IDPH).
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

meant “walkway” it would have said walkway and not sidewalk.\textsuperscript{220}

Mapes sought to defend her agency’s procedure:

IDPH and the AG’s office considered the opinion of the Iowa City attorney about the sidewalk in question being a public right-of-way, and we concur with the city attorney’s opinion.

When staff communicated with you to confirm your complaint, you stated that smoking was not occurring on either of the walks leading from the public sidewalk to the entrances to the courthouse [sic; should be “city hall”]. You observed smoking on the city sidewalk which is adjacent to E. Washington St. The Rules allow cities some discretion in determining what constitutes the grounds of public buildings under their control. In this case, the city attorney determined that the sidewalk adjacent to E. Washington Street is a public right-of-way and is not a sidewalk used in connection with the building and, therefore, is not part of the grounds of that public building.

Since this sidewalk can reasonably be described as a public right-of-way and is not used in connection with the building, we made the determination that smoking on that public sidewalk would not be a violation of the Smokefree Air Act.

Since neither the law nor the rules can anticipate every possible situation, we often confer with government entities, businesses, and others in the process of making a determination of whether or not a violation has occurred. Far from abrogating our responsibility to enforce the Smokefree Air Act, such consultations and discussions are necessary to carrying out that responsibility as reasonably and as effectively as possible.\textsuperscript{221}

That IDPH had in fact ceded control over its enforcement to its municipal regulatees was expressly conceded by Saron 10 days later in an email to the Iowa City assistant city attorney who had asked him about the status of the complaint\textsuperscript{222}:

Hi Sue—based upon the information in the complaint, and the follow-up that was conducted with the complainant and with your office, we have determined that this particular complaint was invalid.

As you can imagine, every single city hall in Iowa is unique, thus 142D.3(2)(e) applies differently to each unique situation. As such, IDPH has not [sic] other alternative but to rely on and trust decisions that your city has made regarding outdoor areas that are used in connection with your city hall.\textsuperscript{223}

\textsuperscript{220}Email from Marc Linder to Brent Saron and Bonnie Mapes (cc: Thomas H. Miller, Matt Gannon, Janet Petersen, Tyler Olson, Philip Wise, and Matt McCoy) (Oct. 10, 2008).

\textsuperscript{221}Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Oct. 10, 2008).

\textsuperscript{222}Email from Sue Dulek to Brent Saron (Oct. 13, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH).

\textsuperscript{223}Email from Brent Saron to Sue Dulek (Oct. 20, 2008) (copy furnished by IDPH). That Saron was not acting as a rogue employee in stating IDPH’s policy of abdicating its Mapes’s defense prompted yet another critique, the concluding prescience of which would soon surprise even its author:

What investigation did you do? How do you know the sidewalk is not “used in connection with” the bldg? All you’ve done is taken the city attorney’s word for it. Go look for yourself. What does “used in connection with” mean? I use the sidewalk in connection with the bldg every time I enter city hall as have uncounted thousands of other people. Since the rule does not define “used in connection with,” how can the city attorney know whether the sidewalk is so used? That’s for you to determine—you shld revise your rule to rule out such interpretations that exacerbate exposure to secondhand smoke.

Conferring and consulting doesn’t mean leaving the decision up to the regulatee. You’ve made no independent investigation whatsoever—all you’ve done is taken the regulatee’s word for it and you have therefore failed to perform the duty the legislature has assigned to you and exacerbated the exposure to secondhand smoke of people trying to enter/leave city hall.

Are you saying that no sidewalk that is a right of way is part of the grounds of a public building regardless of whether it’s used in connection with the bldg? That was the city attorney’s position—is that your position? If so, pls show me one sidewalk in front of a public bldg in Iowa that is not a right of way. The sidewalk in front of the public library in IC extends to within about 3 feet of the front door—it’s a right of way—is it also not “used in connection with”?

The city attorney’s interpretation has in effect read the word “sidewalk” out of your rule statewide and you have acquiesced in it without undertaking even the most cursory investigation of the facts—are you now going to delete the word from the rule? If not, pls identify any “sidewalk” in Iowa that would meet your rule’s definition.

Mapes’s response rendered prescience as to IDPH’s conservative agenda

---

-emails and comments from Aaron Swanson, Marc Linder, Bonnie Mapes, Brent Saron, Thomas H. Miller, Matt Gannon, Janet Petersen, Tyler Olson, Philip Wise, and Matt McCoy.
superfluous:

We reviewed an areal [sic] photo of city hall and other information before we made our determination.

And “sidewalk” has not been ruled out statewide, as you contend. There are sidewalks on the grounds of public buildings all across the state that have been determined by the authority having control of those buildings to be part of the grounds—sidewalks which are clearly used in connection with that building and are not primarily used as a public thoroughfare. 225

The reply drew out the logical implications of IDPH’s position:

The city attorney’s interpretation might be plausible IF AND ONLY IF your rule read:
“used EXCLUSIVELY in connection with.” It’s clear that the sidewalk in front of city hall is used by people to walk into city hall and to walk past city hall. Because your rule does NOT say “exclusively,” the sidewalk is without any doubt “used in connection with” the bldg. QED.

Do you mean it to be used “exclusively”? if so, you would have to revise the definition or issue an interpretation to that effect. But why would you mean it that way? 226

And a follow-up reply on October 13 explained why the substantive change that IDPH had introduced sub rosa could not stand under Iowa administrative law without new rulemaking:

You failed to respond to most of my questions, and I repeat my request for answers to them. But right now I request that you specifically identify (i.e., name the bldg, street, and city location of) any sidewalk on the grounds of any public bldg anywhere in Iowa that meets your new definition below. I find it difficult to imagine any sidewalk that would meet your new definition other than the thoroughly atypical one of a public bldg located on a dead-end street.

As brief and inadequate as your response was, it did let the cat out of the bag—by adding the language “not PRIMARILY used as a public thoroughfare” to “used in connection with.” Since the word “primarily” is not found in the rule, you have now revealed that you have changed the definition and radically shrunk the scope of the definition in your rules by means of INTERPRETATION.

As you must be aware, the Iowa Adm Procedure Act (17A.2(11)) defines a rule this way: “Rule” means each agency statement of general applicability that implements, INTERPRETS, or prescribes law or policy…. And you are also aware that under 17A.4(1) you are required to go through the notice and comment rulemaking procedure

---

225 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Oct. 10, 2008).
226 Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (cc: Brent Saron, Thomas H. Miller, when you adopt or amend such a “rule.”

In connection with that rulemaking I look forward to the opportunity to submit comments on your proposed rule, which clearly has the effect of exposing more rather than fewer people to secondhand smoke. In explaining the reasons for your action will you be denying that IDPH has the power to define the grounds of a public building as including a sidewalk that is used (but not primarily) in connection with and is immediately adjacent to that building?227

IDPH, however, was literally one step ahead of its critic: that very day (October 13), in connection with the following day’s ARRC meeting, Mapes “prepared” “Proposed Amendments to Smokefree Air Act Administrative Rules,” which amended the definition of “grounds of any public buildings” by inserting the phrase, “but not including a sidewalk in the public right-of-way.”228 Interestingly, the IDPH website has retained an earlier draft of these proposed amendments, which Mapes had prepared on October 10, the day on which the above-quoted flurry of email exchanges took place. The draft was identical with regard to the other amendments, but the “grounds” definition used “other than” instead of “not including.”229 It is unclear whether the critique of IDPH’s interpretation of its definition on those very days had prompted the draft of the proposed amendment or whether Mapes had merely failed to reveal to the critic that the agency was in the process of eliminating the textual basis of the critique.

In the event, Mapes strained mightily to justify this particular proposed amendment at the ARRC meeting, which dozens of bar owners attended and lasted almost three hours.230 In response to a question by (outgoing) chairman 227Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (cc: Brent Saron, Thomas H. Miller, Matt Gannon, Janet Petersen, Tyler Olson, Philip Wise, and Matt McCoy) (Oct. 13, 2008).

230Jason Clayworth, “Proposed Rule Change: Smoking Objections Would Be Secret,” DMR, Oct. 15, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com (visited Oct. 15, 2008); Christinia Crippes, “Group Ponders Smoking Ban Rules,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Oct. 15, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank). Before the rules themselves were discussed, attendees made comments on the aforementioned regulatory analysis that failed to engage one another. Supporters (such Cathy Callaway and Christopher Squier) stated that empirical studies in other states showed that smokefree laws had no financial impact on businesses, whereas bar owners and their advocates such as Rep. McKinley Bailey offered unsubstantiated anecdotal evidence of business declines in bars in Iowa. Administrative Rules Review
Senator Michael Connolly as to whether the changes were substantive or technical, Mapes declared that they were merely “technical”:

We ended up with some public buildings that front right on a public sidewalk. So you’d have the situation where someone could smoke to this corner, they’d have to not smoke on this block, and then they could smoke again on the next corner. And so to eliminate this problem we added this in the public right of way.\(^{231}\)

No committee member asked Mapes to explain why it was a “problem” in need of elimination that the existing rule protected people using the public sidewalk to enter and leave a public building from secondhand smoke exposure, while the emitters of those lethal toxins and carcinogens were required to cross the street. After all, IDPH’s own website referenced the surgeon general’s 2006 report on involuntary exposure as establishing both that “[b]reathing secondhand smoke has immediate harmful effects on the cardiovascular system that can increase the risk of heart attack” and that “[t]here is no risk-free level of secondhand smoke exposure. Even brief exposure can be dangerous.”\(^{232}\) Instead, Mapes merely noted that in proposing the amendment the agency had concurred with some city attorney’s opinion. A thoroughly confused Connolly—perhaps he was seeking to deal with cognitive dissonance by denying that the Public Health Department would have rewritten a rule pursuant to a strict no-smoking law to accommodate smokers rather than nonsmokers—asked whether it was the case, then, that it was unlawful to smoke on the sidewalk in front of a public building—“you have to be off the curb?” Disabusing him of his error—people would be permitted to smoke on the right of way—Mapes tried to insure that he and the rest of the committee understood what IDPH was doing without highlighting its counterintuitive character:

Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

So you have some cities that have decided that sidewalks adjacent to the building are part of the public grounds, but they’ll have a situation where they have a major thoroughfare, basically a sidewalk, that’s not immediately adjacent to the building it’s part of the public right of way and therefore should not be counted as grounds of that public building. And that’s what this clarification is in here for. Otherwise it would have to be that that section of city sidewalk immediately in front of that public building would have to be considered part of public grounds.233

Her oblique message of acquiescence in continued public smoking where IDPH could have protected nonsmokers still not having sunk in, Mapes finally discovered a more effective framework in which to embed her apostasy when she was then asked whether it would be lawful to smoke right outside a county courthouse: “The city has some discretion in determining what constitutes the grounds of a public building. This allows them to not consider that right of way that public sidewalk as part of the grounds of a public building.” Connolly, who, along with outgoing co-chair Philip Wise, seemed much more interested in expediting the meeting than in coming to grips with substantive issues, had finally got it: “It’s a local decision, correct?” Even though the legislature had rejected the health organizations’ insistent pleas for local control, its partial resurrection by administrative rule aroused no comment. And Wise, oblivious of the backward step on which he was placing his imprimatur without any attempt at justification, chimed in: “I believe all of these changes make the rules better than they were before the public hearing.”234

The day after the ARRC meeting the news media reported that IDPH had proposed “allow[ing] cities and local governments more leeway in allowing smoking on busy sidewalks adjacent to public buildings. Currently, the law bans smoking on any sidewalk next to a building owned or operated by the government.”235 When, in response to IDPH’s proposal to redefine “grounds” so as to eliminate dual-use sidewalks (that is, those used by both people who were entering and leaving public buildings and those who were walking by without entering the buildings) from the scope of the definition, the agency’s critic asked Mapes (telephonically) why IDPH had decided to amend the definition of grounds of public bldg (by excluding all sidewalks in the public right of way even if they were used in connection with and immediately adjacent to the bldg) and thus to provide less rather than more protection from secondhand smoke to people entering and leaving such bldgs, you said that it would make “no sense” to make people who were smoking on such sidewalks...have to walk across the street. I replied that the sense that it would make is that it would protect me from cancer-causing smoke exposure. You then pooh-poohed my claim by reminding me that this exposure was merely outdoors. I then told you that that view of the health consequences of outdoor exposure to secondhand smoke is ignorant. You then took offense at this characterization and hung up on me.

Had you not hung up, I would have mentioned that, by the same logic, you should also be objecting to making smokers walk many blocks out of their way so that they don’t smoke on the 1900-acre UI campus (even tho, since the campus smoking ban is written directly into the statute, your agency has no power to modify it). ...I would also have mentioned a good deal more about the cumulative (and even short-term) impact of secondhand smoke exposure and atherosclerosis.

Although Mapes’s belittlement of the seriousness of outdoor exposure was “a rather odd position to take with regard to a definition of grounds of a public bldg, which is an entirely outdoor area,” she failed to retract, modify, or deny having taken this position in subsequent email exchanges despite being asked to do so.

After having secured an audio tape of the October 14 ARRC meeting, the IDPH critic posed the following question to Mapes and IDPH Director Newton:

1. Sen Connolly asked Ms Mapes whether the change in the definition of grounds of 236 Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (Oct. 15, 2008). This email was written a few minutes after the end of the telephone conversation. Mapes had taken umbrage at the comparison between her ignorance of the health impacts of secondhand smoke exposure outdoors and bar owners’ ignorance of their impacts indoors.

---

237 Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (cc: Tom Newton) (Oct. 16, 2008).

238 Email between Marc Linder and Bonnie Mapes (Oct. 15-16, 2008). Director Newton in effect terminated this set of exchanges by declaring that “Bonnie Mapes has provided adequate responses (verbal and written) to your inquiries about our proposed amendments to the rules as presented to ARRC this past week,” which “[a]s director of the department I approved and support...” Email from Tom Newton to Marc Linder (cc: Bonnie Mapes, Matt Gannon, Heather Adams, and Barb Nervig) (Oct. 17, 2008).
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers' Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

public bldg was substantive or technical and Ms Mapes answered “technical,” yet she went on to explain how the result of the change could be that smoking would be permitted on the sidewalk in front of a public bldg whereas previously it would have been prohibited. How can that change possibly be merely technical and not substantive?

2. Ms Mapes further stated that under the original rule: “We ended up with some public bldgs that front right on a public sidewalk so you’d have the situation where someone could smoke to this corner, they’d have to not smoke at this block, and then they could smoke again on the next corner. And so to eliminate this problem we added this in the public right of way.” Why is it a “problem” that people entering and leaving a public bldg would not be exposed to secondhand smoke from passers-by. Why does idph consider it more important to permit some city governments’ to cater to smokers’ convenience of not having to cross the street?

3. Ms Mapes also justified the change on the basis that “you have some cities that have…a situation where they have a major thoroughfare, basically a sidewalk that’s fronting a major public street and they’ve decided that is not immediately adjacent to the bldg—it’s part of the public right of way and therefore should not be counted as grounds of the public bldg. And that’s what this clarification is here for. Otherwise it would have to be that the section of city sidewalk immediately in front of the public bldg would have to be considered part of public grounds.” Don’t you agree that Ms Mapes said here that “immediately adjacent to the bldg” and “public right of way” are mutually exclusive? Don’t you also agree that Ms Mapes said that under the first version of the rule a public sidewalk immediately adjacent to the public bldg was part of the public bldg’s grounds? And don’t you agree that unless you had changed the rule, the Washington st sidewalk in front of iowa city city hall would have to have been considered part of the grounds—unless the city had determined that it was not immediately adjacent to the bldg and unless idph had upheld that determination? And isn’t it true that instead of making any of those determinations, idph simply changed the rule, giving cities local decision making power to declare all such sidewalks rights of way not part of public bldg’s grounds? Are such decisions by cities about rights of way now unreviewable by idph or can you imagine circumstances under which idph would respond to a complaint about smoking in a right of way/public sidewalk in front of a public bldg?

Mapes asked Newton what he wanted her “to do with this one,” and promised their questioner that she would let him know as soon as she got “direction” from Newton as to how he wanted her to respond, but she never did.

At the Board of Health meeting on November 12 Mapes presented materials with “examples of the complexity of enforcing the smoke-free campus at Iowa State University...and the city hall in Iowa City.” With regard to the latter 239 Email from Marc Linder to Tom Newton and Bonnie Mapes (Nov. 26, 2008).

240 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder and Tom Newton (Nov. 26, 2008).
241 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Nov. 26, 2008).
242 Minutes, Iowa State Board of Health at 3 (Nov. 12, 2008), on http://www.idph.state.
Mapes explained that IDPH had received a complaint about people smoking on the sidewalk in front of the building. In addition to internal discussion, the agency had some communications with the city attorney, who had determined that the sidewalks on these public streets were not immediately adjacent to the public building and were not going to be counted as part of the public grounds; instead, the city attorney considered them to be public right-of-way and consequently they would not have to be smokefree. Mapes appeared to have concluded that because every city was “different,” each city government should be empowered to determine dispositively whether smoking was lawful or not. Following brief public comments, made only by anti-smoking groups (such as the Lung Association), the Board unanimously approved IDPH’s amended rules. Even news media focused on the change to the “grounds of any public buildings” definition, adding that in December the ARRC would review the proposed change “allowing local officials to decide whether smoking’s allowed on sidewalks surrounding city and county property.”

After listening to an audio tape of the Board of Health meeting, the IDPH critic asked Mapes:

I’ve been trying to listen to the tape of the mtg, which in parts is inaudible so I’m not sure I’m understanding the words, but I think I’m hearing you discuss the sidewalk in front of city hall in iowa city and saying that the city attorney had determined that the sidewalks (plural but maybe it’s singular—it is just Washington street) fronting Washington street “that aren’t immediately adjacent to the building are not going to be counted as part of the public grounds. They consider this a public right of way and these sidewalks are not going to have to be smokefree.” Did I hear the words correctly? I ask because I wonder whether this is really the city’s position or your position. If the sidewalk is NOT immediately adjacent to the bldg, that’s the end of the story isn’t it under the IDPH rule? Whether it happens to be a right of way or anything else is completely irrelevant at that point, isn’t it? is the city and are you taking the position that the sidewalk is not immediately adjacent to city hall?
Mapes responded:

I don’t have a transcript of my comments, but I was discussing some of the issues that had gone into our decision to propose the amendment concerning sidewalks in the public right-of-way. I explained that persons having control of a public building have some discretion in making the determination of what constitutes the grounds of that building and showed the Board examples of how this discretion was being applied. I used the satellite photo of Iowa City Hall as one of those examples. I do not remember if I said “sidewalk” or “sidewalks,” but I did refer to the opinion we received from the Iowa City attorney’s office that they did not consider the sidewalk along Washington Street to be part of the grounds of city hall because that sidewalk was a public right-of-way. Under the amendment we were proposing, that sidewalk would not be required to be smokefree. I do not remember the precise way in which I phrased this, but your synopsis sounds accurate. I was not working from any written script or notes.

As for your question about sidewalks which are immediately adjacent to a building, it is not “the end of the story” if a sidewalk is not immediately adjacent to a building. The rule requires all sidewalks determined to be on the grounds of a public building to be smokefree. If a city government controls a public building within a city park and determines that the entire park constitutes the grounds of that public building, then the sidewalks on those designated grounds, immediately adjacent to the building or not, would have to be smokefree (and be posted as such by the city).

IDPH’s critic asked a follow-up question that Mapes had not answered:

But disregarding parks and just focusing on the Iowa City City Hall—because at the Boh mtg you were concretely discussing the Iowa City City Hall—are you saying both that even a sidewalk that is not immediately adjacent to the bldg might be part of the grounds of a public bldg and that you are NOT taking a position one way or the other as to whether the sidewalk along Washington street is immediately adjacent? In other words, your position is that the sole reason that Washington street sidewalk is not part of the grounds of a public bldg is that it is a right of way?

However, he received only this non-answer from Director Newton:

As for the sidewalk issue you continue to ask about, I believe Bonnie has answered your question about how the decisions were made in amending the rules and addressing your complaint with Iowa City. In addition, the State Board of Health did approve the amendment without reservations, understanding that our rules cannot possibly address every “public grounds” scenario in Iowa.

247 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (cc: Tom Newton).
248 Email from Marc Linder to Bonnie Mapes (cc: Tom Newton) (Nov. 24, 2008).
249 Email from Tom Newton to Marc Linder (cc: Ramona Cooper and Bonnie Mapes)
At the ARRC meeting on December 9, 2008, in the course of outlining the changes that IDPH had made to its rules in response to public comments Mapes admitted that “we heard from the city attorney in Iowa City and so we made the change that allows the sidewalks in the right-of-way not to be included in the definition” of “grounds of any public buildings.”250 A number of pro-smokers, such as Brian Froehlich, George Eichhorn, and members of Iowans for Equal Rights, spoke, but said nothing novel.251 (However, a written submission by IER included this interesting admission concerning bar owners’ opposition to the Act: “many locally owned, neighborhood hospitality trade restaurant and bar small business owners in Iowa face a tilted smoking ban policy deck that shifts the playing field competitive advantage to large chain franchise operations that were predominately smokefree before the Iowa smoking ban was passed...”252) As before, the “so-called ‘bar exemption’” was the “most controversial” rule, with owners contending that IDPH interpreted “bar” too narrowly, and the agency insisting that apart from the definition that the Department of Inspections and Appeals used for restaurant inspections there was no practical basis for creating the detailed recordkeeping and enforcement requirements.253

The final ARRC meeting on the Smokefree Air Act rules ended anticlimactically. Republican Senator James Seymour, a retired hospital CEO254 who had consistently voted against H.F. 2212,255 moved to object to the rulemaking on the grounds that IDPH had not gotten the rules right on its second attempt, thus leaving the distinction between bars and restaurants unreasonable.256

250 Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (Dec. 9, 2008) (audio tape provided by Joseph Royce, legal counsel).
251 Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (Dec. 9, 2008) (audio tape provided by Joseph Royce, legal counsel); Minutes of the December 2008 Meeting of the Administrative Rules Review Committee at 4-5 (Dec. 9, 2008), on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/lsadocs/ARR/ARRMinutes/2009/ANKKB005.PDF.
253 Iowa General Assembly, Legislative Service Agency-Legal Services Division, “2008 Committee Briefings” at 4 (2009), on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/lsadocs/BriefOnMeetings/2009/BJMAR000.PDF.
255 See above ch. 35.
256 Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (Dec. 9, 2008) (audio tape provided by ARRC legal counsel Joseph Royce); Minutes of the December 2008 Meeting
Seymour, whose “whole premise” was that government should not interfere with a private business, grounded his criticism of the administrative definition in the argument that “food is food,” meaning that there was no rational reason for singling out snack foods as a basis for exemption. However, he knew that his motion would not pass, and in fact only Republican Representative Heaton, another opponent of the bill, supported the motion, which failed by a vote of 2 to 6, the only other Republican present, Linda Upmeyer, voting Nay, even though she had been a vociferous opponent of the bill. ARRC, according to Senator Courtney, though skeptical of the outdoor patio rule, ultimately did not object to it because there was so much noncompliance occurring in indoor bars at the time that members wanted to wait and see how it worked out. By the end of 2008, when Larry Duncan had still not been sanctioned for his blatant violations of the law, in the Burlington area fewer bar owners, many of whom had been complying only grudgingly anyway, remained compliant. For example at the Paddlewheel Lounge in that city a note to customers on the tables read: “Due to the lack of enforcement of the law, it has impacted our business significantly the past five months.... We feel at this point that we have no choice than to allow smoking to stay on an even playing field and keep our bar in business.”

Having failed in their final attempt to persuade state government officials to re-word the rules to facilitate smoking in bars, owners vituperatively railed against the Act after the ARRC meeting, prompting Representative Wise to administer a tutorial to them on why vilification was a “dumb” approach. ‘Attempting to change the (law), that means you need to get legislators on your side and insulting legislators and implying legislators are somehow corrupt if they support a smoking ban is not politically very smart.’

---

258 Administrative Rules Review Committee Meeting (Dec. 9, 2008) (audio tape provided by ARRC legal counsel Joseph Royce); Minutes of the December 2008 Meeting of the Administrative Rules Review Committee at 5 (Dec. 9, 2008), on http://www.legis.state.ia.us/lsadocs/ARR/ARRMinutes/2009/ANKKB005.PDF
259 Telephone interview with Thomas Courtney, Burlington (Aug. 16, 2009).
Bar Owners’ Unsuccessful Litigation Challenging the Smokefree Air Act’s Constitutionality

The next question is whether the asserted right to allow patrons to smoke in a public restaurant is “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, such that neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed.” ... The answer clearly is no. ... While tobacco smoking may have a long history, both liberty and justice will continue to exist if smoking in a public restaurant is curtailed or precluded.262

As for the argument that the ban will attract new customers, [bar owner] Kuncl is..."not sure we are going to get new customers.... It’s going to take a long time to air this place out."263

The reason that Clinton and Burlington have become the epicenters of bar-owner resistance has to do almost completely with personality. It is just an accident of geography that the most radical individuals happen to come from those communities. You would need to employ a psychiatrist and not an economist to find the reason.264

In an attempt to thwart the enforcement that they knew would be directed against them if they continued to permit smoking in their bars once the Smokefree Air Act went into effect on July 1, the owners who were members of the Iowa Bar Owners Coalition and Clinton’s Organized Bar & Restaurant Association decided, according to Brian Froehlich, a bar owner in Wilton, to “see if we might get a judge to give us an injunction ’til we can get this thing fixed.”265 Initially bar owners, who were divided as to whether their litigation, for which they had 263Brian Morelli, “Bars’ Longtime Patrons Fret Life After Smoking Ban,” ICP-C, June 28, 2008, on http://www.press-citizen.com (owner of Hilltop Lounge in Iowa City). According to the owner of a restaurant-bar in Davenport who prohibited smoking on Jan. 1, 2008: “It took 13 of us six hours to scrub down everything in the place where there had been smoking for 26 years.” Bill Wundram, “Smoking Ban Didn’t Send Bar into Ruin,” Q-CT, Mar. 18, 2009, on http://www.qctimes.com. Specialized cleaning companies noted that cigarette smoke and the accompanying odor was “pretty invasive” and could, together with the odor, “stay for a long, long, long time” because it “permeates into every porous surface.” Cleaning charges ran into thousands of dollars. Cindy Hadish, “Dispel the Smell—Bars Hope to Lose the Odor Along with the Smoke,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), June 27, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank). On the phenomenon of thirdhand smoke, see above ch. 33.

264Email from (former Rep.) Phil Wise to Marc Linder (July 9, 2009).
purportedly raised $50,000, should focus on total repeal or eliminating exemptions, had spoken to a number of lawyers, including former Governor Tom Vilsack. Towards the end of May Vilsack stated that those who had been in touch with him “believe that a smoking ban based on public health reasons shouldn’t give certain locations immunity from the ban. ‘Saying you can’t smoke in a bar but you can smoke in the casino, that raised some serious questions about the constitutionality of the exemptions.’” Making it clear that he would attack only certain exemptions, Vilsack oddly belittled the universalizing tendency of his approach by remarking that it “‘would be sort of reinforcing the law.’” Bar owners’ attraction to him may have resulted from their absolutizing his view, about which he felt “‘very strongly,’” that “[w]hen we craft laws, even though there may be political reasons for exemptions, the Constitution may not recognize those exemptions.” Froehlich, while characterizing Vilsack’s approach as “solid,” was nevertheless “personally apprehensive” about it; a few people did not like it and some owners were considering a different “legal angle,” but did not yet want to show their hand.266

On June 30 Vilsack told the press that although he had not yet been formally hired, he had “‘advised folks who are interested in using my services’” that “‘if I’m involved it won’t be a lawsuit that seeks to strike the law, which is what some folks want.... If I’m involved, it’ll be a lawsuit that seeks to extend the protections of the no-smoking ban to other locations, like casinos.’” He believed that a number of bar owners and others were interested in his level playing field approach, which was based on unspecified research that he had done persuading him that a “‘there is a good legal argument to be made that the smoking ban did not go far enough and needs to be extended to some of those other places where there are workers and customers who would potentially be exposed to secondhand smoke, which is the intent of the law.’” But the argument that had “‘great appeal’” to the bar owners with whom he had met was not focused on public health: “‘From an economic standpoint, those who are in the entertainment venue business, as certainly bars and taverns are, they ought to be on an equal and level playing field and no one should be given a privilege or an immunity from a law simply because they have political connections or political might that resulted in exceptions being created that make them outside the law.’” Vilsack identified the common feature in both arguments as “‘fundamental fairness to those who go to casinos, those who work in casinos and those who are competing for limited entertainment dollars.’”267

267O. Kay Henderson, “Vilsack May Lead Lawsuit over Smoking Ban,” Radio Iowa,
Despite Vilsack’s commercial competitiveness argument, his focus on public health was anathema to bar owners, who, through Froehlich, revealed that smoking and not equal competitive conditions was their animus: they chose former Republican state legislator George Eichhorn as best representing “‘what our thoughts and feelings were over Gov[ernor] Vilsack’s proposed idea, which [sic] all he wanted to do was go and make the law stronger...so that’s why we steered away from Vilsack on this.’”268 (A few weeks later, IBOC told a somewhat different story, insisting that it had not hired Vilsack because the exemptions he wanted to fight would be “overturned next legislative session without cost to our organizations. We also believe that his involvement is purely political and not for the best interest of small business owners of this state.”)269

In terms of the ideological fit, it does seem highly implausible that repealthesmokingban.org—a website that proclaimed that the “extremists” who promoted the Smokefree Air Act “hate liberty with a passion and they will never stop until they have everything” and featured on its “Facts” page a denial of the lethality of smoking for smokers—would have posted a photo and mini-bio of Vilsack, as it did with Eichhorn, as one of “our heros [sic].”270

Eichhorn, who, after having been crushingly defeated in a bid to be nominated for a state Senate race by a Republican convention,271 lost his House seat in November 2006 to (fellow smoking facilitator) Democrat McKinley Bailey,272 and then on June 3, 2009 lost the Republican U.S. Senate primary for the honor of losing to Tom Harkin,273 was a self-professed conservative and “true strict constructionist.”274 On Facebook Eichhorn declared himself a fan of the Heartland Institute,275 a market-knows-best organization, one of whose hobby horses is tobacco. That part of its website, which begins, “Welcome to the Smoker’s Lounge,” is so profoundly and across-the-board drenched in primitive, know-nothingist denial\textsuperscript{276} that it makes Philip Morris—whose “support never amounted to more than 5 percent of Heartland’s annual budget”\textsuperscript{277}—seem almost like a scientific subcontractor of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the Surgeon General. Not coincidentally, Heartland’s approach found its way into at least one of Eichhorn’s briefs,\textsuperscript{278} and plaintiffs’ Recast and Substituted

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item \url{http://www.heartland.org/suites/tobacco/} (visited July 8, 2009).
\item \url{http://www.heartland.org/about/truthsquad.html} (visited July 8, 2009).
\item In his brief in support of his clients’ (unsuccessful) request for a temporary injunction, Eichhorn wrote: “The affect [sic] of this statute on smokers is monumental. One Letter-to-the-Editor stated, ‘Many smokers today are made to feel like modern-day lepers, segregated and ostracized…[.]’” The footnoted source was “R. Connor, Letter to the Editor, The Heartland Institute, Letters to the Editor, July [8,] 2005.” Brief in Support of Application for Temporary Injunction at 15, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition [sic] v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., July 31, 2008). Eichhorn suppressed the fact that Ralph Connor was the Heartland Institute’s public affairs director so that his “letter” in fact constituted the Heartland Institute’s communication to itself. The ellipsis that Eichhorn inserted spared him the embarrassment of revealing to the judge, IDPH, the attorney general, and the world at large that his clients’ pro-smoking agenda rested on the flat-earth-society claim that secondhand smoke’s alleged lethality was a hoax—a position that even Philip Morris had abandoned: “Many smokers today are made to feel like modern-day lepers, segregated and ostracized on the basis of junk science that says secondhand smoke is a public health threat.” Connor then indulged in the following piece of preposterous charlatanry: “Most experts believe that moderate, occasional exposure to secondhand smoke presents a low cancer risk to nonsmokers.” Ralph Connor, “Smokers: Modern-Day Lepers?” (July 8, 2005), on \url{http://www.heartland.org/full/17590/Smokers_ModernDay_Lepers.html} (visited July 12, 2009). The surgeon general’s monumental scientific synthesis of the health impact of secondhand smoke exposure concluded that such exposure constituted “an alarming public health hazard” to which “there is no risk-free level of exposure,” adding that exposure killed more than 15 times more adult nonsmokers from coronary heart disease (46,000) than from lung cancer (3,000). U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, \textit{The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke: A Report of the Surgeon General} iii, 11, i (2006). Immediately following the aforementioned quotation, Eichhorn offered this essentialist falsification: “With this statute, smokers are denied access to most public places.” Brief in Support of Application for Temporary Injunction at 15, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition [sic] v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., July 31, 2008). The Smokefree Air Act does not deny access to any public place to smokers so long as they refrain from smoking in such a place. His claim might become relevant if the legislature ever prohibited the off-gassing of thirdhand tobacco smoke from clothing and other personal and movable property in public places. See above ch. 33. Further essentialist hyperbole was on display in the Recast Petition, which asserted that the Act “adversely affects the employability of those who choose to smoke in that employers can no longer accommodate

\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
Petition devoted four pages to a disjointed melange regurgitating long ago discredited (and) tobacco-industry-supported efforts at denial of the reality of the deleterious health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure.\(^{279}\)

The petition for a temporary injunction prohibiting the Iowa Department of Public Health and the State of Iowa from enforcing H.F. 2212 and its administrative rules and for a declaratory judgment that the statute and rules were unconstitutional that was filed by IBOC, COBRA, Froehlich’s bar, and a smoker named Ron Overson in Polk County district court on July 1 bore signs of great haste and/or sloppiness (such as a typographical error in the first plaintiff’s name in the caption and misstating COBRA’s name).\(^{280}\) The submission was this behavior, and if a person chooses to smoke during work hours, they [sic] will be required to leave the building with all the business and health risks associated with that conduct. ... By prohibiting smoking on business premises, this Legislation is eliminating up to...20%...of Iowa’s population from providing services for hire, or from being customers.” Recast and Substituted Petition at 28, Choose Freedom Iowa v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 28, 2008). Presumably by “health risks” plaintiffs were not referring to those linked to firsthand smoking.

\(^{280}\)Petition, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition [sic] v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., July 1, 2008). To excuse the need to file a recast petition, Eichhorn asserted that he had had only about a week to prepare the petition. Plaintiffs[‘] Resistance to Defendants’ Motion to Dismiss or Recast at 2, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition [sic] v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 6, 2008). Brothers Larry and Bill Duncan asserted that “each filed a temporary injunction hoping the law could be put on hold until it’s [sic] constitutionality could be challenged in court. Sadly the request for the injunctions was poorly handled by the state and didn’t make it into court until nearly a characterized by outright false assertion paired with trivial quibbling suggestive of lawyerly incompetence. For example, it asserted that the law “uses terms in a manner inconsistent with accepted public and legal usage. Smoking is prohibited in...‘Public places,’ which is not limited to governmentally owned or operated facilities. Instead, the act’s definition includes private property, private businesses and private clubs. The definition states public places are ‘an enclosed area to which the public is invited or in which the public is permitted....’” In fact, the Iowa Code was already replete with provisions using the same definition of “public place”—most notably, with regard to alcoholic beverage control and even breast-feeding. Moreover, the “public place” language, like much of the statutory text, was taken from anti-public smoking laws enacted earlier in other states such as Rhode Island (which is even titled, The Smokefree Public Place and Workplace Law) and Illinois.

The first argument that plaintiffs offered in support of its petition for injunctive and declaratory relief was that the new law would prohibit people who “choose to smoke”—a phrase that cigarette manufacturers had long used instead of ‘addictively self-administer nicotine’—from “enjoying” covered public places and “interfer[e] with their associational rights and...their customary practices of purchasing goods and services from other members of the public.” Moreover, the bar owners also claimed that the Smokefree Air Act “limits the liberty, freedom and choices that individuals in Iowa have historically, customarily and legally maintained.” Attempting to quantify this alleged impact, they asserted that if, as had been estimated, 20 percent of adult Iowans smoked, all of them would be “adversely affected....” 287  Ironically, as early as 1978 the general counsel of Brown & Williamson, in an internal company memo, had underscored that “[n]one of the anti-smoking ordinances in fact restricts a smoker’s right of association or assembly. None of them exclude [sic] smokers from any place or infringe the rights of smokers to associate with whom they choose and assemble where they please. Instead they regulate activity or conduct.” 288  A quarter-century later the associational argument was nevertheless litigated by a pro-smoking anti-smoking regulation group in federal court in New York State, which dismissed it out of hand in 2004. The court concluded that that state’s anti-public smoking law did “not implicate First Amendment protections with regard to assembly and association and thus, would not merit a heightened scrutiny for these claims.” 289  The bar owners’ empirical claim was, as a 2006 Iowa survey demonstrated, wildly exaggerated and untenable: 78 percent of smokers (compared to 87 percent of nonsmokers) stated that a total smoking ban (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., July 1, 2008).

686053139/41-2.
2004). The court explained: “A critical flaw inherent in CLASH’s First Amendment arguments is the premise that association, speech, and general social interaction cannot occur or cannot be experienced to the fullest without smoking, or, conversely, that unless smokers are allowed to light up on these occasions and at these places, their protected right is somehow fundamentally diminished. Implicit in this premise is that smoking enhances the quality of the social experience and elevates the enjoyment of smokers’ First Amendment rights; in other words, that only by being allowed to smoke can smokers contribute fully and enjoy to the maximum the experience of association, assembly, and speech in public places such as bars and restaurants. CLASH’s allegation that the Smoking Bans ‘curtail’ certain activities for smokers, in essence suggests that smokers cannot fully engage in conversation and other activities in bars and restaurants unless they are permitted to smoke, or that only by being permitted to smoke in these places can they fully exercise their constitutional rights of association and speech. Without summarily dismissing all possibility that smoking may contain some scintilla of associational value for some people, there is nothing to say that smoking is a prerequisite to the full exercise of association and speech under the First Amendment. ... At best, smoking, where permitted, is but a single component of the entire realm of associational interactions that a bar or restaurant patron could experience. Other aspects include dining, drinking, conversing, viewing or listening to entertainment, and meeting other people. While the Smoking Bans restrict where a person may smoke, it is a far cry to allege that such restrictions unduly interfere with smokers’ right to associate freely with whomever they choose in the pursuit of any protected First Amendment activity.” Id. at 473.
in restaurants would have no effect on how often they ate out, while 3 percent (compared to 12 percent of nonsmokers) said that it would prompt them to eat out more often.\textsuperscript{290} Perhaps an even more impressive refutation of the bar owners’ essentialization of smokers was the finding that 52 percent of smokers (compared to 83 percent of nonsmokers) did not permit smoking anywhere in their own houses.\textsuperscript{291}

The bar owners next alleged that the law would “inflict[ ] them with [sic] a new, massive and costly regulatory regime by prohibiting them from the full use and enjoyment of their property, by diminishing the value of the real property where businesses that [sic] previously chose to sell goods and services to customers who chose to smoke...and potentially taking away their license or permit to pursue their livelihood if there are findings of non-compliance.”\textsuperscript{292} How the requirement of posting a few nosmoking signs and informing violators of the existence of the law amounted to a “massive and costly regulatory regime” plaintiffs no more explained than how this regulation differed in its impact from many other health and safety regulations.

The bar owners submitted a laundry list of alleged constitutional violations: (1) the inspection and regulatory schemes violated the due process and search and seizure clauses because compliance operations were authorized without warrants or probable cause; (2) procedural due process was violated because IDPH was empowered to determine violations “potentially without notice or opportunity to be heard by the alleged violator”; (3) Iowans were arbitrarily and unreasonably classified so as to deny them “inalienable rights of enjoying liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness, the right to pursue useful and lawful businesses without oppressive regulations”; (4) Iowans were arbitrarily and unreasonably classified in violation of the equal protection clause of the U.S. Constitution and the privileges and immunities clause of the Iowa Constitution; and (5) the free speech clause was violated.\textsuperscript{293}

\textsuperscript{290} Gene Lutz et al., \textit{Iowa 2006 Adult Tobacco Use Survey} 59, fig. 38 at 64, on http://www.csbs.uni.edu/dept/csbr/pdf/IDPH_Adult_Tobacco_Survey-2006.pdf (visited July 9, 2009).

\textsuperscript{293} Petition at 12, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition [sic] v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., July 1, 2008). The free speech claim had also already been rejected by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, which found that even if it “indulg[ed] the notion that smoking in a bar or restaurant embodies some shred of
In an interview two days after filing the petition, Eichhorn stressed that SAA went “far beyond” the single issue of the casino exemption, but failed to reveal how his claim that the law “has some very unusual features in there...strange things just in and of this law that I think are different from other states[’]” was actionable. Nor did he identify the “good results” that he and his clients would get out of the suit. What he did consider to be without a “proper legal foundation” was that “this legislation wants to go in and inspect all sorts of private property that’s never been subjected to this kind of inspection before.”

The bar owners viewed the litigation as just “the first step” in overturning the smoking ban as a whole by means of political mobilization. COBRA president Van Roekel, who saw the law as “blatant discrimination against smokers” (and thus conceded that, contrary to many denials, the owners’ resistance was indeed a defense of smoking) “and...a property rights issue,” publicly announced a position that would have undermined the only argument that the state court judge later took seriously—namely, that the plaintiffs were “not contesting the casino exemption, because many members feel the exemption will be overturned in the next legislative session.” Instead, COBRA and IBOC, temporarily caught up in a post-filing collective delusion of grandeur, purported to be engaged in hiring a Washington, D.C. PR-firm “to coordinate the release of information relating to court proceedings” and recruit other organizations to join the lawsuit: “In essence, we are fighting for the rights of every small business in Iowa.” The next step was political activation, “including putting candidates up for office” who would defend small business owners’ interests and rights. The “final step,” which expressive conduct protected under the First Amendment” and the ban imposed a burden on that expression, the law would still pass constitutional muster under “the more demanding intermediate level of scrutiny” because it was content-neutral and established reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions “substantially related to the important governmental interest of protecting individuals from the harmful effects of ETS.” NYC C.L.A.S.H., Inc. v City of New York, 315 F. Supp.2d 461, 480 (S.D.N.Y. 2004). In their Recast Petition, plaintiffs tacked on the even more implausible claim that the Act violated the commerce clause of the federal constitution by virtue of discriminating against the sale, distribution, and economic benefits of tobacco. Recast and Substituted Petition at 30, Choose Freedom Iowa v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 28, 2008).

---

involved “contact with interested parties in nine states” and contacting many more, was “making the matter a national issue by pooling the resources of similar organizations throughout the United States and debating the constitutionality of the ban before the U.S. Supreme Court.”

On July 21, the attorney general filed a motion to dismiss or, alternatively, to recast the petition. Dismissal was based on the argument that plaintiffs had impermissibly interwoven the statutory and agency rules/rulemaking challenges: because a petition for judicial review of agency action under the Iowa Administrative Procedure Act was the exclusive means of obtaining such review in a court of law, it could not be joined with original declaratory judgment or injunction actions and therefore had to be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Moreover, even if the court were nevertheless willing to construe the whole petition as one for judicial review, it would still have to be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction because plaintiffs had failed to serve the agency defendant within the 10-day statutory service requirement. Consequently, the only possible ground on which the bar owners could proceed was their constitutional challenge to the Smokefree Air Act; but since they made no allegations specific to the statute and intertwined all of them with challenges to the implementing rules, the attorney general requested that, if the court permitted the statutory challenge to proceed, it order plaintiffs to recast their petition to remove the challenges to the rules, thus making the grounds of their statutory challenge clear and giving defendants fair notice of the claims and a fair opportunity to respond.

On July 24, Polk County District Judge Douglas Staskal ordered a hearing for August 1 on the bar owners’ application for a temporary injunction prohibiting 298 Motion to Dismiss or to Recast, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., July 21, 2008). While denying that their petition was an appeal of agency action and stating that they would not attack the rules except as “reflections on the constitutionality” of the statute, plaintiffs expressed their willingness to recast their petition, but nevertheless requested the court to deny defendants’ motion to dismiss or recast. Plaintiffs[‘] Resistance to Defendants’ Motion to Dismiss or Recast at 2-3, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition [sic] v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 6, 2008). Insisting that plaintiffs’ latest filing “leaves the parties squarely on the same uncertain ground they were on at the outset of this action,” the attorney general urged the court to grant defendants’ motion to dismiss or recast. Defendants’ Reply to Plaintiffs’ Resistance to Defendants’ Motion to Dismiss or Recast at 2-3, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 22, 2008).

---

299 http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/TIndexFrm

3573
Administrative Rules for Barkeepers’ Challenge to Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

IDPH from implementing and enforcing the Smokefree Air Act. The parties agreed to proceed with this hearing “but only on the basis of the allegations that the Act is unconstitutional and not on the basis of alleged defects in the department’s rules,” and the judge approved this procedure.

In their brief opposing plaintiffs’ request for a temporary injunction the state defendants, after outlining scientific facts about the health consequences of secondhand smoke exposure, identified the fatal defects in the bar owners’ constitutional claims. Their substantive due process challenge was meritless because they failed to establish that the smoking law impinged on any fundamental right or was an irrational means of furthering the state’s interesting in reducing Iowans’ exposure to secondhand smoke for the purpose of advancing public health. The reason that the bar owners were unable to demonstrate that they had any fundamental right at stake—no court had held the right to smoke in public or to permit smoking in bars to be fundamental—was that tobacco smoking in public places, as the attorney general ironically observed, “is not implicit in the concept of ordered liberty....” Plaintiffs’ claim under the privileges and immunities provision of the Iowa Constitution (“All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation; the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities, which, upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens” was also untenable because the Iowa Supreme Court had held that a party challenging a statute based on the provision “‘must negate every conceivable basis which may support the classification, and the classification must be sustained unless it is patently arbitrary and bears no relationship to a legitimate governmental interest.’” Consequently, it was not defendants’ burden to prove that the statute was constitutional, but rather plaintiffs’ “burden to demonstrate beyond a reasonable doubt that the statute

---

305 Iowa Constitution, art. I, sect. 6.
violates the Privileges and Immunities Clause and to point out with particularity the details of the alleged invalidity.” Moreover, the clause “will not defeat a statutory scheme simply because it benefits certain individuals or classes more than others.” Under the traditional equal protection analysis, by which privileges and immunities challenges are tested, the court first would have to determine whether the statute created “a classification of similarly situated people who have been singled out for different treatment.” If the classes are not similarly situated, then treating them differently would not be unconstitutional; if they are, then the court has to determine whether the classification is rational; only an arbitrary classification that bears no rational relationship to a legitimate government interest would be unconstitutional. Plaintiffs had not only failed to bear their aforementioned burden, but had not even tried to demonstrate that they were part of a class that merited analysis under the privileges and immunities clause. Even if they were, however, they were not a suspect class that merited constitutionally heightened scrutiny; consequently, SAA had (and had already been shown) to satisfy only the rational basis test. Unsurprisingly, “no court employing either a privileges and immunities analysis akin to Iowa’s or a traditional equal protection analysis has overturned a similar statute on equal protection grounds.”

To be sure, the state, presumably because it bore no burden to do so, made no effort to argue that the legislature had a rational basis for classifying bars and casinos differently. Interestingly, the attorney general also made no effort to explain why a more recent aberrant Iowa Supreme Court decision, which not only rejected the U.S. Supreme Court’s analysis of equal protection, but was also at odds with its own prior decisions, did not represent a potential problem for the argument set forth in the attorney general’s brief. In Racing Association of Central Iowa v Fitzgerald, which dealt with a differential tax between racetrack and riverboat casinos, the Iowa Supreme Court held both that there was no rational basis for the legislature’s finding that the two were not similarly situated and that there was no rational relationship between the differential tax and the 306 Defendants’ Brief in Opposition to Plaintiffs’ Application for Temporary Injunction at 13-15, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 1, 2008) (quoting Perkins v Bd of Supervisors of Madison County, 636 NW2d 58, 72 (Iowa 2001) (quoting in turn earlier Iowa Supreme Court cases)). In an even older case not cited by the attorney general, the Iowa Supreme Court held that the privileges and immunities clause “does not require that all laws shall apply alike to all citizens of the State. It is sufficient if an enactment applies to all members of a class, providing the classification is not purely arbitrary but rests upon a reasonable basis. It is equally settled the Legislature has wide discrimination in determining the classes to which its Acts shall apply.” Green v Mt. Pleasant, 256 Iowa 1184, 1199 (1964).

---

main purpose of the legislation. Even if RACI’s point was that a statute that (1) treats differently two industries that the court finds to be similarly situated (2) in a manner that contradicts the main purpose of the statute violates equal protection, RACI’s logic still might not lead a RACI-like court to invalidate the casino exemption in the Smokefree Air Act. If the state’s argument was that the legislature exempted casinos because it needed the tax revenue, that argument might pass muster because, unlike the situation in RACI, the court could not find that this goal was not rationally served by the state’s continuing to receive the higher tax revenues from casinos that would not be possible if smoking were banned there. In other words, unless the court argued back that the goal was not rationally served because (empirically) banning smoking would not reduce revenues/tax revenues, RACI would not apply. That is to say, a RACI-like court would have to argue that casinos and bars were similarly situated with regard to a smoking ban’s impact on revenues/tax revenues. Since, in fact, the Smokefree Air Act bill was amended precisely because its supporters believed that the experience in Delaware and Illinois showed that bars were different than casinos in that the latter’s revenues were reduced by smoking bans while the former’s were not, a court would presumably be precluded from finding that casinos and bars were not similarly situated even though some scholars argued that smoking bans had not reduced casino revenues.

Although Republican House assistant minority leader Doug Struyk saw no “rational basis” defense for the State other than arguing that the absence of gambling in bars was somehow relevant, he was nevertheless dismissive of the Iowa Supreme Court decision on which bar owners must have been pinning all their hopes, calling it “a little odd” and not “mak[ing] a whole lot of sense.” Ironically, his Minority Leader, Rants, agreed that bar owners would have an uphill battle to prevail on a “rational basis” argument.

At the hearing on August 1, which lasted three hours with breaks, most of the 56 people in the courtroom—among whom were two bill drafters from the Legislative Services Agency—were bar owners. IBOC president Froehlich, the first of three bar owner-witnesses, was led through his testimonial paces by Eichhorn, who elicited the claim that most of the bar owners he had spoken to had

---

308 See above ch. 35.
309 Telephone interview with Doug Struyk, Council Bluffs (July 22, 2008). In addition, he saw no hope for a suit based on discrimination against smokers.
310 Telephone interview with Christopher Rants, Des Moines (May 12, 2008).
seen the number of customers drop by 25 to 50 percent and that one bar had closed because of July’s “declining profits,” which he called a “‘catastrophe.’” On cross-examination, Froehlich told Assistant Attorney General Donn Stanley that sales at Fro’s Pub and Grub had declined about 15 percent from June (the last pre-ban month) to July, but, under questioning, conceded that other factors such as high gasoline prices, the (historic) floods, and the housing crunch might also be reducing sales and patronage, prompting a few bar owners to grumble and one to whisper, “‘He’s making their case.’” Stanley’s relentless interrogation forced Froehlich to admit not only that he was still hiring, but that he had reduced the number of his employees in January, months before H.F. 2212 had even been passed. As for his scofflawdom regarding the smoking ban, Froehlich cavalierly admitted that “‘in business, we all take risks,’” which in his case included posting a sign on his door announcing that customers were entering a “‘smoking establishment’”—“‘my way of bei[n]g rebellious.’” Unknown is the impression that he made on Judge Staskal by opining that hanging the mandatory no-smoking sign upside down on the inside of the front door so that customers would see it only upon exiting put him in compliance with the law.

Eichhorn’s next witness was COBRA president Van Roekel, whose prediction that half the bars in Iowa “will close in the coming year because of the ban” suggested that he was as expert at economic prognosticating as he was at oncology and constitutional law or, as the director of the Alcoholic Beverages Division put it, that his prediction was “not a good gauge of reality.” In fact, in spite of the deepest economic crisis of the post-World War II era, the number of commercial liquor/winebeer on premises-beer off premises licenses/permits processed rose in Iowa from 4,023 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 2008 to 4,038 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 2009.

313Telephone interview with Lynn Walding, Des Moines (July 15, 2009).

314Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Division, 74th Annual Report: July 2007-June 2008, at 13, on http://www.iowaabd.com/about_office/annual_reports/pdf/2008/08_entire_report.pdf (visited July 15, 2009); Iowa Department of Commerce Alcoholic Beverages Division,
The third and final bar owner-witness, Amanda Albrecht, testified that her bar income at Hoss’s Saloon in Fairbank had fallen from $11,000 in July 2007 to $3,000 in July 2008, prompting her to put the bar up for sale and probably to close it for good on August 4. Her most affecting testimony she saved for a press interview in which she grieved most deeply over being torn away from experiencing firsthand the reproduction of her customer base: “Over the years I’ve been able to watch children that I knew, you know, that become drinking age and, you know, they have their 21st birthday there...and I’m not going to be able to see that (any) more.” In court Albrecht had offered what she regarded as a show-stopper: “We made $11 yesterday.... What more do you want to know?” That “more” (which did not become known until much later) suggested that that tragic day on which she could no longer witness the formerly underaged turn into personified legal solvent demand for alcohol had been put off after all: the licensure records of the Alcoholic Beverages Division revealed that in November 2008, Albrecht renewed her bar’s annual liquor license, which as of July 2009 was still “active.”

Following plaintiffs’ testimony the lawyers took over, in part merely reviewing the arguments that they had already briefed. Assistant Attorney General Jeffrey Thompson dismissed the bar owners’ self-reported data as “anecdotal,” “unreliable” and ‘unverifiable.’” As to the requested temporary restraining order, he observed that with 82,000 businesses covered and only 572

Activity Report Recap July 1, 2008–June 30, 2009 (emailed by ABD). Similarly, the number of commercial beer on/off premises licenses/permits processed for FY 2008 and 2009 rose from 1,085 to 1,148 and that of special-beer/wine on premises-beer off premises from 465 to 494. These three categories comprise the vast majority of licenses for bars.

https://elicensing.iowaabd.com/LicenseList.aspx (License No. LC0030251) (visited July 16, 2009). According to ABD: “There are no pending new licenses for this location.” Email from Lynn Walding to Marc Linder (July 17, 2009).

Although a court reporter did stenographically transcribe the hearing, the parties agreed that the lawyers’ closing remarks would not be transcribed. Neither party ever requested a transcript of the three plaintiffs’ testimony. Telephone interview with Janet Walker, Des Moines (the court reporter who was assigned to Judge Staskal and transcribed the testimony) (July 16, 2009).
complaints having been filed, issuance of an injunction would undo the improvement in public health that the new law had already effected. Eichhorn embellished the aforementioned false assertion in his brief by contending that the Smokefree Air Act “defies standard definitions of public and private properties...dating back hundreds of years.” In order to parry Thompson’s unobjectionable point that in order to secure an injunction plaintiffs would have to show irreparable harm Eichhorn claimed that: “It’s not the economic harm that we’re worried about.... If you have to tell a customer or an employee, “You can’t do that here; You [sic] have to take it outside,” will that be a customer or an employee tomorrow?” It appears not to have occurred to Eichhorn that owners have a long history of informing people in their bars that they cannot engage in various kinds of behavior. Moreover, the administrative rules were so weak that they did not require owners to do anything other than inform violators that they were violating the Smokefree Air Act; they did not even require that they request violators to leave the smoking-prohibited area or that they notify law enforcement. (In sharp contrast, the Minnesota Freedom to Breathe Act provided that owners and managers “shall make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in the public place, public transportation, place of employment, or public meeting by...asking any person who smokes in an area where smoking is prohibited to refrain from smoking and, if the person does not refrain from smoking after being asked to do so, asking the person to leave. If the person refuses to leave, the proprietor, person, or entity in charge shall handle the situation consistent with lawful methods for handling other persons acting in a disorderly manner or as a trespasser.”)

Just how well the organized barkeeper resistance understood how minimal the IDPH rules had rendered owners’/employers’ obligations in this regard was unmistakably on display on signs that adorned tables at Froehlich’s bar, whose owners sarcastically reveled in their discovery of the crucial legal distinction between the mandatory and the merely permissive:

324See above this ch.
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

If you are smoking you are in violation of the “Iowa Smoke Free Act.” By law we are required to tell you this. Via the administrated (sic) rules, the following actions may take place if you continue to smoke.

- We MAY discontinue service to you.
- WE MAY ask you to leave.
- We MAY call the authorities.

[Then] Again I May Not...Have a nice day.

Even the press reported that “[s]imilar battles have not gone well for smoking proponents. In 2006, a federal judge in Colorado rejected an [sic] challenge to that state’s smoking ban and ruled that Colorado legislators had a rational basis to exclude casinos, as Iowa law does.”

Although a year later Eichhorn remarked that the state “did do something interesting in offering the judge a copy of all cases that have found smoking bans constitutional,” at the hearing he concluded his closing remarks “by dismissing the idea that very few legal challenges of smoking bans in other jurisdictions had succeeded [sic]. He joked that ‘they didn’t have George’—meaning those other plaintiffs didn’t have him for a lawyer.” In fact, the federal court in the 2006 Colorado case, Coalition for Equal Rights, Inc v Owens, both denied the plaintiff-bar (and other business) owners’ request for a temporary restraining order and granted the state defendants’ motion for summary judgment, dismissing the action. Despite opining that “[s]ince the people of the State of Colorado have managed since 1876 without a ban on indoor smoke, I do not consider the delay of a few weeks

---

328 Email from George Eichhorn to Marc Linder (July 14, 2009). Eichhorn was presumably referring to equal protection challenges. For extensive citation of such cases, see Defendants’ Brief in Opposition to Plaintiffs’ Application for Temporary Injunction at 8, 15, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 1, 2008).

or months to be consequential," the judge denied the motion for a TRO in large part because he found that plaintiffs’ equal protection challenge did not show a substantial likelihood of prevailing on the merits. The court reached this conclusion on the grounds that plaintiffs had misunderstood the nature of the requisite rationality that the equal protection clause demanded of the legislation in question. Their argument that the casino and other exemptions to the Colorado statute undermined its public health protective purpose and therefore could not be rationally related to this objective missed the point—repetitively prescribed by the U.S. Supreme Court—that “the relevant test is not whether the classifications imbedded in the Act are rationally related to the Government’s stated purpose. The Act survives constitutional scrutiny if its distinctions are rationally related to any conceivable government purpose, whether or not stated in the law or contained in the legislative record.” Consequently, the untenability of plaintiffs’ equal protection claim was demonstrated by the government’s contention “that casinos were exempted from the Act because of their unique constitutional and statutory status in Colorado, because casino gambling has only recently become legal in Colorado, because many of the towns in which casinos are located have become dependent on the revenues they generate and because they face severe competition from Indian Reservation casinos. Even the state derives economic benefit from its licensed casinos. Plaintiffs suggest that the revenues from casinos are an improper basis for making such a distinction, but provide no authority for the proposition that a

---

331 Coalition for Equal Rights, Inc. v Owens, at *15-16, 2006 U.S. Dist. Lexis 42723 (D. Colo., June 23, 2006). The court quoted F.C.C. v Beach Communication, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 315 (1993), which held (in quoting from the Court’s own precedents) that “those attacking the rationality of the legislative classification have the burden ‘to negative every conceivable basis which might support it’.... Moreover, because we never require a legislature to articulate its reasons for enacting a statute, it is entirely irrelevant for constitutional purposes whether the conceived reason for the challenged distinction actually motivated the legislature. Thus, the absence of ‘“legislative facts”’ explaining the distinction ‘on the record’...has no significance in rational-basis analysis. See Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 15...(1992) (equal protection ‘does not demand for purposes of rational-basis review that a legislature or governing decisionmaker actually articulate at any time the purpose or rationale supporting its classification’). In other words, a legislative choice is not subject to courtroom factfinding and may be based on rational speculation unsupported by evidence or empirical data. ““Only by faithful adherence to this guiding principle of judicial review of legislation is it possible to preserve to the legislative branch its rightful independence and its ability to function.”" consideration of fiscal impacts and cost benefit analysis is an improper basis for a Government decision under rational basis review.” As “to say the least, far fetched” the judge treated plaintiffs substantive due process claim that owners’ alleged right to allow smoking in their bars was a “fundamental right, equivalent to the other rights the Supreme Court has deemed fundamental, such as the right to travel, the right to vote, the right to procreate, and the right to marry....” A few months later the court dismissed the case altogether on largely the same bases. Of potentially great interest for Iowa was that by the time the federal appeals court affirmed the district court’s judgment in 2008 the Colorado legislature had already repealed the casino exemption.

Judge Staskal generated the most enlightening moment in the post-testimony stage of the proceeding when he “asked a question that seems to indicate he’s interested in an argument based on the unfairness of allowing smoking in [sic] the gambling floors of casinos, but barring it in bars & restaurants. ‘I never heard you say the words equal protection,’ the judge said to Eichhorn. Eichhorn indicated that was not part of his initial argument over the stay, but may be included in his subsequent briefs when the case is heard.” Failing to accommodate an adjudicator’s direct question about a line of reasoning that he apparently viewed as significant for the outcome of the case appears to be a sub-optimal litigation strategy and in his ruling three days later Staskal would pointedly remind plaintiffs just how crucial equal protection was. (Although Eichhorn later claimed that he had not presented the equal protection argument at the hearing because it “was not relevant to the Plaintiff’s [sic] request for temporary relief,” his clients revealed the real, substantive reason at the post-hearing press conference.) In contrast, Thompson at least offered a brief refutation of an equal protection claim by arguing that “businesses that are similarly situated are treated similarly, but...bars and casinos are ‘different animals’ citing economic evidence [that] shows that casinos would be impacted 335Coalition for Equal Rights, Inc. v Owens, 517 F3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008). On the repeal, see above ch. 35.

337Email from George Eichhorn to Marc Linder (July 14, 2009).
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

differently by the law.”  Possibly revealing the state’s defense against the claim that apparently everyone but Eichhorn considered plaintiffs’ only even potentially viable argument, Thompson indicated that the reason that the legislature had exempted casinos was “the gambling taxes casinos pay to the state and studies which indicate casino patronage has dropped significantly in casinos where smoking has been banned. ‘That revenue stream is significant to the state’....” (In contrast, he stated that “studies show business goes up in bars and restaurants when smoking is banned.”) Plaintiffs were acutely alive to the importance of this argument: “At several times as Thompson was offering legal arguments for the exception for casinos, bar owners in the crowd audibly reacted. As the laughs and exclamations became more frequent as Thompson’s explanation went on, the judge interjected: ‘Keep your reactions to yourself, please.’”

At a 15-minute press conference in the rotunda of the Polk County courthouse after the hearing four leading bar-owning members of the plaintiff organizations indulged in almost nonstop braggadocio and absurdly hyperbolic claims about the economic harm that the unconstitutional law during its first month had already wreaked on and over time would continue to wreak on barkeepers all over Iowa. That nostalgia for at-will public smoking was at the forefront of their oratory was hardly surprising: after all, what else could practically unite a group of wannabe-l Libertarians who voluntarily chose to make their living in what “is, without a doubt, the most heavily regulated business one could choose,” about whose detailed state and local-government imposed alcohol-related prescriptions and prohibitions they had not been famous for complaining? Only when it came to smoking did it, for example, occur to Larry Duncan to pose the radical anti-regulatory question: “[W]hy do a few elitist people in the state of Iowa have the power to make up and ram through a law about my business, when they don’t have a dime in it?” To be sure, when it came to saving his liquor license, Duncan was thoroughly capable of disingenuously dismounting his high

---

341Telephone interview with Lynn Walding, director, Alcoholic Beverages Division, Ankeny (July 15, 2009).
constitutional hobby horse and claiming that “he’d have no problem declaring smoking off limits in his restaurant [sic] if law makers would have [sic] not caved to lobbyists’ pressure and passed a bill that ties their hands, yet permits some businesses to allow their patrons to smoke. That’s patently unfair, Duncan says.”343 Lead speaker Van Roekel, striving valiantly not to drown in his self-generated bathos, intoned that the plaintiffs had begun the “fight to give back freedom to Iowans. No one should be forced to eat, drink or do business in a building that is nonsmoking.”344 (On its website, Choose Freedom Iowa, the newly formed umbrella organization that IBOC and COBRA co-founded and that in October was added as a plaintiff,345 falsified/sanitized parts of Van Roekel’s statement. In the sentence last quoted it replaced the final two words with “has smoking. No one would suggest that.”)346 Presumably expecting such rhetoric to resonate with non-bar-goers and whatever proportion of the state’s by now small minority of smokers were not indifferent to the health havoc that their secondhand smoke wreaked on nonsmokers, he attacked the “big brother government” that had “ripped away” the choice to shop in a store with smoking, thus revealing that, contrary to bar owners’ refrain, it was about smoking after all. Working himself into a lather, Van Roekel heroically proclaimed: “We will stop at nothing”—which threat Choose Freedom Iowa’s website unheroically deleted from the sanitized version—and announced that the bar owners would take the issue to the ballot box. In response to a reporter’s question as to why, despite Judge Staskal’s statement that he was “amenable” to an equal protection argument, plaintiffs failed to push it, especially with regard to casinos, Joe Sturgis, who owned the Rusty Nail in Davenport, revealed their pro-smoking 345http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/TIndex Frm (Oct. 15, 2008).

agenda: rather than wanting the casinos to lose their exemption, the bar owners wanted every business to have it because the state had no more right to ban a legal activity in businesses than in private homes. Whether his incoherent rant resulted from press conference-induced euphoria, mendacity, or mental incompetence, Sturgis went on to indulge in such quasi-hallucinatory claims as that 80 percent of bar owners were still permitting smoking and that passage of the smoking law had made it impossible for Democratic legislators to campaign in Iowa, who got shut down wherever they went. Similarly, van Roekel repeated his preposterous courtroom prediction that in a year 50 percent of the state’s bars would go out of business. And Fort Madison bar owner Bill Duncan’s dedication to accuracy was on exhibit in his claim that if the legislature had been serious about health, it would not have excluded half of Iowa’s employees from the law. Duncan also delivered the peroration, a panegyric on the Iowa constitution, for which “many, many men have died fighting...” Duncan, who insisted that “[i]t’s about rights, not about smoking,”349—a position difficult to reconcile with both IBOC’s selling buttons with a pointing Uncle Sam saying, “I want you to have a right to smoke” to finance “the legal fight”350 and Choose Freedom Iowa’s website’s homepage, which was adorned with several photos glorifying smoking351—but added that “[i]t’s not illegal to smoke,” demanded that the legislators and the governor be asked and give a yes or no answer to the question: “Do you believe in the Constitution?”352

Belief in the Iowa constitution—which, despite Eichhorn’s aforementioned

Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

citation to Iowa Supreme Court precedent to the contrary, boiled down to the bar owners’ child-like interpretation of the privileges and immunities clause—meant upholding small business owners’ alleged right to vindicate smoker-customers’ right to smoke regardless of the morbid and mortal consequences for the former’s nonsmoking employees and customers. Bill Duncan and his brother Larry Duncan made all of these points with unreserved naivete. In an op-ed piece in the Fort Madison paper (in which he previewed his stirring paean to the “[t]housands and thousands of brave soldiers [who] have died fighting for our Constitution” and urged that Iowans “not let soldiers’ deaths and sacrifices be in vain”) Bill Duncan prefaced his quotation of the text of the privileges and immunities clause with the assertion that “any third grader that can read can tell you that the governor and legislature have shredded our constitution with the smoking ban.”

(Yet even Darwin Bungen, the Burlington lawyer who would soon eclipse Eichhorn as the smoke-loving bar owners’ consigliere in chief, conceded that the provision should not be understood literally: “If I read the Iowa Constitution Article I, Section 6 as a lay person, it seems clear’. However, as a lawyer, he said it’s not as black and white.” Whether he shared that insight with his client before taking the latter’s money is unknown, but in response to the district court judge’s rejection of his privileges and immunities claim and every other claim that he had made Bungen admitted that he had been spewing bravado all along: “Bunger said he was disappointed by the ruling but as an attorney he was not entirely surprised by the judge’s assessment.”)

Larry Duncan, who presumably credited southeast Iowa State Representative Phil Wise and Senator Tom Courtney with at least a

353 “Laws uniform. SEC. 6. All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation; the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities, which, upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens.”

354 For editorial sympathy with this position, see, e.g., Steve Delaney, “Up in Smoke—West Burlington Bar Owner Gets His License and Live to Fight Another Day,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Aug. 24, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank): “Bar owners claim the several exemptions in the law violate that part of the Constitution. At first blush, it certainly appears to at least violate the spirit of it.”

third grader’s reading comprehension, spun his children’s tale further by accusing the legislators of having “‘violated the constitution. They took an oath to uphold the constitution to make laws fair and equitable for all.’” 358 Wise repaid the compliment by observing that “‘[i]f anybody thinks they’re going to knock the law off the books by that [lawsuit], they’re kidding themselves.’” 359

In his 10-page ruling issued three days later denying the request, Staskal suggested that the bar owners faced a significant persuasive burden because, despite the bracketing of agency action, the relief that plaintiffs sought “would block the operation of a duly enacted state law, a fact that obviously directly implicates the public interest.” 360

The court then considered and balanced the factors governing the grant of the order: the extent of the likelihood of success on the merits of plaintiffs’ underlying claim and of the substantial injury and irreparable harm that plaintiffs would suffer if the restraining order were not issued and whether, given the impact of the restraining order on the public interest, the private litigants’ interest might have to yield to the greater public interest. Staskal deemphasized the likelihood of success on the merits because “the other factors to be considered weigh strongly against the entry of a restraining order....” Eschewing “a full blown analysis of the merits of the claims,” he concluded from a preliminary analysis of the (aforementioned) five constitutional claims that only one—that the Smokefree Air Act violated the equal protection clause of the U.S. Constitution and the privileges and immunities clause of the Iowa Constitution—had a “reasonable likelihood of success.” 361 Although the fact that the statute’s ban on smoking in virtually all indoor areas and some outdoor areas was clearly reasonably related to achieving its stated purpose of improving Iowans’ public health by reducing the general public’s and employees’ exposure to harmful secondhand smoke made it unlikely that plaintiffs would prevail on their substantive due process claim, SAA’s exemptions for casino gambling floors (and fairgrounds) opened the possibility for plaintiffs at least to argue that “there is no rational explanation for the disparate treatment of these areas since they pose as great, if not greater [sic], a potential risk of public exposure to second hand smoke as [sic] do other similar areas where...smoking is banned” and that therefore the equal protection clause of the federal and the privileges and immunities clause of the Iowa Constitution had been violated. Although even in the absence of a “thorough explanation of the rationale for the challenged classifications” by the state Staskal “certainly cannot conclude that the defendants’ [sic; should be “plaintiffs’”] equal protection claims will prevail..., given the equal protection analysis the [Iowa Supreme] Court set forth in Racing Ass’n of Central Iowa v. Fitzgerald, 675 N.W.2d 1 (Iowa 2004), it is safe to conclude that the plaintiffs have at least a reasonable chance of succeeding on these claims because, on first impression, the exemptions appear to make the statute as a whole substantially under inclusive [sic] in relation to its stated purpose.” Despite this advisory to the state that it devise a more robust justification for the casino exemption if it wished to prevail on the merits, the judge concluded that “the likelihood of success factor weighs only slightly in favor of entering a restraining order.”

361 Ruling on Request for Temporary Restraining Order at 5, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 4, 2008). Interestingly, plaintiffs’ supporting brief devoted less space (one page) to this alleged constitutional flaw than any other; it quoted an Iowa Supreme Court case holding that a classification had to be sustained unless it was clearly arbitrary and bore no rational relationship to a legitimate governmental interest. Brief in Support of Application for Temporary Injunction at 29, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition [sic] v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., July 31, 2008).

The judge found that the bar owners did not offer strong evidence that they had or would suffer substantial economic harm from the smoking ban both because the testimony of their only two witnesses as to a “dramatic loss of revenue” was “anecdotal and unsupported by any kind of business records” and because they also “acknowledged the possibility that other factors could have played a role in the loss of revenue.” Moreover, the state’s “anecdotal evidence in the form of newspaper articles” indicated that some bars’ and restaurants’ revenues had actually increased since the ban had gone into effect. The state’s evidence was reinforced by the presentation of reliable studies of smoking bans around the United States showing that generally they had not had a negative impact on the bar and restaurant industry.\textsuperscript{363}

---

362 Ruling on Request for Temporary Restraining Order at 6-7, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 4, 2008). To be sure, under clear U.S. Supreme Court precedents: “A State...has no obligation to produce evidence to sustain the rationality of a statutory classification. ‘[A] legislative choice is not subject to courtroom factfinding and may be based on rational speculation unsupported by evidence or empirical data.’... A statute is presumed constitutional...and ‘the burden is on the one attacking the legislative arrangement to negative every conceivable basis which might support it,’...whether or not the basis has a foundation in the record.” Heller v Doe, 509 US 312, 320-21 (1993).

With regard to the third factor, irreparable harm, the state argued that the bar owners had failed to satisfy the requirement because the only injury that they alleged was financial damage that could remedied by monetary payments. While acknowledging the correctness of this statement of the law in general, Judge Staskal observed that, under Iowa Supreme Court precedent, extreme financial loss could constitute irreparable harm. The question then became whether the bar owners had demonstrated such loss. However, all that their testimony showed was that a single bar owner stated that the ban had had such a drastic effect on her business that she was forced to close and try to sell it. Had plaintiffs been able to marshal evidence of such a “widespread and general impact,” then they “could probably be said to have made a showing of irreparable harm. But there is no such evidence... ... The plaintiffs’ remaining evidence of adverse impact goes no further than showing that the law has resulted in decreased revenue at many establishments, causing the termination of employees but not resulting in the destruction of businesses.” Putting the factor totally out of the bar owners’ reach was implementation of the requirement that the court balance the harm prevented by issuing the restraining order against that would be caused by not issuing it: although there was evidence that issuance “may well prevent continued harm to many businesses...having overwhelmingly more weight is the fact that” issuing the restraining order “would prevent the Act from providing the public health benefits which justified its adoption.” Because there was no evidence that the legislature’s finding that secondhand smoke causes disease in nonsmokers was untrue, the court concluded that: “It practically goes without saying that interference with a law that is designed to prevent disease...would cause harm that weighs very heavily against entry of an order blocking its operation.” Consequently, on balance, the irreparable harm factor also weighed against issuing the restraining order.\textsuperscript{364}

At the outcome of consideration of the fourth and final factor, the impact of a restraining order on the public interest, Judge Staskal had already strongly hinted. In addition to the public’s “strong interest in enjoying the health benefits” that the Smokefree Air Act was designed to promote, the other way the public interest was implicated—and it too weighed against issuing the restraining order—was “the absence of interference by the judicial branch with the operation of duly enacted laws. The legislature, not the judiciary, is the voice of the people on policy matters.” And although the plaintiffs were correct in contending for the public’s interest in invalidating unconstitutional laws, “the only viable constitutional complaint” that Staskal was prepared to acknowledge, even preliminarily, namely, the law’s alleged underinclusiveness, was a “defect, if it exists” at all, that “does not denigrate the legitimacy of the policy generally underlying the act.” In a very significant advisory to the bar owners, the judge underscored that their argument with the greatest likelihood of success on the merits “ultimately argues in favor not of eliminating the smoking ban but of extending it to additional areas that are now exempt. Thus, even if the Act’s exemptions make it unconstitutionally discriminatory, blocking its operation would still frustrate the will of the people.” In the end, then, the question was not even close: “the balance of relevant factors tips strongly against” plaintiffs’ request.\footnote{Ruling on Request for Temporary Restraining Order at 9-10, Iowa Bar Owners Coalition v. Newton, Civ. No. [EQ]CE59509 (Polk Cty Dist. Ct., Aug. 4, 2008). For a brief summary of the ruling, see Jeff Eckhoff, “Judge Rejects Blocking Public Smoking Ban,” \textit{DMR}, Aug. 5, 2008, on http://www.desmoinesregister.com (visited Aug. 5, 2008).}

Judge Staskal’s message to the bar owners that the best they could hope to achieve with their equal protection claim was a ruling that SAA’s underinclusiveness would be remedied by eliminating the casino exemption essentially called their bluff: if they were really concerned about the alleged unfair competition that it caused for bars, resulting in—as many legislators had claimed\footnote{See above ch. 35. Since the casino owners were presumably able to see as many moves ahead as Struyk, it is unclear why they did not request the few House Democrats representing casino district who insisted on a casino exemption (which would be vulnerable to judicial invalidation) instead simply to vote against the bill altogether. Possibly these representatives had a sufficient number of anti-public-smoking constituents}—the flight of a financially disastrous proportion of their customers to casinos, then they should be satisfied; but if they were in fact pursuing the resumption of smoking (and not only in bars), as their Complaint suggested, then their judicial victory would be Pyrrhic because it would merely vindicate Vilsack’s litigation strategy, which they had already rejected, and hand Senate Democrats, Peterson, Olson, and other House advocates of quasi-universal coverage the law’s application to casinos that legislative Realpolitik, under pressure from casino capital, had denied them. Moreover, judicial extension of coverage to casinos was precisely the outcome Representative Struyk had warned against when he offered his (unsuccessful) amendment to make H.F. 2212 non-severable so that if a court invalidated any provision, the whole law would be struck down.\footnote{See above ch. 35. Without the casino exemption as a whipping boy, bar owners,} like Republican legislators, deprived of their only even marginally plausible fairness argument, would have been compelled to rely on their reactionary, pecuniarily self-interested, flat-earth-society defense of smoking regardless of the disease and death that it inflicted on their employees and customers. (Plaintiffs did in fact refuse to “concede” that the Smokefree Air Act’s purpose of reducing the general public’s and employees’ level of exposure to secondhand smoke was a “valid” statement of governmental interest.) Consequently, since bar owners’ best or perhaps only chance of prevailing on the merits entailed a strengthening of SAA that was anathema to them, it is puzzling that they did not dismiss their action already at this point before it boomeranged on them.369

The same day that StASKal issued his ruling Choose Freedom Iowa issued a press release calling it “just one small step back in the fight to return freedom to the citizens of Iowa.” Adopting the cigarette manufacturers’ decades-old accommodationist propaganda, embellished with the weasel word “forced,” it insisted that: “No one should be forced to eat, drink or do business in a building that has smoking. No reasonable person would suggest it. And no one should tell citizens where they can eat and drink if they choose to smoke in a business that 369 Asked directly to solve this puzzle, Eichhorn weakly responded that a ruling on a temporary restraining order was no basis on which to draw valid conclusions about the merits of a case. Somewhat more forthcoming was his admission that “my clients’ concerns were to level the playing field in a different manner than Attorney Vilsack and some other groups/persons. Although their position is a possible result of any litigation on equal protection grounds, we were trying to attack the legislation in a more complete manner.” Email from George Eichhorn to Marc Linder (July 14, 2009). The director of the Alcoholic Beverages Division offered an intriguing conjecture based on a recent trip to Burlington and the casino there, where the smoke was so thick that he surmised that many smoking bar-goers had switched to doing their drinking there. He speculated that as a result of such defections bar owners were actually in favor of striking the casino exemption, but that they did not want to appear as the ones pushing that anti-casino position. Walding himself hoped that a court would invalidate the exemption. Telephone interview with Lynn Walding, Ankeny (July 15, 2009).

chooses, as part of their own business model, to allow it.”

On August 29 plaintiffs filed a Recast and Substituted Petition from which the state sought an order removing references to the IDPH rules. Following a hearing on December 10, Staskal, giving the bar owners’s argument the benefit of the doubt, on January 2, 2009, denied the state’s motion to strike on the grounds that the IDPH rules were relevant evidence of the statute’s meaning, but at the same time ruled that plaintiffs could not challenge the administrative rules in this case.

At the end of December Staskal had set the case for an estimated five-day trial beginning on June 29, 2009, but in March Eichhorn withdrew as plaintiffs’ attorney, and at a status conference hearing on April 7, Judge Glenn Pille, who replaced Staskal, ordered plaintiffs’ counsel to file a written appearance, absent which he would dismiss the case with court costs assessed to plaintiffs. On May 5 he did dismiss the case without prejudice. The bar owners, despite their boasts of mobilizing 200,000 freedom-loving Iowans, dropped the case because they “couldn’t pay the high legal bills anymore” and their lawyer’s love for the constitution was apparently not great enough to persuade him to pursue this noble cause pro bono. ""[W]e were fighting for everyone in the state,"" said Joe Sturgis, ""and there wasn’t [sic] enough people supporting it. It’s an expensive lawsuit and we just ran out of funds.""

Brian Froehlich agreed that money played a part, but insisted that in part the reason for dismissal was ""that we’ve got people out there who have now got a legitimate case...regarding the constitutionality of the smoke ban."" Those people were Froehlich himself and Larry Duncan, whose liquor licenses the ABD had suspended for 30 days and revoked, respectively, and who had filed petitions for judicial review. Though this litigation was all about his undoing the suspension of his license, Froehlich persisted in projecting himself as an altruist: ""I am still working hard to make sure that the people of Iowa are represented properly and that this issue gets brought to court.""

However, in a more lucid moment Froehlich admitted that: ""There’s other people now that are personally involved in trying to save and protect their business.... We don’t all need to be having a court date, so we’re shifting efforts and support to those who are going to get this into court just on the basis of protecting their business from being shut down and closed. ... We don’t need to have 60 million court dates out there."" The additional 42 cases that at this point were wending their way through ABD’s administrative process testified to Attorney General Tom Miller’s declaration that ""we will not allow a small minority to flout"" the law. And Froehlich and Duncan, once again, made it clear that the infirmity of the law that they would continue to defy assiduously transcended the unequal protection that they purported to be challenging.

For the former ""[i]t’s about telling adults that they can’t no [sic] longer make up their own minds and their own decisions and government has to step in and be our mothers and fathers."" Duncan’s litigation horizon stretched...
even further, encompassing “‘not only all the civil rights, but also interstate commerce, tobacco is not illegal....’”

While IBOC and COBRA were winding down their state court action, Larry Duncan was initiating a similar federal action that was filed, in Eichhorn’s words, “immediately before the State tried to revoke Otis Campbell’s...liquor license” and is discussed below.

Enforcement

[T]here won’t be a smoking police.

We’re not gonna be as prescriptive as you may want us to be.

You do not have squads of tobacco police out roaming the streets trying to catch violators.

Whether the law is unconstitutional because it excludes one class of business is hardly certain. After all, many state laws are uneven. One denies 18- to 20-year-olds the right to drink. That clearly discriminates against citizens who have otherwise been declared adults with the right to vote, go to war or prison, be sued, incur debt and to raise children.... Bar owners may not like the 21-only law but presumably most obey it because to not do so can put them out of business. And despite the tyranny of discriminating against under age [sic] imbibers, no one has successfully challenged its constitutionality under state or federal law. But in West Burlington you can now obey the state laws you choose to and ignore those you detest. ... That was essentially what the city council said...in voting 3-1 to...let Duncan continue to allow smoking in his establishment in defiance of...state law....

On June 27, 2008, at the special telephonic conference meeting of the Iowa State Board of Health (the IDPH’s policy-making body) at which it unanimously adopted and filed emergency the agency’s Smokefree Air Act rules. Mapes noted that state health officials expected authorities to issue no more than 75 citations and fines—winned down from 3,000 to 4,000 complaints and supported by 800 on-site compliance checks—during the first year of the Smokefree Air Act’s operation. (In the event, from July 1, 2008 to June 30, 2009, IDPH received 3,318 complaints, of which it deemed 2,100 valid, in response to which it sent 1,417 Notice of Potential Violation letters, and conducted 325 compliance checks.) Though based on her “[d]iscussions with other state program managers in states with smokefree workplace laws,” this 390 Iowa Department of Public Health Division of Tobacco Use Prevention & Control, Iowa Smokefree Air Act: First Year Report figs. 2 and 3 at 9, fig. 10 at 12, fig. 15 at 14 (Aug. 2009), on http://www.iowasmokefreeair.gov/common/pdf/smokefree_summary_2009.pdf (visited Aug. 31, 2009). Three-fourths of valid complaints were made by the public, while one-fourth came from inspector reports. Id. fig. 4 at 10. Of 1,062 “businesses” (which included government entities) that received a first NOPV letter 216 (or 20 percent) also received a second NOPV. The number of third, fourth, fifth, and sixth to ninth NOPV letters was 85, 29, 14, and 11, respectively. Id. fig. 12 at 12. See also IDPH Press Release: “Compliance High in First Year of Smokefree Air Act” (June 30, 2009), http://www.idph.state.ia.us/common/press_releases/2009/20090630_smokefree.asp (visited Aug. 9, 2009). These data refer only to owners/managers of covered public places and do not include citations issued to individual smokers, about which local authorities were under no obligation to report to IDPH. Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Sept. 15, 2008).

391 Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Aug. 7, 2009). As early as February 21, 2008—almost seven weeks before the legislature passed SAA—IDPH’s public information officer told the press that “Iowa would probably follow the lead of other states in enforcement” and “would focus primarily on education, and not citations....” Jason Clayworth, “Smoking Ban Seen as Likely to Pass,” DMR, Feb. 21, 2008 (B1) (ProQuest). In response to that official’s statement that the department’s “research uncovered that the most effective method used by states that had enacted similar laws...is education,” he was asked for the sources showing that education was the most effective method to achieve volume, since it could, nevertheless, not have plausibly corresponded to the many thousands of citable violations by individual smokers and owners of public places that any enforcer would reasonably have anticipated, presumably reflected some policy decision and/or allocation of agency budgetary and staff resources. That a certain vision of enforcement—namely, “inspir[ing] compliance through education rather than penalties”—underlay these seemingly arbitrary limitations emerged from Mapes’s declaration that “‘[y]ou’re not going to be cited by roving bands of tobacco police if they see there’s not a sign in your window,’” but there’s still the possibility that we could end up with people getting citations and being fined,” but “‘you’re going to have to work pretty hard to get one’” by “choos[ing] to brazenly violate the new smoking compliance, that issuing citations was less effective, and how compliance was measured in other states. His answer that “[a] good bit of our research was done through one-on-one conversations with program staff in other states” left open the possibility that no other state had tried citations. Email between Marc Linder and Don McCormick (May 25 and 28, June 1, 2009).

3595
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

392To be sure, according to a contemporaneous Iowa press report, from the Minnesota Freedom to Breathe Act’s effective date of October 1, 2007 through the latter part of February 2008, the state Health Department had received fewer than 100 complaints, only one of which resulted in a citation. Jason Clayworth, “Smoking Ban Seen as Likely to Pass,” DMR, Feb. 21, 2008 (B1) (ProQuest). In fact, from Oct. 1, 2007 to Feb. 28, 2008 the MDH received 114 complaints, sent 98 notice of alleged violation letters (which were “educational” and required no response), 10 request for information letters (which did require a response from regulated party), and issued two correction orders and one non-forgivable administrative order. Email from John Olson, enforcement coordinator, Indoor Air Unit, MDH, to Marc Linder (Aug. 11, 2009). However, “the lion’s share” of complaints/citations were received/issued by local law enforcement and neither the state Health Department nor any other entity kept track of local enforcement; in addition, the statewide data encompassed only complaints/citations pertaining to owners since only local enforcement deals with individual smokers. Telephone interviews with Tom Hogan, director, indoor environment, and Dale Dorschner, supervisor, indoor air, Minnesota Department of Health, St. Paul (Aug. 10, 2009). The enforcement coordinator stated that the first year was “almost a grace period.” Telephone interview with John Olson, St. Paul (Aug. 11, 2009).

394Jeff Eckhoff, “Forecast: In 2 Years, Smoke Ban Will Thrive on Its Own,” DMR, June 28, 2008 (B1) (ProQuest).

396Jeff Eckhoff, “Forecast: In 2 Years, Smoke Ban Will Thrive on Its Own,” DMR, prohibition” because there would be “some initial forbearance for first-time and maybe even second-time offenders....” Violators would “probably get a warning” rather than a monetary penalty for first offenses since IDPH’s “whole emphasis, at least for the first few months, is educate, educate, educate because we know—except for the very small percentage of people who might want to take some kind of public stand and that’s not very many ’cause it hasn’t been in any other state—we know that if we can do that, we’re going to gain compliance....” Whether Mapes was being overly optimistic and whether she foresaw the extent and intensity of some bar owners’ resistance is unclear, but as the volume of administrative hearing complaints would soon reveal, she correctly understood that they were informationally incorrigible. Based on the patterns established in other states that had already gone through the enforcement process of a statewide smoking ban, she predicted only 200-300 checks in the second year. Mapes then boldly climbed way out on a limb to predict that: “‘By the third year it’s become the community norm and there’s virtually nothing that needs to be done.’”

Such predictions did not reassure the American Cancer Society’s lobbyist, Peggy Huppert, who told the Board that its advocates were “‘distressed when they hear bar owners say “we’re not going to comply with this law, come and make me” or police chiefs say “I’m not going to enforce the law”....” ACS did not have to look any further than the relatively sophisticated Iowa City Police Department. Despite the fact that IDPH rules stated that the department, pursuant to section 9(7) of SAA, “designates the law enforcement authorities of the state and of each political subdivision of the state to assist with the enforcement of 2008 Iowa Acts, House File 2212. A peace officer may issue a citation in lieu of arrest pursuant to Iowa Code chapter 805 against a person who smokes in an area where smoking is prohibited," Sergeant Troy Kelsay misinformed the public through the news media that: "If, as a patron in a restaurant or bar, you are offended [by someone smoking], you shouldn’t call the police.... You should address the issue with the management, and the establishment should handle it like any other unruly patron."

---

400 Pat Curtis, “Board Approves Smoking Ban Rules,” Radio Iowa (June 27, 2008), on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited Aug. 6, 2009). In contrast, the American Lung Association’s project manager, Kerry Wise, pointed to other states’ experiences: “‘people get very emotional about this issue for a while. Then it all kind of calms down. ... We expect that to happen here.’” Jason Clayworth, “For Smokers, It’s Almost Lights Out,” DMR, June 30, 2008 (B1) (ProQuest).

The assurance, which was more akin to a self-fulfilling prophecy, that enforcement would not be implemented by smoking police turned out, unsurprisingly, to be more accurate than the prediction of minimal and rapidly declining violations—in the absence of strict enforcement. One interesting example of deviations from both the assurance and the prediction took place at Parking Ramp II of the University of Iowa Hospitals and Clinics, where until August 2009 the hospital and central administrators and their police force, despite the fact that complaints about this location accounted for more than one-third of all smoking-violation complaints that the campus police received between July 1, 2008 and June 30, 2009, turned a blind eye to the massive and continuous smoking—evidenced by thousands of cigarette butts—that took place also so close to the doors leading into the hospital that the odor penetrated into the building. After repeated requests to administrators to enforce the law were ignored, an account of the pervasive and (un)civil disobedience together with an appeal to a receptive member of the Board of Regents from Iowa City, who also chaired the Board’s Hospital Committee and raised the issue a few days later with the university president and the top of the hospital hierarchy at a Board meeting, prompted the finally publicly embarrassed bureaucrats to order the police into Ramp II where they actually issued $50 citations to three smokers.

---

401 IAC § 641-153.8(2) (2009).

402 Christopher Patton, “Local Police Take Light-Handed Approach to Smoking Ban,” DI, July 3, 2008, on http://www.dailyiowan.com (bracketed words in original). Kelsay added that if owners “refuse to enforce the ban, they will be subject to penalties.... However, such issues will be referred to” IDPH, “which will take the lead in ensuring business compliance.” Assuming that the student reporter accurately reproduced Kelsay’s statement, it remained a mystery by whom owners’ violations would be “referred” to the agency since he had already told “offended” customers not to bother the police.

403 Calculated according to UI Department of Public Safety, “Prohibited Smoking Calls” (print-out sold by UI DPS) (75 of 223).

404 Nine months into the ban, the chief of the UI police stated: “‘My directions to my officers are to not write citations.’” Jennifer Delgado, “Where There’s Smoke, No Fines,” DI, Mar. 24, 2009 (1A:2-5). See also “Laura Klaarmont, “Police Not Issuing Smoking Citations,” DI, Dec. 19, 2008, on http://www.dailyiowan.com. Whereas the University of Iowa had not issued any citations on any of the thousands of occasions on which smokers had violated the law during its first year, it issued two on July 14 (Scott Raynor, “1st UI university president told the Regents that “the issue is more people who are unaware of the rules and are willing to comply when approached by UI police,” while her defeatist vice president for medical affairs insisted that “[w]e are working with...[the] Department of Public Safety...to review this issue, but we will never resolve it. There will always be people that smoke.” The president’s statement raised an interesting epistemological question inasmuch as it was difficult to imagine how the president imagined that she could possibly know that most violators were unaware of the ban since she and her subordinates virtually never interacted with, let alone scientifically surveyed, them. That any University of Iowa employee or student was unaware would have been extraordinarily implausible; and if any hospital visitor or patient was unaware, such ignorance would have largely been the result of the university’s failure to have posted any no-smoking signs in the areas of heaviest smoking in the ramp.

Smoke Tickets Issued,” DI, July 17, 2009 (1A:6)) and then on August 4 issued the three mentioned in the text; on August 5 it issued four more at other locations (including one in another UIHC parking ramp). Data communicated telephonically by the records division of UI DPS (Aug. 7, 2009). That the three were issued on August 4, the day before the Regents meeting, was presumably related to the email to Regent Downer, which he also asked to be sent to the CEO of the UIHC and the Vice President for Medical Affairs. Email from Marc Linder to Robert Downer, Jean Robillard, Ken Kates, and Paul Rothman (July 31, 2009).

Similarly, the hospital’s spokesperson alleged that “[m]ost people are compliant when told of the no-smoking rule.” “UI Hospitals Step Up Enforcement of People Caught Smoking,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Aug. 5, 2009, on http://www.gazetteonline.com. In fact, the experience of many non-police employees of the University, whom the university president has instructed that it is their responsibility to enforce the law, has been that fellow university employees either ignore or react hostilely to requests that they comply with the smoking ban. The UIHC CEO’s statement that “UI Police are also issuing citations to people who continue to smoke after they are warned of the policy” left unanswered the question as to why people smoking just inches from a no-smoking sign needed to be warned. Id.

The university did not even begin to post signs in the ramp until August 7, 2009, and even when the manager of parking operations was walking through the ramps that day with signs to post, he had to be reminded of the crucial importance of posting one at the location where more smokers congregated than anywhere else. Moreover, he had removed the one useful sign on the inside of the hospital door instructing those exiting that smoking was prohibited outside, while leaving in place the decal facing outside that actually encouraged unlawful smoking in the ramp by informing those entering the building, “No Smoking, Please Extinguish Materials Outside,” thus falsely implying that smoking outside...
Moreover, her additional claim that “‘I think our Department of Public Safety is doing everything it can to try and enforce these rules” was risible since they had done virtually nothing during the first 400 days of the law’s existence when alone in the hospital ramps probably hundreds of thousands of cigarettes had been unlawfully smoked. And even the mini-flurry of ticketing that took place on August 4-5 in the wake of the Regents’ expression of displeasure unsurprisingly turned out to be little more than a Potemkin Village: the police issued no tickets on August 6, 7, or 8, although smokers, including UIHC employees, continued violating the law openly and belligerently. The total of five additional citations that the UI police issued campus-wide through August 20 did not even equal the number of people observed smoking unlawfully on level 2 of Ramp II within a period of a few minutes on any day.410 the hospital building in the ramp was permitted. When the official sought to justify removal of the first sign on the grounds that it did not conform to the requirements of the IDPH rules, he had to be told that they did not require removal of additional signs that provided helpful information tailored to the locality. He did, however, remove the misleading sign. Discussion with Jeff Rahn (Aug. 7, 2009, 2:00-2:30 p.m.).

Alone on one half of Ramp II Level 2 the number of cigarette butts on the ground was estimated to be about 2,000 even a few days after the police had begun issuing tickets. (Around noon on Aug. 8, 2009, about 50 butts were counted on average in each of several equal segments of which there were 40.) According to the operations manager, the ramps were swept every day or two. Interview with Jeff Rahn (Aug. 7, 2009).

E.g., on August 7 within a period of a few minutes six people were observed smoking on Level 2 of Ramp II; when the manager of the ramp told two of them that smoking was illegal, they told him that they did not care and that they had been smoking there for three months. He called the police who, however, arrived after they had left. The policeman (J. Voeller) stated, inter alia, that hospital employees were the worst offenders. On Saturday August 8 six more people were observed smoking in the same location; the two most belligerent smokers were hospital cafeteria employees. On the additional citations, see Samantha Honken, “Smoking War Continues,” DI, Aug. 21, 2009 (1A:4-6). Almost two weeks later, when a local reporter finally visited the ramp and observed that “the no-smoking signs were charred with the black residue of snuffed-out tobacco,” the total number of citations had increased by only three to 15. Josh O’Leary, “UI Begins Citing Smokers on Campus,” ICP-C, Sept. 3, 2009, on http://www.press-citizen.com. This web of nonfeasance came full circle when, by coincidence, IDPH, in response to several complaints, conducted a site inspection of the University of Iowa, including the ramp, on the same afternoon as the local reporter’s visit, but the inspector reported that “[n]o evidence of smoking was evident.” If there was in fact no such evidence, that pristine state may have been the result of yet another Potemkin village created by the University of Iowa.

3600
In the event, from the outset the complaints of potential violations—240 of which were received during the first 11 days\(^{411}\)—conformed to the expected pattern in that bars and restaurants accounted for almost three-fourths of the initial 21 violation notices (which, as noted above, IDPH on its own had turned into “educational notice[s]”) sent out by mid-July.\(^ {412}\) (During the entire first year of the law’s operation bars/restaurants accounted for 61 percent of all valid complaints, 52 percent of all Notice of Possible Violation letters, and 84 percent of all compliance checks.)\(^ {413}\) During the Act’s first month the agency logged a total of 540 complaints, deeming 57 of them serious enough to merit a first notice of potential violation and two a second notice.\(^ {414}\) From the fewer than 1,000 complaints that the IDPH had received by September 1—which resulted in only six site visits by law enforcement—its director concluded that education had been effective in enforcing the law.\(^ {415}\)

---

\(^{413}\) Iowa Department of Public Health Division of Tobacco Use Prevention & Control, Iowa Smokefree Air Act: First Year Report fig. 5 at 10, fig. 11 at 12, fig. 16 at 14 (Aug. 2009), on http://www.iowasmokefreeair.gov/common/pdf/smokefree_summary_2009.pdf (visited Aug. 31, 2009). Retail stores/services accounted for the second highest proportions of valid complaints and NOPV letters—12 percent and 21 percent, respectively; private/membership clubs accounted for the second highest proportion of compliance checks—5 percent. Id. The divergence between percentage of valid complaints and that of NOPV letters was in part explained by the fact that a letter may have been based on more than one complaint. Id. at 12. Asked whether there was any way to distinguish between bars and restaurants, the director of the Division of Tobacco Use Prevention and Control stated: ‘There is no way to easily and reliably separate bars and restaurants. The ‘tavern without food preparation’ designation on food service licenses is voluntary. Business with liquor licenses get the bulk of the complaints, but most of those establishments are restaurants with liquor licenses and not bars as defined by the SFAA.” Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (Aug. 31, 2009).

\(^{415}\) IDPH Press Release: “Smokefree Law Enforcement Efforts Ongoing” (Sept. 4,
The bar owners’ state court lawsuit, while pursuing the objective of invalidating SAA altogether, also served the purpose of outflanking the administrative enforcement process that the IDPH, ABD, and Attorney General’s office had initiated in order to secure compliance by those openly and blatantly flouting the smoking ban. Larry Duncan assumed a pioneering role by permitting smoking in his bar in West Burlington from the ban’s very first day of operation. From July 1 to August 9 he racked up 50 complaints. (In comparison, his closest competitor for Iowa’s most prominent scofflaw, Brian Froehlich in Wilton, was virtually a model of compliance with only seven 416 The ABD/Smokefree Air Act enforcement process was structured as follows:

The Iowa Department of Public Health (IDPH) docket complaints received from the public, governmental inspectors, or law enforcement personnel. In response to all verified complaints, IDPH communicates a notice of potential violation to the violating business in an effort to educate the business as to its responsibilities and duties under the Smokefree Air Act, and to achieve voluntary compliance with the Act.

If it becomes apparent that such educational efforts are ineffective in bringing a liquor licensee into compliance with the Smokefree Air Act, the Iowa Attorney General’s Office, on behalf of the Iowa Department of Public Safety, files a hearing complaint with the Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Division (ABD) against the violating licensee.

Once filed, the hearing complaint is set for an evidentiary hearing in Ankeny, Iowa, before an administrative law judge. Following hearing, the administrative law judge will issue a proposed decision adjudicating whether a violation of the Smokefree Air Act has occurred and, if so, imposing an appropriate sanction (typically a 21-day to 30-day license suspension). Further review of the administrative law judge’s proposed decision may be sought by any party from the Administrator of the Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Division. The Administrator will then issue a final decision on behalf of the ABD. Judicial review of the ABD Administrator’s final decision may be sought in the Iowa District Court.

A hearing complaint also may be resolved through an informal settlement agreement. In such circumstances, the liquor licensee and the prosecuting Assistant Attorney General negotiate a stipulated penalty for the alleged violation (typically a $1,000 civil penalty coupled with a seven-day license suspension). If the stipulated settlement is approved by the ABD Administrator, an order will be entered implementing the terms of the settlement agreement, and no further action or hearing is necessary.

complaints to his debit through August 28.)\(^{418}\) On two occasions West Burlington police officers personally observed people smoking openly inside Duncan’s bar. IDPH, based on these numerous complaints, issued him three Notices of Potential Violation; having manifestly failed to have gotten his attention, the agency informed him on August 20 that that day’s third Notice had been forwarded to local law enforcement for further action.\(^{419}\)

Coincidentally, that very evening the West Burlington city council had on its new business agenda consideration of renewing the liquor license for Duncan’s bar. Because of the many complaints that the city had received about Duncan’s failure to comply with the smoking ban, what might otherwise have been a routine renewal process turned contentious, thrusting the southeast town of about 3,000 near the Mississippi River onto “the front lines” of the smoking battle. The 66-year-old Duncan, who regarded the complaints as “badges of honor in the war to repeal” a law that had been “rammed down small business owners’ throats ‘in order to benefit a handful of people,’” apparently did not view the untold number of customers whose exposure to sickening secondhand smoke he had made possible over 14 years as having in any way undermined his self-vindicated role of “‘good community steward.’” Duncan may have expected all Iowa constitution lovers to “‘stand up and fight this,’” but the violations had in fact prompted police chief Alex Oblein to decline to sign off on the renewal. Because the city council was already known not to be of one mind on the matter, and every day people had been calling the city administration “‘mad’” that Duncan had been getting away with his civil disobedience, while others were saying “‘Screw the State,’” the city administrator expected the polarization to generate a big crowd packing city hall.\(^{420}\)

The three-hour debate did not disappoint—at least not for Duncan, whose license was set to expire on August 30. In a letter to the council, Oblein had recommended non-renewal based on the numerous complaints and potential violations, some of which he had personally observed, when, at the request of the ABD, he performed an on-site inspection during which he found customers

\(^{420}\)Jeff Abell, “‘State Smoking Ban Holds Liquor License,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Aug. 20, 2008 (1A) (Newsbank).
smoking, ash trays on tables, and no required no-smoking signs posted. Oblein wanted it clearly understood—saying it earlier that morning at a statewide IDPH public hearing (via the fiber optic Iowa Communications Network) on amendments to the proposed SAA rules and repeating it at the city council meeting—that he did not want to be the smoking police, especially in businesses.\footnote{Iowa Department of Public Health, Public Hearing for Amendments to Proposed Rules to the Smokefree Air Act (Aug. 20, 2008) (based on notes taken at the Iowa City site); Christinia Crippes, “Ban Continues to Divide People,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Aug. 21, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank); Jeff Abell, “Council Gives Bar Nod,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Aug. 21, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank).} The wilfulness of Duncan’s violations was the decisive point for the police chief.\footnote{City of West Burlington, Regular Council Meeting, [Minutes], Oct. 20, 2008, on http://www.westburlington/archive/minutes/2008/Aug%2020.pdf.} Council member Rick Raleigh, having seen this kind of law work in other states, felt that Duncan should comply with it; in contrast, his colleague Rod Crowner understood Oblein’s position, but nevertheless did not feel that the city should revoke a liquor license for a smoking violation. To the council an unrepentant Duncan “openly stated that he will continue to allow patrons to smoke...”\footnote{Jeff Abell, “Council Gives Bar Nod,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Aug. 21, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank).} To be sure, he was sufficiently in touch with local political realities, especially after the mayor had chided both the state and Duncan for putting the city in a “‘bad situation,’” to know to apologize to the mayor and council for having “placed them in the middle of his crusade against the smoking ban.”\footnote{City of West Burlington, Regular Council Meeting, [Minutes], Oct. 20, 2008, on http://www.westburlington/archive/minutes/2008/Aug%2020.pdf.} Despite the police chief’s having personally witnessed violations and Duncan’s just having publicly admitted that he had violated and would continue to violate the law, Eichhorn asked the council to approve the license because the bar had never been “officially sited [sic] for breaking the law. ... Until a judicial magistrate determines there is a violation, he feels that no violation exists.” A number of bar owners, including Sturgis, also spoke up on Duncan’s behalf. Although the entire council agreed that Duncan should comply with the until it was changed, three of the four members present nevertheless voted to approve the renewal.\footnote{Jeff Abell, “Council Gives Bar Nod,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Aug. 21, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank).} Ostensibly the reason for the approval was, as one of the three-member majority, “amid thunderous applause,” put it, that “‘I don’t have anything in front of me that shows me...any liquor violations. ... If the state was very serious about wanting to enforce this [smoking law], they could do it at any time. I don’t have a lot of faith in my state government. I don’t see where little West Burlington, Iowa, should be the one to take this up.’”26 Seemingly, only German immigrant, Mayor Hans Trousil27 understood the relevant provisions of the Iowa Code: “‘Part of the liquor license criteria is that someone who wants a liquor license is not supposed to violate any laws. Any way you cut it, he has violated the law. I don’t think the right message is allowing a bar across the street from City Hall to continue to break the law.”28 (Police Chief Oblein also understood, but nevertheless did not fault the council for renewing Duncan’s license, even though it sent “the wrong message to the community.”)29 Unsurprisingly, given this attitude, the city government did not believe that it itself needed to comply with the law: it permitted smoking on the steps of city hall—in which many in the audience engaged during a break30—in violation of the law’s prohibition of smoking on the grounds of public buildings.31

To the West Burlington city council’s abdication of its responsibility to “take action against a local bar owner who refuses to obey a statewide smoking ban” IDPH responded the very next day that it was “very concerned” about Duncan’s blatant disregard of the law, but apart from indicating that the department was discussing the matter with the city and on the state level, its spokesperson declined to reveal what its next steps would be, although he mentioned the possibility of the state’s denying the license for noncompliance. Following in the

427 http://www.westburlington.org/city_council/bios_photos.htm
428 Jeff Abell, “State to Decide Action Against Bar Owner,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Aug. 22, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank). According to Iowa Code § 123.30(2) (2008): “No liquor control license shall be issued for premises which do not conform to all applicable laws, ordinances, resolutions, and health and fire regulations.” According to IAC § 185—4.2(1) (2008): “The interior and exterior of all licensed premises shall be kept clean, free of litter or rubbish, painted and in good repair. Licensees and permittees shall at all times keep and maintain their respective premises in compliance with the laws, orders, ordinances and rules of the state, county and city health and fire departments and the Iowa department of inspections and appeals.” 431 H.F. 2212, § 3(2)(e); IAC, Rule 641—153.2.
foot (in mouth) steps of President George W. Bush, Duncan exulted: “‘Bring it on. If it stinks, it stinks, and this law stinks to high heaven.’” He then reverted to incoherence by admitting, yet again, that he was allowing customers to smoke in his bar, and then about-facing and, once again, complaining that: “‘I haven’t violated anything. ... I have never been told who my accusers are. I have never been given due process.’” Duncan’s self-crucifixion campaign, which he persisted, ad nauseam, in characterizing as “‘about protecting the constitutional rights of you, me and everybody in Iowa,’” did not sit well with at least some of his competitors in adjoining Burlington. One of them remarked that it “‘really irks the (expletive) out of me. I don’t support the smoking law either, but I’m following it. ... I’m losing customers because they can smoke over there.’” Another who agreed with Duncan that the law was unconstitutional but was nevertheless complying with it “‘because it’s the law,’” resented the fact that smokers’ migration to Duncan’s bar was “‘taking money out of my pocket.’”

As was the case with others of his public statements, Duncan’s reaction to the charge that renewal of his license had created “an unfair playing field” that benefited (only) him stood reality on its head: asserting that “the law was meant to pit bar owners against each other,” he “suggested other bar owners follow his lead”—an invitation to join his race to the bottom that was not universally welcomed.

On September 3 the Iowa Department of Public Safety filed a complaint with the ABD administrator declaring that 48 public complaints had been filed against Duncan’s bar and grill alleging that he had permitted smoking on the premises and requesting that the administrator suspend and/or revoke Duncan’s license for his “open and continuing failure to comply with all applicable provisions of the Smokefree Air Act.” Rather than forcefully warning scofflaws that the end of their civil disobedience was imminent, ABD Administrator Walding merely observed that the attorney general’s filing of the complaint put business owners on notice that the state was “prepared to enforce the Smokefree Air Act.” He did add, however, that Duncan was “‘paving the way’” for six more bar owners who were going down the same road to a noncompliance hearing. Reveling in the opportunity to play a B-movie Robin Hoodish desperado, Duncan wallowed in nonsense and incoherence: incapable of accepting the state’s initiation of the revocation proceeding as the straightforward (albeit overdue) enforcement action it was, he by turns accused the government of “trying to make an example of him to scare others from joining his cause” and “trying to force me to eat crow and bow down to them like they were the queen.” But this self-sacrificer was having none of it: “I’m standing up for everyone in Iowa. I am fighting for everyone who loves the constitution.” In fact, he was not even speaking for all bar owners: “He’s angered competitors who are following the controversial law. Doesn’t care.” Walding, however, was as good as his word: a week later the Department of Public Safety filed a virtually identical complaint against Froehlich.

432 Jeff Abell, “State to Decide Action Against Bar Owner,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Aug. 22, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank).

Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

And on Larry Duncan’s violations went. At the second law enforcement site visit that Chief Oblein made on September 24 he again observed customers openly smoking (and again he failed to issue them citations) and Duncan confirmed to Oblein on the spot that he knew about the violations. Then on October 30, the day before Duncan’s administrative hearing on the complaint, Oblein witnessed another customer smoking whom no employee asked to stop, but the police chief cited neither the smokers nor the employees nor Duncan. A week before the October 31 hearing, Eichhorn filed a complaint in federal court for the Southern District of Iowa largely replicating the IBOC/COBRA Polk County case, whose focus on agency rules had been procedurally stymied. The federal case was designed with the urgent practical purpose of preempting the administrative enforcement process that might lead to the revocation of Duncan’s liquor license—or, as the Iowa Attorney General put it: “Rather than seek to fully litigate the merits of its statutory and constitutional claims through the ongoing administrative disciplinary action, the Plaintiff opted instead to pursue federal litigation.”

439 Brief in Support of Motion to Dismiss at 3, Coordinated Estate Services, Inc., d/b/a denied Duncan his procedural due process rights under SAA and that the statute itself violated the U.S. Constitution both for the same reason and because it violated the latter’s equal protection, privileges and immunities, and interstate commerce clauses.\footnote{Complaint at 1-2, Coordinated Estate Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v. Walding, Civ. Action Case No. 3:08-CV-138 (S.D. Iowa, Oct. 24, 2008).}

Eichhorn was unable to stitch together this pleading without resort to such falsification as asserting that the law “requires” employers and owners “to affirmatively stop smokers” from smoking in prohibited places,\footnote{Complaint at 6, Coordinated Estate Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v. Walding, Civ. Action Case No. 3:08-CV-138 (S.D. Iowa, Oct. 24, 2008).} whereas in fact the statute merely required them to inform smokers that the latter were violating the law,\footnote{Iowa Code § 142D.8(3) (2009).} and the IDPH rules added the requirement that they “request that the smokers stop smoking immediately.” If smokers persisted, employers/owners had no obligation to do anything—not even to call the police or inform IDPH.\footnote{IAC § 641-153.5(4) (2008).}

Disingenuousness also characterized Duncan-Eichhorn’s assertion that the Smokefree Air Act violated procedural due process because its “enforcement system deprives the alleged violator of the names of witnesses..., thereby denying the alleged violator the right to confront witnesses....”\footnote{Application for Temporary Restraining Order and Preliminary Injunction at 3, Coordinated Estate Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v. Walding, Civ. Action Case No. 3:08-CV-138 (S.D. Iowa, Oct. 24, 2008).} Since Duncan not only admitted, but proudly, publicly, and ad nauseam boasted that he was permitting smoking “in order to get cited and open the door to a challenge in state court,”\footnote{Amy Lorentzen, “Judge Considers Case of Bar Violating Smoking Ban,” \textit{Clinton Herald}, Nov. 1, 2008, on http://www.clintonherald.com (visited July 18, 2009).} and the ALJ in his license suspension/revocation proceeding found that he “concedes that he and his employees have been permitting customers to smoke on the licensed premises,”\footnote{Proposed Decision at 9, In re Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill, Docket No. D-2008-00080 (Iowa Department of Commerce, Alcoholic Beverages Div., Jan. 2, 2009).} he had no need to confront witnesses: his defense of unconstitutionality—which had nothing to do with the police chief’s personally having observed him violating the law—could not, pursuant to the Iowa Supreme Court precedent, be adjudicated by an administrative agency, but could be raised and preserved for judicial review. In light of his continual self-glorification for permitting smoking in defiance of the law, his sworn affidavit complaining that “the State is waging a campaign of accusations to hold my business...up to public ridicule and scorn without allowing us any way of disputing their accusations” was nonsensical.

Duncan’s commerce clause claim was not only a product of a desperate throwing-in-the-kitchen-sink approach, but also, once again, clearly underscored that resisting bar owners’ real demand was not for a ‘level playing field,’ but for at-will smoking. The section on the commerce clause, factoids supporting which occupied 13 of the complaint’s 32 pages, insisted that not only the Smokefree Air Act, but also the state’s recently increased cigarette tax and even its fire-safe cigarette law were part and parcel of the state’s “systematic effort to burden and discriminate against tobacco products,” which was unconstitutional because the “asserted public health concern is insufficient to permit this violation of the Commerce Clause, in that the factual basis for its claims are disputed by the United States, members of the scientific community, the Courts, and others”—assertions that revealed Eichhorn as a master in equal measure of constitutional commerce clause law, the science of the health consequences of involuntary smoke exposure, and elementary English grammar.

All this flat-earthism served only as filler to get to the point, which was a request for a preliminary injunction (which had been unavailing before Judge Staskal) to “bar the...ABD from conducting an evidentiary hearing on the merits of the pending DPS complaint” and to spare Duncan revocation of his liquor license. The district court denied Duncan’s motion for a temporary restraining 447 Salsbury Laboratories v Iowa Dept of Environmental Quality, 276 NW2d 830, 836 (Iowa 1979). order on October 30.\textsuperscript{453}

---

The following day Duncan had his hearing before the ALJ in his liquor license case. In case Duncan felt deprived of the opportunity to confront witnesses, Police Chief Oblein appeared and testified that just the previous day he had, at the state’s request, done a site check at Duncan’s bar, where he observed smoking in prohibited areas, the presence of ashtrays, and the absence of no-smoking signs. To be sure, Oblein added that no citations had been issued against the bar because the West Burlington city council believed that the state should conduct enforcement: “Duncan has made it clear he’s going to challenge the smoking ban, and the city can’t afford to pursue the case. ‘They made the problem, they should be the one to handle it.’”\textsuperscript{454} The real reason for the city government’s refusal to issue a citation was that “West Burlington does not have a city attorney, and the city council fears it could cost them thousands of dollars in attorney fees if they issue a citation to the licensee, and it becomes a test case for the constitutionality of the Smokefree Air Act.”\textsuperscript{455} In contrast, if West Burlington prevailed, “the city would only get a $100 fine.”\textsuperscript{456}

On January 2, 2009, state Administrative Law Judge Margaret LaMarche ordered that Duncan’s liquor license be suspended for a minimum of 30 days for his intentional violations of the Smokefree Air Act and his “defiance” of a duly enacted statute because he “disagree[d] with the legislature’s rationale for a statute....” The ALJ thereby accepted the Department of Public Safety’s argument that Duncan’s open defiance of the health law and rules applicable to licensed premises requires a penalty sufficient to deter similar violations by other liquor licensees.” This consideration was reinforced by the patent unfairness of allowing Duncan to gain business at the expense of compliant competitors. At the end of the minimum 30-day period the suspension, LaMarche ordered, “may be \textsuperscript{453}Clerk’s Court Minutes, Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. v Walding, Case No. 3:08-cv-00138 (S.D. Iowa, Oct. 30, 2008). Although the minutes stated merely that the motion had been denied, the judge, according to a later brief submitted by the state, citing the \textit{Younger} abstention doctrine, allowed the ABD’s administrative disciplinary action against Duncan to proceed. Brief in Support of Motion to Dismiss at 3, Coordinated Estate Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v. Walding, Civ. Action Case No. 3:08-CV-138, 2009 WL 960942 (S.D. Iowa, Jan. 20, 2009).

Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

lifted” if Duncan removed all ashtrays, posted the required no-smoking signs, and gave ABD “a sworn written statement of commitment to comply with the provisions of the Iowa Smokefree Air Act at all times in the future,” absent which “the suspension shall continue until” Duncan demonstrated compliance.457 (The same day the ALJ issued a proposed decision in Froehlich’s case ordering a 21-day suspension.)458 Still unbowed and having yet to ingest the slightest sliver of crow, Duncan manfully told the press that he would continue to fight the smoking ban “until he draws his last breath.” Nor could anything less be expected from Iowans’ outsized hero who, along with his wife and lawyer Bungar, “worried about what other personal freedoms will be taken away if people don’t fight this.” Just about the only thing that could “frustrate[ ]” this champion of civic virtue was that he had not realized that instead, as his wife put it, of getting a $100 ticket and going to court “so the people can tell us if it’s right or wrong,”459 he was now on the verge of having his liquor license yanked on a bar that netted (after sales taxes) $1.2 million annually.460

This feigned surprise was typical for bar owners. A somewhat more candid tale of woe was told by one of Duncan’s confreres near Des Moines: “‘I thought it was going to be like the seat belt law, you know, or some of the other laws they don’t enforce’.... He admits he didn’t pay much attention to Iowa’s Smoke Free Air Act and let customers light up in his bar up until last month. ‘I was just 457Proposed Decision at 17, 18-19, In re Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill, Docket No. D-2008-00080 (Iowa Department of Commerce, Alcoholic Beverages Div., Jan. 2, 2009). SAA provides that a violation by an owner of a covered place “may result in the suspension or revocation of any permit or license issued to the person for the premises on which the violation occurred.” Iowa Code § 142D.9(4) (2009).

---

Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

seeing what they were gonna do. I thought the first fine was $100. If I knew I was going to lose my license, we would never smoke in there.” Walding captured their attitude: “‘It was sort of a dare, show us what you were going to do.’”\(^{461}\) A $1,000 fine and a week’s suspension of the liquor license\(^{462}\) became a teachable moment for the violator: “‘We’ll make sure no one smokes in there.’”\(^{463}\)

It is difficult to reconstruct the logic that underlay owners’ claims that the Smokefree Air Act failed to put them on notice as to the potential economic consequences of permitting smoking in their bars. After all, the statute clearly specified that: “If a public place is subject to any state or political subdivision inspection process or is under contract with the state or a political subdivision, the person performing the inspection shall assess compliance with the requirements of this chapter and shall report any violations to the department of public health or the department’s designee.”\(^{464}\) And even more unmistakably and transparently it brought to readers’ attention that: “In addition to the penalties established in this section, violation of this chapter by a person who owns, operates, manages, or who otherwise has custody or control of a public place, place of employment, area declared a nonsmoking place pursuant to section 142D.5, or outdoor area regulated under this chapter may result in the suspension or revocation of any permit or license issued to the person for the premises on which the violation occurred.”\(^{465}\) The claim of unfair surprise was, moreover, completely undermined

---

\(^{465}\) H.F. 2212, § 9(4)/Iowa Code § 142D.9(4) (2009). Bar owners argued that these provisions had to be interpreted to make ABD license action conditional on prior assessment of progressive monetary penalties by a judicial magistrate pursuant to § 142D.9(2). However, as the ABD administrator ruled in his final order in Duncan’s case, that argument was “without merit” because, if the legislature had intended to preempt ABD’s statutory authority to regulate licensed establishments for violations of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, it would have done so, but it did not. Moreover: “The wording of the license suspension and revocation provision, as well as its placement in a subsection separate from the Iowa Smokefree Air Act’s progressive monetary penalties, supports the conclusion that license suspension and revocation are independent sanctions that may be imposed by the relevant licensing authority and are not dependent upon a by the full quotation, in italics, of this latter provision in the Notice of Potential Violation letters that the IDPH sent to bar owners about unlawful smoking on whose premises the department had received complaints.466

The critical importance of enforcement of the Smokefree Air Act at the state government level became obvious in the wake of the fiasco in West Burlington, where the city council not only renewed scofflaw Duncan’s liquor license, but the city government “decided not to enforce the law at all” because, not having a staff attorney, it would have to pay an attorney $180 an hour to secure a $100 penalty from a non-compliant bar owner. As City Administrator Dan Gifford told the attorney general’s office: “You have attorneys that work for you. You guys come and do it because this is your law.”467 Perhaps in reaction to such resistance, in November Attorney General Miller sent a letter to Iowa’s 99 county attorneys explaining that in “the event that civil enforcement is necessary, your assistance will be essential. It is in everyone’s best interests to have local city or county attorneys pursue these civil actions wherever possible. However...where local attorneys are...unwilling to prosecute retail violators, then my office will undertake the necessary action to enforce the law.” In case concern for public health and public service was not persuasive, Miller reminded the attorneys that the law provided that “if local authorities are involved in the enforcement...any civil penalties levied shall be deposited in the general fund of the...city or county.”468 Ironically, parts of this letter were taken verbatim from a similar letter that Miller had sent to city and county and attorneys in 2001 requesting their assistance in prosecuting retailers who sold tobacco products to minors and announcing that if they were unwilling, Assistant Attorney General judicial magistrate’s finding of a violation and the imposition of a monetary penalty. ...
The ordinary meaning of Iowa Code § 142D.9(4) is that businesses that have a permit or license for their premises who fail to comply with the Iowa Smokefree Air Act may face progressive monetary penalties as well as license suspension or revocation by the authority that granted the license.” Administrator’s Final Order at 12, 13, 14, In Re Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill, Docket No. D-2009-00080 (Iowa 074/470/oc_finalorder.pdf

466E.g., Bonnie Mapes to LA Duncan, First Notice of Potential Violation Iowa Smokefree Air Act at 2 (July 14, 2008), attached as Exhibit B to Hearing Complaint, In Re Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill, Docket No. D-

(and future House Majority Leader) Kevin McCarthy would coordinate state involvement, which in fact did become necessary.

Local government refusal to enforce SAA appeared to assume a more ominous level at the outset of 2009 when County Attorney Mark Walk of Mitchell County (along the Minnesota border) wrote a letter to Attorney General Miller declaring that “he thinks the law is unjust, and that he won’t enforce it until it applies to all workplaces.” Despite this appeal to equal protection, Walk also adopted a position long propagated by cigarette companies and more recently picked up bar owners: he regarded the ban as “unjust because individual business owners are being denied the opportunity to decide whether a legal product can be consumed in their businesses.” In conformity with the manufacturers’ old voluntarist line, he also allowed as if a bar owner chose to prohibit smoking and asked the local authorities to pursue a customer who was smoking, “‘we would’” (though in fact residents told the press that they were unaware of any violations despite Walk’s “promise not to penalize them”). Republican Senate Minority Leader Paul McKinley, who found the law “‘very, very troubling,’” refused to pass judgment on officeholders who had to determine for themselves whether they were “‘doing the right thing.’” In sharp contrast, his Democratic counterpart, Michael Gronstal, was “‘personally annoyed that county attorneys are unwilling to enforce a duly passed state law, whether they like it or not. If they want to pass laws, they should run for the Legislature.’” Taking a longer view, Gronstal remarked: “‘Certainly this law is fairly controversial, but I’m reasonably confident that over a relatively short time most folks will come to their senses and say, “I guess we have a legal responsibility to enforce this law.”’” ... After a bar or two lose their liquor licenses, any scofflaw bars will begin obeying the law, Gronstal predicted. ‘I think it’ll take a little while for everybody to come on board...but I think they will when people realize the law isn’t going away.’”

Walk may, at least in his uninhibited loquaciousness, have been an outlier. (In April, after a state senator had accused Attorney General Miller of hypocrisy for threatening to remove from office a county recorder who refused to issue a marriage license to a same-sex couple but not Walk, the latter sent out an email stating: “‘I have not refused to enforce the smoking ban,’...adding that he had assisted the Mitchell County Department of Health in enforcing the ban. ‘...I

---

470 See above ch. 31.
have stated that in certain situations I felt that the law was not proper and would not enforce it in those situations; however, that situation has never occurred. To the best of my knowledge, Mitchell County is 100 percent in compliance with the law. My stand was largely symbolic. It was to bring attention to a law that was influenced by the tremendous power of the gambling industry.”)\textsuperscript{473} However, seven months into the law the Des Moines Register reported that “in certain parts of Iowa” smokers knew that “they can defy the smoking ban—and local authorities won’t do much to stop them.” For example, in Hampton, in north-central Iowa, “police have never dished out a $50 ticket although everyone from City Council members to the police chief has known for months that bar-stool rebels there are flouting the law.” The police chief’s statement that it was not his job to enforce the law resonated with a Republican city council member and smoker who regarded the ban as a “‘joke’.... If you don’t want to see nude dancing, don’t go to a strip club. If you don’t want to smell smoke, don’t go to a bar.’” A call to the state by a Democratic nonsmoking council member prompted the police chief to backtrack to the extent that he agreed at the very least to “order his officers not to walk away from an obvious violation.” The Republican sheriff of a small county on the Missouri border was not reluctant to share with the press his disagreement with the law, which was “‘just another infringement on private businesses’ rights,’” though he would check out a smoking complaint if state officials asked him to do so. Statewide, although violations had been “spotted at 460 businesses and other public places...local authorities have not taken action against a single one.” Such inaction, whether caused by “the expense of enforcement...or sheer distaste for the law itself,” prompted Bonnie Mapes to lament that “‘[w]hat’s breaking down at this point is the local action, the city and county attorneys taking action.’” Nevertheless, based on a total of 1,866 complaints of potential violations, IDPH sent out a first warning letter to those 460 businesses; that they represented not even one percent of all 82,000 covered workplaces\textsuperscript{474} could also be regarded as an indicator of widespread compliance (rather than widespread acquiescence in or collusion with widespread violations).

Of the 50 hearing complaints against liquor licensees that the attorney general filed with ABD on behalf of the Department of Public Safety through the beginning of August 2009, the six bars located in Burlington and West Burlington

\textsuperscript{474}Jennifer Jacobs, “Dissent Dilutes Smoke Ban,” DMR, Jan. 7, 2009 (A1) (ProQuest). During the Act’s first six months IDPH also sent 83 second, 23 third, six fourth, and one fifth warning letters. \textit{Id.}
accounted for more than those of any other city (the four in Waterloo being the second highest number) and Des Moines County also led all other counties with seven. In all, the southeastern Mississippi River counties running from Clinton to Lee accounted for 14 and, if Wapello (Ottumwa) is included, the southeastern quadrant accounted for 18 hearing complaints. In all, the targeted bars were located in only 27 of Iowa’s 99 counties. In the entire western part of the state (that is, west of Polk County), only six of 43 counties were affected, only one of which involved more than one hearing complaint. Outside of southeastern Iowa, many of the remaining hearing complaints were filed against bars in smaller towns. Interestingly, no hearing complaints were filed against liquor licensees in any of the three state university college towns (Iowa City, Ames, or Cedar Falls), which were bar rich. To be sure, whether these geographic distributions

477 ABD, “Iowa SFAA Status Report” (Aug. 4, 2009), on http://www.iowabrd.com/files/client_files/211/1129/SFAAcases.pdf. If Appanoose, Monroe, Mahaska, and Poweshiek counties in the southeastern quadrant are included, the total reached 24. The only county between Clinton and Lee in which no bar was the object of a hearing complaint was Louisa, although IDPH did refer one non-compliant bar to the attorney general’s office, which by Aug. 4, 2009 had not filed a hearing complaint. The only western county with more than one hearing complaint was Dickinson on the Minnesota border; all three complaints involved bars in the Lake Okoboji resort area. Ironically, seven weeks into the operation of the new law, Republican Representative Mike May related that none of the 25 bars in the vacation town of Okoboji (where he himself owned a motel/resort) had complained to him. Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake (Aug. 18, 2008). Yet as early as July 13, 2008, the police observed people smoking reflected differential degrees of compliance, collusion, indifference, or intimidation of customers, or sheer serendipity is unknown.

Bar owner resistance in small towns away from the Mississippi River may be illustrated by Centerville, a county seat of about 6,000 inhabitants in south-central Iowa near the Missouri border. Gordie Long was another constitutional literalist who believed that neither she nor any other barkeeper deserved a liquor license suspension for violating the Smokefree Air Act, which was “‘unjust’” and “‘unfair’”: “‘What’s fair for one is fair for all is what the Constitution says.’”478 One of her local competitors may have understood that after an adjustment customers would “‘end up getting used to’” the ban, but Long publicly announced her intention to violate the law from the very first day:

“They’re trying to take away my livelihood and it makes me damn mad.... I’m more than aware that I’m going to lose customers. I have a lot customers that don’t smoke at home, they smoke at the bar. It’s definitely going to hurt business. I’m 61 years old and all I want to do is retire from here but now it’s going to be hard”.... Long has proof that some of her customers feel the same way. She has a petition with over 100 signatures that she recently sent to the state, “I buy my cigarette license and I buy my alcohol license. Now they’re walking in my door, telling me what I can and can’t do at a place that I pay taxes on”.... Long also feels that it’s unfair that smoking is still allowed at places like casinos. “I know I pay less taxes than a casino but I still say that’s discrimination. As far as I’m concerned we run the same type of business....” Although the smoking ban went into effect at 12:01 a.m. this morning, Long has other plans. “My ash trays are going to be out. I pay the taxes from the front door to the back door”....

Already on July 11 IDPH sent Long a first notice of potential violation based on a customer’s observation of smoking on July 2 and lack of no-smoking signs. After having racked up several more complaints in short order, Long received a second notice of potential violation, which was being forwarded to local law enforcement for further action. On August 27 a Centerville police officer, in the bar on an unrelated matter, smelled smoke, saw ashtrays with butts on the bar, and customers with cigarette packs in front of them. When told to get rid of the ashtrays and that smoking was prohibited, the quick-witted owner, inverting the National Rifle Association’s mantra, replied: “‘we’re not smoking, the cigarettes are.’” Nor was the treasure chest of humor exhausted: two ABD investigators making an enforcement site visit on September 15 observed the front door sporting a (non-conforming) sign stating “‘no smoking courtesy of the communist party.’” Despite the visibility of the smoke in the bar and dining room Long insisted that “she was trying to comply with the law....” And on and on it went for months. When a food inspector in late November saw three customers and the bartender smoking and told the latter that she would report the smoking, the bartender replied: “‘[W]hatever[,] we have been turned in 3 other times.’” As late as January 2009 Long, not having grown tired of her joke, was still displaying only her communist party signs. At length, the state government did lose its patience: in April an ALJ issued a proposed order suspending her liquor license for 30 days, which, counseled by the ubiquitous Darwin Bünger, she appealed. Interesting light is shed on the evolution of the enforcement strategy being pursued by the Attorney General’s Office by an unusual proceeding that bypassed enforcement by means of liquor license suspension/revocation by the ABD. The Attorney General’s office had sent Long a “petition it was preparing to file in Appanoose County District Court alleging a first violation” on Aug. 27. Long signed a settlement agreement and paid a $100 penalty pursuant to § 9(2) of SAA in lieu of going to court. Asked about this unusual procedure, the 484 In an April 2008 press release Attorney General Miller stated that his office had sought civil penalties for 11 violations of the Smokefree Air Act in addition to liquor license cases. Office of the Attorney General, “Liquor Licenses Revoked, Suspended for Violations of the Smokefree Air Act,” Apr. 8, 2009, on http://www.iowa.gov/government/ag/latest_news/releases/apr_2009/Liquor_Licenses_Revoked.html. Of the other 10 cases five were settled and the penalty paid; four were deferred or dropped.

---

public information officer replied: “The SFAA provides a number of enforcement tools, including a civil penalty. When Public Health referred the Gordie’s case to us, we offered Mr. [sic] Long the chance to pay a civil penalty for a [sic] SFAA violation. Mr. [sic] Long paid the penalty, and thus we did not have to file the civil suit in Appanoose County. Subsequently, Mr. [sic] Long’s repeated violations were referred to ABD for liquor license action. We’ve learned that liquor license actions are our most effective deterrent to violations by establishments with such licenses.”

One of the attorney general’s learning moments may have involved high-profile resister Brian Froehlich, who did not begin to take the law seriously until he realized that his liquor license and thus the whole basis of his business was at risk: “Froehlich continued to permit smoking on the licensed premises after the law went into effect. Mr. Froehlich thought that his violation would be punishable by a $100 monetary penalty and testified that he was willing to ‘take the $100 fine to protect my business as long as I could.’

Because the business closed or a new owner had taken over; and one was referred to the Clinton County attorney, who won a judgment. Two of the five settling businesses were non-bars USF Holland and Electrolux. Email from Bill Roach, Iowa Attorney General’s Office, to Marc Linder (Aug. 3, 2009). The judgment in the only case that was actually filed was a small claim for $100 plus $113.88 in costs. State of Iowa v Grafitti, Inc., Case 07231 SCSC048786 (Clinton Cty, July 13, 2009), on http://www.iowacourts.state.ia.us/ESAWebApp/TIndexFrm.

Email from Robert Brammer to Marc Linder (July 28, 2009).

State of Iowa, Alcoholic Beverages Division, In re Froehlich Properties, Inc. d/b/a Fro’s, Proposed Decision at 3, Docket No. D-2008-00089 (Jan. 2, 2009), on http://www.iowaabd.com/smokefree/fros_proposed_decision.pdf. Although Froehlich admitted that “[t]hrough public documents and other sources it has been shown that...Fro’s did violate the Iowa Smoke Free Air Act,” his use of the passive voice masked his own responsibility for his strategic blunder: “It has always been understood that any violation of the Iowa Smoke Free Air Act was to be handled by the IDPH and that civil penalties for not enforcing [i.e., complying with] were to come from this department.” Since Froehlich had violated the law daily for months, his outrage at not having received three citations/money penalties before rightfully having his liquor license suspended/revoked was misplaced. State of Iowa, Alcoholic Beverages Division, In re Froehlich Properties, Inc. d/b/a Fro’s, Respondents [sic] Reply Brief and Argument at 1, 2, Docket No. D-2008-00089 (n.d. [Jan. 30, 2009]), on http://www.iowaabd.com/files/client_files/711/1176/fros_frosbrief.pdf. His having jumped to this false conclusion was akin to his wife’s (and co-owner’s) explanation that since Judge Staskal had taken no action at the hearing on August 1, 2008, they put the ashtrays back out on the bar. State of Iowa, Alcoholic Beverages Division, In re Froehlich Properties, Inc. d/b/a Fro’s, Proposed Decision at 6, Docket No. D-2008-00089 (n.d. [Jan. 2, 2009]), on http://www.iowaabd.com/files/client_
Arguably the most absurd effort at finding a “loophole” in the law can be credited to a topless bar in Des Moines, which became the first liquor establishment in central Iowa to place its license in jeopardy. However, it was precisely the alleged loophole’s transparently groundless character that raised the issue of the competence of IDPH’s Division of Tobacco Use and Prevention Control, which, instead of seeing through this sham instantaneously, seriously engaged with it for two months. After the enactment of the law, the owner, Rick Goulden, “studied” it, concluding that he could render smoking lawful by taking advantage of the exemption for retail tobacco stores, as implausible as that analysis might have been since such a store was statutorily defined as one used primarily for the sale of tobacco products, to which the sale of other products was incidental. Oddly, although he developed this insight without benefit of legal counsel, “[i]n making this determination, Mr. Goulden...talked with Bonnie Mapes, Director” of the Division. In order to implement this scam, Goulden “instituted certain new business practices,” which an ABD administrative law judge in a huge understatement was to characterize as “contrived.”

The pivot for the hoax was simply hanging a sign declaring the premises a “private dance club/tobacco outlet, smoking optional,” followed by the sale of single cigarettes and “cigarette and drink combos,” the pricing of which was designed to enable him to meet IDPH’s rule defining “incidental to the sale of tobacco products” as not more than 20 percent of the tobacco store’s gross revenues. Astonishingly, Mapes—according to Goulden’s testimony that... the ALJ cited without indicating that IDPH challenged it—instead of informing him that he was engaged in an unlawful act, appeared to be operating as his business consultant: “Ms. Mapes expressed doubt to Mr. Goulden that his pricing of single cigarettes would achieve the desired result as she thought his prices were too high and a deterrent to sales.” Undeterred by the advice, Goulden proceeded to permit smoking in his make-believe tobacco store, prompting a first notice of potential violation as early as July 11 based on law enforcement officers’ observation of smoking on July 6 and racking up a total of 10 complaints through August 28. A second notice of potential violation followed on August 29 after law enforcement officers on August 19 had not only observed further smoking, but had been told by the bartender that the “establishment is a ‘safe haven for smokers’” and that “the owner did not intend to comply with the Act because he was getting licensed as a retail tobacco store.” And so it went until a third notice of potential violation was issued at the end of September for smoking observed on September 5 by the Polk County sheriff’s office, which also issued five civil citations to persons violating the law. Shortly after this inspection Goulden again spoke to Mapes, who finally told him that “she had been researching whether he could sell single cigarettes at his establishment” and informed him that Iowa Code chapter 453A prohibited their sale. After writing down the code section that Mapes’ prodigious researches had unearthed, Goulden stopped selling cigarettes and started complying with SAA. Nevertheless, the ABD ALJ issued a proposed decision ordering a 21-day liquor license suspension for the earlier repeated violations after the Department of Public Safety had argued that a penalty was required both to deter similar violations by other licensees and to undo the unfairness involved in allowing Goulden to realize an economic benefit by virtue of violating the law.

495 State of Iowa, Alcoholic Beverages Division, In re Boot Hill Enterprises, Inc., d/b/a Outer Limits, Proposed Decision at 5, 6, 7, 8, Docket No. D-2008-00092 (Apr. 21, 2009), on http://www.iowaabd.com/smokefree/outerlimits_proposed.pdf. The ALJ interpreted the bartender’s statement that the owners were trying to get a tobacco sales license as an “admission by staff of the licensee...that licensee had actual knowledge that it did not, as yet, qualify for the retail tobacco store exemption.” Id. at 15.

496 State of Iowa, Alcoholic Beverages Division, In re Boot Hill Enterprises, Inc., d/b/a Outer Limits, Proposed Decision at 15-16, Docket No. D-2008-00092 ([Apr. 21, 2009]), on http://www.iowaabd.com/smokefree/outerlimits_proposed.pdf. Preposterously, Goulden’s lawyer claimed in his brief that the ALJ’s decision “supports the fact that the Outer Limits did qualify as an exempt tobacco outlet. The problem with Rick Goulden’s effort is that he was selling individual cigarettes which is illegal in Iowa. Outer Limits’ position is that it did not violate the Smokefree Air Act—period.” State of Iowa, Alcoholic Beverages Division, In re Boot Hill Enterprises, Inc., d/b/a Outer Limits,
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

(That Mapes had been unaware of the ban on selling cigarettes in packages with fewer than 20 was both astonishing and puzzling since it had been enacted on her watch just a year earlier as part of the very high-profile bill that increased the cigarette tax from 36 cents to $1.36.497 Far from being some obscure and minor provision, this prohibition was an increasingly important element of the national tobacco control movement’s program for making cigarettes less accessible to children, for whom the purchase of a single cigarette was a low-price first-step. For this reason the Institute of Medicine in 1994 had recommended passage of such bans by all the states498 and the Food and Drug Administration had included it in its tobacco regulations in 1995, which were struck down.499 Nevertheless by 2008 the American Lung Association was able to report: “Twenty-two states prohibit the sale of cigarettes in packs containing less than 20 cigarettes. Nineteen states and the District of Columbia prohibit the sale of single cigarettes. Fourteen states require cigarettes to be sold in a sealed package that is provided by the manufacturer and that contains the health warning required by federal law. Eleven states require cigarettes to be sold in the original, sealed package.”500 In Iowa, however, the triggering motivation for this prohibitory control lay elsewhere: lacking in the original Senate Study Bill 1055,501 it was requested by the Iowa Department of Revenue in order to “handle an issue related to the distribution of samples that are less than 20 per pack,” which had been “a problem for the Department in the past.”502 This administrative tax collection issue503 coincided with the attorney general’s

499 Federal Register 60:41,313-75 at 41,324 (Aug. 11, 1995).

500 http://slati.lungusa.org/StateLegislateAction.asp

501 The provision was added to SSB 1055 by Committee Amendment 501 § 4. [Senate] Committee Minutes for Ways and Means (Feb. 6, 2007) (copy furnished Kris Bell, Iowa Senate Democratic Research Staff).

502 David Casey (acting administrator, taxpayer services and policy division, Iowa Department of Revenue) to Sen. Matt McCoy, Ron Wieck, and Joe Bolkcom, Re: Senate Study Bill 1055 - Cigarette Tax Increase (Jan. 29, 2007) (copy furnished by Patty Funaro, LSA). The same provision had passed the Senate in 2005. S.F. 416, § 6, SJ 2005, at 1152 (May 5).

503 According to an Iowa Senate Democratic Staff senior research analyst: “The manufacturers generally sell cigarettes in packs of 20 or 25. All of our cigarette stamps “concern[ ] with single cigarettes and other smaller sizes being more readily available and thus easier to obtain by underage smokers.”\textsuperscript{504} At the time IDPH was also aware of the issue and its proposed resolution.\textsuperscript{505}

In the event, more and more bar owners in Burlington decided to emulate Duncan in leveling down rather than up. By December 2008, Des Moines County (of which Burlington was the county seat), which was only the state’s 12th largest in terms of population, had received the second greatest number of notices of violation (30) behind Polk County (76), which had a population almost nine times larger (because the state capital and largest city, Des Moines, was located in it). The press conjectured that the reason may in part have been the lack of enforcement, the prime example of which was the fact that Duncan had yet to be fined or lose his liquor license. The problem in West Burlington and Burlington was exacerbated by Police Chief Oblein’s and Police Chief Dan Luettenger’s erroneous imputation of a catch-22 to the Smokefree Air Act administrative rules, according to which the police “are supposed to go in only once the owner has asked the smoking patron to leave and that person refuses.” But where owners themselves failed to comply and were “‘not calling us and saying ‘Boy I’m having a problem in here; people won’t quit smoking,’” it was “‘kind of hard for me to go in and say that person violated the law.’” As for prosecuting the business itself, IDPH was as yet unaware that any county attorney had done so. Des Moines County Attorney Pat Jackson had chosen not to prosecute such civil infractions both because he had no statutory duty to do so and was “‘pretty busy \textsuperscript{504}Email from Kris Bell, Iowa Senate Democratic Staff senior research analyst, to Marc Linder (July 30, 2009).

\textsuperscript{505}Telephone interview with David Casey, Iowa Department of Revenue, administrator for tax compliance, Des Moines (July 31, 2009). Later Mapes (incorrectly) stated that: “The prohibition against selling cigarettes in packs of less than 20 was in Iowa code before the 2007 tax increase was passed. For how long before, I do not know. I assume the language was simply carried forward from the earlier code language.” When asked whether she knew where in the Code the provisions had been she replied: “No, I don’t. This is a legislative research question.” Email from Bonnie Mapes to Marc Linder (July 27, 2009). No such regulation imposing a floor on the number of cigarettes that could be sold at one time to one person existed before 2007. Telephone interview with David Casey, Des Moines (July 31, 2009).
Administrative Rules for Barkeepers’ Challenge to Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

do the more serious stuff” of criminal cases.506

It is difficult to discern the interpretive logic that could have led the police chiefs to this do-nothing conclusion. After all, smoking in an area in which it is prohibited is a distinct violation independent of whether the owner complies with or violates his own duty to inform the person violating the law of the provisions of the law. Were the former’s unlawfulness dependent on owner compliance, collusion would undermine the law, such subversion being precisely the effect of Oblein’s and Luettenger’s misinterpretation. Not all police officers adopted this approach. For example, shortly after 1:00 a.m. on October 10, 2008, having been told that the police had received complaints of smoking in a certain bar, Grinnell police officer Dan Johnson looked in a window, saw two customers smoking, walked in, told both of them and the bartender that smoking was prohibited there, and issued citations to the smokers. On December 14 he returned, saw a customer smoking at the bar, who, on seeing him, extinguished her cigarette. The same bartender told Johnson that he had a highlighted copy of the law that stated that he “‘may’ ask patrons who are smoking to stop or leave.” Apparently unimpressed, Johnson issued a citation to the customer, who remarked that the bartender had never asked her to stop smoking.507 Systematic enforcement of the law was exceptionally on display in Webster City, a town of about 8,000 in central Iowa, in which the police chief, ironically, was “not necessarily in favor of the law,” did not welcome devolution of enforcement from IDPH to the local police, was chiefly concerned with the unfair competitive effects of violations by some bar owners, and did not even ticket individual smokers in bars. After learning from his night-duty sergeant that police had been finding smoking going on in bars 90 percent of the time they checked,508 Police Chief Mike McConnell “decided to have police officers check all of the city’s bars every night after a bar

506Christinia Crippes, “DMC Has 2nd Most Smoking Ban Violations,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Dec. 13, 2008 (1A) (NewsBank). On county population, see Iowa Official Register: 2005-2006, at 304-305 (vol. 71). According to IAC § 641-153.8(2) (2008): “[T]he department designates the law enforcement authorities of the state and of each political subdivision of the state to assist with the enforcement of 2008 Iowa Acts, House File 2212. A peace officer may issue a citation in lieu of arrest pursuant to Iowa Code chapter 805 against a person who smokes in an area where smoking is prohibited pursuant to 2008 Iowa Acts, House File 2212, and such person shall pay a civil penalty pursuant to Iowa Code section 805.8C(3)”a” for each violation.”

508Telephone interview with Mike McConnell, Webster City (Aug. 7, 2009).
owner complained that a number of local bars were permitting smoking.” Then at the end of January he “sent a letter to all liquor licensees informing them that, effective February 6, 2009, the Iowa Smokefree Air Act would be strictly enforced with zero tolerance.”\footnote{Proposed Decision at 5, 6, In Re Travis and Regina Hurt, d/b/a TeeGee’s Bar & Grill, Docket No. D-2009-00025 (Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Div., June 1, 2009), on http://www.iowaabd.com/files/client_files/254/452/teegees_proposed.pdf.}
Not coincidentally, hearing complaints were filed in quick succession against three bars\footnote{ABD, “Iowa SFAA Status Report” (Aug. 4, 2009), on http://www.iowaabd.com/files/client_files/211/1129/SFAAcases.pdf.} in this small town (which was, ironically, represented in the Iowa House by the law’s zealous opponent and small bar owner’s advocate, McKinley Bailey), in part as a result of the implementation of the nightly police inspections.\footnote{For example, the police observed people openly smoking and employees doing nothing to correct the situation in one bar on January 28, 29, and 31. Hearing Complaint at 4, 5, In Re The Bow Lounge, Docket No. D-2009-00026 (Iowa Alcoholic Beverages comp.pdf.}
In Burlington, too, after ABD had issued administrative hearing complaints to four bars, city officials in April “would not intervene to stop bar owners from allowing patrons to violate” the ban. One city council member, a small-business owner who believed bar owners’ claims that allowing smoking was a “‘matter of survival,’” “railed” against the law: “I won’t support this council taking action against people who are just trying to earn a living on behalf of a stupid law like this.”\footnote{Jeff Abell, “Council Stays Out of Smoking Ban Fight,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 1, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).} The Burlington four accounted for half of the state’s recently filed complaints, bringing the statewide total to 38. The Attorney General’s office displayed flexibility cum firmness in expressing willingness to negotiate with bar owners, instancing a recent settlement with a bar in Ottumwa calling for a seven-day liquor license suspension and $1,000 fine.\footnote{Pat Curtis, “Eight More Bars Charged with Violating Smoking Ban,” Radio Iowa, Apr. 2, 2009, on http://www.radioiowa.com (visited July 4, 2009); State of Iowa, Alcoholic Beverages Division, In re Benge Inc, d/b/a The Keg, Stipulation, Docket No.
875/578/keg_stipulation.pdf.} In the event, after Burlington native Walding’s agents verified that the bars were in compliance—“‘[i]t would be a revocable offense if they mislead us’”\footnote{Christinia Crippes, “ABD Process Starts Anew with Three Bars,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 18, 2009 (2A) (NewsBank).}—within a few months a total of 22 other bars, including the four in Burlington, took the same deal.\textsuperscript{515}

Meanwhile, with the ALJ’s proposed sanctions against Duncan stayed pending the ABD administrator’s review,\textsuperscript{516} on April 7 U.S. District Court Judge John Jarvey issued an order granting defendants’ motion to dismiss plaintiff’s damage claims against ABD Administrator Walding and IDPH Director Newton in their individual capacities because they had absolute immunity, but denying it as to the claim against defendant Mapes for her alleged publication of information about Duncan’s suspected violations. Consequently, because this one damages claim survived, the court, rather than dismissing Duncan’s claim for declaratory relief (that the Smokefree Air Act violated the Commerce, Equal Protection, and Privileges and Immunities Clauses of the U.S. Constitution) on the grounds that such relief would interfere with pending state administrative-judicial proceedings, as the \textit{Younger} abstention doctrine would have directed, the court stayed the federal case until the state proceedings (including any state court adjudication of plaintiff’s claim that the Act was unconstitutional) were concluded.\textsuperscript{517}

The very next day, April 8, 2009, Walding modified the ALJ’s order imposing a 30-day suspension as inadequate because Duncan’s “blatant, intentional and on-going violations” were a “direct assault on both the Iowa Smokefree Air Act and the Iowa Alcoholic Beverage Control Act.” Because his “open defiance of the health law and rules requires a penalty sufficient to deter similar flagrant violations” by Duncan and other licensees in the future and “Duncan’s unapologetic willingness to ignore statutes and rules applicable to the operation of Licensee’s business does not inspire confidence that the Licensee can be trusted to comply with all requirements for holding a liquor license in the future,” Walding ordered his license revoked.\textsuperscript{518} (At the same time Walding modified the ALJ’s proposed order to impose a 30- rather than a 21-day suspension on Froehlich,519 which the latter called “‘a real kick in the knees,’” while repeating the cigarette industry’s longtime refrain that “‘[i]t’s not about smoking, it’s about the rights we keep getting taken away from us every day.’”)520 “[W]ith much reluctance but little choice” Walding acted vis-a-vis a licensee who had “stated in no uncertain terms that he is unyielding in his refusal” to comply with the Smokefree Air Act and “given every indication that he would continue on with his full frontal assault” on the law “once his license is reinstated.” Against the background of these indictments of Duncan’s absolutist positions Walding’s conciliatory about-face was surprising: he was “open to considering a future Request to Rescind Revocation and would be willing to consider reinstating” his license if he met two conditions. “First and foremost,” Duncan had to “provide assurance” to Walding that he would comply with the Smokefree Air Act (and all requirement of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act) “at all times in the future.” And second, Duncan “will be expected to serve a period of suspension in proportion to” his violations of the two laws as later determined by Walding. In other words, Walding was leaving it up to Duncan to decide whether the revocation became permanent or “a step toward proper compliance with Iowa law.”522 If Walding’s offer of a last chance was motivated by the “goal and intention” of gaining “compliance with the law” rather than handing out penalties, it did not immediately prompt any accommodation on the part of Duncan, whose initial response conformed to his media verbal m.o.: “‘As far as I’m concerned this administrative deal is absolutely a circus.’”523

In contrast, Attorney General Miller availed himself of the revocation order to warn other bar owners that the same fate awaited them: “‘Liquor license holders are obligated to obey all Iowa laws as a condition of their privilege to hold a license. We are determined to enforce this new law—because it is the law, and because it saves lives. The huge majority of Iowa businesses are obeying the law, and we will not allow a small, vocal minority to flout the law.”

523 Christinia Crippes, “Duncan’s License Revoked over Smoking Ban,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 9 (1A) (NewsBank).

Miller then went on to undermine his office’s reputation for integrity and competence by making the nonsensical assertion that: “The adult smoking rate in the state has dropped from 19% to 14% over the last two years—in part because the Iowa Smokefree Air Act has encouraged people to quit.” As Miller’s source, the Iowa 2008 Adult Tobacco Survey, itself noted in italics no fewer than three times: “The data for the Iowa 2008 ATS were collected from April 4 through June 9, 2008. Therefore, the findings do not provide information about changes in behaviors or attitudes of adult Iowans as a result of the Iowa Smokefree Air Act which became effective July 1, 2008.” Despite the fact that the hierarchy of the Attorney General’s Office had been informed of this error, Miller repeated it on the first anniversary of the effective date of the Smokefree Air Act: “‘What it’s done is contribute to an incredible drop in smoking in our state.... I don’t think it’s been highlighted enough, but smoking went from 19% of the adult population (in 2007) to 14% (in 2009).’”

Revocation caused alcohol to stop flowing in his bar and forced him to admit

---

525 This statement was contained in the version of the press release that Assistant Attorney General Donn Stanley emailed on April 13, but appears to have been removed from the version on the AG’s website. It does appear, however, on another version of the April 8 press release: http://iowapolitics.com/index.iml?Article=154873 (visited Aug. 1, 2009). Miller also repeated it a week later in a press release on the occasion of an ALJ revocation of the license of the especially recalcitrant VFW Post in Ottumwa. http://www.iowa.gov/government/ag/latest_news/releases/apr_2009/Smokefree_Ottumwa.html (visited May 22, 2009). Miller’s nonsensical claim was embellished by Special Assistant Attorney General Donald Stanley, who asserted that the drop was “due in no small part to the Iowa Smoke Free Air Act....” Email from Donald Stanley to Marc Linder (Apr. 13, 2009).

526 G. Lutz et al., Iowa 2008 Adult Tobacco Survey ii, 37, 41 (Feb. 2009), on http://www.idph.state.ia.us/tobacco/common/pdf/ATS_2008_Final_Draft.pdf. IDPH’s tobacco cessation coordinator did not even expect the smoking ban law to have a large impact on smoking prevalence: “‘[W]e are not going to have the surge like with the tax.... It makes it a little inconvenient. Over time it may nudge people to quit.’” Brian Morelli, “Smokers Adjusting to Ban,” ICP-C, July 17, 2008, on http://www.press-citizen.com (quoting Jeremy Whitaker).

527 Email from Marc Linder to Donn Stanley, Jeffrey Thompson, Matt Gannon, Jeffrey Peterzalek, John Lundquist, Robert Brammer, Bill Roach (Apr. 17, 2009).

that “the battle may be lost,” but Duncan insisted that the “war against the Smokefree Air Act is not over.”529 The following day he filed an application with ABD for a stay of the revocation order pending judicial review, and then Bunger and Eichhorn filed the same application for him in Des Moines County District Court on April 15, which repeated his untenable constitutional challenge to SAA on the grounds that it violated the Commerce Clause by restricting the market for tobacco in Iowa and announced that Duncan would file a petition for judicial review of the revocation, which followed two days later.530 In response, Walding initially stated that he would await that court’s ruling. Increasingly detached from jurisprudential and extra-oral reality, Duncan confused his own concern with the $20,000 reduction in business brought about by the revocation of his liquor license with Iowans’ alleged concern with the consequences of his having prioritized smoking over selling alcohol, and regurgitated his shibboleth: “‘I think people have totally had enough. Now I think they’re really realizing, at least many are...this is about the Constitution. It’s not about smoking.””531 Similarly, his self-mesmerizing incantation, based on the alleged unconstitutionality of the disparate treatment of casinos and bars, that “‘[w]e’re going to win this. We’re the state’s worst nightmare,’” obscured his own worst nightmare—revocation of his liquor license. Whereas for months he cried crocodile tears over the citations he had not received, in fact, “[b]ecause of the gap between the violation and [nonexistent] punishment, Burlington area bars lost any incentive to comply with the ban.... ‘It was only when they took off the liquor license on the wall that 529Christinia Crippes, “Duncan’s License Revoked over Smoking Ban,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 9 (1A) (NewsBank).

530Application for Stay Pending Judicial Review of Agency Action at 3, 8, 1, Coordinated Estates Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v Iowa Department of Commerce, Civil No. CVEQ008591 (Des Moines County Dist. Ct., Apr. 15, 2009); Petition for Judicial Review of Agency Action, Coordinated Estates Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v Iowa Department of Commerce, Civil No. CVEQ008591 (Des Moines County Dist. Ct., n.d. [Apr. 17, 2009]). The ABD website lacks the application that Duncan filed with the agency. It is unclear how Duncan’s lawyers believed they were enhancing his chances for securing a stay by claiming that throughout the ABD proceedings he had “[i]n his defense...maintained that the passage of the Act was highly political....” Application for Stay Pending Judicial Review of Agency Action at 5-6, Coordinated Estates Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v Iowa Department of Commerce, Civil No. CVEQ008591 (Des Moines County Dist. Ct., Apr. 15, 2009).
531Christinia Crippes, “Duncan Pushes for a Court Battle,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 16, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank) (ellipsis in original).
[they] brought us to our knees.” No one was more acutely aware of ABD’s crucial enforcement role than Walding: with bars and restaurants accounting for 53 percent of all 1,015 business to which IDPH sent notices of potential violations during the law’s first year of operation, Walding knew that “license revocation fears have helped compliance immensely”—to the extent that “we’re starting to see that the resistance is kind of burning out throughout the state.” And the nightmare lived on since, as Walding observed, if the courts ultimately upheld or invalidated only exemptions, “then the ABD can impose the suspensions or revocations when it chooses. ‘Once it’s decided, it’s over.... We have complete control once it’s gone through the whole process.’” Moreover, Duncan’s obsession blinded him to the fact that far from being any kind of nightmare at all, a decision by the Iowa Supreme Court striking down the casino exemption would hand the anti-smoking legislators, whom he and his fellow barkeepers incessantly excoriated, the expanded coverage that majority rule had put beyond their reach, thus bringing Iowa that much closer to a universal ban on indoor smoking in public places. As they could have learned from House Speaker Murphy on the eve of the Act’s going into effect: “[L]awmakers anticipated a potential legal challenge and carefully crafted the ban. Should a court eventually rule that drawing a distinction between casinos and bars is discriminatory, the result would be banning smoking in casinos rather than allowing smoking in bars.... ‘We made sure of that’”

Despite Duncan’s continued bravado, on April 17, Walding granted a conditional stay pending judicial review of the agency’s action even though Duncan had failed to satisfy the four-part statutory test. Without revealing his reason(s), Walding expressed his willingness to grant the stay “subject to one condition”—already suggested in the final order—namely, that Duncan agree to comply with the Smokefree Air Act during the pendency of the appeal. Why Walding would have conferred such administrative mercy on an applicant who had not only “not...sufficiently made the case for the granting of a stay,” but had “elected to follow a risky course of action, thereby placing his liquor license at peril” by having “mistakenly assumed that he can ignore the law until the statute is declared to be constitutionally valid”\textsuperscript{538} he did not explain until much later. Asked whether it had been a foregone conclusion that if he had not granted a stay, the district court would have, Walding replied: “No, in fact the Division, through the Iowa Attorney General’s Office, has an established practice of resisting judicial stays whenever the state does not grant a stay. As the goal all along has been SFAA compliance, and not to put licensees out of business, I deemed the stay appropriate provided the licensee could assure me of his future compliance. Frankly, I also deemed it a victory to gain the compliance of the ban[’]s leading protagonist. Nor was I interested in making the licensee a martyr [sic] for his cause and constituency.”\textsuperscript{539} The deal was sealed the next morning when Duncan, eating the crow he had sworn would never touch his lips, faxed Walding a handwritten note agreeing to “abide by”—which arguably fell short of the condition that he “comply with”—SFAA from that moment until the Iowa courts made a final determination as to its constitutionality.\textsuperscript{540} Duncan sought to make it clear that he had not bowed down to the wannabe “queen” after all by claiming \textsuperscript{538}Order Conditionally Granting Stay, In re Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill, Docket No. D-2008-00080 (Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Div., Apr. 17, 2009). The four statutory factors that a court was required to consider and balance before granting a stay of agency action were: (1) extent to which plaintiff was likely to prevail on merits; (2) extent to which applicant would suffer irreparable harm if relief was not granted; (3) extent to which granting relief would substantially harm other parties; and (4) extent to which public interest relied on by agency sufficed to justify agency action. Iowa Code § 17A.19(5)(c)(1)-(4) (2009).

536Christinia Crippes, “Paddlewheel Takes Deal,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), May 13, 2009 (2A) (NewsBank).

\textsuperscript{539}Email from Lynn Walding to Marc Linder (Aug. 1, 2009).

\textsuperscript{540}L. Duncan to Administrator Walding (Apr. 18, 2009), attached to Order Conditionally Granting Stay, In re Coordinated Estate Services, Inc. d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill, Docket No. D-2008-00080 (Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Div., Apr. 17, 2009). See also Christinia Crippes, “Alcohol Served Again at W.B. Bar,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Apr. 19, 2009 (3A) (NewsBank). Larry Duncan appeared to renege on that promise when he insisted that “[i]f the people of Iowa have a say and can vote on the constitutionality of it [i.e., the smoking ban in bars and restaurants], they [i.e., the State of Iowa] could design a law around that, I’ll be smoke free.” “Bar Owner Takes State to Court over Smoking Ban,” KWQC (Davenport) (Nov. 25, 2009), on http://www.kwqc.com (visited Dec. 5, 2009); http://www.smokersinfo.net/bar-owner-takes-state-to-court-over-smoking-ban/ (visited Feb. 1, 2011). Duncan’s reading level—“A 4th grader could read the constitution and know this law is not constitutional. It’s not fair and equitable for everybody”—can be gauged by the fact that Iowans have no right to pass on laws’ constitutionality. that he had “‘chosen to comply with the act’” on his own terms—namely, “‘[n]ow that I have accomplished my goal of getting this question of constitutionality of the Smokefree Air Act to the...District Court level....’” Walding’s press release, archly titled, “Otis Campbell’s Goes Smoke Free,” made it clear that the state apparatus had retained the upper hand: “After over nine months of open defiance of the Smokefree Air Act...owner L.A. ‘Larry’ Duncan has agreed to obey the smoking ban, at least for now.”

A few days after nibbling on the faux crow, Duncan reassembled his Freedom Fighters for All Citizens of Iowa for “a whole lot of venting frustration” cum fundraising, presumably to pay the fees for lawyer Bunger, who was present “acting as a voice of calm amongst the panic of the bar owners, who fear they’re losing their business at a rate that will cause them to close their doors for good.” The hyperventilatory hyperbolic mood was set by a retired army major who predicted that “‘[t]his battle is going to...get uglier’” and Duncan’s own bar manager, who declared that he was “fighting the statewide smoking ban for the sake of his children’s freedom.” Perhaps the group’s out-of-touchness was best exemplified by the defrocked commander of Veterans of Foreign Wars Post No. 775 in Ottumwa, yet another center of resistance in the state’s southeastern quadrant. At a juncture when about half of the states had already enacted statewide smokefree laws and more were in the pipeline, Dennis Whitson assured his ilk in attendance that “‘the nation is watching what we’re doing here, and if we lose this the whole nation is going to lose.’” Some insight into the Freedom Fighters’ collective psyche can be gleaned from his views and behavior. After the VFW Post had racked up five notices of potential violations, Commander Whitson admitted that he had not been complying with the law and testified at an 541Christinia Crippes, “Duncan to Ban Smoking While Fight Goes On,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 18, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).

543Christinia Crippes, “Duncan Rallies Support,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 23, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).
544In Ottumwa three bars paid a $1,000 fine in addition to having their licenses suspended for one week; a fourth’s was suspended for 30 days. Iowa SFAA Status Report (July 24, 2009), on http://www.iowaabd.com/smokefree/SFAAcases.pdf.
545Christinia Crippes, “Duncan Rallies Support,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 23, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).
administrative hearing on March 16 that “he cannot in good conscience send a veteran outside to the parking lot to smoke.” Little wonder that the ALJ in her Proposed Decision ordered the VFW Post’s license revoked. For his part, Whitson also took the naïve line that the Act was unconstitutional because it set “the interests of some businesses above others,” throwing in the non sequitur that a “high school debate class could have passed a more comprehensive law than the Legislature did.” Whitson’s scofflawry was too much even for the State VFW, which removed him from his position for having broken the law and violated the organization’s bylaws, and being an “embarrassment to the V.F.W.” Whitson apparently went off the deep end of rugged individualism, complaining that “[w]e have lost the ability to take care of ourselves. That is why our post chooses to ignore this unconstitutional law, because we still have that choice.” He saw the perpetrators of the Smokefree Air Act as promoting the advent of apocalyptic “One world government.”

In latter half of April, as Duncan’s prosecution shifted into state and federal court constitutional adjudication, enforcement officials finally focused on Des Moines County, the epicenter of “the uprising” with Otis Campbell’s leading the charge. Perhaps this slashing editorial in the Burlington press in March helped motivate IDPH/ABD to crack down inn Des Moines County:

Duncan has refused to ban smoking in his Otis Campbell’s Restaurant and Bar in West Burlington. Though the local police investigated and found the law was being disobeyed, the City Council lacked the guts to back a citation that would require Duncan to go to court, which is where he hopes to prove the ban unconstitutional but likely will not.

Rather than boldly tackle the affront to law and order, the city pushed into the lap of the Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Division the question of whether Duncan should forfeit his liquor license for being a blatant scofflaw. The agency suspended his license for not complying but Duncan remains open for business—and his smoking customers’ pleasure—while his appeal is working through the legal system. ...

Every day, down the street from West Burlington City Hall, the law against smoking in public places is being broken. Other bars have joined the revolt. No one seems to care. 552

In a dozen counties valid complaints had been filed against a larger proportion of businesses, but Des Moines County businesses had recorded the greatest number of complaints. 553 This southeastern county was selected because it had displayed “the strongest resistance” to the Act, but if ABD discovered “‘pockets of resistance’” elsewhere, Walding was prepared to extend the pilot program to such counties too. 554 Having sent two agents who checked eight establishments there and found five violating the smoking ban, Walding decided to carry out more targeted investigations. Taking a longer view, he drew a comparison to the earlier experience with the seatbelt law, stressing that it had taken a while for the public to “‘recognize that paradigm shift in thinking.’” 555
In a press release on April 20, Walding announced that ABD planned to check all 68 of the county’s on-premises licensed establishments; the initiative would continue until the compliance rate improved, leaving the non-compliant to face administrative hearing complaints. Ratcheting up the pressure, he suggested that those who settled before the hearing could expect a seven-day suspension and $1,000 civil fine, while licensees found in violation after a hearing faced a 30-day suspension if they then became compliant and the risk of revocation if they did not. 556 (To be sure, by settling, bar owners in some cases were in a position to subvert the suspension’s deterrent effect by negotiating for its scheduling for a week when they took vacation or made repairs, as Walding put it, “‘so it isn’t a total loss for them during that period.’”) 557 On April 28 ABD initiated a pilot program of random site visits in Des Moines County to be continued over a number of weeks “‘until we get full compliance.” 558 To a meeting the previous day of business owners preoccupied with the disparity between casinos and bars Burlington native Walding, with brutal frankness uncharacteristic of Iowa bureaucrats, left absolutely no doubt as to the smokeless future that rendered their rhetoric and resistance obsolete: “‘If your business model is based on smoking, it’s an archaic business model.’” He also passed a similar judgment on their litigation strategy by noting that even if the casino exemption were judicially invalidated—“something...a lot of us are hoping—the ban would remain otherwise intact. 559 In a piquantly titled up-beat press release (“Des Moines County Licensees Stomp Out Cigarettes”) Walding was “‘thrilled’” by the 81-percent compliance rate, which was a “huge step forward,” especially since none of the 11 non-compliant bars had been found allowing smoking, but instead had violated signage or ashtray provisions. Since ABD had forewarned bar owners of the looming inspections, he had expected a high compliance rate and announced that the random checks would continue until full compliance was attained. 560 To be sure, Walding decided to “‘focus...on the problem, where it should be’” so that checks would “cease for those bars that have corporate policies in place to ban smoking or that have no residual tobacco scent lingering.” 561

552Mike Sweet, “Dubious Fighters,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Mar. 8, 2009 (8A) (edit.)
553Christinia Crippes, “State Plans Bar Checks,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 21, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).

At the same time, despite the publicity surrounding this targeted enforcement effort, the Department of Public Safety filed administrative hearing complaints with ABD against bars in two other southeastern towns (Keokuk and Donnellson)

557Christinia Crippes, “Paddlewheel Takes Deal,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), May 13, 2009 (2A) (NewsBank).

558Christinia Crippes, “State Plans Bar Checks,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 21, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).

559Christinia Crippes, “Smoking Ban Checks Begin Today in DMC,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Apr. 28, 2009 (3A) (NewsBank).

561Christinia Crippes, “Smoking Ban Compliance Up to 81 Percent,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), May 5, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).
for the first time. 562 Faced with this metastasis, Walding explained the phenomenon as in part resulting from the serendipity of what had been (at least until the previous week) a complaint-driven system. More ominously, however, he also regarded it as “‘kind of the resistance effort of the Freedom Fighters kind of centralized out of southeast Iowa.’”

During the second week of ABD’s checks in Des Moines County the compliance rate edged up to 85 percent, but at one of the violators an investigator observed people openly smoking without any attempt by the licensee’s employees to correct the violations. 563 Then during third week in mid-May, the compliance check program “hit a wall,” prompting Walding to observe that “‘[w]e took a heavy dose of some hard medicine here.’” 564 Not only did the compliance rate plummet from 85 to 54 percent, but at three of 11 violators investigators witnessed smoking, including in one case by the bartender at a VFW Post in Burlington; 565 another represented recidivism from the previous week and led to the filing of a administrative hearing complaint, 566 the seventh against a bar in Des Moines County. 567 During the remaining three weekly checks the ABD observed no more smoking and the compliance rates rose to 80 and 96, and finally reached the goal of 100 percent in the sixth week. 568

563 Christinia Crippes, “Smoking Ban Compliance Up to 81 Percent,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), May 5, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).

567 Hearing Complaint at 4, In re Jan Beach, d/b/a Bucktail Lodge, Docket No. D-2009-00063 (Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Div., n.d. [May 29, 2009]).

569 Iowa Alcoholic Beverages Division, “Des Moines County Tobacco Enforcement
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

The turnabout in the one-time “‘hotbed area’” Walding attributed in part to owners’ having learned from Duncan’s and Froehlich’s cases that violating the Smokefree Air Act could bring significant economic consequences beyond a $100 penalty in its wake. Compliance was also promoted by owners’ perception that competitors were “not profiting or benefiting by violating the law....” And, finally, the real-world experience that their own compliance did not hamper their business removed yet another motivation for cheating: “‘At the end of the day, despite some of the warnings, the sky didn’t fall,’ Walding said. “To my knowledge, we haven’t had any bars drop out or lose enough business that they’re throwing in the towel. That really hasn’t happened. The “Chicken Little” philosophy really hasn’t materialized.”

He acknowledged that the state was unable to calculate accurately whether any bars had gone out of business and whether such exits were attributable to the smoking ban, but Walding was of the opinion that “[t]o the extent that anything is having an impact on licensees, it’s three things and that’s recession, recession, recession.” Significantly, in Burlington, the vortex of the alcoholic rebellion against the Smokefree Air Act, a search by the city clerk’s office “did not yield any liquor licensed establishments going out of business during the last year.”

As for the need to replicate the special Des Moines County enforcement regime elsewhere in Iowa, by August 2009 Walding was not aware of any other area of the state with a concentration of disobedience as great as that which had existed in Des Moines County. In addition, the overall compliance rate among bars in the state has shown a marked improvement since the administrative sanctions were meted out this past spring. That said, I plan to closely monitor the compliance rate as the inclement weather approaches. Right now it is fairly easy for a bar to comply as patrons can simply walk outside of a licensed premises to light up. Whether

---

570Christinia Crippes, “ABD Checks Yield 100 Pct Compliance,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), June 10, 2009 (3A) (NewsBank).

571Christinia Crippes, “Bar Check Efforts Rise,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), June 2, 2009 (1A) (Newsbank).

572Christinia Crippes, “ABD Checks Yield 100 Pct Compliance,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), June 10, 2009 (3A) (NewsBank).

that remains the case when winter returns remains to be seen. If not, the random checks may expand to another area of the state.\textsuperscript{575}

Some bar owners violating the Smokefree Air Act sought to justify their offenses by stylizing them as noble and courageous acts of civil disobedience. Their lawyer reinforced this narrative. Speaking at a fundraising rally that one of his clients, Larry Duncan, and his Freedom Fighters for All Citizens of Iowa organized to collect the money to pay him, Darwin Bunger first claimed that he was “not fighting the smoking ban for the fees, but rather because as a citizen he feels the state is not right.” Why under these idealistic circumstances he had not accepted the cases pro bono he failed to explain, but he did tell the pro-smoking crowd that at church on Sunday he had opined that he would win.\textsuperscript{576} Even the Burlington press recognized that “[f]ortunately, Duncan has local attorney Darwin Bunger, who not only represents him but believes in his cause.” As a true believer Bunger appears to have forgotten that Iowa was not a nation: “‘The legislators have a legal and moral obligation to do the best of their ability when passing a law to comply with the supreme law of the land, the Iowa Constitution.’”\textsuperscript{577} However, “‘many of them knew at the time’” that the Smokefree Air Act “‘probably was, or even in their hearts knew was unconstitutional...and we just have to reign [sic] in on that kind of conduct.’”\textsuperscript{578} Bunger was such a full-service lawyer that, after a Burlington city council member had characterized the law-breaking bar owners as creating anarchy,\textsuperscript{579} he published a letter to the editor glorifying the violators: “By a slim majority, Iowa Legislators passed the Smoke Free [sic] Air Act. Many of them voted for the act knowing or suspecting that the Act was in violation of the Iowa Constitution. Others should have known it, if they really did not. That tyrannical action by the legislators in violation of their sworn oaths to uphold the Iowa Constitution was the father of any alleged anarchy. The people and their Constitution must take precedence over any given legislature or legislator in a free society.”\textsuperscript{580} Having

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{575}Email from Lynn Walding to Marc Linder (Aug. 3, 2009).
\item \textsuperscript{576}Christinia Crippes, “Duncan Rallies Support,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Apr. 23, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).
\item \textsuperscript{577}Christinia Crippes, “Otis Campbell’s Owner Keep Fighting,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Jan. 9, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).
\item \textsuperscript{579}Jeff Abell, “Council Stays Out of Smoking Ban Fight,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Apr. 1, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank).
\item \textsuperscript{580}Darwin Bunger, “Tyrannical Action,” \textit{Hawk Eye} (Burlington), Apr. 6, 2009, on \end{itemize}
baptized his client a virtuous tyrannicide and made common cause with him, Bunger nevertheless failed to explain how legislators “should have known” the Iowa Supreme Court would hold that exempting casinos was unconstitutional when the weight of the Court’s privileges and immunities precedents spoke against such a conclusion, the attorney general took that position, and none of the many state anti-smoking laws had been invalidated.

Hyperbole—if Bunger and Eichhorn were even self-conscious enough to perceive that figures of speech that an audience cannot take literally constitute an inept litigational strategy vis-a-vis judges—also pervaded the brief that they submitted to the Des Moines County District Court in Duncan’s constitutional challenge to SAA. Typical were the assertions, for example, that were supposed to shore up the claim that the statute was unconstitutional because it violated the federal Commerce Clause. They climaxed in the bizarre, ignorant, false, and illiterate declaration that: “This statute is not different than if [sic] Kentucky decided that corn was unhealthy [sic] and passed a law prohibiting (or severely restricting) its consumption. Both interfere with interstate commerce. A state cannot remove themselves [sic] from the free market that formed this country.”

In turn, Bunger-Eichhorn rested their triumphant call for invalidation on their delusional assertion—for which they cited no source whatsoever and which even Philip Morris’s website rejected—that the science concerning secondhand

582 “Public health officials have concluded that secondhand smoke from cigarettes causes disease, including lung cancer and heart disease, in non-smoking adults, as well as causes conditions in children such as asthma, respiratory infections, cough, wheeze, otitis media (middle ear infection) and Sudden Infant Death Syndrome. ...”

“Philip Morris USA believes that the public should be guided by the conclusions of public health officials regarding the health effects of secondhand smoke when deciding whether to be in places where secondhand smoke is present, or if they are smokers, and where to smoke around others. Particular care should be exercised where children are concerned and adults should avoid smoking cigarettes around them.

“We also believe that the conclusions of public health officials concerning environmental tobacco smoke are sufficient to warrant measures that regulate cigarette smoking in public places. We also believe that where cigarette smoking is permitted, the government should require the posting of warning notices that communicate public health officials' conclusions that secondhand smoke causes disease in non-smokers.”

smoke was “not conclusive. The State argues cause and effect when there is nothing more than correlation. In fact, there is compelling expertise and expert testimony available showing that the alleged ‘science’ relied upon by the legislature to assert the claim of concern for the public and employee health is merely conjecture....” Duncan’s lawyers eloquently displayed their own multiple expertises by observing that the “legislatively relied upon ‘science’ is more in the realm of antidotal [sic] information and self reporting.” Hence their non-joke about the corn-free Kentucky act (for which they provided no antidote).

However, Bunger-Eichhorn had to pile up far more utter nonsense in order to reach this punch-line. In particular, in the end they did not even shy away from planting the seed of suggestion to readers that state cigarette taxes (which Iowa had pioneered in 1921) were unconstitutional interferences with interstate commerce. Their childish primitive claims stumbled along these lines. Suppressing the fact that many other states had initiated similar and more far-reaching interventions without having been sanctioned for interfering with interstate commerce, they began with Iowa’s “systematic effort to burden and discriminate against tobacco products,” of which SAA was but “one example” of the state’s “trying to stop the lawful consumption of tobacco products.” Initially, Bunger-Eichhorn were content to state that the Legislative Services Agency had apprised the legislature (on April 9, 2008, the day that legislature passed H.F. 2212) that LSA estimated that the law would reduce the dollar amount of cigarette sales by four percent. (In fact, this figure scarcely even merited the label of an estimate. This number emerged from information provided by the Illinois Department of Revenue, less than three months after the Smoke-Free Illinois Act had gone into effect on January 1, 2008, to the Iowa Department of Revenue. However, rather than having even been derived from Illinois’ very short-run data, the 4.0 percent figure originated in a nine-year-old World Bank report based on unidentified studies based on unexplicated methodologies.)

---

584 See above chs 15 and 19.

586 Mary Beth Mellick, “HF 2212—Smoking Ban in Public Place (LSB 5743 CH)” (Fiscal Note Version—Conference Committee Report), Fiscal Services Division, Legislative Services Agency (Apr. 9, 2008), on http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/fiscalnotes/data/82_5743CHv0_FN.pdf; telephone interviews with Mary Beth Melnick and Jeff Robinson, Des Moines (Dec. 1 and 3, 2009). According to Senior Legislative Analyst Jeff
Indeed, the LSA merely “assumed” a 4.0 percent drop.587 Bunger-Eichhorn then transmogrified this scantly assumption into the legislature’s “intention that people not participate in the commerce of tobacco products” and, without any evidence, risibly asserted that the “Anti-Smoking Act tries to prevent most usage of tobacco products....”588 Duncan’s lawyers also claimed that there was “ample evidence this statute seeks to interfere with, and unconstitutionally hinder, the commerce of tobacco and should be ruled to violate the commerce clause” on the grounds Robinson, the assumption arose as follows: “If there are fewer places in Iowa where cigarettes can be legally consumed, it is assumed the result will be fewer cigarettes smoked and fewer cigarette sales. The [Iowa] Department of Revenue provided the estimate for reduced cigarette sales, and that estimate is a reduction in cigarette sales of 4.0%. The Department cites a study by the World Bank [that] estimated that smoking bans reduce cigarette consumption in the range of 4% to 10%.” Jeff Robinson to Representative Phil Wise, Subject: Economic Impact Calculations for HF 2212 (Public Indoor Smoking Ban Bill) at 1 (Mar. 17, 2008) (copy furnished by Jeff Robinson). The World Bank report merely stated without furnishing any sources that: “A second effect of smoking restrictions is that they reduce some smokers’ consumption of cigarettes and induce some to quit. In the United States, such restrictions have reduced tobacco consumption by between 4 and 10 percent, according to various estimates. For such restrictions to work, it appears that there must be a general level of social support for them, and an awareness of the health consequences of exposure to environmental tobacco smoke. Outside the United States, there are comparatively few data on the effectiveness of indoor smoking restrictions.” World Bank, Curbing the Epidemic: Governments and the Economics of Tobacco Control ch. 4 (1999), on http://www1.worldbank.org/tobacco/book/html/chapter4.htm. The Department of Revenue and LSA opted for the lower end of the range merely because it sounded better, though Robinson did not believe that the legislature would have defeated the bill had LSA opted for 10 percent. Telephone interview with Jeff Robinson, Des Moines (Dec. 1 and 3, 2009). Any robust estimate would have to have taken into account the proportion of public places that had been smoke-free before the law went into effect and how extensive the ban was. For the claim that per capita cigarette consumption of the entire adult population of the United States would decline 4.5 percent if all workplaces that were not smokefree banned smoking, see Caroline Fichtenberg and Stanton Glantz, “Effect of Smoke-Free Workplaces on Smoking Behaviour: Systematic Review,” British Medical Journal 325:188 (July 27, 2002).

587 Mary Beth Mellick, “HF 2212—Smoking Ban in Public Place (LSB 5743 CH)” (Fiscal Note Version—Conference Committee Report), Fiscal Services Division, Legislative Services Agency (Apr. 9, 2008), on http://www3.legis.state.ia.us/fiscalnotes/data/82_5743CHv0_FN.pdf

that the passage in 2007 by the same elected General Assembly of bills to increase the tobacco tax and to create fire-labeling requirements on cigarettes “demonstrate a legislative intent to diminish to the greatest extent possible or even destroy the Iowa market for legal tobacco products.” These assertions were as absurd as Bunger-Eichhorn’s false claim to the court that they were directly supported by (“See”) two U.S. Supreme Court decisions, which in fact not only had absolutely nothing to do with them, but dealt exclusively with an aspect of interstate commerce that was totally lacking in the case of the SAA—namely, discrimination against out-of-state business and in favor of local business.\(^589\) Unsurprisingly, the bar owner’s lawyers did not even try to account for why the cigarette tax in no other state had—despite the facts that in 21 states it was higher than Iowa’s\(^590\) and in all states amounted to more than $15 billion annually,\(^591\) every state except Wyoming has passed a fire-safe cigarette law,\(^592\) and most and a growing number of legislatures had passed statewide nosmoking laws\(^593\)—been held to be an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce.

The only legal argument on which Duncan might even have had the slightest shred of a chance of prevailing would, as has already been noted, have been a Pyrrhic victory for him and other bar owners, since even the invalidation of the exemption of casinos on equal protection grounds would merely result in their coverage, not in bars’ exemption.\(^594\)

---

\(^589\)Brief in Support of Petition for Judicial Review at 68, Coordinated Estate Services Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill/Aunt Bea’s Cafe v Iowa Dept of Commerce, No. CVEQ008591 (Des Moines Cty Dist. Ct., July 24, 2009). The cases were City of Philadelphia v New Jersey, 437 US 617 (1978) and Carbone, Inc. v Town of Clarkstone, NY, 511 US 383 (1994). It is unclear whether the lawyers ignorantly or intentionally misinformed the judge.

\(^590\)http://www.tobaccofreekids.org/research/factsheets/pdf/0267.pdf (visited Dec. 2, 2009). At $4.25, the combined New York State/City tax was more than three times higher than Iowa’s.

\(^594\)As the State argued: “Should the Court ultimately conclude that the State of Iowa could not rationally exempt these dissimilar entities from regulation..., the Iowa ABD’s disciplinary action against Otis Campbell’s would still stand.” Respondent’s Brief in Support of Resistance to Petition for Judicial Review at 40 n.7, Coordinated Estate Services Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill/Aunt Bea’s Cafe v Iowa Dept of Commerce, No. CVEQ008591 (Des Moines Cty Dist. Ct., July 24, 2009).
Bunger and Eichhorn remained in their hyperbolic prime at the two-hour hearing before Des Moines County District Judge Mary Ann Brown on November 17. Eichhorn, for example, claimed that the enforcement procedure was flawed because “basically” ABD “has pursued what I would consider a terror-type approach, much like the (Internal Revenue Service).... They want to terrorize people so that they will comply, and they will pretty much do what they need to do to get there.” Gamey trying to defend the casino exemption, Assistant Attorney General John Lundquist argued that the economic impact of gambling revenues on the state—citing a study indicating that prohibiting smoking in casinos would reduce state revenues by 10 percent or $31 million—made casinos different, whereas the revenue impact of the smoking ban in bars and restaurants was zero.\footnote{Christinia Crippes, “Smoking Ban Battle Hits Courtroom,” \textit{Hawk-Eye} (Burlington), Nov. 18, 2009, on http://www.thehawkeye.com.} Unfazed by his lawyers’ legal position that the casino exemption violated the state and federal constitutions, Duncan was content to proselytize for make-believe nineteenth-century rugged-individualist profit-making: he did not “want to take away gambling business’s [sic] right to allow smoking. He just wants all business owners to have the right to operate their establishments as they Commerce, No. CVEQ008591 (Des Moines Cty Dist. Ct., Sept. 4, 2009). Nevertheless, the State failed to come to grips with the major doctrinal issue that Duncan’s lawyers raised. To state that a “desire to maintain the economic vitality and success of Iowa’s licensed casinos is a valid and rational reason for the Legislature to exclude casino gaming floors from the Smokefree Air Act’s regulation” simply because the “State of Iowa and its political subdivisions directly benefit from the operation” of the casinos inasmuch as they use the resulting tax revenue for numerous construction and job programs (\textit{id.}, at 46-47), does not address the question as to whether the similar-situatedness as between regulated bars and exempt casinos must relate to what the legislature designated as “[t]he purpose” of the SAA—namely, “to reduce the level of exposure by the general public and employees to environmental tobacco smoke in order to improve the public health of Iowans” (H.F. 2212, § 1(3))—or whether this other purpose that it serves (namely, maintaining the state’s tax revenues) is wholly unrelated to the statutorily identified purpose, thus rendering the discrimination between casinos and bars “wholly arbitrary” because “such a classification is not based on anything having relation to the purpose for which it is made.” Smith \textit{v} Cahoon, 283 US 553, 567 (1931) (quoting Air-Way Electric Appliance Corp. \textit{v} Day, 266 US 71, 85 (1924)). The State might have bolstered its argument had it specified that some of the tax revenue that would have been lost as a result of casino coverage would have been used for programs to improve the public health of Iowans. This language from the statutory purpose might also have aided the State’s argument: since casino owners claimed that a very high proportion of their customers were out-of-state visitors and since improving non-Iowans’ health was not a statutory purpose, a smoking ban in casinos was not a high priority.
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

Judge Brown’s ruling four and a half months later, though not well researched, did not need to be in order to reject out of hand Bunger-Eichhorn’s plethora of absurd, threadbare, and frivolous arguments. As predicted earlier, the only one that she even took seriously—calling it “the Bar’s...most compelling...argument” was possible only in comparison to the lawyers’ otherwise wholly implausible ones—was the equal protection claim based on the casino exemption. Because Brown found no credible argument that smokers were a suspect or even quasi-suspect class, she was able to use the “very deferential standard known as the rational basis test,” under which Duncan bore the very see fit.”

597For example, the judge quoted a U.S. surgeon general’s report on secondhand smoke secondhand from a second-year law student’s article in a law review. Coordinated Estate Services v. Iowa Department of Commerce, Ruling and Judgment on Petition for Judicial Review, No. CVEQ008591, slip. op. at 14 (Iowa Dist. Ct for Des Moines Cty., Mar. 31, 2010). Ironically, the author of the article, which dealt with the very issue that the judge was deciding, was unaware that a lawsuit was pending. Kevin Sherlock, “Clearing the Air: Analyzing the Constitutionality of the Iowa Smokefree Air Act’s Gaming Floor Exemption,” Iowa Law Review 95:347-92, at 363-64 (2009) (not realizing that a constitutional judicial challenge of ABD’s administrative action survived dismissal of the state court action). On the judge’s mistaken historical claim based on a source that did not make such a claim, see above Preface.

598For example, the court rejected the Bar’s claim that ABD lacked authority to punish the Bar for violating SAA because no judicial magistrate had ever cited it for so doing on the grounds that ABD’s enforcement of SFAA was not at issue, but that of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, which confers on ABD authority to sanction a law-breaking liquor license holder. Since the “Bar freely admits” that it had violated SAA, ABD was justified in acting against its license. Coordinated Estate Services v. Iowa Department of Commerce, Ruling and Judgment on Petition for Judicial Review, No. CVEQ008591, slip. op. at 5-6 (Iowa Dist. Ct for Des Moines Cty., Mar. 31, 2010). The court rejected the Bar’s claim that prohibiting it from permitting its customers to smoke while selling liquor to them denied it a privileged and immunity enjoyed by other businesses because holding a liquor license already subjected the Bar to numerous restrictions from which other businesses were free. Id at 7-8. Finally, Judge Brown rejected Duncan’s lawyers’ bizarre commerce clause claims on the grounds that SAA neither regulated nor restricted the sale of tobacco in Iowa nor had the effect of favoring in-state over out-of-state economic interests. Id. at 18.

Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

heavy burden of refuting every reasonable basis on which the differential classification might be sustained.\textsuperscript{600} The threshold issue that the Bar had to resolve in its favor was that it was similarly situated to the locations exempt from the SAA. Although the court quickly decided that bars were not similarly situated to any of those locations (such as limousines, retail tobacco stores, or fairgrounds), it conceded that casinos presented the closest question, but even the “several superficial similarities to bars and restaurants” (which it did not reveal) could not hide the crucial facts that only casinos were licensed for gambling and the tax and regulatory structures were “radically different.”\textsuperscript{601} Judge Brown could have disposed of the case at this point, but, proceeding on the assumption that bars were similarly situated to the exempt locations, she scrutinized the rational basis for the legislature’s classification.\textsuperscript{602} “Simply put,” the “plausible policy justification” that the court identified was that “the State would lose too much money by banning smoking in gambling areas” and that this money was “spent in a variety of ways that directly benefit the citizens of Iowa.”\textsuperscript{603} In other words, Brown failed to engage the aforementioned jurisprudential question as to whether the similar-situatedness has to relate to the legislature’s designated statutory purpose or whether the other purpose of maintaining the state’s tax revenues is wholly unrelated to SAA’s purpose, thus arbitrarily discriminating between casinos and bars because that classification is unrelated to the purpose for which it is made.

In a parting shot at a litigant and his lawyers for the quality of whose legal arguments she had not even bothered trying to conceal her contempt\textsuperscript{604} Judge \textsuperscript{603}Coordinated Estate Services v. Iowa Department of Commerce, Ruling and Judgment on Petition for Judicial Review, No. CVEQ008591, slip. op. at 27-28 (Iowa Dist. Ct for Des Moines Cty., Mar. 31, 2010). Even under the “‘toothier’” Iowa (as contradistinguished from federal) equal protection standards Judge Brown found that the classifications passed muster as rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose. \textit{Id.} at 29-31.

\textsuperscript{604}For example, Brown referred to “what can only be an attempt to distract the Court, the Bar begins its written argument with a lengthy recitation of ancient
Brown closed by underscoring that even if she had found that the law did unfairly discriminate between Duncan’s bar and casinos, “the Bar would still lose...its liquor license...because...the remedy would be for the Court to strike the constitutional provision from the statute,” thus banning smoking in the casinos.

Stressed, inter alia, by legal fees, Duncan gave up. Bunger, who opined that if his client “continued to fight and continued to lose, it ‘would kill him,’” may have been trying to keep his stake alive—“seven bars across the state...have asked for a judicial review of the case, a few of which are represented by Bunger”—by professing a belief that “the case has a chance at the Iowa Supreme Court level.” In the event, these bar owners, having learned from Duncan’s expensive lesson, abandoned Bunger, who himself in a bravado-less interlude conceded that the Iowa Supreme Court “may well have sustained the district court” (if a paying client had enabled him to satisfy his curiosity). With judicial dockets cleared and bar owners’ rebellion subdued, Walding’s prediction rang true: “As we look back in another decade from now, we’re never going to believe that it ever was any other way than smoke-free.”

Leery Legislative Leadership Prevents Floor Debate of Bills to Strengthen or Weaken the Act During the 2009 Session

Gronstal predicted...that there will be a lot of talk in the 2009 legislative session about expanding or doing away with the state’s smoking ban, but not much action. “My prediction is that there won’t be consensus found on the issue and that nothing will happen on it.”

Even as the legislature was still debating H.F. 2212 some members declared—in part to rebut Republican charges of hypocrisy—their resolve to return in 2009 to push for coverage of casinos. Health organizations, too, quickly announced a similar intention. For example, already by June the American Lung Association, which had been willing to let the bill go down to defeat for its exemption of casinos, was planning how to persuade legislators to extend the prohibition to casinos. Even some legislators who were not outspoken bill backers expected the exemption to be repealed in 2009. Opponents of some provisions of the Smokefree Air Act, who were content to revert to the days when Iowa’s air was less free of tobacco smoke, were also gearing up for revisions. Democratic Representative McKinley Bailey, who had so energetically annoyed his caucus with his nearly successful crippling attacks on the bill, was prepared to urge his colleagues (as early as at a special session in 2008, if one were called to deal with the destruction wrought by unprecedented flooding) to amend the statute to preclude IDPH’s “absolute abuse of power” in defining the bars that would be barred from permitting smoking on their outdoor patios. He nevertheless conceded at a local legislative forum in September that he saw “little chance” of repeal.

---

610 See above ch. 35. Republicans should have been pressed to deal with their hypocrisy if they had refused to vote to cover casinos after having continually berated Democrats in 2008 for having exempted them. Ironically, when asked in 2009 whether he would vote to amend the law to cover casinos, Republican Senator James Seymour instinctively worried instead about being charged with hypocrisy if he voted for coverage despite his “whole premise” that government should not interfere with private businesses. Telephone interview with James Seymour, Woodbine (Aug. 17, 2009).

613 See above ch. 35.

Shortly thereafter Representative Brian Quirk, one of the few Democrats to vote against H.F. 2212, launched a (quickly deflated) trial balloon: in order to remedy the “inequity between casinos and bars” and to “ease bar owners’ concerns,” a small group of legislators was “quietly assembling a compromise to allow gambling devices in adult-only establishments....” Permitting video Keno would, he insisted, “go a long way toward keeping their [bars’] doors open.” Van Roekel and Sturgis, leaders of Choose Freedom Iowa, saw this initiative, which was merely “an effort to respond to voter angst over” the ban, as “grasping for solutions” by “big government legislators” who had finally been forced to acknowledge that the bar owners had been right all along that the law would create problems for small businesses.

Despite the initial flurry of amendatory preparations, a month before the elections anti-smoking forces understood that further progress toward statutory perfection would probably have to be suspended. The American Cancer Society’s lobbyist, for example, believed that at the 2009 legislative session (and perhaps for some time thereafter) anti-smoking groups’ chief task would be defending SAA from efforts to water it down rather than expanding its coverage by striking the casino exemption. That Democrats somewhat increased their control of both chambers for the 2009-10 session (from 53-47 to 56-44 in the House and from 30-20 to 32-18 in the Senate) may have confirmed Gronstal’s and McCarthy’s aforementioned prognoses that voters would not punish the party by electing Republicans with a mandate to restore public secondhand smoke exposure, but the legislative leadership refused to interpret the enlarged majority—or even the electoral losses by all candidates who specifically challenged incumbents on the basis of their votes for H.F. 2212—as the occasion for completing the unfinished work of 2008 by repealing the exclusion of the casinos’ gambling floors, which the law’s supporters and McCarthy himself

---

616 See above ch. 35.
617 “Video Gaming Deal in Works for Bars?” Telegraph Herald (Dubuque), Sept. 16, 2008 (D5) (NewsBank).
619 Telephone interview with Stacy Frelund, ACS, Des Moines (Oct. 2, 2008).
620 http://www.legis.state.ia.us/aspx/Legislators/LegislatorInfo.aspx 621 “Talk @ 12,” WSUI (Iowa City), June 30, 2009, 12:00-1:00 p.m. (statement by Peggy Huppert, director of government relations, ACS).
deemed its most serious defect in need of correction. At the beginning of December McCarthy noted that there “‘may be some advocacy groups who don’t want the law touched for fear that it will open up a Pandora’s box,’” but he still lacked a sense as to where they or the Democratic caucus was at on the issue.

By mid-December the press was reporting that both Democratic and Republican legislators had already drafted bills running the gamut from extending the smoking ban to casino gambling floors to facilitating smoking on outdoor bar patios. At the very end of 2008, just two weeks before the 83rd General Assembly convened, Governor Culver not only predicted that the casino exemption “will not be changed anytime soon.... ‘I think it’s more likely we’ll leave it alone for a while,’” but attributed this outcome not to legislative calculation, but to popular satisfaction with a new equilibrium: “‘I think most Iowans believe that it’s a pretty good balance right now.’” Without unpacking this “balance” and explaining why the majority of state residents would have believed that casino corporations’ blunt power to hold the bill’s passage in the House hostage represented a desirable result, Culver went so far as to adopt pro-smoking forces’ market-knows-best excuse for opposing smoking bans altogether: “[t]here’s more likely is that the casinos will go nonsmoking on their own,” and in any event, “[i]t’s kind of a misconception that if you go to any casino, it’s all smoke-filled.” How low he had set his public health sights was on display in his expectation that casino management would adopt the wholly discredited designated smoking areas regime (that constituted the rotten core of Iowa’s law from 1978 until 2008) by “carv[ing] out smoke-free zones,” which apparently conformed with the expectation of the “‘general public’” that “‘there will be limited smoking and no smoking in most public places.’” Nor did he perceive any urgency since he had “not heard enough of an outcry to prompt him to suggest that lawmakers make casino gambling floors smoke-free” and “‘[u]nless and until that changes, I think we’ve probably gone a lot further than most people would’ve thought.’’ The governor, who well into the 2008 session had supported only local preemption repeal without taking a position on a statewide ban, may well have included himself among that majority. Characterizing the smoking ban even without casino coverage as “extremely progressive,” he exaggerated Iowa’s achievement by claiming that “‘we’ve done what 40 or more states have not done....”’\textsuperscript{626}

Perhaps Governor Culver might have been willing to reconsider his self-satisfied attitude toward the “‘pretty good balance’” that condemned casino workers to continued exposure to secondhand smoke had he understood that air pollution (as measured by respirable suspended particles and carcinogenic particulate polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons) even in well-ventilated casinos with nonsmoking areas is so heavy that a study in Pennsylvania by one of the world’s leading researchers in this discipline estimated that it would cause six deaths annually per 10,000 casino workers from secondhand smoke-induced heart disease and lung cancer—or five times the death rate from disasters in coal mines, Pennsylvania’s most dangerous industry.\textsuperscript{627}

Whether they were merely going through the motions or harbored the hope that political serendipity might yet resurrect bills that had been deemed stillborn even before they were introduced, advocates of both progress and regress filed a number of measures to amend the Smokefree Air Act. Perhaps emboldened by a New Year’s poll in the Cedar Rapids \textit{Gazette} revealing that 70 percent of respondents favored legislative action in 2009 to ban casino smoking,\textsuperscript{628} Democrat Mark Smith of Marshalltown, who had been conflicted about his role in creating the exemption for the veterans home there in 2008,\textsuperscript{629} announced a few days before the 83rd General Assembly opened that he would file a bill in the House to repeal the casino exemption: “‘Our goal was to assist with workers having to work long hours in smoke-filled environments...so I just felt that should be extended to casino workers.’” Mindful, however, of leadership’s “warnings that it is unlikely to pass,” he admitted that he was “‘not hopeful that it’s going to go very far....”’\textsuperscript{630}

\textsuperscript{629}See above ch. 35.

\textsuperscript{630}Fred Love, “Prepared Bills Touch on Smoking, Leaf Burning, Indecent Exposure,” 3650
On the session’s very first day, the American Cancer Society’s legislative update reported that “protecting” (rather than extending) the Smokefree Air Act was its highest priority in light of the Democratic leadership’s feeling that “it’s best not to take it up this session” because “there is a significant risk that the law could be weakened” if it were brought up. Thus, for the time being compliance and education would be the focus. The same day outgoing Representative Philip Wise, who had loyally assumed the task of pushing the amendment to exempt casinos in the House Commerce Committee, delivered the same message from a different perspective in admonishing his former colleagues that: “When you pass landmark legislation—and by [sic] anyone who knows anything about political and governmental history, that smoking ban was landmark legislation—...legislators simply do not revisit it the next year, unless there is some kind of technical flaw that has to be fixed.” Wise’s wisdom notwithstanding, that same day Smith, with no co-sponsors—“I wanted to pre-file the bill and did not have access to other members during the time we were not in session. I wanted to make sure the bill got in early to promote interest in it. I believe Tyler Olson was interested in signing on and maybe others”—introduced H.F. 6, which with admirable brevity consisted of one short sentence striking § 142D.4(10), the casino exemption. Unsurprisingly, already the next day lobbyists for two casinos declared against it and within a month nine more followed suit in addition to the Iowa Gaming Association. The House leadership promptly took the opportunity to remark that smoking bills would not be debated. House Speaker Pat Murphy—who in 2008 received $23,000 in campaign contributions from a casino PAC and who, according to 631 Peggy Huppert, ACS, Iowa Director of Government Relations, Iowa Legislative Update (emailed to Marc Linder, Jan. 12, 2009). ACS’s other legislative priority was insuring continued funding for tobacco control programs in the wake of the depletion of tobacco trust fund (created by the Master Settlement Agreement) and the need to compete for appropriations from the general fund.

---

632 See above ch. 35.

634 Email from Mark Smith to Marc Linder (July 6, 2009).

637 The Peninsula Gaming Employees PAC originated in the company owning the Diamond Jo casino in Dubuque (Murphy’s hometown) and Worth. The PAC’s name was misleading since the lion’s share of the ca. $56,000 contributions to the PAC stemmed the American Cancer Society “looks out for the casinos”: “The problem was in the House...mainly because the Speaker (Pat Murphy) wanted an exemption”\textsuperscript{638}–“‘strongly doub[ed]’” it because some people “‘want to gut the ban,”’ while Majority Leader McCarthy filed the imperative for inaction under the rubric, “let ‘sleeping dogs lie.’”\textsuperscript{639} (Other anti-smoking Democrats suggested that the legislature would not revisit the Smokefree Air Act until court challenges to its constitutionality had been resolved.)\textsuperscript{640} McCarthy’s further explanation that the health groups themselves were not pushing an amendment was circular since their stance was derivative of leadership’s nose counting, but the Cancer Society presented its own voting analysis, which ominously suggested that, no matter how tenuous the previous year’s legislative majority had been, it had shrunk beyond the vanishing point in 2009. Peggy Huppert, ACS’s director of government relations, argued that “an amendment that would have allowed smoking in all bars lost by only one vote in the...House.... And the make-up of the Legislature has now changed. Of the 12 Republicans who voted for the smoking ban last spring, almost all chose not to seek re-election in the fall. ‘They knew when they voted they were retiring and that was part of the reason they could vote yes.’... Ten Democrats voted against the smoking ban, ‘so it was really, truly the Republican support that pushed it over the edge.’”\textsuperscript{641} Later she observed even more bluntly

\textsuperscript{638}Email from Peggy Huppert, Iowa Director of Government Relations, ACS, to Marc Linder (July 14, 2009).

\textsuperscript{639}Jennifer Jacobs, “Iowa Smoking Ban Probably Won’t Be Debated This Year,”

\textsuperscript{640}Will Smith, “Smoke Ban Top Forum Topic, Again,” \textit{Hawkeye} (Burlington), Jan.

\textsuperscript{641}Jennifer Jacobs, “Iowa Smoking Ban Probably Won't Be Debated This Year,” the amendment in 2008 was inaccurate, though her point remained vital. By 2 votes (49-51) Struyk’s amendment to exempt bars and restaurants while they denied admission to those that 2008 had represented an especially propitious political constellation that, since it could not be replicated in 2009-10, made extreme caution imperative lest good amendatory intentions pave the road to dilution or even repeal urged by a vocal minority of “many Iowans talking to Iowans”: “We should not take this law for granted. If we do, we could lose it. I have no doubt that if the bill passed last year were to come to a vote in the Iowa House today, it would not pass due to the change in membership.”

The ACS official in charge of field government relations fleshed out what the changing membership meant: “12 moderate Rs voted for the bill last year—10 of them are gone, replaced by more conservative colleagues. Ten Ds voted against the bill. They are still there, and are joined by two more conservative Ds who said they would have voted against it. Most advocates inside and outside the chamber agree that the bill would not pass this year.”

To be sure, this lethal arithmetic did not deter the Cancer Society (or the Heart or Lung Association) from having its lobbyists declare in favor of Smith’s bill.

How these numbers might have played themselves out in a re-run of the 2008 House vote is instructive. Of the 15 newly elected House members, eight signed on among the 51 co-sponsors in 2009 of McKinley Bailey’s bill, H.F. 211 (discussed below) to repeal the ban on smoking in outdoor areas of restaurants. Of these eight, four replaced retiring representatives who on the final House vote (54-45) on H.F. 2212 on April 8, 2008, provided the requisite constitutional majority—without whose votes the bill would have lacked the 51st vote.

One of those two newly elected conservative Democrats (who co-sponsored Bailey’s bill) may have been Sharon Steckman of Mason City, an ex-smoker who declared that she probably would have voted against H.F. 2212, which she resented for having ruined bars 99.9 percent of whose customers were smokers, and at most would have voted for coverage of indoor restaurants. After having staunchly under 18 lost, but Bailey’s amendment to exempt bars, restaurants, and other public places with a liquor control license during times when only people 21 and over were admitted was adopted (51-44). See above ch. 35.

642Peggy Huppert, [ACS] Iowa Director of Government Relations, Iowa Legislative Update 7 (emailed to Marc Linder, Mar. 2, 2009).

643Email from Stacy Frelund to Marc Linder (Mar. 3, 2009).

644http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Matt&Service=Declarations&frame=1 (visited July 1, 2009). Lobbyists for CAFE and the Iowa Medical Society and Iowa Osteopathic Medical Association also declared for it.

opined that bar owners should be allowed to make the rules, she nevertheless conceded, in response to a question, that she did not oppose laws requiring them to wash glasses; asked why smoking should be treated differently, she triumphantly observed that unwashed glasses spread disease. The sequitur as to whether secondhand tobacco smoke did not also spread disease was met conversation-ending belligerence.646

A week later Smith’s H.F. 6 was assigned to what predictably became its final destination, a House Commerce subcommittee—consisting of the Act’s two chief House advocates, Janet Petersen, Tyler Olson, and pro-smoking Republican Matt Windschitl647—which would be the grave of all House smoking bills. Petersen, the Commerce Committee chair, told the press that she would “likely nix the bill in subcommittee,” adding to Wise’s and leadership’s reasons the desire “‘to give Iowans a chance to get used to the law before we delve back into that legislation again.’” Yet another basis for refraining from repealing the casino exemption was offered by the Iowa Gaming Association, whose president, Wes Ehrecke, refurbished his prior year’s argument by opining that such a step, “‘[i]n times of tough economic budget crunches...might not be the most prudent thing to do.’” In contrast, Smith explained that “‘choosing between conflicting and competing values’” was part and parcel of governance, and, venturing out on a fiscal limb where no supporter of H.F. 2212 had dared to go in 2008, at last rejected potential financial impact as an impediment and proclaimed a healthful work environment “paramount.”648 Near the end of January, the Senate companion bill to H.F. 6 was introduced by Joe Bolkcom and 15 other Democrats, including such strong supporters of the Smokefree Air Act as Quirmbach, Appel, and McCoy.649 Although fully aware that the bill would never come to a floor vote, Bolkcom speculated that “if we had a pure vote on this we could pass it. It would be close” in the Senate, but that it probably could not pass the House.650

Despite the Democratic leadership’s signals that it would not permit any 646 Telephone interview with Sharon Steckman, Mason City (June 1, 2009).

649 S.F. 57 (Jan. 27, 2009, by Bolkcom); Senate Journal 2009, at 143 (Jan. 27).
650 Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (Feb. 26, 2009). In 2011, with Republicans controlling 60 House seats, Smith introduced the same bill, which numerous casino lobbyists quickly declared against, while a number of health organizations (such as ACS, AHA, and ALA) supported it. H.F. 21 (Jan. 12, by M. Smith); House Journal 2011, at 62; http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service=DspReport&ga=84&type=b&hbill=HF21.
amendments to be debated, forces seeking to undo the Smokefree Air Act were hardly quiescent. On January 17, at the session’s first legislative forum in Burlington, Des Moines County—which ABD’s administrator would soon call the county that “probably...had the strongest resistance to the Smokefree Air Act”—Republican Thomas Sands, a loan officer, real estate appraiser, and farm owner representing a southeastern Iowa House district, was exposed to two “primary issues on the minds of local residents”—the new smoking law and the onrushing recession. Unsurprisingly, according to the local press, Sands, together with Democratic Senator Thomas Courteney and Representative Dennis Cohoon, were questioned about the law by Larry Duncan, the owner of Otis Campbell’s Bar and Grill in West Burlington, who had been openly violating the smoking ban since the day it went into effect. Like several other high-profile bar owners engaging in and organizing resistance to SAA, Duncan imagined himself on the cutting edges of oncology (his “high-quality air systems are adequately protecting workers and customers”) and constitutional law. Unlike them, however, he immortalized his critique of the received wisdom in these fields in an affidavit that he provided in his federal lawsuit contesting the law’s constitutionality:

I have reviewed some of the alleged health information about exposure to “second hand smoke.” It doesn’t make sense to me that if some people can smoke all their life and not get cancer that [sic] exposure to “second hand smoke” causes all sorts of problems. Regardless, I would like the opportunity and right to invite business customers onto my private business property, sell to and serve such customers as I see fit, and permit them to use Otis’ by smoking if they and I find it acceptable. I see no reason why the State should find a health reason to shut down this aspect of my business and allow other places in Iowa to sell and serve food and beverages to smokers—especially when they have not made the type of investments that my business has for exhaust and ventilation systems.

---

655 Affidavit of Larry Duncan at 6 (Oct. 28, 2008), Coordinated Estate Services, Inc., d/b/a Otis Campbell’s Bar & Grill v. Walding, Civ. No. 3:08-CV-138 (S.D. Iowa, Davenport Div.).
After Courtney had observed that one of the session’s bills would remove the casino exemption, 67-year-old Duncan, who purportedly had not smoked in 37 years, replied: “‘Dang it, I’m not here to take away from the casino. That’s going to take away hundreds of thousands of more dollars.’” This reaction was self-contradictory since, as his lawyer had told the press, the casino exemption was “one big part” of Duncan’s argument in his federal lawsuit that the law was unconstitutional. If Duncan’s objective in claiming that the law unconstitutionally denied him equal protection was in fact to level down rather than up (that is, to exempt bars, restaurants, and every other business as well as casinos rather than to ban smoking everywhere), then perhaps the resisters’ mantra that “‘[i]t’s not about smoking, it’s about the rights we keep getting taken away from us every day’” was somewhat less than candid.

Sands, who during his re-election campaign in 2008 had presumably calculated that his hyperbolical assertion that “‘[w]hen I read the bill [H.F. 2212] for the first time, I knew it was the most horribly written bill I have seen in my six years up there’” would go over well with his audience, announced at the forum that, because he regarded the law as unconstitutional and as “‘another way the government is overstepping its rights,’” he might come forward with two bills. Yet even he was hedging his bets: although people’s mood about the law had “‘changed significantly...[w]ether it’s enough of a groundswell to change it remains to be seen.’”

The dissatisfaction that bar owners had expressed at the aforementioned Administrative Rules Review Committee hearings during 2008 concerning IDPH’s definition of a “bar” and the permissibility of smoking on outdoor patios was translated into a number of bills. Muscatine House Democrat Nathan Reichert introduced one that sought to deal with the dispute by redefining a bar as deriving 50 percent or more of its annual gross revenues from the sale of alcoholic beverages for on-premises consumption (on whose outdoor patio smoking would be lawful) and a restaurant as an eating establishment deriving 50 percent or more of its annual gross revenues from the sale of food (on whose patio smoking would be prohibited). The bill, which would also have repealed the casino exemption, falling between two stools, promptly harvested the opposition of lobbyists for both the Lung, Heart, and Cancer organizations and the casinos.

---

House Republican Mike May, who had ultimately voted for H.F. 2212 in 2008, tried to resolve the dispute over the definition of “bar” by repealing the ban on patio smoking altogether and re-exposing all outdoor restaurant customers to secondhand smoke. He, too, paired this move with repeal of the casino exemption, and succeeded, again, in provoking the Lung-Heart-Cancer groups and the casinos to direct their lobbyists to declare against it. May, who had tried and failed to recruit (even) one Democrat as a cosponsor, insisted that he was “trying to be consistent with science” in the sense that a ban on smoking in casinos was dictated by health considerations whereas (he erroneously opined) there was “no empirical evidence” that outdoor smoking harmed anyone.

A much more radical House bill was introduced by Republicans Sands and Windschitl, which would have permitted smoking in any enclosed area of a public place or place of employment to which only people 21 and over were invited and allowed entrance. Apparently too huge a step backwards, their bill attracted the support only of lobbyist for the Iowa Restaurant Association and one casino.

If the foregoing bills gained no co-sponsors, Democrat McKinley Bailey’s
Administrative Rules for, Barkeepers’ Challenge to, Enforcement of Smokefree Air Act

came with a ready-made majority of 51—24 other Democrats and 26 Republicans, some of whom had voted for H.F. 2212 in 2008, some against, while others had favored less comprehensive bills.\(^{669}\) In only partial keeping with Bailey’s aforementioned attacks on IDPH’s rule defining “incidental” in the statutory definition of a “bar” (“an establishment where one may purchase alcoholic beverages...for consumption on the premises and in which the serving of food is only incidental to the consumption of those beverages”),\(^{670}\) H.F. 211 struck all the language after “premises” and the prohibition of smoking in outdoor seating or serving areas of restaurants and then added as the twelfth exemption from the statute “[t]he outdoor seating and serving areas of bars and restaurants” unless smoking were prohibited in such an area pursuant to another section of the statute.\(^{671}\) Oddly, whereas Bailey had previously focused on the allegedly unrealistic administrative definition of “bar,” which resulted in the imposition of smoking bans in the outdoor areas of too many bars, now he not only leveled down by proposing to eliminate the ban for outdoor restaurants and bars, but also, at least to the press, falsely claimed that “lawmakers never intended those areas to be a part of the ban”—although the statute expressly and incontestably did cover outdoor restaurant areas. Instead of facing this insurmountable textual contradiction of his position, Bailey argued that “‘the proof’” that legislators lacked such an intention was “‘sort of the diverse nature of the 51 co-sponsors. We have members who never voted for any version of the smoking ban. We have members who have voted for every version of the smoking ban who’ve signed on. ... We don’t think that the bill we passed is being followed.’”\(^{672}\)

In point of fact, it was unclear how many of his co-sponsors even realized that they were supporting the forced re-exposure of nonsmokers to secondhand smoke in outdoor restaurants. Bailey may have predicted that if his bill did reach the House floor, it would receive at least 70 votes,\(^{673}\) but, given the buyer’s remorse, confusion, and misunderstanding about the bill displayed by some of its co-

\(^{670}\)Iowa Code § 142D.2(1) (2009).

\(^{671}\)H.F. 211 (Feb. 5, 2009, by Bailey et al.); House Journal 2009, at 275. The bill also would have permitted actors in live theater to smoke if smoking were integral to the script.

\(^{673}\)James Lynch, “Smoking Legislation Blocked in House,” Gazette (Cedar Rapids), Feb. 11, 2009 (5A) (NewsBank). May did not cosponsor Bailey’s bill simply because Bailey had not asked him; had he been asked, he would have seriously considered it. Telephone interview with Mike May, Spirit Lake, IA (July 2, 2009).
sponsors when asked why they supported repeal of the ban on smoking on outdoor restaurant patios and resumption of exposure of nonsmokers to secondhand smoke, it is unclear whether Bailey would really have been able to count on all 50 of them on a floor vote, especially since some signed on to the bill in large part because they regarded a measure that would not be voted on as a costless way of propitiating some constituents. Three Democrats who had voted for H.F. 2212 in 2008 exemplified these reactions. Speaker Pro Tempore Polly Bukta explained that she had lined up behind H.F. 211 for the sake of several bar-restaurant-owner-constituents in Clinton who felt that, in reliance on H.F. 2212, which the administrative rules later showed to have been misleading, had built nice patios out in open areas where no one would be hurt by smoke. Nevertheless, Bukta, who wished that smoking were banned everywhere, also expressed the wish that she had never co-sponsored the bill, which she knew was not going anywhere. Assistant Majority Leader John Whitaker, who was more interested in bars than restaurants, believed that smoking was already prohibited in outdoor areas of all bars under SAA. Democrat Doris Kelly, whose husband had died five years earlier of lung cancer and who would ban smoking everywhere, also pointed out that legislators run some bills just to show their constituents even though they knew the bills were not going anywhere. She opined that the administrative rules had changed the statutory definition of “bar,” but Kelley, too, did not understand that the effect of Bailey’s bill would have been to repeal the smoking ban outdoor restaurant patios.

Whatever number of votes Bailey imagined he had, Petersen made it clear that H.F. 211, like the other amendatory bills, was unlikely to get out of subcommittee, let alone to floor debate. Moreover, Speaker Murphy announced that the House would not debate the bill because “‘there’s no support in the Senate. [I]f the Senate’s not going to do it why waste our time.’”

674 Telephone interview with Polly Bukta, Clinton (June 2, 2009). Democrat Rick Olson, a co-sponsor who did understand what H.F. 211’s impact on outdoor restaurants would be (and who in 2008 had sponsored Bailey’s amendment to exempt bars and 21-and-over restaurants), also emphasized that H.F. 211 was not going anywhere. Telephone interview with Rick Olson, Des Moines (June 2, 2009).

675 Telephone interview with John Whitaker, Hillsboro (June 1, 2009).

676 Telephone interview with Doris Kelley, Waterloo (June 1, 2009). A newly elected Democrat also did not understand that Bailey’s bill would have deprived outdoor restaurant customers of protection and placed them in the same position as outdoor bar customers. Telephone interview with Sharon Steckman, Mason City (June 1, 2009).

678 Darwin Danielson, “House Leader Says Smoking Ban Changes Won’t Be Debated,”
H.F. 211’s many legislative backers, only the Iowa Restaurant Association’s and American Legion’s lobbyists declared for it, while the health groups all declared against it.\(^{679}\)

 Asked after the end of the session why, if his dispute with IDPH was over the definition and treatment of bars, he nevertheless proposed abolishing the ban on smoking on outdoor restaurant patios,\(^{680}\) Bailey—to whose re-election campaign Altria Group, Inc. (f/k/a Philip Morris) contributed $250 in 2008\(^{681}\)—replied:

> The Department of Public Health stated that the reason they did not distinguish between bars and restaurants on an income basis in line with the true definition of incidental was because they had no way of doing so. It is a silly response as the percentage of income has to be given on Dramshop insurance forms but since they claim they can’t tell the difference we applied it to everyone. If the department would acknowledge that they can tell the difference and stop making up definitions for incidental that have no grounding in the English language or legal terminology than [sic] there would be no need for the legislation at all and we could put the whole thing behind us and move on to more important issues. If they don’t change it we will get it passed this way sooner or later.\(^{682}\)

 Bailey may have made his point that he was able to recruit a bare majority to water down the law, but he did not stop other, more radical, pro-smoking bills from being filed. Republican Senator Brad Zaun, who in 2008 had vociferously advocated on behalf of a 21-and-over exemption, joined by three other Republicans and Democrat Bill Dotzler (who had pursued the same agenda in 2008), redefined a “bar” to mean establishments 60 percent or more of whose gross revenue was derived from selling alcoholic beverages for on-site consumption, struck the ban on smoking in outdoor areas of restaurants, and, most importantly, exempted 21-and-over bars.\(^{683}\) Like Bailey’s bill, it garnered supportive lobbying declarations only from the Iowa Restaurant Association and \(^{680}\) Email from Marc Linder to McKinley Bailey (June 2, 2009).

\(^{682}\) Email from McKinley Bailey to Marc Linder (June 8, 2009).

\(^{683}\) S.F. 158 (Feb. 16, 2009, by Zaun et al.); Senate Journal 2009, at 302. Republican Kettering then filed a bill that differed only by virtue of requiring such exempt bars also to use air filtering/ventilation in accordance with standards adopted by IDPH. S.F. 180 (Feb. 18, 2009, by Kettering); Senate Journal 2009, at 341.
American Legion, but broad opposition from health organizations. Another approach was tried by Republican Representative Jeffrey Kaufmann and his first-term Republican colleague Nick Wagner, who sought to try to undo the “unfair situation between bars and casinos” by striking the casino exemption and replacing it with an exemption for the gaming floor of casinos “exclusive of any restaurant located within the gaming floor which is an enclosed area and subject to the prohibitions of section 142D.3” and bars but only “as long as any prohibition against smoking or exemption from the prohibition against smoking...applies equally to both...locations.” To be sure, purporting to be indifferent as to whether casinos and bars were both covered or exempt, so long as they were treated in the same way, Kaufmann and Wagner did not explain why, if their objective was “basic fairness,” they did not create fairness for nonsmokers by simply banning smoking in both locations rather than also permitting both to be exempt. Lobbyists for all but two casinos (owned by the same company) were “undecided” on this initiative, which the health organizations, as was to be expected, declared against.

The most radical bill of all was introduced by 13 Republicans led by Thomas Sands which would have repealed the whole Smokefree Air Act and reinstated the feckless designated smoking areas bill in effect until 2008. Three co-sponsors were in their first term; the other 10, including Sands, had all voted against H.F. 2212 on final passage. He claimed to have found Democratic sympathizers, but some “refused to sign on over fears of what the Democratic leadership would think.” In explaining his repeal bill as the fulfillment of a promise to constituents, Sands repeated his nonsensical claim that the law was “simply...
unenforceable”—whereas in fact bar owners, the principal complainers, asserted that the law was all too enforceable. Indeed, the chief constituent Sands had in mind was the state’s most prominent smoking scofflaw, Larry Duncan, the owner of a bar in West Burlington, whose liquor license had been suspended and would soon be revoked. Duncan, in accordance with his flat-earth-society view of the harmlessness of secondhand smoke, rejoiced: “‘We’re totally after a rescind of the law.... That way nobody gets hurt.’” To support Republican legislators’ efforts, Duncan was promoting a trek to the legislature by business owners and others favoring outright repeal, by which time he aspired to present a petition with 200,000 signatures. Duncan opined that bar owners’ frustration, brought on by what his lawyer Bunger characterized as “their Legislature’s...high-handedness and arrogance,” would “help his cause by getting more people to collect signatures” for the petition. Such politics allegedly reflected the results of an admittedly unscientific survey that Sands (who was also busy helping Duncan and his self-anointed freedom fighters arrange their day at the capitol) had been conducting among his constituents: in response to the question as to whether the legislature should amend the law to ban smoking on casino gaming floors, exempt bars but not restaurants, or repeal the law altogether, a majority plumped for repeal, casino coverage gaining second place. The majority of Sands’s participating constituents were presumably a special breed: only the American Legion supported Sands’s repealer, which the health organizations (together with the casino in nearby Clinton) opposed, and by the next legislative forum on February 21, Sands was compelled—even in advance of Duncan’s march on Des Moines—to concede to his constituents that it was Republicans introduced two more pro-smoking bills following the repeal measure. No lobbyist declared for former House Minority Leader Christopher Rants’s bill to exempt theatrical productions (which was already contained within H.F. 211), which the health organizations opposed. And finally, first-term representative Jason Schultz, a self-professed “Christian libertarian conservative” who was already co-sponsoring Bailey’s and Sands’s bills, proposed a measure that would have repealed signage requirements. Schultz, who would have preferred total repeal of the law, had named his bill the “Submission Sticker Removal Act” (which had been omitted in drafting but which he wanted to reinsert when he resubmitted the bill in 2010) in order to point out that the function of the signs—which he deemed “offensive to the max”—was merely to document to the world that the business owner had been forced to submit to government interference with his use of his private property. Based on his assumption that everyone in Iowa already knew where smoking was prohibited, Schultz denied that the removal of signs would minimize information available to the public about where smoking was and was not lawful so as to promote confusion, non-compliance, and unenforcement, and, in any event, the amendment would not prohibit willing owners from posting signs. He acknowledged that the underlying premise of his bill (that the business owner should decide whether to permit smoking and even if he lacked the information to make that decision in accordance with public health considerations, customers could refrain from frequenting his business if they did not like his decision—a position that he took to the extreme of acquiescing in chain smoking in hospital rooms in the presence of new-borns if the administration did not ban it) was at odds with SAA’s substance and spirit, but his purpose was to initiate a discussion. He also conceded that he had failed to do so, and his bill attracted absolutely no supportive lobbyist declarations, but solid health organization opposition. Neither these nor any other smoking-related proposal managed to get out of committee.

701Telephone interview with Jason Schultz, Schleswig (July 6, 2009).
703Telephone interview with Jason Schultz, Schleswig (July 6, 2009).
705Among these stillborn bills were one introduced late in the 2009 session and two
Two days before “Duncan and his entourage” had their big day in the statehouse, Mike Sweet, editorialist and columnist for the Burlington Hawk Eye, unleashed a ruthlessly excoriating attack on the “Freedom Fighters” in particular, but, by extension, on virtually all opponents of smoking laws:

They will confront legislators with a metaphorical restaging of the Boston Tea Party. Their battle cry is not “no taxation without representation.” It’s “Free us to commit suicide,” and more to the point of the whole distasteful matter, allow us to abet homicide. ...

Owners like Duncan who are disobeying the ban claim the state has no right to tell them to how to run their businesses.

That’s ridiculous. Federal, city and state governments have always set rules by which businesses operate. It’s in the public’s interest. The current economic meltdown shows what happens when they don’t.

Governments tell businesses to collect and pay taxes. They require fire alarms, sprinkler systems, exit signs and insurance. Government sets health standards that require a clean kitchen, employees to wash their hands after going to the toilet, and not spitting in the customer’s food.

No reasonable establishment would allow customers to harm other customers with a whop to the head with a beer bottle or a pool cue. Nor would they permit customers to stab customers or shoot them.

And yet the crux of the smoking debate is that businesses have the right to turn public places into gas chambers. Spewing arsenic, cyanide, toluene, methane, ammonia, carbon monoxide and hundreds of other deadly gases into the nostrils and lungs of nonsmokers at the next table or working behind the bar.

With this rousing send-off (which the chairman of the Commission on Tobacco Use Prevention and Control called “courageous” and suggested be published in every newspaper in Iowa) the Freedom Fighters finally embarked on their rendezvous with constitutional destiny in Des Moines in the Capitol during the 2010 session. H.F. 731 (Mar. 16, 2009, by Paulsen) would have exempted residential treatment facilities affiliated with Alcoholics Anonymous; House Journal 2009, at 804. H.F. 2105 (Jan. 21, 2010, by Kaufman, Wagner, and Schultz) would have required every gambling license application referendum to include a separate proposition on approval or disapproval of the smoking ban; House Journal 2010, at 136. H.F. 2227 (Feb. 1, 2010, by Chambers, Zirkelbach, Windschitl, and Bailey) would have exempted certain veterans organizations posts from the smoking ban except when used for functions to which the general public was invited; House Journal 2010, at 210.

Mike Sweet, “Dubious Fighters,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Mar. 8, 2009 (8A) (edit.) (NewsBank).

rotunda, where, ironically, as House Majority Leader McCarthy had poignantly observed in 2008, the tobacco smoke had once been so thick that he was unable to see the dome. The movement’s atavistic character was perfectly captured by one of its members: “Tired of standing outside in inclement weather to enjoy a cigarette, Tom Tow stepped inside the Capitol Tuesday to tell legislators to repeal the state indoor smoking ban. ‘I’m not a child.... The state’s trying to tell me what to do and where I can do it.’” Only about 100 smokers and/or business owners—about 0.05 percent of the total number of petition signers for which the group had hoped—gathered in the Statehouse in support of repealing the Smokefree Air Act and in favor of “‘freedom of choice for bar owners...and their patrons.” The autopolydidact Duncan modestly allowed as “‘I am not the most educated person in this room but I think a long time before I completed my education, I could read that to know that this law was not constitutional’”—and, once again, the fatal defect consisted in the casino exemption. During the hour-long assembly Duncan, based on no data and “[d]espite polls showing strong statewide support for a smoking ban,” claimed that SAA was unpopular and that legislators who supported the unconstitutional bill would “pay a political price”—a forecast/threat that he and other smoking facilitators had already made in vain in 2008. Demonstrating a mastery of science and medicine unblemished by even a trace of commercial self-interest, Duncan also “questioned oft-quoted figures regarding how many people die from secondhand smoke, as well as a conspiracy against curing cancer.”

The pro-smoking mindset was nicely projected by Dennis Whitson, commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars post in Ottumwa, who in a few days would be appearing before an ABD ALJ because the police had repeatedly observed people smoking there (the smoking bartender on one occasion blurting out “‘oh shit’” as she saw the officer enter) and whose liquor license the ALJ would propose revoking in April. Ex-soldiers

---

708 See above ch. 35.
712 Christinia Crippes, “Freedom Fighters Take on Des Moines,” Hawk Eye (Burlington), Mar. 11, 2009 (1A) (NewsBank). apparently suffering wounds left and right in Ottumwa, Iowa, he allowed as:

“’Every film you have ever (seen), whether it be fiction or factual, of a military operation a wounded man always had a cigarette in his mouth and now they want to take that away. I think it’s wrong. ... The men and women of the V.F.W. fought for the constitution...fought for life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness and our illustrious Democratic Party seems to think that means they can turn us into a socialist state and I don’t think that can happen...not as long as I’m alive.’”

Shortly after the suicide-committing/homicide-abetting freedom fighters had made their pitch in the now-smokefree rotunda on behalf of resurrecting the good old days when they were free to spew their toxins and carcinogens at will, all the smoking bills were dead in subcommittee for the 2009 session. Later, after adjournment, Senator Thomas Courtney from Burlington, the epicenter of bar-owner civil disobedience, opined that the bar owners’ pending court challenges were “the reason” for the legislature’s abstention: “I still think the courts will rule that we need to get it out of the casinos.... [T]here’s a lot of folks in the Legislature [who] would like to do something about the outdoors part, and once it’s (the court cases are) settled, I think we may do that.” Janet Petersen, the chief sponsor of H.F. 2212 and House Commerce Committee chair, differed regarding the causality, timing, and outcome. On the first anniversary of the law’s effective date, she predicted that in order to allow for an “adequate transition period,” no push would be made to remove exemptions until 2011, but even then she did not believe that the legislature would revisit other issues such as the ban on smoking on certain outdoor patios.

Even some inveterate enemies began to accept the law to the extent of not demanding its total repeal. For example, in the course of the law’s operation, even the bar owners’ opposition to the Smokefree Air Act underwent a certain mellowing in the sense that it morphed into a 21-and-over adult entertainment position. On the occasion of the law’s first anniversary, a leader of the Iowa Bar

---

717 Rod Boshart, “Smokefree Law Touted for Cultural Shift,” July 1, 2009, on dehemed it a foregone conclusion that Democrats would also not permit floor debate in 2010. Telephone interview with Jason Schultz, Schleswig (July 6, 2009).
Owners Coalition, Brian Froehlich, a self-professed “‘freedom fighter,’” for “‘business rights,’’ summoned up the rationality to concede that no one was opposed to a smoking ban, for example, in restaurants, hospitals, grocery stores, or gas stations.\footnote{Douglas Burns, “With Court Challenge to Smoking Ban, Wilton Bar owner Sees Self as ‘Freedom Fighter,’” \textit{Iowa Independent}, July 6, 2008, on http://iowaindependent.com/2558/with-court-challenge-to-smoking-ban-wilton-bar-owner-sees-self-as-freedom-fighter (visited June 30, 2009).}

More Stasis Even with a Large Republican House Majority in 2011

Troy Stremling, governmental affairs director for Ameristar Casino, said casino interests oppose the expansion because businesses should have the right to decide what goes on in their businesses.

“We’ve been opposed to all smoking bans.... It’s a business rights issue. We have a right, as long as smoking is legal, to decide what goes on in our business.”\footnote{“Talk @ 12,” WSUI (Iowa City), June 30, 2009, 12:00-1:00 p.m.}

If the House Democratic leadership in 2009 sought to keep amendatory bills to add casino coverage to the Smokefree Air Act off the agenda lest uncontrollable legislative momentum transmogrify them into anathematic repeal vehicles, it might have been expected that when Republicans captured a 20-vote House majority (and narrowed Democrats’ Senate lead to 26-24) for the 2011 session,\footnote{Mike Glover (AP), “Anti-Tobacco Groups Pushing to Expand Smoking Ban” (Feb. 23, 2011), on http://www.bloomberg.com (visited May 8, 2011).} the anti-smoking movement would have had a considerable incentive to resist the temptation of opening Pandora’s box. But perhaps viewing Senate Majority Leader Gronstal as a safeguard against any runaway House bills, advocates forged ahead. A month after the disastrous 2010 election, which saw Democrats yield 16 House and 6 Senate seats to Republicans, Senator Quirmbach shared with the Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission his judgment that while he did not foresee SAA’s repeal, he also did not think that the casino issue would “move forward.” Undeterred by this news, Commission Chair Cathy Callaway insisted that closing the exemption “is still a goal and seems to have support from both sides of the legislature.”\footnote{http://www.legis.iowa.gov/Legislators/house.aspx?ga=84&sort=Party; http://www.legis.iowa.gov/Legislators/senate.aspx?ga=84&sort=Party.}

\footnote{Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Commission Meeting Minutes 2 (Dec. 3, 2010), on http://www.idph.state.ia.us/tobacco/common/pdf/012811_minutes.pdf.}
As in 2009, Representative Mark Smith early in January introduced a bill to repeal the casino exemption, which once again was interred in a subcommittee. Callaway nevertheless told the Commission at the end of January that she was talking to legislators about eliminating the exemption. Adroitly, in the latter part of February, the Iowa Tobacco Prevention Alliance released the results of a survey conducted two weeks earlier of 500 registered voters in Iowa that found that 63 percent wanted SAA expanded to cover non-tribal casinos (and 79 percent felt that the law had “made Iowa a better place to live,” though oddly only 73 percent did not want the law repealed). Presented by Callaway at a statehouse news conference, the data release prompted press coverage and even editorial support. Perhaps the greatest propaganda coup achieved by the anti-smoking movement was the statement the same day by Dr. Mariannette Miller-Meeks, a conservative Republican ophthalmologist, former Iowa Medical Society president, University of Iowa medical professor, retired Army lieutenant colonel, and twice-defeated congressional candidate, whom newly re-elected Governor Branstad had nominated as IDPH director. At her confirmation hearing before the Senate Human Resources Committee Meeks declared: “If you all vote to push smoking out of casinos, we’ll make sure that happens.” She prefers education and prevention efforts to reduce smoking but added that “sometimes you have to pass laws.” Miller-Meeks said raising the cigarette tax and banning smoking in the workplace probably has done more to reduce smoking than anything else. But then this stance was hardly surprising since Branstad himself, during his 2010 campaign for years 17-20 of his governorship—during his four previous terms as governor he had adopted an anti-tobacco position—stated that he supported the statewide smoking ban, would not sign a repeal, and would support extending the ban to the gambling floors of casinos.\footnote{Rod Boshart, “Culver, Branstad Support Casino Smoking Ban,” \textit{WC}, Sept. 9, 2010, on \url{http://wcfcourier.com/news/local/article_cfd83114-bcd3-11df-8cbd-001cc4c03286.html}; O. Kay Henderson, “Expect Smoking to Continue in Casinos,” Radio Iowa (Dec. 30, 2010), on \url{http://www.radioiowa.com/2010/12/30/expect-smoking-to-continue-on-casino-floors}. An IDPH employee who wished to remain anonymous stated that Branstad’s stance was the only reason that Miller-Meeks supported a casino ban.

---

Ironically, all but one of the remaining anti- and pro-smoking bills were introduced by Republicans and met the same fate as Smith’s (though two of the highest-profile anti-smoking Democrats used a different amendatory procedure for attempting to repeal the casino exemption). The anti-smoking measures included a smoking ban within 100 feet of an entrance to a hospital or long-term care facility\footnote{House Journal 2011, at 323, 364 (Feb. 15, 17) (H.F. 274, by James Van Engelenhoven).} as well as a Senate and House bill replicating Smith’s.\footnote{Senate Journal 2011, at 369, 388 (Feb. 22, 23) (S.F. 283, by Randy Feenstra); House Journal 2011, at 442, 447 (Feb. 25, 28) (H.F. 412, by Kevin Koester). According to Koester: “My bill has minor differences [only in the title] at request of the IA Lung Association. Rep. Smith and I are in different political parties and the ILA also wanted a sponsor from the majority party in the House.” Email from Kevin Koester to Marc Linder (May 11, 2011). A House Democrat speculated that as an educator and “one of very few reasonable Republicans in the legislature,” Koester “probably has real anti-smoking sympathies.” Email from Nate Willems to Marc Linder (May 11, 2011).

Ironically, all but one of the remaining anti- and pro-smoking bills were introduced by Republicans and met the same fate as Smith’s (though two of the highest-profile anti-smoking Democrats used a different amendatory procedure for attempting to repeal the casino exemption). The anti-smoking measures included a smoking ban within 100 feet of an entrance to a hospital or long-term care facility\footnote{Randy Feenstra, “Union Laws and Iowa” (Feb. 22, 2011), on Randy Feenstra, New Generation Republican Blog, on \url{http://newgenerationrepublican.com/blog/?m=201102}.} as well as a Senate and House bill replicating Smith’s.\footnote{“It’s Time to End Smoking Loophole for Iowa’s Casino’s,” \textit{Globe Gazette} (Mason City), Feb. 27, 2011 (edit.), on \url{http://www.globegazette.com}.} Randy Feenstra, the senator who introduced the casino exemption repealer, was an anti-union Republican—unions’ “power has become so great that the unions have lost their initial reason for existence (giving a voice to the worker)”\footnote{Rod Boshart, “Survey: Nearly Two-Third [sic] of Iowans Favor Expanding Smoke Ban to Casinos,” \textit{Q-CT}, Feb. 23, 2011, on \url{http://www.qctimes.com}.}—animated by the “‘level playing field’” argument that casinos held an “unfair advantage” over nearby restaurants or bars.\footnote{“It’s Time to End Smoking Loophole for Iowa’s Casino’s,” \textit{Globe Gazette} (Mason City), Feb. 27, 2011 (edit.), on \url{http://www.globegazette.com}.} Although Feenstra had initially declared that the bill was gaining bipartisan support and that prospects for passage were “‘pretty good,’”\footnote{Rod Boshart, “Survey: Nearly Two-Third [sic] of Iowans Favor Expanding Smoke Ban to Casinos,” \textit{Q-CT}, Feb. 23, 2011, on \url{http://www.qctimes.com}.} once the measure had missed the March 4 deadline for securing committee approval in order to survive—and a week earlier Gronstal had said...}
that “he wouldn’t go to extraordinary lengths to press” the Senate committee to act—Feenstra tried a different tack by offering the text of his very brief bill as an amendment to a gambling bill. Ironically, however, Democratic Senate President Kibbie, in response to an objection raised by a Democratic senator, ruled it non-germane.

Nor was Feenstra the first to attempt this procedural work-around. Back in March, Senate Democrat McCoy, a long-time anti-smoking legislator, offered an amendment during a subcommittee hearing on a gambling bill to subject casinos to the no-smoking law, but the chair, Senator Dotzler—whose pro-tobacco stance in 2008 has been detailed—refused to accept amendments. Then during floor debate on a gambling bill in the House on May 3, Petersen, SAA’s chief advocate in 2008, offered an amendment that would have shortened the process of county-level voter approval of licenses if the casinos prohibited smoking, but it lost on a voice vote. Undaunted, Petersen, joined by seven other Democrats (including Smith and Tyler Olson), immediately offered a variant that would have directly inserted repeal of the casino smoking ban exemption into the bill, but the speaker ruled that it was not germane. Her attempt to overcome this obstacle by suspending the rules ran aground on an almost perfect party-line procedural vote of 40 to 55.

The pro-smoking bills were fewer and less diverse than in 2009. The chief vehicle was largely a re-run of Zaun’s 2009 bill, which: exempted bars—defined as deriving 60 percent of their gross revenues from alcoholic beverages consumed on premises—that excluded persons under 21; permitted smoking in parts of restaurants in which alcoholic beverages could be bought and consumed; and repealed the smoking ban in outdoor seating/serving areas of restaurants.\textsuperscript{739} This time round Zaun was able to mobilize nine other Republican co-signers, but only the Iowa Restaurant Association’s lobbyist declared for the bill.\textsuperscript{740} The only other let’s-bring-back-secondhand-smoke-exposure bill was introduced solo by House Democrat Kurt Swaim, a quondam senior staff attorney in the Northeast regional office of the Legal Services Corporation of Iowa,\textsuperscript{741} who in 2008 had voted twice against SAA.\textsuperscript{742} His measure would have exempted from the smoking ban any public place that restricted entry to persons 18 and over and ensured that the smoke from such smoking did not infiltrate into smoking-prohibited areas.\textsuperscript{743} No lobbyist even bothered to declare for it or its Senate counterpart filed by Zaun and two other Republicans.\textsuperscript{744}

---

Thus ended for 2011 the unsuccessful efforts to strengthen or dismantle SAA.
This stand-off did not leave anti-smoking Democrats of one mind as to what the future held for tobacco control. At one extreme, a Senate assistant majority leader, asked whether House Republicans had the votes to repeal parts or all of the law, confidently responded: “Not going to happen. Branstad has said he is opposed and people like smokefree places a lot.”\textsuperscript{745} At the other extreme, a House member, reckoning that Republicans had about 45 House votes for repeal, speculated that if they gained control of the Senate they might repeal the whole act.\textsuperscript{746} Injecting further uncertainty into this perspective, yet another House Democrat, when prompted by a query as to whether there were enough “unreasonable” Republicans in his chamber to repeal the law or major parts of it, responded: “Maybe if it was a priority of their leadership, but it does not seem to be.” But in response to the suggestion that House Republican leaders might have refrained from pushing repeal simply because it would have squandered political resources since Senate Majority Leader Gronstal had the power to thwart passage, he cautioned: “They are already looking at their 2013 agenda when they hope to \textsuperscript{739}Senate Journal 2011, at 130,179 (Jan. 24, 27) (H.F. 81, by Zaun et al.).

\textsuperscript{740}http://coolice.legis.state.ia.us/Cool-ICE/default.asp?Category=Lobbyist&Service
=DspReport&ga=84&type=b&hbill=SF81
\textsuperscript{741}http://www.house.iowa.gov/swaim/?page_id=3
\textsuperscript{742}See above ch. 35.
\textsuperscript{743}House Journal 2011, at 303, 330 (Feb. 9, 15) (H.F. 232, by Swaim).
\textsuperscript{744}Senate Journal 2011, at 438, 457 (Mar. 1, 2) (S.F. 352, by Chelgren, Zaun, Sorenson).
\textsuperscript{745}Email from Joe Bolkcom to Marc Linder (May 10, 2011).
\textsuperscript{746}Telephone interview with David Jacoby, Coralville (May 9, 2011).
have defeated Gronstal and taken control of the Senate too.

Any future effort to re-impose involuntary exposure to tobacco smoke on the vast majority of non-smoking Iowans who were looking forward to life without it would have to explain why some capitalists’ (empirically baseless) profit-based demands for the resumption of laissez-faire should trump the astonishing public health consequences of the statewide smoking ban in public places. Replicating results that have been recorded elsewhere under similar bans, a recent study determined that during the first two years of the law (July 2008-June 2010) hospitalizations for tobacco related diseases are well below those of the previous three years. More than 10,100 hospitalizations among Iowa residents are estimated to have been prevented because of the Iowa Smokefree Act. ...

- Hospitalization for acute myocardial infarctions or heart attacks declined 8%....
- Hospitalization for other forms of coronary heart disease...declined 31%....
- Hospitalization for congestive heart failure declined 10%....
- Hospitalizations have also been reduced for chest pain/angina (down 21%), peripheral circulatory disease (down 26%), transient ischemic attacks (down 10%) and smoking-related conditions in newborns (down 10%). ...
- Tobacco related admissions declined at more than twice the rate (10.7%) of all hospital admissions (4.7%).

---

747 Email from Nate Willems to Marc Linder (May 11, 2011).

749 “Tobacco Control Makes a Difference!” on http://www.iowasmokefreeair.gov/common/pdf/other/sfaa_brief.pdf (visited May 12, 2011). Two of the study’s co-authors stressed that the data in the final, peer-review-edited version might differ somewhat and conceded that if the large drop in in-state cigarette sales translated into a large decline in smoking prevalence, the decline in hospitalizations might also, to some unquantifiable extent, reflect a decline in firsthand smoking. Telephone interviews with Dr. William Haynes, Department of Internal Medicine, University of Iowa (May 17, 2011), and JoAnn Muldoon, IDPH, Des Moines (May 17, 2011). As of mid-December 2011 the authors had still not analyzed the complete database and did not anticipate submitting the article for publication until February 2012 at the earliest. Telephone interview with JoAnn Muldoon (Dec. 15, 2011).