Only paper and wood are safe from a menstruating woman’s touch.
So they built this room for us, next to the cow shed.
Here, we’re permitted to write letters, to read, and it gives a chance for our kitchen-scarred fingers to heal.

Tonight, I can’t leave the stars alone.
And when I can’t sleep, I pace in this small room, I pace from my narrow rope-bed to the bookshelf filled with dusty newspapers held down with glossy brown cowries and a conch.
When I can’t sleep, I hold the conch shell to my ear just to hear my blood rushing, a song throbbing,
a slow drumming within my head, my hips.
This aching is my blood flowing against, rushing against something—knotted clumps of my blood, so I remember fistfuls of torn seaweed rising with the foam, rising. Then falling, falling up on the sand strewn over newly laid turtle eggs.
