• MORNING

The light. A dust
speck
floating

e Nebulous; plankton
in the sun’s diagonals

which cross
the shutters and reach
your hair,

a nest of insects
dishevelled
on the pillow.

• THE ALMOST BARREN GROUND

Locked to the shade of a wall in the middle of an endless summer. Then silence came first to the mouth, then to the ears. And so on day after day

under a flawless sky, without a drop of wind.
• LANDSCAPE

On that usual stage
(un paisaje de mierda)
where everything rots
with no cure in blisters or in simple gestures repeated in every mirror,

I tried to dig
a pit to lie in quiet and still like a leaf
untouched
by the wind.

Then nothing.

Or else we held each other embraced, the sand from the graves, oh yes, clouding our eyes.

• MASONRY

Inheritance
of rain: black land and puddles; our whole morning of heavy sleep, the beasts’ warm fumes rising from the horizon: amphoras of silence and bowls to gather the tender silt of tears: the heart left to air at the core of the night.
One by one silently, we appear standing up or sitting on wicker along the hallway, among rotting pillars; holding cracked cups or cloudy glasses discarded by a relative whose motto is: all’s useful, nothing disposable; or reading a newspaper spread out the floor. Last night the shadow of a tree half blossoming touched your body (something terse among ruined masonry) in the light of a match. I drank.

The wind warped the stretch of the waters, shook the roofs’ shingles, the timber
of doors and windows.
Frost rose some inches from the ground. It had to be that

(at a wise hour) someone goes out to forage, for flowers, salt of the badlands.

• ETIOLOGY OF US

It poisoned the white flesh in the inlet.

I tried that miasma.

And knew of the constant lament on the enemy’s face: traces in homage to the abundance of noble wounds. Ballast that should have burned as if weed.

• THE LOVERS

The animal was sacrificed.

And clear, an air bell sounded (moved by the breeze) – randomly extending its notes (those of a ghost town) under the vines

where summer, which comes before the end, was being crushed:-

Falling

   blood fills the deep basins, till they flow over.
The face

removed from the rest was washed and afterwards taken

softly

skirting puddles of light among lemon and medlar branches as if a creature.

What followed was just a routine:
perform an incision, divide up, eat.
Keep the leftovers for the dogs.

• THERA

Late in the sleep
a message arrives: two or three

bitter salt splinters release the mouth

from (ancient) breath

of silt
black crumb of sun
from where he returns thirsty for the clear fall

wine spilled upon air while a slow and solitary ceremony takes place at the very top of a dried blue

mother landscape.

• TWO TUNDRA S

residues torn off, mercilessly one over the other: steppes
braided half opened
- once

seven times (seven axes) one after the other-to silence: spawning clarity engraving

psalms in our dead tongue

(calm temple of grief)

to the dark urine
of the hollowed-out ones nourished by a moon cracked

at the shores of oily water.

● UNDER AN INCRUSTED SKY

Under a cloud-incrusted sky we sail swallowing darkness:

mute foliage fermenting in batches of bloods. I play with instruments of torture. I play, talk, hit my head against the walls of an alien city. In vain the walls are limed. In vain the prayers in temple. You ask for alms, burn the dead leaves and warm your hands under the sky incrusted with wrenched clouds.

I temper the torture devices.
You ask for alms

offering slices of the saddest heart on the square, darkened just like a mirror does when the light fades.

WHERE THE RIPE WHEAT

Where the ripe wheat falls as if a nest, grief

ooozes midday wounds over the inlet in which I insisted going to pasture.

From afar comes the dinner bell’s call.

Wash up your thighs in muddy water, clear up the folds

and show

the light face of immaculate suffering.

WINTER HOLIDAYS

at a snail’s pace
you return from the beach on the crushed shell path, ascending among dunes and daisies

Wind, blowing and cutting from the sea it touches your face

with needles of sand, and the smell of something, something dead (scattershot, a dog) in the dusty sterility of yards and streets of a coastal town

in winter.
