It’s a little thing, the word my wife says to me unexpectedly in the middle of a page I’m reading, but it opens a door I can’t see, don’t want to see, and I turn both eyes in its direction where a light swells, where I thought nobody lived anymore.
Remember that spot on the beach in Margate where there were no people? well, one morning while you and the kids were asleep I went there. Thousands of miniature crab shells washed up in a border of foam just above the water, cigarettes too.
I heard the waves hiss as if I had forgotten how they sounded, and I thought it’s because the sun fell into the ocean.
It was my daughters running down the beach, screaming “Daddy!”, waves collapsing against the jetty, the word finding its home in the third body of my mind. Like whose mouth on my mouth at the beginning of death?
The light has grown over us and covers us and, I don’t know, maybe we’ll never understand “the foot says
because I am not the hand, the ear says
because I am not the eye”
