10-1-2006

Writing Sample

James Norcliffe

Includes "the attack on Baghdad," "the song of the belly button man," "schadenfreude," "Villon in Millerton," "a field guide to the wild flowers of the moon," "vice versa party" and "sleep sleep."
the attack on Baghdad in the evening a rising wind knocked the black peaches from the laden branches one by one they dropped and some fell into the roses where thorns tore at their flesh and some fell onto the bank and rolled down towards the river gathering dust and bruises the dark sand was stained black with peach blood and when wasps arrived and were excited the air crackled with their lust

First published in the HAZMAT REVIEW (USA) 2005 the song of the belly button man unseen on the foreshore by a jelly-rolling ocean where apple-bellied seals sleep on watermelon rocks and where flighty spotted shags crouch like parking meter wardens in a sedentary sun leaking yolks of yellow clocks

I’m the belly button man and my lotus-husky voice mutters blue-bottle nothings from a fennel scented hill until the lilac-coloured evening you will only know that whisper like a trilobitic lovesong from some prehistoric swill but in the bladderwracking darkness through the static of the breakers you will sense my phosphorescence you will hear my voice of flint

I’m the belly-button man and my fingers will infest your with a barracuda fastness you think at first is lint my smile is full of pincers my eyes are full of pinpricks and my navel is the pain-song of a flounder in a pan

I’ll com up on your crabwise when the moon is swimming naked in the jelly of the ocean I’m the belly-button man

my navel is the pricksong my navel is the purse-seine my navel is the black hole that will surely suck you in then you will be my flatfish in a belly-pan of darkness in the liver-oily vastness of a midnight pelican

*

schadenfreude

I don’t like the way the cat is looking at me her narrowing eyes her flexing claws too often I have enjoyed her delight in a moth her dance against the window now I see dead birds their little rubber legs jiggling their dead bodies their white eyelids accusing the moon

the cat stretches like a question mark the slits of her eyes glance obliquely

looking at me as if I had feathers

First published in THE STinging FLY 18 [Ireland], 2004.

*

Villon in Millerton

a plank bed in the gully and a woman there with a buckled mouth my hand plunged deep in her pigfern turpentine and tea-tree the sour-smoke smell of damp coal in the scuttle and flat beer on the bench once I stood so tall on a stolen Triumph my hair streamed behind like a thousand freedoms now I stand two miles above the flatlanders screaming so loudly no one can hear me earthbound beneath a high ocean of air I am a poisoned stream full of slippery words sliding underneath a broken bridge's collapsed members her body is heavy and overgrown her laughter is desperate already my sons have gone there is nothing for me here

2

I am tired of the chipped formica and its clouds of blood I am tired of stainless steel and its bleary reflections

I am sick of the feltex floors which stick to my feet the broken glass and crushed cans the rain the water the strangled drains my mind is a mixed miasma of smoke gathered on the ceiling cut through by angle iron and the jangling chords of a rusty guitar and I am tired of screechy voices of brotherhood and sisterhood I just want to curl like a frond of bracken into the silence of love

3

Item: I leave to the helicopters one thundering yellow fart to chunder up Calliope Street and daub the hall with camouflage

Item: I leave to the cops astigmatism arthritis gout galloping-deafness and olfactory deprivation

Item: I leave to the future that flaky blistered rusted tangled tumbedown crock of shit that is the past

4

they have lobotomised the mountain and with steel fingers they fossick and fiddle in the black stuff beneath out in the Tasman the Koreans have built a city of lights - imagine their parties: disco squid and cheap whiskey but what parties I had:

Lion Brown and Millerton Green the good old songs of The Band on a sixty amp lute beating up enough brave decibels to wake up the city of darkness the empty passageways the cloisters the dripping walls

5

I think of the things the fingers remember:
the telephone numbers the diminished sevenths the one-handed roll-your-owns and the nicotine tang of women the stink of fennel and artemisia of wormwood women and gall

6 between what is left and what is to come I squat for a second to catch my breath

I have always been a gasping stranger here a whistling frog puffed up and croaking to its echo just a mad ripple on that pool of black water

Norcliffe
I foolishly let become my world

a weatherboard a borrowed clapboard banged on the side of a clapped-out house

Oh God

before I become pluperfect just pinchbar me the hell out of here but leave my nails bent naked spiky
and dangerous and never drive them home again

Part 1 first published in VERSE (USA) 2002, republished at http://www.jacketmagazine.com/19/norc.html Full text first published in POETRY NZ 2003

*

a field guide to the wild flowers of the moon this spiky inflorescence on the answer-phone troubles the heart

the students are asked which is the more stressful? the bad news you anticipate or the bad news that comes when you least expect it?

and rats as usual provide the answer

they droop like stringy chrysanthemums the colour of rust their ulcers bloom brightly like twitching anemones they stumble through falling petals of cancer and those who have least knowledge stumble first towards the wall towards the door towards the window through which a sharp white sickle moon floats in a black sky in its pale light letters are lilac enough to read the future is round and dark enough to see dressed as Groucho in a pin-striped suit with a slouched fedora dipped acidly over one eye horn-rimmed glasses a mournful stare and a black bootbrush moustache smeared above her lip, smudged like a sigh my mother darkly taking stock my father in a floral frock grins beside her, legs astride, a pastiche of Margaret Dumont stripped of all hauteur, an affront to grace, to feminine pride he holds a beer, she a cigar; she’s bound her chest, he’s in a bra, but bare-legged for the hair later they’ll dance she’ll take the lead, but he’ll stumble backwards on heels and she’ll have to hold him there the foxtrot, the Boston Two Step the Valetta Gay Gordons – cheap laughs at his armpits, bum roll, mince the floor is chalked, slippery she'll hold him there, her mockery, her sugar, her honey, her doll

SOUTHERLY (Australia) 2001.
Collected in ALONG BLUESKIN ROAD
[2005]

*

sleep sleep

he'd said he was a stranger then frowned but nodded at the incomprehensible directions is that why there is slippage now and the treachery of ice on a pass through the mountains?

the motor is humming but the car is lost lost lost in drifts of white noise there is a suggestion of voices close close and far away and the clank of chains tractors and shackles beyond these there is the creak and crack of splitting stone the danger of falling debris the steep steep grade you trust your father you trust his eyes in the rear-vision mirror but you distrust the handbrake you feel him slipping backwards backwards through bakelite and benzene through the luminous dials the quivering needles the grip of whitewall tyres his hands frozen at ten to three on the steering wheel

Collected in ALONG BLUESKIN ROAD [2005]