Letter from the Director

Every four years, Iowa takes pride of place in the nominating process for the next president of the United States—a fact that makes the fall residency of the International Writing Program (IWP) all the richer for the poets and writers visiting from around the world. But after the conclusions of the Iowa caucuses, when all the candidates and their teams have departed, along with media from all corners of the globe, we at the IWP remember that what endures is the written word. “Literature is news that stays news,” Ezra Pound wrote, an insight that governs our thinking in the design of the many programs described in the following pages. Writers from around the world look to the IWP not only for inspiration and ideas but also for a community committed to producing “the news that stays news.” In every setting, from the campus of the University of Iowa to the countries we visit on cultural diplomacy missions to the virtual world, we establish spaces suitable for fruitful interchange, dialogue, and the creation of new work, in a range of literary genres, media, settings, and platforms. Our mission—to connect the writers of the world in an ever expanding literary network—is on abundant display in this report—2015 was a banner year for the IWP—and we invite you to explore with us some of the many ways that we try to tell the real story of our time.

With warm regards,

Christopher Merrill
Fall Residency

Started in 1967, the Fall Residency has hosted 1,400 writers from more than 140 countries. This year’s writers arrived from cities as distant as Havana and São Paulo, Abuja and Cairo, Helsinki and Istanbul, Kabul and Ulaanbatar, Seoul and Manawatu, Manila and Phnom Penh, and many more. To travel to each of these destinations would take months, perhaps years, or perhaps yet would never be possible in the average person’s lifetime. For nearly three months, writers take time away from their families and their professions to come to Iowa to write and to talk about writing, to share their work and to learn about the literary traditions the world around. For some, they also learn how their work fits into the literary landscape. Birgül Oğuz (Turkey) said, “I gained a kind of insight about my own writing and its possible place in world literature in a very short time and in a very intense way. That would take me years to arrive at that point without IWP.” And for others, the opportunity for cultural exchange was the pinnacle. Antônio Xerxenesky (Brazil) said, “The greatest part was the cultural exchange, I believe. I learned so much about Togo, Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan, Finland—almost as much as I learned about the U.S. This may not have a direct impact on my writing, but it certainly shapes who I am, and therefore has a creative impact.”

The Fall Residency wrapped up its 48th year, offering yet another successful literary and cultural exchange program often described as life-changing by its participants. This year, 34 writers from 33 countries joined the IWP for eighty days, from late August to early November. The Residency provides participants ample time and space for work amid a lively calendar of events, including readings at the Shambaugh House and the Prairie Lights Bookstore, class visits, panel discussions, and interdisciplinary art projects with other University of Iowa departments. Beyond Iowa City, collaborations with community arts organizations across the U.S., cultural field trips, visits to regional events, and travel to places such as Chicago, Seattle, New Orleans, Washington, D.C., and New York City.

“The program deepened my understanding of America, which will help me as a translator of American poetry.” —Aki Salmela (Finland)
York are designed to give the visiting writers a richer, more textured sense of America’s fabric. In 2015 that roster of places included national literary institutions like the Library of Congress, the Poetry Foundation, the PEN/Faulkner Foundation and the Hugo House in Seattle, with IWP writers featured in live readings, teaching workshops, and recording readings for institutional archives.

RESIDENCY OUTREACH

Chinese Student Engagement Projects at the University of Iowa

The largest segment of the University of Iowa’s international student population hails from China. In 2015 the IWP began programming to connect this growing student group with the IWP’s historical ties to Chinese-language literature.

In October, the IWP screened the film One Tree Three Lives in the Iowa Memorial Union. Directed by Angie Chen, this documentary chronicles the life of the IWP’s co-founder, the Chinese-Taiwanese-American writer Hualing Nieh Engle. 2015 Fall Residents Chung Wenyin (Taiwan) and Matthew Cheng (Hong Kong) offered introductory comments. Hualing Nieh Engle was in attendance, alongside friends and family, Fall Residents, UI students, and Iowa City community members.

In November, IWP Associate Director Hugh Ferrer and UI PhD candidate Adrienne Rose led a Chinese-English creative writing workshop. Five Chinese international students at UI – both undergraduate and graduate students, studying disciplines ranging from mathematics to English – participated and discussed how narratives operate and how intended audience can affect a work’s structure. During the workshop, the students wrote short pieces of prose about Iowa City in both English and Chinese, and some self-translated their own work.

Clockwise: IWP writers at the University of Washington-Seattle; Antônio Xerxenesky (Brazil) reads at Iowa City’s Prairie Lights Bookstore; Sara Baume (Ireland) reads at the Hugo House in Seattle. Karen Villeda (Mexico) and Mookie Katigbak-Lacuesta (Philippines) before their reading at the Poetry Foundation in Chicago (photos Kathleen Maris Paltrineri).

“The greatest part was the cultural exchange, I believe. I learned so much about Togo, Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan, Finland, almost as much as I learned about the US. This may not have a direct impact on my writing, but it certainly shapes who I am, and therefore has a creative impact.”
—Antônio Xerxenesky (Brazil)
Between the Lines

In the summer of 2015, Between the Lines grew again, to include more countries and more students in two sessions of this unique creative writing and cultural exchange program. The first session brought together 35 students hailing from Russia, Arabic-speaking countries, China, and the U.S. A special second session united 18 students from Armenia, Turkey, and the U.S. Both sessions focused on the theme “Peace and the Writing Experience” as a way to examine the possibilities for literature and writing to foster empathy, cross-cultural understanding, and a shared concern for the human condition.

In both sessions, weekdays started at Shambaugh House, with a morning meeting for all participants. Students then went to their world literature class, taught on rotation by the visiting faculty—poets and writers from the U.S. and abroad—and touching on topics that ranged from Turkish ekphrastic poetry to ancient Arabic epics. In the afternoons, students developed their own creative writing skills in workshops conducted in their native languages. They also explored new genres: BTL Russia/Arabic World featured a digital storytelling workshop by Timothy David Orme, a slam poetry session with Dianna Harris from Chicago's Louder Than A Bomb program, a playwriting workshop with BTL Undergraduate Research Fellow Alyssa Conkinis, and a collaborative translation project with translator Genevieve Guzman. BTL Armenia/Turkey featured similar opportunities: a digital storytelling workshop with poet and web developer Lauren Haldeman, a two-session translation project with Aron Aji, the director of the University of Iowa's MFA in Literary Translation, a two-day playwriting and peace workshop with distinguished playwright Catherine Filloux, and a slam poetry workshop and reading at Prairie Lights with Kevin Coval, founder of Louder Than A Bomb. Finally, in collaboration with the Iowa Young Writers Studio and Iowa Youth Writing Project, students from both sessions shared their own work at open mic events at the High Ground Café.

Students in the Armenia/Turkey session say goodbye at the conclusion of the program.

BTL is all about making connections. As one participant wrote about the Armenia/Turkey session: “BTL, July 30th [our final day], the borders were destroyed.” Such breakthroughs occur not only because of classes, workshops, and events, but also through the small moments of exchange: a Russian student teaching a student from Israel the Russian alphabet on a bus ride to a Ramadan dinner at the Islamic Center of Cedar Rapids, an Armenian student giving a Turkish student a pomegranate necklace—a symbol of fertility and abundance—at the opening orientation of BTL Armenia Turkey, and of course the many tears shed at the conclusion of both sessions. Mutual understanding was also built into student-led “101” events, which offered new glimpses of literary and cultural traditions; a literary scavenger hunt and Fourth of July celebrations at the Jazz Festival in Iowa City for BTL Russia/Arabic World; day trips to Davenport and Maquoketa Caves State Park; and an afternoon at a community kitchen during the Armenia/Turkey session, with students, faculty, and staff cooking a variety of traditional dishes unique to each culture.
Launched in 2012, Book Wings is a collaborative theater project designed to bring together writers, actors, directors, and new media professionals from the United States and partner countries in a virtual environment. Previous iterations connected with theaters in Russia, China, and Iraq. The 2015 Book Wings featured Cape Town, South Africa.

In celebration of the 25th anniversary of Nelson Mandela’s release from prison, this year’s Book Wings commissioned six original plays—three by South African playwrights, three by U.S. playwrights—on the theme of “release,” reflecting the diversity of the two nations’ respective literary traditions.

Audience members from around the world watched the performance online. With nearly 200 audience members in Iowa City and Cape Town, joined by hundreds watching the performance via livestream, the performance was seen in a total of 32 countries. Official watch parties were held at the University of York (UK) and the University of Ghana at Legon.

Special thanks to our partners, including the University of Cape Town, Artscape Theatre Centre, U.S. Consulate General Cape Town, African Arts Institute, UI Department of Theatre Arts, UI Information Technology Services, UITV, and the UI’s Writing University.

“What a fantastic evening. Books give you wings, theatre allows you to fly. Thank you @UIIWPNelson Mandela #bookw #ilovetheatre.” —@curiousgurl via Twitter

Distance Learning

The Distance Learning (DL) Program encourages international access to education, dialogue, and community, especially in underserved regions. Through MOOCs (Massive Open Online Courses), open-application courses, outreach courses, and web-based exchanges, writers and readers are given forums and frameworks for sustained dialogue, fellowship, and cross-cultural understanding. Continually innovating, the DL Program has developed online classrooms that use live and recorded videos; synchronous and asynchronous text-based teaching discussions; peer feedback community structures; public domain text, audio, and video resources; and engagement via social media.

In 2015, the DL Program offered two creative writing MOOCs on three new online learning platforms on a trial basis and selected a platform for future MOOC delivery. Expanding on the successes of 2014 programming, the DL Program developed the writing-photography exchange Narrative Witness, and two open-application writing seminars; new programming included the creation of a course model to support creative expression and provide international community for aspiring women writers. The concept of asynchronous online workshops, pioneered in 2014, was refined for ongoing use throughout 2015, and a supporting structural element of video master classes and guest lectures was introduced. In order to provide opportunities for ongoing community expansion and cultural exchange, the DL Program’s Facebook group “Distance Learning Alumni” was expanded to include alumni of all DL open-application courses, outreach courses, and exchanges. For the second year, the participants in the IWP’s 2015 MOOCs continued their community discussions within the DL Program’s “How Writers Write Poetry” and “How Writers Write Fiction” Facebook groups. Through the study of users’ and instructors’ experiences, DL continues to fine-tune programming design to create more accessible, educational, and exciting experiences for writing and literature students, educators, and enthusiasts worldwide.

Harry Leeds, an English Language Fellow, teaches a course based on How Writers Write Poetry 2015 in Pavlodar, Kazakhstan. Read more about Leeds’ work on Iowa Now.
The universe of literary education you have created here has given me the most basic and the most important tools that I need. I don’t know whether I can be taught to write. But I have been taught how to approach writing. I have been taught how to approach - and better understand - writers. I have been shown how else to create, how else to read, to evaluate, to imagine. And I’m no longer alone. ”

Lanterns of Hope

The youth poetry project Lanterns of Hope was launched in March of 2015 as a means of encouraging Iraqis ages 16 to 23 to make their voices heard and to creatively communicate their visions for the future of their country. Poetry submissions were solicited from youth living across Iraq, and seven distinguished poets—five Iraqis writing in Arabic and Kurdish, one Iranian writing in Kurdish and English, and one American writing in English and translating from the Kurdish—were engaged to mentor the emerging poets as they addressed the ways in which the world sees their country.

In total, 22 poems in Arabic, Kurdish, and English were chosen for the anthology, and the mentors guided the young authors through revisions. Each poem was then translated into the project’s other two languages, so that the final volume could fully highlight the diversity of language and culture within Iraq. The poems have now been anthologized into an e-book, available on the IWP website starting in January 2016, and printed in a limited soft-cover edition. The beginning of 2016 will also see a recognition ceremony in Baghdad honoring all the participants and celebrating the anthology’s publication.

Partnering with the IWP to sponsor this project was the Baghdad UNESCO City of Literature Steering Committee, in collaboration with the Iraqi House of Poetry, the Union of Iraqi Writers, the Iraq Literary Review, and the US Embassy in Baghdad.

Overseas Reading Tours

The IWP’s Overseas Reading and Lecture Tour program provides a unique opportunity in select countries around the world for American writers to learn from their international counterparts, while sharing their knowledge and experience with students and educators. This year’s cultural diplomacy missions included trips to Venezuela, Colombia, and Ukraine. From capital cities to each country’s farthest corners, the writers gave lectures, led workshops, spoke on panels, and joined roundtable discussions. In all, the writers were guest lecturers at thirteen universities spread across three countries and seven cities; one group was featured at the Venezuela Festival de la Lectura; the wide range of subjects is reflected in panel topics such as “Literature and War” (Ukraine) and “Do Creative Writing Programs Homogenize Literature?” (Colombia). In each country the Americans were immersed in local culture, and had a chance to explore history and heritage with guided visits to places such as the Botero Museum in Medellín, the Shevchenko Museum in Kyiv, and a literary tour focused on Gabriel García Márquez’s Cartagena.

Publications

The IWP publishes original work in a range of formats: hardbound literary, digital literary, and audio-visual.

The 91st Meridian Books series at Autumn Hill Books produced Fall and Rise, American Style: Eight International Writers Between Gettysburg and the Gulf, a collection of essays on America’s persistent capacity for recovery from crisis, written in the wake of the program’s 2011 US study tour. And we were honored that NSDP Publishers in Yangon (Myanmar) wanted to publish A Knot Is Where You Tie A Rope, an anthology of two decades’ worth of writing by IWP’s Burmese participants.

The program’s journal, 91st Meridian, published a new issue of poetry and prose from around the world. And translators among the 2015 IWP participants were extensively interviewed for a forthcoming issue of Exchanges, edited by the MFA_LT students at UI.

In addition, the collected work of the 2014 Distance Learning exchange, Narrative Witness: Caracas-Sarajevo, was published on iwpcollections.org.

New video material—all of which can be seen on the IWP Media Gallery—include
- the “On the Map” series of literary interviews with ten of this year’s Fall Residency participants;
- the collage “News from Home,” in which five writers talk about keeping up—or not—with their local scene;
- The Legend in My Heart, a feature-length document of IWP’s 2014 reading tour in China focused on art-making with disability communities.
Silk Routes: Heritage, Trade, Practice

Silk Routes: Heritage, Trade, Practice is a three-year program that began with a symposium in the Maldives and will conclude in 2016 with a special installment of the IWP’s summer writing camp, Between the Lines. 2015 marked the midway point. The focus was on developing the Silk Routes website and on the program of mini-grants that are spurring cultural development at a grassroot level.

MINI-GRANTS

Seven mini-grants have been issued to writers from six countries in order to promote local creative communities and foster stronger cultural networks between countries in Asia and the Middle East—along the historic Silk Routes. Highlights include: in Pakistan, an IWP reunion at the Karachi Literature Festival, of Christopher Merrill, with alumni Shandana Minhas and Bilal Tanweer, that also brought two Indian writers to Karachi for two weeks; in Nepal, several successful translations by La.Lit Magazine as part of an ongoing project of transcribing oral stories from remote regions of the country before the stories are lost; and in Sri Lanka, a forthcoming book from writer Ameena Hussein who chronicled the 14th century travels of Ibn Battuta in that country.

To further promote creative writing and to monitor the success of each in-country grant, the Silk Routes program organized mentor trips. In addition to Christopher Merrill’s trip to Pakistan and the Karachi Book Festival, IWP staff member Lisa Daily traveled with distinguished American writer and mentor Ron Carlson to visit the grant projects in both India and Sri Lanka. Plans for a trip to Nepal and Kyrgyzstan were postponed due to the tragedy of the Nepalese earthquake in April 2015.

In March 2015, Silk Routes launched its online gallery, featuring the creative work of contributors from (to date) 25 countries. The website maps and documents heritage through original writing and creative reports appealing to a range of senses—images, written texts, sounds and videos, recipes—and strives to strengthen regional creative networks by providing resources for collaborative translation exchanges, literary festivals, and publications.

WhitmanWeb has launched its second series, Whitman and the Civil War. The 36-week project explores Walt Whitman’s literary response—in poetry and prose—to the American Civil War, which remains the deadliest war in American history.

While conflict is the inevitable subject, peace and reconciliation are the themes discussed each week in commentaries by University of Iowa professors Ed Folsom (Co-Director of the Walt Whitman Archive) and Christopher Merrill (Director of the International Writing Program). Once readers have taken in the weekly Whitman text and commentaries, they are invited to contribute to the conversation by responding to a question posted on the WhitmanWeb site and Facebook page. All materials are available in Arabic, French, and English.

WhitmanWeb was created in 2012 and first featured “Song of Myself,” which was delivered in 52 weekly installments. The multilingual gallery is made possible through a partnership with the Walt Whitman Archive.
